HEWLETT, MAURICE (1861-1923), novelist, poet, and essayist, became known by his romantic novel of the Middle Ages, 'The Forest Lovers' (1898). He subsequently wrote historical novels ('The Life and Death of Richard Yea-and-Nay'—i.e. Richard Cœur de Lion—1900, 'The Queen's Quair', q.v., 1904, &c.); three books, 'Halfway House' (1908), 'The Open Country' (1909), 'Rest Harrow' (1910), of which the imaginary gipsy-scholar, John Maxwell Senhouse, is the central figure; 'Song of the Plow' (1916), a long poem in which the history of the 'governed race' in England and particularly of Hodge, the agricultural labourer, from the Norman Conquest, is made the subject of pungent comments; some volumes of essays written in the retirement of a Wiltshire village ('In a Green Shade' (1920), 'Wiltshire Essays' (1921), 'Extemporaneous Essays' (1922), 'Last Essays' (1924)); and a number of other volumes of fiction, poetry, and essays.

Hexameter (see Metre), a verse of six metrical feet, which in the typical form consists of five dactyls and a trochee or spondee; for any of the dactyls a spondee may be substituted, except in the fifth foot, where a spondee is rare. The hexameter is the Greek and Latin heroic metre. Longfellow's 'Evangeline' and Clough's 'Bothie' are examples of English hexameter poems.

Hey for Honesty, Down with Knavery, a comedy by T. Randolph (q.v.), printed in 1651.

'Chremylus, an honest decayed gentleman, willing to become rich, repaireth to the oracle of Apollo, to enquire how he might compass his design. The oracle enjoineth him to follow that man whom he first met with, and never part from his company. The man whom he met is the old blind God of Wealth disguised. After this Chremylus calleth his poor (but honest) neighbours to partake of his happiness. The honest party rejoice at the news; rascals only and vicious persons are discontented. Plutus is led to the temple of Esculapius and recovers his eyesight. At this knaves are even mad, they murmur and complain exceedingly. Nay the Pope himself is even starved. Lastly to vex them more, the God of Wealth is introduced, married to Honesty' (Argument prefixed to the play). 'The play is a free adaptation of Aristophanes' 'Plutus', and contains interesting allusions to current events and recent plays, including mentions of Falstaff, Hamlet's ghost, and Shakespeare himself.

HEYLYN, PETER (1600–62), educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, was a notable controversial writer, chiefly on ecclesiastical history. His chief works were 'Ecclesia Restaurata, or History of the Reformation' (1661), 'Cyprianus Anglicus' (i.e. Archbishop Laud) (1668), and 'Aerius Redivivus, or History of Presbyterianism' (1670). He was also author of 'Microcosmus: a little Description of the Great World', reissued in an enlarged form in 1652 as 'Cosmographie', a compilation of descriptions of the various countries of the world.

Heythrop (pron. 'Heethrop'), THE, a celebrated pack of foxhounds whose country lies on the Cotswolds and towards Oxford.

HEYWOOD, JOHN (1497?–1580?), was probably born in London. He married Elizabeth Rastell, niece of Sir T. More. Under Henry VIII he was a singer and player on the virginals. He was much favoured by Queen Mary, and on her death withdrew to Malines, and afterwards to Antwerp and Louvain. He published interludes, substituting the human comedy of contemporary types for the allegory and instructive purpose of the morality; but he did this in the form of narrative and debate rather than of plot and action. His principal works were 'The Four P's' (see Interludes), first printed in 1545(?), the 'Play of the Wether' (1533), in which Jupiter takes the conflicting opinions of various persons regarding the kind of weather to be supplied, and 'A Play of Love' (1534). He may also have been the author of 'The Pardoner and the Frere' and 'Johan the husbände Johan Tyb the wife & syr Jhân the precat', comedies of a wider scope. Heywood also wrote 'A Dialogue concerning Witty and Witless', and collections of proverbs and epigrams.

HEYWOOD, THOMAS (d. 1650?), dramatist, a Lincolnshire man, a student at Cambridge, and perhaps a fellow of Peterhouse. He was a member of the lord admiral's company in 1598, and later one of the queen's players, and a retainer of the earl of Southampton and the earl of Worcester. He wrote a large number of plays, many of which are lost; his chief strength lay in the domestic drama. His best plays are 'A Woman Kilde with Kindnesse' (q.v., acted 1603, printed 1607), 'The Fair Maid of the West' (q.v., printed 1631), and 'The English Traveller' (q.v., printed 1633). His other chief plays were 'The Four Prentices of London' (produced c. 1600, published 1615), ridiculed in Fletcher's 'Knight of the Burning Pestle'; 'Edward IV' (two parts, 1599); 'The Rape of Lucrece' (1608); 'The Captives' (1624); 'The Royal King and the Loyal Subject' (1637); and perhaps 'The Fayre Mayde of the Exchange' (printed 1607) and 'The Wise Woman of Hogsdon' (1638), though the attribution of these has been questioned. He also published 'An Apology for Actors' (1612), and poems (including 'Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels', 1635), translations, and compilations.

Hiawatha, a poem in trochaic dimeters by H. W. Longfellow (q.v.), published in 1855, reproducing American Indian stories which centre in the life and death of Hiawatha, son of the beautiful Wenonah and the West Wind, who marries Minnehaha ('laughing water'), the Dakota maiden.

The original legendary Hiawatha (Haion 'hwa 'tha) was a Mohawk chief, statesman, and reformer, the advocate of a League of Nations among the Indians.

Hibernia, one of the Latin names for Ireland, Ptolemy's Ἰουερπία, a corruption of Ierna, the equivalent of an old Celtic word, whence 'Erin' is derived. Claudian used the form 'Iernë'.

Hickathrift, TOM, see Tom Hickathrift.

HICKEY, WILLIAM (1749?–1830), son of the Joseph Hickey who figures in Goldsmith's 'Retaliation', was the author of entertaining 'Memoirs', 1749–1809 (first published 1913–25), in which he describes his numerous voyages to India and other parts of the world, his chequered career as an attorney, and, with great frankness, his weaknesses for women and claret.

HIERÔCLÈS, the name of several philosophers and writers of the early centuries of our era, among them the author, probably in the 4th cent., of facetious moral verses, a translation of which was absurdly attributed to Dr. Johnson.

Hieroglyphics, the characters used in writing by the ancient Egyptians, consisting of figures of objects representing (directly or figuratively) words or parts of words. They were first interpreted by Champollion (q.v.). The term is also used of the picture-writing of other peoples.

Hieronimo, the principal character in Kyd's 'Spanish Tragedy' (q.v.).

Hieronimus, see Jerome (St.).

HIGDEN

HIGDEN, RANULF (d. 1364), a Benedictine of St. Werburg's, Chester. He wrote the 'Polychronicon', a universal history down to his own days, in Latin prose. A translation of this by John Trevisa (q.v.), dated 1387, was printed by Caxton, 1482, Wynkyn de Worde, 1495, and Peter Treveris, 1527. Another translation was made in the 15th cent.; the original Latin was issued in the Rolls Series, with both English versions and continuation.

HIGGINS, MATTHEW JAMES (1810-68), known as 'Jacob Omnium' from the title of his first published article, a prominent journalist and contributor to 'The Times', 'Punch', the 'Cornhill Magazine', &c. His 'Essays on Social Subjects' was edited in 1875.

High Heels and Low Heels, in Swift's 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), the name of two political parties in Lilliput.

High Life below Stairs, a comedy by the Rev. James Townley (1714-78), produced in 1759.

Lovel, a rich young West Indian, receives warning that he is being outrageously robbed by his servants. He pretends to go to Devonshire, but returns, assumes the character of a country lad who seeks to be trained as a servant, and obtains employment under his own butler. We are presented with the gay doings below stairs, in which the servants ape the vices and follies of their masters, until, the iniquities of most of his staff having been revealed to him, Lovel discovers himself and packs them off.

Highland Widow, The, a short tragic tale, by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), the first of the 'Chronicles of the Canongate', published in 1827.

The story, which purports to be communicated by Mrs. Bethune Balfour to Chrystal Croftangry, is that of the widow of Mac-Tavish Mhor, one of the last of the Highland caterans, killed by 'red soldiers' after the '45. She lives a lonely life in the mountains with her infant son, and when he grows to manhood, being quite unconscious of the change in the times, expects to see him revive the feats and mode of life of his cateran father. The son, who adds common sense and some knowledge of the world to a brave heart, enlists instead for active service in a regiment going to America. At first incredulous, then indignant at what she considers a base surrender, the widow contrives by a sleeping potion to make him outstay his leave, and then goads him by taunts into killing the Cameron sergeant who comes to arrest him. He is shot as a deserter and a murderer, and the mother, a melancholy survival of a departed age, spends her remaining years in misery and remorse, and disappears to die, like a wild beast, where none may see her.

Highlands, The, of Scotland, the mountainous district lying north and west of a line drawn from the Firth of Clyde through Crieff to Blairgowrie and thence to Nairn on the Moray Firth.

Hildebrand (c. 1020-85), Pope Gregory VII, Benedictine monk of obscure 'Lombard-Tuscan' origin, became archdeacon of Rome in 1059 and from that time exercised great influence on the policy of the Papal see, whose temporal power he endeavoured consistently to magnify. He was elected pope in 1073, and in 1076 summoned the Emperor Henry IV to Rome to answer various charges. As a result of the conflict that ensued, Henry did penance at Canossa. But the struggle was resumed; the pope was besieged in the castle of Sant' Angelo, and died in exile.

Hildebrandslied, a fragment of an alliterative German poem of about the year 800, containing a dialogue between Hildebrand, a follower of King Theodoric, who is returning home after many years' absence, and a young knight, who challenges him. Hildebrand tries to avert the fight but fails. The knight turns out to be his own son Hadubrand. At this point the fragment breaks off.

Hildesheim, a town of Hanover. According to legend a monk of Hildesheim, reading St. Augustine's statement that to God a thousand years could be as one day, said, 'I believe, O God, what I read, but I do not understand.' He thereupon heard a white bird singing, and listened to its song with delight. On returning to his convent, he found that a hundred years had passed. Long-fellow introduces the story in his 'Golden Legend' (q.v.), calling the monk Felix.

HILL, AARON (1685-1750), dramatist, satirized by Pope, whom he attacked in his 'Progress of Wit' (1730). He wrote the words of Handel's 'Rinaldo' (1711).

HILL, SIR ROWLAND (1795-1879), originator of penny postage and other postal reforms.

Hind and the Panther, The, a poem by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1687.

Dryden was converted to Roman Catholicism in 1685, and this poem is an outcome of his change of view. It is divided into three parts. The first is occupied with a description of the various religious sects under the guise of the different beasts, and particularly the church of Rome (the 'milk-white Hind, immortal and unchanged') and the church of England (the fierce and inexorable Panther). The second part is occupied with the arguments between the two churches. The third passes from theological controversy to a satirical discussion of temporal and political matters. It contains the well-known fable of the swallows refusing to cross the sea, told by the Panther; and the retort of the Hind, in the fable of the doves, in which Gilbert Burnet (q.v.) is caricatured as the buzzard.

Hinda, a character in Moore's 'The Fire-worshippers' (see Lallah Rookh).

Hindenburg Line, known to the Germans as the SIEGFRIED LINE, the line to which, in the war of 1914-18, the German forces retreated in Feb.-Mar. 1917, the line of the Somme having proved hardly tenable in the fighting of the previous Sept. The new German position extended from the Vimy Ridge to the Chemin des Dames, passing through or near Cambrai, St. Quentin, and La Fère. The name 'Siegfried Line' properly applied only to the section between Cambrai and La Fère.

Hindi, the great Aryan vernacular language of Northern India.

Hindustani, see Urdu.

Hinemoa, the subject of a Maori legend, a beautiful maiden, the daughter of a chieftain of Rotorua in New Zealand, who fell in love with Tutanekai, the illegitimate son of Rangi-Uru, the wife of another chief, and preferred him to his three half-brothers. Guided by the sound of the music that he played in the night, she swam across the lake of Rotorua and joined him, and became his wife. (Sir G. Grey, 'Polynesian Mythology'.)

Hippo, THE BISHOP OF, St. Augustine (q.v.).

Hippocampus, a sea-horse having two fore-feet and a dolphin's tail, represented as drawing the car of Neptune. The name is given to a genus of small sea-fishes, having heads something like that of a horse.

Hippocleides, the subject of an amusing anecdote in Herodotus (vi. 128). He was the chosen suitor for the hand of the daughter of the great tyrant Cleisthenes. At the wedding-feast he ordered the flute-player to play a dance, and 'he danced, probably, so as to please himself', and wound up by standing on his head and gesticulating with his legs, to the grave displeasure of his intended father-in-law, who remarked, 'Son of Tisander, you have danced away your marriage.' 'No matter to Hippocleides', was the rejoinder.

Hippocras, a cordial drink made of wine flavoured with spices, so called because it was filtered through 'Hippocrates' sleeve' or 'bag', a conical bag of flannel, linen, or cotton, named after Hippocrates (q.v.).

HIPPOCRATÈS (c. 460-357 B.C.), born in the island of Cos, one of the Cyclades, the most celebrated physician of antiquity. Of the 'Corpus Hippocraticum' or collection of Greek medical works of various dates which have come down to us, only a small portion can be attributed to Hippocrates himself. One of the most interesting parts of it is the so-called 'Hippocratic Oath', expressing the ethical doctrine of the medical profession. (It is given on p. 213 of 'The Legacy of Greece', Clarendon Press, 1922.)

HISTORIA ECCLESIASTICA

Hippocrene, a fountain on Mt. Helicon in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses. It rose from the ground when struck by the hoof of the horse Pegasus (q.v.).

Hippodāmla, (1) the wife of Peirithous (see Centaur); (2) the daughter of Oenomaus (see Pelops).

Hippogriff, a fabulous animal, the front part like a winged griffin, the hind part like a horse; not, according to Ariosto, the product of magic, but a natural creature, though uncommon, found in mountainous regions of the north. It is on a beast of this kind that Rogero rescues Angelica from the Orc, and that Astolpho visits the moon (see Orlando Furioso).

Hippolyta, a queen of the Amazons (q.v.), given in marriage to Theseus (q.v.) by Hercules, who had conquered her and taken away her girdle, the achievement being one of his twelve labours. She had a son by Theseus called Hippolytus (q.v.). According to another version she was slain by Hercules, and it was her sister Antiope that was the wife of Theseus. She figures as one of the characters in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

Hippolytus, a son of Theseus and Hippolyta (qq.v.), famous for his virtue and misfortunes. His stepmother Phaedra fell in love with him, and, when he repulsed her advances, accused him to her husband Theseus of having offered her violence. Hippolytus fled from his father's resentment, and as he went along the sea-shore, his horses took fright at a sea-monster sent there by Poseidon at the prayer of Theseus, so that they ran away, the chariot was broken among the rocks, and Hippolytus was killed. He is the subject of a play by Euripides and of Racine's 'Phèdre'. (See also Browning's 'Artemis Prologizes'.)

Hippoménēs, see Atalanta.

Hippotādēs, Aeolus (q.v.), the son of Hippotes, and ruler of the winds.

Hiren, a corruption of Irene, the name of a female character in Peele's lost play 'The Turkish Mahamet and Hyren the fair Greek' (c. 1594), used allusively by Shakespeare ('a Henry IV', II. iv) and early 17th-cent. writers for a seductive woman, a harlot.

Historia Brittonum, see Nennius.

Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum, by Bede (q.v.), was completed in 731.

It is a Latin history of the English people, in five books, from the invasion of Julius Caesar to the year 731, beginning with a description of Britain and ending with an account of the state of the country in 731. The author draws on Pliny and other Latin authors, and on Gildas (q.v.) and probably the 'Historia Brittonum' of Nennius (q.v.). In the second book, in connexion with the consultation between Edwin of Northumbria and his nobles whether they shall accept the gospel as preached by Paulinus, occurs the famous simile of the sparrow flying out of the night into the lighted hall, and out again into the night. There is a version of this in Wordsworth's 'Ecclesiastical Sonnets', entitled 'Persuasion'.

Historic Doubts on . . . Richard III, see Walpole (Horace).

Historical Society, THE ROYAL, was founded towards the end of the year 1868, to deal with biographical and chronological investigations of historical subjects, such as do not fall within the province of archaeological societies, and yet present difficulties for private inquirers.

HITLER, ADOLF (1889-1945), an Austrian by birth. His father, the illegitimate son of Maria Anna Schicklgruber, was called Alois Schicklgruber till he was 40, then changed his name to Alois Hitler; when he was 52 Adolf was born. A man of forceful character and a skilful demagogue, Adolf Hitler worked as a house-painter before the war of 1914-18. He then entered the German army as a private, was wounded and gassed, and attained the rank of lance-corporal. The German Workers' Party was founded in January 1919 and later in that year Hitler became propagandist for the party (which in 1920 took the name of National Socialist or Nazi), and in 1921 was appointed its leader. At first the party was of importance only in Bavaria; he strengthened it by attaching to it an irregular armed force, Sturmabteilung or S.A. (brown-shirts), and a smaller body of picked men, Schutzstaffel or S.S. (black-shirts). In November 1923 Hitler took part in an attempt (the Putsch) to set up a revolutionary government. The attempt was unsuccessful and he was in detention from April to December 1924. During this period he wrote the first volume of 'Mein Kampf' ('My Struggle', a manifesto of his political doctrines, coupled with some illuminating autobiography, published in 1925-6). The world economic crisis that began in 1929 caused widespread unemployment in Germany and brought increasing support to the Nazis, until in 1932 they formed for a time the largest single party in the Reichstag. In 1933 Hitler was appointed chancellor of the Reich (under Hindenburg as president) and the Nazis now assumed absolute power within the State. In 1934 a fierce conflict broke out between the leaders of the greatly enlarged S.A. (headed by Röhm) and the army; Hitler resolved it in favour of the latter by a ruthless purge of S.A. commanders. On Hindenburg's death in August 1934 he became president of the Reich and established his own despotic authority as Führer. He adopted a policy of flouting the Versailles Treaty and of national economic self-sufficiency, coupled with feverish rearmament, persecution of the Jews, and suppression of trade unions. His programme culminated in the absorption of Austria in 1938 and aggression in Czecho-Slovakia (see Munich Agreement) and Poland. It resulted in war with Britain and France in 1939 and with Russia and the U.S. in 1941.

A plot to kill Hitler and overthrow the Nazi system, in which high officers of the German army took part, failed in July 1944. Hitler is believed to have perished, perhaps by suicide, during the Russian attack on Berlin on 30 April 1945.

Hitopadesa, the name of one version of the famous collection of Hindu tales, known in its earliest form as the Panchatantra (q.v.), and in a later form as the 'Fables of Bidpai' (q.v.) or 'Pilpay'. It dates from about the 13th cent., and was translated by Sir W. Jones (q.v.).

'Ho Bryen', see Claret.

HOADLY, DR. BENJAMIN (1706-57), son of Benjamin Hoadly (q.v.). He was a physician and (with his brother) the author of one comedy, 'The Suspicious Husband' (q.v.).

Hoadly, BENJAMIN (1676-1761), bishop successively of Bangor, Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester, famous as the initiator of the 'Bangorian Controversy' (q.v.). He was high in the favour of Queen Caroline.

Hobbema, MEINDERT (1638-1709), Dutch landscape-painter, best known in England by his picture in the National Gallery, 'The Avenue, Middelharnis'.

'Hobbema, my dear Hobbema, how I have loved you': the dying words of Crome (q.v.).

HOBBS, JOHN OLIVER, pseudonym of Mrs. P. M. T. Craigie (1867-1906), novelist and playwright. Among her novels were 'The Sinner's Comedy' (1892), 'The Serious Wooing' (1901), 'Robert Orange' (1902); and among her plays, 'The Ambassador' (1892) and 'A Repentance' (1899).

HOBBS, THOMAS (1588-1679), philosopher, was born at Malmesbury and educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. For a great part of his life he was in the service of the Cavendish family, and in 1647 was appointed mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales. At some time (probably between 1621 and 1626) he was in relation with Bacon, translated some of his essays into Latin and took down his thoughts from his dictation. On three occasions he travelled on the Continent with a pupil, and met Galileo, Gassendi, Descartes, and Mersenne (the French mathematician). On his return to England in 1652 he submitted to the Council of State, and was pensioned after the Restoration. He was intimate with Harvey, Ben Jonson, Cowley, and Sidney Godolphin.

As a philosopher Hobbes resembles Bacon in the practical or utilitarian importance that he attaches to knowledge. Nature and man are the objects of his inquiry. With the supernatural world he is little concerned. But he does not share Bacon's enthusiasm for the inductive method; he regards science as essentially deductive, and the geometrical method of demonstration as the true scientific method. Hobbes has been generally described as a nominalist, owing to the importance that he attaches to the definition of the meaning of terms. But he does not deny the reality of the common element entitling things to the same name (Seth, 'English Philosophers'). The basis of all knowledge, according to him, is sensation, and the causes of all sensations are the 'several motions of matter, by which it presseth on our organs diversely'. Motion is the one universal cause, and our appetites are our reactions, in the direction of self-preservation, to external motions. Accordingly man is essentially a selfish unit. Upon this theory Hobbes bases the political philosophy which is expounded in his 'Leviathan' (q.v.), published in 1651. This brought him into general disfavour both on political and religious grounds; and, indeed, the Royalists had some reason to regard it as designed to induce Cromwell to take the crown.

Hobbes's philosophical works, founded on a comprehensive plan in which matter, human nature, and society were successively to be dealt with, further include the 'De Cive' (Latin text 1642, English 1651), 'Human Nature' (1650), 'De Corpore Politico' (originally 'Elements of Law' and subsequently worked up in the 'Leviathan'), 'De Corpore' (Latin text 1655, English 1656), 'De Homine' (1658). He published a translation of Thucydides in 1629, and of Homer in quatrains (1674-5); also a sketch of the Civil Wars, 'Behemoth, or the Long Parliament' (1680), which was suppressed. His complete works were edited by Sir William Molesworth (1839-45). Hobbes was a master of English prose. Without Bacon's profusion of imagery, his style, by its economy and invariable choice of the right and striking word, is most vivid and effective.

Hobblidance, the name of a malevolent sprite or fiend, one of those introduced into the morris-dance, and one of the five fiends that pestered Poor Tom in Shakespeare's 'King Lear', iv. i.

Hobbinol, in Edmund Spenser's writings, was the poet's friend G. Harvey (q.v.).

Hobgoblin, a mischievous tricky imp or sprite, another name for Puck or Robin Goodfellow. Figuratively, an object that inspires superstitious dread.

HOBHOUSE, JOHN CAM (1786-1860), politician and friend of Byron. Author of the notes to the 4th Canto of 'Childe Harold', which is dedicated to him. Byron's executor.

Hobson, a Cambridge carrier, who 'sickened in the time of his vacancy, being forbidden to go to London by reason of the plague'. He died in Jan. 1630-1. Milton wrote two epitaphs on him, and his name survives in

HODGSON

'Hobson's choice', which refers to his custom of letting out his horses in rotation, and not allowing his customers to choose among them. (See 'Spectator', No. 509.)

Hobson-Jobson, the well-known dictionary of Anglo-Indian colloquial words and phrases by Sir H. Yule (q.v.) and Arthur Coke Burnell, first published in 1886. The title is an Anglo-Indian vernacular term for a native festal excitement, and was chosen by the authors as an alternative characteristic title.

HOBY, SIR THOMAS (1530-66), translator of the 'Cortegiano' of Castiglione (q.v.).

HOCCEVE, see Occeleve.

Hock, the wine called in German Hochheimer, produced at Hochheim on the Main; a name extended to other German white wines. There is a reference to hock as early as Fletcher's 'The Chances', v. iii (1620). There are red hocks, which Saintsbury says are specifics for insomnia.

HOCKLEY, WILLIAM BROWNE (1792-1860), author of some good Anglo-Indian stories, of which the best known is 'Tales of the Zenana, or a Nawab's Leisure Hours' (1827). He also wrote 'Pandurang Hari, or Memoirs of a Hindoo' (1826), 'The Vizier's Son' (1831), 'Memoirs of a Brahmin' (1843), &c.

Hockley in the Hole, the birthplace of Jonathan Wild (q.v.), adjoined Clerkenwell. The 'Hole' was the hollow in which the Hole-bourne (Holborn) flowed, and a place of more or less disreputable gatherings.

Hocktide, Hock Monday and Tuesday, the second Monday and Tuesday after Easter, on which, in pre-Reformation times, money was collected for church and parish expenses, with various festive and sportive customs.

Hock-Tuesday Play, an early English mimetic performance, perhaps of ritual origin, representing the defeat of the Danes by the English. It was revived during the festival given to Queen Elizabeth at Kenilworth, and our knowledge of it is chiefly based on descriptions of this. See Hocktide.

Hocus-pocus, originally, it appears, the assumed name of a 17th-cent. conjurer, derived from the sham Latin formula employed by him. The notion that this is a corruption of hoc est corpus, the words used in the Eucharist, rests merely on a conjecture thrown out by Tillochson. [OED.]

Hodge, a familiar adaptation of Roger, used as a typical name for the English rustic. Also the name of Dr. Johnson's cat.

HODGSON, RALPH (1871-), poet, whose chief works are 'The Bull', 'A Song of Honour', 'Eve' (all 1913).

HODGSON, SHADWORTH HOLLWAY (1832-1912), educated at Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, devoted his life, after the death of his wife and child in 1858, to the study of philosophy. He was the first president and leading spirit of the Aristotelian

HODGSON

Society, whose proceedings contain many addresses by him.

Hodgson regarded himself as continuing and improving on the work of Hume and Kant. He refused to accept the distinction of subject and object, the analysis of experience showing the true distinction to be between consciousness and its content. But while he rejects the traditional assumption of mind and matter, analysis leads to the conclusion that this distinction is necessary. Hodgson's chief publications were 'Time and Space: a Metaphysical Essay' (1865), 'The Theory of Practice' (1870), 'The Philosophy of Reflection' (1878), and 'The Metaphysic of Experience' (1898), the last fully expounding his philosophy.

Hödur or Hödr, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the Æsir (q.v.), a son of Odin, a blind god, who by the machination of Loki (q.v.), kills his twin brother Balder (q.v.). He is the god of night.

HOEL, see Howell.

Hofer, ANDREAS (1767–1810), the son of a Tyrolean innkeeper, was a leader of the insurrection of his compatriots against Bavarian rule, when by the Treaty of Pressburg in 1805 the Tyrol was transferred from Austria to Bavaria. Encouraged by the emperor of Austria, he twice liberated the Tyrol, but was each time deserted by Austria and the country ceded afresh to Bavaria. A further attempt to renew the revolt led to the capture of Hofer by Italian troops. He was executed at Mantua in 1810, it was said by Napoleon's order, but Napoleon denied this.

HOFFMANN, ERNST THEODOR AMADEUS (originally Wilhelm) (1776–1822), German romance writer. His works include: 'Phantasiesstücke' (1814–15), 'Elixire des Teufels' (1815–16), 'Serapiensbrüder' (1819–21), 'Kater Murr' (1821–2). He will be remembered by musicians as having provided the inspiration for Offenbach's 'Les Contes d'Hoffmann'.

HOFFMAN, HEINRICH (1809–74), German physician, author of the immortal 'Struwwelpeter' ('Shock-headed Peter', 1847), written for the amusement of his children, and translated into several languages.

HOFMANNSTHAL, HUGO VON (1874–1929), Austrian poet and dramatist, a pioneer of the new romantic movement in German drama. Among his plays are 'Gestern' (1891), 'Der Tod des Tizian' (1892), 'Oedipus und die Sphinx' (1906); also the libretti to Strauss's operas 'Der Rosenkavalier' (1911), 'Ariadne auf Naxos' (1912), &c.

HOGARTH, DAVID GEORGE (1862–1927), archaeologist and authority on Near Eastern affairs. His publications include: 'A Wandering Scholar in the Levant' (1896), 'The Penetration of Arabia' (1904), 'Accidents of an Antiquary's Life' (1910), 'The Life of C. M. Doughty' (1928).

HOGG

Hogarth, WILLIAM (1697–1764), though a great painter, is better known as an engraver of social and political caricature. He established his reputation by the illustrations which he engraved for Butler's 'Hudibras' (1726). Most of his engravings were preceded by oil-paintings of the same subjects, including the four famous series of 'The Rake's Progress', 'The Harlot's Progress', 'Marriage à la Mode', and 'The Election'. 'Calais Gate' and 'The March to Finchley' are other subjects which he both painted and engraved, while the 'Apprentice' series, 'England', and 'France' do not appear to have been painted. Hogarth was instrumental in obtaining the passage of 'Hogarth's Act' (1735) protecting the copyright of engravers. He was the author of 'The Analysis of Beauty' (1753).

Hogen Mogen, a popular corruption of the Dutch Hoogmogendheden 'High Mightinesses', the title of the States General, used contemptuously for the Dutch or a Dutchman, or for any high and mighty person.

HOGG, JAMES (1770–1835), the 'Ettrick Shepherd', was born in Ettrick Forest, and early became a shepherd. His poetical gift was discovered by Scott, to whom he furnished material for the 'Border Minstrelsy'. His early ballads were published by Constable as 'The Mountain Bard' in 1807, but he lost in farming the money that he received from this publication. He came to Edinburgh in 1810 and obtained poetical reputation by 'The Queen's Wake' (q.v., 1813), making the acquaintance of Byron, Wordsworth, Southey, Prof. John Wilson, and John Murray. The duke of Buccleuch, in 1816, granted him the farm of Altrive in Yarrow at a nominal rent, and here he mainly resided for the rest of his life, combining agriculture with literary work. He published the 'Forest Minstrel' in 1810, 'Pilgrims of the Sun' in 1815, 'Queen Hynde' in 1826, but is remembered as a poet chiefly on account of 'The Queen's Wake' and particularly the verse tale of 'Kilmeny' included therein; also for a few of his songs and 'The Jacobite Relics of Scotland' (with music), published in 1819. His prose works include 'The Three Perils of Man' (1822), 'The Confessions of a Justified Sinner' (1824), and 'Recollections of Sir Walter Scott' (1834). With William Motherwell he published an edition of Burns in 1834–5. Hogg was a contributor to 'Blackwood's Magazine' (q.v.), and is impersonated as the 'Ettrick Shepherd' in its 'Noctes Ambrosianae' (q.v.).

HOGG, THOMAS JEFFERSON (1792–1862), educated at University College, Oxford, with Shelley (q.v.), and sent down on the publication of the latter's 'Necessity of Atheism'. He was the friend and biographer of the poet, publishing two volumes of his life in 1858. He had in 1832 contributed reminiscences of Shelley at Oxford to Bulwer's 'New Monthly Magazine'. An edition of his letters was published in 1943.

HOGGARTY DIAMOND

Hoggarty Diamond, The Great, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 'Fraser' in 1841.

It is the story of the struggles and misfortunes of Mr. Samuel Titmarsh. The Hoggarty Diamond given him by his stingy old aunt is the means of bringing him temporary prosperity. But he falls into the hands of the swindling Mr. Brough and the West Diddlesex Association. The unfortunate career of this Association as an insurance office brings Samuel to prison, whence he is rescued by the efforts of his excellent young wife.

Hoggins, Mr., a character in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.).

Hogmanay, the name given in Scotland and some parts of the N. of England to the last day of the year, also called 'Cake-Day'; also to the gift of an oatmeal cake or the like, which children expect, and in some parts systematically solicit on that day. The word corresponds exactly in sense and use to the Old French aguillanneuf (Norman form, hoguinnand), from which it is no doubt derived. The origin of the French word is obscure. Cotgrave's explanation 'Au gui l'an neuf' ('to the mistletoe the new year') is now rejected. The Spanish word 'aguilando', a handsel, Christmas-box, is found before 1600. [OED.]

Hohenlinden, in Bavaria, the scene of a great battle in 1800, in which the French revolutionary general, Moreau, defeated the Austrians; celebrated by T. Campbell (q.v.) in his 'Battle of Hohenlinden'.

Holbein, HANS, THE YOUNGER (1497-1543), a great German painter, who came to England in 1526, was received in the house of Sir Thomas More, and became court-painter to Henry VIII in 1534. He painted portraits of many notable personages in England and abroad, including that of Anne of Cleves, whom Henry VIII found so much less attractive than her picture.

Holborn, a district of London whose name is derived from the Holeburne, 'the burn in the hollow'. This was probably the stream known in its lower course as the Fleet (see Fleet Street). In this district the bishops of Ely had from the 13th cent. a splendid palace (Ely Place) with a great garden, referred to in Shakespeare's 'King Richard III', III. iv:

My lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn,
I saw good strawberries in your garden there.

The garden was made over to Sir Christopher Hatton, the favourite of Elizabeth, during a vacancy in the see (1581), and its site now bears his name (Hatton Garden). Matthew Wren, the uncle of Sir Christopher and bishop of Ely, made prolonged efforts, but without success, to recover it from Hatton's widow, who married Sir Edward Coke. Hatton Garden is now the centre of the diamond trade.

HOLINSHED

HOLCROFT, THOMAS (1745-1809), successively stable-boy, shoemaker, tutor, actor, and author, and a friend and associate of Thomas Paine and William Godwin (qq.v.), wrote an entertaining autobiography ('Memoirs', edited and completed by Hazlitt, after his death, 1816) and a number of sentimental plays, of which the best known is 'The Road to Ruin' (1792). In this, Harry Dornton, whose spendthrift habits have imperilled his father's bank, is prepared to sacrifice himself by marrying the odious rich widow Mrs. Warren in place of the girl he loves, a sacrifice rendered unnecessary by the fidelity of the bank's head clerk, the grim old Mr. Sulky. Holcroft also wrote some novels, including 'Alwyn, or the Gentleman Comedian' (1780), based on his own odd experiences, 'Anna St. Ives' (1792), and 'Hugh Trevor' (1794), written in the spirit of Godwin's 'Caleb Williams' in defence of revolutionary ideas. He also translated Goethe's 'Hermann und Dorothea' (1801) and other works.

HOLE, SAMUEL REYNOLDS (1819-1904), educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, became dean of Rochester in 1887. He was an enthusiastic huntsman, sportsman, and gardener, and a close friend of John Leech, who introduced him to Thackeray. He was an early contributor to 'Punch'. His 'Book about Roses' (1869) helped to popularize horticulture. He published 'Hints to Freshmen' in 1847, 'A Little Tour in Ireland' (illustrated by Leech) in 1859, 'The Six of Spades' (a gardeners' club) in 1872, 'Memories' in 1892, 'More Memories' in 1894, and 'Then and Now' in 1901. His humorous and charming 'Letters' were edited with a memoir by G. A. B. Dewar in 1907.

Holger Danske, the tutelary hero of Denmark, who is supposed to be sleeping under the Kronenborg at Elsinore, his long beard grown into the table, waiting to arise in the hour of Denmark's peril. He is the subject of one of Hans Andersen's Tales. See Ogier the Dane.

Holiday House, a very popular story for children, by Catherine Sinclair, published in 1839.

HOLINSHED, RAPHAEL (d. 1580?), was of a Cheshire family and is said by Anthony à Wood to have been a 'minister of God's word'. He came to London early in the reign of Elizabeth, and was employed as a translator by Reginald Wolfe, the printer and publisher. While in his employ he planned the 'Chronicles' (1577) which are known by his name and are by several hands. The 'Historie of England' was written by Holinshed himself. The 'Description of England', a vivid account, not devoid of humour, of English towns, villages, crops, customs, &c., of the day, was written by William Harrison (q.v.). The 'History and Description of Scotland' and the 'History of Ireland' were translations or adaptations, and the 'Description of Ireland' was written by Richard Stanyhurst and Edward Campion. A few passages in the 'History of Ireland' offended the Queen and her ministers, and were expunged. A copy containing the expunged passages is in the Grenville collection in the British Museum. The 'Chronicle' was reissued, with continuation, edited by John Hooker, alias Vowell, in 1586, and politically offensive passages again taken out; it was utilized by Shakespeare and other dramatists.

HOLLAND, PHILEMON (1552-1637), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and a doctor of medicine, was master of the free school at Coventry from 1628, and received a pension from that city in 1632. He is celebrated for his translations of Livy (1600), Pliny's 'Natural History' (1601), Plutarch's 'Moralia' (1603), Suetonius (1606), Ammianus Marcellinus (1609), Camden's 'Britannia' (1610), and Xenophon's 'Cyropaedia' (1632). His knowledge of Greek and Latin was accurate and profound, and his renderings are made in a vivid, familiar, and somewhat ornamented English.

Holland House, Kensington, built at the beginning of the 17th cent. for Sir Walter Cope, passed by marriage into the possession of Henry Rich (son of Penelope Rich, q.v.), 1st earl of Holland, who took his title from the 'parts of Holland' in Lincolnshire, and was executed in 1649. In 1767 it was acquired by Henry Fox, 1st baron Holland, who entertained Horace Walpole and George Selwyn there. In the time of his grandson, the 3rd baron Holland (1773-1840), Holland House became a great political, literary, and artistic centre, and many eminent authors, such as Sheridan, Moore, Thomas Campbell, Macaulay, Grote, and Dickens, were among the guests received there. Joseph Addison, who had married the widow of one of the earls of Warwick and Holland, died at Holland House in 1719.

HOLLANDS (HOLLANDS GIN), see Geneva.

Hollywood, a suburb of Los Angeles, California, one of the principal centres of the cinematograph industry.

HOLME, CONSTANCE, novelist, author of 'The Lonely Plough' (1914), 'The Trumpet in the Dust' (1921), &c.

HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL (1809-94), born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, was professor of anatomy and physiology at Harvard University from 1847 to 1882. His 'Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table' appeared in the 'Atlantic Monthly' in 1857-8, 'The Professor at the Breakfast-Table' in 1860, 'The Poet at the Breakfast-Table' in 1872, and 'Over the Tea-Cups' in 1891. He also wrote novels, 'Elsie Venner' (1861) and 'The Guardian Angel' (1867), some volumes of poems and essays, and memoirs of R. W. Emerson and J. L. Motley. His essays in the 'Breakfast-Table' series are notable for their kindly humour and general sagacity; they take the form of discourses by the author, the other characters being listeners, who interpose occasional remarks. His poems include a few good lyrics and familiar verses, such as 'The Chambered Nautilus', 'Homesick in Heaven', 'The Last Leaf', 'Dorothy Q', and 'The Deacon's Masterpiece; or The Wonderful One-Hoss Shay'.

Holmes, SHERLOCK, the famous private detective who figures in a number of works by Conan Doyle (q.v.). The character was in part suggested by an eminent Edinburgh surgeon, Dr. Joseph Bell (1837-1911), under whom Doyle studied medicine. Sherlock Holmes was familiarized to the public by his eccentricities and mannerisms, his nonchalance alternating with energy, his dressing-gown and hypodermic syringe, as well as his amazing mental powers. His assistant and foil is Dr. Watson (q.v.), his great enemy Prof. Moriarty.

Holofernes, (1) Nebuchadnezzar's general, who was killed by Judith (Judith, iv. 1, &c.); (2) the great doctor in theology (Thubal Holoferne) who instructed the youthful Gargantua (Rabelais, i, xiv); (3) the pedantic schoolmaster in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost'. This character has been thought to represent John Florio (q.v.), 'Holofernes' being a partial anagram of his name.

Holt, FATHER, in Thackeray's 'Esmond' (q.v.), a Jesuit priest and Jacobite intriguer.

Holy Alliance, THE, an alliance formed in 1815, after the fall of Napoleon, between the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, with the professed object of uniting their governments in a Christian brotherhood. Great Britain refused to be a party; and Castlereagh called it 'a piece of sublime mysticism and nonsense'. It virtually came to an end in 1822, and entirely in 1825.

Holy Bottle, THE ORACLE OF THE, see Pantagruel.

Holy Cross Day, the festival of the exaltation of the Cross, 14 Sept., on which the Jews in Rome were obliged formerly to go to church and hear a sermon. It is the subject of a satirical poem by R. Browning, in which the Rabbi Ben Ezra on his death-bed in a prayer to Christ sets forth the degradation of the Jews and appeals against Christ's so-called followers.

Holy Grail, THE, see Grail.

Holy Grail, The, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1869.

Sir Percivale, having left the court of Arthur for the cowl, recounts to a fellow monk the story of the quest of the Holy Grail (q.v.) and the success of Sir Galahad. Percivale has not, like Galahad, 'lost himself to save himself' and, though approaching near the sacred vessel, fails. The honest Bors has the vision of the Grail, but no more. Gawain fails utterly. Lancelot, after a fierce struggle to pluck asunder the noble elements from the one sin in his soul, fails also.

Holy Office, THE, see Inquisition.

Holy Roman Empire, the name given to the realm of the sovereign who claimed to inherit the authority of the ancient Roman emperors in the West. It comprised, in general, the German-speaking States of Central Europe. Its creation may be traced to the need felt by the popes in the 8th cent. for temporal support, which led Leo III to invoke the aid of Charlemagne and finally to crown him emperor on Christmas Day, 800. The empire degenerated under his successors, but was revived by Otto the Great in 962. After the successive falls of the Saxon, Salian, and Swabian dynasties, and an interregnum of nineteen years, it passed by election to the Hapsburgs. These came into prominence with Maximilian I in 1493, and their line was all but continuous until the abdication of Francis II in 1806. The epithet 'Holy', adopted by Frederick Barbarossa, was significative of the supposed divine institution of the empire and of its union with the Church. The emperor was elected by seven electors, the archbishops of Trèves, Mayence, and Cologne, the king of Bohemia, the count Palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony, and the margrave of Brandenburg. Bavaria was added to the electorate in 1648 and Hanover in 1699. For the classic work on the Holy Roman Empire, see under Bryce (James).

Holy State and Profane State, The, a series of characters and essays, by Fuller (q.v.), published in 1642.

This is one of Fuller's most popular works. The author describes with much good sense and humour a number of good and evil characters, such as 'The Good Widow', 'The Good Merchant', 'The True Gentleman', 'The Liar'; and adds essays on various subjects, among the best of which are those 'Of Building' and 'Of Recreations'.

Holy War, The, an allegory by Bunyan (q.v.), published in 1682.

The author narrates how Diabolus gets possession by his wiles of the city Mansoul (i.e. soul of man), the metropolis of the universe. Thereupon King Shaddai, the builder of the city, sends Boanerges and three other captains to recover it, and finally his own son Emmanuel to lead the besieging army. The vicissitudes of the siege are recounted with much spirit. The city falls to the assault conducted by Emmanuel, after much parley between the defenders ('Diabolonians') and the besiegers. But when the power of the king has been re-established, the city presently relapses into evil ways. Diabolus recaptures the city but cannot take the citadel, and is presently defeated by Emmanuel. Bunyan in this allegory evidently drew upon his experience as a soldier in the parliamentary war.

HOMER

Holy Willie's Prayer, a poem by Burns (q.v.).

Holywell Street, London, a street that ran parallel to the Strand between the churches of St. Clement Danes and St. Mary le Strand, where second-hand booksellers congregated. It was demolished towards the end of the 19th cent. Holywell is mentioned by William Fitzstephen (q.v.) in the introduction to his life of Thomas à Becket, among 'the excellent springs in the outskirts [of London], with sweet wholesome and clear water that flows rippling over the bright stones' (quoted by G. R. Stirling Taylor, 'Historical Guide to London').

HOME, DANIEL DUNGLAS (1833-86), a spiritualistic medium, whose seances in England in 1855 and subsequent years were attended by well-known people, many of whom, including Sir William Crookes, were convinced of the genuineness of the phenomena. Browning, who witnessed them, remained sceptical (see his 'Mr. Sludge "The Medium"'). Home was expelled from Rome in 1864 as a sorcerer. He published 'Incidents of my Life' (1863 and 1872).

HOME, HENRY, LORD KAMES (1606-1782), a Scottish judge and psychologist. His 'Introduction to the Art of Thinking' (1761) and 'Elements of Criticism' (1762) were widely read in his day.

HOME, JOHN (1722-1808), a Scottish minister and, after his resignation from the ministry, secretary to Lord Bute and tutor to the Prince of Wales, and a friend of Hume, Robertson, and Collins. He was the author of a tragedy 'Douglas' (q.v.), produced in 1756, which enjoyed much popularity. He subsequently wrote other tragedies which were less successful. Home was a friend of Macpherson (q.v.) and a firm believer in 'Ossian'.

Home Rule, the name given to the movement, begun about 1870, to obtain for Ireland self-government through the agency of a national parliament. The phrase 'Home Rule' had been used incidentally in 1860. But at the meeting for the local autonomy of Ireland held on 19 May 1870, the phrase 'Home Government' was adopted, though 'Home Rule' is said to have been suggested and became immediately popular. [OED.]

Home, Sweet Home, a song by John Howard Payne (q.v.), an American dramatist and song-writer. It formed part originally of the opera 'Clari'. The music is by Sir Henry Rowley Bishop (1786-1855), musical composer.

HOMER, the great Greek epic poet, who was regarded by the ancients (though the belief has in modern times been contested) as the author of the 'Iliad' and the 'Odyssey' (qq.v.). There is doubt as to both his birth-place and his date, the latter being variously placed between 1050 and 850 B.C. The seven cities that claimed to be his birthplace were 'Smyrna, Rhodus, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athenae'. Tradition represents him as blind and poor in his old age. The origin of the epics, whether by the enlargement and remodelling of earlier material by one or more hands or as a direct composition from traditional material, is disputed. Recent scholarship tends to recur to the view of 'One Homer'.

The HOMERIC HYMNS, of unknown authorship and various dates, are preludes to epic poems, addressed to various deities, and recounting legends relating to them.

Homilies, BOOKS OF, a title applied in the Church of England to two books of Homilies, published in 1547 and 1563, appointed to be read in the Churches. The second Book of Homilies is mentioned in Article 35 of the Thirty-nine Articles in the Book of Common Prayer.

Homonym, the same name or word used to denote different things; or a person or thing having the same name as another, a namesake. Cf. Synonym.

Homophone, a word having the same sound as another, but a different meaning. Cf. Synonym.

HONE, WILLIAM (1780-1842), author and bookseller, who published political satires on the government illustrated by Cruikshank and was prosecuted for his 'Political Litany' (1817). He published his 'Every-Day Book' (dedicated to Lamb and praised by Scott and Southey) in 1826-7, and his 'Table-Book' in 1827-8.

Honest Whore, The, a play by Dekker (q.v.) in two parts, of which the first was printed in 1604 and the second in 1630. It appears from Henslowe's diary that Middleton collaborated in writing the first part.

In Pt. I Count Hippolito, making the acquaintance of Bellafront, and discovering that she is a harlot, upbraids her bitterly for her mode of life and converts her to honesty. She falls in love with Hippolito, who repels her and marries Infelice, daughter of the duke of Milan. Bellafront is married to Matheo, who had caused her downfall.

In Pt. II we find the converted Bellafront as the devoted wife of the worthless Matheo, who, to get money for his vices, is prepared to see her return to her old way of life. Hippolito, now falling in love with her, tries to seduce her. She stoutly resists temptation, and is finally rescued from misery by her father, Orlando Friscobaldo. The painful character of the play, one of the great dramas of the age, heightened by Dekker's powerful treatment and by scenes in Bedlam and Bridewell, is somewhat alleviated by the admirable character, Orlando Friscobaldo, and by the comic underplot, dealing with the eccentricities of the patient husband, Candido the linen-draper.

Honeycomb, Will, in Addison's 'Spectator'

Honorificabilitudinitatibus, the long word in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (v. i), in which Baconians see a cryptogram indicating that Bacon was the author of the works attributed to Shakespeare.

Hood, ROBIN, see Robin Hood.

HOOD, THOMAS (1799-1845), born in London, the son of a bookseller, became sub-editor of the 'London Magazine', 1821-3, and made the acquaintance of Lamb, Hazlitt, and De Quincey. He edited various periodicals at different times: the 'Gem' (1829), in which his 'Eugene Aram' appeared; the 'Comic Annual' (1830); the 'New Monthly Magazine' (1831-3); and 'Hood's Magazine' (1843). In addition to the humorous work for which he is perhaps chiefly remembered (including 'Miss Kulmansegg', q.v., which appeared in the 'New Monthly Magazine'), Hood wrote a number of serious poems: the popular 'Song of the Shirt' (published anonymously in 'Punch' in 1843) and 'The Bridge of Sighs', 'The Haunted House', 'The Elm Tree', 'The Plea of the Midsummer Fairies', and shorter pieces such as 'A Death-bed'. Among his prose writings may be mentioned a humorous comedy called 'York and Lancaster', and the 'Literary Reminiscences' in 'Hood's Own' (1839), which include the notable account of an assembly at Charles Lamb's. Hood received a civil list pension not long before his death.

Hoodlum, the American equivalent of the hooligan, a street rough. The name arose in San Francisco about 1870-2, but its origin is lost.

Hoodoo, see Voodoo.

Hook, CAPTAIN, the pirate captain in Barrie's 'Peter Pan' (q.v.).

HOOK, THEODORE EDWARD (1783-1841), is remembered as a wit, a writer of light verses, a successful editor (chiefly of the Tory 'John Bull'), and a novelist. But his novels, 'Sayings and Doings' (1826-9), 'Maxwell' (1830), 'Gilbert Gurney' (1836),

HOOK

'Jack Brag' (1837), 'Gurney Married' (1838), &c., full of the crude fun of the period and popular as they once were, have now lost their interest. He went to Mauritius as accountant general in 1813, but was recalled owing to a deficiency of £12,000 in his accounts—or, as he put it, 'on account of a disorder in his chest'.

HOOKE, RICHARD (1554?–1600), theologian, was born at Exeter of poor parents, and by Bishop Jewel's patronage sent to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he remained till 1579, becoming a fellow and deputy professor of Hebrew. He was appointed to the living of Drayton-Beauchamp in 1584, master of the Temple 1585, rector of Boscombe in Wiltshire, and of Bishopsbourne in Kent, where he died and where the inscription on his monument first called him 'Judicious'. Of his great prose classic, the defence of the Church of England as established in Queen Elizabeth's reign, entitled 'Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polities' (q.v.), four books appeared in 1594, the fifth in 1597. Other works by Hooker were issued at Oxford in 1613. A pleasant biography of Hooker was written by Izaak Walton and published with the 1665 edition of his 'Ecclesiastical Polities'. There is some reason to credit Hooker with the first steps towards making known in England the theory of 'original contract' as a basis of sovereignty.

HOOKE, SIR WILLIAM JACKSON (1785–1865), botanist and traveller, and friend and helper of Darwin. He greatly extended and threw open to the public Kew Gardens, of which he was director, and founded there a museum of economic botany. He published several botanical works.

Hop-o'-my-thumb, a name applied generically to a dwarf or pygmy, occurring as early as the 16th cent. See also below.

Hop o' my Thumb, Little Thumb, a fairy tale, from the French of Perrault (q.v.), translated by Robert Samber (1729?).

Hop o' my Thumb (petit Poucet) is the youngest of seven children of a woodman and his wife, who are forced by poverty to rid themselves of the children by losing them in the forest. Hop o' my Thumb, having overheard this decision, fills his pocket with white pebbles, which he drops along the way, and by means of these leads his brothers home again. The parents once more lose them, Hop o' my Thumb this time using bread-crumbs to mark the way. But the birds eat up the bread-crumbs, and the children arrive at the house of an ogre, who is deluded by Hop o' my Thumb into killing his own children instead of the woodman's. Hop o' my Thumb moreover steals his seven-league boots, and with the help of these obtains enough wealth to set his parents at ease. Andrew Lang in his 'Perrault's Popular Tales' discusses the origins of this story.

HOPE, ANTHONY, see Hawkins.

HOPE, THOMAS (1770?–1831), a man of great wealth, a traveller, and a virtuoso, was the author of the once popular novel 'Anastasius' (q.v.), published in 1819.

Hope Theatre, THE, on Bankside, Southwark, built in 1613 by Henslowe (q.v.) as a bear-garden, with a movable stage on which plays could be performed. Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fair' was acted there in 1614.

HOPKINS, GERARD MANLEY (1844–80), was educated at Highgate School and Balliol College, Oxford. He was the pupil of Jowett and Pater, numbered Bridges and Dolben (and later in life Coventry Patmore) among his friends, and was a disciple of Pusey and Liddon, and, after his conversion in 1866 to the Church of Rome, of Newman. He entered the Jesuit novitiate in 1868, and in 1884 was appointed to the chair of Greek at Dublin University. He was a poet of much originality and a skilful innovator in rhythm. He wrote a number of short poems, none of them published in his lifetime, but collected by Robert Bridges, who published a small selection from them in Miles's 'Poets and Poetry of the Century' and a practically complete edition in 1918 (reissued with some additions in 1930). His Letters to Bridges, Dixon, and Patmore have been edited by C. C. Abbott (1935–8); his 'Note-books and Papers' by H. House (1937).

HOPKINS, MATTHEW (d. 1647), the witch-finder, said to have been a lawyer at Ipswich and Manningtree. He made journeys for the discovery of witches in the eastern counties in 1644–7, and procured a special judicial commission under which sixty women were hanged in Essex in one year, and many in Norfolk and Huntingdonshire. He published his 'Discovery of Witches' in 1647. He was exposed and hanged as a sorcerer. He is referred to in Butler's 'Hudibras'.

HORACE, (QUINTUS HORATIUS FLACCUS, 65–8 B.C.), the Roman poet, was born at Venusia in Apulia, educated at the school of Orbilius (q.v.) and at Athens. He was present on the losing side at the battle of Philippi, but obtained his pardon and returned to Rome; here he became the friend of Maecenas (q.v.), who bestowed on him a Sabine farm. His poems include the 'Satires', 'Odes' and 'Epodes', 'Epistles', and the 'Ars Poetica'.

Horae, in classical mythology, originally the goddesses of the seasons, generally three in number. According to Homer they control the weather and grant the rain. According to Hesiod they are daughters of Zeus and Themis, and give laws, justice, and peace.

Horatii and the Curiatii, THE, three Roman brothers and three Alban brothers, a battle between whom, according to legend, decided the struggle between Alba and Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. This story, and the love of one of the Curiatii for the sister of the Horatii, form the subject of William Whitehead's successful play 'The Roman Father' (1750) and of a tragedy by P. Corneille.

Horatius Cocles, see Cocles.

Horatio, in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.), the friend of Hamlet.

HORMAN, WILLIAM (d. 1535), fellow of New College, Oxford, and vice-provost of Eton, author of 'Vulgaria' or 'Vulgaria Puerorum', Latin aphorisms for boys to learn. It was printed by Pynson (1519), Wynkyn de Worde (1540), and for the Roxburghe Club (edited by M. R. James, 1926); a most remarkable book.

HORN, CAPE, the southernmost point of America, on the last island of the Fuegian archipelago, was discovered by the Dutch navigator Schouten in 1616, and named after Hoorn, his birthplace.

Horn, King, see King Horn.

Horn Childe, a verse romance of the early part of the 14th cent., containing some 1,100 lines. The general plot is similar to that of 'King Horn' (q.v.), but is different in details. Horn is the son of Hatheolf of the North of England. Arlaund, the instructor of Horn and his eight companions, flees with them to Honlac, a king in the South of England, whose daughter Rimnild falls in love with Horn. Arlaund substitutes Hatherof, one of the companions, for Horn when Rimnild summons him to her chamber. Two of Horn's companions, Wiard and Wikel, betray Horn and Rimnild to the king. Horn goes to Wales, taking Rimnild's magic ring and promising seven years' fidelity, and to Ireland, where he drives out the pagan invaders of King Finlac's realm. He returns to England and in a tournament overcomes the suitor of Rimnild, slays Wiard, blinds Wikel, and marries Rimnild. The poem is inferior to 'King Horn', and is one of those referred to by Chaucer in his 'Tale of Sir Thopas', see Canterbury Tales (19).

Horn-book, a leaf of paper containing the alphabet (often with the addition of the ten digits, some elements of spelling, and the Lord's Prayer) protected by a thin plate of translucent horn, and mounted on a tablet of wood with a projecting piece for a handle, used for teaching children to read. A simpler and later form of this, consisting of the tablet without the horn covering, or a piece of stiff cardboard varnished, was also called a battle-

HORNE, RICHARD HENRY or HEN-GIST (1803-84), educated at Sandhurst, served in the Mexican navy in the Mexican war of independence, and led an adventurous life until he was thirty, when he took up literature. He is remembered chiefly as the author of the epic 'Orion' (q.v.), which he published in 1843 at a farthing 'to mark the public contempt into which epic poetry had fallen'. He published 'Cosmo de' Medici' and 'The Death of Marlowe' in 1837, and other tragedies ('Gregory VII' in 1840, 'Judas Iscariot' in 1848); also 'Ballad Romances' in 1846 and 'The Poor Artist' in 1850. Then, abandoning poetry, he went to Australia from 1852 to 1869, where he was a commissioner for crown lands, commanded the gold escort from Ballarat to Melbourne, taught gymnastics and swimming, &c. He published in 1859 his entertaining 'Australian Facts and Prospects', with his 'Australian Autobiography' as preface, in which he gives a stirring account of his experiences. Horne was granted a civil list pension in 1874. He had much correspondence with E. B. Browning, and published two volumes of her letters to him. She collaborated with him in his 'A New Spirit of the Age' (1844).

Horniman, ANNIE ELIZABETH FREDERICKA (1860-1937), a pioneer supporter of the modern English drama, founder of 'Miss Horniman's Company' of actors, and of the Manchester Repertory Theatre, for the purposes of which she acquired the Gaiety Theatre in that town in 1908. By her generous assistance the Irish National Theatre Society was provided with a permanent home in the Abbey Theatre, Dublin (1904).

HORSE, THE TROJAN or WOODEN, the artifice by which the Greeks got possession of Troy. They constructed a large wooden horse and filled it with armed men, and then withdrew their forces from the neighbourhood of Troy as if to return home. Sinon, son of Sisyphus (q.v.), allowed himself to be taken prisoner by the Trojans, pretending to have been maltreated by the Greeks, and persuaded Priam to have the horse drawn into the city, on the ground that it was an offering to Athene and would render Troy impregnable. When the horse was within the walls, Sinon at dead of night released the armed men, who made themselves masters of the city.

HORT, FENTON JOHN ANTHONY (1828-92), theological scholar, famous for his recension, jointly with B. F. Westcott, of the Greek text of the New Testament (1871). His Hulsean lectures of 1871 were published in 1893 under the title, 'The Way, The Truth, The Life'.

Hortensio, a character in Shakespeare's 'The Taming of the Shrew' (q.v.).

Horus, the Egyptian god of light, the son of Osiris and Isis (qq.v.), who avenges the death of Osiris by defeating the evil deity Typhon and wages war with the powers of darkness. He was regarded as the rising sun, born afresh daily, the symbol of renewed life. See also Harpocrates.

Hoster's Ghost, Admiral, see Glover (R.).

Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, KNIGHTS, also called KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN, KNIGHTS OF RHODES, and KNIGHTS OF MALTA, a military religious order, originally an association that provided a hostel at Jerusalem for the reception of pilgrims. The military order was founded about 1099 on the earlier (1070) foundation of a hospital for sick pilgrims by a citizen of Amalfi. A branch was established in England in the 12th cent., and had its house at Clerkenwell, where their church of St. John, much rebuilt, still exists. Their badge was a white cross of eight points on a black ground. The Knights of St. John defended Acre in 1290, took Rhodes in 1310 and defended it against the Saracens until 1525; then retired to Candia and Sicily, and finally in 1530 were given Malta by the Emperor Charles V. This they were obliged to surrender to Buonaparte in 1798; it was taken by the British in 1800 and ceded by the Treaty of Paris of 1814.

The original order survives on the Continent. It was suppressed in England in the 16th cent. The modern British order was formed in the 19th cent., receiving a charter of incorporation in 1888, for the purpose of ambulance and other charitable work.

Repertory Theatre; followed by 'Independent Means' in 1909, 'The Younger Generation' and 'The Master of the House' in 1910, 'Fancy-Free' in 1911, and 'Hindle Wakes', his most successful work, in 1912. In 1913 Houghton migrated to Paris, but died within a few months.

Hound of Heaven, The, see Thompson.

Houndsditch, a district in London, largely inhabited by poor Jewish shopkeepers, originally part of the ditch outside the city walls.

Hours, see Horae.

Hours, Book of, a book containing the prayers or offices of the Roman Catholic Church to be said at the seven times of the day appointed for prayer.

House of Fame, The, a poem by Chaucer of 1,080 lines composed probably between 1372 and 1386. In a dream the poet visits the Temple of Venus, where he sees graven the story of the flight of Aeneas after the fall of Troy, and of his reception by, and betrayal of, Dido. He is then carried by an eagle to the House of Fame, full of a great company of aspirants for renown and adorned with the statues of historians and poets; and sees the queen, Fame, distributing fame and slander. He is then taken to the House of Rumour, crowded with shipmen, pilgrims, and pardoners, and other bearers of false tidings. The poem is unfinished.

House, ASTROLOGICAL, a twelfth part of the heavens as divided by great circles through the north and south points of the horizon. A special signification was attached to each house. They were numbered eastwards beginning with the HOUSE OF THE ASCENDANT. THE ASCENDANT was the degree of the zodiac which at any moment, e.g. that of the birth of a child, is rising above the eastern horizon. The 'house of the ascendant' included five degrees of the zodiac above this point and twenty-five degrees below it. The LORD OF THE ASCENDANT was any planet within the house of the ascendant. The ascendant and its lord were supposed to exercise a special influence on the life of a child born at the moment.

House, THE, a familiar name for (1) the House of Commons; (2) Christ Church, Oxford; (3) the Stock Exchange; (4) the work-house.

House of Life, The, a sonnet-sequence by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), published partly in 1870, partly in 1881. The sonnets are records of the poet's spiritual experiences, inspired by love of his wife and sorrow for her death, and permeated with mysticism.

House of the Seven Gables, The, a novel by Hawthorne (q.v.), published in 1851.

In this tale the author presents the problem of unmerited misfortune and prosperous and unrequited crime. Hepzibah Pyncheon is a poor grotesque old spinster, inhabiting the paternal mansion of a decayed New England family, which has suffered from generation to generation the curse of old Maule, the dispossessed owner of the property. Under stress of poverty she is obliged to do violence to her family pride by opening a small shop. At this moment, to add to Hepzibah's perplexities, her brother Clifford Pyncheon, an amiable Epicurean bachelor of enfeebled intellect, who has spent long years in prison for a crime of which he has been unjustly convicted by the machinations of his cousin Judge Pyncheon, returns to his home. On the other hand, a fresh little country cousin, Phoebe Pyncheon, arrives to lighten the gloom of the old house. Judge Pyncheon, the bland prosperous hypocrite, diffusing a 'sultry' benevolence, continues his persecution of Clifford; but this is arrested by the Judge's sudden death, and with the help of Holgrave, a young daguerreotypist and descendant of old Maule, a typical modern American, independent and self-reliant, Clifford is rehabilitated, and a belated happiness brightens the declining years of the poor old brother and sister.

House of Usher, The Fall of the, one of the 'Tales of Mystery and Imagination' of Poe (q.v.).

House that Jack Built, The, a nursery accumulative tale of great antiquity, probably based on an old Hebrew original, a hymn in Sepher Haggadah, beginning 'A kid my father bought for two pieces of money'; 'then came the cat and ate the kid, &c.'; 'then came the dog and bit the cat, &c.'; ending with the Angel of Death who killed the butcher who slew the ox, &c.; and the Holy One who slew the Angel of Death. That the English version is an early one is indicated by the reference to the 'priest, all shaven and shorn'. There is also a Danish version (Halliwell).

House with the Green Shutters, a novel by George Douglas (George Douglas Brown, 1869-1902), published in 1901.

Household Words, a weekly periodical started in 1850 by Dickens (q.v.), from which politics were ostensibly excluded and which was adapted to a more popular standard of taste than such magazines as 'Blackwood'. It received contributions from such noted writers (besides Dickens himself) as Bulwer Lytton, Lever, Wilkie Collins, and Mrs. Gaskell.

HOUSMAN, ALFRED EDWARD (1859-1936), one of the greatest of recent classical scholars, professor of Latin at Cambridge University, was the author of two volumes of lyrics, remarkable for economy of words and simplicity, 'A Shropshire Lad' (1896) and 'Last Poems' (1922).

HOUSMAN, LAURENCE (1865-), brother of the above, author and artist. His best-known works are: 'Prunella' (1906), 'Angels and Ministers' (1921), 'Little Plays of St. Francis' (1922), 'Palace Plays' (1930); also satirical novels, 'The Duke of Flamborough' (1928), 'Trimblerrigg' (1924). He was the author of 'An Englishwoman's Love-letters', published anonymously in 1900.

Houyhnhnms, the talking horses in 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.).

HOVEDEN or HOWDEN, ROGER (d. 1201?), a Yorkshireman and a chronicler who lived in the reign of Henry II. His 'Cronica' were first printed in 1596, and edited by Bishop Stubbs in 1868-71.

How they brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Dramatic Romances', published in 'Bells and Pomegranates' (1842-5).

This, one of the most popular of the author's poems, is a vivid imaginary tale of three horsemen galloping to save their town, one horse falling dead on the way, the second within sight of the town, the third reaching the market-place, where the town's last measure of wine is poured down its throat.

HOWE, EDGAR WATSON (1853-1937), American author, printer, and publisher, born in Indiana but afterwards associated with Kansas. His first and most famous book, 'The Story of a Country Town' (1883), was an important contribution to realistic fiction, and has been called 'the grimmest of American novels'.

HOWE, JULIA WARD, see Battle Hymn of the Republic.

Howe, Miss, a character in Richardson's 'Clarissa Harlowe' (q.v.).

Howell or HOEL, in the Arthurian legend, duke of Brittany and cousin of King Arthur.

HOWELL, JAMES (1594?-1666), educated at Jesus College, Oxford, held diplomatic and administrative posts under Charles I, and was imprisoned in the Fleet as a Royalist from 1643 to 1651. He wrote a number of historical and political pamphlets, but is chiefly remembered for his 'Epistolae Ho-eliae: Familiar Letters', mostly written in the Fleet and generally to imaginary correspondents (collected in 1650, and edited by Joseph Jacobs in 1890-2). Some of these are political or historical and deal with various countries, others are essays on literary and social topics. In 1649 he wrote his satirical 'Perfect Description of the Country of Scotland', which was reprinted by Wilkes in No. 31 of the 'North Briton'. In 1642 he issued his entertaining 'Instructions for Forreine Travel' (enlarged in 1650), and in 1657 his 'Londinopolis; an Historical Discourse or Perustration of the City of London'.

HOWELLS, WILLIAM DEAN (1837-1920), American novelist, was born at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, and began life as a printer and journalist. He was American consul at Venice, 1861 to 1865, an experience reflected in his 'Venetian Life' (1866) and 'Italian Journeys' (1867). He was appointed editor of the 'Atlantic Monthly' in 1871, and was associate editor of 'Harper's Magazine' 1886-91, to which periodicals he contributed many articles on literary subjects. His numerous romances include 'Their Wedding Journey' (1872), 'A Chance Acquaintance' (1873), 'A Foregone Conclusion' (1875), 'The Lady of the Aroostook' (q.v., 1879), 'The Undiscovered Country' (1880), 'A Fearful Responsibility' (1881), 'A Modern Instance' (1881), 'The Rise of Silas Lapham' (q.v., his greatest work, 1885), 'Indian Summer' (another charming book, 1886), 'A Hazard of New Fortunes' (1890), in which he took up again the characters of 'Their Wedding Journey', 'The Quality of Mercy' (1892), 'The Landlord at Lion's Head' (1897), 'Miss Bellard's Inspiration' (1905). His works of criticism and reminiscence include 'Criticism and Fiction' (1891), 'My Literary Passions' (1895), 'Literary Friends and Acquaintances' (1900), 'Heroines of Fiction' (1901), 'Literature and Life' (1902). Howells also wrote some comedies.

Howleglass, see Eulenspiegel.

Hoyden, Miss, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Relapse' (q.v.), and in Sheridan's 'A Trip to Scarborough' (q.v.).

HOYLE, EDMOND (1672-1769), author of a 'Short Treatise on Whist' (1742 and later editions). Hoyle's 'Laws' of 1760 ruled Whist till 1864.

Hrimfaxi ('dewy-mane'), in Scandinavian mythology, the horse of Night.

Hrothgar, the Danish king in 'Beowulf' (q.v.).

Hrotavitha or ROSWITHA, a Benedictine abbess, in the 10th cent., of Gandersheim in Saxony, who adapted the comedies of Terence for the use of her convent, an example of the survival of classical influence in the Middle Ages.

Hubbard, MOTHER, see Mother Hubbard and Mother Hubbard's Tale.

Hubert, St., the patron saint of the chase, is said to have been son of Bertrand, duke of Aquitaine, and to have lived in the 7th cent. He was passionately devoted to hunting, for which he neglected his religious duties. One day a stag appeared before him, with a crucifix between his horns, and threatened him with eternal punishment if he did not repent of his sins. He thereupon took holy orders and later became bishop of Liège and Maastricht.

HUCHOUN (fl. 14th cent.), Scottish author of romances in alliterative verse. Among the poems attributed to him, with various degrees of probability, are the alliterative 'Morte Arthure', 'The Awntyrs of Arthure', 'Gawain and the Green Knight', 'The Pistyl of Susan', 'Patience', 'The Pearl', and 'Cleanesse' (qq.v.). He is perhaps to be identified with Sir Hugh of Eglington, a statesman of the reigns of David II and Robert II.

HUDIBRAS

Huckleberry Finn, see Clemens.

Hudibras or HUDDIBRAS, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. ii. 17, the lover of Elissa,

An hardy man,
Yet not so good of deeds as great of name
Which he by many rash adventures wan.

Another Huddibras in II. x. 25 of the same poem is a legendary king of Britain.

Hudibras, a satire in octosyllabic couplets, and in three parts, each containing three cantos, by S. Butler (1612-80, q.v.), published, Pt. I in 1663, Pt. II in 1664, and Pt. III in 1678.

The satire takes the form of a mock-heroic poem, in which the hypocrisy and self-seeking of the Presbyterians and Independents are held up to ridicule. It is externally modelled on 'Don Quixote', while there are Rabelaisian touches, and the influence of Scarron on the style has been pointed out. The name 'Hudibras' is taken from the 'Faerie Queene' (see above). The character has been thought to represent the Puritan Sir S. Luke. He is pictured as a pedantic Presbyterian, setting forth 'a-colonelling', a grotesque figure on a miserable horse, with rusty arms but ample provisions. He is accompanied by his squire Ralpho, an Independent, and the satire is largely occupied with their sectarian squabbles. The pair light upon a crowd intent on bear-baiting, a popular sport vigorously condemned by the Puritans. A battle ensues in which the bear-baiters are at first defeated, and their leader, the one-legged fiddler Crowdero, is put in the stocks. But the bear-baiters rally their forces, Hudibras and Ralpho replace Crowdero in the stocks, and there they resume their sectarian disputes.

In Pt. II a widow, with whose 'jointure-land' Hudibras is in love, visits him in the stocks, exposes his self-seeking and requires him (after the model of 'Don Quixote') to submit to a whipping in order to win her favour. This gives an opportunity of exposing the casuistry of the Puritans; for Hudibras wishes to escape from his promise, and his squire suggests a whipping by proxy. To this Hudibras readily assents and orders Ralpho to be the substitute, whence a furious quarrel. They then consult Sidrophel (q.v.), an astrologer, on Hudibras's prospects with the widow. The astrologer is discovered to be a humbug, is beaten and left for dead by Hudibras, who escapes (after emptying the astrologer's pockets), intending that Ralpho shall bear the charge of murder.

In Pt. III Hudibras goes alone to the widow and gives her an account of his pretended sufferings on her behalf; but he has been forestalled by Ralpho, and is accordingly exposed. His cowardice is revealed when fierce knocking is heard at the gate. He attributes this to the astrologer's supernatural agents, hides under a table, is drawn out and cudgelled, and confesses his iniquities. He next consults a lawyer, who counsels him to write love-letters to the widow, in order to inveigle her in her replies. The second Canto of Pt. III has no connexion with the adventures of Hudibras, but is an account of the principles and proceedings of the republicans prior to the Restoration (it includes an admirable character of Anthony Ashley Cooper).

It is probable that Butler intended to complete the story in a fourth part.

Hudibrastic, in the metre or after the manner of Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.), burlesque-heroic.

Hudson, JEFFERY or GEOFFREY (1619-82), a dwarf who was served up in a pie to Charles I and entered the service of Queen Henrietta Maria. He was a captain of horse in the civil wars, was captured by pirates while on his way to France and carried to Barbary, escaped and returned to England, and was imprisoned for supposed complicity in the 'Popish Plot'. He figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

Hudson, RODERICK, hero of Henry James's novel of that name (q.v.).

HUDSON, WILLIAM HENRY (1841-1922), born of American parents near Buenos Aires, came to England in 1869, where he at first, and indeed till nearly the end of his life, suffered much from poverty and loneliness. He was naturalized a British subject in 1900. He has left an admirable picture of his early life in the Argentine in 'Far Away and Long Ago' (1918). From his youngest days he was an intense observer of nature, and a large proportion of his writings was devoted to birds (e.g. 'The Naturalist in La Plata', 1892; 'Birds in London', 1898; 'Birds and Man', 1901; 'Adventures among Birds', 1913). His most remarkable work is probably 'A Shepherd's Life' (1910), in which he depicts the humble folk of the Wiltshire downs, their dogs, their sheep, and the wild life of the region, with Caleb Bawcombe, a shepherd, as the principal figure. He also wrote a striking romance of the S. American forest, 'Green Mansions' (1904), of which the central figure 'Rima', the semi-human embodiment of the spirit of the forest, has been made familiar by Epstein's sculpture. His other writings include: 'The Purple Land' (1885), 'Nature in Downland' (1900), 'El Ombu' (1902), 'Hampshire Days' (1903), 'A Crystal Age' (1906), 'Afoot in England' (1909), 'A Traveller in Little Things' (1921), 'A Hind in Richmond Park' (1922).

Hudson's Bay Company: the 'governor and company of adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay' received a charter from Charles II in 1670, for trade and 'to discover a passage leading to the Pacific Ocean'. Prince Rupert was the company's first governor. On the expiration of the charter in 1689, the bulk of their territories was transferred, against compensation, to the Dominion of Canada. Hudson's Bay is named after Henry Hudson, the explorer, who was turned adrift there with his son and some companions by a mutinous crew, and perished in 1611.

HUGUENOT

Hugh, in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), the ostler of the Maypole Inn.

Hugh of Lincoln, Sr. (?1246-55), a child supposed to have been crucified by a Jew named Copin or Joppin at Lincoln, after having been starved and tortured. The body is said to have been discovered in a well and buried near that of Grosseteste in the cathedral, and to have been the cause of several miracles. The story, a frequent theme for poets, is referred to by Chaucer ('Prioress's Tale') and by Marlowe in 'The Jew of Malta'. See also the ballad of 'The Jew's Daughter' in Percy's 'Reliques'. Cf. William of Norwich.

HUGHES, THOMAS (1822-96), educated at Rugby and Oriel College, Oxford, was a follower of Frederick Denison Maurice (q.v.). He published in 1857, over the signature 'An Old Boy', his chief work, 'Tom Brown's Schooldays', the story of an ordinary school-boy at Rugby under Dr. Arnold's head-mastership. In this he depicted, with a didactic purpose, schoolboy cruelties and loyalties, and considerably influenced English ideas on public schools. The sequel, 'Tom Brown at Oxford' (1861), has less merit. Hughes also published 'The Scouring of the White Horse' (1859), a 'Memoir of a Brother' (his brother George, 1873, containing George Hughes's fine poem on the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race of 1868), and various biographies.

Hugin and Munin, see Odin.

HUGO, VICTOR-MARIE (1802-85), French poet and novelist, the leader of the French Romantic movement. He entered political life after the Revolution of 1848 and showed himself an eloquent defender of liberty. He spent the years 1851-70 in exile. His poetical creed was expounded in the preface to his long drama 'Cromwell' (1827), while the production of his 'Hernani' (q.v.) on the stage in 1830 was one of the principal events of the literary revolution. Hugo introduced flexibility, sonority, and melody into the rigid verse that had prevailed during many generations. His other important plays were: 'Manon de Lorme' (1831), 'Le Roi s'amuse' (1832), and 'Ruy Blas' (1838). His lyric verse includes the earlier 'Odes' (1822), 'Odes et Ballades' (1826), 'Les Orientales' (1829), 'Feuilles d'Automne' (1831), 'Chants du Crépuscule' (1835), 'Voix intérieures' (1837), 'Les Rayons et les Ombres' (1840), followed after a long interval by 'Les Châtiments' (1853, a violent satire against Louis Napoleon, written in exile), 'La Légende des Siècles' (his finest work, 1859, 1877, 1883), 'Chansons des Rues et des Bois' (1865), 'Les Quatre Vents de l'Esprit' (1881). His most famous novels are 'Notre Dame de Paris' (1831), 'Les Misérables' (1862), 'Les Travailleurs de la Mer' (1866), and 'Quatre-vingt-treize' (1873).

Huguenot, a member of the Reformed or Calvinistic communion of France in the 16th and 17th cents. The name, according to Hatzfeldt and Darmesteter, is a corruption, under Humber, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth, a king of the Huns who invaded Britain in the reign of Lochrine, and was defeated near the river Abus. He was driven into the river, which thereafter was named after him. (See Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. x. 15 and 16.)

HUMBOLDT (FRIEDRICH HEINRICH) ALEXANDER VON (1769–1859), German traveller and scientist, published a series of works embodying the results of a scientific expedition to South America and Mexico, which were translated into English (1814–21). His greatest work was the 'Kosmos' (published in German, 1845–58), a physical description of the universe, passing from celestial phenomena to the earth and its atmosphere, and finally to organic life.

HUME, DAVID (1711–76), born of Berwickshire parents at Edinburgh, developed early in life a passion for philosophy. He spent three years (1734–7) with the Jesuits at La Flèche, and in 1739 published anonymously his 'Treatise of Human Nature' (q.v.) in two volumes, a third volume appearing in 1740. The work aroused little interest, but his 'Essays Moral and Political' (1741–2) were more successful. He accompanied General St. Clair as judge-advocate in the expedition to Port L'Orient in 1747 and on a mission to Vienna and Turin in 1748. His 'Enquiry concerning Human Understanding' (originally entitled 'Philosophical Essays') appeared in 1748 and his 'Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals' in 1751 (for these two works see Treatise of Human Nature). In 1752 he published his 'Political Discourses', which was translated into French and made Hume famous on the Continent. In the same year he was appointed keeper of the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh. In 1754 appeared the first volume of his 'History of Great Britain' (see below), followed by further volumes in 1757, 1759, and 1761. The first two volumes were translated into French.

HUME'S ENQUIRY

From 1763 to 1765 Hume was secretary to the Embassy in Paris, where he was well received by the court and by literary society. He brought back Rousseau to England and befriended him, but Rousseau's suspicious nature presently led to a quarrel. Hume was under-secretary of state in 1767–8, and after this finally settled in Edinburgh. After his death, his friend Adam Smith (q.v.) published his autobiography (1777). Hume's 'Dialogues concerning Natural Religion' (q.v.) were published in 1779 by his nephew. A complete edition of Hume's Letters, edited by J. Y. T. Greig, appeared in 1932.

Hume's philosophical works are dealt with under the heading 'Treatise of Human Nature'. His views on religion are contained, (a) in the essay 'Of Miracles' (included in the 'Enquiry concerning Human Understanding'), in which he argues that the evidence for miracles is necessarily inferior to the evidence for the 'laws of nature' established by uniform experience of which they are a violation; (b) in the dissertation entitled 'The Natural History of Religion' (included in 'Four Dissertations', 1757), in which he investigates its origin in human nature, attributing it to a 'concern with regard to the events of life', to the 'incessant hopes and fears which actuate the human mind', and traces its development from polytheism to monotheism and its inevitable degeneration; (c) in the 'Dialogues concerning Natural Religion' (q.v.), of which the conclusion is that there is evidence of design in the universe, but that while it is possible to infer from design the intelligence of God, it is impossible to infer his goodness. We thus have an 'attenuated theism' (Prof. Campbell Fraser), the view 'that the cause or causes of order in the universe probably bear some remote analogy to human intelligence'.

Hume's political opinions as expressed in his various writings show a process of development. He appears to have abandoned the view that men are naturally equal and that society is established by contract. He finally seems to have regarded political society as evolved from the family and existing for the purpose of administering justice ('Of the Origin of Government', 1777); and in contrast to his Tory attitude in the 'History' (q.v.), in his later essays he regards liberty as an ideal limiting the sphere of authority of government.

As a political economist Hume attacked the mercantile system, and in general anticipated the views of later economists (including Adam Smith). He insisted on the distinction between money and wealth; he held that a low rate of interest does not result from an abundance of money but from the increase in the industry and frugality of the people; he thought that the best taxes were those on consumption and denied that all taxes ultimately fall on land.

Hume's Enquiry concerning Human Understanding, see Treatise of Human Nature.

HUME'S HISTORY

Hume's History of Great Britain (see Hume), containing the reigns of the Stuarts, was published in 1754-7. Two further volumes on the Tudor reigns appeared in 1759, and two on the period from Julius Caesar to Henry VII in 1761.

Hume's object was to trace the steps by which the nation had arrived at its present system of government, and he started with the reign of James I as the period in which the revolt against the prerogative of the crown commenced. The work is criticized as superficial and as containing many misstatements, and the author is said to show Tory prejudice. But it was the first great English history, and, however imperfect, a fine conception. It was not a mere chronicle of political events, but includes periodical reviews of the material and intellectual state of the nation. The first volume was coldly received, but the work subsequently became popular, and for long was regarded as a standard history.

Humorous Lieutenant, The, a comedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), produced about 1620.

Prince Demetrius is in love with Celia, a captive. His father, Antigonus, king of Syria, also falls in love with her, and during his son's absence at the wars, tries to inveigle Celia, but she remains faithful to her younger lover. On Demetrius's return from victory, Antigonus informs him that Celia is dead, and while Demetrius shuts himself up in despair, tries to obtain her affection by a love-philtre. But the plot miscarries, and finally Celia's virtue and loyalty prevail on the king to surrender her to his son.

The name of the play is taken from an eccentric lieutenant, suffering from an infirmity which stimulates him to wonderful deeds of courage in war. When cured, his courage fails him; and it comes again when he is deluded into thinking himself sick once more. By accident he drinks the love-philtre intended for Celia, and in consequence falls grotesquely in love with the king.

Humours, COMEDY OF, a term applied especially to the type of comic drama written by Ben Jonson (q.v.), where a 'humour' is the embodiment in one of the characters of some individual passion or propensity.

Humphrey, DUKE OF GLOUCESTER (1391-1447), youngest son of Henry IV, 'the Good Duke Humphrey', was perhaps educated at Balliol College, Oxford. He was appointed Protector on the death of Henry V. He owed the epithet 'Good' only to his patronage of men of letters (including Lydgate and Capgrave). He read Latin and Italian literature, collected books from his youth, and gave the first books for a library at Oxford. His original library, built in the 15th cent., forms the oldest part of the Bodleian. He was the husband of Eleanor Cobham, who was imprisoned for witchcraft.

Humphrey, TO DINE WITH DUKE, to go dinnerless. The origin of the phrase is not clear. In the 17th cent. it was associated with old St. Paul's, London, and said of those who, while others were dining, passed their time walking in that place. According to Stow, the monument of Sir John Beauchamp there was 'by ignorant people misnamed to be' that of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, son of Henry IV (who was really buried at St. Albans). Nares says an (adjacent) part of the church was termed 'Duke Humphrey's Walk'. The equivalent expression in Edinburgh appears to have been 'to dine with St. Giles and the Earl of Murray' (who was buried in St. Giles's). [OED.]

Humphry Clinker, The Expedition of, a novel by Smollett (q.v.), published in 1771.

This is the last and the pleasantest of Smollett's novels. It relates, in the form of letters, the adventures of Mr. Matthew Bramble's family party as they travel through England and Scotland. The party consists of Bramble himself, an outwardly misanthropical but really kind-hearted old valetudinarian bachelor; his sister Tabitha, a virago bent on matrimony; his nephew Jerry, an amiable young spark, and his sister Lydia; Mrs. Winifred Jenkins, the maid; and Humphry Clinker, a ragged ostler whom they pick up en route as postilion, and who turns out a creature of much resource and devotion. Their wanderings, which take them to Bath, London, Harrogate, Edinburgh, and the Highlands, are made the occasion for many amusing adventures and episodes, for conveying much interesting information about contemporary manners, and for many discussions on matters political and other. The thread of narrative is slender. There is the love-affair of Lydia with a good-looking young actor, who turns out to be a gentleman of good family. Humphry becomes a Methodist and suffers a short imprisonment on a false charge of robbery. At Durham the party is joined by an eccentric Scottish soldier, Lieutenant Obadiah Lismahago, no less proud than he is needy. He wins the heart and hand of Miss Tabitha. Finally Humphry himself turns out to be the natural son of Matthew Bramble, and is united to Winifred Jenkins.

Humpty-Dumpty, a short, dumpy, hump-shouldered person. In the well-known nursery rhyme or riddle the name is commonly explained as signifying an egg. The riddle is found in one form or another in many parts of Europe (Halliwell). The name is thence allusively applied to any thing or person which when shattered cannot be restored. 'Humpty-Dumpty' occurs in 1698 as the name of a liquor; according to Disraeli ('Venetia'), ale boiled with brandy. [OED.]

Huns, an Asiatic race of warlike nomads who invaded Europe c. A.D. 375. They perhaps also invaded Hindustan: the Rajputs are believed to be of Hun stock. In the middle of the 5th cent. under their king, Attila (q.v.), they overran and ravaged a great part of Europe. The name is believed to represent the native name of the people, who were known to the Chinese as Hiong-nu and also Han. It is used in a transferred sense (like 'Vandal') of uncultured devastators, especially of the Germans. The immediate source of the latter application was a speech delivered by Wilhelm II on 27 July 1900 to the German troops about to embark for China, urging ruthless treatment of the enemy, like that of Attila and the Huns. [OED.]

HUNT, JAMES HENRY LEIGH (1784-1859), was educated at Christ's Hospital. He began to edit the 'Examiner' in 1808 and the 'Reflector' in 1810, and was sentenced with his brother to a fine and two years' imprisonment in 1813 for reflections in the former paper on the Prince Regent. He continued editing the 'Examiner' while in jail, where he was visited by Byron, Moore, Bentham, and Lamb. Subsequently he brought about the meeting of Keats and Shelley, and introduced the two poets to the public in the 'Examiner'. He published his chief poetical work 'The Story of Rimini' (based on the story of Paolo and Francesca, q.v.) in 1816 (it was subsequently revised), and 'Hero and Leander' in 1819. He joined Byron at Pisa in 1822 and there for a time carried on with him 'The Liberal' magazine (see under Byron). In 1847 he received a civil list pension. His poetical work, which was far less extensive than his prose writings, includes, besides the two poems mentioned above, 'Captain Sword and Captain Pen' (1835, depicting the horrors of war and foretelling the ultimate discomfiture of military power), the lines entitled 'Abou Ben Adhem' (q.v.) and 'Jenny kissed me', the apologue 'The Fish, the Man, and the Spirit', and a translation of Redi's 'Bacchus in Tuscany' (1825). His play 'A Legend of Florence' was successfully produced at Covent Garden in 1840. In addition to the two periodicals already mentioned, Leigh Hunt at various times conducted and largely wrote the 'Indicator' (1819-21), the 'Companion' (1828), a new 'Tatler' (1830-2), and

HUNTING THE FOX

'Leigh Hunt's London Journal' (1834-5). Other works of his are 'Imagination and Fancy' (1844), 'Wit and Humour' and 'Stories from Italian Poets' (1846), 'Men, Women, and Books' (1847), 'A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla' (1848), 'The Town' (1848), an 'Autobiography' (1850, enlarged edition 1860), 'Table Talk' (1851), 'The Old Court Suburb' (1855), and an edition of Beaumont and Fletcher in the same year.

The importance of Leigh Hunt lies chiefly in his development of the light miscellaneous essay, in his recognition of the genius of Shelley and Keats, and in the wide range of his critical work. He was depicted by Dickens as Skimpole (in 'Bleak House', q.v.), at any rate as regards 'the light externals of character', that is to say a certain vagueness and irresponsibility.

Hunt, THE REV. TUFTON, the blackmailing parson in Thackeray's 'The Adventures of Philip' (q.v.). He had previously figured in his 'A Shabby Genteel Story'.

HUNT, VIOLET, contemporary novelist, whose chief works are: 'Unkist, Unkind' (1897), 'The Wife of Altamont' (1910), 'The House of Many Mirrors' (1915), 'Their Lives' (1916), all novels; 'Tales of the Uneasy' (1910), 'More Tales of the Uneasy' (1925), short stories.

HUNTER, JOHN (1728-93), surgeon and anatomist, contributed very greatly by his writings, discoveries, and collections to the advance of surgical science. His MUSEUM was bought by the nation and transferred to the Royal College of Surgeons. He is commemorated in the annual HUNTERIAN ORATION.

Hunter, WILLIAM (1718-83), elder brother of John Hunter (above), was, like him, a distinguished anatomist, and first professor of anatomy at the Royal Academy. His museum was acquired by Glasgow University.

HUNTER, SIR WILLIAM WILSON (1840-1900), a distinguished Indian civilian and a man of wide culture, was appointed by Lord Mayo to compile a statistical survey of the Indian Empire, which he condensed in 'The Imperial Gazetteer of India' (1881). He published 'Annals of Rural Bengal' in 1868, 'Orissa' in 1872, 'A Brief History of the Indian Peoples' in 1882, 'The Life of Brian Houghton Hodgson' in 1896, and two charming lighter works, 'The Old Missionary' (1890) and 'The Thackerays in India' (1897). Of his 'History of British India' (1899) only two volumes had been completed at his death. He was editor of the series 'Rulers of India'.

Hunting of the Snark, The, a mock-heroic nonsense poem by Lewis Carroll (see Dodgson) published in 1876. The Snark is an imaginary animal of elusive character. On this occasion, it turns out to be a Boojum, a highly dangerous variety.

Hunyadi or HUNIADES, JANOS (1387-1456), a great Hungarian captain, who served under Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Poland. Owing to his military skill and valour the invading Turks suffered two signal defeats in 1443 and were obliged to make peace. He was regent of Hungary after the death of Ladislaus I in 1444, and father of Matthias Corvinus, the great king of Hungary.

Huon of Bordeaux, the hero of a French 13th-cent. chanson de geste. He has the misfortune to kill Charlot, son of the Emperor Charlemagne, in an affray, not knowing who his assailant is. He is thereupon condemned to death by the emperor, but reprieved on condition that he will go to the court of Gaudisse, amir of Babylon, bring back a handful of his hair and four of his teeth, kill his doughtiest knight, and kiss Esclarmonde his daughter. By the help of the fairy Oberon, Huon achieves the adventure. The work was translated by Lord Berners (q.v.) and printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1534. Huon's adventure is the theme of Gluck's opera 'Oberon'.

Hurlothrumbo, a popular burlesque (1729) by Samuel Johnson (1691-1773), a Manchester dancing-master.

HURST, FANNIE (1889-), American novelist, born at St. Louis. Her chief books are: 'Just around the Corner' (1914), 'Humoresque' (1919), 'Lummox' (1923), 'A President is Born' (1928).

Husbandrie, (Five) Hundreth good pointes of, see Tusser.

Husband's Message, The, an OE. poem included in the 'Exeter Book' (q.v.). It takes the form of a message to a woman from her husband, who has had to leave his home owing to a vendetta, telling her that he has obtained wealth and position in another land, and asking her to sail and join him when spring comes.

Hussars, from a Hungarian word meaning originally 'free-booter' (Latin cursorius, a pirate), the name in the 15th cent. of an organized body of light horsemen in the Hungarian army and extended to similar bodies of light cavalry in other armies.

The BLACK HUSSARS were the 'Black Brunswickers' (a force raised by the duke of Brunswick during the Napoleonic wars, so called from the colour of their uniform), who neither gave nor received quarter. Scott in a letter to Ballantyne wrote, 'I belong to the Black Hussars of Literature, who neither give nor receive criticism.' The letter and the incident which occasioned it are interesting (Lockhart, ch. xxxvii).

Hussites, followers of John Huss (1373-1415), the Bohemian preacher of the Reformation, who was convicted of heresy by the Council of Constance (1414-18) and burnt alive. The Hussites after his death took up arms under Zisca (q.v.), and inflicted many defeats on the Imperialists.

HUTCHESON, FRANCIS (1694-1746), a Scotsman born in Ulster and educated at Glasgow University, was professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow from 1729 until his death. Before this he had published two volumes, 'An Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue' (1725) and 'An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections' (1726). These were followed by text-books on philosophical subjects, and in 1755, after his death, was published his 'System of Moral Philosophy'.

Hutcheson, in his ethical system, developed the ideas of Shaftesbury (q.v.). He elaborated the theory of the moral sense, giving it greater prominence than did his predecessor. While Shaftesbury made virtue reasonable as well as beautiful, Hutcheson sees it solely in its aesthetic aspect. The Author of Nature has 'made Virtue a lovely Form, that we might easily distinguish it from its contrary and be made happy in pursuit of it'. We have a 'moral sense of beauty in actions and affections'. At the same time he identifies virtue with general benevolence, and finds that action best which procures the greatest general happiness, in this respect anticipating the utilitarians.

Hutchinson, JOHN (1615-64), of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn, held Nottingham for parliament as governor, signed the king's death-warrant, and was a member of the first two councils of state, but retired in 1653. He was saved from death and confiscation at the Restoration by the influence of kinsmen, but was imprisoned. See Hutchinson (Mrs. L.).

HUTCHINSON, Mrs. LUCY (b. 1620), daughter of Sir Allen Apsley, and wife of John Hutchinson (q.v.). She was author of 'The Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson', her husband, published in 1806, and of a fragment of a 'Life' of herself. The 'Memoirs' give an interesting picture, from the Puritan standpoint, of the state of the country at the outbreak of the civil war and of the conflict in the vicinity of Nottingham.

Hutchinsonians, followers of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson (1591-1643), née Marbury, who followed John Cotton to Massachusetts, and there founded an Antinomian (q.v.) sect. She was murdered by Indians at Hell Gate, New York county.

HUTH, HENRY (1815-78), merchant

banker and bibliophile. He collected narratives of voyages, Shakespearian and early English literature, and early Spanish and German books. He printed 'Ancient Ballads and Broad-sides', 1867; 'Inedited Poetical Miscellanies (1584-1700)', 1870; 'Prefaces, Dedications, and Epistles (1540-1701)', 1874; 'Fugitive Tracts (1493-1700)', 1875.

HUTTON, RICHARD HOLT (1826-97), educated at University College School and University College, London, studied at Heidelberg and Berlin and prepared at Manchester New College for the Unitarian ministry. He was principal of University Hall, London, and edited the Unitarian magazine 'The Enquirer' from 1851 to 1853. With Walter Bagehot (q.v.) he was joint editor of the 'National Review' from 1855 to 1864. He was also assistant editor of the 'Economist' (1858-60), and joint editor of the 'Spectator' (1861-97). His works, mainly of literary and theological criticism, include, besides a volume on Cardinal Newman, 'Essays, Theological and Literary' (1871; revised, 1877), 'Essays on some Modern Guides of English Thought' (1887), 'Criticisms on Contemporary Thought and Thinkers' (1894), and 'Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought' (1899).

HUXLEY, ALDOUS (LEONARD) (1894-), novelist and essayist, educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford. His best-known books are: 'Crome Yellow' (1921), 'Antic Hay' (1923), 'Those Barren Leaves' (1925), 'Point Counter Point' (1928), 'Brave New World' (1932), all novels. Also 'Leda' (1920), a poem; and 'On the Margin' (1923), 'Jesting Pilate' (1926), essays.

HUXLEY, THOMAS HENRY (1825-95), studied at Charing Cross Hospital and from 1846 to 1850 was assistant surgeon on H.M.S. 'Rattlesnake'. Apart from a large number of papers on technical subjects, he influenced English thought by many addresses and publications on philosophical and religious subjects. Among these may be mentioned 'Man's Place in Nature' (1863), 'The Physical Basis of Life' (1868), 'Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews' (1870), 'Critiques and Addresses' (1873), a monograph on Hume (1879), 'Science and Morals' (1886), in which he defines the relation of science to philosophical and religious speculation, 'Essays upon some Controverted Questions' (1892), and his Romanes Lecture, 'Ethics and Evolution' (1893). In this last he refuses to see in the struggle of evolution a basis for morality, of which the criterion is to be sought elsewhere. Huxley coined the word 'agnostic' to express his own philosophical attitude. Huxley's 'Collected Essays' were published in 1894, and his 'Scientific Memoirs' in 1898-1901. His 'Life and Letters' were edited by his son (1900). He was a powerful but discriminating supporter of Darwinism, and a vigorous disputant. A controversy between him and Gladstone, carried on in the magazines, on the subject of the Gadarene swine, is celebrated.

Hvergelmir, in Scandinavian mythology, the spring in Niflheim (q.v.) from which twelve rivers issued, the largest of which was Elivagar (the cold stormy waters).

Hyacinthus, a son of Amyclas, a king of Sparta, beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the love of the former, and Zephyrus, incensed at his preference of his rival, resolved to punish him. As Apollo was playing at quoits with Hyacinthus, Zephyrus blew the quoit thrown by Apollo so that it struck the boy and killed him. Apollo changed his blood into the flower that bears his name.

Hyacinthus de Archangelis, DOMINUS, in R. Browning's 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.) Count Guido's counsel.

Hyades, daughters of Atlas (q.v.), who were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Hyas, killed by a wild boar, that they pined away and died, and were placed among the stars (cf. Pleiades). Their names were Ambrosia, Eudora, Pedile, Corónis, Polyxo, Phyto, and Diônē. The rising of the group of stars simultaneously with the sun was supposed to indicate rainy weather, whence probably its name (from ὑεω, to rain).

Hybla, a town in Sicily, on the slope of Mt. Etna, where thyme and odoriferous herbs grew in abundance, famous for its honey.

HYDE, DOUGLAS, contemporary Irish writer, 'An Craoibhin' according to his Gaelic designation, is a pioneer of the movement for the revival of the Irish language and literature. He is author of a 'Literary History of Ireland' (1899) and of the 'Love Songs of Connacht' (1894), among many publications.

Hyde Park, London, the ancient manor of Hyde, part of the property of the old Abbey of Westminster, passed into the possession of the Crown at the dissolution of the monasteries. Races were held there in Stuart times (see below). The Serpentine lake was formed in 1733, by Queen Caroline's direction, from the waters of the Westbourne stream. The corner near the Marble Arch is the favourite pitch of HYDRA PARK ORATORS, popular exponents of various causes, social, political, and religious.

Hyde Park, a comedy by Shirley (q.v.), acted in 1632 on the occasion of the opening of Hyde Park to the public. It was printed in 1637. Several of the scenes are in the park, and in the fourth act races take place; when Pepys saw the play, horses were led across the stage, causing much excitement. The plot is very slight, and the chief interest is in the representation of contemporary manners.

Hydra, a many-headed monster that infested the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna in the Peloponnese. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy it, but as soon as one head was struck off, two arose in its place. This difficulty was overcome with the help of Iolauus, who applied a burning brand to the wound as each head fell. Hercules dipped his arrows in the Hydra's blood, so that the wounds they gave were incurable.

Hydriotaphia, see Urn Burial.

Hye Way to the Spyttel House, The, a tract printed and probably composed by Robert Copland (fl. 1508-47), describing the beggars and other types of the poorer classes who visit the hospital, in the form of a dialogue between the author and the porter of the hospital. It throws a vivid light on the poverty prevailing in the early 16th cent.

Hygiea, the goddess of health, and daughter of Aesculapius (q.v.).

Hyksos, THE, or Shepherd Kings of Egypt, foreign rulers who conquered Egypt in the second millennium B.C., and ruled it, according to Manetho, for 510 years. But his figures are untrustworthy. The word 'Hyksos' is the Egyptian hek-shasu, 'chief of the Bedouins' or 'shepherds'.

Hylas, a beautiful youth beloved by Hercules, and his companion on board the ship 'Argo'. On the Asiatic coast, the Argonauts (q.v.) landed to take a fresh supply of water, when Hylas fell into the fountain and was drowned, or according to the poets was carried away by the nymphs for love of his beauty. Hercules, disconsolate, abandoned the Argonautic expedition.

Hyleg, in astrology, the ruling planet of a nativity. See House (Astrological).

Hymen, in Greek and Roman mythology, the god of marriage, represented as a young man carrying a torch and veil.

Hymettus, a mountain in Attica celebrated for its honey and for its marble.

Hymir, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the sea-giants. He was destroyed by the gods under Woden, and from his body the earth was made.

Hymn to the Naiads, a poem by Akenside (q.v.), written in 1746 and published in 1758 in Dodsley's 'Collection of Poems'.

The poet traces the mythological origin of the Naiads, and considers them successively as producing the brooks and breezes, nourishing verdure, yielding health, and so forth. Finally he treats of their union with the Muses and the true inspiration that temperance alone can give.

Hymns Ancient and Modern, a collection promoted and edited by the Rev. Sir Henry Williams Baker (1821-77), vicar of Monkland, near Leominster, who contributed to it many original hymns and translations from the Latin. The collection first appeared in 1861. Supplements were added in 1889 and 1916, edited respectively by C. Steggall and S. H. Nicholson.

HYPERION

Hypallagē, from a Greek word meaning 'exchange', a transference of epithet, as 'Sansfoy's dead dowry' for 'dead Sansfoy's dowry' (Spenser).

Hypatia, or New Foes with an Old Face, an historical novel by C. Kingsley (q.v.), published in 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1851 and in book form in 1853.

The time of the story is the 5th cent., when the Western Empire was rapidly succumbing before the Teutonic advance. The scene is Alexandria, and the book presents a striking and crowded picture of the turbulent city, scarcely controlled by the shifty prefect Orestes and his legionaries; the vigorous aggressive church under the patriarch Cyril; the lawless intruding Goths; and the subtle influence of the ancient Greek philosophy, in the person of the beautiful Hypatia, its noble expounder. Philammon, a young Christian monk from the Egyptian desert, comes to Alexandria, and in the turmoil of sensations awakened by his first experience of the city is swept from his ancient faith. He is fascinated by Hypatia and the temperance and sanity of her doctrine; he is repelled by the violence and fanaticism of the Alexandrian monks. He sees Hypatia torn to pieces by a mob of infuriated Christians. And finally he returns to the solitude of the desert cliffs, having learnt tolerance to all men.

The historical Hypatia was daughter of the Alexandrian mathematician Theon; she was a Neoplatonic philosopher, and perished as described in the novel.

Hyperbōlē, the use of exaggerated terms not in order to deceive but to emphasize the importance or extent of something. Cf. Meiosis.

Hyperboreans, THE, in Greek legends connected with the worship of Apollo, a happy and peaceful people, worshippers of that god, who lived in a land of perpetual sunshine and plenty. This came to be conceived as lying in the extreme north, 'beyond the influence of the north wind', perhaps from the derivation of their name, now generally rejected, from ὑπερ Βορέας (Smith's 'Classical Dictionary').

Hyperion, a son of Uranus and Gē, one of the Titans. He married Thea, by whom he was father of Aurora, the Sun, and the Moon. Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the Sun itself. In Greek the word was pronounced Hyperion, but Shakespeare and most English poets accent it Hyper'ion. The phrase 'Hyperion to a satyr' is in 'Hamlet', i. ii.

Hyperion, a poem by Keats (q.v.), written in 1818-19.

Keats wrote two versions of the poem and each remains an uncompleted fragment. In the first the story of Hyperion is told in simple narrative; in the other in the form of an allegorical vision granted to the poet. In the former, Saturn is presented mourning his fallen realm, and debating with the Titans how he may recover it. They look in vain to Hyperion, the sun-god, who is still undeposed, to help them. Then the young Apollo is introduced, the god of music, poetry, and knowledge. At this point the fragment ends.

In the other form of the poem, the poet in a dream passes through a garden towards a shrine, of which the approach is granted to none

But those to whom the miseries of the world

Are misery, and will not let them rest.

Then the fate of Hyperion, the last of the Titans, who is dethroned by Apollo, is revealed to him by Moneta, the mournful goddess of the 'wither'd race' of Saturn; but the tale is uncompleted.

Hypsipylē, daughter of Thoas, king of Lemnos. When the women of the island, being neglected by their husbands, decided to kill all the men, she saved her father. On the occasion of the visit of the Argonauts (q.v.) to the island, she wedded Jason and bore him twin sons. The Lemnian women discovered that she had saved Thoas, and drove her from the island.

Hyrkania, a region of the ancient Persian Empire adjoining the Caspian or Hyrcanian sea. It was reputed to abound in wild beasts, serpents, &c.

Hystéron Protéron, in grammar and rhetoric, a figure of speech in which the word or phrase that should properly come last is put first; in general, 'putting the cart before the horse'.

Hythloday, RAPHAEL, in More's 'Utopia' (q.v.), the traveller in whose mouth the author places the criticisms of English institutions, and the description of the 'wise and godly ordinances' of the Utopians.

I

IHS, representing the Greek IΗΣ, an abbreviation of ΙΗΣΟΥΣ, Jesus. The Romanized form of the abbreviation would be IES, but from the retention of the Greek form in Latin manuscripts and subsequent forgetfulness of its origin, it has often been looked upon as a Latin abbreviation or contraction, and explained as meaning Iesus Hominum Salvator, Jesus Saviour of men, or In Hoc Signo [vinces], in this sign (thou shalt conquer), or In Hac Salus, in this (cross) is salvation. [OED.]

I.N.R.I., Iesus Nazareus Rex Iudaeorum, Jesus of Nazareth king of the Jews; the title on the Cross.

Iachimo, a character in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.).

Iago, a character in Shakespeare's 'Othello' (q.v.).

Iambic, verse consisting of, or based on, iambuses, that is feet consisting of a short followed by a long syllable (see Metre). The IAMBIC TRIMETER is a verse of six iambuses, the first, third, and fifth of which may be replaced by a tribrach or a spondee or a dactyl. This was the principal metre of the Greek drama. In modern use, an iambic verse of six feet is known as an Alexandrine (q.v.).

Iamblichus (d. c. A.D. 330), born at Calchis in Coele-Syria, a Neoplatonic philosopher, who was author of a work, part of which survives, on the Pythagorean philosophy.

Ianthe, (1) the heroine of D'Avenant's 'The Siege of Rhodes' (q.v.); (2) the young lady to whom Byron dedicated his 'Childe Harold's Pilgrimage', Lady Charlotte Mary Harley (1801-80), who married Captain Anthony Bacon; (3) the lady whom Landor addressed in a series of poems, Sophia Jane Swift, an Irishwoman, who became Countess de Mollandé; (4) the name of the daughter of Shelley and his wife Harriet; also in Shelley's 'Queen Mab' (q.v.), the maiden to whom the fairy grants a vision of the world.

Iâpētus, one of the Titans (q.v.) and the father of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus, and the grandfather of Deucalion (qq.v.). He was thus regarded by the ancient Greeks as the progenitor of the human race.

IBSEN, HENRIK (1828-1906), Norwegian dramatist, whose satirical problem-plays, directed to social reforms, obtained wide fame and exerted a powerful influence. Ibsen's early work consisted of historical romantic dramas, 'Fru Inger at Osterrad', 'The Banquet at Solhaug', 'The Warriors at Helgeland', and 'Kongsemnerne' ('Royal Candidates', 1862). These were followed by 'Love's

IBSEN

Comedy' (1863), the first of his satirical dramas, of which the theme is the destructive effect on love of the prosaic and official aspects of courtship and matrimony. Sooner than see their love thus blighted, Falk and Swanhild decide to part while it is still in its perfect bloom.

Then, in a moment of pecuniary distress, and embittered by disappointment at the attitude taken by his country in the Dan-German war, Ibsen gave vent to his despondency in his two great lyrical dramas 'Brand' and 'Peer Gynt' (qq.v., 1866 and 1867). After these came 'The Young Men's League' (1869), a satire on Norwegian politics, and 'Emperor and Galilean' (1873), a double play on Julian the Apostate and his relations with Christianity and Paganism. Then followed the series of problem plays, of which the general subject is the relation of the individual to his social environment, the shams and conventions that hinder his self-expression, and especially the case of woman in the state of marriage. These plays were: 'Pillars of Society' (1877), 'A Doll's House' (1879), 'Ghosts' (1881), 'An Enemy of the People' (1882), 'The Wild Duck' (1884), 'Rosmersholm' (1886), 'The Lady from the Sea' (1888), 'Hedda Gabler' (1890), 'The Master Builder' (1892), 'Little Eyolf' (1894), 'John Gabriel Borkman' (1896), and 'When we Dead awake' (1900). These have been very differently judged. Saintsbury goes so far as to call Ibsen parochial, and attributes his success (apart from the measure of genius that he allows to the author) to the prevailing lack of sense of humour and the revolt against the classical and conventional. But other competent judges, supported by the wide influence of Ibsen's work, profoundly disagree.

Icarius, an Athenian who, having hospitably received Dionysus when he came to Attica, was taught by him the cultivation of the vine. He gave wine to some peasants who became intoxicated, slew Icarius and threw his body into a well. His daughter Erigone discovered it by the help of her dog Maera. Erigone in despair hanged herself, and was changed into the constellation Virgo, and her father into the star Boötes.

Ictus, Latin 'beat', the stress on particular syllables that marks the rhythm of a verse.

Ida, the name of a mountain in Phrygia near Troy, where the Simois and Scamander had their sources. From its summit the gods watched the Trojan War. It was the scene of the rape of Ganymede (q.v.) and the home of Paris and Oenone (qq.v.). There was another Mt. Ida in Crete; in a cave on this mountain Zeus (q.v.) was said to have been brought up. A cave on the Cretan Mt. Ida has been excavated and has yielded a great quantity of votive offerings of the classical Greek period.

The IDAEAN MOTHER was Cybele (q.v.), whose worship was universal in Phrygia and who was particularly connected with Mt. Ida in Crete and the Phrygian Ida (Smith, 'Class. Dict.').

Ida, PRINCESS, the heroine of Tennyson's 'The Princess' (q.v.), which is the basis of the Gilbert and Sullivan opera 'Princess Ida'.

Idalla, a name sometimes given to Venus, from Idalium, a mountain-city in Cyprus, sacred to her worship.

Idea, the Shepherds Garland, nine pastorals by M. Drayton (q.v.), issued, 1st ed. 1593, 3rd revision (entitled 'Pastorals') 1619.

Ideal of a Christian Church. The, see Ward (W. G.) and Oxford Movement.

Idealism, in philosophy, any system of thought in which the object of external perception is held to consist, either in itself, or as perceived, of ideas, whether of the perceiving mind or of the universal mind; or in which no independent reality is held to underlie our ideas of external objects. The principal exponents of idealistic philosophies include Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel (qq.v.). In common use the word means the representation of things in an ideal form, or as they might be; the imaginative treatment of a subject in art or literature.

Idōmēnēus, king of Crete, an ally of the Greeks in the Trojan War. While returning, he vowed, if saved from a tempest that threatened his ship, to sacrifice to Poseidon whatever he first met on his arrival. This proved to be his own son, whom Idomeneus accordingly sacrificed. For his inhumanity the Cretans expelled him from his kingdom.

Idun or IDUNA, in Scandinavian mythology, the goddess who had in her keeping in Asgard the apples that restored the youth of the gods. She was the wife of Bragi (q.v.), and appears to personify the fruitful season of the year.

Idyll, from a Greek word meaning a little picture, a short poem, descriptive of some picturesque scene or incident, chiefly in rustic life; e.g. the 'Idylls' of Theocritus (q.v.).

Idylls of the King, The, a series of connected poems by A. Tennyson (q.v.), of which the first fragment, 'The Morte d'Arthur', subsequently incorporated in 'The Passing of Arthur', was published in 1842. In 1859 appeared 'Enid', 'Vivien', 'Elaine', and 'Guinevere'. In 1869 were added 'The Coming of Arthur', 'The Holy Grail', 'Pelleas and Ettarre', and 'The Passing of Arthur'. 'The Last Tournament' appeared in 1871, 'Gareth and Lynette' in 1872, 'Balin and Balan' in 1885; and finally 'Enid' was divided into two parts, 'The Marriage of Geraint' and 'Geraint and Enid'.

These poems form parts in a general presentation of the story of Arthur, of his noble design of the Round Table, and of its failure under the ever-widening influence of evil, in the shape of the sin of Lancelot and Guinevere. It is a story of bright hope (in 'The Coming of Arthur' and 'Gareth and Lynette'), followed by growing disillusionment, of which the protagonists are the melancholy characters of Arthur and Guinevere, Lancelot and Elaine. The chief criticism passed on it relates to the shadowy and unreal, almost symbolical, character of Arthur himself. Summaries of the several parts are given herein under their respective titles.

Ignis Fatuus, meaning 'foolish fire', is a phosphorescent light seen hovering or flitting over marshy ground, and supposed to be due to the spontaneous combustion of an inflammable gas derived from decaying vegetable matter, popularly called Will-o'-the-wisp, Jack-o'-lantern, &c. It seems to have been formerly a common phenomenon. When approached, the ignis fatuus appeared to recede and finally to vanish, sometimes re-appearing in another direction. This led to the notion that it was the work of a mischievous sprite, intentionally leading benighted travellers astray. Hence the term is often used allusively for any delusive hope, aim, &c. [OED.]

Ignoge (three syllables), according to Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Greek princess, the wife of Brute (q.v.), and the mother of Lochrine, Albanact, and Camber. Spenser calls her Inogene of Italy ('Faerie Queene', II. x. 13).

Ignorāmus, a famous university farcical play by George Ruggle (1575-1622), a fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, produced in 1615 before James I, an adaptation of an Italian comedy by Della Porta. The title part is a burlesque of the recorder of Cambridge, Brackyn, who is subjected to various humiliations; he falls in love with the heroine Rosabella, but is fobbed off with the virago Polla, belaboured, thought to be possessed by evil spirits, subjected to exorcism, and finally carried off to a monastery for treatment. Brackyn had already been held up to ridicule in the last part of the 'Parnassus' plays (q.v.).

Ignoratio elenchī, a logical fallacy which consists in apparently refuting an opponent while actually disproving some statement other than that advanced by him.

Igraine, or IGERNE, or YGERNE, in the Arthurian legend, the wife of Gorlois of Cornwall, whom Uther Pendragon, assuming the likeness of her husband by the help of Merlin's magic, won for his wife. Of their union Arthur (q.v.) was born.

Illad, The, a Greek epic poem attributed to Homer (q.v.), describing the war waged by Achaean princes against Troy for the purpose of recovering Helen, wife of Menelaus, whom Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy, had carried away. In particular it deals with the wrath of Achilles, the special hero of the poem, at the slight put upon him by Agamemnon, leader of the host, and his final return to the field and slaying of Hector. See Achilles.

Ilissus, a river of Attica, flowing east and south of Athens and joining the Cephissus.

Illium, see Troy.

Ilk, in Scottish, means 'same', of that ilk, of the same place, designation, or name; e.g. Guthrie of that ilk, Guthrie of Guthrie.

Illuminati, a name applied to, or assumed by, various societies or sects because of their claim to special enlightenment in religious or intellectual matters. It is used also to render the German Illuminaten, the name of a celebrated secret society founded at Ingolstadt in Bavaria in 1776 by Prof. Adam Weishaupt, holding deistic and republican principles, and having an organization akin to freemasonry. It obtained Goethe and Herder among its recruits. It was attacked by the Rosicrucians, and became an object of political suspicion to the Bavarian government, and its activities were prohibited in 1785. The Jacobins of the French Revolution were supposed to be connected with the Illuminati. The name is also applied generally, often in a satirical sense, to persons claiming special knowledge on any subject.

Ilmarinen, one of the principal heroes of the 'Kalevala' (q.v.), the metal-worker who makes the magic mull, the Sampo (q.v.).

Imaginary Conversations, by Landor (q.v.), published 1824-9, followed by 'Imaginary Conversations of Greeks and Romans', published in 1853.

These represent, particularly if 'Pericles and Aspasia' (q.v.) and 'The Pentameron' (q.v.) are included, the bulk of Landor's prose work. The conversations are between characters of all the ages, from classical to recent times; they are, some dramatic, some idyllic, some satirical, while others treat of political, social, or literary questions; action and incidents are occasionally interposed, which add to their variety. There are some 150 of these dialogues. Their form is admirable, but the matter is unequal; for Landor made use of them to express his personal views, which were sometimes ill-judged, on a multitude of subjects. The following are some of the best known: 'Dante and Beatrice', 'Princess Mary and Princess Elizabeth', 'Louis XIV and Pere La Chaise', 'Aesop and Rhodope', 'Romilly and Wilberforce', 'Fra Filippo Lippi and Pope Eugenius IV', and 'Calvin and Melancthon'.

ancient times to a body of 10,000 Persian infantry, the flower of the army, whose number was kept constantly full.

Imogen, in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), the wife of Posthumus.

Imoinda, a character in Mrs. Behn's 'Oroonoko' (q.v.) and Southerne's tragedy of the same name.

Imp, originally a young shoot of a plant or tree; hence a scion, especially of a noble house (e.g. in the epitaph of Lord Denbigh in the Beauchamp Chapel at Warwick, 'Heere resteth the body of the noble Impe Robert of Dudley'). It came to be used specifically of a child of the devil; a little devil, an evil spirit; a mischievous child, a young urchin.

Imposture, The, a comedy by James Shirley (q.v.), produced in 1640.

Flaviano, the favourite of the duke of Mantua, hopes to win the hand of the duke's daughter, Fioretta. The prince of Ferrara comes to proffer his suit for her. The 'imposture' consists in the passing off, for the young duchess, of the favourite's cast-off mistress, Juliana, and is for a time successful; but all is put right in the end.

Impressionism, the method of painting things so as to give their general tone and effect, or the broad impression which they produce at first sight, without elaboration of detail; the literary presentation of a scene or emotion in its salient features, done in a few strokes. [OED.]

Imprimatur, meaning 'let it be printed', the formula signed by an official licenser authorizing the printing of a book.

In commendam, from the Latin dare in commendam, to give in trust, used of the tenure of a benefice given in charge to some person until a proper incumbent was found for it, especially used of a benefice which a bishop or other dignitary was allowed to hold along with his own preferment (abolished in England by statute in 1836).

In Memoriam A. H. H., a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.) written between 1833 and 1850, and published in the latter year. The poem was written in memory of Arthur H. Hallam, the son of Henry Hallam, the historian, a young man of extraordinary promise and an intimate friend of Tennyson, who died in 1833 at Vienna when 23 years old. It is written in stanzas of four octosyllabic lines rhyming a b b a.

'In Memoriam' is not so much a single elegy as a series of poems written at different times, inspired by the changing moods of the author's regret for his dead friend. The series describes, broadly speaking, the 'Way of the Soul', as Tennyson sometimes called it, in presence of a great loss, the gradual transformation of the regret felt by the living for the dead and of the longing for his bodily presence, into a sense of spiritual contact and possession, and a wider love of God and humanity. (See A. C. Bradley, 'A Commentary on Tennyson's "In Memoriam"'.)

The epilogue is a marriage-song on the occasion of the wedding of the poet's sister, Cecilia, to Edward Lushington, and gives a cheerful ending to the whole work.

In petto, Italian, in one's own breast or private intention, in contemplation, undisclosed; used, in the phraseology of the Roman Curia, for the nomination of a cardinal, which nomination is not yet to be disclosed.

In principio, Latin, in the beginning; the first words of Genesis and of St. John's Gospel in the Vulgate. Hence, the short name for the first fourteen verses of St. John, which were supposed to have extraordinary virtues. Chaucer says of the Friar in the 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.):

He was the beste beggar in al his house,
For though a widdewe hadde but oo schoo,
So plesant was his In principio,
Yet wolde he have a ferthing or he wente.
('Prologue', 252.)

In the Midst of Life, a collection of short stories by Ambrose Bierce (q.v.), originally entitled 'Tales of Soldiers and Civilians'.

Inca, the title of the emperor or king of Peru before its conquest by the Spaniards; also one of the royal race of Peru, descended from Manco Capac (q.v.) and Mama Ocollo.

INCHBALD, Mrs. ELIZABETH (1753-1821), née Simpson, was a novelist, dramatist, and actress. She is chiefly remembered for her two prose romances 'A Simple Story' (1791) and 'Nature and Art' (1796), qq.v. Her most successful comedy was 'I'll tell you what', produced in 1785. She edited 'The British Theatre', a collection of old plays, in 1806-9.

Inchcape Rock, THE, a rock in the North Sea, off the Firth of Tay, dangerous to mariners, near which the abbot of Arbroath or Aberbrothock fixed a warning bell on a float. In Southey's ballad on the subject, Sir Ralph the Rover, to plague the abbot, cuts the bell from the float, and later, on his homeward way, is wrecked on the rock.

Incunabula, a Latin word meaning swaddling-clothes, is used to signify books produced in the infancy of the art of printing, especially those printed before 1500.

Indamora, a character in Dryden's 'Aureng-Zebe' (q.v.).

Independence Day, 4 July, kept as a national holiday in the United States, as the anniversary of the signature in 1776 of the Declaration of Independence.

Index Expurgatorius, strictly, an authoritative specification of the passages to be expunged or altered in works otherwise permitted to be read by Roman Catholics. The term is frequently used in England to cover the 'Index librorum prohibitorum', or list of forbidden books (not authors, as sometimes thought). Rules for the formation of this list and of the 'Index Expurgatorius' were drawn up by the Council of Trent, and successive editions of the former have been published from time to time until to-day. Indicator, The, a periodical conducted by Leigh Hunt (q.v.), 1819-21.

Indo-European, the name applied to the great family of cognate languages (also called Indo-Germanic and Aryan) spoken over the greater part of Europe and extending into Asia as far as northern India; also applied to the race, or its divisions, using one or other of these languages. [OED.]

Indra, in Vedic theology, the chief god of the air, the rain-giver, the type of beneficent heroic power, struggling against evil demons; later subordinated to the triad Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva.

Iñez, DONNA, in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.), the mother of the hero.

Iñez de Castro, the daughter of a Castilian nobleman, attached to the court of Alphonso IV of Portugal. Prince Pedro married her secretly, and lived with her in happy seclusion. When the marriage was discovered, the king authorized the murder of Iñez. On the accession (1357) of Pedro, who had been reduced to despair by the death of his wife, his first measure was to take vengeance on her murderers. The subject has been treated by various poets, including Camoens; Landor wrote a short drama on it.

Infangthief (Infangenetheof) and Outfangthief, the ancient right of the lord of the manor to hang, respectively, his own man (one of his feudal tenants or serfs) if caught in the act of crime, and someone else's man, if caught in the act of crime within his jurisdiction. The two stone balls that decorate the gateways of many old manor-houses are said to have originally represented the heads of two malefactors, symbols of the lord's jurisdiction.

Infernal Marriage, The, a short burlesque tale published by B. Disraeli in 1834, describing the 'runaway match' of Pluto and Proserpine and what ensued, and introducing some political banter.

Ingres, JEAN AUGUSTE DOMINIQUE (1780-1867), a celebrated French painter, mainly of historical pieces, a pupil of David. He is noted rather for his drawing than his colour. Among his smaller works is the well-known piece, 'La Source', in the Louvre.

Ingres, VIOLIN OF (Violon d'Ingres): Ingres (see previous entry), besides being a great painter, was a moderate performer on the violin. It is said that he was less flattered by compliments on his painting (in which he knew himself a master) than by compliments on his fiddling. The expression is used of a secondary occupation or hobby, a subject of pride or vanity to the person concerned.

Inheritance, The, a novel by S. E. Ferrier (q.v.), published in 1824.

It deals with the fortunes of Gertrude St. Clair, granddaughter of the earl of Rossville and heiress presumptive of his estate. On the death of her father, who had been repudiated by the earl as having married beneath him, she and her mother are admitted to Rossville Castle and the countenance of the earl, a pompous self-conceited tyrant. Contrary to his wishes, Gertrude falls in love with her fascinating profligate cousin, Colonel Delmour, and after the earl's death becomes engaged to him, to the despair of those who know his real character. Among these is another cousin, Edward Lyndsay, who loves Gertrude with self-effacing humility. A low-bred American now comes forward and claims to be Gertrude's father. It comes to light that the ambitious Mrs. St. Clair, despairing of issue, has adopted the daughter of a servant and passed her off as her own child. The reaction of the two cousins to this catastrophe is characteristic. Gertrude having lost title and fortune is abandoned by Colonel Delmour, while Edward Lyndsay is faithful to her and gradually wins her love. Miss Pratt, the garrulous and eccentric spinster, is an amusing character in the story.

Inkle and Yarico, a romantic comedy by G. Colman (q.v.) the younger, performed in 1787, in which the young Londoner Inkle, saved from death on a voyage to Barbados by the beautiful savage Yarico, has to decide between fidelity to her and a wealthy marriage to Narcissa, the governor's daughter; he chooses the latter, and is punished for his ingratitude. The story occurs in Addison's 'Spectator' (No. 11), and is taken from Ligon's 'History of Barbados'.

Inn Album, The, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1875.

The poem is a tragedy, in eight scenic divisions, of a motherless girl seduced by an elderly adventurer, driven to marry an old, poor, and narrow-minded clergyman, and finally to suicide by the threat of her seducer to reveal her secret to her husband. The 'inn-album' is used as the means of conveying this threat to her. A young man, who had honourably loved the woman and had come under the pernicious influence of the adventurer, not knowing that he was the woman's seducer, reappears at the crisis of the story, and, learning the elder man's infamy, strangles him. The story in its main outlines was founded on fact. (See Nicoll and Wise, 'Literary Anecdotes', i. 533.)

Innisfall, a poetical name for Ireland.

Inns of Court and of Chancery were the earliest settled places of residence, resembling colleges, of associations of law students in London, and date from the 13th and 14th cents. The Inns of Court are the four sets of buildings belonging to the four legal societies that have the exclusive right of admitting persons to practice at the bar. They are: Lincoln's Inn, Inner Temple, Middle Temple, and Gray's Inn. Each of the societies comprises benchers, barristers, and students. The first are the senior members and managers of the society. The Inns were the frequent scene of masques and revels in the 16th and 17th cents. The Inns of Chancery were formerly attached to one or other of the Inns of Court. They have ceased to exist as corporate bodies. The buildings of some of them (e.g. Furnivall's Inn or Clifford's Inn) have been destroyed. But those of others (e.g. Staple Inn or Barnard's Inn) survive in private ownership.

Innocents Abroad, The, one of Mark Twain's (q.v.) most successful books (1869). It is a rollicking tale of a tour of Europe and the East by a group of Americans. Neither famous names nor historic associations unpress the tourists, and each place in turn is compared, on its merits, with their native land.

Ino, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia (qq.v.) and wife of Athamas, king of Thebes. Athamas had previously, by order of Hera, married Nephele, and by her had become father of Phrixus and Helle. Ino conceived a bitter hatred of her step-children, who escaped from her on a golden ram (see under Argonauts). Ino's own children were Learchus and Melicertes. Hera, angered with Ino, drove Athamas mad, so that he killed Learchus. Ino fled from him and threw herself into the sea with Melicertes in her arms. They became deities of the sea, under the names

Leucothea and Palaemon. It was Ino who saved Odysseus when his raft was wrecked, lending her scarf to support him.

Inogene, see Ignoge.

Inquisition, THE, in the Roman Catholic Church, an ecclesiastical tribunal (officially styled the Holy Office) directed to the suppression of heresy and punishment of heretics. At first it was in the hands of the Dominican Friars, and early in the 13th cent. was entrusted by Innocent III with the extirpation of heresy in southern France. Soon there grew up a central governing body at Rome called the Congregation of the Holy Office, whose activities were gradually extended over France, the Netherlands, Spain, Portugal, and the Spanish and Portuguese colonies. It was abolished in France in 1772, and finally in Spain in 1834. The Congregation of the Holy Office still exists, but is chiefly concerned with heretical literature.

Instauratio Magna, the title of Francis Bacon's (q.v.) great projected work, of which his 'Novum Organum' is the second part.

Institutes of Justinian, THE, an elementary treatise on Roman Law compiled by order of the Emperor Justinian in A.D. 529, and intended as an introduction to the Pandects (q.v.).

Instructions to a Painter, Last, see Marvell. 'Instructions to a Painter' or 'Advice to a Painter' was the title adopted (with minor modifications) for a number of political satires (by Denham and others) published in the latter half of the 17th cent. The original 'Instructions' were those of Waller for the celebration of the duke of York's victories over the Dutch.

Intelligencer, THE, see L'Estrange.

Interim of Augsburg, see Augsburg. Three 'Interims', or provisional arrangements for the adjustment of religious differences between the German Protestants and the Roman Catholic Church, were promulgated, that of Ratisbon in 1541, which proved ineffective, and those of Augsburg and Leipzig in 1548. The Protestants finally obtained toleration in 1552 as a result of the Peace of Passau between the Elector of Saxony and the emperor Charles V.

Interludes were plays performed at Court, in the halls of the nobles, at the Inns of Court, and in colleges, generally but not exclusively by professional actors, dealing with a short episode and involving a limited number of characters. That interludes were sometimes performed by villagers we know from 'Pyramus and Thisbe' in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.). Their vogue was chiefly in the 15th and 16th cents. They succeeded 'moralities' (q.v.) in the history of the drama, and are not always clearly distinguishable from them. The characters are still frequently allegorical, but the comic or farcical element is more prevalent. The versification tends to doggerel, and they are shorter than the moralities. A notable producer of interludes was J. Heywood (q.v.), author of 'The Four P's', in which a Palmer, a Pardoner, and a 'Pothecary contend as to the merits of their respective callings. A Pedlar comes in and offers to decide which shows the greatest capacity as a liar, and the Palmer wins the prize by asserting that 'he never saw or never knew Any woman out of patience'. This follows a humorous description by the Pardoner of his visit to hell to rescue the soul of the shrewish Margery Coorson. 'Thersites', another interlude (c. 1537), perhaps by Heywood, is a farcical treatment of boasting, in which the braggart Thersites, having had arms made for him by Mulciber, successfully encounters a snail, but runs away behind his mother when threatened by Miles, a knight.

The origin of the name is obscure. The OED. speaks of interludes as 'commonly introduced between the acts of long mystery-plays or moralities'; Ward finds the probable origin in the fact that interludes were 'occasionally performed in the intervals of banquets and entertainments'. E. K. Chambers gives reasons for questioning both these explanations. He is inclined to interpret interludium not as a ludus in the intervals of something else, but as a ludus carried on between two or more performers, and as primarily applicable to any kind of dramatic performance.

International Episode, AN, a short novel by Henry James (q.v., 1878-9), the action of which is provided by the clash between an American girl and an English duchess.

Invalides, HÔTEL DES, an institution founded in Paris by Louis XIV in 1670 for superannuated or disabled soldiers. The tomb of Napoleon I is in its church.

Invention of the Cross, THE, see Helena (St.).

Invincible Doctor, THE, Ockham (q.v.).

Io, a daughter of Inachus, king of Argos, who was loved by Zeus. To escape the jealousy of Hera, Zeus changed his mistress into a beautiful heifer. Hera, who discovered the fraud, obtained the animal from her husband and set Argos (q.v.) to watch it. Zeus caused Hermes to destroy Argos and set Io at liberty. Hera then sent a gadfly to torment Io, so that she wandered over the face of the earth, swimming the Bosphorus (i.e. passage of the ox), and reaching the banks of the Nile, where she recovered her human shape and bore a son, named Epaphus. According to Herodotus, Io was carried off by Phoenician merchants, who wished to make reprisals for the theft of Europa (q.v.).

Iōlāus, the friend of Hercules (q.v.). He helped Hercules to destroy the Hydra, and aided the sons of Hercules, after their father's death, against Eurystheus.

Iona or IOLMKILL, an island of the Inner Hebrides, where St. Columba (q.v.) founded a monastery about 563, an important centre of Celtic missions. Adamnan, in his life of St. Columba, wrote the name Ioua, which has been erroneously converted into Iona. Shakespeare, in 'Macbeth', II. iv, calls it 'Colmekill'. 'I-colum-kill' means 'island of St. Columb's chapel'.

Ionian Mode, (1) one of the modes of ancient Greek music, characterized as soft and effeminate; (2) the last of the 'authentic' ecclesiastical modes corresponding to the modern major diatonic scale. [OED.]

Ionic Dialect, the most important branch of ancient Greek, the language of that part of the Hellenic race which occupied Attica and the northern coast of the Peloponnese, and founded colonies in Italy, Sicily, and especially Asia Minor. Attic was a development of Ionic.

Ionic Order, one of the three orders of Grecian architecture (Doric, Ionic, Corinthian), characterized by the two lateral volutes of the capital.

Ionica, see Cory.

Iphigēnia, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (qq.v.). When the Greeks on their way to the Trojan War were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were told that Iphigenia must be sacrificed to appease the wrath of Diana, whose stag Agamemnon had killed. Agamemnon reluctantly consented, but, as the priest was about to strike the fatal blow, Iphigenia disappeared and a deer was found in her place. The goddess, moved by Iphigenia's innocence, had borne her away to Tauris and entrusted her with the care of her temple. Here Iphigenia was obliged to sacrifice all strangers who came to the country. When Orestes (q.v.) and Pylades came to Tauris, Iphigenia discovered that one of the strangers she was about to immolate was her brother. Thereupon she conspired with them to escape and to carry away the statue of the goddess, as the oracle had directed; and this they accomplished.

The story of Iphigenia was made the subject of plays by Aeschylus and Sophocles (not extant), and notably by Euripides; also in modern times by Racine and Goethe.

Iphigenia auf Tauris, see Goethe.

Ipomedon, a romance of the Middle English period, taken from the French of Huon de Rotelonde. There are versions both in rhyme and prose.

Ipomedon, prince of Apulia, having by knightly exploits won the favour of the queen of Calabria without revealing who he is, leaves her; but returns on hearing that a tournament is to be held at which her hand will be the prize. He disclaims the intention of competing and sets out hunting, but returns disguised on the successive days in different coloured armour and defeats the other suitors. Other adventures follow before the lovers are united. Ipomedon, who appears to have a passion for disguises, to the confusion of his mistress,

Iran, the Persian name for Persia. IRANIAN in Comparative Philology is used to designate one of the two Asiatic families of Indo-European languages, comprising Zend and Old Persian and their modern descendants or cognates. IRAN is opposed to TURAN, the name used by Firdusi (q.v.) for the realm beyond the Oxus; and TURANIAN is applied to languages of Asiatic origin that are neither Aryan nor Semitic.

Iras, in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (q.v.), one of Cleopatra's attendants. Her name is in Plutarch's 'Life of Antony'.

Ireland, JOHN (1761-1842), the son of an Ashburton butcher, bible-clerk at Oriel College, Oxford, became dean of Westminster, and founded a professorship of exegesis and the IRELAND SCHOLARSHIP for classics at Oxford.

Ireland, WILLIAM HENRY (1777-1835), son of Samuel Ireland the engraver, is remembered as a forger of Shakespeare manuscripts. He had access to Elizabethan parchments in the lawyer's chambers where he was employed, and in 1794-5 forged deeds and signatures of, or relating to, Shakespeare. He also fabricated in forged handwriting the pseudo-Shakespearean plays 'Vortigern and Rowena' and 'Henry II', which deceived many experts and men of letters. The former was produced unsuccessfully by Sheridan at Drury Lane in 1796. Ireland subsequently made an avowal of his fraud.

Ireland Scholarship, THE, see Ireland (J.).

Irena, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (Bk. v), personifies Ireland, oppressed by Grantorto (q.v.), and righted by Sir Artegall (q.v.).

Irenaeus, St., a Greek Father of the Church, of the 2nd cent., born in Asia Minor, who became bishop of Lyons. He suffered martyrdom about A.D. 200. A Latin translation ('Contra Hereticos') survives of a Greek work by him.

Irene, a tragedy by S. Johnson (q.v.).

Irene Iddesleigh, title of a novel by Amanda M'Kittick Ros, published in 1897.

Iris, according to mythology, the messenger of the gods, and particularly of Zeus and Hera. The rainbow was the path by which she travelled between the gods and men.

emperors, was kept at Pavia. Napoleon assumed it when he crowned himself king of Italy in 1805. See also Luke's Iron Crown.

Iron Duke, a popular name for the duke of Wellington (1769-1852).

Iron Mask, THE MAN IN THE, a state prisoner in the reign of Louis XIV, confined at Pignerol, in the island of St. Marguerite, and finally in the Bastille, whose name was concealed and who wore a mask covered with black velvet. He was probably Count Matiolli, an Italian agent, but his identity has never been established, and various other suggestions were made, such as that the prisoner was a son of Louis XIV and Mlle de la Vallière, an elder brother of Louis XIV, or Monmouth (supposed to have survived his execution in 1685).

IRON, RALPH, pseudonym of OLIVE SCHREINER (q.v.).

Ironsides, IRONSIDES, a name given, in allusion to their hardihood or bravery, to Edmund, king of England (1016), and Oliver Cromwell. In the case of the latter, the appellation was a nickname of Royalist origin. 'Ironsides' was also applied to Cromwell's troopers in the Civil War, perhaps originally as a possessive, Ironsides' Men.

Iroquois, a confederacy of North American Indians, known in English as the 'Five Nations' (q.v.). They sided with the English against the French, and subsequently against the American colonists.

Irredentist, from (Italia) irredenta, unredeemed, in Italian politics (from 1878) a member of the party that advocated the recovery and union to Italy of Italian-speaking districts still subject to other countries. Hence the general application.

Irrefragable Doctor, THE, Alexander of Hales (q.v.).

Irus, in Homer's 'Odyssey', a beggar who executed commissions for Penelope's suitors. On Ulysses' return, Irus tried to drive him from the house, and, a boxing match between them having been arranged, Irus was struck down and thrown out by the hero.

Irving, EDWARD, see Irvingites.

Irving, SIR HENRY (1838-1905), whose original name was JOHN HENRY BRODRIBB, first appeared as an actor as Gaston in Bulwer Lytton's 'Richelieu' at Sunderland in 1856. His first Shakespearian character was Hamlet, in 1864. He became famous by his acting in the melodrama 'The Bells' (1871-2), and afterwards scored successes in a large number of Shakespearian and other parts, his impersonation of Tennyson's 'Becket' being one of his chief triumphs. His managership of the Lyceum Theatre in association with Miss Ellen Terry from 1878 to 1902 was a notable incident in the history of the English theatre. Irving revived popular interest in Shakespear. He was pre-eminently a romantic actor, highly intellectual, of magnetic personality and originality of conception, but of mannered elocution and gait.

IRVING, WASHINGTON (1783-1859), born at New York, the son of an Englishman, first came into literary repute by his humorous 'History of New York to the end of the Dutch Dynasty, by Diedrich Knickerbocker' (1809). He was attached to the American Legation in Spain in 1826, was secretary of legation in London in 1829, and minister in Spain in 1842. His writings include 'The Sketch-Book' (1820), 'Bracebridge Hall' (1822), 'Tales of a Traveller' (1824), 'Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus' (1828), 'The Companions of Columbus' (1831), 'The Conquest of Granada' (1829), 'Legends of the Alhambra' (1832), 'Oliver Goldsmith' (1849), and 'Life of George Washington' (1855-9). This last is his greatest work; but he is perhaps best known by his pleasant collections of essays and tales, 'The Sketch-Book' (which includes 'Rip van Winkle' (q.v.) and 'The Legend of Sleepy Hollow'), and the later volume 'Bracebridge Hall', in which figures Squire Bracebridge, a sort of 19th-cent. Sir Roger de Coverley. Irving has left in his 'Abbotsford' a pleasant account of his visit to Sir Walter Scott in 1817, and a picture of the latter's household at Abbotsford.

Irvingites, a religious body founded about 1835 on the basis of principles promulgated by Edward Irving (1792-1834), a minister of the Church of Scotland, excommunicated in 1833. Ritualism, symbolism, and mystery are prominent features in its worship. The name is not accepted by the body itself, which assumes the title Catholic Apostolic Church. Edward Irving, the son of a tanner of Annan, was a friend and encourager of Carlyle; both Carlyle and Hazlitt have left us descriptions of him.

Irwine, THE REV. ADOLPHUS, the rector in George Eliot's 'Adam Bede' (q.v.).

Isaac, a character in Sheridan's 'The Duenna' (q.v.).

Isaac Comnenus, a novel by Sir Henry Taylor (q.v.).

Isaac of York, in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.), the father of Rebecca.

Isabella, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), daughter of a Saracen king of Spain, with whom the Scottish prince Zerbino (q.v.) fell in love. After his death, while on her way, broken-hearted, with a hermit to a convent near Marseilles, she fell into the power of Rodomont, and to protect her honour caused him by guile to slay her.

Isabella, a character in (1) Kyd's 'The Spanish Tragedy' (q.v.); (2) Shakespear's 'Measure for Measure' (q.v.); (3) Southern's 'The Fatal Marriage' (q.v.).

Isabella, or the Pot of Basil, a poem by Keats (q.v.), published in 'Lamia . . . and other Poems' in 1820.

ISABELLA

The poem is based on Boccaccio's 'Decameron', iv. v. The proud brothers of Isabella, a Florentine lady, having discovered the love of Lorenzo and their sister, decoy Lorenzo away, murder him, and bury his body in a forest. Isabella, apprised by a vision, finds his body, places the head in a flower-pot, and sets a plant of basil over it. Her brothers, observing how she cherishes the basil, steal the pot, discover the head, and fly conscience-stricken; and Isabella pines and dies. See Basil.

Isabella Vere, a character in Scott's 'The Black Dwarf' (q.v.).

Isaiah, the greatest of the prophets of the O.T. He prophesied in Judah during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (the latter part of the 8th cent. B.C.). The chapters of the Book of Isaiah from xl onwards appear to be by other hands and of much later date. The author of xl-lv is an exile in Babylon.

Isëgrym or ISENGRIN, the wolf in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.).

Isenbras, Sir, see Isumbras.

Iselt (ISOUD, YSOLDE, or YSOUDE), LA BEALE, in the Arthurian legend, is the sister or daughter of the king of Ireland. For her story see Tristram.

Iselt (ISOUD, YSOLDE, or YSOUDE), LA BLANCHE MAINS, in the Arthurian legend, is the daughter of the duke of Brittany and the wife of Tristram (q.v.).

Isfendiyar or ASPANDIYAR, after Rustem (q.v.) the principal hero of the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.). He is the son of Gushtasp, king of Persia, achieves great conquests and spreads the Zoroastrian faith. But his father's mind is poisoned against him and he is thrown into prison. Later, under stress of the victorious advance of his enemy Arjasp, Gushtasp releases Isfendiyar, who, like Rustem, performs seven superhuman feats, rescues his sisters who have been captured by Arjasp, and kills the latter. His father, still suspicious of him, orders Isfendiyar to bring Rustem to him in fetters. Isfendiyar forces Rustem to fight with him, and after the first day's inconclusive fighting, is killed by Rustem with a magic arrow that pierces his eyes.

Ishmael, the son of Abraham by Hagar, hence allusively an outcast, one 'whose hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him' (Gen. xvi. 12). ISHMAELITE is used in the same sense.

sister and wife of Osiris (q.v.), and mother of Horus (q.v.). She came to be looked upon as the great nature-goddess, and her worship spread to Western Asia and Southern Europe (including Rome), where she was identified with various local deities.

Isis, the river: see Thames.

Iskanderbeg, see Scanderbeg.

Islam, an Arabic word meaning 'resignation', signifies the religious system of Mohammed (q.v.), or the body of Mohammedans, the Mohammedan world.

Island, The, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1823.

The poem is based on the narrative of the mutiny on H.M.S. 'Bounty' (q.v.), and the life of the mutineers on Tahiti, with which a pleasant love-idyll is interwoven.

Isle of Saints, a medieval name for Ireland, from the welcome it gave to Christianity.

Ismēnē, the sister of Antigone (q.v.), who, when the latter was ordered to be buried alive, demanded to share her punishment.

Isocrātēs (436-338 B.C.), an Attic orator and teacher of rhetoric, who took his own life after the defeat of the Greeks by Philip of Macedon at the battle of Chaeronea. He is 'that old man eloquent' referred to by Milton in the sonnet to the Lady Margaret Ley.

Israfel, in the Mohammedan religion, the angel of music, who is to sound the trumpet at the day of resurrection. Poe (q.v.) wrote his poem 'Israfel' on the text, 'the angel Israfel, whose heartstrings are a lute and who has the sweetest voice of all God's creatures'.

Istakhar, the capital of the Persian Empire under the Sasanian (q.v.) dynasty, and the centre of priestly learning. It adjoined Persepolis, the earlier capital.

Isthmian Games, one of the four great national festivals of the ancient Greeks, held in the Isthmus of Corinth. It included all sorts of athletic contests, horse and chariot races, and musical and poetical competitions. Victory at these games was celebrated in odes, of which Pindar has left examples.

Isumbras, or Isenbras, Sir, a popular verse tale of the 14th cent. Isumbras is strong, handsome, and prosperous, but proud and arrogant. A bird sent by God gives him the choice between suffering in youth or in old age. He chooses the former. Extreme misfortunes befall him, which he bears patiently. He loses wife, children, and possessions, and for 21 years suffers among the Saracens, doing deeds of prowess; after which an angel announces that his sins are forgiven, and he is restored to his family and happiness.

Millais's picture 'Sir Isumbras at the Ford' was painted in 1857.

It is Never too Late to Mend, a novel by Reade (q.v.), published in 1856. Reade had previously written a play, 'Gold' on the same subject.

The novel combines, rather loosely, two distinct stories: first, that of a young farmer who emigrates to Australia to earn the £1,000 necessary to win the father's consent to marry his sweetheart, a purpose which he achieves in spite of the machinations of the money-lending villain Meadows. This gives an opportunity for a description of the perils of an Australian miner's life during the gold rush. Secondly, that of a thief sentenced to jail and transportation, in the course of which the author exposes the brutalities and abuses of the English prison system.

Itala, the name given to an old Latin version of the Bible (q.v.) on which, after Jerome's recension of it, the Vulgate came to be founded.

Italian Journeys, a book of travel by W. D. Howells (q.v.), published in 1867.

Italic type, a species of printing type introduced by Aldus Manutius (q.v.) of Venice, in which the letters, instead of being erect as in roman, slope towards the right. It was first used in an edition of Virgil, published in 1501 and dedicated to Italy. [O.E.D.]

Italy, a collection of tales in verse by S. Rogers (q.v.).

Ithaca, the kingdom of Ulysses (q.v.), a small island in the Ionian sea.

Ithuriel, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', iv. 788 et seq., one of the Cherubim, a 'strong and subtle spirit', charged by Gabriel to search for Satan in Paradise. Touched by Ithuriel's spear, which 'no falsehood can endure', the Fiend starts up in his own shape.

Itinerary of Antoninus, an official list of the roads in the Roman Empire, with the distances between stations, probably an early 3rd-cent. compilation embodying a good deal of material from the 2nd cent. Nothing is known of the author.

Itylus, the son of Aëdon, who was wife of Zethus, king of Thebes. According to legend, Aëdon, jealous of Niobe, the wife of her brother, who had six sons and six daughters, determined to kill one of these sons, but by mistake killed Itylus. She was changed by Zeus into a nightingale, whose song is Aëdon's lament for her son. Swinburne (q.v.) wrote a poem on this subject ('Itylus' in 'Poems and Ballads', First Series).

Itys, see Philomela.

✓ Ivanhoe, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1819. This was the first of the author's novels in which he adopted a purely English subject. Freeman ('Hist. of the Norman Conquest', vol. v, appx.) has criticized, as unsupported by the evidence of contemporary records, the enmity of Saxon and Norman, represented as persisting in the days of Richard I, which forms the basis of the story.

Wilfred of Ivanhoe, son of Cedric, of noble

IVANHOE

Saxon birth, loves his father's ward, the lady Rowena, who traces her descent to King Alfred, and who returns his love. For this reason Cedric, who is passionately devoted to the cause of the restoration of the Saxon line to the throne of England and sees the best chance of effecting this in the marriage of Rowena to Athelstane of Coningsburgh, also of the Saxon blood royal, has in anger banished his son. Ivanhoe has joined Richard Cœur de Lion at the crusade and there won the king's affection. In Richard's absence, his brother John has found support among the lawless and dissolute Norman nobles for his design of ousting Richard from the throne, a design favoured by Richard's imprisonment in Austria on his return from Palestine.

The story centres in two chief events: a great tournament at Ashby-de-la-Zouche, where Ivanhoe aided by Richard, who unknown to all has returned to England with Ivanhoe, defeats all the knights of John's party, including the fierce Templar, Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert, and Sir Reginald Front-de-Bœuf; and the siege of Front-de-Bœuf's castle of Torquilstone, whither Cedric and Rowena, with the wounded Ivanhoe, Athelstane, the Jew Isaac, and his beautiful and courageous daughter Rebecca, have been carried captives by the Norman nobles. After an exciting fight, the castle is carried by a force of outlaws and Saxons, led by Locksley (otherwise Robin Hood) and King Richard himself. The prisoners are rescued, with the exception of Rebecca, of whom the Templar has become passionately enamoured, and whom he carries off to the Preceptory of Templestowe. Here the unexpected arrival of the Grand Master of the order, while relieving Rebecca from the dishonourable advances of Bois-Guilbert, exposes her to the charge of witchcraft, and she escapes sentence of death only by demanding trial by combat. Ivanhoe, whose gratitude she has earned by nursing him when wounded at the tournament of Ashby, appears as her champion, and in the encounter between him and Bois-Guilbert (on whom has been thrust the unwelcome duty of appearing as the accuser), the latter falls dead, untouched by his opponent's lance, the victim of his own contending passions. Ivanhoe and Rowena, by the intervention of Richard, are united; the more interesting Rebecca, suppressing her love for Ivanhoe, leaves England with her father.

Among the many characters in the story, besides Robin Hood and Friar Tuck, mention may be made of the poor fool Wamba, who imperils his life to save that of his master Cedric; Gurth, the swineherd; and Isaac the Jew, divided between love of his shekels and love of his daughter. The description of the siege of Torquilstone is borrowed from Goethe's 'Goetz von Berlichingen'. Thackeray's 'Rebecca and Rowena' (q.v.) is an amusing sequel to, and critical reinterpretation of, Scott's tale.

IVORY GATE

Ivory Tower, The, an unfinished story by Henry James (q.v.).

Ivry, in the department of the Eure, France, the scene of a famous battle in which Henri IV of France defeated the Leaguers under the duke of Mayenne (1590). 'Ivry' is the subject of a lay by T. B. Macaulay (q.v.), published in 1824.

Ixion, a Thessalian, who married Dia, daughter of Deioneüs. When the latter came to fetch the bride-price, Ixion contrived that he should fall into a pit containing burning coals. As a consequence of this treachery Ixion was shunned by men and refused purification of his murder. He took refuge with Zeus, who consented to purify him. With gross ingratitude Ixion tried to seduce Hera. Thereupon Zeus formed a cloud, Nephelê, to resemble Hera, and by her Ixion became father of the Centaurs (q.v.). As a punishment for his crimes Ixion in the underworld was bound on a burning wheel, which turned for ever. R. Browning wrote a poem on this subject ('Ixion' in 'Jocoseria', 1883) and Disraeli a short burlesque, 'Ixion in Heaven'.

Ixion in Heaven, a short burlesque tale published by B. Disraeli in 1833, describing amusingly the visit of Ixion to Olympus as the guest of Jove.

J

Jabberwock, a fictitious monster, the subject of the poem 'Jabberwocky' in Lewis Carroll's 'Through the Looking-Glass' (q.v.). The story, told in an invented vocabulary, begins: 'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves'. J'accuse, see Dreyfus.

Jachin and Boaz, the names of the two pillars of the porch of the Temple of Solomon (1 Kings vii. 21).

Jack, COLONEL, see Colonel Jack.

Jack-a-Lent, a figure of a man, set up to be pelted: an ancient form of the sport of 'Aunt Sally' practised during Lent. Hence figuratively a butt for every one to throw at (Shakespeare, 'Merry Wives', v. v. 137).

Jack and Jill, a nursery rhyme, involving perhaps originally some political allusion now lost. Lord Houghton is quoted by Sir M. Grant Duff ('Notes from a Diary', 7 June 1878) as thinking that Jack and Jill were Empson and Dudley, notorious for their fiscal exactions in Henry VII's reign and executed for constructive treason soon after Henry VIII came to the throne, to the great satisfaction of the Londoners. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') finds the origin of Jack and Jill in the Hiuki and Bil of Scandinavian mythology, two children who had been drawing water and were stolen by the moon.

Jack and the Bean-stalk, a nursery tale based on a world-wide myth, found e.g. among the North American Indians and the native tribes of S. Africa. The bean-stalk is said to be derived from the ash, the world-tree of northern mythology (see Yggdrasil).

Jack, the son of a poor widow, exchanges his mother's cow for a hatful of beans. His mother in anger throws the beans out of the window. The next morning a bean-stalk has grown up into the clouds. Jack climbs up and finds himself in a strange country, where a fairy directs him to the house of a giant who has killed his father. He robs the giant of a hen that lays golden eggs, a self-playing harp, and bags of diamonds, and is finally discovered by the giant and pursued down the bean-stalk. Jack reaching the ground first, cuts the bean-stalk with an axe, and the giant falls and is killed.

Jack Brag, a vulgar pretentious snob, a term derived from the novel of that name by Hook (q.v.).

Jack Drum's Entertainment, see Drum's Entertainment.

Jack Horner, the subject of a nursery rhyme ('Little Jack Horner sat in a corner', &c.), which occurs in an 18th-cent. chapbook, 'The Pleasant History of Jack Horner, containing his witty Tricks, &c.' The rhyme is also referred to by Carey (q.v.) about 1720. The origin of the rhyme is attributed to a Jack Horner who was steward to the abbot of Glastonbury in the reign of Henry VIII and by a trick acquired the deeds of the manor of Mells at the dissolution of the monasteries, took them to the king, and was handsomely rewarded: the family still holds the manor.

Jack-in-office, a consequential petty official.

Jack in the Green, a feature in the chimney-sweepers' celebration of the May-day festival: 'a large hollow cone of hoops and basket-work, so completely covered with ivy, holly, flowers, and ribbons that the person carrying it is altogether hidden except his feet' (Soane, 'New Curiosities of Literature', i. 262).

Jack of Dover, in the Prologue to Chaucer's 'Cook's Tale',

And many a Jakk of Dover hastow sold
That hath be twyes hoot and twyes cold, is probably some sort of pie.

In 'Jack of Dover, his quest of Inquire' (1604), given in W. C. Hazlitt's 'Shakespearean Jest-books', Jack travels in search of a greater fool than himself, and fails to find him.

JACK OF NEWBURY

Jack of Newbury or NEWBURY, John Winchcombe, alias Smalwoode (d. 1520), a clothier of Newbury, whose wealth inspired the authors of numerous chapbook stories. According to a legend he led 100 or 250 men, equipped at his own expense, at the battle of Flodden Field. See Deloney (T.).

Jack-o'-Lantern or JACK-A-LANTERN, see Ignis Fatuus.

Jack-pudding, a clown or buffoon. 'A set of merry Drolls . . . whom every nation calls by the name of that Dish of Meat which it loves best. In Holland they are termed Pickled Herrings; in France, Jean Pottages; in Italy, Maccaronies; and in Great Britain, Jack Puddings.' (Addison, 'Spectator', No. 4.)

Jack Robinson, 'before one can say Jack Robinson', i.e. very quickly, a phrase whose origin is unknown. The earliest quotation given for it in the OED. is from Miss Burney's 'Evelina' (II. xxxvii).

Jack Sprat, of the nursery rhyme, who 'would eat no fat', figures in a rhyme given by James Howell, in the collection of proverbs annexed to his 'Tetraglotton' (1659), as 'Archdeacon Pratt', who had the same aversion:

Archdeacon Pratt would eat no fatt,
His wife would eat no lean.
Twixt Archdeacon Pratt and Joan his wife,
The meat was eat up clean.

Jack Straw, the leader of a party of insurgents from Essex in the Peasants' Rising of 1381. There have been inns called 'Jack Straw's Castle' at Islington, Highbury, and Hampstead Heath, but there does not appear to be any historical connexion between them and the above.

Jack the Giant-killer, a nursery tale of Northern origin, known in England from very early times.

Jack was the son of a Cornish farmer, and lived in the days of King Arthur. His first achievement was the destruction of the giant of Mount Cornwall, which he effected by digging a pit, covering it with branches and earth, and luring the giant into it. He subsequently acquired from another giant by his ingenuity a coat that made him invisible, shoes that gave him extraordinary speed, and a sword of magic potency. With the help of these, he destroyed all the giants in the land.

Jack the Ripper, the name assumed by an unknown man who claimed to be the perpetrator of a series of murders, characterized by the same revolting features, in the East end of London in 1888-9.

Jackanapes, a word which, so far as yet found, first appears as an opprobrious nickname of William de la Pole, duke of Suffolk (murdered 1450), whose badge was a clog and chain, such as was attached to a tame ape. Hence he is referred to as Jack Napes, this being inferentially already a quasi-proper name for a tame ape. But of Jack Napes and its relation to an ape or apes, no certain explanation can be offered. The word is used to signify a tame ape or monkey, or one who is like a monkey in tricks, air, or behaviour. [OED.]

Jackanapes, a story by Juliana Horatia Ewing (1841-85); author of 'Daddy Darwin's Dovecot', 'A Flatiron for a Farthing', 'The Story of a Short Life', and other stories.

Jackdaw of Rheims, The, one of the best known of Barham's 'Ingoldsby Legends' (see Barham) which tells how a jackdaw stole the ring of the cardinal archbishop of Rheims. The archbishop's terrible curse on the thief reduced the jackdaw to a pitiable state. He showed where he had hidden the ring, the curse was removed, the bird recovered his sleekness, became devout, and on his death was canonized by the name of Jim Crow.

JACKSON, HELEN HUNT (1831-85), an American novelist, whose chief works were 'A Century of Dishonor' (1881) and 'Ramona' (q.v., 1884).

Jacob and Esau, the twin sons of Isaac and Rebecca. Esau, the elder, was a hunter, Jacob a dweller in tents. Esau, coming in faint from the field, sold his birthright to Jacob for a mess of pottage (Gen. xxv). Jacob, personating Esau, obtained Isaac's death-bed blessing (Gen. xxvii). The name Jacob means 'supplanter'.

Jacob Faithful, a novel by Marryat (q.v.), published in 1834.

Jacob Faithful is born on a Thames lighter and spends his early years there, until his mother, a heavy drinker of gin, dies of spontaneous combustion, and his father, scared out of his wits, jumps overboard and is drowned. Jacob fortunately finds kind friends, gets a good education, and shows natural talent fitting him for a much higher station. But he has a mistaken notion of the value of 'independence', and a pride that makes him vindictively resent an injury unwittingly done him by the protector who is trying to further his career. So he sticks to the river as lighterman and wherryman, and meets with various adventures and entertaining characters, until he is pressed on a frigate and carried to sea. From this life he is soon rescued by the inheritance of a fortune from an old gentleman who has befriended him and whom he has saved from drowning.

Among the amusing characters in the book are honest Domine Dobbs, Jacob's schoolmaster, old Tom Beazley, the loss of whose legs has not impaired his cheeriness, and his mischievous son, young Tom.

Jacob Omnium, see Higgins.

Jacob's Ladder, the ladder that Jacob saw in a dream, at the place that he named Bethel, set up on earth and reaching to heaven, with the angels of God ascending and descending on it (Gen xxviii. 12). The name is given to the garden plant Polemonium caeruleum and also popularly or locally to the plant Solomon's Seal.

Jacob's Staff, a pilgrim's staff, derived from St. James (Jacobus), whose symbols in religious art are a staff and a scallop shell (see Spenser, 'Faerie Queene', I. vi); perhaps also derived from Gen. xxxii. 10, 'with my staff I passed over this Jordan'.

Jacobin, originally a name of the French friars of the order of St. Dominic, so called because the church of St. Jacques in Paris was given to them and they built their first convent near it. From them the name was transferred to the members of a French political club established in 1789, in Paris, in the old convent of the Jacobins, to maintain the principles of extreme democracy and absolute equality. It was applied in a transferred sense to sympathizers with their principles, and about 1800 was a nickname for any political reformer.

Jacobite, a partisan of the Stuarts after the revolution of 1688, from Jacobus, Latin for James.

JACOBS, WILLIAM WYMARK (1863-1943), writer of short stories; they have been collected, e.g., in 'Many Cargoes' (1896), 'The Skipper's Wooing' (1897), 'A Master of Craft' (1900), 'Night Watches' (1914); he also wrote some tales of the supernatural, of which 'The Monkey's Paw' is the best known. This and others of his stories (such as 'Beauty and the Barge') have been dramatized.

Jacobus, the unofficial name of a gold coin struck in the reign of James I, worth 20-24s.

Jacobus a Voragine, see Golden Legend.

Jacquard, JOSEPH MARIE (1752-1834), of Lyons, the inventor of an apparatus for facilitating the weaving of figured textiles in the loom.

Jacquerie, LA, a bloody insurrection of the peasantry of northern France in 1358, occasioned by their sufferings in consequence of the English invasion. The name is derived from JACQUES BONHOMME, a nickname given to the peasants at this time.

Jaffar the Barmecide (Ja'far al Barmeki), in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), the vizier of Haroun-al-Raschid, who, with the executioner Mesrour, accompanied him when, disguised as a merchant, he walked at night about the streets of Bagdad. See Barmecide.

Jaffier, one of the principal characters in Otway's 'Venice Preserv'd' (q.v.).

Jaggars, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.).

JAGO, RICHARD (1715-81), born in Warwickshire and the holder of three livings in that county, was the author of 'Edge-Hill', a poem in four books describing, with many moral and other digressions, the views seen at morning, noon, afternoon, and evening, as he looks from that famous spot over his favourite county.

Jahangir, or JEHANGIR the son of Akbar, reigned as Mogul Emperor, 1605-27.

Jahvistic, see Elohim.

Jakln, BOB, a character in G. Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

JAMES I (1394-1437), king of Scotland, was captured while on his way to France by an English ship, probably in 1406. He was detained in England for nineteen years and well educated. While in England he composed his poem, 'The Kingis Quair' (q.v.). In 1424 he married Lady Jane Beaufort, daughter of the earl of Somerset and granddaughter of John of Gaunt, the heroine of the above poem. James I was assassinated at Perth. One or two other poems, 'The Ballad of Good Counsel', 'Christ's Kirk on the Green', 'Pebelis to the Play', have been doubtfully attributed to him. He is the subject of D. G. Rossetti's 'The King's Tragedy' (included in 'Sonnets and Ballads', 1881).

JAMES I (James VI of Scotland), king of England, 1603-25. He is reputed the author of 'True Law of Free Monarchies' (1603), a reply to the argument of G. Buchanan (q.v.) in his 'De Jure Regni' that the king is elected by, and is responsible to, the people. He also wrote 'Basiliikon Doron' (1599, precepts on the art of government, addressed to his son); 'A Counterblaste to Tobacco' (1604), in which the alleged virtues of the plant are refuted; and a good many mainly theological works. James I figures in Scott's 'The Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

James II, king of England, 1685-8. In 1688 he was driven out by an aristocratic revolution and threw the Great Seal into the Thames. He was succeeded in 1689 by William and Mary, the throne being declared vacant. He lived until 1701.

JAMES, GEORGE PAYNE RAINSFORD (1799-1860), wrote, besides historical novels ('Richelieu', 1829, 'Philip Augustus', 1831, and others), 'Memoirs of the Great Commanders' (1832), 'Life of the Black Prince' (1836), and other popular historical works and poems. The style of his romances was parodied by Thackeray in 'Novels by Eminent Hands' ('Barbazure').

JAMES, HENRY (1843-1916), was born in New York of ancestry originally both Irish and Scottish. His father, Henry James, sen., was a remarkable writer on questions of theology and a follower of Swedenborg. His elder brother, William James (q.v.), was a distinguished philosopher. After a desultory education in New York, London, Paris, and Geneva, Henry James entered the law school at Harvard in 1862. He settled in Europe in 1875. From 1865 he was a regular contributor of reviews and short stories to American periodicals, and owed much to his friendship with the novelist Howells (q.v.). His first considerable piece of fiction, 'Watch and Ward', appeared serially in 1871, followed by 'Transatlantic Sketches' and 'A Passionate Pilgrim' (q.v.) in 1875, and his first important novel 'Roderick Hudson' (q.v.) in 1876 (in the 'Atlantic Monthly', 1875). For more than twenty years he lived in London, and in 1898 moved to Lamb House, Rye, where his later novels were written. He at first chiefly concerned himself with the impact of the older civilization of Europe upon American life, and to this period belong his more popular novels: 'Roderick Hudson' (1875), 'The American' (1877), 'Daisy Miller' (1879), and the exquisite 'Portrait of a Lady' (q.v., 1881). He next turned to a more exclusively English stage in 'The Tragic Muse' (1890), 'The Spoils of Poynton' (1897), and 'The Awkward Age' (1899), in which he analysed English character with extreme subtlety, verging at times on obscurity. 'What Maisie Knew' appeared in 1897. In his last three great novels, 'The Wings of the Dove' (1902), 'The Ambassadors' (q.v., 1903), and 'The Golden Bowl' (1904), he returned to the 'international' theme of the contrast of American and European character. In 1914 he began work on two novels, 'The Ivory Tower' and 'The Sense of the Past', which remained unfinished at his death and were published as fragments in 1917. For the revised collection of his fiction, of which the issue began in 1907, James wrote a series of critical prefaces of high interest.

Besides nearly a hundred short stories (including the well-known ghost-story, 'The Turn of the Screw', 1898), James wrote several volumes of sketches of travel ('Portraits of Places', 1883; 'A Little Tour in France', 1884) and literary criticism; a number of plays, of which the few that were acted were not successful; a life of Nathaniel Hawthorne for the English Men of Letters series; and, in 'The American Scene' (1906), a record of the impressions produced on him by a visit to America after an absence of nearly twenty years. 'A Small Boy and Others' (1913) and 'Notes of a Son and a Brother' (1914) are evocations of his early days in New York and Europe. A short story called 'The Middle Years' appeared in the volume 'Terminations' in 1895. The autobiographical work of the same title is a fragment (published posthumously in 1917) 'representing all that James lived to write of a volume of autobiographical reminiscences to which he had given the name of one of his own short stories' (from the prefatory note to the autobiographical fragment). Two volumes of his letters were published in 1920. Under the influence of an ardent sympathy for the British cause in the War, Henry James was in 1915 naturalized a British subject. His portrait by J. S. Sargent is in the National Portrait Gallery.

In addition to the works referred to above, the following may be mentioned: 'Madonna of the Future' (q.v., 1879), 'Washington Square' (1881), 'The Siege of London' (1883), 'The Bostonians' (1886), 'The Princess Casamassima' (1886), 'The Reverberator' (1888), 'The Aspern Papers' (1888), 'The Real Thing' (1893), 'Embarrassments' (1896), 'The Other House' (1896), 'In the Cage' (1898), 'The Two Magics' (1898), 'The Better Sort' (1903).

JAMES, MONTAGUE RHODES (1862-1936), medievalist, provost of Eton from 1918. As well as editing a great number of bibliographical and palaeographical works he edited and translated 'The Apocryphal New Testament' (1924). His ghost stories are well known and have been collected in one volume (1931) which includes 'Ghost Stories of an Antiquary'.

JAMES, WILLIAM (1842-1910), American philosopher, the son of Henry James, sen. (a Swedenborgian philosopher), and elder brother of Henry James (q.v.), was at first a student of art and then a teacher of physiology, but turned his attention to psychology. His views are embodied in his 'Principles of Psychology' (1890), and show a tendency to subordinate logical proof to intuitional conviction. He was a vigorous antagonist of the idealistic school of Kant and Hegel, and an empiricist who made empiricism more radical by treating pure experience as the very substance of the world. Yet he was not a monist but a pluralist, 'willing to believe that there may ultimately never be an all-form at all, that the substance of reality may never get totally collected . . . and that a distributive form of reality, the each-form, is as acceptable as the all-form' ('Pluralistic Universe', p. 34). Pragmatism was his method of approach to metaphysics: abstract ideas are true if 'they work', if they harmonize with our other experience and accepted ideas. James's principal works were, besides the 'Principles of Psychology' above mentioned, 'Varieties of Religious Experience' (1902), 'Pragmatism' (1907), 'The Meaning of Truth' (1909), 'A Pluralistic Universe' (1909), 'Essays in Radical Empiricism' (1912). The conclusions of his 'Varieties of Religious Experience' are notable: 'the visible world is part of a more spiritual universe from which it draws its chief significance; union with the higher universe is our true end; spiritual energy flows in and produces effects within the phenomenal world'.

Jameson Raid: the discontent of the 'Uitlander' (mainly British) population of the Transvaal with the government of the South African Republic became acute in 1895, and a 'reform committee' in Johannesburg in the autumn of that year was making plans for its forcible overthrow. It was supported by Cecil Rhodes, and to Leander Starr Jameson (1853-1917), administrator of what is now Southern Rhodesia, was allotted the task of raising a mounted force in Rhodesia and of holding it in readiness on the border of the Transvaal, to be used if events in Johannesburg should make it necessary. Jameson decided to take the initiative, and on 29 Dec., in spite of messages calling upon him to stay his hand, he marched his force, under the military command of Sir John Willoughby, across the Transvaal frontier. The force which Jameson expected to be sent from Johannesburg to meet him was not sent, he was surrounded by the Boers, and his little band was forced to surrender to P. A. Cronje, the Boer commandant, on 2 Jan. 1896.

JAMIESON, JOHN (1759-1838), antiquary and philologist, a friend of Scott. His 'Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language' first appeared in 1808.

Jamieson, THE HON. MRS., a character in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.).

JAMMES, FRANCIS (1868-1938), French poet and prose writer, author of 'Le Deuil des primevères' (1901), 'Les Géorgiques chrétiennes' (1911), 'Œuvres' (2 vols., 1925), &c. Jamshid or JEMSHID, an early legendary king of Persia, celebrated in the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.). He was the reputed inventor of the arts of medicine, weaving, iron-working, navigation, &c. His reign was a period of prosperity and magnificence. But Jamshid waxed arrogant and, incurring the wrath of heaven, was reduced to utter wretchedness and degradation, became a wanderer and was put to a miserable death by Zohak (Dahak), the usurper of his throne. He is mentioned in the 'Rubáiyát' of Omar Khayyám (q.v.), 'The Courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep'.

Jane, a small silver coin of Genoa (Fr. Gênes) introduced into England towards the end of the 14th cent. The word is used by Chaucer ('Sir Thopas') and Spenser ('Faerie Queene', III. vii).

Jane Eyre, a novel by C. Brontë (q.v.), published in 1847.

The heroine, a penniless orphan, has been left to the care of her aunt, Mrs. Reed. Harsh and unsympathetic treatment rouses the spirit of the child, and a passionate outbreak leads to her consignment to Lowood Asylum, a charitable institution, where after some miserable years she becomes a teacher. Thence she passes to be a governess at Thornfield Hall to a little girl, the natural daughter of Mr. Rochester, a man of grim aspect and sardonic temper. In spite of Jane Eyre's plainness, Rochester is fascinated by her elfish wit and courageous spirit, and falls in love with her, and she with him. Their marriage is prevented at the last moment by the revelation that he has a wife living, a raving lunatic, kept in seclusion at Thornfield Hall. Jane flees from the Hall, and after nearly perishing on the moors is taken in and cared for by the Rev. St. John Rivers and his sisters. Under the influence of the strong personality of Rivers, she nearly consents (in spite of her undiminished love for Rochester) to marry him and accompany him to India. She is prevented by a telepathic appeal from Rochester, and sets out for Thornfield Hall, to learn that the place has been burnt down, and that Rochester, in vainly trying to save his wife from the flames, has been blinded and maimed. She finds him in utter dejection, becomes his wife, and restores him to happiness.

In Lowood Asylum Miss Brontë depicted the school at Cowan Bridge where she spent some unhappy years, and where her sisters Maria (portrayed in Helen Burns) and Elizabeth contracted the consumption of which they died.

Janice Meredith, novel by P. L. Ford (q.v.).

Janissaries or JANIZARIES, a body of Turkish infantry, first organized in the 14th cent., and constituting the sultan's guard. It was recruited mainly from the children of rayahs or Christian subjects of the Turks. The force became powerful and turbulent, and after a revolt deliberately provoked by the Sultan Mahmud II, many thousands of Janissaries were massacred, and the organization abolished (1826).

Jansenism, the doctrine of a school that developed in the Roman Catholic Church holding the doctrines of Cornelius Jansen (1585-1638), bishop of Ypres in Flanders, who maintained after St. Augustine the perverseness and inability for good of the natural human will. The capacity for the love of God, he held, could be obtained only by 'conversion', and God converts whom He pleases. His doctrine thus approximated to that of predestination and was closely analogous to Calvinism. But Jansen repudiated justification by faith and maintained that the personal relation of the human soul with God was possible only through the Roman Church. His doctrine was developed in France by Antoine Arnauld. The Jansenists were a powerful body in the 17th cent., but were strongly opposed by the Jesuits, and their doctrines were condemned by several popes, especially by Clement X in his Bull Unigenitus. The headquarters of Jansenism was Port-Royal (q.v.). There is said to be still a Jansenist Church in Holland. See also Pascal.

Januarius, St., a bishop of Benevento, who was martyred under Diocletian. His head and some of his blood are preserved as relics at Naples; the blood is said to have the miraculous power of liquefying on certain days in each year.

January and May, the title of a version by Pope of Chaucer's 'Merchant's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales).

Janus, an ancient Italian deity, the god of the doorway (janua). He was guardian both of private doors and of the city gates, and presided over the year, his own special month being named January. He is most famous as the guardian of the state during war, when the gates of his temple were left open (being closed in peace time). He is represented in statues with two heads, facing opposite ways, perhaps suggestive of vigilance, looking both before and behind.

Japhetic, a name sometimes applied to the Indo-European family, as supposed to be descended from Japhet, one of the sons of Noah.

Jaquenetta, in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), a country maid with whom Armado is in love.

Jagues, a character in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

Jarley, Mrs., in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.), the proprietor of a travelling wax-works show.

Jarnac, COUP DE: in a duel fought in 1547 before Henri II and the French court by two young nobles, Jarnac and La Châtaigneraie, Jarnac by an unexpected blow hamstringing his opponent. The coup de Jarnac became proverbial for an unforeseen and decisive stroke.

Jarndyce, JOHN, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Jarvey, a hackney-coachman, a by-form of Jarvis or Jervis, personal name; according to Serjeant Ballantine, 'a compliment paid to the class in consequence of one of them named Jarvis having been hanged'.

Jarvie, BAILIE NICOL, a character in Scott's 'Rob Roy' (q.v.).

Jason, a celebrated hero of antiquity, son of Aeson, king of Iolcos. When his father's kingdom was usurped by his uncle Pelias, he was entrusted to the care of Cheiron the centaur (q.v.), by whom he was educated. Returning to Iolcos by the direction of the oracle, he boldly demanded from Pelias the restoration of the kingdom, and to obtain it undertook the expedition to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece (see under Argonauts). This he accomplished successfully with the help of Medea (q.v.), whom he married, but subsequently abandoned in order to marry Glaucé or Créúsa (q.v.).

Jason, The Life and Death of, a poem in heroic couplets by W. Morris (q.v.), published in 1867.

The story is that of Jason and Medea, the Argonauts and the Golden Fleece (see under Jason, supra), permeated with a spirit of romance and pathos, and ending on a melancholy note, as Jason dies 'of love, of honour, and of joy bereft'.

Jasper Packlemerton, 'of atrocious memory', a notable figure in Mrs. Jarley's wax-works (see Old Curiosity Shop), who had murdered fourteen wives.

Javan, according to Gen. x. 2, a son of Japhet; mentioned also in Ezekiel xxviii. 13 as trading with the Tyrians, and here signifying the Ionians of Asia Minor, in which sense Milton uses the expressions 'Javan's issue', in 'Paradise Lost', i. 508, and 'bound for the isles of Javan and Gadire' in 'Samson Agonistes', 716.

Jeames de la Pluche, The Diary of, a short story by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 'Punch' in 1845-6, reprinted in 'Miscellanies', 1856.

James Plush, a footman, makes a fortune by railway speculation, changes his name, and takes up his abode in the Albany. Lord Bareacres proposes to marry his daughter, Lady Angelina, to Jeames. But the latter wakes up one day to find that Lady Angelina has eloped with someone else, and that his fortune has likewise disappeared with a collapse of the market. He takes a public-house and marries Mary Ann Hoggins. See also Yellowplush.

JEAN DE MEUN(G), see Roman de la Rose.

Jean Jacques, a current abbreviation of the name of Jean Jacques Rousseau (q.v.).

JEANS, SIR JAMES HOPWOOD (1877-1946), astronomer and writer on cosmogony and stellar physics. His popular work 'The Universe Around Us' appeared in 1929.

JEBB, SIR RICHARD CLAVERHOUSE (1841-1905), educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, was professor of Greek at Glasgow in 1875, and at Cambridge in 1889. He was M.P. for the University during the later years of his life. He is remembered for his critical editions and translations of Sophocles (1883-96) and Bacchylides (1905), his translation of Theophrastus (1870), 'The Attic Orators from Antiphon to Isaeus' (1876-80), and other works on classical subjects. He also wrote a life of Bentley for the English Men of Letters series (1882).

Jebusites, in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), and generally in the 17th cent., the Roman Catholics.

Jedburgh, the capital of Roxburghshire, Scotland, famous in the annals of Border warfare. JEDBURGH, JEDWOOD, or JEDDART JUSTICE was proverbial for its summary character, the suspected culprit being hanged first and tried afterwards.

Jeeves, in many of P. G. Wodehouse's stories, the omniscient and resourceful valet.

JEFFERIES, RICHARD (1848-87), the son of a Wiltshire farmer, and a writer with a remarkable power of observing nature and representing it in combination with a strain of poetry and philosophy. He first attracted notice by his 'Gamekeeper at Home' (1878), reprinted from the 'Pall Mall Gazette'. There followed 'Wild Life in a Southern County' (1879), 'Hodge and his Master' (1880), 'Round about a Great Estate' (1880), 'Wood Magic' (1881), 'Bevis' (1882), 'The Life of the Fields'

JEFFERIES

(1884); also his remarkable spiritual autobiography, 'The Story of my Heart' (1883). His novels were less successful.

Jefferson, THOMAS (1743-1826), born in Virginia, third President of the United States, holding the presidency for two terms (1801-9). He drafted the Declaration of Independence (1776), and is noted for his liberal policy and the educational and humanitarian reforms that he advocated.

JEFFREY, FRANCIS, Lord Jeffrey (1773-1850), educated at Edinburgh High School and at Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities, became a Scottish judge. He is principally remembered as the founder, with Sydney Smith, of the 'Edinburgh Review' (q.v.), as its editor until 1829, and for his unsparing criticism of the authors (notably the Lake school) of whom he disapproved. His article on Wordsworth's 'Excursion' (1814), beginning with 'This will never do', contains his chief objections. On the other hand, he would have made appreciation of Keats the touchstone of aptitude for poetry.

Jeffreys, GEORGE, first Baron Jeffreys (1644-89), educated at St. Paul's School, at Westminster, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, was lord chief justice, 1682. He presided at the trial of Titus Oates, and is chiefly notorious for his brutality and as the judge who held the 'Bloody Assizes' (q.v.). He was arrested in 1688 and died in the Tower after petitioning for a pardon.

Jehovah, the English representation of the Hebrew principal and personal name of God in the O.T., which was considered by the Jews too sacred for utterance. It has been held that the original name was YAHWEH, generally understood to mean 'he that exists', 'the self-existent'.

Jehovistic, see Elohim.

Jehu, a fast and furious driver; a coachman; in humorous allusion to 2 Kings ix. 20.

Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The Strange Case of Dr., a novel by R. L. Stevenson published in 1886.

Dr. Jekyll, a physician conscious of the duality, the mixed good and evil, in his own nature, and fascinated by the idea of the advantage that would arise if these two elements could be clothed in different personalities, discovers a drug by means of which he can create for himself a separate personality that absorbs all his evil instincts. This personality, repulsive in appearance, he assumes from time to time and calls Mr. Hyde, and in it he gives rein to his evil impulses. The personality of Hyde is pure evil. It gradually gains a greater ascendancy, and Hyde commits a horrible murder. Jekyll now finds himself from time to time involuntarily transformed into Hyde, while the drug loses its efficacy in restoring his original form and character. On the point of discovery and arrest, he takes his own life.

Jenkins, HENRY (d. 1670), called the 'Modern Methuselah', was a native of Ellerton-upon-Swale in Yorkshire. He claimed to have been born about 1501, and when 10-12 years old to have been sent at the time of the battle of Flodden with a horse-load of arrows for the army at Northallerton; also to have been butler to Lord Conyers, abbot of Fountains, and to have witnessed the dissolution of the monasteries. He was buried at Bolton, where he is commemorated by an obelisk, but his extreme old age rests only on his own statements, which are in some respects contradictory.

Jenkins, Mrs. WINIFRED, a character in Smollett's 'Humphry Clinker' (q.v.).

Jenkins's Ear, an allusion to a political incident of 1738, which precipitated the war with Spain of 1739. Robert Jenkins, a master mariner, produced to a committee of the House of Commons what he declared to be his ear, cut off by the Spanish captain Frandino at Havana in the exercise of the right of search which the Spaniards claimed in order to prevent English trade with Spanish America. There was some truth in the story; but it was a pirate captain who had cut off the ear, and the Spanish governor had punished the pirate.

Jenkinson, EPHRAIM, in Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.), an old swindler who imposed on Dr. Primrose and his son Moses.

Jenkinson, Mrs. MOUNTSTUART, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Jenkyns, DEBORAH, MATILDA, and PETER, characters in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.).

JENNER, EDWARD (1749-1823), the pioneer of vaccination. He first vaccinated from cow-pox in 1796, and his 'Complete Statement of Facts and Observations' was published in 1800. He received grants from parliament of £10,000 and £20,000 in 1802 and 1806. Vaccination was made compulsory in England in 1853.

JENYNS, SOAME (1704-87), educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, was M.P. for Cambridgeshire and for Dunwich, 1742-80, and author of 'Poems' (1752) and of 'A Free Enquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil' (1757). The latter was vigorously criticized by Johnson in the 'Literary Magazine'. Jenyns also wrote a 'View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion' (1776), which had considerable vogue.

Jephthah's daughter, see Judges xi. 30 et seq. When Jephthah went out against the Ammonites he vowed to sacrifice, if victorious, whatever came forth from his house to meet him. This proved to be his daughter, and he 'did with her according to his vow'. She figures in Tennyson's 'Dream of Fair Women'. (Cf. the story of Idomeneus.)

The ballad in Percy's 'Reliques' entitled 'Jephthah Judge of Israel' is that which Hamlet quotes in Shakespeare's play (II. ii).

Jeremiad, a doleful complaint, in allusion to the Lamentations of Jeremiah in the O.T.

Jeremy, a character in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Jeremy Diddler, see Diddler.

Jeroboam, a very large wine-bottle, equivalent to six standard bottles (Saintsbury), so called in allusion to Jeroboam, 'a mighty man of valour' (1 Kings xi. 28) 'who made Israel to sin' (xiv. 16) by setting up other sanctuaries besides the Temple.

JEROME, JEROME KLAPKA (1859-1927), novelist and playwright, whose 'Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow' and 'Three Men in a Boat' appeared in 1889, and by their blending of humour and sentiment proved very popular; the latter work has been translated into many languages. Jerome's 'The Passing of the Third Floor Back' (1908) brought him fame as a dramatist. With others he founded in 1892 'The Idler', a successful monthly magazine.

JEROME, ST. (HIERONYMUS) (c. 340-420), was born at Strido, on the borders of Dalmatia, of Christian parents, educated at Rome, and baptized in 360. He visited Gaul and Asia Minor, and after a period of dissipation devoted himself to the practice of asceticism. He lived as a hermit near Chalcis (SE. of Antioch), spent the years 382-5 at Rome, where he was the spiritual counsellor of a group of noble Roman ladies, and in 386 settled at Bethlehem, where he died in 420. His principal works were a translation and continuation of the chronicles of Eusebius and the Latin version of the Scriptures which came to be known as the Vulgate.

Jeronimo or HIERONIMO, the chief character in Kyd's 'The Spanish Tragedy' (q.v.).

JERROLD, DOUGLAS WILLIAM (1803-57), is chiefly remembered as the contributor to 'Punch' of 'Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures' (q.v.), which added greatly to that periodical's popularity and appeared in book form in 1846. He was also author of the successful plays 'Black-ey'd Susan' (1829) and 'The Bride of Ludgate' (1831). Other amusing comedies by Jerrold were 'The Prisoner of War' (1842), 'Time works Wonders' (1845), and 'The Catpaw' (1850). He wrote in 'Punch', over the signature 'Q', a number of social and political satires of a liberal tendency. He published 'The Story of a Feather' in 1844 and several novels. From 1852 till his death he edited 'Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper'.

Jerusalem: for the poem of that name by William Blake, see Blake.

Jerusalem Chamber, THE, the old abbot's parlour in the monastic buildings of Westminster Abbey, the scene of the conspiracy against Henry IV and of his death. Its name was probably derived from tapestries representing the history of Jerusalem. It became the chapter-house of the abbey at an uncertain date, probably as early as the 16th cent.

Jerusalem Delivered (Gerusalemme Liberata), a poem by Tasso (q.v.), published in three forms, in 1576 (unauthorized), in 1581 (authorized), and in 1593 (after Tasso's liberation from confinement).

The poem is the epic of a crusade, with the addition of romantic and fabulous elements. By the side of Godefroi de Bouillon, the leader of the Christian host besieging Jerusalem, and other historical characters, we have the romantic figures of Sophronia and her lover Olindo, who are prepared to face martyrdom to save the Christians in the beleaguered city; the Amazon Clorinda who is beloved by Tancred the Norman, and killed by him unwittingly; and Armida, the niece of the wizard king of Damascus, who lures away the Christian knights to her enchanted gardens. Rinaldo, prince of Este (supposed to be present by an anachronism, for he was not born till 1175), rescues the prisoners of Armida, and Armida falls in love with him. By her enchantments they live happily together till Rinaldo is summoned away to help the army. He takes the chief part in the capture of Jerusalem.

The poem was translated into English in 1594 by R. Carew, and by Edward Fairfax in 1600 (under the title 'Godfrey of Bulloigne'). Spenser's description of Acrasia's Bower of Bliss ('Faerie Queene', II. xii) was modelled on the gardens of Armida.

Jerusalem, THE NEW, the celestial city (Rev. xxi. 2).

Jessamy Bride, THE, the name given by Goldsmith (q.v.) to the younger Miss Horneck, with whom he is supposed to have been in love.

Jesse, a genealogical tree representing the genealogy of Christ from 'the root of Jesse' (the father of David, 1 Sam. xvi; cf. Isa. xi. 1), used in churches in the Middle Ages as a decoration of windows, walls, &c., or in the form of a large branched candlestick. Sometimes the tree is represented as rising from the body of Jesse, who is shown recumbent.

Jessica, Shylock's daughter in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice' (q.v.).

Jessica's First Prayer, a story of a girl wail's awakening to the meaning of religion; written by Hesba Stretton (i.e. Sarah Smith, 1832-1911); first published in 1866, in 'The Sunday at Home', issued in book form in 1867. The work had a sale of over one and a half million copies, and has been translated into every European language, and into most Asiatic and African tongues.

Jesuits, see Loyola.

Jew, THE WANDERING, see Wandering Jew.

Jew of Malta, The, a drama in blank verse by Marlowe (q.v.), produced about 1592 but not published until 1633.

The Grand Signior of Turkey having demanded the tribute of Malta, the governor of Malta decides that it shall be paid by the Jews of the island. Barabas, a rich Jew, who resists the edict, has all his wealth impounded and his house turned into a nunnery. In revenge he indulges in an orgy of slaughter, procuring the death of his daughter Abigail's lover among others, and poisoning Abigail herself. Malta being besieged by the Turks, he betrays the fortress to them, and, as a reward, is made its governor. He now plots the destruction of the Turkish commander and his force at a banquet by means of a collapsible floor; but is himself betrayed and hurled through this same floor into a cauldron, where he dies.

JEWETT, SARAH ORNE (1849-1909), American author, born at South Berwick, Maine, known for her stories of New England life, and particularly for 'The Country of the Pointed Firs' (1896), which Edward Garnett has described as consisting of 'thirty little masterpieces'. Among her other books are: 'Deephaven' (1877), 'Play-Days' (1878), 'Old Friends and New' (1879), 'Country Byways' (1880), 'The Tory Lover' (1901).

JEWSBURY, GERALDINE ENDOR (1812-80), novelist, author of 'Zoe' (1845), 'The Half-Sisters' (1848), 'Marian Withers' (1851), and 'Right or Wrong' (1859). Her sister MARIA JANE JEWSBURY (afterwards Mrs. Fletcher) published 'Phantasmagoria' (1824), 'The Three Histories' (1830), and other works.

Jezebel, the proud and infamous wife of Ahab, king of Israel (1 Kings xvi. 31, xix, and 2 Kings ix), hence used allusively of a wicked, impudent, or abandoned woman; also of a painted woman (2 Kings ix. 30).

Jihad or JEHAD, a religious war of Mohammedans against unbelievers in Islam, inculcated as a duty by the Koran and by traditions.

Jim Crow, a generic name for a negro, from the refrain of a popular negro melody, 'Wheel about and turn about, and jump Jim Crow'. 'Jim Crow cars' is a term applied to the special railway coaches for negroes in the south of the U.S.

Jingle, ALFRED, a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Jingo. The word appears first about 1670 as a piece of conjurer's gibberish, usually hey or high jingo!, probably a mere piece of sonorous nonsense. In 1694 by jingo occurs in Motteux's translation of Rabelais, where the French has 'par Dieu'. This may be presumed (though not proved) to be the same as the conjurer's word, substituted for a sacred name (cf. 'by Gosh', &c.). A recent conjecture that jingo is from the Basque word for God (Jinko, Jainko), caught up from Basque sailors, is not impossible, but is as yet unsupported by evidence.

The word was adopted as a nickname for those who supported the policy of Lord Beaconsfield in sending a British fleet into Turkish waters to resist the advance of Russia in 1878, from the refrain of a music-hall song of the period ('We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do'). It is extended to advocates in general of bellicose nationalism in dealing with foreign powers. [OED.]

Jiniwln, MRS., in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.), the mother of Mrs. Quilp.

Jinn or DJINN, in Mohammedan demonology, an intermediate order of beings between angels and men, created out of fire, said to have the power of assuming human or animal forms, and to have a supernatural influence over men. There are good and evil jinn. See also under Genius.

Jo, the crossing-sweeper in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Joan of Arc, ST. (1412-31), JEANNE D'ARC, or more correctly JEANNE DARC, as it was spelt in all contemporary documents (Litttré), the daughter of Jacques Darc, an agriculturist of Domremy in the valley of the Meuse, an illiterate girl who contributed powerfully to liberate France from the English in the reign of Charles VII. Her mission was a double one, (1) to raise the siege of Orléans; (2) to conduct Charles to his coronation at Rheims. She accomplished both these tasks and then wished to return home; but she yielded to the demands of the French patriots and was taken prisoner by the Burgundians, who handed her over to the English. But it was a French court of ecclesiastics (with the help of the Inquisition) who sentenced her as a witch, and the English who burned her at Rouen. She was at last canonized in 1920. She is the subject of Voltaire's 'La Pucelle', of a tragedy by Schiller, of a poem by Southey, and of a drama by G. B. Shaw.

Joan, POPE, a mythical female pope, supposed to have intervened as John VIII between Leo IV and Benedict III in the 9th cent. She was described as of English descent, though born in Germany. After fleeing, disguised as a man, to Greece with her lover, a Benedictine monk, she was said to have removed to Rome and there risen to be a cardinal and ultimately to the papacy, and to have died in childbirth during a procession. From a simple mention (probably a later interpolation) in the chronicle of the contemporary Anastasius Bibliothecarius that Joanna, a woman, succeeded Leo as pope in 854, the story was developed by the addition of the above details. Its truth has repeatedly been contested, and it was finally shown to be unfounded by Döllinger ('Papstfabeln des Mittelalters', Engl. tr. 1872). The name of the Pope-Joan card game is perhaps a corruption of nain jaune, its name in French.

Job, the hero of the O.T. book that bears his name, a wealthy and prosperous man suddenly overtaken by dire calamities. These give rise to discussions between Job and the friends who come to visit him (Job's comforters) as to the connexion between suffering and sin, the friends assuming that Job's misfortunes are a punishment, while Job maintains his innocence. Job is the typical example of patience under misfortune.

JOCELIN DE BRAKELOND (fl. 1200), a monk of Bury St. Edmunds, whose chronicle of his abbey (1173-1202) inspired Carlyle's 'Past and Present'.

Jocelyn, Ross, a character in Meredith's 'Evan Harrington' (q.v.).

Jock o' Hazeldean, a ballad, of which one stanza is ancient, the rest by Sir W. Scott. The lady is to marry young Frank, chief of Errington, but she weeps for Jock. On her wedding-day she is found to have eloped with him over the Border.

Jockey Club, THE, founded in 1750 or 1751 to administer racing at Newmarket, now controls racing throughout England, grants licences to jockeys, settles disputes, &c.

Jockey of Norfolk, in the lines:

Jockey of Norfolk, be not so bold,

For Dickon thy master is bought and sold

was Sir John Howard, first duke of Norfolk, who commanded Richard's vanguard at the battle of Bosworth, and was slain.

Joe Manton, 'a name given to fowling-pieces made by Joseph Manton, a celebrated London gunsmith' (1766?-1835) (Farmer, 'Slang').

JOHN BULL

Joe Miller's Jests, a jest-book by John Mottley (q.v.), published in 1739. The name is taken from Joseph Miller (1684-1738), an actor in the Drury Lane company and reputed humorist. A 'Joe Miller' is a stale jest.

Johannes Factotum, 'John Do-everything', a Jack of all trades, a would-be universal genius. The phrase, as also Dominus Factotum, Magister Factotum, and the corresponding Italian fa il tutto, is found in the 16th cent. It occurs in Greene's famous attack on Shakespeare in the 'Groatsworth of Wit' (q.v.):

'Being an absolute Johannes fac totum, is in his owne conceit the only Shake-scene in a countrey.'

John Barleycorn, see Barleycorn.

John Bull, The History of, a collection of pamphlets by Arbuthnot (q.v.), issued in 1712, and rearranged and republished in Pope and Swift's 'Miscellanies' of 1727.

The pamphlets, of which the first appeared on 6 Mar. 1712, were designed to advocate, in the form of humorous allegories, the cessation of the war with France, the various parties concerned being designated under the names of John Bull, Nicholas Frog (the Dutch), Lord Strutt (Philip of Spain), Lewis Baboon (the French king). Bull and Frog are engaged in a law-suit with Baboon, and their case is put in the hands of Humphrey Hocus, an attorney (the duke of Marlborough), and won. John Bull, however, discovers an intrigue between Hocus and Mrs. Bull, his first wife (the Whig parliament), and trouble follows. Mrs. Bull dies and John marries again (the Tory parliament), but is much disturbed at the cost of the litigation. The second and subsequent pamphlets are conceived on the same lines, satirizing the Whigs, and dealing with various current political topics.

John Bull himself is described as 'an honest plain-dealing fellow, choleric, bold, and of a very inconstant temper . . . very apt to quarrel with his best friends, especially if they pretended to govern him. . . . John's temper depended very much upon the air; his spirits rose and fell with the weather-glass. John was quick and understood his business very well . . . a boon companion, loving his bottle and his diversion'.

'John Bull' is also the title of a play by George Colman the younger, acted in 1803, and containing the well-known character, Job

JOHN BULL

Thornberry, an honest tradesman, generous and kindhearted, but irascible under a sense of injustice, supposed to typify the national character.

John Buncle, Esq., The Life of, a work of fiction by Amory (q.v.), published in two volumes in 1756-66.

This strange book takes the form of an autobiography, and the hero, in the words of the 'illustrious Miss Noel', his first love, is 'an odd compound of a man'. Like the author himself, he is a Unitarian, a man of learning and serious tastes, amorous but virtuous in a way. He marries seven wives in succession, each of them dying within a couple of years, and each of them surpassingly beautiful and clever. Statia's 'bright victorious eyes flash celestial fire', and she says 'two or three good things on the beauty of the morning'. Miss Spence has 'the head of Aristotle, the heart of a primitive Christian, and the form of Venus de Medicis', and discusses the differential calculus after supper. Miss Turner dies with a Latin quotation on her lips. After the death of each—he is not a believer in a long period of mourning—he sets out to see if he can find 'another good country girl for a wife and get a little more money'. The story of his matrimonial ventures is varied with digressions on religious, literary, and scientific subjects, descriptions of scenery, algebra and trigonometry, and a good deal of eating and drinking.

John Company, see East India Company.

John de Reeve, the subject of an old ballad, containing a comic element. He is a sturdy independent 'villain', who rides to court with pitchfork and sword, and is knighted.

John Doe and Richard Roe, legal fictions in old actions of ejectment, adopted to simplify the old procedure under which a number of irrelevant matters had to be proved. The fictitious John Doe was stated to have entered under a lease granted by the plaintiff, and to have been ejected by the fictitious Richard Roe, who made no defence and was allowed to be replaced by the true defendant, the tenant in possession. All that was thus left to the court to decide was the real point at issue, whether the plaintiff or defendant had the better title. (See Holdsworth, 'History of English Law'.) All this was swept away by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

John Gilpin, The Diverting History of, a poem by Cowper (q.v.), first published anonymously in the 'Public Advertiser', reprinted in chapbook form, and included in the same volume as 'The Task' in 1785. The story of John Gilpin was told to Cowper by Lady Austen to divert him from melancholy. He laughed over it during the night and next day had turned it into a ballad.

John Gilpin, a 'linen-draper bold' of Cheapside, and his wife, decide to celebrate their twentieth wedding-day by a trip to the

JOHN OF GAUNT

Bell at Edmonton, he on a borrowed horse, she, her sister, and the children in a chaise and pair. But when John's horse begins to trot John loses control; and the poem describes his headlong career to Edmonton, and ten miles beyond it to Ware, and then back again,

Nor stopped till where he had got up
He did again get down.

It appears that John Gilpin was the name of a real citizen of London, owning land near Olney, where Cowper was living in 1785.

John Hallfas, Gentleman, a novel by Dinah Mulock (q.v.), published in 1857.

This is the plain domestic tale of a poor but honest and hard-working boy, left an orphan in childhood, who by his own exertions and with the help of Phineas Fletcher, the son of one of his employers, improves his education, achieves a good position, and marries the heroine, Ursula March. The story is intended to illustrate the doctrine that the character of a true gentleman resides in integrity and nobility of purpose, rather than in birth and wealth.

John Inglesant, an historical novel by Shorthouse (q.v.), published in 1881 (privately printed in 1880).

The story is set in the time of Charles I and the Commonwealth. John Inglesant, a high-souled gentleman, of a serious and mystical cast of mind, is brought in his early years under the influence of a Jesuit emissary and becomes the tool of the Jesuit body in the political intrigues that attended the later years of Charles I. He comes into close contact with the community of Little Gidding (see under Ferrar, Nicholas), and falls in love with Mary Collet, a member of the community. He joins the court of Charles I and is employed by him in the dangerous negotiations for bringing an Irish army into England. When these are discovered, he is repudiated by the king, and his loyal refusal to betray his master nearly costs him his head. After the death of Charles I he passes to Italy, partly for the purpose of discovering and taking vengeance on an Italian ruffian who has murdered his brother. The story presents a picture of the Italian life of the period, and of the religious factions and political intrigues, culminating in the long-drawn-out election of a pope on the death of Innocent X. The reaction of the hero's character to various temptations and influences (including that of Molinos, the founder of the Quietists, q.v.) is described, the climax being reached when his brother's murderer finally falls into his power, and he renounces his own vengeance and leaves him to that of God. The style of the 17th cent. is admirably imitated. But it has recently been discovered that Shorthouse drew certain passages from 17th-cent. books.

John of Gaunt (1340-99), Duke of Lancaster, fourth son of Edward III, born at Ghent ('Gaunt'), a notable figure in political history, a patron of Wycliffe and Chaucer, and a character in Shakespeare's 'Richard II'.

JOHN O' GROAT'S HOUSE

John o' Groat's House, at the extreme NE. point of the Scottish mainland, is the reputed site of an octagonal house said to have been built in the 16th cent. by a Dutchman, John Groot, who migrated thither and was followed by other members of the Groot family. Disputes arose among them as to precedence at the annual feasts, and to settle these John Groot built his house with eight doors, so that each claimant could enter by his own door and sit at his own table.

JOHN OF SALISBURY (d. 1180) was born at Salisbury and studied at Paris under Abélard (q.v.) and at Chartres. He returned to England about 1150, residing mainly at Canterbury, where he was secretary to Archbishop Theobald and was sent on missions to Rome. He fell into disfavour with Henry II and retired to Rheims, where he composed his 'Historia Pontificalis'. He was present in Canterbury Cathedral when Becket was murdered, wrote his life, and urged his canonization. He also wrote a life of Anselm with a view to his canonization. He became bishop of Chartres in 1176. He was not only an able politician and ecclesiastic but the most learned classical writer of his time; he may be called the fine flower of the first (primitive) Renaissance, and it is an interesting question whether or no he knew any Greek. His works include the 'Policraticus' or 'De Nugis Curialium', on the vanities of the court and miscellaneous questions of philosophy and learning; the 'Metalogicus', a treatise on logic and an account of Aristotle's treatment of the subject; and the 'Entheticus', an elegiac poem in praise of Becket. There is a Life of John of Salisbury (1932) by C. C. J. Webb, who has also edited some of the works.

John o' Scales, see Hair of Linne.

John of the Cross, ST. (1549-91), a Spanish mystical poet and a friar of the Carmelite order. He was canonized in 1726.

John Silence, a novel by Algernon Blackwood, published in 1908. John Silence is a 'psychic doctor' and the book is a collection of narratives of uncanny psychic experiences.

John Thomson's man or JOHN TAMSON'S MAN, a Scottish proverbial appellation for a man who is governed by his wife (Scott, 'Old Mortality', xxxviii). The origin of the expression is unknown. W. C. Hazlitt states that it occurs in the works of Dunbar (q.v.).

John-a-Nokes, a fictitious name for one of the parties in a legal action, usually coupled with JOHN-A-STILES as the name of the other.

Johnson, Anecdotes of the late Samuel, by Mrs. Piozzi (see Thrale), published in 1786.

Johnson, ESTHER, Swift's 'Stella', see Swift.

JOHNSON, LIONEL PIGOT (1867-1902), educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, a scholar-poet and critic. He became a Roman Catholic. His chief works are 'Postliminium' (essays and critical papers, 1912), 'The Art of Thomas Hardy' (1896), and two books of verse, 'Poems' (1895) and 'Ireland' (1897). He contributed to the 'Spectator', 'Academy', 'Athenaeum', 'Daily Chronicle', &c.

JOHNSON, RICHARD (1573-1659?), was a freeman of London, and author of the 'Famous Historie of the Seven Champions of Christendom' (q.v., c. 1597), 'The Nine Worthies of London' (1592), 'The Crowne Garland of Golden Roses' (1612, reprinted by the Percy Society), and 'Pleasant Conceites of Old Hobson' (1607, reprinted 1843).

Johnson, THE REV. SAMUEL (1640-1703), a Whig divine who was imprisoned, pilloried, fined, and whipped for his Protestant pamphlets. He received a pension and bounty from William III. He figures in 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.) as 'Ben-Jochanan'.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL (1709-84), born at Lichfield, the son of a bookseller of that town. When 3 years old he was brought to London to be touched for the king's evil by Queen Anne. He was educated at Lichfield Grammar School and at Pembroke College, Oxford, where he spent fourteen months in 1728-9, but took no degree. His father died in 1731 and left his family in poverty, and Johnson's career for a time is not clearly known. He worked as an usher at Market Bosworth and lived for a time at Birmingham, where he contributed essays to the 'Birmingham Journal'. In 1735 he published anonymously a condensed translation of a French version of Father Lobo's 'Voyage to Abyssinia'. In the same year he married Mrs. Elizabeth Porter, a widow considerably older than himself, and started a private school at Edial, near Lichfield. This was not successful, and in 1737, accompanied by one of his pupils, David Garrick (q.v.), he set out for London, which was henceforth to be his home. He entered the service of Edward Cave, the printer (1691-1754), who had founded 'The Gentleman's Magazine' (q.v.) in 1731. To this he contributed essays, poems (notably 'Friendship, an Ode'), Latin verses, biographies, and reports of parliamentary debates. The latter were in reality discussions in Johnson's own language of the current political questions, for which the speeches actually made in parliament furnished merely a basis. In 1738 he published his poem 'London' (q.v.). In 1744 appeared his notable 'Life of Mr. Richard Savage', subsequently included in the 'Lives of the Poets', the affectionate record of a friend with whom he had shared extreme poverty (see under Savage, Richard). In 1747 he issued the 'Plan' of his 'Dictionary' (see Johnson's Dictionary), addressed to Lord Chesterfield, with results referred to under the name of that nobleman. In 1749 he published 'The Vanity of Human Wishes' (q.v.), his longest and best poem, and in the same year Garrick produced his tragedy 'Irene', which Johnson had written in 1736 at Edial, and which is little but a series of dialogues on moral themes between Mahomet, emperor of the Turks, his attendants, and various Greek captives. By this act of kindness of Garrick's, Johnson made nearly £300. In 1750 he started the 'Rambler' (q.v.), a periodical written almost entirely by himself, which ran until 1752 (when his wife died), appearing twice a week. From March 1753 to March 1754 Johnson contributed regularly to Hawkesworth's 'Adventurer'. His lives of Cheynel and Cave were contributed, the first to 'The Student' in 1751, the second to 'The Gentleman's Magazine' in 1754. The 'Dictionary' was published in 1755, and an abridgement in 1756. In the same year he contributed to Smart's 'Universal Visitor' and during this year and the next edited the 'Literary Magazine', which published a number of his political articles and reviews, including his essay on tea, and his criticism of Soame Jenyns's 'Free Enquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil'. In 1757 he also contributed the introduction to the 'Morning Chronicle'. He wrote the life of Sir T. Browne which is prefixed to his edition of that author's 'Christian Morals' (1756), and the life of Ascham in J. Bennet's edition of his Works (1761). During 1758-60 he contributed the 'Idler' (q.v.) series of papers to the 'Universal Chronicle'. In 1759 appeared his 'Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia' (q.v.). In 1762 Johnson received, on Wedderburn's application, a pension of £300 a year from Lord Bute, and in 1763 made the acquaintance of James Boswell (q.v.), his biographer. It was in the next year (1764) that 'The Club', later known as the 'Literary Club', was founded, including, besides Johnson, among its original members Reynolds, Burke, and Goldsmith, to whom Garrick, C. J. Fox, and Boswell were shortly added. The Club held its meetings at the Turk's Head in Gerrard Street. Besides a number of writings of minor importance, including an exposure of the Cock Lane ghost, he worked at his edition of Shakespeare, which after much delay was published in 1765; although superseded by later scholarship, it contained valuable notes and some emendations that have been maintained. He was introduced to the Thrales (q.v.) in 1764, in whose town and country houses he was hospitably received. In 1773 Johnson undertook a journey with Boswell to the Scottish Highlands and Hebrides, recorded in his 'Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland' (1775) and in Boswell's 'Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides' (1785). Johnson's diary of his tour with the Thrales in 1774 to north Wales was printed in 1816. In 1777 he undertook, at the request of a number of booksellers, to write the 'Lives of the Poets' (q.v.), published in 1779-81. In 1783 the death of his faithful old dependant, Robert Levett, elicited his beautiful little elegy, 'His virtues walked their narrow round', and in 1784, after two melancholy years, further saddened by the death of his friend Thrale and his quarrel with Mrs. Thrale, he died at his house in Bolt Court and was buried in Westminster Abbey. A monument was erected to him in St. Paul's. Johnson's literary output bears no proportion to his reputation. The latter is due in great measure to the fortunate accident by which an ideal biographer was found in Boswell to record for us the humour, wit, and sturdy common sense of his conversation, and a kindness of heart sometimes concealed under a gruff exterior.

Apart from Boswell's 'Life', much information about Johnson is to be found in Mrs. Piozzi's (Mrs. Thrale's) 'Anecdotes of the late Samuel Johnson' (1786) and in his 'Life' by Sir John Hawkins (1787). Besides those of Johnson's works above referred to, mention may be made of the following: translation into Latin verse of Pope's 'Messiah' (1731), written while Johnson was at college, and commended by Pope himself; 'Marmor Norfolciense; or an Essay on an ancient Prophetic Inscription' (1739), a political pamphlet in ironical disguise; 'A Compleat Vindication of the Licensers of the Stage' (1739), an ironical attack on them for refusing Brooke's 'Gustavus Vasa'; the 'Proposals' for printing the catalogue of the Harleian Library, and the 'Account' of it (1742-4); the 'Proposals' for, and the introduction to, the 'Harleian Miscellany' (q.v.), published in 1744, and the latter reprinted separately as an 'Essay on the Origin and Importance of Small Tracts and Fugitive Pieces'; 'Miscellaneous Observations on the Tragedy of Macbeth' (1745), an anticipation of the edition of Shakespeare; an apologue of human life entitled 'The Vision of Theodore, the Hermit of Teneriffe', contributed in 1748 to 'The Preceptor' (a work on education published by Dodsley), which Johnson described to Percy as the best thing he ever wrote; dedications to Mrs. Lennox's 'Female Quixote' (1753) and 'Shakespeare Illustrated' (1754), and many other dedications, prologues, &c.; 'An Account of an Attempt to ascertain the Longitude at Sea' (1755), written for Zachariah Williams; three letters in the 'Gazetteer' on the plans for Blackfriars bridge (1759); reviews in the 'Critical Review' of Goldsmith's 'Traveller' and of two other works (1763-4); 'Considerations on the Corn Laws' written in 1766 for 'single speech' Hamilton, and printed in Hamilton's 'Parliamentary Logick' (1808); four political pamphlets, 'The False Alarm' (1770), 'Thoughts . . . respecting Falkland's Islands' (1771), 'The Patriot' (1774), and 'Taxation no Tyranny' (1775); 'Occasional Papers by the late William Dodd, D.D.' (by Johnson, except Dodd's 'Account of Himself', suppressed but published in 1785). Johnson's remarkable 'Prayers and Meditations' were published posthumously in 1785, also two volumes of sermons (1788-9). A collection of his letters was edited by G. B. Hill in 1892 ('Additional Letters' in 1897).

JOHNSON

Boswell informed Johnson in 1772 of his intention to write his life, and had collected materials for the purpose ever since he first met him in 1763. After Johnson's death in 1784 he set to work arranging and adding to the 'prodigious multiplicity of materials', a task which, he writes in 1789, involved him in great labour, perplexity, and vexation. The final edition, after Boswell's death, was revised by Edmund Malone. The standard edition is that of G. B. Hill (revised 1934-).

Johnson's Dictionary, A Dictionary of the English Language, by S. Johnson (q.v.), published in 1755.

The prospectus of the Dictionary was issued in 1747 (for the incident with Lord Chesterfield to which it gave rise see under Chesterfield, earl of). Johnson's object was to produce 'a dictionary by which the pronunciation of our language may be fixed, and its attainment facilitated; by which its purity may be preserved, its use ascertained, and its duration lengthened'. In his collection of words he does not go back farther than the works of Sidney, holding that 'from the authors which rose in the time of Elizabeth a speech might be formed adequate to all the purposes of use or elegance'. As regards words imported from other languages he 'warned others against the folly of naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of the natives'. His derivations suffer from the scantiness of etymological knowledge in his day. But the dictionary is principally remarkable for the definitions of the meanings of words, and for the quotations in illustration of their use. Five editions of the Dictionary were published in Johnson's lifetime.

Johnson's 'Dixonary' was Miss Pinkerton's invariable present to departing scholars. Becky Sharp threw her copy into the garden as the coach drove off ('Vanity Fair', ch. 1).

Johnson, WILLIAM EUGENE (1862-), American prohibition propagandist, known as 'Pussyfoot', 'because of his catlike policies in pursuing lawbreakers in the Indian Territory' ('Who's Who in America'). He was chief special officer in the U.S. Indian Service 1908-11, during which he secured 4,400 convictions. He became well known as a temperance organizer and came to England in 1919 in support of the cause. He lost an eye at a prohibition meeting at Essex Hall, London, by a missile thrown by one of the crowd.

JOHNSTON, MARY (1870-1936), American author, born at Buchanan, Virginia, best known for her romantic novel of colonial Virginian life, 'To Have and to Hold' (1900).

JOHNSTONE, CHARLES, see Adventures of a Guinea.

JOINVILLE, JEAN DE (1224-1317), seneschal of Champagne, and a witness of the events of the disastrous crusade of Louis IX, wrote a vivid account of the latter in his 'Histoire de Saint Louis'.

Jolly Beggars, The, a cantata by Burns (q.v.), written in 1785.

A company of vagrants meet and carouse in a hedge ale-house. 'There is a maimed soldier, a fiddler, a strolling player, a ballad-singer, with their female companions. Each sings a song in character, and the songs are connected by vivid descriptions of the various rogues.

Jolly Roger, the pirates' black flag.

Jonah, A, a bearer of ill-luck, an allusion to the O.T. story. When Jonah was ordered to prophesy against Nineveh, he sailed instead for Tarshish. A tempest arising, the sailors threw lots to know for whose cause it was sent, and the lot fell upon Jonah, whom they accordingly cast into the sea. He was swallowed by 'a great fish' and thrown up again upon the land.

Jonathan, BROTHER, see Brother Jonathan.

Jonathan Wild the Great, The Life of, a satirical romance by H. Fielding (q.v.), published in his 'Miscellanies' in 1743. See also Wild.

The author's purpose is to expose the true meaning and reward of 'greatness' as distinct from 'goodness', when the 'greatness' is not obscured by worldly eminence. He relates the career of a consummate rogue, from his birth and his baptism by Titus Oates, to his arrival at the 'tree of glory', the gallows. The hero, having shown at school his disposition for iniquity, enters on his career of crime under the auspices of Mr. Snap, keeper of a sponging-house, and shows dexterity as a pickpocket. He becomes the chief of a gang of robbers, contriving their exploits, taking the largest share of the booty, keeping himself out of the clutches of the law, and maintaining discipline by denouncing any of the gang who contest his authority. He marries Snap's daughter, Letitia, who is as worthless as himself, and whose assumption of virtue provides some amusing scenes. His principal undertaking is his attempt to ruin the fortunes and domestic happiness of his old schoolfellow, the virtuous jeweller Heartfree. He robs him and gets him locked up as a bankrupt, induces Heartfree's wife by a trick to leave England, accuses Heartfree of having made away with her, and brings him within an ace of execution. But his trickery is fortunately exposed, and he meets his end with the 'greatness' that has distinguished him throughout.

Jonathan's, a coffee-house in Change Alley, Cornhill, referred to in the 'Tatler' (No. 38) and the 'Spectator' (No. 1) as a mart for stock-jobbers.

JONES, HENRY ARTHUR (1851-1929), dramatist, of a Welsh dissenting family, was for a time a shop assistant. Among his successful plays were: 'A Clerical Error' (1879, a one-act comedy in which the author himself acted), 'The Silver King' (1882, in which Henry Herman in a small degree collaborated, and which enjoyed great popularity), 'Saints and Sinners' (1884), 'The Middleman' (1889), 'The Dancing Girl' (1891). In 'The Crusaders' (1891), 'The Masqueraders' (1894), 'The Case of Rebellious Susan' (1894), 'The Triumph of the Philistines' (1895), and 'Dolly Reforming Herself' (1908), Jones showed an increased command of the art of comedy, and reached his masterpiece in 1897 in 'The Liars', acted by Charles Wyndham and Mary Moore. 'Michael and his Lost Angel', which Jones believed his best play, proved a failure on the stage in 1896. Jones wrote in all some sixty plays, and also 'The Renaissance of the English Drama' (1896) and 'Foundations of a National Drama' (1913). His 'Life' by his daughter appeared in 1930.

JONES, INIGO (1573-1652), architect, was the son of a Roman Catholic clothworker of London. In his youth he travelled on the Continent at the expense of the third Earl of Pembroke. He designed many buildings in London, including the Banqueting House in Whitehall, and St. Paul's Church and the piazza in Covent Garden. He added an Ionic façade to old St. Paul's Cathedral. He also designed shifting scenes, machines, and dresses for many masques by Ben Jonson, Daniel Heywood, D'Avenant, and others. He quarrelled with Ben Jonson and was satirized by him as 'In-and-In Medley' in his 'Tale of a Tub' (q.v.).

Jones, JOHN PAUL (1747-92), naval adventurer, was the son of a Kircudbrightshire gardener named Paul. After some years spent in the slave trade, smuggling, and trading to the W. Indies, he entered the American navy in 1775. While in command of the 'Ranger' he took the fort at Whitehaven and captured the 'Drake' off Carrickfergus (1778), and in the following year in the 'Bonhomme Richard', accompanied by three French ships and one American, threatened Edinburgh and captured the 'Serapis'. Jones afterwards served in the French navy.

JONES, SIR WILLIAM (1746-94), educated at Harrow and at University College, Oxford, a distinguished orientalist and jurist, was judge of the high court at Calcutta from 1783 till his death. He published his 'Essay on Bailments' in 1781, but is best known for his works on oriental languages: 'Poeseos Asiaticae Commentarium Libri Sex' (1774), his version of the Arabic 'Moallakat' (1783), his translations of the 'Hitopadesa' and 'Sakuntala', and his 'Persian Grammar' (1771). He also began 'The Institutes of Hindu Law, or Ordinances of Manu'. Jones mastered Sanskrit and was a pioneer in the science of comparative philology. His collected works were edited by Lord Teignmouth (1799).

JONSON, BENJAMIN (1572-1637) ('Ben Jonson'), was of Border descent, but born probably in Westminster. He was educated at Westminster School under William Camden, and was for a time in the business of his step-father, a bricklayer. His occupation from 1591/2 to 1597 is uncertain, but included some voluntary military service in Flanders. In 1597 he began to work for Henslowe's company as player and playwright. He killed a fellow actor in a duel, but escaped death by benefit of clergy, 1598; became a Roman Catholic during imprisonment, but abjured twelve years later. His 'Every Man in his Humour' (q.v.), with Shakespeare in the cast, was performed by the lord chamberlain's company at the Curtain, 1598, and 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.) at the Globe, 1599; his 'Cynthia's Revels' (q.v.), 1600, and 'The Poetaster' (q.v., attacking Dekker and Marston), 1601, were performed by the children of the Queen's Chapel. In 1600-1 he was writing additions to Kyd's 'Spanish Tragedy' (q.v.). His first extant tragedy, 'Sejanus' (q.v.), was given at the Globe by Shakespeare's company, 1603; his first court masque 'of Blacknesse' (with scenery by Inigo Jones) was given on Twelfth Night, 1605. He was temporarily imprisoned for his share in 'Eastward Ho' (q.v.), a play reflecting on the Scots. His 'Volpone' (q.v.) was acted at both the Globe and the two universities in 1606. 'Epicœne, or the Silent Woman' (q.v.) followed in 1609; 'The Alchemist' (q.v.) in 1610; 'Bartholomew Fayre' (q.v.) in 1614; and 'The Devil is an Ass' (q.v.) in 1616. Though not formally appointed the first poet laureate, the essentials of the position were conferred on him in 1616, when a pension was granted to him by James I. In 1618 he went to Scotland, where he was entertained by Drummond of Hawthornden (q.v.), who recorded their conversation. He produced 'The Staple of News' (q.v.), his last great play, in 1625. He was elected chronologer of London in 1628. 'The New Inn', a comedy, which shows decline in his powers, and proved a failure, was produced in 1629. From 1605 onwards he was constantly producing masques (q.v.) for the court, a form of entertainment that reached its highest elaboration in Jonson's hands. He introduced into it the 'antimasque', sometimes a foil to the principal masque, sometimes a dramatic scene, frequently of Aristophanic comedy. We have instances of this in the 'Masque of Queens' (1609), 'Love Restored' (1612), 'Mercury vindicated from the Alchemists' (1615), 'Pleasure reconciled to Vertue' (1618, which gave Milton his idea for 'Comus'), and 'Newes from the New World' (1621). Jonson quarrelled with Inigo Jones (q.v.) after production of the masque 'Chloridia', 1630, and lost court patronage. He produced 'The Magnetic Lady', 1632, and 'Tale of a Tub' (comedies, q.v.), 1633; his last masques were produced in 1633-4. He was buried in Westminster Abbey and celebrated in a collection of elegies entitled 'Jonsonus Virbius' (1637-8). His friends included Bacon, Selden, Chapman, Beaumont, Fletcher, Donne, and Shakespeare, and of the younger writers (his 'sons') Herrick, Suckling,

JONSON

Sir Kenelm Digby, and Lord Falkland. Among his patrons were the Sidneys, the earl of Pembroke, and the duke and duchess of Newcastle. His poems include 'Epigrammes' (containing the epitaph on Salathiel Pavy, the boy actor) and 'The Forrest' (q.v.), printed in the folio of 1616, 'Underwoods' (q.v.), printed in 1640, and translations. His chief prose work is 'Timber; or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter' (q.v.), 1640. His works have been edited by William Gifford (1816) and Colonel Cunningham (1875); a splendid edition by C. H. Herford and P. Simpson (Clarendon Press) is in progress.

As a man Jonson was arrogant and quarrelsome, but fearless, warm-hearted, and intellectually honest. The estimate of him formed by his contemporaries is summed up in the inscription of one of these upon his tomb, 'O rare Ben Jonson', which has been adopted as his epitaph.

Jonsonus Virbius, see Jonson.

Jordan, DOROTHEA or DOROTHY (1762-1816), actress, née Bland, appeared at Dublin as Phebe in 'As You Like It' in 1777, ran away to Leeds, and under the name of Mrs. Jordan played Calista and other parts on the York circuit. She made her début at Drury Lane as Peggy in 'The Country Girl' in 1785, and took many parts there, at the Haymarket, and at Covent Garden, her last part being Lady Teazle (1814). She was much praised by Hazlitt, Lamb, Leigh Hunt, &c. She was for long mistress of the duke of Clarence (William IV), and bore him many children. She went to France in 1815 and died at St. Cloud.

Jörmungander, in Scandinavian mythology a monstrous serpent, the offspring of Loki (q.v.). Odin threw it into the ocean, where it grew till it encircled the whole earth, finally swallowing its own tail. It was also known as the Midgard Serpent.

Jorrock, JOHN, 'a great city grocer of the old school' and a natural born sportsman whose lot was cast behind the counter instead of in the country, is, with Mr. Sponge and Mr. Facey Romford, among the celebrated characters of the novels of R. S. Surtees (q.v.). He first appears in 'Jorrock's Jaunts and Jollities' (published in periodical form in 1831-4, and as a book in 1838), and later in 'Handley Cross', &c., becoming master of the Handley Cross foxhounds.

Josaphat, see Barlaam and Josaphat.

José, DON, the father of the hero in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.).

Joseph, a long cloak, buttoned down the front, with a small cape, worn chiefly by women in the 18th cent. when riding, so called in allusion to the upper coat which Joseph left behind him (Genesis xxxix).

A pea-green Joseph was her favourite dress. (Crabbe, 'Parish Register', III.)

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHĒA

Joseph and his brethren, an allusion to the story, in Gen. xxxvii et seq., of Joseph the son of Jacob, the jealousy of his brethren, his sale to Ishmaelites who took him to Egypt and sold him to Potiphar, and his reception of his brethren, when he had been advanced to be ruler over Egypt and they came there to buy corn at a time of famine. 'Joseph and his Brethren' is the title of a drama by Charles Jeremiah Wells (1799?-1879), published under a pseudonym in 1823-4.

Joseph Andrews and his Friend Mr. Abraham Adams, The History of the Adventures of, a novel by H. Fielding (q.v.), published in 1742.

This was the first of Fielding's novels and was begun as a skit on Richardson's 'Pamela' (q.v.). As the latter had related the efforts of Pamela Andrews, the serving-maid, to escape the attentions of her master, so here her brother Joseph, also in service, is exposed to attacks on his virtue. Mr. B. of 'Pamela' becomes young Squire Booby, and mild fun is made of Pamela herself. But presently the satire is in the main dropped, Joseph sinks rather into the background, and the real hero of the remainder of the novel is Parson Adams, the simple, good-hearted, slightly ridiculous but lovable curate in Sir Thomas Booby's family.

Joseph Andrews having been dismissed from service in that family for repelling the advances of Lady Booby and her amorous attendant, Mrs. Slipslop, sets out on foot for the village, where his sweetheart, Fanny, lives. He is knocked down and stripped by robbers and carried to an inn, where he is found by Parson Adams. After this the pair travel together and meet with many ridiculous adventures, until the story brings Joseph and Fanny, Parson Adams, Lady Booby, and Mrs. Slipslop all together in the parish of Lady Booby's country seat. Lady Booby's malevolence pursues the unfortunate Joseph, but the timely arrival of young Squire Booby, who has now married Pamela, effects his brother-in-law's rescue from her persecution. Joseph presently turns out to be not Pamela's brother at all, but the son of persons of much greater consequence, and the story ends with his marriage to Fanny. Among the other amusing characters in this comedy are Mrs. Tow-wouse, the shrewish hostess of the inn, Peter Pounce, the rascally steward, and Trulliber, the boorish farmer-parson. The character of Parson Adams was drawn from William Young, with whom Fielding collaborated in the translation of the 'Plutus' of Aristophanes.

Joseph of Arimathea. For the legend of Joseph and the Holy Grail, see Grail. According to fable, St. Philip sent twelve disciples into Britain to preach Christianity, of whom Joseph of Arimathea was the leader. They founded at Glastonbury the first primitive church, which subsequently was developed into Glastonbury Abbey. Here Joseph was buried. His staff, planted in the ground, became the famous Glastonbury Thorn, which flowered at Christmas (William of Malmesbury, 'De Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesiae').

Joseph Vance, a novel by De Morgan (q.v.), published in 1906.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS (A.D. 37-c. 98), a celebrated Jew, who proved his military abilities by supporting against Vespasian a siege of forty-seven days in a small town of Judaea. He obtained the esteem of Vespasian by foretelling that he would one day become ruler of the Roman Empire. He was present at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and received from the conqueror the gift of certain sacred books that it contained, besides an estate in Judaea. He came to Rome with Titus, was honoured with Roman citizenship, and devoted himself to study. He wrote in Greek a 'History of the Jewish Wars', and 'Jewish Antiquities', which is a history of the Jews down to A.D. 66.

JOSH BILLINGS, pseudonym of Henry Wheeler Shaw (1818-85), American humorist, born at Lanesborough, Massachusetts.

Josian, the wife of Bevis of Hampton (q.v.).

Jötun, the giants of Scandinavian mythology, the enemies of the Æsir (q.v.) or gods. Their abode was called Jötunheim.

Joule, JAMES PRESCOTT (1818-89), a celebrated physicist and predecessor of Clerk-Maxwell (q.v.). Besides the determination of the mechanical equivalent of heat and the discovery of the conservation of energy, he investigated the thermodynamic properties of solids, and suggested improvements in the apparatus for measuring electric currents.

Jourdain, MONSIEUR, in Molière's 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme', a wealthy bourgeois obsessed with the desire to pass for a perfect gentleman. He apes people of quality, and is exploited in consequence. His surprise at learning, in the course of his education, that he has been talking prose all his life is proverbial.

Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, The, by Boswell (q.v.), published in 1785. It is a narrative of the journey taken by Boswell and Dr. Johnson in Scotland and the Hebrides in 1773. Boswell's manuscript, which Johnson and others read, has lately been recovered; it is longer by about a third than the published 'Tour'.

Journal of the Plague Year, A, see Plague Year.

Journey from this World to the Next, A, a Lucianic (see Lucian) narrative by H. Fielding, included in his 'Miscellanies' published in 1743.

After a lively satirical account by the author of his spirit's journey in a stage-coach, in company with the spirits of other recently dead persons, to Elysium, and of the judgement by Minos of the spirits seeking admittance there, we have a long discourse by the spirit of Julian the Apostate, describing its adventures in its successive embodiments. This is followed by a fragment containing a similar narrative by the spirit of Anne Boleyn.

Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, A, by S. Johnson (q.v.), published in 1775. It is a narrative of the tour undertaken by Johnson and Boswell in 1773 in Scotland and the Hebrides.

Jove, a poetical equivalent of Jupiter (q.v.).

Joviall Crew, A, or The Merry Beggars, a romantic comedy by Brome (q.v.) produced in 1641.

Oldrents, a rich and kindly country squire, has been thrown into melancholy by a gipsy's prediction that his two daughters must be beggars. Springlove, an honest vagabond, whom Oldrents has tried to reclaim to a settled life by making him his steward, is seized each spring with a desire to return to his wandering life, and rejoins a party of beggars, whom Oldrents from kindness of heart entertains in his barn. Oldrents's daughters, wearied with their father's melancholy, decide to join the beggars for a frolic, with their two lovers. They thus give effect to the gipsy's prediction, but their begging exposes them to unforeseen dangers. Meanwhile Justice Clack's niece has run away with the Justice's clerk, and they too fall in with the beggars. The search for the runaways, and the apprehension of the beggars, give occasion for amusing scenes, and all ends well.

The play, Brome's masterpiece, is highly original in more than one respect, notably in the picture of Oldrents's compassion for the poor, and of Springlove's bent for vagabondage and response to the call of the spring.

JOWETT, BENJAMIN (1817-93), educated at St. Paul's School and Balliol College, Oxford, became fellow of Balliol in 1838, Regius professor of Greek at Oxford in 1855, and master of Balliol in 1870. He contributed to 'Essays and Reviews' (q.v.) an essay on 'The Interpretation of Scripture' (1860), and published translations of Plato (1871), Thucydides (1881), and Aristotle's 'Politics' (1885). He also published in 1855 a commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans, notable for the freedom and freshness of its treatment, the orthodoxy of which was criticized. Jowett was an Oxford figure and the subject of innumerable stories.

JOYCE, JAMES (1882-1941), novelist, born at Rathgar, a suburb of Dublin, and educated at Irish Jesuit colleges. Dissatisfied with the intellectual atmosphere of Dublin, he left Ireland in 1902 and spent most of the remainder of his life abroad, chiefly in Trieste, Zürich, and Paris, contending for many years with poverty, suffering latterly from severe eye trouble, and struggling to obtain the publication of his works. He is principally known for his novel 'Ulysses', published in 1922 (Paris). It gives a striking picture of a single day's life, the actions and thoughts, microscopically revealed, of two middle-class Irishmen, Leopold Bloom and Stephen Dedalus, residents in Dublin. The work is marked in parts by eccentricities of form (economy of punctuation, ellipses of words, &c.), an utter frankness of language, and a realism that spares the reader neither the sordid nor the indecent. It has, however, been regarded by some intellectuals as the most important novel of modern times. It has been translated into French, German, and other languages.

Joyce's other principal works are: 'Dubliners' (short stories, 1914), 'Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man' (1916), 'Anna Livia Plurabelle' and 'Haveth Childers Everywhere', fragments from 'Work in Progress', the temporary title given to the work published in completed form in 1939 as 'Finnegans Wake' (all novels); 'Chamber Music' (poems, 1907).

JOYCE, PATRICK WESTON (1827-1914), was author of 'Irish Names of Places' (1869) and a 'Grammar of Irish' (1881), and contributed Irish folk-songs to Petrie's 'Ancient Music of Ireland'. He also wrote a 'Social History of Ireland' (1903), and his 'Old Celtic Romances' was the source from which Tennyson drew the subject of his 'Voyage of Maeldune'.

Joyous Gard, Launcelot's castle in the Arthurian legend. Malory says that 'some men say it was Anwick, and some men say it was Bamborow'. The latter is near Berwick-on-Tweed.

Juan, DON, see Don Juan.

Juan Fernandez, an island off the coast of Chile, discovered by Juan Fernandez, a Spaniard, about 1565. See Robinson Crusoe.

Juba, a character in Addison's 'Cato' (q.v.).

Jubal, a son of Lamech and Adah, and the 'father of all such as handle the harp and organ' (Gen. iv. 19-21). He is the subject of a poem by G. Eliot (1874).

Judas Iscariot (i.e. 'man of Kerioth' in Judaea), the disciple who betrayed Christ (Matt. xxvii. 14-15) for thirty pieces of silver. He repented, brought back the thirty pieces, and hanged himself (Matt. xxvii. 3). The legend that he is once a year, on Christmas eve, allowed to cool himself for a day on an iceberg is treated by M. Arnold (q.v.) in his 'Saint Brandan', and by Sebastian Evans (q.v.) in his 'Judas Iscariot's Paradise'.

Judas Maccabaeus (d. 160 B.C.), the third son of Mattathias the Hasmonean, and after the death of his father, leader of the Jews in their revolt against Antiochus Epiphanes (see Maccabees).

JUGGERNAUT

Jude the Obscure, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), reprinted in revised form from 'Harper's Magazine' in the 1895 edition of his 'Works'.

It is a story, in the author's words, 'of a deadly war waged with old Apostolic desperation between flesh and spirit', and tells how the intellectual aspirations of Jude Fawley, a South Wessex villager, are thwarted by a sensuous temperament, lack of character, and the play of circumstances. Early in life, while he is supporting his passion for learning by work as a stonemason, he is entangled in a love-affair with Arabella Donn, a 'mere female animal', and entrapped into marrying her. She presently deserts him and he resumes his studies, and aims at becoming a priest. But he falls in love with his cousin, Sue Bridehead, a vivacious intelligent young school-teacher. She marries an elderly schoolmaster, Phillotson. Though Jude tries to suppress his passion for Sue, he hovers about her, and presently Sue, driven by physical repulsion, leaves Phillotson and flies to Jude, and their guilty connexion debars Jude from hope of the priesthood. Though they become free to marry as a result of divorce from their respective spouses, Sue shrinks from this step. Social disapproval makes itself felt, and the couple go downhill. Their children perish by a tragic fate, and Sue in an agony of remorse and self-abasement returns to Phillotson. Jude takes to drink, is inveigled back by Arabella, and dies miserably. The horrors of his own creation in this, the last of his stories, perhaps turned Hardy away from novel-writing to poetry.

Judecca, see Giudecca.

Judith, the heroine of the book of the Apocrypha that bears her name, a widow of Bethulia who, when the army of Nebuchadnezzar was threatening her town, adventured herself in the camp and tent of Holofernes, the enemy general, and cut off his head. She figures in Lascelles Abercrombie's (q.v.) 'Emblems of Love'. The story was dramatized by E. A. Bennett (q.v.).

Judith, a fragment of 350 lines of a poem in Old English. It relates the deeds of Judith of the Apocrypha. The extant cantos, x, xi, and xii, describe the banquet in the Assyrian camp, the bringing of Judith to Holofernes' tent, the slaying of Holofernes, the escape of Judith, the attack on the Assyrians, and their flight.

Judy, a familiar pet-form of the name JUDITH, the name of the wife of Punch in the puppet-show 'Punch and Judy' (q.v.).

Juggernaut or JAGANNĀTH, in Hindu mythology, a title of Krishna, the eighth avatar of Vishnu; also specifically the uncouth idol of this deity at Puri in Orissa, annually dragged in procession on an enormous car, under the wheels of which many devotees are said formerly to have thrown themselves to be crushed. Hence JUGGERNAUT CAR is used of practices, institutions, &c., to which persons blindly sacrifice themselves. [OED.]

JULIA

Julia, a character in Shakespeare's "Two Gentlemen of Verona" (q.v.).

Julia de Roubigné, see Mackenzie (H.).

Julia, DONNA, in Byron's "Don Juan" (q.v.), a lady of Seville, whose love for the hero is the first incident in his career.

Julia Melville, a character in Sheridan's "The Rivals" (q.v.).

Julian and Maddalo, A Conversation, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), written on the occasion of his visit to Venice in 1818.

The poem takes the form of a conversation between Julian (the author) and Maddalo (Lord Byron) on the power of man over his mind, followed by a visit to a Venetian madhouse, where a maniac, whose mind has been unhinged by unfortunate love, recounts his story.

Julian the Apostate, Roman emperor A.D. 361-3, was brought up compulsorily as a Christian, and on attaining the throne proclaimed himself a pagan. He made a great effort to revive the worship of the old gods. He was killed in a valiant attack on the Persians near the Tigris. The story that he was murdered by a Christian and died exclaiming "Vicisti, Galilæe" ('Galilean, you have conquered') is unfounded.

JULIANA OF NORWICH (1343-1443), anchoress; she wrote "XVI Revelations of Divine Love", two manuscript copies of which are in the British Museum.

Julie, the heroine of the "Nouvelle Héloïse" of Rousseau (q.v.), loved by Saint-Preux.

Julie de Mortemar, the heroine of Bulwer Lytton's "Richelieu" (q.v.).

Juliet, the heroine of Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" (q.v.).

Julius Caesar, a Roman tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably produced in 1599, and printed in the 1623 folio. The plot is taken from North's translation of Plutarch's Lives, and deals with the events of the year 44 B.C., after Caesar, already endowed with the dictatorship, had returned to Rome from a successful campaign in Spain.

Distrust of Caesar's ambition gives rise to a conspiracy against him among Roman lovers of freedom, notably Cassius and Casca; they win over to their cause Brutus, who reluctantly joins them from a sense of duty to the republic. Caesar is slain by the conspirators in the Senate-house. Antony, Caesar's friend, stirs the people to fury against the conspirators by a skillful speech at Caesar's funeral. Octavius, nephew of Julius Caesar, Antony, and Lepidus, united as triumvirs, oppose the forces raised by Brutus and Cassius. The quarrel and reconciliation of Brutus and Cassius, with the news of the death of Portia, wife of Brutus, provide one of the finest scenes in the play. Brutus and Cassius are defeated at the battle of Philippi (42 B.C.), and kill themselves.

Jumping Frog of Calaveras County, The Celebrated, one of Mark Twain's (q.v.) most famous humorous stories.

Jungle, The, a novel by Upton Sinclair (q.v.), which exposed the life and evil practices of the Chicago stockyards, published in 1906. Its effect was so great that many Americans refused for a time to eat meat from Chicago, and an investigation of the yards was instituted by the U.S. government.

Jungle Book, The, and The Second Jungle Book, stories by Kipling (q.v.), published in 1894 and 1895 respectively, which tell how the child Mowgli was brought up by wolves and was taught by Baloo, the bear, and by Bagheera, the black panther, the law and business of the jungle.

JUNIUS, the pseudonym of the author of a series of letters that appeared in the "Public Advertiser" (q.v.) from 1769 to 1771, attacking with bitter scorn and invective, among others, the duke of Grafton, the duke of Bedford, Lord North, and Lord Mansfield in his judicial capacity, while George III is not spared the irony of the writer. Junius also takes an active part on behalf of Wilkes. Both before 1769 and after 1771 political letters under other pseudonyms, which have been traced to the same hand, appeared in the public press. In the former the writer attacks the ministry of Lord Chatham; in the latter he violently abuses Lord Barrington, secretary at war. Though personal invective is the chief weapon of Junius, his political arguments, written from the Whig standpoint, are shrewd and lucidly expressed. The identity of Junius, which he concealed with great skill, has never been definitely established; but there are strong reasons for attributing the letters to Sir Philip Francis (q.v.). Lord Temple has also been claimed as the author. An authorized edition of the "Letters of Junius" appeared in 1772.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, or DU JON, FRANÇOIS (1589-1677), philologist and antiquary, born at Heidelberg. He was librarian to Thomas Howard, second earl of Arundel, and tutor to his son, and a friend of Milton. He presented Anglo-Saxon manuscripts and philological collections to the Bodleian Library, and published "De Pictura Veterum" in 1637, an edition of Caedmon in 1655, and other works. His "Etymologicum Anglicanum" (first printed in 1743) was largely used by Dr. Johnson. He took an active interest in the Oxford University Press (q.v.) and presented it with materials for Gothic, Runic, Anglo-Saxon, and Roman printing.

Juno, see Hera.

Jupe, and his daughter Cissy, characters in Dickens's "Hard Times" (q.v.).

Jupiter, originally the elemental god of the Romans, came to be identified with the Greek

JUPITER

Zeus (q.v.), the myths concerning whom were transferred to Jupiter. The name signifies 'father of the bright heaven'.

Justified Sinner, Confessions of a, see Hogg (James).

Justinian I, emperor of Constantinople 527-65, famous for his successful wars (Belisarius, q.v., and Narses were his generals), and for the code of Roman law that he caused to be drawn up, known as the Corpus Juris Civilis, and consisting of (1) the Institutes (q.v.); (2) the Digesta or Pandects (opinions of jurists); (3) the Codex Justinianus; and (4) the Novellae (collection of ordinances). Famous also for building St. Sophia at Constantinople.

Jutes, a Low German tribe that invaded Great Britain (according to tradition under Hengist and Horsa, at the invitation of the Britons to help them against the Picts) in the 5th cent. Their connexion with Jutland is disputed.

Jutland, BATTLE OF, a naval engagement between the British Grand Fleet under Admiral Sir J. R. Jellicoe and the German High Seas Fleet under Admiral Reinhard Scheer, fought in the North Sea on 31 May 1916. Admiral Scheer had sent out Admiral Hipper with a scouting force with the idea of luring out the British Fleet, and himself followed with the High Seas Fleet. The British Fleet, which had received warning of extensive German operations, had put to sea on the evening of the 30th. The battle began with an engagement between the British battle-cruisers under Admiral Beatty and Hipper's force, in which the British ships suffered heavily. The main engagement followed, but the evening was so still and misty that the biggest ships were within (long-distance) range of each other for barely half an hour. Scheer avoided envelopment by the British fleet, refusing action, and manœuvring so as to return safely to his base. The British lost 3 battle-cruisers, 3 cruisers, and 8 torpedo craft; the Germans 1 battleship, 1 battle-cruiser, 4 light cruisers, and 5 torpedo craft. After this engagement the High Seas Fleet did not again put out to sea.

JUVENAL, Decimus Junius Juvenalis (c. A.D. 60-c. 130), the great Roman satirical poet, born probably at Aquinum. His extant works consist of sixteen satires, depicting contemporary society and denouncing its vices, which have served as models to many English poets.

'The English Juvenal' referred to by Scott ('Waverley') is Oldham (q.v.).

K

Kaaba, THE, in the ancient temple enclosure at Mecca, the 'Holy of Holies' of Islam, a roughly cubical, windowless, stone structure, 30-40 ft. in length, height, and breadth, said to have been erected by Abraham and Ishmael. In its SE. corner is the celebrated black stone, of which legend tells that it fell from Paradise with Adam and was given by the angel Gabriel to Abraham when he was building the Kaaba. It was originally white but became black from the kisses of sinful but believing lips.

Kabbalah, THE, see Cabbala.

Kabir, an Indian mystic, who lived at Benares in the 15th cent., and taught a monotheistic religion designed apparently to reconcile Hindus and Moslems.

Kaf or Kaff, in Mohammedan mythology, a mountain which encircles the earth, the abode of the Jinn (q.v.). A name also used to signify the Caucasus.

Kalkhoeru, see Khusrau I.

Kalkobad, known to history as Qubad I, the father of Khusrau I (q.v.), figures in the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.) as one of the descendants of Feridun, and king of Iran, who carries on the war with Afrasiab, king of Turan. He is mentioned in the 'Rubáiyát' of Omar Khayyám (q.v.).

Kallyal, a character in Southey's 'Curse of Kehama' (q.v.).

Kallyard School, from 'Kail-yard', a cabbage patch such as is commonly attached to a small cottage, a term applied to writers of a recent class of fiction describing, with much use of the vernacular, common life in Scotland, e.g. J. M. Barrie, 'Ian Maclaren', and S. R. Crockett.

KAISER, GEORG (1878-), German dramatist, author of 'Von Morgen bis Mitternacht', among many plays.

Kalends, see Calends.

Kalevala ('Land of Heroes'), the national epic poem of Finland, compiled from popular lays transmitted orally until the 19th cent., when a collection was published by Zacharias Topelius (1822). They were arranged in a connected form by Elias Lönnroth, who in 1835 published a version of 12,000 lines, and in 1849 a longer version of 23,000 lines, in alliterative eight-syllabled trochaic verse (the metre of 'Hiawatha'). The poem is concerned with the myths of Finland, centring in Wainamoinen, the god of music and poetry, his brother Ilmarinen the smith, who makes the magic mill (the Sampo), and the conflicts of the Finns with the Lapps. The myths are of great antiquity, perhaps dating, according to internal evidence, from the time when Finns and Hungarians were still one people.

The poem was translated into English by W. M. Crawford in 1887.

Kali, in Hindu mythology, a form of Durga, the bloodthirsty wife of Shiva, represented in idols with a black body, a necklace of human heads, and a protruding blood-stained tongue. She is worshipped in particular at Kalighat, near Calcutta, with bloody sacrifices.

KALIDASA, a great Indian poet and dramatist, best known by his play 'Sakuntala' (q.v.), of which we have a translation by Sir W. Jones (q.v.). Monier-Williams thinks that he lived at the beginning of the 3rd cent. A.D., but there is diversity of opinion on the point.

Kalmucks, a race of Mongol nomads, ranging from parts of China to south-eastern Russia, whose religion is a form of Buddhism.

Kalpa, in Hindu cosmology, a great age of the world, a thousand yugas (q.v.), 4,320,000,000 years, a day of Brahma.

Kama or KAMADEVA, in Hindu mythology, the god of love, the Indian Cupid, represented as riding on a sparrow and armed with bow and arrows. His wife is Rati (pleasure).

KAMES, LORD, see Homo (H.).

Kanaka, a word meaning 'man', a native of the South Sea Islands, especially one employed in Queensland on the sugar plantations.

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724-1804), second son of a leather-worker of Königsberg in Prussia (of Scottish descent), was educated at the university of that town, and supported himself as a tutor. He published his first considerable work, 'A General Natural History and Theory of the Heavens', in 1755, and in that year became a lecturer at Königsberg, an unsalaried post in which he remained for fifteen years, during which he published a number of minor philosophical treatises. In 1770 he became professor of logic and metaphysics at Königsberg, retaining the appointment until his death. He remained unmarried. His 'Critique of Pure Reason' appeared in 1781, 'Prolegomena to every future Metaphysic of Ethic' in 1783, 'Foundation for the Metaphysic of Ethic' in 1785, 'Metaphysical Rudiments of Natural Philosophy' in 1786, the second edition of the 'Critique of Pure Reason' in 1787, the 'Critique of Practical Reason' in 1788, and the 'Critique of Judgement' in 1790. His 'Religion within the Boundaries of Pure Reason' (1793) called down on him the censure of the government.

The following are some of the leading ideas of Kant's philosophy. Knowledge is the outcome of two factors, the senses and the understanding. Sensations are the starting-point of knowledge. Space and time are essential conditions of our sensuous perception, the forms under which our sensations are translated into consciousness. Therefore knowledge has space and time for its essential conditions. Nor have space and time any existence except as forms of our consciousness. These forms, continuous and infinite, provide the possibility of unifying our individual perceptions, and the unification is effected by the understanding. This act of synthesis Kant analyses into twelve principles or 'categories', or laws of thought. The categories are to the understanding very much what time and space are to the consciousness. They include such notions as quality, quantity, and, notably, causation. The external world is thus the product of sensations conditioned by the forms of consciousness and linked by thought according to its own laws. It consists of appearances, 'phenomena'; but the causes of these appearances, 'noumena', things in themselves, lie beyond the limits of knowledge, nor can we, by the aid of reason alone, apart from appearances, arrive at absolute truth, for reason leads to certain insoluble contradictions, or 'antinomies', such as the impossibility of conceiving either limited or unlimited space.

But where metaphysics fail us, practical reason comes to our aid. The moral consciousness assents to certain 'categorical imperatives', such as 'do not lie'. From this follow the conviction that man is in a certain sense free, the belief in immortality (because self-realization within any finite period is impossible), and the belief in God. We are driven by the nature of our minds to see design in nature, and man as the centre of that design; and a 'good will', 'a habitual controlling consciousness of membership in an ideal community of rational beings' [Wallace], is that alone by which man's existence can have an absolute value. Though the advantages resulting from the obedience to particular moral laws can be shown, the moral obligation itself is a categorical imperative, something that we feel but cannot explain. Interpreted as a practical rule of conduct, the moral law bids you 'act as if the principle by which you act were about to be turned into a universal law of nature', and do all in your power to promote the highest good of all human beings. This highest good is not realizable unless the course of the world is itself guided by moral law, that is to say by a moral Master of the universe, whose existence we are driven to assume. But metaphysics places religion and morality outside the province of knowledge, and in the region of faith.

Kant's philosophy was developed and profoundly modified by Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel (q.v.). The above summary is based, in the main, on Prof. W. Wallace's little book on Kant (Blackwood, 1882). Other notable expositions of Kant's philosophy have been Prof. Edward Caird's 'Philosophy of Kant' (1868) and 'The Critical Philosophy of Immanuel Kant' (1889).

Karma, in Buddhism, the sum of a person's actions in one of his successive states of existence, regarded as determining his fate in the next; hence necessary fate or destiny. [OED.]

Karmathians, a Shia sect of Mohammedans in Eastern Arabia founded in the 9th cent., 'pantheistic in theory and socialist in practice' [E.B.], called after Karmat, their founder.

Karttikeya, see Skanda.

Kastril, one of the characters in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

Kate, CRAZY, see Crazy Kate.

Kate Barlass, see King's Tragedy.

Katharina, a character in Shakespeare's 'The Taming of the Shrew' (q.v.).

Katharine of Aragon, QUEEN, the wife of Henry VIII, whose divorce is one of the principal incidents in Shakespeare's 'Henry VIII'.

Katharine, (1) a character in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.); (2) in his 'Henry V' (q.v.), the daughter of the king of France.

Katinka, in Byron's 'Don Juan' (canto vi), one of the beauties of the harem.

Katmer, KRATIM, or KRATIMER, the dog of the Seven Sleepers (q.v.), in the Mohammedan version of the tale. Sale says that the Mohammedans have great respect for this dog, allow him a place in Paradise, and write his name on their letters which go far or cross the sea, as a kind of talisman to prevent them from miscarriage.

Katterfelto, GUSTAVUS, a quack, notorious in the latter part of the 18th cent. He appeared in London during the influenza epidemic of 1782, exhibiting 'philosophical apparatus' in Spring Gardens, and giving microscopic and magnetic demonstrations. He was the subject of a novel by Whyte-Melville (q.v., 1875).

KAVANAGH, JULIA (1824-77), author of a number of tales of French life, notable for their faithful rendering of French character. Her 'Natalie' appeared in 1851, 'Adèle' in 1858, 'French Women of Letters' in 1861, 'English Women of Letters' in 1862.

Kay, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (q.v.), King Arthur's seneschal, a brave but disagreeable, spiteful knight. He was son of Sir Ector (q.v.). He figures in the Modena sculpture (see Gawain).

Kean, CHARLES JOHN (1811?-68), actor, second son of Edmund Kean (q.v.), educated at Eton, appeared in 1827 as Young Norval, in 'Douglas', and subsequently sustained many parts, but excelled only as Hamlet and Louis XI.

Kean, EDMUND (1789-1833), the son of an itinerant actress, deserted by his mother, was an unrivalled tragic actor. After an adventurous boyhood and the performance of subordinate parts, he made a triumphant appearance in 1814 as Shylock. His numerous successes included Richard III, Hamlet, Othello, Iago, Macbeth, and Lear.

KEBLE

Kearney, CAPTAIN, a character in Marryat's 'Peter Simple' (q.v.).

KEATS, JOHN (1795-1821), the son of a livery-stable keeper in Moorfields, London, acquired a knowledge of Latin and history, and some French, but no Greek. He was apprenticed to an apothecary, but his indentures were cancelled that he might qualify for a surgeon. He passed his examinations, but abandoned surgery owing to his passion for literature. He became intimate with Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt, who printed a sonnet for him in the 'Examiner' in May 1816, and in whose house he met Shelley. His sonnet on Chapman's 'Homer' was printed in the 'Examiner' in December 1816. With the help of Shelley he published in 1817 'Poems by John Keats', which were financially a failure. They include 'Sleep and Poetry', an expression of the author's own poetic aspirations. In the course of 1818 Keats wrote 'Endymion' (q.v.), which was savagely criticized in 'Blackwood's Magazine' and the 'Quarterly'; and commenced 'Hyperion' (q.v.). In the same year he nursed his brother Tom until his death. He began 'The Eve of St. Agnes' (q.v.) early in 1819, and wrote 'La Belle Dame sans Merci' (q.v.) and the unfinished 'Eve of St. Mark', another poem on a young girl and the legend of a saint's day. About the same time he wrote his great odes 'On a Grecian Urn', 'To a Nightingale', and 'To Autumn'; and those 'On Melancholy', 'On Indolence', and 'To Psyche'. His dramatic experiments, 'Otho the Great' and 'King Stephen', also belong to 1819, and a little after them the burlesque poem 'Cap and Bells'. He had meanwhile fallen deeply in love with Fanny Brawne. His 'Lamia' (q.v.) and other Poems, including 'The Eve of St. Agnes' and 'Isabella, or the Pot of Basil' (q.v.), appeared in 1820 and was praised by Jeffrey (q.v.) in the 'Edinburgh Review'. Keats was by now seriously ill with consumption. He sailed for Italy in September 1820, reached Rome in November, and died there, desiring that there should be engraved on his tomb the words, 'Here lies one whose name was writ in water'. He was lamented by Shelley in 'Adonais' (q.v.). Of Keats's letters, which throw a valuable light on his poetical development, there have been several editions; the most complete is that of M. B. Forman, 1935.

KEBLE, JOHN (1792-1866), educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, became fellow and tutor of Oriel College (where Newman and Pusey were also fellows), and professor of poetry at Oxford. By his sermon on national apostasy in 1833 he initiated the Oxford Movement (q.v.), which he also supported by seven of the 'Tracts for the Times' (q.v.), by his translation of Irenaeus, and by his 'Life' and 'Works' of Bishop Thomas Wilson. He also edited Hooker's works (1836) and helped Newman with R. H. Froude's 'Remains'. Keble was eminent as a writer of sacred verse. His poetical work is contained in 'The Christian Year' (1827), which obtained immense popularity, 'Lyra Innocentium' (1846), and 'Miscellaneous Poems' (1869). His Latin 'Praelections' as professor of poetry, 'De Poeticae Vi Medica' (1844), have been translated by E. K. Francis (1912).

Keble College, Oxford, was founded in 1870 as a memorial to John Keble.

Kedar, a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13), whose reputed descendants were a tribe of nomadic Arabs. 'Woe is me, that I am constrained . . . to have my habitation among the tents of Kedar' is in Ps. cxx. 4 (Prayer Book version).

Kehama, The Curse of, see Curse of Kehama.

Kells, Book of, an illuminated manuscript of the four gospels (together with local records), traditionally ascribed to Columba's (q.v.) own hand, but probably dating from the 8th cent., the finest specimen in existence of Irish illuminated art. It was discovered, after having for long been lost, by James Ussher (q.v.), and bequeathed by him to Trinity College, Dublin. Kells, in County Meath, was the seat of a bishopric founded in the 9th cent., succeeding, according to tradition, an earlier monastery founded by Columba; it became a noted home of learning.

Kelly, a name applied to the series of directories published by Kelly's Directories Ltd. and including Kelly's Post Office London Directory, the county, town, and trades directories, and the Handbook to the titled, landed, and official classes. The Post Office directory was first published in 1799.

KELLY, HUGH (1739-77), an Irishman who came to London in 1760, edited the 'Court Magazine' and the 'Ladies' Museum', and afterwards the 'Public Ledger'. He wrote three comedies, 'False Delicacy' (produced by Garrick in 1768), 'A Word for the Wise' (1770), and 'The School for Wives' (1773).

Kelmscott Press, see Morris (W.).

Kelpie or KELPY, the Lowland Scottish name of a fabled water-spirit or demon assuming various shapes, but usually that of a horse; it is reputed to haunt lakes and rivers and to delight in, or even to bring about, the drowning of travellers and others. [OED.]

KELVIN, LORD, see Thomson (Sir W.).

Kemble, CHARLES (1775-1854), an actor of great range and pre-eminent in comic parts, younger brother of John Philip Kemble and Mrs. Siddons (qq.v.). Among the characters he impersonated were Charles Surface, Falstaff, Mercutio, Macbeth, and Romeo. He was the father of Fanny Kemble and John Mitchell Kemble (qq.v.).

KEMBLE, FRANCES ANNE, afterwards MRS. BUTLER, generally known as FANNY KEMBLE (1809-93), daughter of Charles Kemble (q.v.), an actress who appeared with great success as Juliet to her father's Mercutio, and subsequently as Lady Macbeth, Portia,

KEN

Beatrice, Queen Katharine, and in many other parts. She published a volume of 'Poems' in 1844, and 'Records of Later Life' (1882). She gave Shakespearian readings on which Longfellow wrote a sonnet. An appreciation of her may be found in Henry James's 'Essays in London'.

KEMBLE, JOHN MITCHELL (1807-57), elder son of Charles Kemble (q.v.), historian and philologist, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was a pupil and friend of Jacob Grimm (q.v.). He edited the poems of Beowulf (1833-7) and did good work on the early history of England: 'Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici' (1839-48), 'The Saxons in England' (1849, ed. Birch 1876). He also issued a collection of 'State Papers' illustrating the period 1688-1714 (1857).

Kemble, JOHN PHILIP (1757-1823), an eminent actor, elder brother of Charles Kemble and Mrs. Siddons (q.v.), played with great success a large number of parts, beginning with Hamlet, and including Iago, Romeo, Prospero, Petruchio, and Wolsey.

Kemp, WILLIAM (fl. 1600), a comic actor and dancer, who acted in plays by Shakespeare and Jonson. He danced a morris-dance from London to Norwich, of which an account, 'Kemps Nine Daies Wonder', written by himself (1600), has been twice reprinted.

Kemp Owyne, an old ballad in Child's collection, from an Icelandic source. Isabel, who has been transformed into a monster by a wicked stepmother, is released from the enchantment by three kisses of her lover, Kemp Owyne. In modern versions of the ballad he is 'Kempion'.

KEMPE, MARGERY (b. c. 1373), a mystic, daughter of John Brunham of Lynn, married John Kempe, also of Lynn, c. 1393. 'The Book of Margery Kempe' (which she dictated, being illiterate) is a narrative of her spiritual history, in the course of which she undertook extensive travels (to Italy, Jerusalem, Compostella, and Germany). The only extant manuscript (which is not the original one) of the work dates probably from the middle of the 15th cent. Extracts from it were printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1501. It has been published by the E.E.T.S. (1940).

Kempenfelt, RICHARD (1718-82), the son of a Swede in the service of James II, served as naval officer, and was present at a number of actions in the West and East Indies, rising to be rear-admiral. He was flying his flag on the Royal George when this ship went down at Spithead, as commemorated in Cowper's poem.

KEMPIS, THOMAS A, see Thomas à Kempis.

KEN, THOMAS (1637-1711), fellow of Winchester and New College, Oxford, became bishop of Bath and Wells. He was a writer of devotional prose and verse; his works include 'Ichabod' (1663), the 'Practice of Divine Love (1685-6), a 'Manual of Prayers for Winchester Scholars' (1695), and some well-known hymns. His works were collected by W. Hawkins in 1721.

KENDALL, HENRY CLARENCE (1841-82), Australian poet, published several volumes of verse, of which the most notable are: 'Poems and Songs' (1862), 'Leaves from Australian Forests' (1869), and 'Songs from the Mountains' (1880).

Kenelm Chillingly, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1873.

The work contains, in the opinions and doings of the hero, a good deal of the author's criticism on contemporary society. Kenelm Chillingly, a young man of good family, generous and high-minded, but cynical and disgusted with the shams by which he feels himself surrounded, and in his own estimation a woman-hater, goes out into the world, a sort of knight-errant in humble garb, to seek adventures. By his strength and pugilistic skill he knocks out the ferocious farrier Tom Bowles, who is pressing distasteful attentions on a village maiden; unites the latter to her cripple lover; and awakens the latent nobility in Tom Bowles's character. In accordance with his views on women, he refuses to be led into a marriage with the amiable Cecilia Travers, but presently finds himself desperately in love with Lily, a young girl of natural charm, but uneducated and the daughter of a felon. Lily, though devoted to him, is forced by a sense of gratitude to promise her hand to the guardian who has protected her in childhood, but, broken-hearted, dies before her marriage. After an interval, Kenelm, who has now experienced the love and sorrow of romance, decides to turn his thoughts to practical life and to become 'a soldier in the ranks', in the service of some honoured cause.

Kenilworth, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1821.

The novel is based on the tradition of the tragic fate, in the reign of Elizabeth, of the beautiful Amy Robsart, daughter of Sir Hugh Robsart of Devon. She has been enticed, by the designs of the villainous Richard Varney, into a secret marriage with his patron, the earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's favourite, rejecting the suit of the worthy Edmund Tressilian, a Cornish gentleman and an adherent of Leicester's rival, the earl of Sussex. This marriage Leicester is forced to conceal, on pain of incurring the displeasure of the jealous queen. Amy is accordingly mewed up in Cumnor Place, an old country house near Oxford, and is believed by Tressilian to be living there as the paramour of Varney, Leicester's connexion with her not being suspected. Tressilian, after vainly attempting to induce her to return to her father, lays before the queen a charge of seduction against Varney, who, to shield Leicester, declares Amy to be his wife. Elizabeth thereupon orders that Amy shall appear before her at Kenilworth, whither the queen is shortly going as the guest of Leicester. Varney, who has evil designs on Amy, persuades Leicester, in order to prevent the discovery of the true facts, to direct Amy to present herself at Kenilworth in the character of Varney's wife. Amy, indignant at the order, goes secretly to Kenilworth, aided by Tressilian, determined to demand recognition as Leicester's countess. She obtains admission to the castle, and in an interview with Leicester, persuades him to acknowledge her openly; which he does, thereby calling down on himself the furious anger of the queen. But Varney, by misrepresenting the relations of Amy and Tressilian, now induces Leicester to believe her guilty of infidelity to him. In a passion Leicester orders Varney to remove Amy to Cumnor Place and to kill her. The true facts are revealed too late, and Tressilian arrives at Cumnor Place only to find that Amy, by Varney's machinations, has fallen through a trap-door and perished.

Among the many interesting features in the novel are the glimpses of the court of Elizabeth, where the young Walter Raleigh is just coming into favour; the description of the revels at Kenilworth; and the adaptation of the legend of Wayland Smith (q.v.), the skilful farrier and physician, who aids Tressilian in his attempts to recover the unfortunate Amy. Dickie Sludge, or Flibbertigibbet, the impish friend of Wayland Smith, also deserves mention.

KENNEDY, JOHN PENDLETON (1795-1870), American author and statesman, born at Baltimore, Maryland; his writing was much influenced by Washington Irving, whose friend and admirer he was. His best-known books are 'Swallow Barn' (1832), a kind of Virginia 'Bracebridge Hall'; and 'Horse-Shoe Robinson' (1835), a tale of the American Revolution, laid in the Carolinas.

KENNEDY, MARGARET, novelist, author of 'The Constant Nymph' (1924) and its sequel, 'The Fool of the Family' (1930).

KENNEDY, WALTER (1460?-1508?), Scottish poet, the rival of William Dunbar (q.v.), in 'The Flying of Dunbar and Kennedie' (1508), of whom only a few, not very interesting, poems survive.

Kenneth, Sir, or the Knight of the Leopard, the hero of Scott's 'The Talisman' (q.v.).

Kensington Gardens, originally the gardens of Kensington Palace (q.v.), thrown open to the public in the 18th cent. They were the subject of a poem by Tickell (q.v.), published in 1722, in which he imagines the gardens, recently laid out, as peopled by Oberon and his fairies, and the scene of many adventures. Cf. also 'Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens', by Sir J. M. Barrie (q.v.).

Kentigern, St., or St. MUNGO (518?–603), a grandson of Loth, a British prince, after whom the Lothians are named. St Kentigern was brought up in the monastic school of Culross under the discipline of St. Serf, from whom he received the name of MUNGO (Celtic for 'my dear one'). He became a missionary and was chosen bishop for the Strathclyde Britons, whose centre was Cathures (now Glasgow). He was driven by persecution to Wales, and is said to have stayed on his way to convert the inhabitants of Cumberland. In Wales he founded the monastery of Llanellwy (afterwards St. Asaph's). He was recalled to Strathclyde, and after reclaiming the Picts of Galloway from idolatry, settled at Glasgow, and was buried in the crypt of Glasgow Cathedral, called after him St. Mungo's. He is commemorated on 13 Jan. Some of his miracles, including the resuscitation of St. Serf's favourite robin-redbreast and of a meritorious cook, are celebrated in a canticle formerly sung as part of his office (quoted by J. H. Burton, 'The Book-hunter'):

Garrit ales pernacatus,
Cocus est resuscitatus,
Salit vervec trucidatus

It was captured by the troops of the Mahdi in 1885, after a gallant defence by General Gordon (q.v.). It was reconquered by the British in 1898.

Khorassan, The Veiled Prophet of, one of the tales in Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.).

Khusrau I (CHOSROES, KAIKHOSRU), king of Iran, A.D. 531–79, who took the name of ANU-SHIRVAN, and extended the Persian dominions from the Indus to the Red Sea. Within them, during his reign, Mohammed was born. He caused a number of Sanskrit, Greek, and Latin works to be translated into Persian, including the book known as 'Kalila and Dimna', containing the fables of Bidpai (q.v.). Under the name of Kaikhosru he is mentioned in the 'Rubáiyát' of Omar Khayyám (q.v.).

Kiblah, the point (the temple at Mecca) towards which Mohammedans turn at prayer.

KID, THOMAS, see Kyd.

Kidd, WILLIAM (d. 1701), pirate; lived at Boston, Massachusetts; captain of the 'Adventure' privateer; imprisoned for piracy, 1699; sent to England under arrest, 1700; hanged, 1701.

Kidnapped and Catriona (Gaelic for Catherine and pronounced Catree'na), a novel and its sequel by R. L. Stevenson (q.v.), published in 1886 and 1893.

The central incident in the story is the murder of Colin Campbell, the 'Red Fox' of Glenure, the king's factor on the forfeited estate of Ardsziel. This is an historical event. The young David Balfour, whose uncle Ebenezer unlawfully detains his estate, being left in poverty on the death of his father, goes to Ebenezer for assistance. Ebenezer, a miserly old villain, having failed to effect the death of David, has him kidnapped on a ship to be carried off to the Carolinas. On the voyage Alan Breck is picked up from a sinking boat. He is 'one of those honest gentlemen that were in trouble about the years forty-five and six', a Jacobite who 'wearies for the heather and the deer'. The ship is wrecked on the coast of Mull, and David and Alan journey together. They are witnesses of the murder of Colin Campbell, and suspicion falls on them. After a perilous journey across the Highlands, they escape across the Forth, and the first novel ends with the discomfiture of Ebenezer and David's recovery of his rights.

'Catriona' is principally occupied with the unsuccessful attempt of David Balfour to secure, at the risk of his own life and freedom, the acquittal of James Stewart of the Glens, who is falsely accused, from political motives, of the murder of Colin Campbell; with the escape of Alan Breck to the Continent; and with David's love-affair with Catriona Drummond, the daughter of the renegade James More.

Kilhwch (or Kulhwch) and Olwen, one of the stories included in Lady C. Guest's translation of the 'Mabinogion' (q.v.). Besides being an excellent fairy-tale, the work is important for its reference to King Arthur (q.v.). Lady C. Guest's translation is from the text in the 'Red Book of Hergest' (q.v.); but the story is assigned to the 10th cent. And its author, as Matthew Arnold pointed out, is dealing with materials taken from a far older architecture.

Kilhwch (pron. 'Keelhookh') is doomed to have no wife at all unless he can secure Olwen, daughter of Hawthorn, chief of the giants (Yspaddadu Penkawr). He goes to Arthur, who is his cousin, for assistance in his attempt to secure the lady. Arthur orders Kay and Bedivere and Gawain (Gwalchmei), and other knights to attend him, and they visit Hawthorn, who demands an exorbitant brideprice for his daughter, in the shape of thirteen 'treasures' involving almost impossible quests. These are successfully achieved by the various members of the party. There is a great catalogue of the members of Arthur's court, interlarded with amusing notes on their peculiarities.

Kilkenny Cats, To FIGHT LIKE. According to 'N. and Q.', III Series, v. 433, the origin of the allusion is as follows: During the rebellion of 1798 (or it may be of 1803) Kilkenny was garrisoned by a regiment of Hessian soldiers whose custom it was to tie together two cats by their tails and throw them across a clothes-line. The cats naturally fought until one or both died. The officers, apprised of these acts of cruelty, resolved to stop them and made inspections for the purpose. On one occasion an officer was heard approaching while a pair of cats were fighting. One of the troopers with a sword cut their tails and the cats escaped. The presence of the cats' tails on the line was explained to the officer by the statement that two cats had been fighting so desperately that they had devoured each other, with the exception of their tails.

KILLIGREW, HENRY (1613-1700), brother of T. Killigrew (q.v.), the elder, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, master of the Savoy in 1663, was the author of one play, 'The Conspiracy', published in 1638, and re-written as 'Pallantus and Eudora' in 1653. He was the father of Anne Killigrew (1660-85; see Dryden).

Killigrew, Mrs. Anne, Ode to the Memory of, see Dryden.

KILLIGREW, THOMAS, the elder (1612-83), was page to Charles I, and groom of the bedchamber and a favourite companion of Charles II. He built a playhouse on the site of the present Drury Lane Theatre, London, in 1663, and was master of the revels in 1679. His most popular play, 'The Parson's Wedding', a comedy whose coarseness is not redeemed by any notable wit or humour, was played between 1637 and 1642, and printed in 1664. Among his other plays are 'The Prisoners', 'Claracilla', and 'The Princess', romantic tragi-comedies, acted before the closing of the theatres. His 'Cecilia and Clorinda', a tragi-comedy, the subject of which is partly taken from 'Le Grand Cyrus', is of later date.

KILLIGREW, THOMAS, the younger (1657-1719), son of T. Killigrew the elder (q.v.), and gentleman of the bedchamber to George II when Prince of Wales. He was author of 'Chit Chat', a comedy, acted in 1719.

KILLIGREW, SIR WILLIAM (1606?-1695), brother of T. Killigrew the elder (q.v.), and author of 'Selindra', 'Ormasdes, or Love and Friendship', tragi-comedies, and 'Pandora', a comedy, published in 1664; and of 'The Siege of Urbin', a tragi-comedy, said to be a pleasant play, published in 1666.

KILLIGREW

'Pandora' and 'Selindra' were acted, and there is reason to think [T.L.S. 18 Oct. 1928] that 'The Siege of Urbin' was also acted.

Killing No Murder, a pamphlet advocating the assassination of Oliver Cromwell, printed in Holland in 1657, when it was believed that Cromwell would accept the crown. It was written by Edward Sexby (d. 1658), who had been one of Cromwell's troopers, and revised by Capt. Silas Titus. The name on the title-page, however, is that of William Allen, who had also been one of Cromwell's Ironsides.

Kilmeny, the subject of the thirteenth bard's song in 'The Queen's Wake' of James Hogg (q.v.), and Hogg's chief title to fame as a poet. Kilmeny goes up the glen to hear the birds sing and to pluck berries, does not return, and is mourned for dead. At last she comes back. She has been carried away from the snares of men to the land of spirits, of glory and light, whence she has had a vision of the world below, and of war and sin. She has asked to return to tell her friends what she has seen, and comes transformed and sanctified, with a mysterious influence on all about her; but after a month disappears and passes again to the land of thought.

Kim, a novel by Kipling (q.v.), published in 1901.

Kim, by his proper name Kimball O'Hara, the orphaned son of a sergeant in an Irish regiment, spends his childhood as a vagabond in Lahore, until he meets an old lama from Tibet, and accompanies him in his travels. He falls into the hands of his father's old regiment, is adopted, and sent to school, resuming his wanderings in his holidays. The colonel remarks his aptitude for secret service, and on this he embarks under the direction of the native agent, Hurree Babu. While still a lad he distinguishes himself by capturing the papers of a couple of Russian spies in the Himalayas. The book presents a vivid picture of India, its teeming populations, religions and superstitions, and the life of the bazaars and the road.

KING HORN

KING, WILLIAM (1650-1729), archbishop of Dublin, author of 'State of the Protestants in Ireland under the late King James's Government' (1691) and 'De Origine Mali' (1702).

KING, WILLIAM (1663-1712), educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, an advocate at Doctors' Commons, the holder of various minor posts in England and Ireland, and a clever and amusing writer. His 'Dialogue concerning the way to Modern Preferment' was published in 1690, and his 'Dialogues of the Dead', in which (with Charles Boyle) he joined in the attack on Bentley (see Battle of the Books), in 1699. He wrote a number of other burlesques and light pieces, some of the best of which are included in 'Miscellanies in Prose and Verse', dedicated to the members of the Beef-Steak Club (q.v.), 1709, and 'Useful Miscellanies' (1712). His 'Art of Cookery, in imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry' was published in 1708, and his 'Useful Transactions in Philosophy', a skit on Sloane's 'Philosophical Transactions', in 1709.

King and no King, A, a romantic drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (see Fletcher, J.), acted in 1611, printed 1619.

Arbaces, king of Iberia, defeats Tigranes, king of Armenia, in single combat, thus bringing to an end a long war. Arbaces offers his prisoner freedom if he will marry his sister Panthea, who has grown up to womanhood during his long absence. Tigranes loves Spaconia, an Armenian lady, declines the offer, and sends Spaconia to engage Panthea to oppose the match. But when Tigranes, Arbaces, and Panthea meet, not only is Tigranes shaken in his fidelity by the sight of Panthea's beauty, but Arbaces is smitten with a guilty passion for her, which he in vain endeavours to check. An interview with Panthea reveals that she shares his love. Gobrias, who has been Lord Protector of the kingdom since the late king's death, now confesses that Arbaces is his son, adopted secretly by the queen-mother and passed off as her son when she despaired of issue, Panthea being born six years later. Panthea is thus queen of Iberia, Arbaces is unrelated to her, and the lovers can be united. Tigranes, repenting his infidelity, takes Spaconia as his queen, and is released from captivity. Bessus, a cowardly braggart captain in Arbaces' army, provides comic relief.

King Horn, the earliest of the extant English verse romances, dating from the late 13th cent. and containing some 1,500 lines. Horn is a beautiful child, the son of King Murray and Queen Godhild of Suddene (Isle of Man). A host of invading Saracens slay the inhabitants, including the king. Horn's beauty saves him from the sword, and he is turned adrift in a boat with his companions, Athulf and Fikenhild. They reach the coast of Westernesse, where King Almair's daughter, Rymenhild, falls in love with Horn. The steward Athelbrus brings Athulf to her chamber in place of Horn, to the indignation of the princess when she discovers the trick. Fikenhild betrays the lovers to the king. Horn is banished and goes to Ireland, and enters the service of the king under the name of Cutberd. He slays the champion of the Saracens, who are attacking the country. The king offers his realm and daughter to Horn, who postpones acceptance. Meanwhile Rymenhild sends word that she is sought in marriage by a powerful suitor. Horn arrives disguised as a palmer and makes himself known to Rymenhild by means of the ring she had given him. With the help of Athulf he slays the rival suitor. He now reveals his birth to the king, and returns to Suddene to recover his kingdom, leaving Rymenhild with her father. He presently learns that Rymenhild is wedded to Fikenhild. Disguised as a harper he makes his way into the castle and slays Fikenhild, thereafter living happily with Rymenhild in Suddene.

King John, a historical play by Shakespeare (q.v.), adapted by him before 1598 from an earlier work, 'The Troublesome Raigne of King John', and not printed until the folio of 1623.

The play, with some departures from historical accuracy, deals with various events in King John's reign, and principally with the tragedy of young Arthur. It ends with the death of John at Swinstead abbey. It is significant that no mention of Magna Carta appears in it. The tragic quality of the play, the poignant grief of Constance, Arthur's mother, and the political complications depicted, are relieved by the wit, humour, and gallantry of the Bastard of Faulconbridge.

King John, an historical drama (c. 1547) by Bale (q.v.).

King Lear, a tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), was performed in 1606 and two slightly different versions of it were printed in 1608. For the origin of the name 'Lear' see Llyr. The story of Lear and his daughters is given by Geoffrey of Monmouth and by Holinshed. 'King Lear' resembles in certain respects an older play 'Leir', which had been 'lately acted' in 1605.

Lear, king of Britain, a petulant and unwise old man, has three daughters: Goneril, wife of the duke of Albany; Regan, wife of the duke of Cornwall; and Cordelia, for whom the king of France and duke of Burgundy are suitors. Intending to divide his kingdom among his daughters according to their affection for him, he bids them say which loves him most. Goneril and Regan make profession of extreme affection, and each receives one-third of the kingdom. Cordelia, self-willed, and disgusted with their hollow flattery, says she loves him according to her duty, not more nor less. Infuriated with this reply, Lear divides her portion between his other daughters, with the condition that himself with a hundred knights shall be maintained by each daughter in turn. Burgundy withdraws his suit for Cordelia, and the king of France accepts her without dowry. The earl of Kent, taking her part, is banished. Goneril and Regan reveal their heartless character by grudging their father the maintenance that he had stipulated for, and finally turning him out of doors in a storm. The earl of Gloucester shows pity for the old king, and is suspected of complicity with the French, who have landed in England. His eyes are put out by Cornwall, who receives a death-wound in the affray. Gloucester's son Edgar, who has been traduced to his father by his bastard brother Edmund, takes the disguise of a lunatic beggar, and tends his father till the latter's death. Lear, whom rage and ill-treatment have deprived of his wits, is conveyed to Dover by the faithful Kent in disguise, where Cordelia receives him. Meanwhile Goneril and Regan have both turned their affections to Edmund. Embittered by this rivalry, Goneril poisons Regan, and takes her own life. The English forces under Edmund and Albany defeat the French, and Lear and Cordelia are imprisoned; by Edmund's order Cordelia is hanged, and Lear dies from grief. The treachery of Edmund is proved on him by his brother Edgar. Albany, who has not abetted Goneril in her cruel treatment of Lear, takes over the kingdom.

Kingis Quair, The, a poem of some 200 stanzas, in rhyme-royal, by James I of Scotland (q.v.), written in 1423 and 1424 while he was a prisoner in England and about the time of his marriage with Lady Jane Beaufort, the heroine of the poem. It was discovered and printed by Lord Woodhouselee in 1783. The poem shows the influence of Chaucer. The royal prisoner, lamenting his fortune, sees a beautiful lady walking in the garden below, and is smitten with love. He visits the Empire of Venus and the Palace of Minerva, goddess of Wisdom, has speech with the goddess of Fortune, and finally receives a message from Venus promising the success of his suit. Rossetti quotes from the poem in 'The King's Tragedy' (q.v.). There is an important article on it by Sir W. A. Craigie in 'Essays and Studies by members of the English Association', vol. xxv.

The word 'Quair' means 'quire' or 'book'.

KINGLAKE

KINGLAKE, ALEXANDER WILLIAM (1809–91), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, published in 1844 'Eöthen', a charming narrative of his travels in the Near East. Having followed the British expedition to the Crimea, Kinglake undertook, at the request of Lady Raglan, the history of the Crimean War to the death of Lord Raglan. The first two volumes of this long and exhaustive work appeared in 1863, and the remaining six volumes at intervals down to 1887.

King-maker, THE, Richard Neville, earl of Warwick (1428–71), so named for his influence on the fortunes of Henry VI and Edward IV.

King's Bench, THE, the King's Bench division of the High Court of Justice. 'Bench' in this expression is the seat where judges sit in court; hence the place where justice is administered. The COURT OF KING'S BENCH was originally that in which the sovereign presided, and which followed him in his movements.

King's Bench Prison, a jail in Southwark which was appropriated to debtors and criminals confined by order of the supreme courts. It is mentioned by Stow as of unknown antiquity. The RULES OF THE KING'S BENCH were a defined area outside the prison within which certain prisoners, especially debtors, could live on giving security.

King's College, Cambridge, founded in 1441 by Henry VI and completed by Henry VII and Henry VIII. Its great Chapel is famous as a fine example of ornate Perpendicular. Giles Fletcher, Sir W. Temple, E. Waller, and Horace Walpole (qq.v.) were educated at this college.

King's Evil, or THE EVIL, scrofula, which the king was popularly supposed to be able to cure by touching the diseased person. Anne was the last sovereign who 'touched' for it.

King's Friends, THE, the so-called 'corrupt' members of parliament who under the administrations of Lord Bute and Lord North voted subserviently as George III required, in expectation of offices, pensions, and honours. So named in allusion to 1 Maccabees ii. 18.

King's Printer, the printer of royal proclamations, &c., appointed under royal patent. The earliest known patent was granted to Thomas Berthelet (or Bartlet) in 1530. At the present day the controller of the Stationery Office (under Letters Patent) is the King's Printer of Acts of Parliament, and in him is vested the copyright in all government publications. Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode are also termed the King's Printers; their privilege is the printing of the Bible and Prayer Book, a privilege shared with the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge.

King's Tragedy, The, a poem by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), included in 'Ballads and Sonnets', published in 1881.

It is the story, which purports to be told by Catherine Douglas ('Kate Barlass'), of the ominous incidents which preceded the attack on the life of King James I of Scotland, and of her attempt to save him by barring the door with her arm against his murderers.

KINGSLEY, CHARLES (1819–75), born at Holne in Devonshire, where his father was vicar, was educated at King's College, London, and Magdalene College, Cambridge. He became curate and subsequently, in 1844, rector of Eversley in Hampshire and held the living for the remainder of his life. He was professor of modern history at Cambridge from 1860 to 1869, and after this held canonries at Chester and Westminster. He came much under the influence of F. D. Maurice and the writings of Carlyle, and took a vigorous interest in the movement for social reform of the middle of the century, though disapproving of the violent policy of the Chartists. He contributed, over the signature 'Parson Lot', to the 'Politics of the People' in 1848, and to the 'Christian Socialist' in 1850–1. His literary activities were large and varied. In 'The Heroes' (1856) he tells for young readers the stories of Perseus, Theseus, and the Argonauts. His poetry included 'The Saint's Tragedy' (1848), a drama concerning St. Elizabeth of Hungary, the wife of Lewis, Landgrave of Thuringia, torn between her natural affections and her religious duties as enforced by a domineering monk; 'Andromeda' (1859), dealing with the classical myth; and many pleasant songs and ballads. His principal novels were 'Yeast' (q.v.), published in 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1848 and separately in 1850, and 'Alton Locke' (q.v., 1850), showing his sympathy with the sufferings of the working classes; 'Hypatia' (q.v., 1853); 'Westward Ho!' (q.v., 1855); 'Two Years Ago' (q.v., 1857); 'Water Babies' (q.v., 1863); and 'Hereward the Wake' (q.v., 1865). His enthusiasm for natural history was shown by 'Glaucus; or the Wonders of the Shore' (1855). In 'Macmillan's Magazine', Jan. 1864, he published a review of Froude's 'History of England', vols. vii and viii, which led him into controversy with J. H. Newman and furnished the occasion for the latter's 'Apologia' (q.v.). In the same year he published a course of lectures entitled 'The Roman and the Teuton'. 'At Last' (1871) is the record of a long-desired visit to the West Indies. His beautiful 'Prose Idylls' (1873) are among his last works. Kingsley published several volumes of sermons, many of them remarkable for their style, their interesting subjects, and the broad spirit of humanity they display.

KINGSLEY, HENRY (1830–76), younger brother of C. Kingsley (q.v.), was educated at King's College School and Worcester College, Oxford. At the latter his exuberance led him into some sort of trouble, as a result of which he went, without a degree, to Australia, where he spent five years (1853-8), and was for a time a trooper in the Sydney mounted police. His experiences with bushrangers while in this force are reflected in some of his novels. On his return he published 'Geoffrey Hamlyn' (1859), a somewhat melodramatic story of the life of early settlers in Australia, in which bush-fires, attacks of bushrangers, &c., provide exciting incidents. This was followed by 'Ravenshoe' (q.v., 1862); 'Austin Elliott' (1863); 'The Hillyars and the Burtons' (1865), a second Australian story; 'Leighton Court' (1866); 'Silcote of Silcotes' (1867), and a number of less-known novels. During the Franco-Prussian war Henry Kingsley was a newspaper correspondent with the German army.

Kinmont Willie, see Armstrong (W.).

Kinraid, CHARLEY, a character in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Sylvia's Lovers' (q.v.).

Klomi, the gipsy girl in Meredith's 'The Adventures of Harry Richmond' (q.v.).

KIPLING, RUDYARD (1865-1936), son of J. L. Kipling, the author and illustrator of 'Beast and Man in India', was born in Bombay and educated at the United Services College, Westward Ho! He was engaged in journalistic work in India from 1882 to 1889. His fame rests principally on his short stories, dealing with India, the sea, the jungle and its beasts, the army, the navy, and a multitude of other subjects; and in a less degree on his verse, which is variously judged, and as diversified in subject as his tales. His publications include: 'Departmental Ditties' (1886); 'Plain Tales from the Hills', 'Soldiers Three' (1888); 'In Black and White', 'The Story of the Gadsbys', 'Under the Deodars', 'The Phantom Rickshaw', 'Wee Willie Winkie' (1889); 'The City of Dreadful Night', 'The Light that Failed' (1890); 'Life's Handicap', 'Letters of Marque', 'The Smith Administration' (1891); 'Barrack-room Ballads', 'The Naulahka' (1892); 'Many Inventions' (1893); 'The Jungle Book' (q.v., 1894); 'The Second Jungle Book' (1895); 'The Seven Seas' (1896); 'Captains Courageous' (1897); 'The Day's Work' (1898); 'Stalky & Co.' (1899); 'Kim' (q.v., 1901); 'Just So Stories' (1902); 'The Five Nations' (1903); 'Traffics and Discoveries' (1904); 'Puck of Pook's Hill' (1906); 'Actions and Reactions' (1909); 'Rewards and Fairies' (1910); 'The New Army in Training' (1914); 'France at War', 'The Fringes of the Fleet' (1915); 'Sea Warfare' (1916); 'A Diversity of Creatures' (1917); 'The Years Between' (1919); 'Letters of Travel, 1892-1913' (1920); 'Land and Sea Tales for Scouts and Guides' (1923); 'Debits and Credits' (1926); 'A Book of Words' (1928); 'Thy Servant a Dog' (1930). Kipling edited 'The Irish Guards in the Great War' (1923).

Kipps, a novel by H. G. Wells (q.v.), published in 1905.

Arthur Kipps is a little, vulgar, uneducated

draper's assistant at Folkestone, who unexpectedly inherits twelve hundred a year. After the first days of delirious joy, he finds his troubles begin. He becomes engaged to a young lady of the superior classes, but impecunious, who had previously been a distant star in his firmament. She has ambitions of her own, and sets firmly about Kipps's social education. The problems of correct eating and dressing, and generally of living up to his new position and his future bride, prove too much for Kipps's fortitude, and at last, driven desperate, he bolts, and hastily marries Ann, his boyhood's love, now in domestic service. But even then he is not out of his troubles; for his wealth, with its trail of social obligations, follows him into married life, and threatens his happiness. So that the loss of nearly the whole of it—by the embezzlement of a solicitor—comes soon to be felt as a positive relief, and real happiness begins only when he starts life again as a shopkeeper. The description of Kipps's early life as a draper's apprentice is interesting for its autobiographical character.

Kirk, SIR JOHN (1832-1922), chief officer on Dr. Livingstone's second Zambezi Expedition (1858-63). He was a pioneer in photographic work and took many interesting photographs in Africa during the course of the expedition. He was subsequently for many years an administrator in Zanzibar.

KIRKE, EDWARD (1553-1613), a friend of Edmund Spenser, educated at Pembroke Hall and Caius College, Cambridge. He wrote the preface, the arguments, and a verbal commentary to Spenser's 'Shepherds Calendar', under the initials 'E. K.' (1579). Modern critics have, on insufficient grounds, sought to prove that 'E. K.' was Spenser himself.

Kirke, PERCY (1646?-91), colonel of KIRKE's LAMBS, the old Tangier regiment, the badge of which was a Paschal Lamb. He was present at Sedgemoor in 1685 and notorious for his cruelty to the rebels.

Kirkrapine, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', I. iii, 'a stout and sturdy thief' of the church, who destroyed Una's lion.

Kismet, a Turkish word meaning fate, destiny.

Kit Nubbles, a character in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.).

Kit-Cat Club, founded in the early part of the 18th cent. by leading Whigs, including (according to Pope) Steele, Addison, Congreve, Garth, and Vanbrugh (qq.v.). Jacob Tonson (q.v.), the publisher, was for many years its secretary and moving spirit. It met at the house of Christopher Katt, a pastry-cook, in Shire Lane (which ran north from Temple Bar). Katt's mutton-pies were called Kit-cats, hence the name of the club ('Spectator', No. ix). The club subsequently met at Tonson's house at Barn Elms. The portraits of the members (painted by Sir Godfrey Kneller and now in the possession of the National Portrait Gallery) had to be less than half-length because the dining-room was too low for half-size portraits. The word 'kit-cat' is in consequence still used for portraits of this size.

Kite, SERGEANT, one of the chief characters in Farquhar's 'The Recruiting Officer' (q.v.). One of his songs is the well-known 'Over the hills and far away'.

Kitely, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (q.v.).

KITTREDGE, GEORGE LYMAN (1860-1941), professor of English literature in Harvard University. His works include: 'Observations on the Language of Troilus' (1891), 'The Date of Chaucer's Troilus and other Matters' (1905), 'Chaucer and his Poetry' (1915), 'A Study of Gawain and the Green Knight' (1916).

Klaboterman, see Carmilhan.

Klephts (M.Gk. κλέφτης, thief), the Greeks who refused to submit to the Turks after the conquest of Greece in the 15th cent., and maintained their independence in the mountains. After the war of independence (1821-8) those who continued this existence became mere brigands. Hence the word is used for brigands, bandits.

Klingsor, in the version of the legend of the Grail (q.v.) adopted by Wagner in his opera 'Parsifal', the magician who, with the help of the enchantress, Kundry, and the flower maidens, strives to lure away the knights of Titurel (q.v.), until overcome by Parsifal.

KLOPSTOCK, FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB (1724-1803), German poet, famous for his patriotic odes and his great religious epic 'Messias' ('The Messiah'), inspired by Milton's 'Paradise Lost', of which the first three cantos were published in 1748 and the last in 1773.

Knag, Miss, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), Madame Mantalini's forewoman.

KNICKERBOCKER, DIEDRICH, the pseudonym under which W. Irving (q.v.) wrote his 'History of New York', and 'Rip van Winkle' and 'The Legend of Sleepy Hollow' (in 'The Sketch-Book'). The name 'Knickerbocker' signified a descendant of the original Dutch settlers of the New Netherlands in America. The word as used for loose-fitting breeches is said to have been given to these because of their resemblance to the knee-breeches of the Dutchmen in Cruikshank's illustrations to W. Irving's 'History of New York'. [OED.]

editorship of Charles Fenno Hoffman. From that date until it was discontinued in 1865, the Knickerbocker numbered many of the foremost American writers among its contributors, including Washington Irving, H. W. Longfellow, W. C. Bryant, O. W. Holmes, J. R. Lowell, Horace Greeley, and J. F. Cooper.

KNIGHT, CHARLES (1791-1873), editor and publisher, produced the 'Penny Magazine' (1832-45), the 'Penny Cyclopaedia' (1833-44), and other cheap series designed to popularize knowledge.

Knight Hospitaller, see Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem.

Knight of the Burning Pestle, The, a comedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (see Fletcher, J.), printed in 1613. It is probably in the main the work of Beaumont.

The play is at once a burlesque of knight-errantry and of T. Heywood's (q.v.) 'The Four Prentices of London'—and thus the first of English parody plays—and a comedy of manners. The plot is very slight. A grocer and his wife in the audience insist that their apprentice, Ralph, shall have a part in the play. He therefore becomes a Grocer Errant, with a Burning Pestle portrayed on his shield, and undertakes various absurd adventures, including the release of the patients held captive by a barber (Barbaroso). These are interspersed in the real plot, in which Jasper, a merchant's apprentice, is in love with his master's daughter Luce. He carries her off when she is about to be married to his rival, Humphrey, who is favoured by her father. The father and Humphrey recover her, and she is locked up. Jasper, feigning death, has himself conveyed to her in a coffin, frightens her father by assuming the character of his own ghost, and finally obtains his consent to the match.

Knight of the Leopard, Sir Kenneth of Scotland, the earl of Huntingdon, hero of Scott's 'The Talisman' (q.v.).

Knight of the Rueful Countenance, Don Quixote (q.v.).

Knight of the Swan, THE, Lohengrin (q.v.). In early forms of the legend he is called HELIAS. There is an Icelandic saga in which Helis, Knight of the Swan, is represented as a son of Julius Caesar. See also Rudiger, a ballad by R. Southey.

perhaps for 'knights of the whipping-post' or pillory. [OED.]

Knights of Windsor, a small body of military officers who have pensions and apartments in Windsor Castle.

Knights Templar, see Templars.

Knightley, GEORGE, the bachelor owner of Donwell Abbey, and JOHN, his brother, characters in Jane Austen's 'Emma' (q.v.).

Knight rider Street, see Giltspur Street.

Knightsbridge, in the West End of London, at the end of the 17th cent. was a place of some notoriety, with two taverns of questionable reputation, the Swan and the World's End, referred to in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Knipperdolling, an adherent of Bernhard Knipperdolling, a leader of the Münster Anabaptists (q.v.) in 1533-5; an Anabaptist; hence a religious fanatic.

Knockdunder, THE CAPTAIN OF, in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.), the duke of Argyle's agent.

KNOLLES, RICHARD (1550?-1610), author of a 'General Historie of the Turkes' (1603), not only valuable as a contribution to contemporary knowledge of the East, but interesting for the influence which Byron acknowledges that it had upon himself.

Knossos, see under Minoan.

Knowell, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (q.v.).

KNOWLES, JAMES SHERIDAN (1784-1862), after trying the army, medicine, the stage, and teaching, as professions, became an author. His best plays were the tragedies of 'Caius Gracchus' (produced 1815), 'Virgilius' (produced 1820), 'William Tell' (1825), and 'The Wife' (1833); and his comedies, 'The Beggar's Daughter of Bethnal Green' (1828), 'The Hunchback' (1832), and 'The Love Chase' (1837).

Knowles, SIR JAMES THOMAS (1831-1908), editor of the 'Contemporary Review', 1870-7, and founder of the 'Nineteenth Century' and the Metaphysical Society (qq.v.).

Knox, FLURRY, the M.F.H. in the 'Experiences of an Irish R.M.' by E. CE. Somerville (q.v.) and Martin Ross.

KNOX, JOHN (1505-72), was educated at Haddington School and Glasgow University. He was called to the ministry and began preaching for the reformed religion in 1547. He went abroad at the accession of Mary Tudor, wrote his 'Epistle on Justification by Faith' in 1548, met Calvin at Geneva in 1554, was pastor of the English congregation at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1554-5, and from 1556 to 1558 lived at Geneva. Thence he addressed epistles to his brethren in England suffering under the rule of Mary Tudor, and in Scotland under the regency of Mary of Lorraine. It was this situation which led to the publication of his 'First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women' (1558), of which the title, Saintsbury remarks, was the best part. In 1559 appeared the 'First Book of Discipline', of which Knox was part-author, advocating a national system of education ranging from a school in every parish to the three universities. His 'Treatise on Predestination' was published in 1560. In 1572 he was appointed minister at Edinburgh, where he died. His 'History of the Reformation of Religion within the realme of Scotland' was first printed in 1587 (the best edition of this is in the first two vols. of Laing's edition of Knox's 'Works', 1846-8). It contains, in its fourth book, the notable account of the return of Mary Stuart to Scotland, of Knox's interviews with her, and his fierce denunciations from the pulpit of St. Giles.

KNOX, VICESIMUS (1752-1821), educated at St. John's College, Oxford, is remembered as the compiler of 'Elegant Extracts' (1789). He was author of 'Essays Moral and Literary' (1778).

KNYVETT, SIR HENRY (d. 1598), of Charlton, near Malmesbury, a valiant soldier in Elizabeth's wars, wrote 'The Defence of the Realme' (1596); it was published in the 'Tudor and Stuart Library' in 1906. It advocates universal training for military service.

Knyvett, THOMAS (1596-1658), born at Ashwellthorpe in Norfolk, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was a landowner in the eastern counties, and a Royalist in sympathy during the Civil War. His letters to his wife, which have been preserved, throw an interesting light on the life of the period. (From 'The Times', 2 Feb. 1931.)

Kobold, in German folk-lore, a familiar spirit, haunting houses and rendering services to the inmates, but often of a tricky disposition; also an underground spirit haunting mines and caves.

Koh-i-noor, an Indian diamond, famous for its size and history, extending, it is said, to 2,000 years, which became one of the British crown jewels on the annexation of the Punjab in 1849. It belonged in the past to Aurungzebe, and subsequently to Nadir Shah and to Runjeet Singh.

Königsberg, a seaport on the Baltic, the capital of East Prussia, a town associated with the life of Kant (q.v.). 'Königsberg' was also the name of a German light cruiser, engaged in commerce destruction in the early part of the war of 1914-18, blockaded in the Ruffi river in Nov. 1914, and destroyed in July 1915.

Koppenberg, see Pied Piper of Hamelin.

Koran or QURÂN, THE, from the Arabic verb signifying 'to read' the sacred book of the Mohammedans, consisting of revelations orally delivered from time to time by Mohammed, some at Mecca, others at Medina, taken down by scribes, and collected and put in order after his death by Abu Bakr (q.v.). The Koran teaches the unity of God, which it attests by examples of the punishments inflicted on those who maltreated his messengers, and supplements with directions and admonitions. The four chief duties that it enjoins are prayer (to be preceded by ablution), the giving of alms, fasting, and the pilgrimage to Mecca. The Koran is written in a very pure Arabic, the standard language.

Koraysh or QURAYSH, the Arabian tribe to which Mohammed belonged. It included the rival families of the Hashimites and the Umayyads (qq.v.).

Kosciusko, TADEUS (1746–1817), Polish patriot and general, who led the Polish insurrection of 1794.

Kottabos, a Trinity College, Dublin, magazine started by R. Y. Tyrrell, an eminent classical scholar, translator, and conversationalist, in 1868. It ran for some twenty years in all, in two periods, and excelled in light verse and parodies. Its contributors included Edward Dowden, Oscar Wilde, Standish O'Grady, and John Todhunter. (Kóτταβος was a game introduced into Greece from Sicily, which depended on skill in throwing wine from a goblet, at a certain distance, into a metal basin.)

KOTZEBUE, AUGUST VON (1761–1819), a German dramatist, author of a large number of sentimental plays which had considerable vogue in their day and influenced the English stage. His 'Menschenhass und Reue' enjoyed great popularity here as 'The Stranger', brought out by Sheridan in 1798, the story of a wife duped and erring, her husband in consequence turned misanthropical, the wife's repentance, the reconciliation, and the husband's return to sanity. 'Lovers' Vows' (q.v.), made famous by Jane Austen's 'Mansfield Park', was adapted from Kotzebue's 'Das Kind der Liebe'. Sheridan adapted 'Die Spanier in Peru' in 'Pizarro'.

Kraken, a mythical sea-monster of enormous size, said to have been seen at times off the coast of Norway. The name was first brought to general notice by the description (1752) of Pontoppidan (q.v.). Tennyson wrote a short poem about the Kraken.

Kratim or KRATIMER, see Katmer.

Kremlin, the ancient citadel of Moscow, containing a palace and many curious churches; now the seat of the Soviet government.

Kreutzer Sonata, The, a famous sonata for piano and violin by Beethoven (q.v.), dedicated by him to Rodolphe Kreutzer (1766–1831), a French violinist and composer. Also the title of a work by Tolstoy.

Kriemhild, see Nibelungenlied.

KYD

Krishna, a great deity or deified hero of later Hinduism, worshipped as an incarnation of Vishnu (q.v.), the god of fire, lightning, and storm; in the myths a brave, crafty, invincible hero, the destroyer of the tyrannical King Kansa, and the lover of Radha.

Kronos, see Cronos.

Krook, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Kshatriya, the second of the great Hindu castes, the military caste.

Ku-Klux-Klan, a widespread secret society (κύκλος), which arose in the Southern States of North America after the civil war of 1861–5, beginning with an effort to overawe the negro population by whipping and arson, and developing into a system of political outrage and murder. Though suppressed in 1871 by an act of Congress, a kindred organization still survives.

Kubla Khan, a Vision in a Dream, a poem by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), published in 1816.

The poet, in 1797, living at a lonely farmhouse on the confines of Somerset and Devon, fell asleep in his chair when reading a passage in 'Purchas his Pilgrimage' relating to the Khan Kubla and the palace that he commanded to be built. On awaking he was conscious of having composed in his sleep two or three hundred lines on this theme, and immediately set down the lines that form this fragment. He was then unfortunately interrupted, and, on returning to his task an hour later, found that the remainder of the poem had passed from his memory. All that remains to us is the vision of the scene amid which Kubla's palace was built. See Xanadu.

Kufic, see Cufic.

Kulhwch and Olwen, see Kilhwch and Olwen.

Kulturkampf, the struggle between Bismarck and the Vatican, which began in 1873, concerning the relations of Church and State.

Kundry, see Klingsor.

Kvasir, see Odhaerir.

KYD or KID, THOMAS (1557?–95?), dramatist, was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, London, and was by profession a scrivener. His 'Spanish Tragedy' (q.v.) was printed in 1594 (?), and 'Pompey the Great, his faire Corneliaes Tragedy' (q.v.) in 1595. 'The First Part of Ieronimo', published in 1605, a fore-piece to the 'Spanish Tragedy', is frequently attributed to Kyd, but was probably not by him, though some other such forepiece by him probably at one time existed. It is also uncertain whether he was the author of 'The Tragedy of Solymann and Perseda' (printed in 1599). He was perhaps the author of a pre-Shakespearean play (now lost) on the subject of Hamlet. He was one of the best-known tragic poets of his time, and his work shows an advance in the construction of plot and development of character.

KYRIE

Kýrie Eléison, Greek words meaning 'Lord, have mercy', a short petition used in various offices of the Eastern and Roman churches; also a musical setting of these words. An English version is part of the Communion service.

Kyrle, JOHN, the MAN OF ROSS (1637-1724), educated at Ross Grammar School and Balliol

LABYRINTH OF CRETE

College, Oxford, lived very simply on his estates at Ross and devoted his surplus income to works of charity. He was celebrated by Pope in the 'Moral Essays' (q.v.), Epistle III, and the Kyrle Society (for brightening the lot and improving the taste of the poorer classes) was inaugurated in 1877 as a memorial of him.

LA BOÉTIE, ÉTIENNE DE (1530-63), French writer and humanist, the intimate friend of Montaigne (q.v.). His most famous work was the 'Discours sur la servitude volontaire' or 'Contr'un'.

LA BRUYÈRE, JEAN DE (1645-96), French ethical writer, author of 'Caractères' on the model of Theophrastus.

LA CALPRENÈDE, GAUTHIER DE COSTES DE (1614-63), a Gascon by birth, author of several very lengthy heroic romances, which were much admired by contemporaries, but are found intolerably tedious to-day. These were: 'Cassandre' (ten vols., 1644-50), which has for its heroine the daughter of Darius whom Alexander the Great married; 'Cléopâtre' (ten vols., 1647-56), of which the heroine is not Antony's Cleopatra, but a supposed daughter of their marriage, and one of the characters is a certain Artaban, who became proverbial for pride; 'Pharamond' (twelve vols., 1661-70, the last five vols. by a continuator), which deals with the early legendary history of France, in particular the love of the first of the French kings for Rosemonde, daughter of the king of the Cimbrians. All these romances were translated into English and other languages.

La Chaise, PÈRE, see Père La Chaise.

LA FAYETTE, MME DE (1634-93), French writer, author of 'La Princesse de Clèves' (q.v.).

LA FONTAINE, JEAN DE (1621-95), a French poet of great versatility, who wrote dramas, satires, and light verse, but is chiefly famous for his 'Contes et Nouvelles' (from 1664), successive collections of verse-tales in which he recast the popular fabliaux of Europe; and still more for his 'Fables' (1668, 1678, and 1694). These were taken from Eastern, Greek, Roman, and modern sources, and while in their more serious aspect presenting a somewhat hard and sceptical view of life, are told with an inimitable naïveté and a semi-pagan sentiment for nature that make La Fontaine the greatest fabulist of all time.

La Mancha, an ancient province of Spain, from which Don Quixote (q.v.) took his title.

La Palisse (more correctly LA PALICE), JACQUES DE CHABANNES, Seigneur de (c. 1470-1525), Marshal of France under Charles VIII-Francis I, killed at the battle of Pavia. He was unjustly ridiculed in a famous song written in the 18th cent., embodying a number of incontestable truths, known as 'vérités de La Palisse', e.g.

Il mourut le vendredi,
Le dernier jour de son âge,
S'il fût mort le samedi,
Il eût vécu davantage.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, FRANÇOIS DE MARSILLAC, Duc de (1613-80), author of interesting 'Mémoires', but chiefly famous for his 'Réflexions, Sentences, et Maximes Morales' (1665), pithy maxims of extreme concision and finish, embodying a somewhat cynical philosophy that finds in self-love the prime motive of all action.

La Saisiaz, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), written in 1877 under the influence of the sudden death of a friend who had been spending the summer of that year with Browning and his sister at the villa 'La Saisiaz' near Geneva. In it the poet examines afresh the basis of his faith in a future life.

Labyrinth of Crete, THE, a maze constructed by Daedalus (q.v.) for Minos (q.v.) king of Crete. In it the Minotaur (q.v.) was confined. The word 'labyrinth' is of uncertain origin, perhaps from λάβρυς, a Lydian or

Carian word meaning double-headed axe, a symbol of religious signification, such as is found frequently incised on stones and pillars in Cretan excavations of the Minoan period.

Lacheis, see Parcae.

LACHMANN, KARL KONRAD FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1793–1851), a German philologist, distinguished both in the German and classical spheres. By a careful study of Old German and Middle High German literature he determined its metrical principles. He published editions of Lucretius, Propertius, and Tibullus; and critical works on Homer, &c. His 'Lucretius' was his greatest work, and a landmark in the history of textual criticism.

Laconic, following the Laconian (i.e. Spartan, q.v.) manner especially in speech and writing; brief, concise, sententious.

Ladas, a celebrated courier of Alexander the Great, who won a crown at Olympia. Ladas was the name of Lord Rosebery's Derby winner in 1894.

Ladislav, WILL, a character in G. Eliot's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

Ladon, the dragon that guarded the apples of the Hesperides (q.v.), and was slain by Hercules.

Ladrones (Spanish, 'robbers'), a chain of fifteen islands in the North Pacific, discovered by Magellan and occupied by Spain in the 17th cent.; so called by Magellan because the islanders stole some of his goods.

Ladurlad, a character in Southey's 'Curse of Kehama' (q.v.).

Lady Bountiful, in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.) a 'country gentlewoman, that cures all her neighbours of their distempers' and lays out half her income in charitable uses.

Lady Day, a day kept in celebration of some event in the life of the Virgin Mary; now used only of 25 March, the Feast of the Annunciation; formerly also 8 Dec. (the Conception of the Virgin), 8 Sept. (the Nativity), and 15 Aug. (the Assumption).

Lady Margaret foundations at Oxford and Cambridge were instituted by Margaret Beaufort, daughter of John duke of Somerset, wife of Edmund Tudor, and mother of Henry VII. She was an early patron of Caxton and Wynkyn de Worde.

Lady of Christ's, Milton's nickname at Cambridge.

Lady of Lyons, The, or Love and Pride, a romantic comedy by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), produced in 1838.

The time of the play is 1795–8. Pauline Deschappelles, the proud daughter of a merchant of Lyons, rejects various suitors, including a ci-devant marquis, Beauséant. Young Claude Melnotte, son of the Deschappelles' old gardener, self-educated and accomplished, loves her humbly. Beauséant, in order to be avenged on Pauline, persuades Claude to personate a foreign prince and to court her in that disguise. The fraud is completely successful, the pair are married, and Claude carries his wife off to his mother's humble cottage. Then he is filled with remorse and seeks to make atonement by restoring Pauline to her father and facilitating the annulment of the marriage. Pauline's heart is won by this proof of his real love. Claude joins the army of Buonaparte, greatly distinguishes himself under an assumed name, and returns to Lyons two years later, rich and a colonel, to find that Pauline is on the point of marrying Beauséant to save her father from bankruptcy. Pauline not recognizing him, but believing him to be the friend of Claude, sends to her former husband a final message of her undying love for him. Claude reveals himself, is rapturously received, and Beauséant departs, raving at his discomfiture.

Lady of Shalott, The, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1852, of which the story finds fuller development in the author's 'Lancelot and Elaine' (q.v.), one of the 'Idylls of the King'.

Lady of the Aroostook, The, a novel by W. D. Howells (q.v.), published in 1879, which relates the fortunes of Lydia Blood, a young New England school-teacher who finds herself set down in the midst of fashionable and sophisticated Venice.

Lady of the Idle Lake, see Phaedria.

Lady of the Lake, THE, in the Arthurian legends, a somewhat indistinct supernatural character. In Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', she first appears as giving Arthur the sword Excalibur, and when she comes to claim Balin's head as her reward, is killed by Balin (II. iii). But Nimue (q.v.) is spoken of later in the same work as the Lady of the Lake. Nimue befriends Arthur and rescues him in peril, and marries Pelleas. Merlin falls into a dotage on her, and Nimue, to get rid of him, inveigles him under a rock and buries him under a great stone. She is one of the three queens in the ship in which Arthur is borne away to be healed of his wounds. These, as Professor Rhys points out ('Arthurian Legend'), 'may all be taken as different aspects of one mythic figure, the lake lady Morgen', who appears also as Morgan le Fay (q.v.), at one time a benevolent, at another a malicious being. He traces her to the Rhianon of British mythology, the wife of Pwyll (see under Mabinogion), the names 'Nimue' and 'Vivien' arising from miscopyings by successive scribes.

Lady of the Lake, The, a poem in six cantos by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1810.

A knight, who gives his name as James Fitz-James, receives hospitality in the home of Roderick Dhu, the fierce Highland chief, on Loch Katrine, where he falls in love with Ellen, daughter of the outlawed Lord James of Douglas. Roderick himself and the young Malcolm Graeme are also suitors for her hand, and Ellen loves the latter. Under threat of an attack by the royal forces, Roderick summons his clans. Douglas, regarding himself as the cause of the attack, sets out for Stirling to surrender himself to the king. Meanwhile James Fitz-James returns and proposes to carry Ellen off to safety. She refuses, confessing her love for another. Fitz-James generously withdraws, giving her a signet-ring which will enable her to obtain from the king any boon she may ask. On his way back to Stirling he falls in with Roderick. A fierce quarrel springs up between them and they fight. Fitz-James's skill prevails, and the wounded Roderick is carried prisoner to Stirling. Ellen appears at the king's court, presents her signet-ring, asks for her father's pardon, and discovers that Fitz-James is the king himself. The king and Douglas are reconciled, Roderick dies of his wounds, and Ellen marries Malcolm Graeme. The poem includes the beautiful coronach 'He is gone on the mountain', and Ellen's song 'Soldier, rest, thy warfare o'er'. The king is as much drawn from James V as from anyone.

Lady of the Lamp, THE, a name given to Florence Nightingale (q.v.) in allusion to her visits at night to the hospital wards during the Crimean War.

Lady or the Tiger, The, a famous short story by Frank Stockton (q.v.), published in 1882.

Laelaps, see Cephalus.

Laertes, (1) the father of Ulysses (q.v.); (2) in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.) the brother of Ophelia.

Læstrygōnes, in Homer's 'Odyssey' (Bk. x), a race of giants who inhabited Sicily and fed on human flesh. They sank eleven of the twelve ships of Ulysses and devoured his companions.

Lafeu, a character in Shakespeare's 'All's Well that Ends Well' (q.v.).

Lafite, CHÂTEAU, see Claret.

Lagado, see Gulliver's Travels.

Lals, a celebrated Greek courtesan, a Sicilian, carried to Corinth at the time of the Athenian expedition to Sicily.

Lake Poets, LAKE SCHOOL, THE, terms applied to the three poets Coleridge, Southey, and Wordsworth, who resided in the neighbourhood of the English Lakes. 'Lake School' first appears in this sense in the 'Edinburgh Review', August 1817.

Lake Regillus, near Rome, memorable for the victory of the Romans over the Latins and Tarquin c. 496 B.C., celebrated by T. B. Macaulay (q.v.) in his lay, 'The Battle of Lake Regillus'.

Lakshmi or SRI, in Hindu mythology, the wife of Vishnu (q.v.), the goddess of prosperity. She is represented in the 'Ramayana'

LALLA ROOKH

(q.v.) as produced from the foam of the sea, when the gods and the demons churned the ocean in order to obtain the Amrita (q.v.) or water of life.

Lalla Rookh, a series of oriental tales in verse, connected together by a story in prose, by T. Moore (q.v.), published in 1817.

The prose story relates the journey of Lalla Rookh, the daughter of the Emperor Aurungzebe, from Delhi to Cashmere, to be married to the young king of Bucharia. On the way, she and her train are diverted by four tales told by Feramorz, a young Cashmerian poet, with whom she falls in love, and who turns out, on her arrival at her destination, to be the king of Bucharia himself. An element of humour is introduced by the self-important chamberlain, Fadladeen. A series of accidents on the way has thrown him into a bad temper, which he vents in pungent criticisms on the young man's verses (in the style of the 'Edinburgh' reviewers), and he is correspondingly discomfited on discovering the latter's identity. The four tales are as follows.

The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan. The beautiful Zelica, half demented by the loss of Azim, her lover, supposed dead, is lured into the haram of Mokanna, a repulsive impostor who poses as a prophet, on the promise of admission to Paradise. Azim, returning from the wars, finds Zelica wedded to Mokanna, and joins the army of the Caliph, on its way to punish the blasphemy of Mokanna. The latter is defeated, throws himself into a vat of corrosive poison, and dies. Zelica, seeking death, puts on his veil, and being mistaken for the prophet, is killed by Azim and dies in his arms.

Paradise and the Peri. A Peri, one of 'those beautiful spirits of the air who live on perfumes', offspring of fallen angels, is promised admission to Paradise if she will bring to the gate the gift that is most dear to Heaven. She brings first a drop of the blood of a youthful warrior who dies to free India from the tyrant Mahmoud of Gazna, but it fails to open the gate. Then the expiring sigh of an Egyptian maiden who dies from grief at the loss of her plague-stricken lover; this is equally unavailing. Lastly, the repentant tear wrung from a criminal by his child's prayer to God, and this opens the gate.

The Fire-Worshippers, a tale of the Ghebers or Persians of the old religion, who maintained their resistance against the conquering Moslems. Hafed, a young Gheber, falls in love with Hinda, daughter of the Emir Al Hassan, who has been sent from Arabia to quell this resistance. Hafed scales the rocks on which her bower stands, and wins her love. Presently Hinda is captured by the Ghebers and discovers that her lover is their chief. The Ghebers are betrayed to Al Hassan, and Hafed throws himself on a funeral pyre. Hinda leaps from the boat on which she is being carried back to her father and is drowned.

The Light of the Haram, a story of Nourmahal, the beloved wife of Selim, son of the Great Akbar. The Feast of Roses is being celebrated in the Vale of Cashmere, but Nourmahal has quarrelled with her husband. Namouna, the enchantress, teaches her a magic song, which Nourmahal sings, masked, at Selim's banquet, and thus wins back his love.

The first of the tales is written in heroic couplets, the others in stanzas of varied metre, mostly octosyllabic. Lady Holland said to Moore at her own table, 'Mr. Moore, I have not read your Larry O'Rourke; I don't like Irish stories.'

L'Allegro, see Allegro.

Lama, the title given to the Buddhist priests of Tibet and Mongolia. The two chief lamas of Tibet are called respectively the Dalai Lama and Tashi Lama; the former is higher in dignity and is known to Europeans as the Grand Lama. He lives in the strictest seclusion, and is worshipped with almost divine honours. When he dies, the lamas search for a child who gives evidence that the soul of the deceased pontiff has entered into him; when found, the child succeeds to the office.

Lamachus, an Athenian general, colleague of Alcibiades and Nicias in the Sicilian expedition of 415 B.C. His plan for the capture of Syracuse, an immediate attack, was the boldest, but he was overborne by his colleagues.

LAMARCK, JEAN BAPTISTE, Chevalier de (1744-1829), French biologist and botanist. He advanced the view that species were not unalterable, and that the higher and more complex forms of life were derived from lower and simpler forms; that environment and new needs created new organs, and that these were transmitted to descendants. Darwin adopted from Lamarck the theory of the transmissibility of acquired characteristics, but in other respects their views were not in harmony.

LAMARTINE, ALPHONSE DE (1790-1869), French poet and politician, best known for his 'Méditations poétiques' (1820), meditative poems of a religious and mystical cast, followed by 'Nouvelles Méditations poétiques' in 1823, and 'Harmonies poétiques et religieuses' in 1830. He subsequently turned to politics, and for a brief period was in 1848 head of the provisional government. He published in 1847 his 'Histoire des Girondins', which contributed powerfully to the Revolution of 1848. After his retirement he published two series of 'Confidences' (1849-51), and some novels and further poems.

LAMB, LADY CAROLINE (1785-1828), daughter of the third earl of Beesborough, married William Lamb, afterwards second Viscount Melbourne. She became passionately infatuated with Byron. Her first novel 'Glenarvon', published anonymously in 1816, after his rupture with her (republished as 'The Fatal Passion', 1865), contained a caricature portrait of him. She published 'Graham Hamilton' in 1822, and 'Ada Reis, a Tale' in 1823. Her accidental meeting with Byron's funeral procession on its way to Newstead in 1824 permanently affected her mind.

LAMB, CHARLES (1775-1834), was born in London. His father, the Lovel of the 'Essays of Elia' ('The Old Benchers of the Inner Temple'), was the clerk and confidential attendant of Samuel Salt, a lawyer, whose house in Crown Office Row was Lamb's birthplace and his home during his youth. His grandmother, Mrs. Field, was housekeeper at Blakesware (near Ware), described in the 'Blakesmoor' essay and in 'Mrs. Leicester's School'. Lamb was educated at Christ's Hospital, where he formed an enduring friendship with S. T. Coleridge. After a few months' employment at the South Sea House, he obtained at 17 an appointment in the East India House, where he remained from 1792 to 1825. In 1796 his mother was killed by his sister Mary in a fit of insanity. Lamb undertook the charge of his sister, who remained subject to periodic seizures, and she repaid him with her sympathy and affection. He himself was for a short time (1795-6) mentally deranged, and the curse of madness acted as a shadow on his life. A volume of poems by S. T. Coleridge published in 1796 contains four sonnets by Lamb, and in 1798 appeared 'Blank Verse' by Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb, which includes 'The Old Familiar Faces'. In the same year appeared 'The Tale of Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret', a simple tragic tale of a young girl, the victim of an undeserved misfortune. In 1802 Lamb published 'John Woodvil' (first called 'Pride's Cure'), a tragedy in the Elizabethan style; in 1806 his farce 'Mr. H——' proved a failure at Drury Lane. With his sister he wrote 'Tales from Shakespear' (1807), designed to make Shakespeare familiar to the young; also 'Mrs. Leicester's School' (1809), a collection of ten stories, reminiscences of childhood supposed to be told by the pupils at a Hertfordshire school, containing autobiographic details of the authors. 'The Adventures of Ulysses' (1808) is a successful attempt by Lamb to do for the 'Odyssey' what with his sister he had done for Shakespeare. In 1808 he also published his 'Specimens of English Dramatic Poets contemporary with Shakespeare, with Notes'. Between 1810 and 1820 his literary output was small. It includes the essays on 'The Tragedies of Shakespeare' and 'On the Genius and Character of Hogarth' (1811). He wrote for Leigh Hunt's 'Reflector' and for the 'Examiner', and in 1814 contributed to the 'Quarterly Review' an article (much altered editorially) on Wordsworth's 'Excursion'. A collection of his miscellaneous writings in prose and verse appeared in 1818. From 1820 to 1823 Lamb was a regular contributor to the 'London Magazine', in which appeared the first series of miscellaneous essays known as the 'Essays of Elia' (q.v.), published in a separate volume in 1823. The second series was published in 1833. His correspondence was first published by Sir Thomas Talfourd in 1834; an enlarged collection was issued by Canon Ainger in 1899-1900. Of his poems the best known are 'The Old Familiar Faces' (referred to above), the lyrical ballad 'Hester' (1803), and the elegy 'On an Infant dying as soon as born' (1827); but 'Album Verses', published in 1830, also includes many charming lyrics and sonnets. From 1797 to 1823 Lamb lived with his sister in London (at Pentonville, Southampton Buildings, The Temple, and Covent Garden); in 1823 they moved to Islington, in 1827 to Enfield, and thence in 1833 to Edmonton, where Lamb died and was buried. His sister survived him for thirteen years. The standard life of Lamb was written, and the most complete collection of his letters edited, by E. V. Lucas (1905, 5th ed. 1921, 'Letters', 1935).

LAMB, MARY ANN (1764-1847), the sister of Charles Lamb (q.v.), under whose name the chief facts of her life will be found. Besides 'The Tales from Shakespear' there referred to (her share in which was the comedies), she wrote the greater part of 'Mrs. Leicester's School' (1809), to which her brother contributed three tales.

Lambert, GENERAL, MRS., THEO, and HETTY, characters in Thackeray's 'The Virginians' (q.v.).

Lambeth, from very early times the property of the see of Rochester, was in 1197 acquired by the archbishop of Canterbury. Of the palace an important part was built by Hubert Walter, who was archbishop in 1193-1205, and other parts were added at various times. The Lollards' Tower (15th cent.) was used during the Interregnum, as a prison for Royalists, as it had been for Lollards 250 years before. The archbishops, notably Bancroft, collected a great library at Lambeth. This was saved with difficulty at the Great Rebellion. It was transferred to the University of Cambridge under a provision of Bancroft's will. Many books were lost, but a good proportion returned to Lambeth, being claimed by Archbishop Juxon at the restoration, and were housed in the fine hall that Juxon built. The palace is on the Thames, 1½ miles south-west of St. Paul's Cathedral.

Lamela, AMBROSE, see Don Raphael.

Lamia, a poem by Keats (q.v.), written in 1819.

The story was taken by Keats from Burton ('Anatomy of Melancholy', III. ii. 1. 1), who quotes it from Philostratus ('De Vita Apollonii'). Lamia, a witch, is transformed by Hermes from a serpent into a beautiful maiden. She loves the young Corinthian Lycius, and he, spellbound by her beauty, takes her secretly to his house. Not content with his happiness, he makes a bridal feast and summons his friends. Among them comes the sage Apollonius, who pierces through Lamia's disguise, and calls her by her name, whereupon with a frightful scream she vanishes.

'Lamia' was the Latin name for a witch who was supposed to suck children's blood, a sorceress.

Lammas, from OE. hlafmæsse, loaf-mass, 1 Aug., in the early English Church observed as a harvest festival, at which loaves of bread were consecrated, made from the first ripe corn. In Scotland one of the quarter-days.

Lammie, ALFRED and SOPHRONIA, in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.), unscrupulous social adventurers.

Lamorak de Galls, SIR, in the 'Morte Darthur' (q.v.), son of Sir Pellinore and brother of Sir Percival, 'the biggest knight that ever I met withal, but if it were Sir Launcelot', said Sir Tristram. He was slain by Gawaine, Agravaine, Gaheris, and Mordred, Mordred giving him his death-wound treacherously at his back. This they did because of Sir Lamorak's adultery with their mother, King Lot's wife.

LA MOTTE FOUQUÉ, FRIEDRICH, BARON DE, see Undine.

Lamourette, ADRIEN (1742-94), bishop of Lyons and member of the Legislative Assembly (in the French Revolution), where he brought about a temporary reconciliation between the parties which was soon forgotten. Whence a baiser Lamourette or 'Lamourette kiss' signifies an ephemeral reconciliation.

Lamplighter, The, a novel by the American authoress Maria Susanna Cummins (1827-66), published in 1854.

LAMPMAN, ARCHIBALD (1861-99), Canadian poet, published two volumes of verse, 'Among the Miller' (1888) and 'Lyrics of Earth' (1896). A third volume 'Alcyone' was in preparation when he died. It contained one of his finest works 'The City of the End of Things', a sombre allegory of human life. But Lampman's strength lay in his observation and description of nature, and he has given many vivid pictures of the Canadian landscape.

Lampoon, a virulent or scurrilous satire, according to French etymologists derived from lampons, let us drink, a drunken song.

LANCASTER, JOSEPH (1778-1838), the founder of a system of education, based 'on general Christian principles' (i.e. undenominational), in schools organized 'on the monitorial or mutual system', described in 'Improvements in Education' (1803). The proposal gave rise to heated controversy, of which the outcome was the 'voluntary system' of elementary schools that endured until 1870.

LANCASTER, WILLIAM, see Warren (J. B. L.).

Lancelot, see Launcelot of the Lake.

LANCELOT AND ELAINE

Lancelot and Elaine, one of A. Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1859.

In this idyll we see the beginning of the retribution for the sin of Lancelot and Guinevere. Lancelot, the guilty lover of the queen, leaves the court so as to attend the 'diamond jousts' unknown, and goes to the castle of Astolat. The events that follow, ending with the death of Elaine, 'the lily maid of Astolat', and Lancelot's remorse, are given under Launcelot of the Lake.

Lancelot Bogle, The Rhyme of Sir, see Bon Gaultier Ballads.

Lancelot du Lake, Sir, a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', recounting the adventure of Lancelot with Tarquin, who had in prison threescore of Arthur's knights. Lancelot kills him and liberates the knights. Falstaff sings a snatch from this ballad in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', II. iv.

Land League, an association of Irish tenant farmers and others organized in 1879 by Charles Stewart Parnell and suppressed by the government in 1881, having primarily for its object the reduction of rent and ultimately the substitution of peasant proprietors for landlords.

Land of Cakes, THE, i.e. the land of oaten bread or oat-cake, Scotland.

Land o' the Leal, THE, the land of the blessed departed, the title of a song by Lady Nairne (q.v.).

Landau, an old-fashioned four-wheeled carriage, of which the top, being made in two parts, can be closed or opened; named from a town in Germany where it was first made.

Landless, NEVILLE and HELENA, characters in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.).

Landlord at Lion's Head, The, a novel by W. D. Howells (q.v.), published in 1897.

LONDON, LETITIA ELIZABETH (1802-38), afterwards Mrs. Maclean, wrote under the initials L. E. L. She published between 1824 and her death a number of poems, collected editions of which appeared in 1850 and 1873. She also wrote novels, of which the best is 'Ethel Churchill', published in 1837. She died mysteriously, probably from an accidental overdose of prussic acid, in West Africa shortly after her marriage.

LANDOR, ROBERT EYRES (1781-1869), youngest brother of Walter Savage Landor (q.v.), was author of a tragedy, 'The Count of Arezzi' (1823), which was attributed to Byron, of a poem 'The Impious Feast' (of Belshazzar, 1828), of a fantastic prose story 'The Fawn of Sertorius' (1846), and of 'The Fountain of Arethusa' (1848), dialogues between a certain Antony Lugwardine and Aristotle, Cicero, and other famous men of ancient times.

LANDOR, WALTER SAVAGE (1775-1864), of a Warwickshire family, was educated at Rugby and at Trinity College, Oxford, whence he was rusticated, an intractable temper frequently involving him in trouble throughout his life. He married in 1811 Julia Thuillier, with whom he quarrelled in 1835, lived in Italy (Como, Pisa, and Florence) from 1815 to 1835, at Bath from 1838 to 1858, and the last part of his life in Florence. His principal prose work took the form of 'Imaginary Conversations' (q.v.), published 1824-9. The 'Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare touching deer-stealing' appeared in 1834, his 'Pericles and Aspasia' (q.v.) in 1836, and 'The Pentameron' in 1837. These show an elaborate and finished style of great charm. Landor's verse was spread over most of his life, and includes 'Gebir' (q.v.), published in 1798; 'Count Julian' (q.v.), a tragedy (1812); 'Andrea of Hungary' (q.v.), 'Giovanna of Naples', and 'Fra Rupert', a historical trilogy (1839); 'The Hellenics' (1846-7), short tales or dialogues in verse on Greek mythical or idyllic subjects; and among shorter pieces the various verses addressed to 'Ianthé' (q.v.), the beautiful 'Dirce', 'Rose Aylmer' (q.v.), and 'The Three Roses'. Boythorn, in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.), is a genial caricature of some peculiarities of Landor.

Landseer, SIR EDWIN HENRY (1802-73), animal-painter, youngest son of John Landseer (1769-1852), who was also an artist. He visited Sir W. Scott at Abbotsford in 1824 and drew the poet and his dogs. His most famous pictures were painted between 1842 and 1850. He completed the lions for the Nelson monument in Trafalgar Square in 1866. Landseer struck out a new line by treating pictorially the analogy between the characters of animals and men. He enjoyed the favour of Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort.

LANE, EDWARD WILLIAM (1801-76), Arabic scholar, published in 1836 his 'Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians', and in 1838-41 a translation of the 'Thousand and One Nights'. He compiled an exhaustive thesaurus of the Arabic language from native lexicons, which was published at intervals during 1863-92.

Lanfranc (1005?-89), archbishop of Canterbury from 1070, a man educated in the secular learning of the time and in Greek, reputed as a teacher, prior of Bec in Normandy from 1045. As archbishop he worked in accord with William the Conqueror. He rebuilt Canterbury Cathedral after the fire of 1067.

LANG, ANDREW (1844-1912), born at Selkirk, was educated at Selkirk Grammar School, Edinburgh Academy, St. Andrews University, and Balliol College, Oxford, and became a fellow of Merton. In 1875 he settled down in London to a life of journalism and letters.

Lang's first book was of verse, 'Ballads and Lyrics of Old France' (1872); followed by 'Ballades in Blue China' (1880 and 1881); 'Helen of Troy' (1882), a more ambitious narrative poem in six books; 'Rhymes à la

LANG

Mode' (1884), 'Grass of Parnassus' (1892), 'Ban and Arrière Ban' (1894), and 'New Collected Rhymes' (1905). Many of his poems were written in the old French forms of ballade, rondeau, triolet, virelai, &c. Among the best of them are the sonnets, 'The Odyssey' and 'Colonel Burnaby'. His 'Collected Poems' were published in 1923.

Lang valued himself most as an anthropologist. His first book on folk-lore, 'Custom and Myth', did not appear until 1884, but contained papers written and printed much earlier. 'Myth, Ritual, and Religion', dealing chiefly with totemism, was published in 1887, and 'The Making of Religion' in 1898, the second edition of 'Myth, Ritual, and Religion' in 1899 being drastically rehandled to harmonize with his more developed views. These books involved him in much controversy, but he 'conferred', in the words of M. Salomon Reinach, 'a benefit on the world of learning' in proving that folk-lore is not the debris of a higher or literary mythology, but the foundation on which that mythology rests. Mention should be made in this connexion of Lang's 'Perrault's Popular Tales' (1888, see Perrault), in which he discusses the origins of many of our nursery tales.

Lang, as a Greek scholar, devoted himself to Homer. He was one of the joint authors (with S. H. Butcher) of the admirable prose versions of the 'Odyssey' (preceded by his best sonnet, 1879) and (with W. Leaf and E. Myers) of the 'Iliad' (1883), and also published translations of Theocritus (1880), the 'Homeric Hymns' (1899), and three books on the Homeric question, 'Homer and the Epic' (1893), 'Homer and his Age' (1906), and 'The World of Homer' (1910).

His chief work as an historian is the 'History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation to the Suppression of the last Jacobite Rising' (1900-7). He also wrote a number of historical monographs: 'Pickle the Spy' (1897) and 'The Companions of Pickle' (1898), on the identity of the Jacobite spy hinted at in the Introduction to Scott's 'Redgauntlet'; 'Prince Charles Edward' (1900); 'The Mystery of Mary Stuart' (1901); 'James VI and the Gowrie Conspiracy' (1902); 'John Knox and the Reformation' (1905); the 'Life of Sir George Mackenzie' (1909); and 'The Maid of France' (1908), on Joan of Arc. His last published work was a 'History of English Literature' (1912). He also wrote biographies of Sir Stafford Northcote (1890) and J. G. Lockhart (1896), the latter one of the best works of this kind of the century.

Lang's novels, with the exception of 'The Mark of Cain' (1886) and 'The Disentanglers' (1902), were less remarkable. In his 'Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown' (1912) he took part, in defence of Shakespearean authorship, in the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy. Mention should be made of his two pleasant bibliographical works, 'The Library' (1881) and 'Books and Bookmen' (1887); and of his preface to his translation of Theocritus, his 'Letters to Dead Authors' (1886), 'In the Wrong Paradise', 'Old Friends', and 'Essays in Little', as some of his most delightful works. He collaborated with H. R. Haggard (q.v.) in 'The World's Desire' (1891), and with A. E. W. Mason in 'Parson Kelly' (1899). His collections of Fairy Tales, each volume named after a different colour, are well known.

LANGLAND, WILLIAM (1330?-1400?), poet, details of whose life are chiefly supplied from the work generally attributed to him, 'The Vision concerning Piers the Plowman' (q.v.). He was a native of the western Midlands, was probably educated at the monastery of Great Malvern, went to London, and was engaged on his great work, which appeared in three versions (in 1362, 1377, and 1392). But recent critical discussion of these three versions has left the question of their authorship undecided. Langland was possibly the author of 'Richard the Redeless', a poem written to remonstrate with Richard II.

Langtry, MRS. EMILY CHARLOTTE (1852-1929), a famous beauty, 'the Jersey Lily', daughter of the Very Rev. W. C. le Breton, Dean of Jersey. She married Edward Langtry in 1874, and after his death Sir Hugo de Bathe.

Languish, LYDIA, the heroine of Sheridan's 'The Rivals' (q.v.).

LANIER, SIDNEY (1842-81), American poet and critic, born at Macon, Georgia. During the Civil War he served in the Confederate Army. Among his books are: 'Florida' (1875), 'Poems' (1876), 'The Science of English Verse' (1880), 'The English Novel and its Development' (1883), 'Complete Poems' (1884).

Lantern-land, in Rabelais's 'Pantagruel', v. xxxiii, the country of learning, visited by Pantagruel and his companions on their way to the oracle of Bacchus. The lanterns are the philosophers and poets.

Laocöön, according to legend a Trojan priest of Apollo, who, when he was offering a sacrifice to Poseidon, saw two serpents issue from the sea and attack his sons. He rushed to their defence, but the serpents wreathed themselves about him and crushed him. This was said to be a punishment for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans from admitting the wooden horse into Troy.

Laodamia, the wife of Protésiläus, who was slain by Hector before Troy. Visited by the spectre of her dead husband, she could not bear to part with it, and followed it to the shades. Wordsworth wrote a poem on her.

Laodicean, one who has the fault for which the Church of Laodicea is reproached in Rev. iii. 15, 16; lukewarm, indifferent in religion or politics.

Laodicean, A, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1881.

LAODICEAN

The Laodicean is Miss Paula Power, the daughter of a successful railway contractor, a vacillating lukewarm character. She is first presented in a striking scene, faced with the ordeal of being baptized according to the rites of the Baptist persuasion to which her father belonged, and unable to take the plunge. We then see her vacillating between her love for George Somerset, a young architect of no particular position, and the offer of marriage of Captain De Stancy, the heir of an ancient family which once owned the castle in which she now lives. Her romantic inclinations make her accept the latter, but she is arrested at the eleventh hour by the discovery of a plot hatched by Willy Dare, an odious little villain, De Stancy's illegitimate son, to blacken George Somerset's character in her eyes. She marries her prosaic lover, her romantic castle is burnt to the ground, but she remains a Laodicean to the end.

Lookoön, an essay in literary and artistic criticism by Lessing (q.v.), published in 1766. It takes its title from the celebrated group of statuary disinterred at Rome in the 16th cent. representing Laocoön (q.v.) and his sons in the coils of a serpent. Adopting this group and the Horatian formula 'ut pictura poesis' ('poetry resembles painting') as the initial subject of discussion, Lessing examines the grounds for the divergence in the treatment of the scene by the artist and by Virgil who described it, and develops the essential differences between the art of poetry and the plastic arts. The work was left unfinished.

Lao-tze ('the Venerable Philosopher'), the great Chinese teacher and reputed founder of TAOISM, lived in the 6th cent. B.C. and was a contemporary of Confucius (q.v.), who visited him at least once. He appears to have been a librarian and historiographer at a royal court in what is now the province of Ho-nan.

The TAO TEH KING, which is attributed to him (the word T'ao is generally translated 'the way'), is a short and obscure work, putting forth the doctrine of simple, spontaneous, childlike, unselfish action, in the individual and in the government, as the foundation of general happiness. Its teaching is benevolent and humane, though not always practical. It recognizes the existence of a Supreme Being or Deity, and has been thought to be in some measure in harmony with Christianity. In later centuries Taoism developed into a far different polytheistic religion, borrowing elements from Buddhism, and assimilating many superstitions.

Lapithae, a race inhabiting Thessaly, chiefly famous in mythology for their fight with the Centaurs (q.v.) on the occasion of the marriage of Peirithōus, king of the Lapithae, with Hippodāmia.

Lara, a poem in heroic couplets by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1814.

'The Reader', says the publisher's advertisement, 'may probably regard ["Lara"] as a sequel to the "Corsair"' (q.v.). Lara is in fact Conrad, the pirate chief, returned to his domains in Spain, accompanied by his page, Kaled, who is Gulnare in disguise. He lives aloof and a mystery hangs over him. He is recognized, and involved in a feud in which he is finally killed, dying in the arms of Kaled. But the interest of the poem lies not in the story but in the character of Lara, in which one may see the author's conception of himself.

LARBAUD, VALÉRY (1881–), contemporary French author, among whose works are 'Enfantines' (1918), 'Fermina Marquez' (1920), 'Jaune, bleu, blanc' (1927).

Lārēs, Roman tutelary deities of the home. They are generally linked in Latin literature with the Penates, from whom they are scarcely distinguishable. Besides these private gods, there were Lares Compitales or Viales, worshipped by the community. Similarly there were both private and public Penates.

LAROUSSE, PIERRE ATHANASE (1817–75), French lexicographer, compiler of the 'Grand Dictionnaire universel du xix^e siècle', a vast encyclopaedia (1866–76). The present series of 'Dictionnaires Larousse' are independent works and are produced under the direction of Claude Augé.

Larrikin, the Australian equivalent of the hooligan, or street rough. The name arose in Melbourne not long before 1870, but its origin is uncertain; perhaps from Larry, the nickname for Lawrence.

Lars, a praenomen of Etruscan origin, in Etruscan usually the prefix of the first-born, while a younger son was called Aruns; an honorary appellation, equivalent to the English 'lord' (Lewis and Short). Thus, 'Lars Porsena', in Macaulay's lay of 'Horatius'.

Larynx, THE REV. MR., a character in Peacock's 'Nightmare Abbey' (q.v.).

LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE (1474?–1566), Spanish historian and bishop of Chaipa (Mexico), famous for his protest against the ill-treatment by his countrymen of the Indians of America, in his 'Very Brief Account of the Ruin of the Indies' (1542). He also wrote in his old age a general 'History of the Indies'.

Last Chronicle of Barse, The, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1866–7.

This is the last of the Barseshire series and the principal characters had already appeared in earlier works. It is chiefly occupied with the tribulations of the Rev. Josiah Crawley, the cross-grained perpetual curate of Hogglestock. Mr. Soames, agent to Lord Lufton, has lost a pocket-book containing a cheque for £20, and believes that he dropped it in

LAST CHRONICLE OF BARSET

Mr. Crawley's house. Subsequently Mr. Crawley has cashed this cheque and applied the proceeds to pay his bills. Called upon to explain whence he got it, he first states erroneously that he received it from Soames in payment of his stipend; then that it was part of a gift from Dean Arabin, which the latter (who is on a journey to Jerusalem) denies. Brought before the magistrates, Mr. Crawley is committed for trial but allowed bail. Then follows a period of persecution, principally instigated by Mrs. Proudie, wife of the bishop, which finally leads to Mr. Crawley's surrender of his incumbency. Meanwhile Major Grantly, son of the archdeacon, who is in love with Grace, Mr. Crawley's daughter, has insisted on engaging himself to her, thereby bringing about a breach with his father. When matters reach a crisis, the mystery of the origin of the cheque finds a simple explanation. It had been given to Crawley by Mrs. Arabin, being slipped into the envelope containing the dean's gift without the latter's knowledge. The cheque had been previously stolen from Soames by a servant and paid to Mrs. Arabin as money due to her. Mr. Crawley's innocence having been established, he is appointed to the living of St. Ewold's, vacant by the death of old Mr. Harding, and Grace is married to Major Grantly.

Of other characters in the Barsetshire drama we hear a good deal. John Eames continues unavailingly his suit of Lily Dale and becomes entangled in a dangerous flirtation with the intriguing Madalina Demolines; Mrs. Proudie dies, too soon to witness the rehabilitation of Mr. Crawley; and Lady Lufton, Mr. Robarts, the Greshams, and the Thornes also figure in the story.

Last Days of Pompeii, The, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1834.

The scene is laid at Pompeii, shortly before its destruction, and deals with the love of two young Greeks, Glaucus and Ione, and the villainous designs of Arbaces, the girl's guardian, who is enamoured of his ward. When the city is overwhelmed, the blind girl Nydia, who cherishes a hopeless passion for Glaucus, saves the lovers by leading them through the darkness to the sea. The work gives an interesting picture of Roman life at the time of the catastrophe (A.D. 79).

Last Man, The, the title of poems by Campbell and by Hood (qq.v.).

Last of the Barons, The, an historical novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1843.

The 'Last of the Barons' is Warwick the king-maker, and the historical events described in the novel occurred between 1467 and the death of Warwick at the battle of Barnet in 1471, that is to say in the last years of the feudal period. These events include the quarrel between Warwick and Edward IV over the marriage of Edward's sister, Margaret; their reconciliation and final dissension, this last attributed by the author to an attempt by Edward on the honour of Warwick's daughter Anne; the short-lived restoration of Henry VI, and the battle of Tewkesbury, fatal to Warwick and the Lancastrians. With these historical events is woven the tragic story of a poor philosopher and mechanical inventor, Adam Warner, and his beautiful daughter, Sibyll, beloved but deserted by the great Lord Hastings. After many vicissitudes, they meet their death as the result of popular prejudice and superstition, personified in the character of the astrologer, Friar Bungey.

Last Ride Together, The, a short poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Dramatic Romances', published in 'Men and Women' in 1855.

Last Tournament, The, one of A. Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), privately printed in 1871, and included in the published volume of 1889.

At the last tournament held at Arthur's court, the 'Tournament of the Dead Innocence', held on a wet and windy day, and presided over by the weary and disillusioned Lancelot, Tristram, late returned from Brittany, wins the prize, a carcanet (necklace) of rubies. Disloyal to his wife, Iseult of Brittany, he carries this to his paramour, Iseult, the wife of Mark. He finds her alone at Tintagel, and, as he clasps it round her neck,

Behind him rose a shadow and a shriek—
'Mark's way', said Mark, and clove him through the brain.

Arthur returns 'in the death-dumb autumn-dripping gloom' to find his home empty and Guinevere fled. A notable feature in the idyll is the moral uprightness of Dagonet the jester, who does not spare Tristram his scarcely veiled reproaches.

He was appointed bishop of Worcester in 1535, but resigned his bishopric and was kept in custody for a year, because he could not support the Act of the Six Articles (q.v.), 1539. His famous sermon 'of the plough' was preached in 1548. Latimer was committed to the Tower on Mary's accession, 1553; was sent to Oxford with Ridley and Crammer to defend his views before the leading divines of the University, 1554; and was condemned as a heretic and burnt at Oxford with Ridley on 16 Oct. 1555. His extant writings were edited for the Parker Society in 1844-5. They are notable for a simple vernacular style and for their graphic and vivid illustrations.

Latitudinarians, a name applied to those divines of the English Church in the 17th cent. who, while attached to episcopal government and forms of worship, regarded them as things indifferent. Hence applied to those who, though not sceptics, are indifferent to particular creeds and forms of worship.

Latōna, known to the Greeks as LETO, was the daughter of a Titan, and beloved by Zeus. Hera, jealous of her, sent the serpent Python to persecute her during her pregnancy. LAUD, WILLIAM (1573-1645), educated at St. John's College, Oxford, became predominant in the Church of England at Charles I's accession, being at the time bishop of St. David's. He was promoted successively to the sees of Bath and Wells and London, and became archbishop of Canterbury (1633). He supported the king in his struggle with the Commons and adopted the policy of enforcing uniformity in the Church of England. He was impeached of high treason by the Long Parliament in 1640, committed to the Tower in 1641, tried in 1644, condemned and beheaded in 1645. A few of his sermons were published in 1651, and a collected edition of his works in 1695-1700. In these he shows himself a sturdy defender of the Anglican Church as a national institution, resisting the claim of the Church of Rome to universality and infallibility, and equally resisting the claims of Puritanism. Laud gave some 1,300 manuscripts in eighteen different languages, and his collection of coins, to the Bodleian Library.

Lauder, WILLIAM (d. 1771), literary forger, a good classical scholar, was proved to have interpolated in the works of Masenius and Staphorstius (17th-cent. Latin poets) extracts from a Latin verse rendering of 'Paradise Lost'. Incidentally he proved that Milton had deeply studied the works of modern Latin poets.

Launce, a character in Shakespeare's 'Two Gentlemen of Verona' (q.v.).

Launcelot Gobbo, in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice' (q.v.), a clown, servant to Shylock.

Launcelot of the Lake, appears only late in the series of English Arthurian romances, though he is the subject of a great French prose work, 'Lancelot', of the 13th cent. He is the son of King Ban of Brittany, stolen in childhood by Vivienne, the Lady of the Lake, and brought by her, when he reached manhood, to Arthur's court. His story is first dealt with at length in English in the 14th-cent. poem 'Le Morte Arthur' (not Malory's). In this, Launcelot, a knight of the Round Table, is the lover of Queen Guinevere. King Arthur having proclaimed a tournament at Winchester, Launcelot goes secretly to the jousts. He is welcomed by the lord of Ascolot (Astolat, Guildford in Surrey). The daughter of the lord, Elaine the Fair Maid of Astolat, falls in love with him; though remaining faithful to the queen, he consents to wear the maid's sleeve at the tournament. There he takes the weaker side and is wounded by his kinsman, Sir Ector de Maris. He is carried to Ascolot and gives his own armour as a keepsake to Elaine. Gawain comes to Ascolot and the maid tells him that she is Launcelot's love, which Gawain reports to Arthur and his court, to Guinevere's distress. Launcelot returns, and being reproached by the queen, leaves the court in anger. The Maid of Ascolot is brought dead in a barge to Arthur's palace, a letter in her purse declaring that she has died for love of Launcelot. Launcelot and the queen are reconciled. Agravain (brother of Gawain) betrays them to the king, and with twelve knights surprises the lovers. Launcelot slays all except Modred (q.v.), escapes and carries off the queen, who is sentenced to the stake. Arthur and Gawain besiege Launcelot and the queen in Launcelot's castle Joyous Gard (q.v.). Launcelot restores the queen to Arthur and retires to Brittany, where Arthur and Gawain pursue him. Launcelot wounds Gawain. Modred seizes Arthur's kingdom, and tries to get possession of Guinevere. Arthur, returning, lands at Dover, where Gawain is slain. After several battles, Modred retreats to Cornwall. In the final battle all the knights are slain except Arthur, Modred, and two others. Arthur and Modred mortally wound each other, the sword Excalibur is thrown into the river, and Arthur is borne off to Avalon. Launcelot arrives to aid Arthur, and, finding him dead, seeks the queen, but finds that she has taken the veil. Launcelot becomes a priest and helps to guard Arthur's grave. On his death he is carried to Joyous Gard, and visions indicate that he has been received into heaven. The queen is buried with Arthur, and the abbey of Glastonbury rises over their graves.

The story as told in Malory's 'Morte Darthur' is substantially similar, but fuller, and more exploits are attributed to Launcelot. He is the first of the knights of the Round Table and takes part in the quest of the Holy Grail, of which he has glimpses but no more, being hindered by his sins. He is the father of Galahad by Elaine, daughter of King Pelleas. Gawain becomes Launcelot's bitter enemy, because Launcelot has slain his brothers, Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth. He prevents Arthur from making peace with Launcelot, when Arthur pursues the latter to Brittany.

Launfal, Sir, a poem by Thomas Chestre (fl. 1430). Sir Launfal, a Knight of the Round Table (q.v.), leaves the court, offended by the reputed misconduct of Queen Guinevere. He lives in poverty at Caerleon. Tryamour, the daughter of the fairy king of Olyroun, declares her love for him, gives him wealth, a horse, and a page, and promises to come to him unseen when he summons her, on condition that he does not reveal their love. He returns to Arthur's court, where Guinevere declares her love for him. He rejects her advances, saying that he loves a lady whose very maids are more beautiful than the queen. In consequence of this indiscreet speech, Launfal's horse and page and wealth disappear; the queen accuses him of trying to seduce her. At the trial he is required to produce within a certain period the lady of whose beauty he has boasted. After the expiration of the period Tryamour appears, justifies the knight, and breathing on the queen's eyes, blinds her. Tryamour and Launfal thereafter live in the Isle of Olyroun.

The story occurs in the lais of Marie de France (12th cent.). J. R. Lowell (q.v.) in his 'Vision of Sir Launfal' makes him one of those who sought the Holy Grail.

Laurie, ANNIE (1682-1764), the subject of the famous Scottish song that bears her name. She was the daughter of Sir Robert Laurie of Maxwellton, Dumfriesshire, and married Alexander Ferguson. The song was written by her rejected lover, William Douglas. It was revised and set to music by Lady John Scott in 1835.

Lavengro, the Scholar—the Gypsy—the Priest, a novel by Borrow (q.v.), published in 1851. 'Lavengro', in gipsy language, means 'philologist'. The name was applied to Borrow in his youth by Ambrose Smith, the Norfolk gipsy, who figures in this work as Jasper Petulengro.

In this book, as in 'The Romany Rye' and 'The Bible in Spain', autobiography is inextricably mingled with fiction. It purports to be the story, told by himself, of the son of a military officer, a wanderer from his birth, at first accompanying his father from station to station, and later under the impulse of his own restless spirit. In the course of his wanderings he makes the acquaintance of a family of gipsies, with whom he becomes intimate, and of many other strange characters, an Armenian, an old apple-woman, a tinker (the Flaming Tinman with whom he has a memorable fight), pickpockets and sharpers, and the like. In London he experiences the hardships of the life of a literary hack. He is much given to the comparative study of languages, of which the reader is told a good deal, and he shows his aversion to the Roman Catholic Church. The book closes in the midst of the romantic episode of Belle Berners, the sturdy wandering lass, which is resumed in the sequel, 'The Romany Rye' (q.v.).

Law, JOHN (1671-1729), educated at Edinburgh, escaped from prison after being sentenced to death for killing 'Beau' Wilson in a duel, and fled to France. With the support of the Regent he established in 1716 the first French bank, a successful venture on sound principles, and in 1717 a company to exploit the territories of Louisiana and later to trade also with the East Indies. In 1719, in return for the valuable privilege of farming the taxes, the company undertook to convert the French national debt, which bore interest at about 4%, into a debt to itself at 3%. Law was appointed controller-general of French finances in 1720. The conversion was mismanaged. Speculation on a vast scale in the shares of the company led to their gross overvaluation followed by the inevitable reaction. The scheme failed, involving widespread ruin. Law fled from France, and died a few years later in poverty at Venice.

LAW, WILLIAM (1686–1761), born at King's Cliffe near Stamford, was elected a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, but, declining to take the oath of allegiance to George I, lost his fellowship. Edward Gibbon made him the tutor of his son, the father of the historian, in 1728, and he remained as the honoured friend and spiritual director of the family until 1740, when he returned to King's Cliffe and became the centre of a small spiritual community.

Law's earlier writings are of a controversial character; he replied to bishop Benjamin Hoadly's latitudinarian doctrine in his 'Three Letters to the Bishop of Bangor', 1717–19 (see Bangorian Controversy); he wrote his 'Remarks on the Fable of the Bees' in 1723 in answer to Mandeville's satire of that name (q.v.); and to the deists he replied in 'The Case for Reason' (1731). But his chief claim to be remembered rests on his treatises of practical morality, 'A Practical Treatise on Christian Perfection' (1726), and more particularly his 'Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life', 1729, of which Wesley admitted that it sowed the seed of Methodism and said that it 'will hardly be excelled, if it be equalled, in the English tongue, either for beauty of expression or for justice and depth of thought'. Dr. Johnson attributed to his reading of it his first attention to religion. The work contains admirable portraits of typical characters, such as the man of affairs and the woman of fashion.

In his later life Law's writing assumed a mystical character. He was strongly influenced by Jacob Boehme (q.v.), and his treatises, 'An Appeal to all that Doubt' (1740) and 'The Way to Divine Knowledge' (1752), are in harmony with Boehme's teaching. See also Byrom.

LAWLESS, EMILY (1845–1913), daughter of Lord Cloncurry, was author of the successful Irish novels 'Hurriah' (1886) and 'Grania' (1892). Among her other works may be mentioned 'With Essex in Ireland' (1890) and 'With the Wild Geese' (poems, 1902). The 'Wild Geese' are the exiles who left Ireland after the surrender of Limerick in 1691.

LAWRENCE, DAVID HERBERT (1885–1930), poet and novelist, was author of some remarkable novels, among which the best known are perhaps 'Sons and Lovers' (1913), 'Aaron's Rod' (1922), 'Kangaroo' (1923), 'The Plumed Serpent' (1926), 'The White Peacock', 'The Rainbow', and 'The Prussian Officer' (1929), and 'Lady Chatterley's Lover' (1928; expurgated edition, 1932). His essay, 'Fantasia of the Unconscious', appeared in 1922. Lawrence published several volumes of poems, of which a collected edition appeared in 1928.

LAWRENCE, GEORGE ALFRED (1827–76), educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford, was the author of 'Guy Livingstone' (q.v., 1857), a novel that enjoyed great popularity, but was denounced in some quarters for its exaltation of the muscular blackguard. His other novels included 'Sword and Gown' (1859), 'Barren Honour', 'Sans Merci', &c.

Lawrence, SIR THOMAS (1769–1830), the son of an innkeeper at Devizes, president of the Royal Academy and principal portrait-painter in ordinary to George III. His works, which include portraits of Cowper and of John Kemble as Hamlet, are distinguished for their courtliness and social elegance.

LAWRENCE, THOMAS EDWARD (1888–1935), was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, became an archaeologist, and travelled and excavated in Syria. In the war of 1914–18 he was one of the British officers sent from Egypt to help the Sherif of Mecca in his revolt against the Turks. He gained a position of great influence with the Arabs, performed many daring exploits, and entered Damascus in 1918 with the leading Arab forces. His narrative of these experiences, 'The Seven Pillars of Wisdom', was printed for private circulation in a limited edition in 1926 (published in 1935); a shortened version, 'Revolt in the Desert', was published in 1927. After the War he joined the Royal Air Force as an aircraftsman, changing his name to Shaw by deed-poll in 1927.

Laws of Ecclesiastical Politie, Of the, by Hooker (q.v.), a philosophical and theological treatise of which four books appeared in 1594, the fifth in 1597. The last three books, as we have them, were not published until after Hooker's death, and do not represent work prepared by him for the press. The sixth and eighth appeared in 1648, the seventh was first included in Gauden's edition of 1662. The whole was reissued with a life of Hooker by Izaak Walton in 1666.

The work is a defence, written in a dignified and harmonious prose, of the position of the Anglican Church against the attacks of the Puritans. The first book is a philosophical discussion of the origin and nature of law in general, as governing the universe and human society, and of the distinction between laws of a permanent and of a temporary character. The second, third, and fourth books deal with the assertion of the Puritan party that Scripture is the sole guide in determining the actions of a Christian and the form of Church polity, and that the Anglican Church is corrupted with popish rites and ceremonies. The fifth book is a defence of the Book of Common Prayer. According to Hooker's scheme, the last three books were to deal with Church discipline, the power of jurisdiction (whether of the bishops, or lay elders), and the nature of the king's supreme authority. The principal characteristics of the work are its breadth of outlook and tolerant spirit, and its advocacy of intellectual liberty against the dogmatism of Calvin and the ecclesiastical despotism recommended in the 'Admonition to Parliament', a statement of the Puritan case by John Field and Thomas Wilcox (1572).

Lay, a short lyric or narrative poem intended to be sung; originally applied specifically to the poems, usually dealing with matter of history or romantic adventure, which were sung by minstrels.

Lay of the Last Minstrel, The, a poem in six cantos by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1805. It is in irregular stanzas of lines of four accents and seven to twelve syllables. This was Scott's first important original work. It is a metrical romance, put in the mouth of an ancient minstrel, the last of his race. It is based on an old Border legend of the goblin Gilpin Horner. The period of the tale is the middle of the 16th cent.

The lady of Branksome Hall, the seat of the Buccleuchs, has lost her husband in an affray in which Lord Cranstoun was one of his opponents. Lord Cranstoun and Margaret, the lady's daughter, are in love, but the feud renders their passion hopeless. The lady commissions Sir William Deloraine to recover from the tomb of the wizard Michael Scott in Melrose Abbey the magic book which is to help her in her vengeance. As Deloraine returns, he encounters Lord Cranstoun and is wounded by him. At Lord Cranstoun's bidding, his elfin page carries the wounded man to Branksome Hall, and, impelled by the spirit of mischief, lures away the lady's little son, the heir of the house, who falls into the hands of her English enemy, Lord Dacre. The latter, with Lord William Howard, intends to storm Branksome, alleging Deloraine's misdeeds as a Border thief. The Scots army is on its way to relieve Branksome. A single combat is suggested between Sir William Deloraine, now lying wounded, and Sir Richard Musgrave, whose lands Deloraine has harried; the lady's little son to be the prize. The challenge is accepted and Musgrave defeated. It is discovered that the victor is Lord Cranstoun, who with his page's assistance has assumed the form and arms of Deloraine. This service rendered to the house of Buccleuch heals the feud, and Lord Cranstoun marries Margaret.

The poem includes some notable ballads, such as that of Albert Graeme and the touching 'Rosabelle'; also a version of the Latin hymn 'Dies Irae'.

LAYS OF THE SCOTTISH CAVALIERS

LAYAMON or LAWEMON (meaning Lawman) (fl. 1200), according to his own statement a priest of Ernley (Arley Regis, Worcester), author of a 'Brut' or history of England from the arrival of the legendary Brutus to Cadwalader (A.D. 689), based directly or indirectly on Wace's French version of the 'Historia Regum Britanniae' of Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.), with additions from Breton or Norman sources. It is especially interesting as giving for the first time in English not only the story of Arthur, but also that of Lear and Cymbeline and other personages dealt with in later English literature. It is the first considerable work in Middle English and is said to show no little literary power. It is written in the Old English alliterative line of two short sections, but the alliteration is frequently abandoned and rhyme is occasionally introduced. The standard text is that of Sir F. Madden, 1847.

LAYARD, SIR AUSTEN HENRY (1817-94), the excavator of Nineveh, and in later life under-secretary for foreign affairs and British minister successively at Madrid and Constantinople. He published his 'Nineveh and its Remains' in 1848-9, his 'Popular Account of Discoveries at Nineveh' in 1851, 'Nineveh and Babylon' in 1853, and 'Early Adventures in Persia, Susiana, and Babylonia' in 1887.

Lays of Ancient Rome, by Macaulay (q.v.), published in 1842.

These are attempts to reconstruct, in English form, the lost ballad-poetry of Rome out of which its traditional history was thought to have grown. The lays are: 'Horatius', dealing with the valiant defence by Horatius Cocles of the bridge leading to Rome against the Tuscan bands; 'The Battle of Lake Regillus', in which the Romans, aided by the gods Castor and Pollux, defeated the Latins; 'Virginia', the story of the slaying of a young Roman maiden by her father Virginius, to save her from the lust of the patrician Appius Claudius; and 'The Prophecy of Capys' the blind seer, who foretells to Romulus the great future of the Roman race.

In the edition of 1848 there were added: 'Ivry', a ballad of the victory of the Huguenots under Henry of Navarre at that place in 1590; and the fragment 'The Armada', describing the scenes in England on the arrival of the news that the Spanish fleet was coming.

Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers, a collection of ballads by Aytoun (q.v.), of which the first, the 'Burial March of Dundee', appeared in 'Blackwood's Magazine' in April 1843, and the whole were published in 1849.

They are ballad-romances, in the style of those of Scott, dealing with such subjects as the pilgrimage of Sir James Douglas to the Holy Land to bury there the heart of Bruce, and—the best of them—'The Island of the Scots', an exploit of the company of old officers of Dundee's army serving the French king against the Germans.

LAZARILLO DE TORMES

Lazarillo de Tormes, the first of the Spanish picaresque (q.v.) romances, of uncertain authorship, printed in 1553. It is the autobiography of the son of a miller, who lived on the banks of the Tormes, near Salamanca. The boy begins his career of wit and fraud as a blind man's guide, whose money and virtuels he steals. He passes into the service of various poverty-stricken or rascally employers, and ultimately reaches the position of town-crier of Toledo. His career provides occasion for many satirical portraits of Spanish types.

LE FANU, JOSEPH SHERIDAN (1814-73), great-grand-nephew of R. B. Sheridan (q.v.), was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. His principal novels and stories, in which he successfully introduced the element of the mysterious and the terrible, include 'Uncle Silas' (q.v., 1864), 'The House by the Churchyard' (1863), and 'In a Glass Darkly' (1872, containing 'The Watcher', 'The Room in the Dragon Volant', &c.). Le Fanu also wrote a drama 'Beatrice', and some good Irish ballads ('Shamus O'Brien', 1837, is the best known) and other poems.

Le Fevre, the hero of an episode in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v., vol. vi).

LE SAGE, ALAIN RENÉ (1668-1747), a French novelist and dramatist, whose first important work was 'Le Diable Boiteux' (q.v., 1707), followed in 1709 by 'Turcaret', a comedy satirizing the plutocratic basis of society; and in 1715-35 by the famous picaresque romance 'Gil Blas' (q.v.), which gives a wonderful picture of Spanish life, though the author's knowledge of Spain was solely derived from Spanish writers.

Leabhar Gabhala, 'Book of Invasions', a Celtic record of legendary invasions of Ireland. The earliest copy of it is in the 'Book of Leinster', a 12th-cent. manuscript.

LEACOCK, STEPHEN BUTLER (1869-1944), political economist, but better known as a writer of humorous stories, among which are 'Nonsense Novels' (1911), 'Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town' (1912), 'Frenzied Fiction' (1917), 'Winsome Winnie' (1920).

Leadenhall Market, London, which takes its name from the hall with lead roof which stood at the corner of Gracechurch Street, lies at the crossing of the two main thoroughfares, north and south, and east and west, which traversed the Roman city. Remains of an important Roman building have been found there, and the spot has probably been devoted to public service ever since.

Leadenhall Street, a street in the City of London in which stood the offices of the old East India Company. The name was frequently used to designate the Company.

Leader, The, a weekly periodical started in 1849 by Lewes (q.v.) and Thornton Leigh Hunt, with a staff that included Spencer (q.v.) and Kinglake (q.v.).

LEAR, EDWARD (1812-88), artist and traveller, as well as author, wrote 'The Book of Nonsense' (1846) for the grandchildren of his patron, the earl of Derby, which did much to popularize the 'Limerick' (q.v.); 'Nonsense Songs, Stories, and Botany' (1870); and accounts (illustrated by his own drawings) of his travels in Greece and southern Italy. The last drew from Tennyson the poem to 'E. L.', 'Illyrian woodlands, echoing falls'.

Lease-Lend. On 17 December 1940 President Roosevelt at his Press conference suggested that the U.S. should take over British orders for supplies, turn them into American orders, and then lease the material produced to Britain or sell it under mortgage. On 6 January 1941, addressing Congress, he developed this suggestion, proposing that supplies thus furnished should be repaid within a reasonable time in similar materials or in other goods, and asked for funds to carry out the proposal. On 10 January 1941 the draft of an Act authorizing the President to give help on this basis to countries resisting aggression (the 'Lease and Lend Bill') was submitted to Congress, and passed with amendments on 11 March 1941. The principle was further elaborated and made reciprocal in the Agreement of 23 February 1942 between the U.S. and Great Britain.

Public Opinion in Ireland', which at the time met with little success. After travelling in Spain and Italy he published an essay on 'The Declining Sense of the Miraculous' (1863), which subsequently formed the first two chapters of his 'History of Rationalism' (1865). In this he traced the progress of the spirit of rationalism and tolerance as opposed to theological dogmatism. The work first brought him into fame. In 1869 he published his 'History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne', describing man's changing estimate of the various virtues and its effect on happiness. Lecky next set himself to collect materials for his 'History of England in the Eighteenth Century', of which the first two volumes appeared in 1878, and the others at various dates to 1890. It is concerned primarily with the history of political ideas and institutions, and social and economic history; while biographical, party, and military matters are accorded less space. The last volumes are devoted to the history of Ireland and designed to refute Froude's misstatements. Lecky's later works were: 'Democracy and Liberty', a study of social and political questions in England, France, Germany, and America (1896); a revised edition of 1899 gave an admirable estimate of Gladstone's work and character; 'The Map of Life' (1899), and 'Historical and Political Essays' (1908). Lecky was M.P. for Dublin University from 1895 to 1902.

Leda, a daughter of Thestius, and wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. She was seen bathing in the river Eurotas by Zeus, who became enamoured of her and took the form of a swan in order to approach her. Of their union were born Castor (q.v.) and Pollux, and Helen (q.v.).

Lee, SIR HENRY, COLONEL ALBERT, and ALICE, characters in Scott's 'Woodstock' (q.v.).

LEE, NATHANIEL (1653?-92), was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He failed as an actor and became a playwright, producing 'Nero' in 1675, and 'Gloriana' and 'Sophonisba', in heroics, in 1676. His best-known tragedy 'The Rival Queens' (q.v.), in blank verse, appeared in 1677, 'Mithridates' in 1678, 'Theodosius', which enjoyed a long popularity, in 1680, and 'Lucius Junius Brutus' in 1681. He collaborated with Dryden in 'Oedipus' (1679) and 'The Duke of Guise' (1682). He lost his reason and was confined in Bedlam from 1684 to 1689. He produced 'The Massacre of Paris' in 1690, and went mad once more, escaped from his keepers, and perished. His plays, which are marked by rant and extravagance, were long popular.

'D.N.B.' from the beginning, joint editor in 1890, and sole editor from 1891. His publications include 'Stratford-on-Avon from the Earliest Times to the Death of Shakespeare' (1885, new edition 1906), 'Life of William Shakespeare' (1898, revised edition, 1915), 'Life of Queen Victoria' (1902), 'Great Englishmen of the 16th Century' (1904), 'Elizabethan Sonnets' (1904), 'Shakespeare and the Modern Stage' (1906), 'The French Renaissance in England' (1910), 'Principles of Biography' (1911), 'Shakespeare and the Italian Renaissance' (1915), 'Life of King Edward VII' (1925-7).

LEE, VERNON, pseudonym of VIOLET PAGET (1856-1935), English essayist and novelist.

Leech, JOHN (1817-64), the son of a coffee-house keeper on Ludgate Hill, was educated at Charterhouse. He contributed drawings to 'Punch' from 1841 till his death, among them 600 cartoons. The drawings give a delightful picture of the social life of the age, with its crinolines and whiskers, and the humours of sport. Leech's first popular hit was a caricature of Mulready's design for a universal envelope (1840).

LEFROY, EDWARD CRACROFT (1855-91), author of some remarkable sonnets, 'Echoes from Theocritus, and other Sonnets', published in 1885.

Legend, SIR SAMPSON, a character in Congrave's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Legend of Good Women, The, written by Chaucer (q.v.) probably between 1372 and 1386, was his first experiment in the heroic couplet.

The poem begins with an allegorical prologue (of which there are two versions extant) in which the god of love rebukes the poet for the reflections on the fidelity of women contained in the 'Romaunt of the Rose' and 'Troilus and Cryseyde'. Alceste, his queen, defends the poet, but directs that he shall write henceforth in praise of women. The poet accordingly narrates nine stories of good women, classical heroines: Cleopatra, Thisbe, Dido, Hypsipyle and Medea, Lucrece, Ariadne, Philomela, Phyllis, and Hypermnestra. The matter is taken from the Heroides of Ovid, and various authors.

Tennyson refers to the poem in 'A Dream of Fair Women':

'The Legend of Good Women', long ago Sung by the morning star of song, who made
His music heard below.

Legend of Montrose, A, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1819, the last of the 'Tales of My Landlord'.

It is the story of the campaign of 1644, in which the Highland clans, having risen in favour of Charles I and against the Covenanters of their own country, inflicted a succession of defeats on their opponents, thanks in great measure to the skilful generalship of their great commander, the earl of Montrose, whose character the author strongly contrasts with that of his rival, the marquess of Argyle.

With this for historical background, the author tells the tale, which also has some basis of fact, of a barbarous murder committed by a small clan of Highland bandits, the Children of the Mist, and of the tragic events following thereon. Allan M'Aulay, the nephew of the murdered man, obsessed with the thirst for vengeance, grows up moody and violent, and passionately loves Annot Lyle, a young girl whom in one of his forays against his uncle's murderers he has rescued from them. She, however, returns the love of the gallant young earl of Menteith. Both Allan and Menteith are prevented from pressing their suit by the obscurity in which the birth of Annot Lyle is involved. When the leader of the caterans reveals on his death-bed that Annot is the daughter of Sir Duncan Campbell, her marriage with Menteith becomes possible, but is interrupted by Allan, who furiously attacks and stabs his rival, and then disappears.

The gloom of the story is relieved by the character of Captain Dugald Dalgetty, a mixture of the loquacious pedant, who makes great show of the knowledge gained at the Marischal College of Aberdeen, and the brave but self-seeking soldier of fortune; he has served indifferently under Gustavus and Wallenstein, and is prepared to do so under King Charles or the Covenanters according to the prospects offered by each.

Légouls, ÉMILE (1861-1937), an eminent French critic of English literature.

LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM (1646-1716), German philosopher and mathematician, born at Leipzig, was the founder of the Society (later Academy) of Sciences at Berlin. He discovered the infinitesimal calculus at about the same time as Newton, but by a different method. As a philosopher he was inspired by Descartes, Spinoza, and Hobbes (qq.v.), but broke away from Descartes's mechanical conception of the universe. Matter he regarded as a multitude of monads, each a nucleus of force and a microcosm or concentration of the universe. Admitting that the interaction of spirit and matter is inexplicable, he assumed a 'pre-established harmony' between them: the spirit is modified by final causes, bodies by efficient causes; the two series are brought together, like two clocks ticking in unison (the simile is Voltaire's), by a harmony established from all time by God, the supreme monad and perfect exemplar of the human soul. His system is embodied in his 'Theo-

Leigh, AMYAS, the hero of C. Kingsley's 'Westward Ho' (q.v.).

Leigh, AUGUSTA, half-sister of Lord Byron (q.v.), being the daughter of his father by the latter's earlier marriage with Lady Conyers. Her relations with Lord Byron were the object of Lady Byron's jealousy and occasioned their separation.

Lella, (1) in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.), the Mohammedan child whom Juan rescues at the siege of Ismail; (2) in Byron's 'The Giaour' (q.v.), the unfortunate heroine.

Leinster, Book of, an Irish MS. of the 12th cent., containing stories of Gaelic mythology, in particular the feats of Cuchulain (q.v.).

LELAND, CHARLES GODFREY (1824-1903), a native of Philadelphia, U.S., remembered as the author of 'Hans Breitmann's Ballads', of which the first appeared in 1857, and which were finally assembled in 1914. These humorous verses have for their theme the demoralizing effect of the American social environment on a German gentleman, the product of the old-world civilization. Leland was an authority on the gipsies, and translated all Heine's prose works into English.

LELAND or LEYLAND, JOHN (1506?-52), the earliest of modern English antiquaries, was educated at St. Paul's School, London, and Christ's College, Cambridge. He studied at Paris, took holy orders, became library-keeper to Henry VIII before 1530, and king's antiquary, 1533. He made an antiquarian tour through England, 1534-43, intending his researches to be the basis of a great work on the 'History and Antiquities of this Nation', but he left in fact merely a mass of undigested notes. In 'A New Year's Gift' (1545) he described to the king the manner and aims of his researches. He became insane in 1550. 'Leland's Itinerary' was first published at Oxford in nine volumes (1710), and his 'Collectanea' in six (1715). Leland claimed to have 'conserved many good authors, the which otherwise had been like to have perished', in the dissolution of the religious houses. There is a good edition of the 'Itinerary' by Lucy Toulmin Smith (1906-7).

Lernnos, one of the largest islands in the Aegean. Hephaestus (Vulcan) is said to have fallen there when hurled from Olympus by Zeus. The Argonauts (q.v.) visited it and found it peopled by women, who had killed their husbands (see Hypsipyle). On this account and because of the murder by the later Pelasgian occupants of the island of the Attic women they had brought with them and their children, 'Lemnian deeds' became proverbial in Greece for atrocious deeds. See also Terra Sigillata.

LEMON, MARK (1809-70), is remembered as one of the founders and first joint-editors, and subsequently sole editor, of 'Punch' (q.v.). He also published farces, melodramas, and operas, and besides contributing to 'Household Words' and other periodicals, was editor of the 'Family Herald' and 'Once a Week'.

LEMPRIÈRE, JOHN (d. 1824), classical scholar; author of 'Bibliotheca Classica' (Classical Dictionary), 1788, which has become a standard work of reference and has been revised and enlarged from time to time.

Lēmūres, the name given by the Romans to the spirits of the dead, regarded as maleficent, who were supposed to rove at night, haunting houses and frightening the occupants. The LEMURIA was a festival designed to propitiate them.

Lemuria, the name proposed by Philip Lutley Sclater, the zoologist, for the supposed lost continent between Madagascar and Malaya, which would account for the peculiar geographical distribution of the lemur, a small mammal akin to the monkey. Cf. Gondwana.

Lenclos, ANNE, known as NINON DE LENCLOS (1620-1705), a Frenchwoman noted for her beauty and wit, which she retained to a very advanced age, depicted by Mlle Scudéry as 'Clarisse' in her 'Clélie'. She had many celebrities for her lovers, and her salon was frequented by St. Évremond, Molière, the youthful Voltaire, &c.

LENNOX, Mrs. CHARLOTTE (1720-1804), daughter of Colonel James Ramsay, lieutenant-governor of New York, where she was born, was author of a novel, 'The Female Quixote' (1752), and a 'Shakespeare Illustrated', to both of which Dr. Johnson wrote dedications. She also wrote a comedy, 'The Sister', acted in 1769.

Lenore, the heroine of a celebrated ballad by Gottfried August Bürger (1747-94), a German poet. Lenore is carried off on horseback by the spectre of her lover after his death and married to him at the grave's side. Sir W. Scott's translation or imitation of the ballad was one of his first poetical works; it appeared as 'William and Helen' in 'The Chase and William and Helen', published anonymously in 1796.

Leo, the 5th sign of the zodiac; also a constellation, which, according to mythology, was originally the Nemean lion killed by Hercules (q.v.).

Leo Hunter, Mrs., a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Leo X, Giovanni de' Medici, Pope 1513-21, a patron of literature and art, notably of Raphael (see Raffaello). It fell to him to deal with the theses of Luther, whom he excommunicated in 1520. It was he who gave Henry VIII the title of 'Defender of the Faith'. See also Laurentian Library.

LEO, JOHANNES, generally known as LEO AFRICANUS (c. 1494-1552), a Moor born in Spain, who travelled widely in Africa (the Sudan, the Sahara, the Niger basin, Egypt). He was captured by pirates while returning by sea from Egypt, and given as a slave to Leo X, who induced him to become a Christian, and gave him his own names Johannes and Leo. Leo Africanus was author of a 'Description of Africa', of which the Italian text survives (1526).

Leo the Isaurian or Iconoclast, Byzantine emperor, 718-41, famous for his edict proscribing the veneration of images, which was repudiated by Pope Gregory II (726-31).

Leodegrance, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', king of Camelard, and father of Guinevere.

LEON, FRAY LUIS PONCE DE (c. 1528-91), a Spanish Augustinian monk, celebrated as a mystic poet. A life of him by James Fitzmaurice-Kelly was published in 1921.

Leonarda, DAME, in Le Sage's 'Gil Blas' (q.v.), the old cook in the robber's cave.

LEONARDO DA VINCI (1452-1519), the great Italian painter, sculptor, and engineer. He was a pupil of Verrochio, and worked for a time at Florence, but subsequently entered the service of the Duke Ludovico Sforza at Milan, where he carried out one of his most famous works, the fresco of the 'Last Supper' in the refectory of Sta Maria delle Grazie. He subsequently went to Rome and finally accepted employment under Francis I of France. He died at the Château de Cloux, near Amboise, which had been assigned to him as a residence. His extant paintings are not numerous; they include the famous 'La Gioconda' ('La Joconde'), or portrait of Mona Lisa (q.v.), in the Louvre. He was author of many treatises on art and science, including the celebrated 'Trattato della Pittura'.

Leonato, in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado' (q.v.), the father of Hero and uncle of Beatrice.

Leonidas, king of Sparta (491-480 B.C.), the hero of the defence of the pass of Thermopylae in 480 B.C. against the invading army of Xerxes.

LEONINE CITY

Leonine City, the part of Rome in which the Vatican stands, walled and fortified by Leo IV because of the Saracen invasions.

Leonine verse, a kind of Latin verse much used in the Middle Ages, consisting of hexameters, or alternate hexameters and pentameters, in which the last word rhymes with that preceding the caesura; for instance:

His replicans clare tres causas explico quare
More Leonino dicere metra sino.

The term is applied to English verse of which the middle and last syllables rhyme. It is derived, according to Du Cange, from the name of a certain poet Leo, who lived about the time of Louis VII of France (1137-80) or his successor Philippe-Auguste (1180-1223).

Leonora, (1) 'the unfortunate jilt', an episode in Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.); (2) the original name of Beethoven's one opera, based on a libretto by Bouilly, and produced as 'Fidelio' in 1805. Fidelio is the name assumed by Leonora when, disguised as a boy, she rescues from captivity her husband Florestan, a state prisoner; (3) Bürger's ballad, see Lenore.

Leonora d'Este, sister of Alfonso II, duke of Ferrara, with whom (according to a story now declared untrue) the poet Torquato Tasso (q.v.) fell in love, and was in consequence imprisoned in a madhouse. The legend is the foundation of Byron's 'The Lament of Tasso'.

Leontes, in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.), the husband of Hermione.

Leontius, a character in Fletcher's 'The Humorous Lieutenant' (q.v.).

LEOPARDI, GIACOMO (1798-1837), Italian poet and scholar, an invalid from his youth, the author of some of the finest poetry in modern Italian literature, classic in form and imbued with melancholy and pessimism. His works, small in total bulk, include patriotic odes ('To Italy', 'On the Monument of Dante', 1819, are among the finest) and a score or two of short poems, and essays, dialogues, &c., in prose, showing a wide scholarship ('Operette Morali', 1827).

Leporello, the valet of Don Giovanni in Mozart's opera of that name, and of Don Juan in Shadwell's 'The Libertine'. (In Molière's comedy 'Le Festin de Pierre', Don Juan's valet is Sganarelle.)

Leprechaun, a fabulous creature of Irish folk-lore, who makes shoes for the fairies and knows where treasures lie hidden.

Terpander, Alcaeus, Sappho, and Arion (qq.v.). Hence 'Lesbian' is sometimes used to signify 'pertaining to or resembling Sappho' in the perverted character attributed to her.

Lesly, LUDOVIC, 'le Balafre', a character in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.).

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM (1729-81), German critic and dramatist. He was educated at Leipzig University, was the critic of the National Theatre at Hamburg (1765-9), and in 1770 became librarian to the duke of Brunswick, living for the remainder of his life at Wolfenbüttel. As a dramatist his principal works were: the serious comedy 'Minna von Barnhelm' (1763); 'Emilia Gallotti' (1772), a tragedy on a social theme; and 'Nathan the Wise' (1779), a plea for religious tolerance. Lessing was, in the words of Macaulay, 'beyond all dispute, the first critic in Europe', who emancipated German literature from the narrow conventions of the French classical school, and one of the principal figures of the 'Aufklärung' or 'Enlightenment'. His chief critical works were the 'Litteraturbriefe' (1759-65), the 'Laokoön' (q.v., 1766) on the limits of the several arts, and the 'Hamburgische Dramaturgie' (1767-9).

Lesson of the Master, The, a story by Henry James (q.v.), published in 1892, which conveys the message that art is a jealous and exacting mistress.

Lester, MADELINE, the heroine of Bulwer Lytton's 'Eugene Aram' (q.v.).

L'ESTRANGE, SIR ROGER (1616-1704), of a good Norfolk family, probably studied at Cambridge and was one of the earliest of English journalists and writers of political pamphlets. He was an active Royalist and was obliged to flee the country during the parliamentary wars. He wrote a number of pamphlets in favour of the monarchy and against the army leaders and Presbyterians. After the Restoration, in 1663, he was appointed surveyor of printing presses and licenser of the press. He issued the 'Intelligencer' and 'The News' during 1663-6, but these were ousted by the 'London Gazette' of Henry Muddiman (q.v.). He also perhaps projected the 'City Mercury' in 1675. His political activities in connexion with the Popish Plot again obliged him to leave the country for a while in 1680. In his periodical 'The Observer' (1681-7) he attacked the Whigs, Titus Oates, and the dissenters. He was knighted in 1685. At the revolution he was deprived of his office and repeatedly imprisoned. He was an accomplished linguist and produced many translations, notably of the 'Colloquies' of Erasmus (1680 and 1689), of Aesop's 'Fables' (1692 and 1699), of the 'Visions' of Quevedo (1668), and of the works of Josephus (1702).

Lestrigionians, see Laestrigones.

Lêthê, a Greek word meaning 'oblivion', the name of one of the rivers of Hades, of which the souls of the dead about to be reincarnated were supposed to drink. It had the power of making them forget their past lives.

Letitia Hardy, the heroine of Mrs. Cowley's 'The Belle's Stratagem' (q.v.).

Leto, see Latona.

Letter to a Noble Lord on the attacks made upon him and his pension in the House of Lords by the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Lauderdale, by E. Burke (q.v.), published in 1796.

Burke retired from Parliament in 1794 and received a pension from the government of Pitt. This grant was criticized in the House of Lords, principally by the peers above named, as excessive in amount and inconsistent with Burke's own principles of economical reform. Burke replied in one of the greatest masterpieces of irony and feeling in the English language, comparing his own services to the State with those rendered by the duke of Bedford and his house, which had been the recipient of enormous grants from the Crown.

Letter to Sir William Wyndham, A, written in 1717 by Viscount Bolingbroke (q.v.) while in exile, was his first important contribution to political literature. It was not published until 1753. It is intended to vindicate his conduct during the period 1710-15, and to persuade the Tories to renounce all idea of a Jacobite restoration. To that end he recounts his relations with Harley and the Tories, his fall from power and attainder, his relations with the Pretender, and in particular detail the disastrous failure of the Jacobite rising of 1715 and his own dismissal by the Pretender. The facts are misrepresented, but the 'Letter' is a brilliant and effective piece of writing, notably in the invective against Harley and the sarcastic description of the Pretender's court in 1715.

Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, A, by E. Burke (q.v.), published in 1777.

The American War had at this time followed its disastrous course for two years. The letter begins with a protest against certain acts of parliament subjecting the rebels to exceptional legal disabilities, treating them in fact as traitors, and passes to a review of the present humiliating situation. Burke goes on to defend the course that he has taken. Asserting his zeal for the supremacy of Parliament, he defines the problem which the exercise of this supremacy involves: 'to conform our government to the character and circumstances of the several people who compose this mighty and strangely diversified' empire. The scheme of taxing America is incompatible with this conception of imperial policy, and Burke has consequently voted for the pacification of 1766, and even for the surrender of the whole right of taxation.

Letters to Archdeacon Singleton, by Sydney Smith (q.v.), published in 1837.

LEVIATHAN

In these three letters the author argues against the attempts of the Reformed Government (through the Ecclesiastical Commission) to interfere with the incomes of the clergy.

Leucadia, an island in the Ionian Sea (Leucas, Santa Maura), on the southern promontory of which stood a temple of Apollo. At the annual festival of the god, it was the custom to throw a criminal into the sea, as an expiatory rite. This gave rise to the story that unhappy lovers threw themselves from 'Leucadia's Rock' (Byron, 'Don Juan', ii. 205), and that Sappho leapt from it in despair at her unrequited love for Phaon.

Leucothœa, the name of the sea-goddess into whom Ino (q.v.) was changed.

LEVER, CHARLES JAMES (1806-72), was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and practised medicine. He contributed much of his early work to the 'Dublin University Magazine', which he edited during 1842-5. His 'Harry Lorrequer' appeared there in 1837, 'Charles O'Malley' in 1840, 'Jack Hinton the Guardsman' in 1843, 'Tom Burke of Ours' and 'Arthur O'Leary' in 1844, 'The O'Donoghue' in 1845, and 'The Knight of Gwynne' in 1847. He then settled at Florence, where he wrote 'Con Cregan' (1849), 'Roland Cashel' (1850), 'Maurice Tiernay' (1852), and 'The Dodd Family Abroad' (1853-4). His last works included 'A Day's Ride' (1863), 'Cornelius O'Dowd' (1864), 'Luttrell of Arran' (1865), and 'Lord Kilgobbin' (1872). His vivid rollicking pictures of military life and of the hard-drinking fox-hunting Irish society of his days were very popular. There is an amusing parody of Lever in Thackeray's 'Novels by Eminent Hands'.

Leviathan, a Hebrew word of uncertain origin, the name of some aquatic animal (real or imaginary) frequently mentioned in Hebrew poetry. It is used in English in this and various figurative senses, e.g. a ship of great size, a man of formidable power, &c.

Leviathan, The, or the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil, a treatise of political philosophy by Hobbes (q.v.), published in 1651.

By 'The Leviathan' the author signified sovereign power. The basis of his political philosophy is that man is not, as Aristotle held, naturally a social being, recognizing the claims of the community upon him and sharing in its prosperity, but a purely selfish creature, seeking only his own advantage and resisting the competing claims of others. The result is 'contention, enmity, and war'. The 'state of nature' is one of general war, and 'the notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, have there no place'. There is 'continual fear; and the life of man is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short'. To escape from these intolerable conditions man has adopted certain 'articles of peace', those 'Laws of Nature' 'by which a man is forbidden to do that which is destructive of his life' and of which the science is 'true moral philosophy'. Virtue is 'the means of peaceable, sociable, comfortable living'. The first law of nature is 'that every man ought to endeavour peace'. The second is 'that a man be willing, when others are so too, to lay down his right to all things; and be contented with so much liberty against other men, as he would allow other men against himself'. The third is 'that men perform their covenants made'.

To enforce these covenants it is necessary to establish an external power, which shall punish their infraction; accordingly all individuals must enter into a contract 'to confer all their power and strength upon one man, or upon an assembly of men'. 'This done, the multitude so united in one person, is called a commonwealth.' This representative person is sovereign, and his power is inalienable. The contract is not between the subjects and the sovereign, but only between the subjects. The sovereign power is indivisible; it cannot for instance be divided between king and parliament. Hobbes is careful to repudiate the rival claim of the Church to control over the citizen, which involves either a division of sovereign power, or the absorption of the State in the Church. He accordingly makes the Church subordinate to the State.

The absolute power thus given to the sovereign is however subject to certain limits. There is liberty to refuse obedience if the command of the sovereign frustrates the end for which the sovereignty was ordained, i.e. the preservation of the life of the individual. Moreover, the obligation of subjects to the sovereign is understood to last so long as, and no longer than, 'the power lasteth, by which he is able to protect them'. The sovereign finally is responsible to God, if not to his subjects, for the proper discharge of his office.

LEWES, GEORGE HENRY (1817-78), a versatile writer, was the author of a popular 'Biographical History of Philosophy' (1845-6), a 'Life of Goethe' (1855), 'Seaside Studies' (1858), 'Physiology of Common Life' (1859), 'Studies of Animal Life' (1862), and 'Problems of Life and Mind' (1873-9), this last a philosophical work of considerable importance. Lewes collaborated with Thornton Leigh Hunt in the 'Leader' in 1850 and edited the 'Fortnightly Review' in 1856-6. He made the acquaintance in 1851 of Mary Ann Evans ('George Eliot') and in 1854 formed a lifelong union with her.

Lewesdon Hill, a descriptive poem, somewhat in the style of Thomson and Cowper, by William Crowe (1745-1829), of Winchester and New College, Oxford, at one time public orator at Oxford, published in 1788.

LEWIS, Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL

LI BEAUS DESCONUS

(1806-63), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, was editor of the 'Edinburgh Review', 1852-5. He wrote an essay 'On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion' (1849), an 'Enquiry into the Credibility of Ancient Roman History' (1855), 'The Astronomy of the Ancients' (1862), and translated Boeckh's 'Public Economy of Athens' (1828). He also wrote treatises entitled 'The Government of Dependencies' and 'The Best Form of Government'. He was M.P. for Radnor Burghs, and was chancellor of the exchequer (1855-8), home secretary (1859-61), and secretary for war (1861-3).

LEWIS, MATTHEW GREGORY (1775-1818), educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, is remembered as the author of the novel 'The Monk' (q.v., 1796). He wrote numerous dramas, and his verses (of which 'Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogene' is perhaps the best) had a considerable influence on Scott's earlier poetry.

LEWIS, SINCLAIR (1885-1951), American novelist and journalist, born at Sauk Center, Minnesota. His chief works are: 'Main Street' (q.v., 1920), 'Babbitt' (q.v., 1922), 'Martin Arrowsmith' (1925), 'Elmer Gantry' (1927), 'Dodsworth' (1929).

Lewis is probably the best-known American novelist to readers outside America. He satirizes American middle-west life, and a great number of Europeans see America through his eyes. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1930.

Lewis and Short, the well-known Latin-English dictionary, the work of Charlton T. Lewis and Charles Short, published in 1879.

Lewis Baboon, in Arbuthnot's 'The History of John Bull', represents Louis XIV of France.

Lewknor's Lane, now Charles Street, Drury Lane, so named after Sir Lewis Lewknor, of the time of James I, who resided in Drury Lane, is frequently mentioned in 17th- and 18th-cent. literature as a disreputable haunt.

LEYDEN, JOHN (1775-1811), physician, poet, and orientalist, assisted Scott (q.v.) in the preparation of the earlier volumes of the 'Border Minstrelsy', published an essay on the Indo-Persian, &c., languages (1807), and translated the 'Malay Annals' (1821) and the 'Commentaries of Baber' (1826).

Li Beaus Desconus (= le bel inconnu), a 14th-cent. verse romance attributed to Thomas Chestre, the author of 'Sir Launfal' (q.v.). Gingelein, the bastard son of Gawain, demands knighthood of Arthur. As his name is unknown, he is knighted as Li Beaus Desconus. The poem recounts his adventures in rescuing the imprisoned lady of Sinadoun. This is one of the romances referred to by Chaucer in 'Sir Thopas' (see under Canterbury Tales (19)).

LIBEL OF ENGLISH POLICY

Libel of English Policy, The, a political poem written c. 1436, in which the author exhorts his countrymen to regard the sea as the source of the national strength, discusses commercial relations with other countries, and urges the importance of retaining Calais, Ireland, and Wales. The poem was included by Hakluyt, and is in Political Poems II, Rolls Series. It is perhaps the work of Adam Moleyns or Molyneux, clerk of the king's council. See the Introduction by Sir F. G. Warner (Oxford, 1926). 'Libel' in the title means 'a little book'.

Liber Albus, see Carpenter.

Liber Amoris, see Hazlitt.

Liberal, The, magazine, see Byron (Lord).

Liberty or LIBERTIES of a city, the district extending beyond the bounds of a city, which is subject to the control of the municipal authority. The 'Liberties' of a prison (especially the Fleet and the Marshalsea) were the limits, outside the prison, within which prisoners were sometimes permitted to reside.

Liberty, On, an essay by J. S. Mill (q.v.), published in 1859.

In this work Mill examines from the standpoint of Utilitarian philosophy the proper relations of society to the individual, and criticizes the tyranny of the custom-ridden majority that is concealed under such expressions as 'self-government' and 'the power of the people over themselves'. In his view 'the sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually or collectively, in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-protection'. The only part of the conduct of anyone, for which he is amenable to society, is that which concerns others. A man's own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant for the interference of society. 'Mankind are greater gainers by suffering each other to live as seems good to themselves, than by compelling each to live as seems good to the rest.' But Mill is careful to point out that this doctrine is reconcilable with the State's interference in trade and industry.

Liberty Hall, a place where one may do as one likes. 'This is Liberty Hall, gentlemen,' says Squire Hardcastle (in 'She Stoops to Conquer') to Marlow and Hastings, who have mistaken his house for an inn.

Liberty of Prophesying, see Taylor (Jeremy).

Libitina, an ancient Italian divinity, originally, it appears, a goddess of the earth, who came to be regarded as goddess of the dead, and is sometimes identified with Proserpine.

Libra or THE BALANCE, one of the zodiacal constellations; also the seventh sign of the zodiac into which the sun enters at the autumnal equinox. ('The sign and constellation owing to the precession of the equinoxes no longer correspond.)

LICK OBSERVATORY

Library, The, a magazine of bibliography and literature, published from 1889 to 1898 as the organ of the Library Association, and from 1899 to 1918 as an independent journal. In 1920 it was merged with the 'Transactions' of the Bibliographical Society (q.v.), though retaining its original title.

Libri, THE BOOK THIEF, whose full name was Guglielmus Brutus Icilius Timoleon, Count Libri-Carucci dalla Somaja (1803-69), belonged to an old Florentine family and was a distinguished mathematician, and author of a number of learned works, especially a history of the mathematical sciences in Italy (1837-41). Being implicated in a conspiracy, he migrated to France in 1830, where he obtained professorial posts, was highly esteemed by Guizot, and was appointed to inspect libraries and archives. His visits to these were found to be followed by the disappearance of valuable books and manuscripts, but the police reports on the subject were suppressed by his friend Guizot, the prime minister. On the fall of Louis Philippe, Libri, receiving anonymous warning, fled to England, where he protested his innocence, but sold books and manuscripts purloined from French and Italian libraries, and acquired thereby a fortune. Many of these were unwittingly bought by Lord Ashburnham, and some were repurchased by the French government.

Libya, the ancient Greek name for the continent of Africa.

Lichas, the servant of Hercules (q.v.) who brought him the poisoned cloak of Nessus. Hercules hurled him into the sea, where the gods turned him into a rock.

LICHTENBERG, GEORG CHRISTOPH (1742-99), born in Hessen, was educated and later a professor at Göttingen, thus becoming a subject of George III, of whose Hanoverian dominions Göttingen formed part. A distinguished scientist, but interested also in philosophy (a disciple of Kant), he twice visited England, in 1770 and 1774-5, and was a guest at Kew of George III. He was an ardent admirer of English institutions and literature and a keen dramatic critic. His letters from England to his friends in Germany ('Lichtenberg's Visits to England', Clarendon Press, 1938) contain shrewd comments on the acting of Garrick, Macklin, &c., and throw an interesting light on contemporary English manners. He also published in Germany explanations of Hogarth's engravings.

Lick Observatory, an observatory on the summit of Mt. Hamilton in California, founded by James Lick (1796-1876), a rich Californian, and given by him to the University of California. He provided funds for the construction of an equatorial telescope of 36-inch aperture.

LIDDELL

LIDDELL, HENRY GEORGE (1811-98), educated at Charterhouse and Christ Church, Oxford, was headmaster of Westminster School 1846-55, and dean of Christ Church 1855-91. He is remembered as the author, with Robert Scott (1811-87), of the famous 'Greek-English Lexicon'.

It was for Alice Liddell (afterwards Mrs. Reginald Hargreaves), daughter of Dean Liddell, that Dodgson (q.v.) wrote 'Alice in Wonderland'.

LIDDON, HENRY PARRY (1829-90), educated at King's College School, London, and Christ Church, Oxford, a disciple of Pusey and Keble, became canon of St. Paul's (1870), where his sermons for twenty years were an important factor in London life. His Bampton Lectures of 1866 on 'The Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' were published in 1867. Many volumes of his sermons were published, and he left at his death a 'Life of Pusey' ready for publication (1893-7).

Lido, THE, near Venice, a sandbank separating the lagoons from the Adriatic, of late years a fashionable sea-bathing resort.

Lien Chi Altangl, in Goldsmith's 'Citizen of the World' (q.v.), the Chinaman who studies English customs.

Life and Labour of the People in London, see Booth (C.).

Life in London, see Egan.

Life on the Mississippi, by Mark Twain (q.v.), published in 1883, an autobiographical account of the author's early years as a river pilot.

Ligëa, one of the Nymphs (q.v.), mentioned by Milton in 'Comus' (l. 880).

Light of Asia, or The Great Renunciation, a poem in eight books of blank verse, by Sir E. Arnold (q.v.), published in 1879.

In it the author, to use his own words, seeks 'by the medium of an imaginary Buddhist votary to depict the life and character and indicate the philosophy of that noble hero and reformer, Prince Gautama of India, founder of Buddhism'.

Light of the Haram, The, see Lalla Rookh.

LIGHTFOOT, JOSEPH BARBER (1828-89), bishop of Durham, published many valuable works of biblical criticism and on early Christian history and literature, notably commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles (1865, 1868, 1875).

Ligurian Republic, THE, the republic of Genoa formed in 1797 after Napoleon's victorious Italian campaign. It was annexed to France in 1805 and subsequently merged in the kingdom of Italy.

Lilburne, JOHN (1614?-57), known as 'Freeborn John', a political agitator and pamphleteer, supporter of the parliament, repeatedly imprisoned, proverbial for his quarrelsome disposition.

Lill, celebrated by Goethe (q.v.) in his lyrics, was Anne Elizabeth Schönemann, to whom Goethe was for a time engaged. She married the Baron von Türkheim.

Lilith, an Assyrian demon, associated with the night, a vampire. The name occurs in Isa. xxxiv. 14, where it is translated 'screech-owl' (Revised Version, 'night-monster'). In Rabbinical literature Lilith was the first wife of Adam, and was dispossessed by Eve. D. G. Rossetti, in his 'Eden Bower', tells of Lilith's vengeance on Adam and Eve. Lilith also makes a brief appearance in the Walpurgis-night scene of Goethe's 'Faust'.

Lilli-Burlero Bullen-a-la! These 'are said to have been the words of distinction used among the Irish Papists at the time of their massacre of the Protestants in 1641' (Percy). They were made the refrain of a song, written by Lord Wharton, satirizing the earl of Tyrconnel on the occasion of his going to Ireland in Jan. 1686-7 as James II's papist lieutenant. The song is given in Percy's 'Reliques'. Burnet (q.v.) wrote as follows regarding it:

'A foolish ballad was made at the time, treating the Papists, and chiefly the Irish, in a very ridiculous manner, which had a burden said to be Irish words, "Lero, lero, lilli-burlero", that made an impression on the army, that cannot be imagined by those that saw it not. The whole army, and at last the people, both in city and country, were singing it perpetually. And perhaps never had so slight a thing so great an effect.'

According to Chappell's 'Popular Music of the Olden Time', the tune of 'Lilliburlero' was included, in 1689, in the second part of 'Music's Handmaid' as 'a new Irish Tune' by 'Mr. Purcell', but it occurs in 'The Delightful Companion' of 1686.

Lilliput, see Gulliver's Travels.

Lilliput Levée, a book of verse for children, with illustrations by J. E. Millais and G. J. Pinwell, by W. B. Rands (q.v.), published in 1864. The same author published 'Lilliput Lectures' (mostly prose) in 1871, and 'Lilliput Legends' in 1872. All three appeared anonymously.

LILLO, GEORGE (1693-1739), was the author of the famous prose domestic tragedy 'The London Merchant, or the History of George Barnwell' (q.v.), produced in 1731. Very little is known about him. He was very possibly the descendant of Flemish refugees, and is said to have carried on the trade of jeweller in London. His other plays include 'The Christian Hero', produced in 1735, 'Fatal Curiosity' (q.v.), 1736, and 'Elmerick, or Justice Triumphant', produced in 1740 after his death. He also wrote a tragedy on the subject of 'Arden of Feversham', published posthumously. Lillo is important as a pioneer, and his introduction of domestic tragedy had an influence which extended beyond English literature.

LILLY, WILLIAM (1602-81), a noted astrologer, who published almanacs yearly from 1644 until his death, and pamphlets of prophecy. While ostensibly serving the parliament, he endeavoured to aid Charles I. He published also a 'True History of King James I and King Charles I' (1651).

Lillyvick, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

LILY, WILLIAM (1468?-1522), was the first high-master of St. Paul's School. He contributed a short Latin syntax, with the rules in English, under the title 'Grammatices Rudimenta', to Colet's 'Aeditio' (1527).

Limbo (from Latin limbus, an edge), a region supposed to exist on the border of hell as the abode of the just who died before Christ's coming, and of unbaptized infants. Also referred to as limbo patrum and limbo infantum. (See also Paradise of Pools.) The word came to be used to mean prison, confinement; and later for a place of rubbish and forgetfulness.

Limehouse, used of virulent political abuse, in allusion to a celebrated speech at Limehouse, London, by Lloyd George (30 July 1909), directed against territorial and financial magnates.

Limerick, a form of facetious jingle, of which the first instances occur in 'Anecdotes and Adventures of Fifteen Young Ladies' and the 'History of Sixteen Wonderful Old Women' (1820), subsequently popularized by Edward Lear (q.v.) in his 'Book of Nonsense'. (The name is said to be derived from a custom at convivial parties, according to which each member sang an extemporized 'nonsense-verse', which was followed by a chorus containing the words 'Will you come up to Limerick?' [OED.]) Limericks have been composed on a great variety of subjects, even to express philosophic doctrines. The following, for instance, ridicules English pronunciation of French:

There was an old man of Boolong,
Who frightened the birds with his song.
It wasn't the words
That frightened the birds,
But the horrible dooble ong-tong.

LINACRE, THOMAS (1460?-1524), physician and classical scholar, was educated at Oxford and was a fellow of All Souls College. He was M.D. of Padua, and became one of Henry VIII's physicians. Later he was Latin tutor to the Princess Mary, for whom he composed a Latin grammar, 'Rudimenta Grammatices'. He was mainly instrumental in founding the College of Physicians in 1518. He wrote grammatical and medical works, and translated from the Greek, mainly from Galen.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM (1809-65), was president of the United States, 1861-5, and political leader of the Northern States in the

LINDOR

American Civil War. He was assassinated in 1865. In a literary connexion he is remarkable as an interpreter of the American theory of democracy and as a framer of political aphorisms. His great inaugural and other orations show a direct, pregnant, non-rhetorical style, and a strong sense of rhythm. Notable among these was his 'Gettysburg Address', given in Nov. 1863 at the dedication of the national cemetery of Gettysburg, soon after the battle at that place. John Drinkwater (q.v.) made Abraham Lincoln the subject of a successful drama.

Lincoln Green, a bright green stuff made at Lincoln, used for woodmen's jackets and the like.

Lincoln's Inn, off Chancery Lane, said to be named after Henry de Lacy, third earl of Lincoln, who had a mansion there in Edward I's reign. It became an Inn of Court in 1310. LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS were laid out by Inigo Jones, who designed Lindsay House (Nos. 57-60). The house of Mr. Tulkington in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.) is No. 58.

Lind, JOHANNA MARIA, known as JENNY LIND (1820-87), the 'Swedish Nightingale', born at Stockholm, was remarkable for the combination of the histrionic gift with a magnificent voice and great musical talent. She first appeared in England in 1847 at Her Majesty's Theatre with immense success. She gave up the stage in 1849 and thereafter confined herself to singing in concerts and oratorios. In Sept. 1850 she began an American tour under the management of Barnum. She married Otto Goldschmidt (her conductor during the second year of her American tour) in 1852 and during the latter part of her life settled in England.

Linda brldēs, the daughter of the emperor Alicandro in the 'Mirror of Knighthood', a romance of Spanish origin translated into English by Richard Percival at the end of the 16th cent. The name is used (e.g. in Scott's 'Kenilworth') to signify a lady-love, a mistress.

Lindbergh, CHARLES AUGUSTUS (1902-), born at Detroit, Michigan, the aviator who made the first 'solo' flight across the Atlantic, 20-1 May 1927.

Lindisfarne, Holy Isle, off the coast of Northumberland. See Cuthbert.

Lindisfarne Gospels, a manuscript of the four gospels, beautifully illuminated at the beginning of each gospel, in the Vulgate text, with an Old English paraphrase of later date interlined. The author of the paraphrase states that the Latin text was written by Eadfrith (d. 721), bishop of Lindisfarne, in honour of St. Cuthbert (q.v.), and names the binder, the author of the ornamentation on the cover, and himself the translator. The manuscript forms part of the Cottonian collection in the British Museum.

Lindor, a conventional poetical name for a shepherd lover.

LINDSAY

LINDSAY, LADY ANNE (1750-1825), daughter of the fifth earl of Balcarres, wrote in 1771 the popular ballad 'Auld Robin Gray'. She became by marriage Lady Anne Barnard, and accompanied her husband to S. Africa. 'Lady Anne Barnard at the Cape, 1797-1802', edited by Miss D. Fairbridge (Oxford, 1924), is an important authority for the events during the first British occupation of Capetown.

LINDSAY or LYND SAY, SIR DAVID (1490-1555), Scottish poet and Lyon king-of-arms; usher to Prince James (afterwards James V). His first poem, 'The Dreame', written in 1528, but not printed till after his death, is an allegorical lament on the misgovernment of the realm, followed by a vigorous exhortation to the king. In 1529 he wrote the 'Complaynt to the King', in octosyllabic couplets, commenting on the improved social condition of the realm except as regards the Church, lamenting that others have been preferred before him at court, and requesting the king that 'thy Grace will uther geve, or lend me' 'of gold ane thousand pound, or tway'. The 'Testament and Complaynt of our Sovereane Lordis Papyngo' (finished in 1530, printed in 1538) combines advice to the king, put in the mouth of his parrot, with a warning to courtiers drawn from the examples of Scottish history, and with a satire on ecclesiastics in the form of a conference between the dying parrot and its 'holy executors'. Lindsay's principal poem, 'Ane Pleasant Satyre of the Three Estaitis' (q.v.), a morality, was produced in 1540 before the king and court. Other poems by Lindsay include 'The Monarchie (Ane dialog betwix Experience and ane Courtier of the miserabill estait of the World)' (1554) and the 'History of Squire Meldrum' (first published in 1582), a spirited verse romance on the career and exploits of a Scottish laird.

LINDSAY, ROBERT (1500?-65?), of Pittcote, author of 'The Historie and Cronicles of Scotland' from the reign of James II, one of Sir Walter Scott's principal sources for the period.

LINDSAY, [NICHOLAS] VACHEL (1879-1931), American poet. Among his best-known poems are 'General William Booth enters into Heaven' (1913) and 'The Congo' (1914).

Linet, in the 'Morte d'Arthur', the sister of dame Liones (q.v.). She marries Sir Gaheris. See also Gareth and Lynette.

LINGARD, JOHN (1771-1851), educated at Douai, and ordained a Roman Catholic priest, was the author of a 'History of England' (published 1819-30) which remains a principal authority from the point of view of enlightened Roman Catholicism. Lingard also wrote 'The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church', published in 1806.

Lingua, see Tomkiss.

Lingua franca, a mixed language or jargon used in the Levant, consisting largely of Italian words deprived of their inflexions. The term is extended to any mixed jargon formed as a medium of intercourse between people speaking different languages.

Linkinwater, TIM, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), clerk to the brothers Cheeryble.

Linne, THE HEIR OF, see Heir of Linne.

Linnean Society, THE, was founded in 1788 by Sir James Edward Smith, in honour of Linnaeus (Carl von Linné, 1707-78), the great Swedish naturalist and founder of modern botany, whose collections Smith purchased. The Linnean Society publishes journals and transactions on matters of natural history.

Linton, EDGAR, ISABELLA, and CATHERINE, characters in E. Brontë's 'Wuthering Heights' (q.v.).

Lintot, BARNABY BERNARD (1675-1736), published many poems and plays by Pope, Gay, Farquhar, Steele, and Rowe. His uncouth appearance was compared by Pope, in the 'Dunciad', ii. 63, to that of a dabchick.

Linus, in Greek mythology, a hero whose untimely death was celebrated in a dirge, the 'Song of Linus', sung annually, from Homeric days, at harvest time. He was perhaps originally a harvest deity.

Lion, THE BRITISH, the lion as the national emblem of Great Britain, used figuratively for the British nation, perhaps derived from the royal arms. The first mention of the British Lion quoted by the OED. is in Dryden's 'The Hind and the Panther' (1687).

Lion of Cotswold, a sheep.

Lion of the North, Gustavus Adolphus (q.v.).

Liones, in the 'Morte d'Arthur' (q.v.), Linet's sister, whom Beaumains (Gareth) rescued from the castle where she was imprisoned, and married.

Lionesse, see Lyonesse.

Lipsia, in imprints, Leipzig.

LIPSIUS, JUSTUS, or JOEST LIPS (1547-1606), a Flemish humanist, who adopted the Protestant faith and was professor at Jena and subsequently at the University of Leyden, where he was succeeded by Scaliger. His principal work was a learned edition of Tacitus.

Lir or Lêr, in Gaelic mythology, the sea-god, one of the Tuatha Dé Danann (q.v.); perhaps to be identified with Llyr (q.v.) the British sea-god. He was the father of Manannán (q.v.).

According to the story of 'The Children of Lir', one of the 'three sorrowful tales of Erin', Lir had one daughter, Fionnuala (q.v.), and three sons. These were changed into swans by their jealous step-mother Aeife, and condemned to spend 900 years on the seas and Literary Club, THE, see Johnson (S.).

Literary Magazine, The, or Universal Review, a periodical started in 1756 and edited in 1756–7 by Samuel Johnson (q.v.), to which he contributed many articles, notably his Essay on Tea, and his review of Soame Jenyns's (q.v.) 'Free Enquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil'.

Literature, THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF, was founded in 1823 at the suggestion of Thomas Burgess, bishop of St. David's, and under the patronage of George IV, who assigned the sum of 1,100 guineas to be applied in pensions of 100 guineas to each of ten Royal Associates, and in a premium of 100 guineas for a prize dissertation. The Associates were elected by the council of the Society (Malthus and S. T. Coleridge were among the first ten). The Society has published Transactions and a certain number of separate works.

Litôtès, a figure of speech in which an affirmative is expressed by the negative of the contrary, e.g. 'a citizen of no mean city'; an ironical under-statement.

Littimer, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), Steerforth's hypocritical valet.

LITTLE, THOMAS, see Moore (T.).

Little Billee, a humorous ballad of three sailors of Bristol, of whom Little Billee is the youngest. When provisions fail he narrowly escapes being eaten by the other two. Thackeray wrote a version of the ballad. Du Maurier uses 'Little Billee' as the nickname of the hero of 'Trilby' (q.v.).

Little Britain, near Aldersgate Street, in the City of London. It was formerly known as Britten or Briton Street, from the dukes of Brittany who are supposed to have had a mansion in it. Many bookstalls were located there in the 17th cent.

Little Dorrit, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in monthly parts, 1855–7.

William Dorrit has been so long in the Marshalsea prison for debtors that he has become the 'Father of the Marshalsea'. He has had the misfortune to be responsible for an uncompleted contract with the Circumlocution Office (a satirical presentment of the government departments of the day, with their incompetent and obstructive officials, typified in the Barnacles). His lot is alleviated by the devotion of Amy, his youngest daughter, 'Little Dorrit', born in the Marshalsea, whose diminutive stature is compensated by the greatness of her heart. Amy has a snobbish sister Fanny, a theatrical dancer, and a scapegrace brother, Tip. Old Dorrit and Amy are befriended by Arthur Clennam, the middle-aged hero, for whom Little Dorrit conceives a deep passion, at first unrequited. The unexpected discovery that William Dorrit is heir to a fortune raises the family to affluence. Except Little Dorrit, they become arrogant and purse-proud. Clennam, on the other hand, owing to an unfortunate speculation, is brought in turn to the debtors' prison, and is found in the Marshalsea, sick and despairing, by Little Dorrit, who tenderly nurses and consoles him. He has meanwhile learnt the value of her love, but her fortune stands in the way of his asking her hand. The loss of this makes their union possible, on Clennam's release.

With this main theme is wound the thread of an elaborate mystery. Clennam has long suspected that his mother, a grim old puritanical paralysed woman, living in a gloomy house with a former attendant and present partner, Flintwinch, has done some wrong to Little Dorrit. Through the agency of a stagy villain, Rigaud alias Blandois, this is brought to light, and it appears that Mrs. Clennam is not Arthur's mother, and that her religious principles have not prevented her from suppressing a codicil in a will that benefited the Dorrit family.

There are a host of minor characters in the work, of whom the most notable are the worthy Pancks, rent-collector to the humbug Casby; Casby's voluble daughter Flora, the early love of Arthur Clennam; her eccentric relative 'Mr. F's Aunt'; Merdle, the swindling financier, and Mrs. Merdle, who 'piques herself on being society'; Affery, the villain Flintwinch's wife; 'Young John' Chivery, the son of the Marshalsea warder; and the Meagles and Gowan households. The Marshalsea scenes have more reality than the rest of the story, for Dickens's father had been immured in that prison.

Little-endians, see Gulliver's Travels. The Little-endians were the orthodox party on the question at which end an egg should be broken.

Little Englander, one who desires to restrict the dimensions and responsibilities of the Empire. It was a current term of opprobrium during the Boer War of 1899–1901.

Little French Lawyer, The, a comedy probably by J. Fletcher (q.v.) and Massinger (q.v.), though Dyce attributed it to Beaumont and Fletcher. It was produced between 1619 and 1622.

Lamira marries Champernel, a lame but gallant old gentleman, throwing over Dinant, Little-go, the popular name at Cambridge for the matriculation examination, and at the University of Dublin for the final Freshman examination taken at the end of the second year.

Little John, one of the companions of Robin Hood in the legends relating to that outlaw. He was a sturdy yeoman and a skilled archer, originally called John Little. He figures in Sir W. Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.).

'Littlejohn', HUGH, John Hugh Lockhart, the grandson of Sir Walter Scott, to whom the 'Tales of a Grandfather' are dedicated.

Little Lord Fauntleroy, see Burnett (F. E. H.).

Little Musgrave and Lady Barnard, an ancient ballad, given in Percy's 'Reliques' (III. i. 11), which tells how Lady Barnard, loving Little Musgrave, invited him to pass the night with her in her bower at Bucklesford-Buty. A little foot-page overhears the assignation, and tells Lord Barnard. He finds the lovers together, fights with Musgrave and kills him, then kills his wife, and is afterwards filled with remorse.

Musgrave is referred to in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'The Knight of the Burning Pestle' (q.v.), Act v, and in D'Avenant's 'The Wits', III. iii.

Littlepage Manuscripts, a trilogy by J. F. Cooper (q.v.), consisting of 'Satanstoe' (1845), 'The Chainbearer' (1845), and 'The Redskins' (1846).

Little Red Ridinghood, see Red Ridinghood.

Little Rhody, Rhode Island, see United States.

Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come, The, a novel of the Kentucky mountaineers, by John Fox (q.v.), published in 1903.

Little Women, one of the most popular juvenile books ever written, by L. M. Alcott (q.v.), published in 1868. The story is concerned with the daily lives of four girls—Jo, Meg, Beth, and Amy March—in a New England family of the mid-nineteenth century. For her portrayal of this family the author drew upon her own memories of home.

LITTLETON, SIR THOMAS (1422–81), judge and legal author. His fame rests on his treatise on 'Tenures', written in law-French; and his text, with Sir Edward Coke's comments, long remained the principal authority on English real property law. The editio princeps was published in London without date or title.

LITTRÉ, MAXIMILIEN PAUL ÉMILE (1801–81), French scholar, philosopher, and lexicographer, began his great dictionary of the French language in 1844, but did not seriously pursue the task until 1863. It was completed in 1872 (supplement in 1878). He was a supporter of the philosophy of Comte (q.v.), on whom he published in 1863 'Auguste Comte et la philosophie positive'. He also published editions of the works of Hippocrates and Pliny.

Lityerses, son of Midas, king of Phrygia. It was said that he required all who passed his fields to help in the harvest, and if they did not surpass his activity in reaping the corn, put them to death, until a mightier hero (some say Hercules) arrived and killed him.

LIUTPRAND (d. 972) of Cremona, perhaps the most picturesque chronicler of the Dark Ages, and distinguished for having written worse Latin than any one else; a good illustration of the darkness of the 10th cent.

Livery Companies, the London City companies, descended from the old City Guilds, so called because they formerly had distinctive costumes for special occasions. A LIVERY-MAN is a freeman of the City of London who is entitled to wear the 'livery' of the company to which he belongs. The word 'livery' is derived (through French) from the Latin liberare, and meant originally the dispensing of food or clothing to retainers or servants, or the food or clothing so dispensed.

Lives of the Poets, The, a biographical and critical work by S. Johnson (q.v.), published in 1779–81.

Johnson was invited in 1777 by a deputation of London booksellers to undertake the preparation of biographical notices for an edition of the English poets that they were contemplating. When the work was completed, these notices were issued without the texts, under the above title. It had originally been intended to include all important poets from Chaucer onwards, but the scheme was curtailed and Cowley was taken as the point of departure. Fifty-two poets were included and it is significant of the taste of the age that Herrick and Marvell are not among them. The facts of each life are given and the character of the man brought out; and then Johnson passes to an estimate of his poems. In this respect the work is now considered unequal. The severe strictures, for instance, on Milton's 'Lycidas' and Gray's 'Odes' would not be endorsed at the present day. There is a good edition of the 'Lives' by G. Birkbeck Hill (Oxford, 1905).

LIVINGSTONE, DAVID (1813–73), the great African missionary and explorer. He educated himself while working at a cotton factory near Glasgow, and embarked for the Cape of Good Hope in 1840. He made a number of journeys into the interior in the following years, discovered Lake Ngami in 1849, and the Zambesi in the interior of the continent in 1851. Livingstone published 'Missionary Travels in S. Africa' in 1857, and 'The Zambesi and its Tributaries' in 1865. In that year he started on an expedition to discover the sources of the Nile, returned almost dying to Ujiji, where he was rescued by H. M. Stanley (q.v.), resumed his explorations, and finally died at a village in the country of Ilala. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Livingstone's 'Last Journals in Central Africa, 1865 to his death' were published posthumously (1874).

LIVY (TITUS LIVIUS) (59 B.C.-A.D. 17), the Roman historian, born at Patavium (Padua). He was a friend of the Emperor Augustus though he showed a preference for republican institutions. His great work was the history of Rome from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus (9 B.C.). Of the 142 books in which it was contained we have 35, and epitomes of the greater part of the rest. See Patavinity.

Lieu Llaw Gyffes, in British mythology, a sun-god, son of Gwydion and Arianrod. See Mabinogion.

Lloyd's, an association in London of ship-owners, merchants, and underwriters, which had its origin in a coffee-house kept by Edward Lloyd in Lombard Street early in the 18th cent. It subsequently moved to rooms in the new Royal Exchange and in 1928 to a new building in Leadenhall Street. It is principally concerned with marine insurance and the collection of shipping intelligence.

Ludd or NUDD, one of the chief gods of the ancient Britons, who survived in later times as the mythical King Lud, and perhaps as the Arthurian King Lot (qq.v.). See C. Squire, 'Mythology of the British Islands'.

Llyr, the sea-god of the ancient Britons, perhaps to be identified with the Lir (q.v.) of Gaelic mythology. He figures in the 'Mabinogion' (q.v.) and his name survived as that of a British king in Shakespeare's 'King Lear'. The town of Leicester is said to have been originally Llyr-cestre (C. Squire, 'Mythology of the British Islands').

Lob's Pound, also COB'S POUND, HOB'S POUND, a jail or lock-up. 'Lob' means a country bumpkin, a clown; also a fairy of the Puck variety.

Lochiel, the title of the chief of the clan Cameron. Campbell (q.v.) wrote a poem called 'Lochiel's Warning'.

Lochinvar, the hero of a ballad included in the fifth canto of Scott's 'Marmion'. His fair

LOCKE ON THE HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

Ellen is about to be married to 'a laggard in love and a dastard in war', when the brave Lochinvar arrives at the bridal feast, claims a dance with her, and, as they reach the hall door, swings the lady on to his horse, and rides off with her.

LOCKE, JOHN (1632-1704), born at Wrington in Somerset, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. He held various academic posts at that University, and became physician to Anthony Ashley Cooper (first earl of Shaftesbury) and settled in his house in 1667. He held official positions and subsequently resided at Oxford until expelled for supposed complicity in Shaftesbury's plots in 1684. He then lived in Holland, where he became known to the Prince of Orange. He was commissioner of appeals and member of the council of trade under William III. He died and was buried at High Laver, Essex. His portrait was painted by Kneller.

His principal philosophical work is the 'Essay concerning Human Understanding' (q.v.), published in 1690, which led John Stuart Mill to call him the 'unquestioned founder of the analytic philosophy of mind'. He was a strong advocate of religious liberty. He wrote a 'Letter concerning Toleration' in 1689, a second letter on Toleration in 1690, and a third in 1692; a fourth was left unpublished at his death. He published an essay on the 'Reasonableness of Christianity' in 1695, maintaining that, as our understanding is not commensurate with reality, knowledge must be supplemented by religious faith.

Locke published in 1690 two 'Treatises of Government' designed to combat the theory of the divine right of kings and to justify the Revolution. He finds the origin of the civil State in a contract. The 'legislative', or government, 'being only a fiduciary power to act for certain ends, there remains still in the people the supreme power to remove or alter the legislative when they find the legislative act contrary to the trust reposed in them'. Throughout, Locke in his theory of the 'Original Contract' is the opponent of Hobbes's 'Leviathan' (q.v.); though he seems to be more actively criticizing Sir Robert Filmer's 'Patriarcha' than Hobbes). He published treatises 'On Education' in 1693, and on the rate of interest and the value of money in 1691 and 1695. The first edition of his collected works appeared in 1714.

LOCKE, WILLIAM JOHN (1863-1930), born in Barbados, educated at Queen's Royal College, Trinidad, and St. John's College, Cambridge, and from 1897 to 1907 secretary to the Royal Institute of British Architects, was a successful writer of fiction. His 'Morals of Marcus Ordeyne' (1905), and still more 'The Beloved Vagabond' (1906), enjoyed a very wide popularity. Locke also wrote a few plays.

Locke on the Human Understanding, see Essay concerning Human Understanding.

LOCKER

LOCKER, FREDERICK (1821-95), who took the name of LOCKER-LAMPSON in 1885, was a clerk in Somerset House and the Admiralty, but left the government service c. 1850. He published in 1857 a volume of light verse entitled 'London Lyrics', followed in 1867 by 'Lyra Elegantiarum', an anthology of verse of the same character, and in 1879 'Patchwork', a miscellany of verse and prose. 'My Confidences', in prose, appeared posthumously in 1896.

Locket, Lucy, see Lucy Locket.

Locket's, a fashionable ordinary or tavern in Charing Cross, frequently alluded to in the drama of the 17th-18th cents., so named from Adam Locket, the landlord.

LOCKHART, JOHN GIBSON (1794-1854), born at Cambusnethan, was educated at the high school and University of Glasgow, and at Balliol College, Oxford. He was called to the Scottish bar, and became one of the chief contributors to 'Blackwood's Magazine' (q.v.) in 1817. His fierceness as a critic earned him the nickname of 'The Scorpion'. In 1820 he married Sir W. Scott's elder daughter Sophia, and from 1825 to 1853 was editor of the 'Quarterly Review' (q.v.). He published his 'Life of Burns' in 1828, and his famous 'Life of Scott' in 1838. He wrote several novels, of which the most notable is 'Some Passages in the Life of Adam Blair' (1822), the tragic story of the sin of a Scottish minister, and its expiation. His 'Valerius' (1821) is a romance of the period of the Roman occupation of Britain. His 'Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk', containing lively sketches of the Edinburgh and Glasgow of the day, appeared in 1819. His poetry is seen at its best in his adaptations of 'Ancient Spanish Ballads' (1823). Lockhart, it may be noted, was an early admirer of Wordsworth and Coleridge, though he condemned Keats and Shelley.

Lockit, and his daughter LUCY, characters in Gay's 'Beggars' Opera' (q.v.).

Locksley, the name under which Robin Hood figures in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.). Ritson (q.v.) states that Robin Hood was born at Locksley in Nottinghamshire.

Locksley Hall, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1842.

It takes the form of a monologue, in which the speaker, revisiting Locksley Hall, the home of his youth, recalls his love for his cousin Amy, 'shallow-hearted', who abandoned him in deference to her parents for a worldly marriage. This leads him to conjure up again his youthful vision of the progress of the world, in which he finally expresses his confidence.

A sequel, 'Locksley Hall Sixty Years After', appeared in 1886.

Lochrine or LOGRIN, according to the legend told by Geoffrey of Monmouth and reproduced by Spenser ('Faerie Queene', II. x), was the eldest son of Brute (q.v.), and succeeded him as king of Loegria or England. He was the father of Sabrina (see Estrildis).

Lochrine, The Lamentable Tragedie of, a play published in 1595, and included in the third Shakespeare folio. The authorship is unknown; modern opinion is inclined to attribute it to Peele (q.v.). The play deals with the legend of Lochrine, king of England, his queen, Gwendolen, and Estrildis (see Estrildis).

Swinburne wrote a play on the subject ('Lochrine', 1887).

Locusta or LUCUSTA, a skilful poisoner employed by Agrippina to poison Claudius, and by Nero to poison Britannicus. She was executed in the reign of Galba.

Lodbrog, or LODBROK, RAGNAR, see Ragnar Lodbrog.

LODGE, SIR OLIVER (1851-1940), physicist. In addition to numerous scientific papers he wrote: 'Conductors and Lightning Guards', 'Signalling without Wires', and 'The Ether of Space'; 'Relativity' (1925), 'Ether and Reality' (1925). After 1910 he became known as a leader in psychic research, and among his writings dealing with this subject are: 'The Survival of Man' (1909), 'Reason and Belief' (3rd ed., 1911), 'Raymond, or Life and Death' (1916), and 'The Reality of a Spiritual World' (1930).

LODGE, THOMAS (1558?-1625), was son of Sir Thomas Lodge, lord mayor of London; born in Lincolnshire and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, London, and Trinity College, Oxford. He was a student of Lincoln's Inn in 1578. He abandoned law for literature, and published 'A Defence of Plays', a reply to the 'School of Abuse' of S. Gosson (q.v.), in 1580; and in 1584 'An Alarum against Usurers', depicting the dangers that money-lenders present for young spendthrifts.

His first romance, 'The Delectable Historie of Forbonius and Priscilla', appeared in 1584, and 'Scillaes Metamorphosis' in 1589 (reissued in 1610 as 'Glaucus and Scilla'). This work is interesting as the first romantic treatment in verse of a classical subject, the prototype of Shakespeare's 'Venus and Adonis'. Lodge sailed on a freebooting expedition to the islands of Terceras and the Canaries in 1588, and to South America in 1591. In the course of the former voyage he wrote his second and best-known romance, 'Rosalynde. Euphues Golden Legacie' (q.v.), which appeared in 1590. His chief volume of verse, 'Phillis', a cycle of amorous sonnets, largely translations or imitations of French and Italian poems, with songs and lyrics, was issued in 1593. He published 'A Fig for Momus', containing satires and epistles in verse on the Horatian model, in 1595. During his voyage to South America, amid the winter storms of the Straits of Magellan, he wrote 'A Margarite of America', a romance dealing with the tragical love of Arasdachas, son of the emperor of Cusco, for Margarita, daughter of the king of Muscovy, which appeared in 1596; as did also his 'Wits Miserie and Worlds Madnesse'. He was converted to Roman Catholicism and studied medicine, becoming M.D. at Oxford, 1603. He published a laborious volume, 'The Famous and Memorable Workes of Iosephus' (1602), 'A Treatise of the Plague' (1603), and 'The Workes, both Morrall and Natural, of Lucius Annaeus Seneca' (1614). His last literary undertaking, 'A learned Summary upon the famous Poeme of William of Saluste, lord of Bartas, translated out of the French', was published in 1625. Lodge excelled as a lyric poet and was the best of the imitators of the style of 'Euphues'.

Loeb, JAMES (1867-1933), an American banker, educated at Harvard, a member until 1900 of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. He founded in 1912 the well-known Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Latin authors, which gives the original text and the translation on opposite pages.

Loegria, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth, the part of Britain assigned to King Locrine (q.v.); England. Spenser calls it Logris ('Faerie Queene', II. x. 14).

LOGGAN, DAVID (1635-1700?), artist and engraver, born at Danzig, came to England before 1653. He was engraver to Oxford University and later to Cambridge University. He published 'Oxonia Illustrata' (1675), 'Cantabrigia Illustrata' (1676-90).

Logic, A System of, ratiocinative and inductive, a treatise by J. S. Mill (q.v.), published in 1843, revised and enlarged in the editions of 1850 and 1872.

The importance of Mill's 'Logic' lies in the fact that it supplied, to use the author's own words ('Autobiography'), 'a text-book of the opposite doctrine [to the a priori view of human knowledge put forward by the German school]—that which derives all knowledge from experience, and all moral and intellectual qualities principally from the direction given to the associations'. In this work Mill formulated the inductive procedure of modern science, while, unlike Bacon, giving its proper share to deduction. He lays down methods for investigating the causal relations of phenomena, assuming the causal principle, in defence of which he can only say that 'the belief we entertain in the universality, throughout nature, of the law of cause and effect, is itself an instance of induction', constantly verified by experience, and to which, if there were an exception, we should probably have discovered it.

In attributing to experience and association our belief in mathematical and physical laws, he came into conflict with the intuitional philosophers, and gave his own explanation 'of that peculiar character of what are called necessary truths, which is adduced as proof that their evidence must come from a deeper source than experience'. This peculiar certainty, he holds, is 'an illusion, in order to sustain which it is necessary to suppose that those truths relate to, and express the properties of purely imaginary objects', as in the laws of geometry, which are only approximately true in the real world. Geometry being built on hypotheses, 'it owes to this alone the peculiar certainty supposed to distinguish it'. This conflict with the intuitional school is further developed in Mill's 'Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy' (q.v.).

Logistilla, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), a beneficent witch, who defends Rogero against Alcina (qq.v.) and gives Astolfo (q.v.) his magic horn and book.

Logrin, see Locrine.

Logris, or LOGRES, see Loegria.

Lohengrin, the son of Percival (q.v.), first mentioned, as Loherangrin, in the 'Parzival' of Wolfram of Eschenbach (q.v.). According to legend he is summoned from the temple of the Grail at Montsalvatch (which is perhaps Montserrat in Catalonia) and borne in a swan-boat to Antwerp, where he defends the Princess Elsa of Brabant against Frederick of Telramund, who claims to marry her. He overcomes Frederick and consents to marry Elsa on condition that she shall not ask his race. But she fails to abide by this condition, and the swan-boat comes and carries Lohengrin back to the castle of the Grail. Lohengrin is mentioned in 'Titivel' (q.v.), and the legend is repeated in other early poems. It forms the subject of Wagner's music-drama 'Lohengrin', produced in 1850.

A similar tale is told of Helias, the legendary grandfather of Godfrey de Bouillon (see Baring-Gould, 'Curious Myths').

Lois the Witch, a novel by Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in 1859, telling how the fanatical frenzy of the people of New England caused an innocent English girl to be hanged as a witch.

Loki, in Norse mythology, one of the Æsir (q.v.), the spirit of evil and mischief, the father of Hel, Jörmungander, and the Fenris-wolf (qq.v.). It is he who contrives the death of Balder (q.v.).

Lokman or LUQMÂN, a mythical person to whom has been attributed a collection of fables in Arabic, in consequence of a passage in the 31st Surah of the Koran, which says, 'We gave to Luqmân wisdom'. The fables, which are drawn from various sources, some of them Greek, date, in the form in which we have them, from the 13th cent. They are not mentioned by Arabic writers.

Lola Montez, the stage name of Marie Dolores Eliza Rosanna Gilbert (1818-61), the daughter of a military officer, an adventuress, who appeared in London as a dancer in 1843, and was highly successful on the Continent. She became the mistress of Ludwig I of Bavaria and exercised full control over the government of that country, until banished by Austrian and Jesuit influence. She died in New York.

LOLAH

Lolah, one of the beauties of the harem in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.), vi.

Lollards, from a Dutch word meaning 'mumbler', a name of contempt given in the 14th cent. to certain heretics, who were either followers of Wycliffe (q.v.) or held opinions similar to his. Their activities were the occasion of the statute 'De haeretico comburendo' (1401). See also Oldcastle.

LOLLIUS, an unknown author mentioned by Chaucer twice in 'Troilus and Cryseyde' (i. 394 and vi. 1667), and once in the 'House of Fame' (iii. 378). The problem of his identity is increased by the fact that the first mention in 'Troilus and Cryseyde' relates to the love-song of Troilus, which is a translation from Petrarch; while the second points, from its context, to Boccaccio. In the 'House of Fame' he is one of six authors of the story of Troy, the others being Homer, Dares, Tytus (? Dictys), Guido da Colonna, and Geoffrey of Monmouth.

LOMBARD, PETER, see Peter Lombard.

Lombard Street, London, 'so called of the Longobards and other Merchants, strangers of divers nations, assembling there twice a day' (Stow), a financial centre of the city, as indicated in the expression, 'All Lombard Street to a China orange'. Lombard merchants came to England as early as the 13th cent., and were employed to help in collecting the dues payable to the popes, notably Gregory IX, in the reign of Henry III. Our word 'lumber' is derived from the pawn-broking establishments of the Lombards.

London: the name Londinium is first mentioned by Tacitus ('Annals', 14. 33, A.D. 61) as that of a place notable for its concourse of merchants; but the earlier existence of the town is proved by coins (of Cunobelin) and other Celtic objects found on the site. The origin of the name is uncertain. Geoffrey of Monmouth connects it with King Lud who built walls round the city founded by Brute and enlarged by Belinus, and called it Cær Lud. According to Loftie, it is from the Celtic Llyn-din, the lake fort, a name that would be explained by the much wider spread in ancient times of the estuary of the Thames, with its creeks and tributaries, round the original settlement. Ekwall ('Oxford Dictionary of English Place-names') connects it with a stem, found in OIr. lond, meaning 'wild, bold'. After evacuation by the Romans, conquest by the Saxons, and plundering by the Danes in the 9th cent., London was resettled by Alfred in 886.

LONDON, JACK (1876-1916), an American novelist who began life as a common sailor. Besides his autobiographical 'Martin Eden' (1909) and 'John Barleycorn' (1913), London is remembered for his novels 'The Sea-Wolf' (1904) and 'The Call of the Wild' (1903), the story of a dog who escapes from the servitude of drawing a sledge in Alaska to be the leader of a pack of wolves. London also wrote sen-

London, a poem by S. Johnson (q.v.), published in 1738, in imitation of the Third Satire of Juvenal.

Thalès (perhaps Richard Savage, q.v.), disgusted with London and its vices, leaves it for the fields of Wales, and as he does so utters his indignant reflections on the degeneracy of the times, the oppression of the poor and the arrogance of wealth, the prevalence of French fashions (the 'supple Gaul' takes the place of the 'Graeculus esuriens' of Juvenal), and the dangers to which the Londoner is exposed from roisterers and criminals.

London Bridge. There is evidence in Dio Cassius of the existence of a bridge at London in A.D. 43, confirmed by the finds of Roman coins and the iron shoes of oaken piles in the bed of the river. No further mention of a bridge is found until the 10th cent. One was certainly in existence in the reign of Æthelred (979-1016), when Cnut found it an obstruction to the advance of his ships up the river. The 'Heimskringla' (q.v.) gives a spirited description of an attack on it by Olaf's fleet in the last year of Sweyn. The wooden bridge that existed in 1136 was burnt down in that year. The great medieval stone bridge was begun in 1176 by Peter the Bridge Master and curate of St. Mary Colechurch (d. 1205) and finished in 1209. It consisted of twenty openings about 28 ft. wide, and twenty piers about 20 ft. wide. One great pier near the centre was over 34 ft. wide and carried a two-story chapel dedicated to St. Thomas of Canterbury. The bridge itself was 20 ft. wide, with a 12 ft. roadway, and houses on either side, projecting over the river, supported by struts. The seventh opening from the Southwark end was spanned by a drawbridge. A gate stood just north of this; and another gate stood nearer the Southwark shore. On the first of these, until its demolition, the heads of traitors were exposed; after 1577 they were exposed on the Southwark Gate. The confinement of the river by the massive piers caused a dangerously violent current (with a fall at times of as much as 5 ft.) through the arches, and accidents were frequent, although 'shooting the Bridge' was a well-known pastime in the 17th cent. The houses on the bridge were demolished in 1758-62, and the old bridge itself was taken down in 1831. See Gordon Home, 'Old London Bridge'. There is a good description of the bridge in its last phase in 'Lavengro', ch. xxxi.

London Magazine, The, a periodical which ran from 1732 to 1785, founded in opposition to the 'Gentleman's Magazine' (q.v.).

A magazine bearing the same name had a distinguished career from 1820 to 1829, in opposition to 'Blackwood's' (q.v.), with Lamb, Hazlitt, De Quincey, Hood, and Miss Mitford on its staff. It published Lamb's 'Dissertation on Roast Pig' and De Quincey's 'Opium Eater'. The tragic outcome of the hostility between the 'London Magazine' and 'Blackwood's' was a duel, in which John Scott, first editor of the 'London', was killed.

London Prodigal, The, a comedy published in 1605, attributed to Shakespeare in the title of the quarto edition of that year and included in the 3rd and 4th folios, but undoubtedly by some other hand.

The play is a comedy of London manners, and deals with the reclaiming of the prodigal young Flowerdale by the fidelity of his wife.

London Spy, The, see Ward (E.).

London Stone, of which a fragment survives (now in the wall of St. Swithin's Church, near its original site), was perhaps a military or Roman milestone, but was thought by Wren 'by reason of the large foundation' to be 'rather some more considerable monument' ('Parentalia', quoted by Lethaby). Later it became associated with the house of the first mayor of London (Fitz Aylwin, 1189), and appears to have had some institutional character. It was against this stone that Jack Cade is said to have struck his sword and said, 'Now is Mortimer lord of this city' (Shakespeare, '2 Henry VI', iv. vi).

Long Melford, in Borrow's 'Lavengro' (q.v.), the expression that Belle Berners uses for Lavengro's long right arm (Belle was born in the workhouse at Long Melford). It was with a blow from 'Long Melford' that Lavengro knocked out the Flaming Tinman.

Long Parliament, THE, the second of the two parliaments summoned by Charles I in 1640. It passed a Triennial Bill, impeached Strafford, and adopted a number of constitutional reforms by which the personal government of the sovereign was terminated. In 1642 hostilities broke out between this parliament and the king. In 1648 those members who were favourable to the latter were expelled by a body of soldiers under Colonel

LONGFELLOW

Pride, an act of violence known as Pride's Purge. The Long Parliament was dissolved by Cromwell in 1653. In 1659 forty-two members of the Rump—as the portion which had continued to sit until 1653 was called—returned to Westminster; and when the survivors of those excluded in 1648 returned, early in 1660, the Rump, under pressure from Monk, voted its own dissolution.

Longaville, in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), one of the three lords attending on the king of Navarre.

LONGFELLOW, HENRY WADSWORTH (1807–82), born at Portland, U.S.A., and educated at Bowdoin (where he was the class-mate of Hawthorne, q.v.) and at Harvard, became professor of modern languages at Bowdoin and in 1836 at Harvard. From that time Cambridge (U.S.A.) became his home. He travelled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany after leaving college, and again went to Europe (Sweden, Denmark, and Holland) before taking up his professorship at Harvard. Longfellow was twice married, his first wife dying while he was in Holland, and the second being burnt to death in 1861.

Longfellow's prose romance, 'Hyperion', appeared in 1839, a product of his first bereavement, the tale of a young man who seeks to forget sorrow in travel, a thread on which are hung philosophical discourses, poems, and legends. In the same year was published 'Voices of the Night', including his didactic pieces, 'The Psalm of Life', 'Footsteps of the Angels', and 'The Reaper and the Flowers'. In 1842 appeared 'Ballads and other Poems', containing 'The Wreck of the Hesperus', 'Excelsior', and 'The Village Blacksmith'. Longfellow visited London in 1842, and was the guest of Dickens. On the return voyage he wrote his 'Poems on Slavery'. In 1845 appeared 'The Belfry of Bruges and other Poems'; in 1847, 'Evangeline' (q.v.); in 1849, 'Kavanagh', a tale in prose, and 'The Seaside and the Fireside', containing 'The Building of the Ship' and 'Resignation'; in 1855, 'Hiawatha' (q.v.); in 1858, 'The Courtship of Miles Standish' (q.v.); in 1863, the first series of 'Tales of a Wayside Inn', including 'Paul Revere's Ride' and 'The Saga of King Olaf'; in 1867, his translation of Dante's 'Divine Comedy'. In 1872 appeared his 'Christus', a trilogy which Longfellow regarded as his greatest achievement. The three parts of it had appeared earlier: (1) 'The Divine Tragedy', in 1871; (2) 'The Golden Legend' (q.v.), in 1851; (3) 'New England Tragedies', in 1868. In 1872 he also published 'Three Books of Song', including further 'Tales of a Wayside Inn', the third instalment of these appearing in 'Aftermath' (1874). The 'Masque of Pandora' (1875) includes the fine ode 'Morituri Salutamus' and some notable sonnets. Longfellow's last volumes were 'Ultima Thule' (1880) and 'In the Harbor', published in 1882, after his death.

LONGINUS, CASSIUS, a Greek philosopher and critic of the 3rd cent. A.D., the instructor and counsellor of Zenobia. The author, conventionally called Longinus, of the remarkable treatise of literary criticism, 'On the Sublime', was probably of earlier date.

Longinus or LONGIUS, the traditional name of the Roman soldier who pierced with his spear the side of our Lord at the crucifixion. His spear figures in certain versions of the Grail legend, and is mentioned in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', II. xvi. It was dug up in a church at Antioch during the First Crusade, and enabled the Crusaders to overcome a vast host of Moslems.

Longomontanus, CHRISTIAN SEVERIN (1562-1647), of Longberg (of which Longomontanus is the latinized form), a Danish astronomer, assistant of Tycho Brahe (q.v.).

LONGUS, the reputed author of 'Daphnis and Chloe' (q.v.), of whom nothing is known.

LOPE DE VEGA, see Vega.

Lorbrulgrud, in 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), the capital of Brobdingnag.

Lord of Burleigh, The, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), of which the story (of a country girl who marries a landscape-painter and discovers that he is a wealthy noble) is founded on the marriage of Henry, marquess of Exeter (1754-1804), in 1791, with Sarah Hoggins of Bolas in Shropshire.

Lord of the Ascendant, see House (Astrological).

Lord of the Isles, The, a poem in six cantos by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1815.

The poem, founded on the chronicles of the Bruce, deals with the return of Robert Bruce in 1307 to Scotland, whence he had been driven after the murder of the Red Comyn, and the period of his subsequent struggle against the English, culminating in the battle of Bannockburn. With this is woven the story of the love of Edith of Lorn for Lord Ronald, the Lord of the Isles. She is his affianced bride, but his heart is given to Isabel, Bruce's sister. His marriage to Edith is prevented by the return of Bruce. Edith, in the disguise of a mute page, follows Bruce and Ronald, and, at the risk of her life, saves them from destruction. Her devotion finally wins Lord Ronald's heart.

Lord Ormont and his Aminta, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1894.

Major-general the earl of Ormont, a distinguished cavalry commander, who has retired from the service with a grievance against the East India Company and the British public, has met the young and beautiful Aminta Farrell on a trip to Spain, and, in spite of her inferior birth and her dreadful aunt, Mrs. Pagnell, and his own sixty years, has married her at the embassy at Madrid. On her side Aminta has been led to the step by intense hero-worship. Lord Ormont contemplates a life of travel on the Continent, and when Aminta tires of this and they return to London, he does not introduce her to society or publicly recognize her as his wife, but leaves her in an equivocal position and to the companionship of a shady and highly emancipated set. Matthew (Matie) Weyburn, another young admirer of Lord Ormont's military prowess, is appointed his secretary, and discovers in the countess the 'Brownie' of his schooldays and the object of a boyish passion. In spite of honourable restraint on both sides, circumstances revive their mutual affection. Lord Ormont's treatment and Mrs. Pagnell's mischievous interference expose Aminta to the persecution of the profligate Morsfield, from which Weyburn helps to rescue her. Lord Ormont finally repents of his course and prepares to give Aminta her proper position. But it is too late, and Aminta leaves him for ever. Matie and Brownie, both great swimmers, meet one morning in the sea, and the meeting decides their fate. They defy conventions and go off together to keep a school in Switzerland. Some years later, before Lord Ormont's death, they receive his forgiveness.

Lord Strutt, in Arbuthnot's 'History of John Bull' (q.v.), represents King Philip of Spain.

Lord Ullin's Daughter, a ballad by Campbell (q.v.).

Lord's cricket ground, London, the headquarters of the Marylebone Cricket Club, so named from Thomas Lord, who at the end of the 18th cent. removed here from a cricket ground that he had previously opened near Regent's Park. Lord is said to have been a Scot and a Jacobite.

Lords and Liveries, in Thackeray's 'Novels by Eminent Hands', is a parody of the novels of Mrs. C. G. F. Gore (q.v.).

Lorel, the swineherd in Jonson's 'The Sad Shepherd' (q.v.).

Lorelei, a cliff on the Rhine, where, according to German legend, dwelt a siren of the same name, who lured boatmen to destruction by her song. It is the subject of a poem by Heine.

Lorenzo, a character in Shakespeare's 'The Merchant of Venice' (q.v.).

Loretto or LORETO, a small town near Ancona in Italy, where in a church stands the SANTA CASA ('Holy House'), reputed to be the veritable house of the Holy Family miraculously transported there from Nazareth in 1294.

Lorna Doone, a novel by R. D. Blackmore (q.v.), published in 1869. The story is set in the times of Charles II and James II, and has a slight historical background, for Monmouth's rebellion and Judge Jeffreys figure in it, and John Ridd and the highwayman Tom Faggus have some traditional foundation.

John Ridd is a young Exmoor yeoman of herculean strength and stature. His father has been killed by the Doones, a clan of robbers and murderers who inhabit a neighbouring valley. The vengeance which John and his neighbours finally exact from the Doones for their numerous crimes, complicated by John's love for Lorna Doone, provides the main theme of the book and the occasion for many thrilling and romantic adventures. John rescues Lorna from her villainous associates, and the chief impediment to their marriage is the fact that her reputed father was the murderer of John's father. It turns out that Lorna is really the daughter of a Scottish noble, stolen from her parents by the Doones, and the difficulty now lies in the disparity in the social positions of Lorna and John. But this is overcome by Lorna's fidelity and by the services that John renders to an old kinsman of Lorna and to the king.

Lot or Loth, in the Arthurian legend, is king of Orkney and the husband of Arthur's sister, Margawse or Morgause, and the father of Gawain and, in the earlier version, of Modred. He is perhaps, in origin, the Lludd of British mythology.

LOT, PARSON, the pseudonym of C. Kingsley (q.v.).

Lothair, a novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1870. This is one of Disraeli's last two novels, written while out of office, and, though containing many references to politics, has no political purpose.

Lothair is a young nobleman of immense wealth, an orphan left to the guardianship of Lord Culloden, a Scottish noble, and of a clergyman of shining talent, who, after his appointment as guardian, enters the Church of Rome and becomes Cardinal Grandison. Lothair, after a strictly Protestant education in Scotland, comes of age about the time (1866) when the Garibaldian forces were threatening the papal government. The plot of the novel consists principally of the efforts of Cardinal Grandison, assisted by his attendant Monsignor Cateby, and supported by the ascendancy of the beautiful and devout Catholic, Clare Arundel, to secure for the

LOUISIANA PURCHASE

Roman Church the influence and wealth of Lothair. The forces opposed to his conversion are Lord Culloden, Lady Corisande (whom from his Oxford days Lothair has wished to marry), and the heroic Theodora, the enthusiastic supporter of Italian liberty. Lothair joins in the campaign against the papal forces, in the course of which Theodora is killed, obtaining from Lothair on her death-bed a promise that he will never enter the Roman Church. Lothair himself is wounded at Mentana, and the struggle to secure him is renewed by the Roman ecclesiastics. Their efforts are related with genial humour, and there is a capital passage where the cardinal blandly attempts to persuade Lothair that his belief that he fought at Mentana is a delusion comparable to that of George IV that he commanded at Waterloo. Lothair with difficulty escapes from the cardinal's vigilance, and finally returns to England to marry Lady Corisande. Among the delightful characters in the book is that of Lord St. Aldegonde, the red republican opposed to all privileges, except those of dukes, and in favour of the equal division of all property, except land.

Lothario, (1) the heartless libertine (proverbial as 'the Gay Lothario') in Nicholas Rowe's 'The Fair Penitent' (q.v.); (2) a character in the episode of 'The Curious Impertinent' (q.v.) in 'Don Quixote'; (3) a character in Goethe's 'Wilhelm Meister'.

LOTI, PIERRE, pseudonym of JULIEN VIAUD (1850-1923), French naval officer and author. Loti was an impressionist writer, with a remarkable gift for depicting exotic scenery and the melancholy aspects of nature, especially of the sea. He is seen at his best in some of his earlier works, such as 'Mon Frère Yves', 'Pêcheur d'Islande', and 'Le Mariage de Loti'.

Lotophāgi or LOTUS-EATERS, according to the 'Odyssey', a people inhabiting a coast visited by Ulysses, who fed on a fruit called the lotus. Those who ate it lost all desire to return to their native country. 'The Lotus-eaters' is the subject of one of Tennyson's best-known poems, founded on the Homeric story, in Spenserian stanzas followed by a choric ode of the sailors.

Lotte, the heroine of Goethe's 'The Sorrows of Werther' (see Goethe). Lotte was drawn from Lotte Buff, with whom Goethe fell in love at Wetzlar, and who married Goethe's friend Kestner.

purchased from Napoleon, for $15,000,000, a vast tract of land west of the Mississippi, containing 828,000 square miles, or an area greater than that of all the thirteen original States. 'The bargain was a great one for America. It not only precluded all possibility of a foreign power getting a foothold on the lower Mississippi; it also secured control of the great river. . . .' [H. W. Elson.]

Lourdes, a town on the Gave de Pau in the Hautes-Pyrénées, France, one of the chief centres of Roman Catholic pilgrimage. The principal object visited is a grotto in which the Virgin is said to have appeared in 1858 and revealed the miraculous properties of a local spring. Lourdes is the subject of Zola's (q.v.) novel of that name (1894).

Loustad, The, a mock-heroic poem by Wolcott (q.v.), published in 1785.

Its subject is the appearance of a louse in a dish of peas served to George III, which led to an order that all the servants in the king's kitchen should have their heads shaved.

Louvre, THE, the ancient palace of the kings of France in Paris, dating according to tradition from King Dagobert (628-38), who is said to have had a hunting-seat there (Louvre is from the late Latin lupara, which appears to mean a place or equipment for hunting wolves). It was entirely rebuilt in the reign of Philip II, and enlarged by Francis I and his successors down to Napoleon III. See also Louvre (Musée du).

Louvre, MUSÉE DU, housed in the former royal palace (see above), the principal art museum in France, containing a number of collections, of which the most important are those of pictures and of sculpture. The private collections of the kings of France form the nucleus of the former, which dates from the Renaissance, and particularly from Francis I, who imported a number of paintings from Italy (including Leonardo's 'Mona Lisa'). Louis XIV added largely to it, and it was immensely increased by the spoils of conquest during the wars of the Revolution and the Empire (after the fall of Napoleon, the Allies caused 5,000 works of art to be restored to their former owners). Since then it has been added to by purchase and bequests. The sculptures, like the pictures, come in part from royal collections; many are the fruit of archaeological missions.

Love à la Mode, a comedy by Macklin (q.v.), produced in 1759.

Four suitors, an Englishman, an Irishman, a Scot, and a Jew, are rivals for the hand of the heroine. Their quality is tested by the pretence that she has lost her fortune. The play is famous for the characters of Sir Archy MacSarcasm and Sir Callaghan O'Brallaghan.

Love for Love, a comedy by Congreve (q.v.), produced in 1695.

Valentine has fallen under the displeasure of his father by his extravagance, and is besieged by duns. His father, Sir Sampson

LOVE'S LABOUR'S LOST

Legend, offers him £4,000 (only enough to pay his debts) if he will sign a bond engaging to make over his right to his inheritance to his younger brother Ben. Valentine, to escape from his embarrassment, signs the bond. He is in love with Angelica, who possesses a fortune of her own, but she has hitherto not yielded to his suit. Sir Sampson has arranged a match between Ben, who is at sea, and Miss Prue, an awkward country girl, the daughter of Foresight, a superstitious old fool who claims to be an astrologer. Valentine, realizing the ruin entailed by the signature of the bond, tries to move his father by submission, and fails; then pretends to be mad and unable to sign the final deed of conveyance to his brother. Finally Angelica intervenes. She induces Sir Sampson to propose marriage to her, pretends to accept, and gets possession of Valentine's bond. When Valentine, in despair at finding that Angelica is about to marry his father, declares himself ready to sign the conveyance, she reveals the plot, tears up the bond, and declares her love for Valentine.

The comedy is enlivened by its witty dialogue and its humorous characters. Among these are Jeremy, Valentine's resourceful servant; Sir Sampson, with his 'blunt vivacity'; Ben, the rough young sea-dog, who intends to marry whom he chooses; Miss Prue, only too ready to learn the lessons in love given her by Tattle, the vain, half-witted beau, who finds himself married to Mrs. Frail, the lady of easy virtue, when he thinks he has captured Angelica; and Foresight, the gullible old astrologer.

Love's Cruelty, a tragedy by James Shirley (q.v.), produced in 1631, printed in 1640.

Hippolito refuses to meet Clariana, the wife of his friend Bellamante, for fear that her beauty may tempt him to disloyalty to her husband. Clariana, piqued at his refusal, visits Hippolito, concealing her identity, with consequences disastrous to all three.

Love's Labour's Lost, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), on internal evidence one of his earliest works, probably produced about 1595, printed in quarto in 1598.

The king of Navarre and three of his lords have sworn for three years to keep from the sight of woman and to live studying and fasting. The arrival of the princess of France on an embassy, with her attendant ladies, obliges them 'of mere necessity' to disregard their vows. The king is soon in love with the princess, his lords with her ladies, and the courting proceeds amidst disguises and merriement, to which the other characters contribute, viz. Don Adriano de Armado, the Spaniard, a master of extravagant language, Holofernes the schoolmaster, Dull the constable, Sir Nathaniel the curate, and Costard the clown. News of the death of the princess's father interrupts the wooing, and the ladies impose a year's ordeal on their lovers. The play ends with the beautiful owl and cuckoo-song, 'When icicles hang by the wall'.

Love's Sacrifice, a tragedy by J. Ford (q.v.), printed in 1633.

Fernando, favourite of the duke of Pavia, falls in love with Bianca, the duchess. He declares his love, but is repulsed. Presently, however, the duchess, in whom he has awakened a strong passion, comes to his room and offers herself to him, but warns him that she will not survive her shame, but take her own life before morning. Fernando masters his passion and determines to remain her distant lover. Fiormonda, the duke's sister, who has vainly importuned Fernando with her love for him, discovers his affection for Bianca, and pursues her vengeance. With the help of D'Avolos, the duke's base secretary, she stirs up the duke's jealousy, and a trap is laid for Fernando and Bianca. The duke finds them together, and kills Bianca. Convinced too late, by Fernando's declarations and Bianca's manner of meeting her death, of her innocence, he stabs himself, and Fernando takes poison in Bianca's tomb.

Lovel the Widower, a short story by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 1860 in the 'Cornhill Magazine'. The principal characters are Lovel, the well-to-do widower; his odious mother-in-law Lady Baker, who makes his home intolerable; and Miss Prior, the governess in his family, a young woman who has learnt diplomacy in the school of adversity. It comes to light that she once danced at a theatre, and Lady Baker indignantly orders her to leave. But Lovel asks her to remain, as his wife, and Lady Baker is routed.

LOVELACE, RICHARD (1618-58), educated at Charterhouse School and Gloucester Hall, Oxford, was the heir to great estates in Kent. Wealthy, handsome, and of graceful manners, he had a romantic career. He was a courtier and served in the Scottish expeditions of 1639. Having presented a 'Kentish Petition' to the House of Commons in 1642, he was thrown into the Gatehouse prison, where he wrote the song, 'To Althea'. He rejoined Charles I in 1645 and served with the French king in 1646. It being reported that he was killed, his betrothed Lucy Sacheverell — 'Lucasta' — married another man. He was again imprisoned in 1648, and in prison prepared for the press his 'Lucasta; Epodes, Odes, Sonnets, Songs, &c.', which includes the beautiful lyric 'On going to the wars'. He died in extreme want. After his death his brother published his remaining verses ('Lucasta: Posthume Poems'). He wrote two plays, which have perished, and is remembered only by his lyrics, which are of unequal quality. His works have been edited by C. H. Wilkinson (2 vols., Oxford, 1925).

Lovelace, ROBERT, a character in Richardson's 'Clarissa Harlowe' (q.v.).

Loveless, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Relapse' and Sheridan's 'A Trip to Scarborough' (qq.v.).

Lovell, LORD, a character in Massinger's 'A New Way to pay Old Debts' (q.v.).

LOVER, SAMUEL (1797-1868), Irish novelist and song-writer, is remembered for his ballad, and the novel developed out of it, 'Rory O'More' (1836), which deal with the tragic events in Ireland in 1798; also for his novel 'Handy Andy' (1842), in which he depicts the whimsical aspects of Irish character. Andy Rooney, known as 'Handy Andy', is the servant of Squire Egan, and has an unrivalled faculty of 'doing everything the wrong way'. The rivalry of Squire Egan and Squire O'Grady and the blunders of Andy give rise to many amusing incidents, ending in the discovery that Andy is an Irish peer, Lord Scatterbrain. Lover published his 'Songs and Ballads' in 1839.

Lover's Melancholy, The, a romantic comedy by J. Ford (q.v.), acted in 1628.

Palador, prince of Cyprus, has been betrothed to Eroclea, daughter of Meleander, an old lord; but, to escape the evil designs of Palador's father, she has been conveyed away to Greece, where she has remained disguised as a boy. Meleander has been accused of treason, imprisoned, and driven to madness. Palador, after his father's death, is left in a state of hopeless melancholy. Eroclea returns to Cyprus as the page of Menaphon. Tharmasta, cousin of the prince, falls in love with her in this disguise, and to escape her attentions Eroclea is obliged to reveal her identity. She is then restored to Palador; Meleander is released and cured; Tharmasta marries Menaphon; and all ends happily. The play contains a version of Strada's contest of the lute-player and the nightingale, which is also dealt with by Crashaw (q.v.).

Lovers of Gudrun, The, see Gudrun (The Lovers of).

Lovers' Progress, The, a romantic drama by J. Fletcher (q.v.), revised by Massinger (q.v.), produced in 1623 and printed in 1647.

Lidian and Clarangè, devoted friends, are both in love with Olinda. Clarangè lets it be believed that he is dead, and finally turns friar, in order to surrender Olinda to Lidian. The plot is complicated with another illustration of the conflict of love and friendship. Lisander loves the virtuous Calista, wife of his friend Cleander. Cleander is killed by a servant. The imprudent but not criminal conduct of Lisander and Calista throws grave suspicion on them, and they narrowly escape condemnation for the murder.

Lovers' Vows, a play by Mrs. Inchbald, adapted from 'Das Kind der Liebe' of Kotzebue (q.v.), acted in 1798.

Baron Wildenheim has in his youth seduced and deserted Agatha Friburg, a chambermaid, and married another woman. Agatha, when the play opens, is reduced to destitution, in which state she is found by her son, Frederic, a young soldier, who now for the first time learns the story of his birth. To relieve his mother's needs, he goes out to beg, and chances upon his unknown father, and attempts to rob him. He is arrested, discovers who the baron is, reveals his own identity and his mother's, and finally, with the aid of the good pastor Anhalt, persuades the baron to marry Agatha. The baron consents also to the marriage of his daughter Amelia with Anhalt, abandoning the projected marriage with Count Cassell which he had at heart.

The play would be of little interest but for the place it occupies in the story of Jane Austen's 'Mansfield Park' (q.v.).

Loves of the Angels, The, a poem by T. Moore, published in 1823. This was Moore's last long poem, and it had a very wide vogue. It was translated into several languages.

The poem recounts the loves of three fallen angels for mortal women, being founded on the eastern tale of 'Harût and Marût' (q.v.) and certain rabbinical fictions. In the poet's intention it represents emblematically the decline of the soul from purity. The first angel loved Lea, and taught her the spell-word which opens the gate of heaven. At once she uttered it and rose to the stars. The second loved Lilis; he came to her in his full celestial glory, and she was burnt to death. The third, Zaraph, loved Nama; they were condemned to live in imperfect happiness among mortals, but would ultimately be admitted to immortality.

Loves of the Plants, The, see Darwin (E.).

Loves of the Triangles, The, a parody by Canning and J. H. Frere in the 'Anti-Jacobin' (q.v.) of E. Darwin's (q.v.) 'The Loves of the Plants'. The authors claim to have enlightened by illustration 'the arid truths of Euclid and Algebra', and, 'as it were, to have strewed the Asses' Bridge with flowers'.

Lovewell, one of the principal characters in Colman and Garrick's 'The Clandestine Marriage' (q.v.).

LOWELL, JAMES RUSSELL (1819-91), born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, succeeded Longfellow as professor of belles-lettres at Harvard in 1855, and was American minister in Spain, 1877-80, and in England, 1880-5. He was editor of the 'Atlantic Monthly' magazine in 1857, and subsequently (1864) with C. E. Norton of the 'North American Review'. His works include several volumes of verse, the satirical 'Biglow Papers' (1848 and 1867), and memorial odes after the Civil War; and prose essays, 'Conversations on some of the old Poets' (1845), 'Fireside Travels' (1864), 'Among my Books' (1870 and 1876), 'My Study Windows' (1871), 'Democracy' (1884), and 'Political Essays' (1888). His 'Letters', edited by C. E. Norton, appeared in 1894.

LOWES, JOHN LIVINGSTON (1867-1945), professor of English at Harvard University and writer. His principal work is 'The Road to Xanadu' (1927), a remarkable study of Coleridge's 'Kubla Khan' and 'The Ancient Mariner'.

Low-heels and High-heels, in 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), two factions in Lilliput.

LOWNDES, WILLIAM THOMAS (d. 1843), author of 'The Bibliographer's Manual of English Literature' (1834) and 'The British Librarian' (1839), early bibliographical works of importance. The former was revised and enlarged (1857-8) by H. G. Bohn (q.v.).

Loyal Subject, The, a drama by J. Fletcher (q.v.), produced in 1618.

The subject is the jealousy shown by the duke of Muscovy of his late father's loyal general, Archas, whom he dismisses and replaces by an incompetent flatterer Boroskie. The young Archas, son of the general, disguised as a girl (Alinda) is placed in the service of Olympia, the duke's sister, wins her affection, and attracts the duke's love. On an invasion of the Tartars, Boroskie feigns sickness, Archas is recalled and conquers. But Boroskie inflames the duke's suspicion of Archas. On signs of the disaffection of the troops, who are devoted to Archas, Archas is carried off to torture. The infuriated troops attack the palace, and then march away to join the Tartars, but are brought back to submission by Archas, fresh from the rack. The repentant duke marries Honora, daughter of Archas. The identity of Alinda, who has been dismissed by Olympia on suspicion of yielding to the duke's advances, is now declared, and the young Archas is married to Olympia.

Loyola, St. IGNATIUS (1491-1556), a page to Ferdinand V of Aragon, and subsequently an officer in the Spanish army, was wounded in both legs at the siege of Pampeluna (1521), and thereafter devoted himself to religion. He constituted himself the Knight of the Blessed Virgin, went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and on his return in 1534 founded in Paris the society of the Jesuits, bound by vows of chastity, poverty, obedience, and submission to the holy see, and authorized by papal bull in 1540. Its principal activities were preaching, instruction, and confession, and it formed a spiritual army bound to obedience. The object of the society was to support the Roman church in its conflict with the 16th-cent. reformers and to propagate its faith among the heathen. Francis Xavier and other missionaries carried on the latter work in the most distant parts of the world. The secret power of the organization brought it into collision with the civil authorities even in Roman Catholic countries, whence its members have at times been expelled. Loyola's 'Exercitia' ('Spiritual Exercises'), a manual of devotion and of rules for meditation and prayer, was finished in 1548.

Luath, in the Ossianic poems of Macpherson (q.v.), Cuthullin's dog. The name was adopted by Burns for the ploughman's collie in his poem 'The Twa Dogs' (q.v.).

LUBBOCK, SIR JOHN, first Baron Avebury (1834-1913), educated at Eton, and head of the banking house of Robarts, Lubbock & Co., was elected M.P. for Maidstone in 1870 and subsequently sat for London University; in 1871 he secured the passing of the Bank Holidays Act, and in 1882 the Act for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments. From early days he devoted his leisure to natural science and was a pioneer in the study of the life histories of insects. His scientific works include the following: 'Prehistoric Times' (1865), 'The Origin of Civilization' (1870), 'On the Origin and Metamorphoses of Insects' (1874), 'Ants, Bees, and Wasps' (1882), 'On the Senses, Instincts, and Intelligence of Animals' (1888), 'A Contribution to our Knowledge of Seedlings' (1892), 'The Scenery of Switzerland' (1896), 'On Buds and Stipules' (1899), and 'Marriage, Totemism, and Religion' (1911). He wrote other works which enjoyed much popularity: the list of the 'Hundred Best Books', 'The Pleasures of Life' (1887-9), 'The Beauties of Nature' (1892), 'The Use of Life' (1894), and 'Peace and Happiness' (1909).

LUCAN, Marcus Annaeus Lucanus (A.D. 39-65), a Roman poet born at Corduba (Cordova) in Spain. His success as a poet aroused the jealousy of Nero, who forbade him to recite in public. In consequence Lucan joined in the conspiracy of Piso, and was compelled to take his own life. His chief work is the 'Pharsalia', a heroic poem describing the struggle between Caesar and Pompey.

LUCAS, EDWARD VERRALL (1868-1938), educated at London University, an essayist of remarkable charm, at one time assistant editor of 'Punch', published, among numerous works, a standard life of Charles Lamb (1905, 5th ed., 1921), editions of the works and letters of Charles and Mary Lamb (1903-35), and two pleasant anthologies, 'The Open Road' (1899, revised 1905) and 'The Friendly Town' (1905). Among the best of his discursive 'entertainments', a blend of the novel and the essay, are 'Over Bemerton's' (1908) and 'Listener's Lure' (1911).

Lucas, Vrain- (b. c. 1818?), French forger, born at Châteaudun. His forgeries consisted of over 27,000 letters alleged to be from historical personages, among them being Abélard, Alcuin, Alexander the Great, Attila, Julius Caesar, Cervantes, Cicero, Cleopatra, Galileo, Herod, Joan of Arc, Judas Iscariot, Pascal, Pontius Pilate, Vercingetorix. The letters were written in French (except Galileo's, which was in Italian), and were on contemporary paper. They were sold over a period of about nine years (1861-9) to Michel Chasles (1793-1880), the eminent French geometrician and member of the Académie des Sciences. Chasles, being an old man and a fellow provincial of Lucas, seems to have entirely believed in him, and to have had no suspicion of imposture, notwithstanding the remarkable range of the letters, and, as afterwards appeared, the glaring errors of chronology. Over 140,000 frs. were paid by him for the various letters. Lucas represented that the letters had come from a collection made by the Comte de Boisjardin, who, he alleged, had emigrated to America in 1791, was shipwrecked and drowned. The letters, however, were saved, a few pieces being damaged by water.

In 1867 Chasles gave various letters to the Académie, including some from Pascal to Boyle and Newton. These were designed to show that Pascal had preceded Newton in establishing the law of gravitation, but it was later shown that at the date of the alleged letters Newton was only 10½ years old. The publication of these letters immediately raised doubts of their authenticity. They were exposed in 1868 by P. Faugère in his 'Défense de B. Pascal, et accessoirement de Newton, Galilée', &c., which contains facsimiles of some of the forged documents as well as genuine letters. Vrain-Lucas was tried in 1870, and was sentenced to a heavy fine and two years' imprisonment. On his release he again tried to pass off further forgeries and was sentenced to a further three years' imprisonment.

Lucasta, see Lovelace.

LUCCA, THE HOLY FACE (Volto Santo) or SACRED COUNTENANCE OF, is a crucifix of cedar-wood in the Cathedral of St. Martin at Lucca, reputed to have been carved by Nicodemus and to give a true likeness of the Saviour. Alban Butler in his 'Lives of the Saints' (s.v. 'Anselm') states that 'by the holy face of Lucca' was the 'usual oath' of William Rufus.

Lucentio, a character in Shakespeare's 'The Taming of the Shrew' (q.v.).

Lucia, a character in Addison's 'Cato' (q.v.).

LUCIAN (b. c. A.D. 120), a Greek writer born at Samosata on the banks of the Euphrates, author of 'Dialogues of the Gods' and 'Dialogues of the Dead' in which mythology, philosophers, and the society of the time are satirized with much humour and vivacity (though some of the dialogues are melancholy, or despairing under a veil of cynical levity). The 'Dialogues' have been translated by H. W. and F. G. Fowler (1905). In his 'Auction of Philosophers', Socrates, Aristotle, and other great thinkers are offered by the gods to the highest bidder. His 'Veracious History' is a narrative of imaginary travels, the prototype of Gulliver. 'Lucius, or the Ass', a different version of the tale of the 'Golden Ass' (q.v.) of Apuleius, is doubtfully attributed to Lucian.

Lucifer, the morning star; the Phosphorus of the Greeks, the planet Venus when it appears in the sky before sunrise. The application of the name to Satan, the rebel archangel who was hurled from heaven, arises from a mistaken interpretation of Isa. xiv. 12, 'How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning'.

Lucifera, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', I. iv. 12, the symbol of baseless pride and worldliness.

Lucillus, GAIUS (180-102 B.C.), Roman satirist.

Lucina, 'She who brings to light', the Roman goddess who presided over childbirth. She was identified with Juno.

Lucina, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), a lady in the power of a cruel monster called an orc, released by Mandricardo and Gradasso.

Lucinda, see Cardenio.

Lucius, (1) a mythical king of Britain, supposed to have been the first to receive Christianity. See Spenser, 'Faerie Queene', II. x. 53; (2) in the legend of Arthur (q.v.) Lucius is the Roman emperor against whom Arthur wages war; (3) Brutus's page in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar' (q.v.); (4) a character in his 'Timon of Athens' (q.v.); (5) a character in his 'Titus Andronicus' (q.v.); (6) in his 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), Caius Lucius is 'General of the Roman Forces'.

Luck of Eden Hall, a goblet of enamelled glass long kept at Eden Hall in Cumberland. The luck of the Musgrave family was traditionally held to depend on its safe preservation. It is the subject of a ballad by Uhland, translated by Longfellow.

Luck of Roaring Camp, The, one of the best known of Bret Harte's short stories, published in 1868.

Lucrece or Lucretia, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus, whose beauty inflamed the passion of Sextus (son of Tarquin, king of Rome), which he used threats and violence to satisfy. Lucretia, after informing her father and husband of what had passed, and entreating them to avenge her indignities, took her own life. The outrage committed by Sextus, coupled with the oppression of the king, led to the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, and the introduction of republican government.

Lucrece, The Rape of, a poem in seven-lined stanzas by Shakespeare (q.v.), published in 1594 and dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. For the subject of the poem see Lucrece, above.

Lucretius, Titus Lucretius Carus, the Roman poet, lived during the 1st cent. B.C., probably c. 99-55 B.C. It is said that he was driven mad by a love-potion administered by his wife Lucilia, and that he took his own life in his 44th year. His chief work is a philosophical poem in hexameters, in six books, 'De Rerum Naturâ'. He adopts the atomic theory of the universe of Epicurus (q.v.), and seeks to show that the course of the world can be explained without resorting to divine intervention, his object being to free mankind from terror of the gods. The work is marked by passages of great poetical beauty.

This, perhaps the greatest of Tennyson's poems on classical subjects, presents the philosopher, his mind distraught, and his 'settled, sweet, Epicurean life' deranged, by the love-potion that Lucilia has administered, mingling visions of atoms and of gods, lamenting his subjugation to 'some unseen monster', and finally taking his own life.

Lucrezia Borgia, see Borgia (L.).

Lucullus, LUCIUS LICINIUS (b. c. 110 B.C.), Sulla's quaestor and subsequently consul, who for eight years (74-67) carried on the war with Mithridates. After his return to Rome, having amassed much wealth, he became famous for his magnificence and luxury, spending vast sums on a single dinner. He was also a patron of literature.

Lucy, in the episode of Amidas and Bracidas in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. iv, the dowdier maid abandoned by Amidas and married by Bracidas.

Lucy, the subject of several poems by Wordsworth (q.v.) written about 1799, has been taken for a real person and was made the heroine of a story by the Baroness von Stockhausen. But nothing is known to suggest that she really existed. Coleridge surmised that one of the poems, 'A slumber did my spirit steal', referred to Dorothy Wordsworth. See, however, H. W. Garrod, 'Wordsworth's Lucy' in his 'Profession of Poetry' (1929).

Lucy Locket and Kitty Fisher (in the nursery rhyme about Lucy Locket losing her pocket) were, according to Halliwell, celebrated courtesans in the time of Charles II. A Kitty Fisher (d. 1767), described under the name of Kitty Willis in Mrs. Cowley's 'Belle's Stratagem', was several times painted by Sir J. Reynolds.

Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.), he built walls round the city founded by Brute, which subsequently was known as London, and called it Cær Lud. See also Ludgate.

Luddites, English mechanics, who, under the pressure of the economic disturbance caused by the introduction of machinery to replace handicraft in the period 1811-16, set themselves to destroy machinery in the midlands and north of England. Their name is said to be taken from one Ned Ludd, a person of weak intellect, who lived in a Leicestershire village about 1779, and in a fit of insane fury broke up two frames in a stockinger's house. The Luddites figure in C. Brontë's 'Shirley' (q.v.). Byron's 'Song for the Luddites' was written in 1816 and published in 1830.

Ludgate, the name of one of the ancient gates of London, traditionally connected with King Lud, but now believed to be a corruption of the OE. ludgeat, a postern. The gatehouse became a prison for debtors of the better sort (others being sent to the Fleet).

Luke, St., the evangelist, by tradition a physician (Col. iv. 14) and a painter, and the patron saint of these crafts. His festival is kept on 18 Oct., whence a period of fine weather about that day is called 'St. Luke's Summer'.

Luke's iron crown, in the well-known lines in Goldsmith's 'The Traveller', is an allusion to the Hungarian peasant revolt in 1514 against the oppressive Magyar rule, led by György Dosza. Dosza was finally routed at Temesvar and condemned to sit on a red-hot iron throne, with a red-hot crown on his head. Goldsmith wrote 'Luke' in error for George.

Lulli or LULLY, JEAN BAPTISTE (1633-87), a Florentine by birth, composer and director of the opera in Paris under Louis XIV; the founder of the French grand opera.

LULLY, RAYMOND (Raimon Lull) (c. 1235-1315), a Catalan born in Majorca, who, after visions of Christ crucified, became a Franciscan, a mystic, a philosopher, a missionary to the Arabs, an author of controversial treatises, and a poet. He urged on the Council of Vienne (1311) the establishment of schools for missionary languages and obtained a decree for the foundation of chairs of Hebrew, Greek, Chaldee, and Arabic at various universities (including Oxford; Rashdall, ii. 459). He died of wounds received in a missionary crusade in North Africa, undertaken in his 80th year, after he had been twice expelled from Barbary.

Lumpkin, TONY, a character in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.).

Lunsford, SIR THOMAS (1610?-53?), a royalist colonel and a man of violent temper, who was removed from the lieutenantancy of the Tower on the petition of the Commons. He is referred to in Butler's 'Hudibras', iii. 2, 1111.

Lupercal, a cave on the Palatine hill in ancient Rome, sacred to LUPERCUS, or Faunus in the form of a wolf-deity. The story of Romulus and Remus having been suckled by a wolf is connected with this deity. The 'Lupercalia' was the annual festival of Luper-cus, when the priests (Luperci) ran about the city striking the women whom they met, a ceremony supposed to make them fruitful [Lewis and Short].

Lupin, ARSÈNE, the hero of Maurice Leblanc's novels of crime, at once a criminal and a detective. In some of Leblanc's short stories he is brought amusingly into conflict with Sherlock Holmes.

Luria, a poetical drama by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1846.

The play deals with an episode of the struggle between Florence and Pisa in the 15th cent. Luria is a heroic Moor, the hired commander of the Florentine forces, whom, however, the Signoria distrust and plot to overthrow when he shall have achieved victory. Braccio is set to watch him and to gather materials for his trial. The Pisan general Tiburzio brings to Luria an intercepted letter from Braccio to the Signoria, but the loyal Luria refuses to read it. After the battle he learns with indignation what is being contrived against him. He has Florence and Pisa at his mercy, but refuses to avail himself of his power, takes poison, and dies.

Lutetia or LUTETIA PARISIORUM, the modern Paris, on an island in the Sequana (Seine), was the capital of the Parisii, a Gallic tribe. Two wooden bridges connected it with the banks of the river, and it became a place of importance during the Roman Empire.

'Lutetia', in imprints, stands for Paris.

LUTHER, MARTIN (1483-1546), the leader of the Reformation in Germany, was born of humble parents at Eisleben, and entered the Augustinian order. As a monk he visited Rome, and his experience of the corruption in high ecclesiastical places influenced his future career. He attacked the principle of papal indulgences by nailing his famous

LUTHER

Theses to the door of the church at Wittenberg, and as a consequence the papal ban was pronounced on him (1521) at the Diet of Worms. He left the monastic order and married, and devoted himself to forming the League of Protestantism. His chief literary work, apart from polemical treatises, was his translation into German of the Old and New Testaments, known as the Lutheran Bible (1534; portions had appeared earlier). He also composed Hymns of great popularity in Germany, notably 'Ein feste Burg'.

Luther's power lay in these hymns of joy and strength and in his revival of the doctrine of justification by the faith of the individual, implying religious liberty and attacking the scandal of indulgences.

Lutine Bell. H.M.S. 'Lutine', a 32-gun frigate, previously of the French navy but captured by Admiral Duncan, sank in a heavy gale off the mouth of the Zuyder Zee in October 1799. She was carrying a large amount of coin and bullion, the property of merchants, and this entailed a heavy loss to the underwriters. In the course of salvage operations in 1857-8 the bell and rudder of the ship were recovered and taken to Lloyd's. There the bell now hangs; it is sounded on the occasion of important announcements.

LUTTRELL, HENRY (1765?-1851), author of an admirable light verse poem, 'Advice to Julia' (1820).

LUTTRELL, NARCISSUS (1657-1732), annalist and bibliographer, compiled 'A Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs, 1678-1714' (Oxford, 1857).

Luve Ron, or Love Rune, a mystic love-poem by Thomas de Hales, written probably between 1216 and 1240, in eight-lined stanzas. It deals with the theme of the love of Christ and of the joy of mystic union with Him.

Lux Mundi, a collection of essays on the Christian faith, by various hands, edited by C. Gore (q.v.), at that time principal of Pusey House, published in 1889.

The collection is an attempt to present the central ideas and principles of the Catholic faith in the light of contemporary thought and current problems. It was written by a group of Oxford men engaged in university tuition. The several essays and their contributors were as follows: 'Faith' (Rev. Henry Scott Holland); 'The Christian Doctrine of God' (Rev. Aubrey Moore); 'The Problem of Pain' and 'The Incarnation in Relation to Development' (Rev. J. R. Illingworth); 'The Preparation in History for Christ' (Rev. E. S. Talbot); 'The Incarnation as the Basis of Dogma' (Rev. R. C. Moberly); 'The Atonement' (Rev. and Hon. Arthur Lyttelton); 'The Holy Spirit and Inspiration' (Rev. C. Gore); 'The Church' (Rev. W. Lock); 'Sacraments' (Rev. F. Paget); 'Christianity and Politics' (Rev. W. J. H. Campion); 'Christian Ethics' (Rev. R. L. Ottley).

LYCURGUS

LYALL, EDNA, the pseudonym of Ada Ellen Bayly (1857-1903), novelist and ardent supporter of women's emancipation and of all political liberal movements. Her best-known novels were 'Donovan' (1882, admired by Gladstone), its sequel 'We Two' (1884), and 'In the Golden Days' (1885).

LYALL, SIR ALFRED COMYN (1835-1911), educated at Eton and Haileybury, joined the Indian Civil Service in 1856, and served actively in the mutiny. He had a distinguished career, becoming lieutenant-governor of the North-West Provinces and member of the India Council in London. He was author of 'Asiatic Studies' (1882; second series, 1890), treating principally of the Hindu religion; 'The Rise and Expansion of the British Dominion in India' (1893); lives of Warren Hastings (1889), Tennyson (1902), and Lord Dufferin (1905); and 'Studies in Literature and History' (1915). He also published a volume of remarkable 'Verses written in India' (1889), including the beautiful piece 'The Land of Regrets', 'Siva, or Mors Janua Vitae', 'The Old Pindaree', 'Retrospection', and 'Theology in Extremis' (the imaginary soliloquy of an Englishman in the mutiny who is offered his life if he will profess Mohammedanism). His biography was written by Sir H. M. Durand (1913).

Lyblus, Sir, see Li Beaus Descomus.

Lycaon, an impious king of Arcadia, to punish whom Zeus visited the earth. To test the divinity of Zeus, Lycaon set before him a dish of human flesh, which the god rejected and slew Lycaon and his wicked sons, or turned them into wolves. Lycaon was the father also of Callisto (q.v.). See Werewolf.

Lyceum, THE, a gymnasium outside the city of Athens, on the banks of the Ilissus, sacred to Apollo Lyceus, where Aristotle taught philosophy.

Lyceum Theatre, THE, in London, at first known as the English Opera House, was originally built in 1794, and rebuilt, after being destroyed by fire, in 1834. It is especially associated with the name of Sir Henry Irving, who was lessee and manager for many years from 1878.

Lycidas, a poem by Milton (q.v.), written in 1637, while at Horton.

It is an elegy, in pastoral form, on the death of Edward King, a fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, who had been a student there at the same time as Milton. King was drowned while crossing from Chester Bay to Dublin, his ship having struck a rock and foundered in calm weather.

LYCOPHRON (b. c. 325 B.C.), a Greek tragic poet, native of Euboea, who lived at Alexandria. His only extant poem is the 'Alexandra', in which Cassandra prophesies the fall of Troy and the fate of the Trojans and Greeks and their descendants.

Lycurgus, the legendary legislator of Sparta, of whom nothing certain is known. According to tradition he was the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta. After travelling in Crete and eastern lands, he returned to his country, then in a state of anarchy, and was acclaimed by all parties. He remodelled the constitution and obtained from the people a promise that they would not alter his laws until his return. He then went into voluntary exile, that the people's oath might be binding on them for ever, or according to Plutarch took his own life.

Lydford law, like 'Jedburgh justice' (q.v.), execution first, trial afterwards. Lydford is a town in Devon where a Stannaries court was formerly held.

LYDGATE, JOHN (1370?–1451?), probably of the Suffolk village of which he bears the name, and a monk of Bury St. Edmunds. He enjoyed the patronage of Duke Humphrey of Gloucester (q.v.). He was a most voluminous writer of verse. His chief poems are: 'Troy Book' (q.v.), written between 1412 and 1420, first printed in 1513; 'The Story of Thebes', written c. 1420, first printed c. 1500; 'Falls of Princes', founded on Boccaccio's 'De Casibus Virorum Illustrium', some 36,000 lines in rhyme-royal, written between 1430 and 1438, first printed in 1494; 'The Pilgrimage of Man', a very prolix 'Pilgrim's Progress', translated from Guillaume de Deguileville. A minor poem, 'London Lickpenny' (edited for the Percy Society by Halliwell), gives a vivid description of contemporary manners in London and Westminster (Howell says, 'Some call London a Lickpenny, as Paris is called a pick-purse, because of feasting and other occasions of expense'). Lydgate wrote also devotional, philosophical, scientific, historical, and occasional poems, besides allegories, fables, and moral romances. One prose work, 'The Damage and Destructyon in Realmes', written in 1400, is assigned to him.

Lydia, a part of Asia Minor, adjoining the Aegean Sea; its capital was Sardis. The first historical kings of Lydia were the Mermnadae dynasty (c. 685–546 B.C.), which included Gyges and Croesus (qq.v.), and was overthrown by Cyrus of Persia. Previously an active and industrious people, the Lydians gained under the Persian rule a reputation for effeminate luxury.

Lydian mode, one of the three principal modes of ancient Greek music, a minor scale appropriate to soft pathos.

LYELL, SIR CHARLES (1797–1875), geologist, was a pupil of William Buckland (author of 'Reliquiae Diluvianae', 1823). He travelled extensively, studying geology, and published his famous works 'The Principles of Geology' in 1830–3, 'The Elements of Geology' in 1838, and (after the appearance of Darwin's 'Origin of Species') 'The Antiquity of Man' in 1863. A record of his 'Travels in North America' appeared in 1845, and of a 'Second Visit' in 1849. Lyell was professor of geology at King's College, London, 1831–3, and president of the Geological Society 1835–6 and 1849–50. He completely revolutionized the prevailing ideas of the age of the earth, and substituted for the old conception of 'catastrophic' change the gradual process of natural laws.

Lyle, ANNOT, a character in Scott's 'A Legend of Montrose' (q.v.).

LYLY, JOHN (1554?–1606), was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and studied also at Cambridge. He was M.P. successively for Hindon, Aylesbury, and Appleby (1589–1601), and supported the cause of the bishops in the Martin Marprelate controversy in a worthless pamphlet, 'Pappe with an Hatchet', in 1589. The first part of his 'Euphues' (q.v.), 'The Anatomy of Wit', appeared in 1578, and the second part, 'Euphues and his England', in 1580. Its peculiar style (see Euphues) received the name 'Euphuism'. Lyly's best plays are 'Alexander and Campaspe' (1584, see Campaspe), 'Endimion' (q.v., 1591), 'Midas' (q.v., 1592), and 'The Woman in the Moone' (q.v., 1597). His 'Sapho and Phao' was acted in 1584. For his 'Mother Bombie' see Bumby. The plays contain attractive lyrics, which were first printed in Blount's collected edition of the plays (1632). Lyly as a dramatist is important as the first English writer of what is essentially high comedy, and as having adopted prose as the medium for its expression.

Lyceus, (1) one of the Argonauts (q.v.), noted, like the lynx, for his keen sight. He was killed by Pollux; (2) the husband of Hypermnestra (see Danaides).

Lynch law, the practice of inflicting summary punishment on an offender, irrespective of trial by a properly constituted court. The origin of the term is uncertain. It is often asserted to have arisen from the proceedings of Charles Lynch, a justice of the peace in Virginia, who in 1782 was indemnified by an act of the Virginia Assembly for having illegally fined and imprisoned certain Tories in 1780. Some have conjectured that the term is derived from Lynch's creek in South Carolina, a meeting-place in 1768 of the 'Regulators', a band of men who professed to supply the want of a regular administration of criminal justice in the Carolinas. [OED.]

LYNDSAY, SIR DAVID, see Lindsay (Sir D.).

Lynette, see Gareth and Lynette.

Lyon King-of-Arms, the title of the chief herald in Scotland, so named from the lion on the royal shield.

Lyones, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', the lady of the castle Perilous, whom Sir Gareth rescues and marries.

Lyonesse or LIONES, in the Arthurian legends, the country of Tristram's birth, is supposed to be a tract between the Land's End and the Scilly Isles, now submerged.

LYONORS

Lyonors, see Gareth and Lynette.

Lyons Mall, The, originally 'The Courier of Lyons', a melodrama by C. Reade and T. Taylor (qq.v.), produced in 1851. It kept the stage and furnished one of Sir H. Irving's successful parts.

Lyra Apostolica, a collection of sacred poems contributed originally to the 'British Magazine' by Keble, Newman, R. H. Froude, Wilberforce, and I. Williams (qq.v.), and reprinted in a separate volume in 1836.

Lyrical Ballads, a collection of poems by Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge (qq.v.), of which the first edition appeared in 1798, the second with new poems and a preface in 1800, and a third in 1802.

Coleridge in his 'Biographia Literaria' (q.v.), ch. xiv, describes how Wordsworth and he decided to divide the field between them: 'it was agreed that my endeavours should be directed to persons and characters supernatural or at least romantic. . . . Mr. Wordsworth, on the other hand, was to propose to himself as his object, to give the charm of novelty to things of every day. . . .' Coleridge's contributions to the first edition were three, increased in the second to five ('The Ancient Mariner', 'The Foster-Mother's Tale', 'The Nightingale', 'The Dungeon', and 'Love'). Wordsworth contributed such simple tales as 'Goody Blake and Harry Gill' and 'Simon Lee the Old Huntsman'. His fine meditative poem 'Lines composed above Tintern Abbey' was also included.

The 'Lyrical Ballads', with their sudden revolt from the artificial literature of the day to the utmost simplicity of subject and diction, were unfavourably received; and the hostility of the critics was even increased by the appearance in the second edition of a preface in which Wordsworth expounded his poetical principles, and by his additional essay on 'Poetical Diction'.

Lysander, (1) a famous Spartan commander, who captured the Athenian fleet off Aegospotami in 405 B.C., and fell at the battle of Haliartus, 395 B.C.; (2) a character in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

Lysias (b. c. 450 B.C.), Greek rhetorician and pleader, son of Cephalus, a wealthy Syracusan who settled at Athens and figures in Plato's 'Republic'.

LYTTELTON, GEORGE, first Baron Lytton (1709-73), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, a political opponent of Walpole and for a short time chancellor of the exchequer (1756), was a friend of Pope and Fielding and a liberal patron of literature. It is he whom James Thomson addresses in 'The Seasons' and who procured the poet a pension. He published, among numerous works, 'Dialogues of the Dead' (1760) and 'The History of the Life of Henry the Second' (1767-71). Of the 'Dialogues', Mrs. Montagu (q.v.) was the author of the last three.

LYTTON, EDWARD GEORGE EARLE LYTTON BULWER- first Baron Lytton (1803-73), son of General Bulwer, educated at Trinity College and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, became M.P. for St. Ives and later for Lincoln, supporting himself by literary labour. He was secretary for the colonies in 1858-9, and was created Baron Lytton of Knebworth in 1866. The principal novels of this versatile writer were published at the following dates: 'Falkland' (1827), 'Pelham' (q.v., 1828), 'The Disowned' (q.v.) and 'Devereux' (1829), 'Paul Clifford' (q.v., 1830), 'Eugene Aram' (q.v., 1832), 'Godolphin' (1833), 'The Last Days of Pompeii' (q.v., 1834), 'Rienzi' (q.v., 1835), 'Ernest Maltravers' (q.v., 1837), 'Zanoni' (1842), 'The Last of the Barons' (q.v., 1843), 'Harold' (q.v., 1848), 'The Caxtons' (q.v., 1849), 'My Novel' (q.v., 1853), 'What Will He Do with It?' (1858), 'The Coming Race' (q.v., 1871), 'Kenelm Chillingly' (q.v.) and 'The Parisians' (q.v., reprinted from 'Blackwood'), 1873. In addition Lytton produced three plays: 'The Lady of Lyons' and 'Richelieu' (qq.v., 1838), and 'Money' (q.v., 1840). Among notable shorter stories were his 'The Haunted and the Haunters' (1859), and 'A Strange Story' (1862), in which he successfully introduces occult powers. His poem 'The New Timon' (1846) contained an incidental sarcasm on Tennyson, to which the latter replied in verse. Lytton's poem 'King Arthur' appeared in 1849 (revised, 1870).

LYTTON, EDWARD ROBERT BULWER, first earl of Lytton (1831-91), son of Edward Bulwer-Lytton, first Baron Lytton (q.v.), was educated at Harrow and Bonn, and after a career in the diplomatic service became viceroy of India (1876-80), where his 'Forward' policy was the subject of much opposition. He published a number of volumes of verse, at first under the pseudonym 'Owen Meredith'. His poetry in general is marred by prolixity, but some good lyrics are included in the 'Wanderer' (1857) and 'Marah' (1892), while the fantastic epic 'King Poppy' (1892) is generally considered his best work. 'Lucile' (1860) and 'Glenaveril' (1885) are long verse-romances.

MABBE, JAMES (1572–1642?), educated at, and fellow of, Magdalen College, Oxford, became a lay prebendary of Wells. He is remembered for his translations of Fernando de Rojas's 'Celestina' (q.v.) and of 'The Spanish Ladye', one of Cervantes's 'Exemplary Novels'. Mabbé hispaniolized his name as Puedeser (may-be).

MABILLON, JEAN (1632–1707), a Benedictine monk of St. Maur (see Maurists), who worked at St. Germain-des-Prés. He was author of 'De re diplomatica' (1681, with supplement 1704), in which he created the science of Latin palaeography and laid down the principles for the critical study of medieval archives. He also wrote in 1691 a 'Traité des études monastiques', and was author or editor of many Maurist publications.

Mabinogion, The, a collection of Welsh tales (mabinogi = instruction for young bards). Four 'Mabinogi' are contained in the 'Red Book of Hergest', compiled in the 14th and 15th cents. They deal with old Celtic legends and mythology, in which the supernatural and magical play the chief part. They are, said Matthew Arnold, the 'deitritus of something far older'. The four Mabinogi are concerned respectively with: (1) Pwyll, prince of Dyved; (2) Branwen, daughter of Llyr; (3) Manawyddan, son of Llyr; and (4) Math, son of Mathonwy; and they are to some extent interconnected.

The first tells how Pwyll, prince of Dyved (Pembrokeshire), temporarily exchanged shapes with the king of Annwyn (Hades), became known as Pen Annwyn or 'Head of Hades', and got Rhiannon to wife though she was promised to Gwawl (whose name, meaning 'light', suggests that he was a sun-god). He did this by luring Gwawl into a bag and releasing him only on condition that he gave up all claim to Rhiannon. The son of Pwyll and Rhiannon was Pryderi, who mysteriously vanished soon after his birth (Rhiannon was accused of having devoured him) and was restored some years later.

In the second tale, Matholwch, king of Ireland, comes to Wales and is married to Branwen, sister of Bran and daughter of Llyr (q.v., the sea-god of British mythology). During his visit a gross insult is put upon him by the mischief-making Evnissyen; and although Bran offers compensation, Branwen is in consequence ill-treated at her husband's court, war ensues, the Irish force and almost all the British are destroyed, and Bran himself is wounded in the foot with a poisoned arrow. In his agony he orders his head to be cut off, carried to the White Mount in London, and buried there with the face towards France. Branwen dies of grief and is buried in Anglesey. (The White Mount is explained to mean the Tower of London: The head was a kind of palladium, and, so long as it remained interred, no invasion of England could take place. See Lethaby, 'London before the Conquest'.)

The third tale tells of the association of Manawyddan, the last surviving child of Llyr, with Pryderi, and of the evils that came upon them in vengeance for the outrageous treatment of Gwawl, as told in the first tale.

The fourth tells how Gilvaethwy, son of Don, and Gwydion his brother, nephews of Math, the wizard, tricked Pryderi, son of Pwyll and Rhiannon, out of the pigs sent him by the Arawn, the king of Hades, by giving in exchange some attractive-looking horses, greyhounds and shields, in reality made of fungus; and how war ensued in which Pryderi was killed; also of the birth of Llew Llaw Gyffes, and of his marriage with Blodenwedd, a maiden composed of the blossoms of the oak, the broom, and the meadowsweet; of her treachery to her husband, and of her transformation into an owl.

For the position of these various characters in the ancient British pantheon, see J. Rhys, 'Hibbert Lectures', and C. Squire, 'Mythology of the British Islands'. Lady Charlotte Guest published in 1838–49 a collection of eleven Welsh tales, with translation and notes, including the above Mabinogi, under the title of 'Mabinogion'. The above abstract is based upon her book.

There is no mention of Arthur in the four Mabinogi, but among Lady Charlotte Guest's other seven Welsh tales from the 'Red Book of Hergest' there are five that deal with him. Three of them are drawn from French originals ('The Lady of the Fountain', 'Geraint, Son of Erbin', and 'Peredur, Son of Evrawc'). Two are of British origin, 'Kilhwch and Olwen' (q.v.) and 'The Dream of Rhonabwy'. In the first and more important of these two Arthur is represented, not as a hero of chivalry, but as a fairy king, surrounded by superhuman warriors, and able by his magic powers to overcome monsters.

McAdam, JOHN LOUDON (1756–1836), the 'macadamizer' of roads.

Macaire, ROBERT, a character in 'L'Auberge des Adrets', a French comedy of 1823, the type of clever and audacious rogue.

Macaroni, an exquisite of a class which arose in England about 1760 and consisted of young men who had travelled and affected the tastes and fashions prevalent in continental society. [OED.] Horace Walpole refers to the Macaroni Club, 'which is composed of all the travelled young men who wear long curls and spying-glasses'.

MACARONIC VERSE

Macaronic verse, a term used to designate a burlesque form of verse in which vernacular words are introduced into a Latin context with Latin terminations and in Latin constructions . . . and loosely to any form of verse in which two or more languages are mingled together. [OED.] The chief writer of macaronic verse was the Italian, Folengo (q.v.).

M'Auley, ANGUS and ALLAN, characters in Scott's 'Legend of Montrose' (q.v.).

MACAULAY, ROSE, contemporary author, among whose chief works are: 'Potterism' (1920), 'Dangerous Ages' (1921), 'Told by an Idiot' (1923), 'Orphan Island' (1924), 'Keeping up Appearances' (1928), all novels; 'Milton' (1930); also two volumes of verse.

MACAULAY, THOMAS BABINGTON, first Baron Macaulay (1800-59), son of Zachary Macaulay, the philanthropist, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. His first article (on Milton) was published in 1825 in the 'Edinburgh Review', of which he became a mainstay. He became Liberal M.P. for Calne in 1830 and for Leeds in 1831, and was a member of the supreme council of India from 1834 to 1838. There he exerted his influence in favour of the choice of an English, instead of an oriental, type of education in India. He returned to London and engaged in literature and politics, being M.P. for Edinburgh in 1839-47 and 1852-6; he was secretary of war in 1839-41, and paymaster of the forces in 1846-7. He published his 'Lays of Ancient Rome' (q.v.) in 1842, and a collection of his 'Essays' (q.v.) in 1843 (enlarged in later editions). Volumes i and ii of his 'History of England' (q.v.) appeared in 1848, iii and iv in 1855. He also contributed to the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica' a remarkable series of articles on Atterbury, Bunyan, Goldsmith, Johnson, and the younger Pitt. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. A life of Macaulay by his nephew, Sir George Trevelyan, appeared in 1876.

Macaulay's History of England from the Accession of James II, by T. B. Macaulay (q.v.), in five volumes, published in 1849-61 (vol. v was posthumous; edited by his sister, Lady Trevelyan, in 1861).

Macaulay had hoped to write the history of England from the reign of James II to the time of Sir Robert Walpole; but the work does not go beyond the death of William III, and, as regards the reign of the latter king, is incomplete. The 'History' is written on a vast scale, involving immense research, and presents a detailed and vivid picture of the age. The hero is William III, and the work, written from a Whig and Protestant point of view, is criticized as showing partiality. Nevertheless, it was, and remains, extremely popular, and is one of the great literary works of the 19th cent.

Macaulay's New Zealander, whom the author imagines, in the distant future, visiting

MACCABEES

London when it is a ruined city (Essay on Von Ranke's 'History of the Popes' and elsewhere).

Macaulay's Schoolboy: Macaulay was apt to attribute to schoolboys a range of historical and literary knowledge not usually found among them. Taking exception, for instance, to a statement on a more or less abstruse historical point in a book under review, he would assert that 'any schoolboy of fourteen' knew better. (See e.g. the essays on Croker's 'Boswell' and on Sir William Temple.)

Macbeth, a tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), founded on Holinshed's 'Chronicle of Scottish History', and probably finished in 1606; it was no doubt designed as a tribute to King James I. First printed in the folio of 1623.

Macbeth and Banquo, generals of Duncan, king of Scotland, returning from a victorious campaign against rebels, encounter the three weird sisters, or witches, upon a heath, who prophesy that Macbeth shall be thane of Cawdor, and king hereafter, and that Banquo shall beget kings though he be none. Immediately afterwards comes the news that the king has created Macbeth thane of Cawdor. Stimulated by the prophecy, and spurred on by Lady Macbeth, Macbeth murders Duncan, who is on a visit to his castle. Duncan's sons, Malcolm and Donalbain, escape, and Macbeth assumes the crown. To defeat the prophecy of the witches regarding Banquo, he contrives the murder of Banquo and his son Fleance, but the latter escapes. Haunted by the ghost of Banquo, Macbeth consults the weird sisters, and is told to beware of Macduff, the thane of Fife; that none born of woman has power to harm Macbeth; and that he never will be vanquished till Birnam Wood shall come to Dunsinane. Learning that Macduff has joined Malcolm, who is gathering an army in England, he surprises the castle of Macduff and causes Lady Macduff and her children to be slaughtered. Lady Macbeth loses her reason and dies. The army of Malcolm and Macduff attacks Macbeth; passing through Birnam Wood every man cuts a bough and under this 'leavy screen' marches on Dunsinane. Macduff, who was 'from his mother's womb untimely ripped', kills Macbeth. Malcolm is hailed king of Scotland.

Maccabaeus, JUDAS, see Judas Maccabaeus.

Maccabees, THE, originally known as the Hasmonaeans, a family of Jews, consisting of Mattathias and his five sons, Jochanan, Simon, Judas (surnamed Maccabi, 'the hammer', his father's successor in the command), Eleazar, and Jonathan, who led the revolt of their compatriots against the oppression of the Syrian king, Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.). They afterwards established a dynasty of priest-kings who ruled until the time of Herod (40 B.C.). Two 'Books of the Maccabees' are included in the 'Apocrypha'. The first deals mainly with the struggle of the Jews for independence during the period 168–135 B.C. The second is not a continuation of the first, but covers a somewhat longer period, beginning about 185 B.C.

Mac Callum, or MAC CALAIN, MORE, the Gaelic title of the earls, marquises, and dukes of Argyll, chiefs of the clan of Campbell (q.v.).

MCCARTHY, JUSTIN (1830–1912), Irish politician, historian, and novelist, author of the 'History of Our Own Times' (1877). His best-known novels are: 'Dear Lady Disdain' (1875) and 'Miss Misanthrope' (1878).

McClure, SIR ROBERT JOHN LE MESURIER (1807–73), commander in the search for Sir John Franklin, 1850–4. He found the North-West Passage, but had to abandon his ship.

Macdonald, FLORA (1722–90), a Jacobite heroine, daughter of a farmer at South Uist (Hebrides), who helped Prince Charles Edward to escape after Culloden (q.v.) by disguising him as her female servant. She was committed to custody and released under the Act of Indemnity (1747).

MACDONALD, GEORGE (1824–1905), poet and novelist, author of 'Within and Without' (1855, a narrative poem admired by Tennyson); 'Phantastes: a faerie romance' (1858, prose and verse); 'David Elginbrod' (1863), 'Alec Forbes' (1865), and 'Robert Falconer', prose fiction, the first mystical in character, the others descriptive of Scottish humble life.

Macduff and Lady Macduff, characters in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth' (q.v.).

Mac Flecknoe, or A Satyr upon the True-Blew-Protestant Poet, T. S., a satire directed against Shadwell (q.v.) by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1682.

Shadwell had replied to Dryden's 'Medal' (q.v.) by the 'Medal of John Bayes', and moreover had called Dryden an atheist. Dryden thereupon dealt with the political character of Shadwell in the second part of 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), and with his literary character in this work. Flecknoe, an Irish writer of verse (some of it fine), is represented as passing on to Shadwell his pre-eminence in the realm of dullness (it is not clear why Dryden thus pilloried Flecknoe). Shadwell is accordingly crowned in the Barbican suburb, and his claims to distinction on the score of stupidity are enumerated.

The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,

But Shadwell never deviates into sense.

McGill University, THE, in Canada, commemorates James McGill (1744–1813), who left £30,000 for the foundation of a university. A charter was granted in 1821, but it was not until the middle of the century that the institution became prosperous. It has its headquarters at Montreal, with affiliated colleges in certain other centres.

Macgregor, ROB ROY and HELEN, see Rob Roy.

MACHIN

Macham, ROBERT, see Machin.

Machæon, a son of Asclepius (Aesculapius, q.v.), and one of the two surgeons of the Greek army in the Trojan War (Podaleirius, his brother, was the other).

MACHAUT or MACHAULT, GUILLAUME DE (c. 1300–77), of Machaut in the Ardennes, French poet. He was secretary to the king of Bohemia killed at Crécy, and afterwards at the court of John the Good, who became king of France. He was author of ballades and of several long poems, of interest because of their influence, which has been variously estimated, on Chaucer, notably in his 'Death of Blanche' (see T. R. Lounsbury, 'Studies in Chaucer', ii. 212 et seq.).

Macheath, CAPTAIN, the hero of Gay's 'Beggar's Opera' (q.v.).

MACHEN, ARTHUR (1863–), a writer of tales, mystical, romantic, and macabre. His chief works are: 'The House of Souls' (1906), 'Hieroglyphics' (1902), 'The Great Return' (1915), 'Things Near and Far' (1923), 'The Shining Pyramid' (1924). A collected edition was published in 1923.

MACHIAVELLI, NICCOLO DI BERNARDO DEI (1469–1527), a Florentine statesman and political philosopher. After holding high office in the restored Florentine 'republic' and discharging important missions abroad, he was exiled on suspicion of conspiracy against the Medici, but was subsequently restored to some degree of favour. He then turned his experience to profit in his writings on history and philosophy. He wrote his 'Art of War' (translated into English in 1560) and his 'Florentine History' (translated in 1595). But his best-known work was the 'Prince' (written in 1513), a treatise on statecraft by a great political thinker with a clear knowledge of the facts. It was directed to the attainment of a united Italy, by means that included cruelty and bad faith. The work was not translated into English until 1640. It is none the less repeatedly referred to in the Elizabethan drama, and influenced the policy of Thomas Cromwell, Cecil, and Leicester. Selected maxims from the 'Prince' were translated into French, and attacked by Gentillet, the French Huguenot, in 1576; and this treatise in turn was translated into English in 1602. It is from Gentillet's work that the Elizabethans derived their idea of, and hostility to, Machiavelli. There is a careful sketch of his character in George Eliot's 'Romola' (q.v.). 'The New Machiavelli' is a novel (1911) by H. G. Wells (q.v.).

Machin or MACHAM, ROBERT (fl. 1344), the legendary discoverer of the island of Madeira. He is supposed to have fled from England with Anna Dorset, daughter of an English noble, and landed on an island at a port which he called Machico. His ship was driven out to sea while he was ashore, and Anne died of grief on board. He and his companions made their way to the mainland and home to England. Madeira was discovered by Genoese sailors in the Portuguese service prior to the date of Machin's voyage.

M'Ian, IAN EACHIN, otherwise CONACHAR, in Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.), Simon Glover's Highland apprentice.

M'Intyre, CAPTAIN HECTOR and MARIA, in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.), nephew and niece of Jonathan Oldbuck.

Mac-Ivor, FERGUS, of Glennaquoich, otherwise known as VICH IAN VOHR, a character in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

MACKAIL, DENIS (1892-), novelist, author of 'The Flower Show' (1927), 'Greenery Street' (1928), 'The Square Circle' (1930), &c.

MACKENZIE, COMPTON (1883-), educated at St. Paul's School and Magdalen College, Oxford, author. Among his chief works are: 'Carnival' (1912), 'Sinister Street' (two volumes, 1913-14), 'Guy and Pauline' (1915), 'Vestal Fire' (1927), 'Extraordinary Women' (1928), 'Our Street' (1931), all novels; 'Gallipoli Memories' (1929), 'First Athenian Memories' (1931), autobiography.

MACKENZIE, HENRY (1745-1831), who held the position of comptroller of the taxes for Scotland, was the author of 'The Man of Feeling' (1771), in which the hero is presented in a series of sentimental sketches loosely woven together, somewhat after the manner of Addison's Sir Roger. This book was one of Burns's 'bosom favourites'. It was followed in 1773 by 'The Man of the World', in which the hero, this time, is a villain and a seducer; and in 1777 by 'Julia de Roubigné', a novel after the manner of Richardson's 'Clarissa' (q.v.). Mackenzie also wrote a play, 'The Prince of Tunis' (1773), was chairman of the committee that investigated Macpherson's (q.v.) 'Ossian', and edited two forgotten periodicals, the 'Mirror' (1770) and the 'Lounger' (1785-6). Sometimes spoken of as the 'Addison of the North'.

Mackenzie, Mrs. and Rosky, characters in Thackeray's 'The Newcomes' (q.v.).

McKerrow, RONALD BRUNLEES (1872-1940), bibliographer and Elizabethan scholar. Joint secretary of the Bibliographical Society (q.v.); editor of the 'Review of English Studies'. His 'Introduction to Bibliography for Students' was published in 1927, his 'Prolegomena for the Oxford Shakespeare' in 1939.

MACKINTOSH, SIR JAMES (1765-1832), educated at Aberdeen University and subsequently a student of medicine, was the author of 'Vindiciae Gallicae' (1791), a reasoned defence of the French Revolution and an answer to Burke's 'Reflections on the French Revolution'. Mackintosh subsequently recanted, and finally summed up in 1815 in his 'On the State of France'. He published in 1830 a much-discussed 'Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy', which provoked James Mill's 'Fragment on Mackintosh'. He also wrote the first three volumes of a 'History of England' (1830-1) for Lardner's 'Cabinet Cyclopaedia', and an unfinished 'History of the Revolution in England in 1688' (1834), the subject of one of Macaulay's 'Essays' (q.v.).

MACKLIN, CHARLES (1697?-1797), an actor who made his reputation by his impersonation of Shylock. He was author of the excellent comedy 'The Man of the World' (q.v.), produced in 1781, and of 'Love à la Mode' (q.v.), produced in 1759.

Macmillan's Magazine was started by David Masson (q.v.) in 1859, and edited by him till 1867. Among notable early contributors were Henry and Charles Kingsley, and Matthew Arnold. It came to an end in 1907.

Macmorris, CAPTAIN, in Shakespeare's 'Henry V' (q.v.), the only Irishman presented in Shakespeare's plays.

Macmurray, JOHN, see Murray (John).

MACPHERSON, JAMES (1736-96), born near Kingussie, the son of a farmer, was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh Universities. He was a man of considerable literary ability, with some knowledge of Gaelic poetry, which was popular in the district of his birth. In 1760 he published 'Fragments of Ancient Poetry collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and translated from the Gaelic or Erse language'. Then with the assistance of 'several gentlemen in the Highlands' he produced in 1762 'Fingal, an ancient epic poem in six books' (see under Fingal), and in 1763 'Temora' (q.v.), another epic, in eight books, purporting to be translations from the Gaelic of a poet called Ossian (q.v.). They were much admired (by Goethe among others) for their romantic spirit and rhythm, but their authenticity was challenged, notably by Dr. Johnson. Called upon to produce his originals, Macpherson was obliged to fabricate them. A committee appointed after his death to investigate the Ossianic poems reported that Macpherson had liberally edited traditional Gaelic poems and inserted passages of his own, and subsequent investigation supports this view. Macpherson published in 1775 a 'History of Great Britain from the Restoration till the Accession of George I', and was M.P. for Camelford from 1780 to 1786. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, by his own desire.

Macready, WILLIAM CHARLES (1793-1873), educated at Rugby, first achieved eminence as an actor by his impersonation of Richard III (1819), and subsequently of King Lear. He was manager of Covent Garden Theatre in 1837-9, and of Drury Lane in 1841-3. Tennyson wrote a sonnet on his retirement from the stage in 1851.

MacStinger, Mrs., in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.), Captain Cuttle's termagant landlady.

MACSYCOPHANT

MacSycophant, SIR PERTINAX, a character in Macklin's 'The Man of the World' (q.v.).

MacTurk, CAPTAIN, a character in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.).

Macwheeble, BAILIE DUNCAN, a character in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

Mad Hatter, THE, see Hatter.

Madame Bovary, the chief work of Gustave Flaubert (q.v.).

Madame Tussaud's, see Tussaud.

MADDEN, DODGSON HAMILTON (1840-1928), judge of the High Court of Justice of Ireland, attorney-general for Ireland, 1889-92. He was author of 'The Diary of William Silence; a Study of Shakespeare and Elizabethan Sport' (1897).

Madeira, an island belonging to Portugal, off the west coast of Africa, producing a deep amber-tinted wine, of full body and some sweetness, resembling a well-matured full-bodied brown sherry. EAST INDIAN MADEIRA was Madeira which had been sent on a sea-voyage to the East Indies to improve its quality.

Madoc, a poem by Southey (q.v.), published in 1805.

Madoc is the youngest son of Owen Gwyneth, king of Wales (d. 1169). He has left Wales and sailed to a western land across the ocean where he has founded a settlement and defeated the Aztecs. He returns to Wales for a fresh supply of adventurers, and tells his tale. After arriving once more at the settlement in Aztlan, war breaks out again with the Aztecs. Madoc is ambushed and captured, chained by the foot to the stone of human sacrifice, and required to fight in succession six Aztec champions. He slays the first, Ocellopan, and engages Tlalala 'the Tiger'. Then Cadwallon comes to the rescue, and after much fighting the Aztecs are finally defeated and migrate to another country. Among the Aztecs figures Coatel, the daughter of Aculhua, a priest; she assists the white men, and thus brings herself, her husband, and her father to a tragic end.

Madonna of the Future, The, by Henry James (q.v.), published in 1879, is the story of a painter who plans for twenty years to paint a perfect Madonna; but his hand loses its cunning, and his chosen model her beauty, and the end is frustration.

MADVIG, JOHANN NICOLAI (1804-86), Danish scholar and philologist, professor at Copenhagen of Latin, and later of classical philology, and author of a celebrated Latin grammar (1841).

Maeander, a river of Phrygia, remarkable for its many windings; the origin of our verb 'to meander'.

Maecenas, GAIUS CILNIUS (c. 70-8 B.C.), a Roman knight who became celebrated for his patronage of learning and letters in the time of Augustus, of whom he was the friend and adviser. He was the protector and benefactor of Virgil and Horace.

Maeldune or MAILDUN, the hero of an ancient Irish legend, who sets out in a ship to avenge his father, slain by plunderers shortly before his birth. He disregards a wizard's advice to take only seventeen companions, for he also takes his three foster-brothers, and it is only after the loss or death of these, and visiting many lands, that he is persuaded by a holy man to forgive his enemy, as God has forgiven him. Maeldune finds his enemy and they are reconciled. The legend was translated by P. W. Joyce (q.v.) in his 'Old Celtic Romances', and forms the subject of Tennyson's 'The Voyage of Maeldune'.

Maelstrom, from Dutch words meaning 'whirling stream', a famous whirlpool in the Arctic Ocean off the west coast of Norway, formerly supposed to suck in and destroy vessels within a long radius. Poe (q.v.) wrote an imaginative description of 'A Descent into the Maelström'.

Maenads, a name of the Bacchantes (q.v.) or priestesses of Bacchus.

Maeonia, an early name for Lydia (q.v.). The epithet Maonian and the name Maonides are sometimes applied to Homer, who was supposed to be a native of this region.

He [Aristotle] steered securely, and discovered far,

Led by the light of the Maeonian star.

(Pope, 'Essay on Criticism', l. 648.)

Maeotis, the ancient name of the sea of Azov.

MAETERLINCK, MAURICE (1862-1949), Belgian poet and dramatist. His works include: 'La Princesse Maleine' (1889), 'Les Aveugles' (1890), 'Pelléas et Mélisande' (1892), 'Alladine et Palomides' and 'La Mort de Tintagiles' (1894), 'Le Trésor des humbles' (1896), 'Aglavaine et Selysette' (1896), 'La Vie des abeilles' (1901), 'Monna Vanna' (1902), 'Le Double Jardin' (1904), 'L'Intelligence des fleurs' (1907), 'L'Oiseau bleu' (1909), and 'La Mort' (1912). He received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1911. His early works, in which death and love are dark mysteries governing men's lives, show a sombre imagination. His later works, dating from 'Le Trésor des humbles', show a happier, less mystical, more realist philosophy.

Maeviad, The, see Gifford.

Maffick, To, to indulge in extravagant demonstrations of exultation on occasions of national rejoicing. A word originally used to designate the behaviour of the crowds in London and other towns on the occasion of the relief of Mafeking (17 May 1900).

Mafia, in Sicily, the spirit of hostility to the law and its ministers prevailing among a part of the population; also the body of those who share in this spirit; not, as often supposed, an organized secret society.

MAGA

Maga, see Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.

Magazine, originally a place where goods are laid up, has come also to mean a periodical publication containing articles by different authors. Thus the 'Gentleman's Magazine' in the introduction to its first number (1731) described itself as 'a Monthly Collection to store up, as in a Magazine, the most remarkable Pieces on the Subjects above-mentioned'. But the word had been used before this for a storehouse of information.

Magdalen, MAGDALENE (pron. 'Maudlen' in the names of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Magdalene College, Cambridge), the appellation (signifying a woman of Magdala) of a disciple of Christ named Mary, 'out of whom went seven devils' (Luke viii. 2). She has commonly been supposed to be identical with the unnamed 'sinner' of Luke vii. 37, and therefore appears in western hagiology as a harlot restored to purity and transmuted to sanctity by repentance and faith. The word is used to signify one whose history resembles that of the Magdalene; also as short for MAGDALENE HOSPITAL, a home for refuge and reformation of prostitutes. [OED.]

Magdalen (pron. 'Maudlen') College, Oxford, was founded in 1458 by William Waynflete (1395-1486), provost of Eton, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor of England. Among famous members of the college have been Cardinal Wolsey, Prince Rupert, Henry, Prince of Wales, son of James I, and the present Duke of Windsor. Its beautiful tower is celebrated. On the morning of 1 May at 5 a.m. (6 a.m. Summer Time) the Magdalen choristers sing a hymn on the top of this tower. See also Oxford University.

Magdalenian, the name given to a culture (of the palaeolithic age) that followed the Aurignacian (see Aurignac), so called from the rock-shelter of La Madeleine in the Dordogne, France. The Magdalenian industry is characterized by weapons and tools of horn and bone, which reached a high quality before the close of the period (Peake and Fleure, 'Hunters and Artists').

Magdeburg, CENTURIATORS OF, a number of Protestant divines who in the 16th cent. compiled a Church History in thirteen volumes, one for each century (called the Centuries of Magdeburg).

Magellan, the English form of the name of the Portuguese navigator Fernão de Magalhães (1470-1521), the first European to pass through the straits that bear his name.

Maggie, a short novel by Stephen Crane, written in 1893 but not published until 1896.

Maggie, the mare to which Burns's 'The Auld Farmer's New Year Salutation' is addressed.

Maggie Lauder, the subject of an old Scottish song doubtfully attributed to Francis Sempie of Beltrees, who is said to have written it in 1642. Also the heroine of 'Anster Fair', by W. Tennant (q.v.).

MAGNANO

Magi, the ancient Persian priestly caste, the priests of Zoroastrianism. Hence, in a wider sense, persons skilled in oriental magic and astrology, ancient magicians or sorcerers.

THE (THREE) MAGI, the three wise men who came from the East, bearing offerings to the infant Christ, named according to tradition Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar. They are also known as the 'Three Kings of Cologne' (see Cologne).

Magie Flute, The, 'Die Zauberflöte', a famous opera by Mozart (q.v.); also a book by C. Lowes Dickinson (1920).

MAGINN, WILLIAM (1793-1842), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was one of the principal early contributors to 'Blackwood's Magazine' (q.v.) under the pseudonym of Ensign O'Doherty, and was perhaps the originator of the 'Noctes Ambrosianae' (q.v.). He settled in London in 1823, wrote for various periodicals, and established 'Fraser's Magazine' (q.v.), in which he published his 'Homeric Ballads' and his 'Illustrious Literary Characters'. But his best work is contained in his shorter stories and verses, which are marked by humour, wit, and pathos. He was the original of Captain Shandon in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

Maginot Line, a strong system of defences constructed by the French, chiefly during the period 1929-36, along the frontier between their country and Germany (a distance of about 200 miles). It consisted in the main of powerful and elaborate forts so echeloned as to bring the maximum fire-power on an advancing enemy. The system was extended, but on a far weaker scale, northwards along the Belgian frontier. It was through this extension, near Sedan and Malmédy, that the Germans penetrated in May 1940. The line takes its name from André Maginot, minister of war in a number of French governments from 1922.

Magliabechi, ANTONIO (1633-1714), a Florentine bibliophile, librarian to Cosimo III, grand duke of Tuscany, and noted for his great and varied learning. He bequeathed to the grand duke his large collection of books and manuscripts, which is now included in the Biblioteca Nazionale.

Magna Carta, the Great Charter of the liberties of England, granted by John under pressure from the Barons, at Runnymede in Surrey, on 15 June 1215. Its chief provisions were that no freeman should be imprisoned, banished, or in any way destroyed except by the law of the land; and that supplies (except aids imposed on tenants-in-chief on certain specified occasions) should not be demanded without the consent of the Common Council of the realm.

Magnano, in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.), one of the characters in the bear-baiting episode, is Simon Wait (mañana is Spanish for 'tomorrow, by and by'), a tinker and a noted Independent preacher.

MAGNETIC LADY

Magnetic Lady, The, or Humours Recounted, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), produced in 1632.

Lady Loadstone, the 'Magnetic Lady', who 'draws unto her guests of all sorts', has a niece Placentia, of age to be married, whose dower is detained by her uncle, Sir Moth Interest. The bride and dowry are the object of various intrigues, until it is found, first that Placentia is already with child, and secondly that she is not the true niece but a changeling.

Magnolia State: Mississippi, see United States.

Magnus, MR. PETER, a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Magog, see Gog.

Magog Wrath and Bully Bluck, in Disraeli's 'Coningsby' (q.v.), the hired leaders of the two political parties in the Darford constituency.

Magwitch, ABEL, a character in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.).

Mahābhārata, The, one of the two great epics (the other being the 'Rāmāyana') of the Hindus. They are believed to have been composed before 500 B.C., but, in the form in which we have it, the 'Mahābhārata' probably dates from 200 B.C.

MAHAFFY, SIR JOHN PENTLAND (1839-1919), provost of Trinity College, Dublin, and author of numerous works on Greek literature and history.

Mahatma, Sanskrit mahātman, meaning 'great-souled'; in 'esoteric Buddhism', one of a class of persons with preternatural powers imagined to exist in India and Tibet. [OED.] The word is also used by Theosophists.

Mahdi, a spiritual and temporal leader expected by the Mohammedans. The title has been claimed by various insurrectionary leaders in the Sudan, but is especially applied to Mohammed Ahmed (1843-85), who destroyed General Hicks's army in 1883, besieged Gordon (q.v.) in Khartoum, and overthrew the Egyptian power in the Sudan.

Mahmud of Ghazni or THE GREAT, son of Sabuktigin, and Turkish ruler of the Persian Empire, 998-1030. He was a great conqueror, who extended his dominions from the Tigris to the Ganges and the Oxus, and made Ghazni in Afghanistan his capital. He besieged and captured Somnath in Gujerat, obtaining there an immense treasure and carrying off its gates. (These, or others mistaken for them, were restored to India in 1842.) Mahmud was a patron of Persian literature. For his treatment of Firdusi see under the latter.

MAHONY, FRANCIS SYLVESTER (1804-66), best known by his pseudonym of FATHER PROUT, a Jesuit (dismissed from the order in 1830) and author of many entertaining papers and poems contributed to 'Fraser's Magazine' and 'Bentley's Miscellany'. These included translations from Horace, Béranger, Victor Hugo, &c., and, interspersed among them, mystifications in the shape of invented 'originals' in French, Latin, and Greek for some of Moore's songs, &c. The contributions to 'Fraser' were collected in 1836 as 'The Reliques of Father Prout'. He is best remembered for his 'Bells of Shandon'.

Mahound, the 'false prophet' Mohammed; in the Middle Ages often vaguely imagined to be worshipped as a god.

Mahrattas, a warlike Hindu race, Brahman in religion, inhabiting western and central India. They rose to power in the latter part of the 17th cent. and formed a confederacy of States under their rule. They were from time to time in conflict with the British in the 18th cent., and were reduced to submission in 1803 (Wellesley's victories at Assaye and Argaum, and Lake's at Aligurh and Laswaree), and to complete dependency in 1817-18.

Mahu, the fiend of stealing, one of the five that pestered 'poor Tom' in Shakespeare's 'King Lear' (iv. i).

Maia, a daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and the mother by Zeus of Hermes. There was also an old Italian goddess of the same name, also known as BONA DEA.

Maid Marian, a female personage in the May-game and Morris-dance. In the later forms of the story of Robin Hood she appears as the companion of the outlaw, the association having probably been suggested by the fact that the two were both represented in the May-day pageants. [OED.] According to one version of the legend she was Matilda, the daughter of Lord Fitzwater.

Maid Marian, a novel by Peacock (q.v.), published in 1822. It is a gay parody of medieval romance, based on the story of Robin Hood, adopting the version that the outlaw was Robert, earl of Huntingdon, and Maid Marian was Matilda Fitzwater. It contains some excellent songs.

Maid of Athens, THE, in Byron's poem is said to have been the daughter of Theodore Macri, who was a consul at Athens.

Maid of Bath, The, see Foots.

Maid of Honour, The, a romantic drama, by Massinger (q.v.), published in 1632.

Bertoldo, natural brother of the king of Sicily and a knight of Malta, is in love with Camiola. Departing on an expedition to aid the duke of Urbino against the duchess of Sienna, he asks for her hand, but she refuses on the ground of the disparity of their station and his oath as a knight of Malta not to marry. Bertoldo is taken prisoner by the Siennese, cast into prison and held to ransom for a large sum, which the king of Sicily, being incensed against Bertoldo, forbids anyone to pay. Camiola directs her follower Adorni, who is passionately devoted to her, to carry the ransom (which she provides from her own estate) to Bertoldo, and to require of him a contract to marry her. Adorni, though it means the defeat of his own hopes, faithfully discharges his mission; Bertoldo is released and signs the contract. But the duchess of Sienna falls in love with him, and he yields to her wooing. They are on the point of being married when Camiola interposes and pleads her cause with spirit, so that all, including the duchess, condemn the ingratitude of Bertoldo, and the marriage is broken off. Camiola, 'the Maid of Honour', takes the veil, and the humiliated and repentant Bertoldo resumes his vocation as a knight of Malta. Camiola is Massinger's best female character, and the play contains some of his finest scenes.

Maid of Kent, see Barton (Elizabeth).

Maid of Norway, MARGARET (b. 1283), daughter of King Erik of Norway and granddaughter of Alexander III of Scotland, recognized as queen of Scotland on the latter's death in 1285. She was betrothed to Edward, Prince of Wales, but died on her way to Scotland in 1290.

Maid of Orleans, Joan of Arc (q.v.).

Maid of Saragoza, THE, Augustina, whose bravery in the defence of Saragossa (a town on the Ebro in Spain) against the French in 1808-9 was celebrated by Byron in his 'Childe Harold' (l. liv-lvi).

Maid's Tragedy, The, a tragedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (see Fletcher, J.) published in 1619, generally accounted the best of their dramas.

Amintor, a gentleman of Rhodes, engaged to marry Aspatia, daughter of Calianax, the lord chamberlain, at the order of the king breaks off the match and marries Evadne, sister of his friend Melantius. Evadne on the wedding night declares herself the king's mistress and denies Amintor her bed. Amintor's loyalty makes him conceal the position, but Melantius learns the cause of his melancholy, terrifies Evadne into murdering the king, and obtains from Calianax possession of the citadel. Meanwhile Aspatia, broken-hearted, disguising herself as her brother, forces Amintor to fight a duel with her and kill her. Evadne comes to Amintor after the murder of the king, expecting now to be pardoned by him, and being rejected commits suicide. Melantius, holding the citadel, secures pardon for himself and his associates.

The last act of the play was re-written by Edmund Waller (q.v.). The king is not murdered, but Evadne is got out of the way, Melantius is pardoned, Aspatia is prevented from committing suicide and married to Amintor.

Malden, THE, the instrument, similar to the guillotine, formerly used in Scotland for beheading criminals; said to have been introduced by the regent Morton (d. 1581) and to have been used for his execution.

MAITLAND

Maldun, see Malduns.

MAIMONIDES (1135-1204), a Jew of Cordova, who, on the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, went to Fez and Cairo. He was a rationalist and anti-mystic philosopher. His chief work was 'The Guide for the Perplexed', of which there are English, French, and German translations.

Main Street, a novel by S. Lewis (q.v.), published in 1920; a picture drawn in minute detail of life in the depressing atmosphere of a small prairie town in the American middle west. Nathaniel Hawthorne used the same name for an account of Harlem.

MAINE, SIR HENRY JAMES SUMNER (1822-88), educated at Christ's Hospital, London, and Pembroke College, Cambridge, became fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, of which he died master. He was appointed Regius professor of civil law in 1847, but exchanged this post for a readership at the Inns of Court. He was legal member of the council of India, 1862-9, and Corpus professor of jurisprudence at Oxford, 1869-78. Besides reviews, Maine wrote many works on the philosophy of law, history, and politics, marked by scholarship and a fine style, the best known of which are his 'Ancient Law' (1861), 'Village Communities' (1871), 'Early History of Institutions' (1875), and 'Dissertations on Early Law and Custom' (1883). He also wrote a criticism of democratic institutions entitled 'Popular Government' (1885).

Mainotes, inhabitants of Maina, a mountainous district in the southern Morea, a sturdy and independent people who were never subdued by the Turks.

Maintenon, FRANÇOISE D'AUBIGNÉ, MARQUISE DE (1635-1719), the wife of the French burlesque poet Scarron (q.v.). After her husband's death she was charged with the education of the children of Louis XIV and Mme de Montespan. She obtained a great ascendancy over the king, who secretly married her in 1684.

Main-Travelled Roads, stories of the American middle west, by H. Garland (q.v.), published in 1891.

Maisie Farrange, the heroine of Henry James's (q.v.) novel, 'What Maisie Knew' (1897).

MAITLAND, FREDERIC WILLIAM (1850-1906), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, was called to the bar in 1876 and after eight years' practice became reader in English law at Cambridge and, from 1888 until his death, Downing professor. In 1887 he founded the Selden Society for encouraging the study of English law, and edited several of its publications. His first important work was 'Bracton's Note-Book' (1887), followed by the 'History of English Law before the time of Edward I' (1895), the standard authority on the subject, which he wrote in collaboration with Sir Frederick Pollock. He traced Roman influence on English law in the 13th cent. in his 'Bracton and Azo' (the famous doctor of canon law of Bologna, d. 1200), which appeared in 1895, and in 'Roman Canon Law in the Church of England' (1898). His Essays on 'Domesday Book and Beyond' (1897), his Ford lectures on 'Township and Borough' (1898), his Rede lecture on 'English Law and the Renaissance' (1901), were other notable productions. The lectures delivered by him in 1887 on 'The Constitutional History of England' from the death of Edward I to the present time were posthumously published under that title in 1908. His 'Year Books of Edward II' (text and translation) for 1307-10 were published in 1903-5. His collected papers were edited in 1911 by H. A. L. Fisher, by whom and also by A. L. Smith memoirs of Maitland were published (1910 and 1908).

Maitland Club, a club founded at Glasgow in 1828 for the publication of works on the literature and antiquities of Scotland.

MAJOR or MAIR, JOHN (1469-1550), born in Haddingtonshire, has been called 'the last of the schoolmen'. He studied at Cambridge and Paris, where he became doctor of theology. He lectured on scholastic logic and theology at Glasgow and St. Andrews from 1518 to 1525, and then returned to Paris, where he was regarded as the most eminent exponent of medieval learning. He published between 1509 and 1517 a Latin 'Commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard', and in 1521 a Latin 'History of Greater Britain, both England and Scotland', in which he showed himself in advance of his times by advocating the union of the two kingdoms.

According to Rabelais (II. vii), among the books found by Pantagruel in the library of St. Victor was a treatise by Major 'De modo faciendi boudinos' ('On the art of making black-puddings').

Major Gahagan, Some Passages in the Life of, and Historical Recollections by, an early work by Thackeray (q.v.), published in the 'New Monthly Magazine' in 1838-9. Major Goliah O'Grady Gahagan, of the Indian Irregular Horse, relates his Munchausen-like military adventures in India and Spain.

Majuscule, in palaeography, a large letter or script, uncial (q.v.) or capital.

Malagigi, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.), a cousin of Rinaldo, possessed of magic lore, who detects the wiles of Angelica and attempts to slay her, but is taken prisoner and carried to Cathay. He is released on condition that he shall lure Rinaldo to her.

MALAGROWTHER, MALACHI, the pseudonym under which Sir W. Scott addressed three letters in 1826, on the question of the Scottish paper currency, to the 'Edinburgh Weekly Journal'.

Malagrowthier, SIR MUNGO, a character in Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

MALEGER

Malambruno, in 'Don Quixote', II. xxxix, the giant necromancer who transforms Antonomasia into a monkey of brass and Don Clavijo into a metal crocodile, and is appeased by Don Quixote.

Malaprop, Mrs., in Sheridan's 'The Rivals' (q.v.), the aunt and guardian of Lydia Languish, noted for her aptitude for misapplying long words, e.g. 'as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile'.

Malbecco, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (III. ix, x), a 'cancerd crabbed carle', jealous and avaricious, married to the lovely Hellenore. Paridell elopes with her, and Malbecco, unable to escape from his jealous thoughts, throws himself from a rock. But his 'aery spright' lives for ever, under the name of Jealousy.

Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre, the first line of an old French song, perhaps, but not very probably, referring to the campaigns of the duke of Marlborough. Malbrouk goes off to war; he may return at Easter or at the Trinity. His lady mounts to the top of the tower, sees his page returning, and learns that her lord is dead. The song was sung as a lullaby by a nurse to one of Marie Antoinette's children, took the queen's fancy, and became popular. Beaumarchais introduced the tune, which resembles that of 'We won't go home till morning', into his 'Mariage de Figaro'.

Maldon, Battle of, a poem in Old English, perhaps of the 10th century, dealing with the raid of the Northmen under Anlaf, at Maldon in Essex, in 991. The Northmen are drawn up on the shore of the Blackwater. The ealdorman Byrhtnoth, the friend of Ælfric, exhorts his men to stand firm. An offer by the herald of the Northmen that their attack shall be bought off by payment of tribute is scornfully rejected. The fight is delayed by the rising tide which separates the two armies. Then Byrhtnoth is slain with a poisoned spear and some of his men flee. A fresh attack is led by Ælfwine, son of Ælfric. Godric falls. The end of the poem is lost.

Maldon, JACK, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield', the scapegrace cousin of Mrs. Strong. Male or MASCULINE Rhymes, see Rhymes.

Male Regle, La, see Oclevs.

Malebolge, the name given by Dante to his eighth circle in Hell, consisting of ten circular trenches, designated bolge. The word is chiefly used in English in allusion to the pool of filth in the second bolgia, or to the boiling pitch in the fifth bolgia ('Inferno', xviii and xxi).

Malecasta, 'unchaste', in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', III. i, the lady of Castle Joyeous.

Maleger, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. xi, the captain of twelve troops, the seven deadly sins and the evil passions that assail the five senses. He is lean and ghostlike, and Prince Arthur's sword has no effect on him. Finally, remembering that earth is his mother and that he draws his strength from her, Arthur lifts him up and squeezes the life out of him. (Cf. the legend of Antaeus.)

Malengin, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. ix, the personification of guile. Sought out by Sir Arthur and Artegall, he runs away assuming various disguises, but is destroyed by Talus.

Malibran, MME MARIA FELICITA GARCIA (1808-36), a famous opera singer, born in Paris. She had a contralto voice and sang with increasing success in Paris, London, and other cities until her early death. De Musset's 'Stances à la Malibran' are famous.

Mall, THE, a walk sheltered by trees along the N. side of St. James's Park, London, originally a 'mall' where the game of 'pall mall' (q.v.) was played. It was a fashionable promenade in the 17th-18th cents.

MALLARMÉ, ÉTIENNE (STÉPHANE) (1842-98), French poet, author of 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune' (1876).

MALLET (or MALLOCH), DAVID (1705?-65), author of the well-known ballad of 'William and Margaret' (q.v.). He collaborated with J. Thomson (1700-48, q.v.) in the masque of 'Alfred', which contains 'Rule, Britannia'; but that song is generally attributed to Thomson. Mallet was the literary executor of Bolingbroke (q.v.).

Malleus Maleficarum, or Hexenhammer, the 'Hammer of Witches', published in 1484 by Jakob Sprenger, the Dominican inquisitor of Cologne, and Heinrich Krämer, Prior of Cologne. It was the text-book of the day on witchcraft, setting forth how it may be discovered and how it should be punished.

MALLOCH, DAVID, see Mallet.

MALLOCK, WILLIAM HURRELL (1849-1923), educated at Balliol College, Oxford, is best known as author of 'The New Republic' (1877), a lively satire on English society and ideas, in which Ruskin figures as Mr. Herbert, and Jowett, Matthew Arnold, Pater, Huxley, Tyndall, &c., figure under thin disguises among the other characters. Mallock's other works include 'The New Paul and Virginia' (1878), 'Memoirs of Life and Literature' (1920), and various studies of social and economic science directed against the doctrines of socialism.

Malmesbury, THE SAGE OF, Hobbes (q.v.).

Malmesbury, WILLIAM OF, see William of Malmesbury.

Malmsey, a strong sweet wine, originally the produce of Monemvasia (Napoli di Malvasia) in the Morea, but now obtained from Spain, the Azores, Madeira, and the Canaries, as well as Greece. The vines from Monemvasia are said to have been transplanted to Candia, and thence to Spain and Portugal. Malmsey is referred to in England as early as the 15th cent., and George, duke of Clarence, is said to have been drowned in a butt of this wine in the Tower in 1478. An act of Henry VIII lays down that it shall not be retailed above 12d. a gallon.

MALVOISIE is a parallel corruption through Malvasia.

MALONE, EDMOND (1741-1812), literary critic and Shakespearian scholar. He published in 1778 his 'Attempt to ascertain the Order in which the Plays of Shakespeare were written', and an edition of the works in 1790; the revised edition, 1821, was the best to that date. A member of The Club and a friend of Boswell, he revised the 'Tour to the Hebrides', 1785, while it was going through the press, and gave great assistance with 'The Life of Johnson', 1791, of which he edited the third to sixth editions.

Malone Society, THE, was founded in 1907 for the purpose of making accessible materials for the study of early English drama, by printing dramatic texts and documents. Its name is taken from Edmond Malone (q.v.).

MALORY, SIR THOMAS (d. 1471) is identified by E. Vinaver (v. 'Morte Darthur') with Sir Thomas Malory, knight, of Newbold Revel (Warwicks.) and Winwick (Northants.) who succeeded to his estates in 1433 or 1434. In 1450 he was charged with attempted murder, and he later suffered terms of imprisonment for various major crimes. He sat for his shire in Parliament in 1456, with the Earl of Warwick followed Edward IV to Northumberland, and, probably with Warwick, joined the Lancastrians, for he is excluded by name from two pardons granted them by Edward. Three 'prayers for deliverance' occurring in his manuscript suggest that he wrote most of it to occupy himself while in prison, attracted by the adventurous content of the French Arthurian material.

MALTHUS, THOMAS ROBERT (1766-1834), educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, became curate of Albury in Surrey in 1798. In that year he published 'An Essay on the Principle of Population', in which he argued that population would soon increase beyond the means of subsistence and that checks on this increase are necessary. The 'Essay' was recast in the second edition (1803); in this the author somewhat modifies his conclusions, recognizing a slackening in the pressure of population, and the influence of morality among the checks on its increase. The work aroused a storm of controversy and exerted a powerful influence on social thought in the 19th cent. The economic writings of Malthus included 'An Inquiry into the Nature and Progress of Rent' (1815) and a treatise on the 'Principles of Political Economy' (1820).

Mamamouchi, the mock-Turkish title pretended to have been conferred by the Sultan upon M. Jourdain (q.v.), in Molière's 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme'.

Mambrino, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.) a pagan king whose magic helmet is acquired by Rinaldo. In 'Don Quixote' (q.v., Part I) there is frequent mention of Mambrino's helmet. Don Quixote, seeing a barber riding with his brass basin upon his head, takes this for the golden helmet of Mambrino, and gets possession of it.

Mamelukes, a military body, originally composed of Caucasian slaves of the Sultan of Egypt. They seized the government of Egypt in 1254 and made one of their number sultan. The Mameluke sultans reigned from 1254 to 1517, when the Ottoman sultan Selim I assumed the sovereignty. Subsequently Egypt was governed, under the nominal rule of a Turkish viceroy, by twenty-four Mameluke beys. In 1811 the remaining Mamelukes were massacred by Mohammed Ali, pasha of Egypt.

Mammet or MAUMET, a corruption of Mahomet, a false god, an idol, a doll.

Mammon, the Aramaic word for 'riches', occurring in the Greek text of Matt. vi. 24, and Luke xvi. 9-13. Owing to the quasi-personification in these passages, the name was taken by medieval writers as the proper name of the devil of covetousness. This use was revived by Milton in 'Paradise Lost', i. 678 and ii. 228.

Mammon, The Triumph of, see God and Mammon.

Mammon, THE CAVE OF, described in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. vii, is the treasure-house of the god of wealth, visited by Sir Guyon.

Mammon, SIR EPICURE, in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.), an arrogant, avaricious, voluptuous knight. Charles Lamb in his 'Specimens' says of him: 'It is just such a swaggerer as contemporaries have described old Ben to be'.

Man and Superman, a comedy by G. B. Shaw (q.v.), published in 1903; 'a stage projection of the tragi-comic love chase of the man by the woman', in which 'Don Juan is the quarry instead of the huntsman' (Author's Epistle Dedicatory).

Man in the Iron Mask, THE, see Iron Mask.

Man in the Moon, THE, a fancied figure, with a bundle of sticks on his back, made by the shadows on the moon. The nursery tale is that he is a man banished to the moon for gathering sticks on the Sabbath (an allusion to Num. xv. 32 et seq.). The myth that the moon is inhabited by a sabbath-breaker is found with variations in several countries. In England it is at least as old as Henryson, who refers to it in the 'Testament of Cresseid' (l. 260), and there are references to it in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (III. i) and 'The Tempest' (II. ii). In Dante, 'Inf.' xx. 126 and 'Par.' ii. 49-51, 'the old popular belief that the Man in the Moon was Cain with a bundle of thorns (probably with reference to his unacceptable offering)' is alluded to (Toynbee).

Man in the Street, THE, the ordinary man, as distinguished from the expert or the man who has special opportunities of knowledge. The earliest use of the expression quoted by OED. is 1831, when Greville ('Memoirs', 22 Mar.) writes, 'knowing, as "the man in the street" (as we call him at Newmarket) always does, the greatest secrets of kings'.

Man of Mode, THE, or Sir Fopling Flutter, a comedy by Etherege (q.v.), produced in 1676. The play has no plot. It is a picture of a society living exclusively for pleasure, a slight web of love-affairs providing the occasion for brilliant dialogue and character-drawing. We have Dorimant, a portrait of Lord Rochester; Sir Fopling Flutter, the prince of fops, the perfect product of Parisian taste of the day; Young Bellair, the portrait of the poet; and so on.

Man of Ross, see Kyrle.

Man of Sin, THE, see Antichrist.

Man of Straw, (a) a person or thing compared to a straw image, a dummy; (b) an imaginary adversary or invented adverse argument, adduced in order to be defeated; (c) a person of no substance, especially one who undertakes a pecuniary responsibility without having the means to discharge it; (d) a fictitious or irresponsible person fraudulently put forward as a surety or as a party in an action. [OED.]

Man of the World, THE, a novel by H. Mackenzie (q.v.).

MAN OF THE WORLD

Man of the World, The, a comedy by Macklin (q.v.), produced in 1781.

This amusing play satirizes the peculiarities of a Scottish politician, Sir Pertinax Mac-Sycophant, who, having started life as a 'beggary clerk in Sawney Gordon's compting house', has, by the judicious application of his doctrine of pliability, risen to parliamentary eminence. In order to gain the control of three parliamentary boroughs, he proposes to marry his eldest son, Egerton, to the daughter, Lady Rodolpha, of another servile but needy politician, Lord Lambercourt, who gets some hard cash by the arrangement. Unfortunately Egerton is devoted to his father's poor ward Constantia, and Lady Rodolpha to Egerton's younger brother. The parents dictatorially insist, and the young people are summarily set to their courting, in view of a marriage the next day. There follows an amusing scene, in which Lady Rodolpha, finding her proposed lover speechless from embarrassment, dutifully makes the first advances in broad Scotch. Each, however, presently discovers that the other's affections are already otherwise engaged and they combine to defeat their parents' purposes. Egerton secretly marries Constantia, and Sir Pertinax, momentarily defeated, recovers the lost ground by proposing a marriage between Lady Rodolpha and his second son, on the same financial terms. This of course is welcome to the lady, while her father doesn't 'care a pinch of snuff if she concorporates with the Cham of Tartary', provided he gets his cash.

Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, The, a story by Mark Twain (q.v.), published in 1899, which displays the destructive effects of greed within the circle of a small town.

Manannán, the son of Lir (q.v.), a highly popular god of the old Gaelic pantheon, the subject of many legends and the patron of sailors and merchants. The Isle of Man was his favourite abode, and is said to take its name from him. There he has degenerated into a traditional giant, with three legs (seen revolving in the coat of arms of the island).

Manasseh, the firstborn son of Joseph, to whom Jacob, in his death-bed blessing, preferred Manasseh's younger brother Ephraim (Gen. xlviii. 19).

and Bright, who advocated the principles of free trade. It was afterwards extended to the party who supported those leaders on other questions of policy. 'Manchester policy' was used derisively to signify a policy of laissez-faire and self-interest.

Manco Capac, the legendary founder of the Inca monarchy of Peru. He is represented as a child of the sun, sent to civilize the Indians, but was probably a real person, the chief of an Indian tribe in the 13th cent.

Mancus, an old English money of account worth thirty pence [OED.]. Offa, king of Mercia in the 8th cent., struck a gold coin closely imitated from an Arabic gold dinar of the Caliph Al Mansur, of which a single specimen, found near Rome, survives. This coin may have been one of the 365 gold 'mancuses' of which Offa had promised an annual gift to Pope Adrian I (Oman, 'Coinage of England', 1931). See Peter's Pence.

Mandaeans, known also as NASORAEANS or SABIANs, or (owing to a misunderstanding) CHRISTIANS of St. JOHN, a body of pagan gnostics of whom a small community survives in Lower Mesopotamia. They date perhaps from about the beginning of the Christian era. Their sacred writings (in a special form of Aramaic) survive. The name 'Mandaean' means 'Gnostic' (q.v.). Their doctrines appear to have been formed from contact with Jews, Christians, and Manichaeans, and have developed into a monotheistic worship of the 'Light King', while 'Manda d'Hayye', 'Knowledge of Life' personified, plays in their religion the part of an incarnate Saviour. They revere John the Baptist, and practise frequent baptism, but are hostile to Christianity. [EB.]

Mandane, the daughter of Astyages, king of Persia. She was married to Cambyses, a man of humble birth, because it had been foretold to Astyages that his daughter's son would dethrone him. Her son Cyrus was exposed as soon as born, but was saved by a shepherdess and survived to carry out the prophecy.

MANDEVILLE, BERNARD DE (1670-1733), born in Holland, settled in London and became a physician. He was author of a satire in octosyllabic verse, entitled 'The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves turned Honest' (1705), reissued with a prose commentary as 'The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices, Public Benefits' (1714), designed to illustrate the essential vileness of human nature. Society, like a hive of bees, thrives on a system of mutual rapacities. The paradox was widely controverted, among others by W. Law (q.v.), and by Berkeley in his 'Alciphron' (q.v.). He figures in R. Browning's 'Parleyings with some Persons of Importance'.

MANDEVILLE, SIR JOHN, was the ostensible author of a book of travels bearing his name, composed soon after the middle of the 14th cent., purporting to be an account of his own journeys in the East, but really a mere compilation, especially from William of Boldensele and Friar Odoric of Pordenone, and from the 'Speculum' of Vincent de Beauvais. The work was written originally in French, from which English, Latin, German, and other translations were made.

The writer of this remarkable literary forgery remains unknown, but probability points to a certain Jean d'Outremeuse, a writer of histories and fables, who lived at Liège at the time in question. According to him, Sir John Mandeville, who had assumed the name of Jehan de Bourgogne, or Jean à la Barbe, died in 1372 and was buried in the church of the Guillemins at Liège.

The 'Voiage of Sir John Maundevile' purports to be a guide to pilgrims to the Holy Land, but carries the reader a good deal farther, to Turkey, Tartary, Persia, Egypt, and India. It is an entertaining work combining geography and natural history with romance and marvels, such as the fountain of youth and ant-hills of gold-dust.

Mandricardo, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), the son of Agrican, king of Tartary. He wears the armour of Hector, and comes to Europe to secure Hector's sword, Durindana, now in the possession of Orlando, and to avenge his father's death. He carries off Doralis, who is betrothed to Rodomont, meets Orlando and fights with him (but the fight is broken off), gets Durindana after Orlando in his madness has thrown it away, and is finally killed by Rogero.

Manduce, see Gastrolaters.

Mānēs (Latin, the good beings), the deified souls of the departed, the ghosts of shades of the dead, whom the ancient Romans thought it desirable to propitiate.

MA'NĒTHO, an Egyptian priest who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 B.C.) and wrote chronicles of his country, of which only fragments survive.

Manette, DR. and LUCIE, characters in Dickens's 'A Tale of Two Cities' (q.v.).

Manfred, a dramatic poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1817.

Manfred, guilty of some inexpiable and mysterious crime, living among the Alps an outcast from society, is tortured by remorse. He calls up the spirits of the universe; they offer him everything but the one thing he seeks—oblivion. In vain he tries to throw himself from a high peak, and invokes the Witch of the Alps. He visits the Hall of Arimanes (Ahriman), resolutely refuses submission to the spirits of evil, bids them call up the dead, and has a vision of Astarte, the woman whom he has loved. In answer to his invocation, she foretells his death on the morrow, but will say no more. At the appointed time, demons appear to summon him. He denies their power over him; they disappear, and Manfred expires.

Mani, in Scandinavian mythology, the Moon.

MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS

Mani or MANES, see Manichaeism.

Manichaeism, a religious system widely accepted from the 3rd to the 5th cent. Like Mithraism, which it replaced, it was of Iranian origin, and was composed of Gnostic, Christian, Mazdean, and pagan elements. It was founded by Mani (Manes or Manichæus), a Persian of Ecbatana, who lived in the 3rd cent. after Christ. He proclaimed the new religion at the court of Shapur I and became its travelling prophet. He was opposed by the fanatical Magians and crucified in the year A.D. 274 (?) under Bahram I. He wrote many works, most of which are lost; his doctrines are chiefly known from the 'Acta Archelai'.

The essential feature of the system is its dualistic theology, of which the principal elements are light and darkness, God and Satan, the soul and the body. Man was created by Satan in his image, but contains portions of light. Eve, the type of sensual seduction, was given him by Satan. A conflict is in progress between the demons and the angels of light for the possession of mankind. The angels send prophets to the world to impart true knowledge, by which alone man can be liberated. Of these prophets Mani is the last. Ultimately, when all the particles of captive light and the souls of the just have been set free, the end of the world will come in a general conflagration.

Manichæism is essentially ascetic, and reprehends all forms of uncleanness. It spread both eastward to China and westward to Europe, where it was especially prevalent in Bulgaria and southern France (see Bridges, 'The Testament of Beauty', iii. 680 et seq.). Manichæan views were held by the Albigenses (q.v.) and exposed them to the terrible persecution (1207) of Innocent III. Augustine in his younger days was a Manichæan, but later wrote against the religion.

MANILIUS, the name given to the author of 'Astronomica', a Latin poem in five books on astrology and astronomy, written in the time of Augustus and Tiberius. Nothing is known of the author beyond his name, found variously spelt in some of the manuscripts.

Manitou, the supreme spirit of the American Indians. The name was applied equally to the spirit of Good and the spirit of Evil.

MANLEY, MRS. MARY DE LA RIVIÈRE (1663-1724), having been drawn into a false marriage by her cousin John Manley, who was already married, fell into disreputable courses, and avenged herself on society for an unhappy life by her 'New Atalantis' (1709), in which Whigs and persons of note were slandered. She was arrested but escaped punishment. She wrote other scandalous memoirs and several plays, and succeeded Swift as editor of the 'Examiner' in 1711.

Manlius Capitolinus, MARCUS, Roman consul in 392 B.C., was in the Capitol when the Gauls attempted to surprise it. Awakened, it is said, by the cackling of the geese, he hastily collected a few men and repelled the attack. Subsequently he befriended the poorer classes of Romans; he was accused of aiming to make himself tyrant and was sentenced to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock.

Manlius Torquatus, TITUS, Roman dictator in 363 B.C., who was celebrated for slaying in single combat, in 361, a gigantic Gaul. He took from him a chain (torques) which he placed round his own neck, whence his surname Torquatus. When consul in 340, he caused his own son to be executed for engaging in single combat, contrary to his orders, and slaying a Tusculan noble who had provoked him.

Manly, (1) a character in Wycherley's 'The Plain Dealer' (q.v.); (2) a character in Vanbrugh and Cibber's 'The Provok'd Husband' (q.v.).

MANLY, JOHN MATTHEWS (1865-1940), professor of English in the University of Chicago, medievalist. His works include: 'Contributions to the Piers Plowman Controversy' (1907-9), 'Chaucer and the Canterbury Tales' (1928), 'Some New Light on Chaucer' (1926).

MANN, HEINRICH (1871-1950), German novelist, author of 'Im Schlaraffenland', 'Die Göttinnen', 'Die Kleine Stadt' (1922).

Mann, SIR HORACE (1701-86), British envoy at Florence, 1740-86, where the Young Pretender was residing. He is chiefly remembered as Horace Walpole's friend and correspondent.

MANN, THOMAS (1875-1955), German novelist, author of 'Buddenbrooks' (1902), 'Der Tod in Venedig' (1913), 'Mario und der Zauberer' ('Mario and the Magician', 1930).

MANNING, HENRY EDWARD (1808-92), educated at Balliol College, Oxford, and fellow of Merton. He became archdeacon of Chichester in 1840. In 1851 he joined the Roman Catholic church, and became archbishop of Westminster in 1865 and cardinal in 1875. He published many religious and polemical works, including: 'The Vatican Decrees' (1875) in reply to W. E. Gladstone. He was a great preacher and ecclesiastical statesman, of ascetic temper, and a subtle controversialist.

Manny or MAUNY, SIR WALTER DE, afterwards Baron de Manny (d. 1372), a native of Hainault and esquire to Queen Philippa, won great distinction as a military commander under Edward III. He founded the Charterhouse in London (1371). Drayton ('Polyolbion', xviii. 227) relates a legend about his forming a band of warriors who 'closed their left eyes up' until they had performed 'some high adventurous deed'.

Manoa, see El Dorado.

Manon Lescaut, Histoire du Chevalier des Grieux et de, a famous novel by the Abbé Prévost (Antoine François Prévost d'Exiles, 1697-1763), published in 1731.

It is the story of a young man who is led into evil courses by his passionate attachment to a courtesan. She is finally transported to America, whither her lover follows her, and where she dies, her character transformed by love and suffering.

MANSEL, HENRY LONGUEVILLE (1820-71), educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford, was professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, 1866-8, and dean of St. Paul's for the last three years of his life. He contributed to the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica' an exposition of the Hamiltonian philosophy, subsequently published (1860) as 'Metaphysics'. In his 'Artis Logicae Rudimenta' (1849) and 'Prolegomena Logica' (1851) he had already shown himself a follower of Sir W. Hamilton (q.v.). But his fame rests chiefly on his Bampton Lectures (1858), 'The Limits of Religious Thought', in which he applied the Hamiltonian philosophy of the conditioned' to theology. Mansel's position is that human knowledge is limited to the finite, and that a conception of the Deity, in His absolute existence, involves a contradiction; for conception itself is a limitation, and conception of the absolute Deity is a limitation of the illimitable. Theology is properly 'regulative' not speculative. We have 'regulative ideas of the Deity, which are sufficient to guide our practice, but not to satisfy our intellect, which tell us, not what God is in Himself, but how he wills that we should think of Him'. Mansel published in 1850 'Phrontisterion', a satire on the University Commission, in the form of an excellent Aristophanic parody.

MANSFIELD, KATHERINE, pseudonym of Katherine Middleton Murry (1888-1923), née Beauchamp, whose chief works were: 'Bliss' (1920), 'The Garden Party' (1922), 'The Dove's Nest' (1923), 'Something Childish' (1924), all short stories.

Mansfield Park, a novel by J. Austen (q.v.), begun in 1812 and published in 1814.

Sir Thomas Bertram of Mansfield Park, a stern but good-hearted baronet, has two sons, Tom and Edmund, and two daughters, Maria and Julia. His wife, a selfish, indolent woman, has two sisters: the widow Mrs. Norris, selfish and spiteful, a near neighbour, and Mrs. Price, wife of an impecunious officer of marines, with a large family of young children. In order to assist the latter, the Bertrams undertake the charge of Fanny Price, a girl of nine. In spite of her humble situation and the constant bullying of Mrs. Norris, Fanny, by her honesty and modest disposition, gradually becomes an indispensable part of the household. Her sterling character is especially shown during Sir Thomas's absence in the

MANSFIELD PARK

West Indies, when the family discipline is relaxed, private theatricals are indulged in, and there is some unseemly flirtation between Maria Bertram, who is engaged to marry Mr. Rushworth, 'a heavy young man, with not more than common sense', and Henry Crawford, the attractive but unprincipled brother-in-law of the parson of Mansfield. Against all this, Fanny resolutely sets her face. Loving her cousin Edmund, she grieves to see him fascinated by the worldly-minded Mary Crawford, Henry's sister. Maria having become Mrs. Rushworth, Henry Crawford turns his attention to Fanny, falls in love with her, and proposes. Fanny unhesitatingly rejects him, incurring the grave displeasure of Sir Thomas by what he regards as a piece of ungrateful perversity. During a visit paid by Fanny to her own home, matters come to a crisis. Henry, accidentally thrown again into contact with Mrs. Rushworth, runs away with her; and Julia elopes with an ineligible suitor, Mr. Yates. Mary Crawford's failure to reprobate her brother's conduct, coupled with her aversion to marrying a clergyman (Edmund has now taken orders), finally opens Edmund's eyes to her lack of principle. He turns for comfort to Fanny, falls in love with her, and marries her.

Marble Faun, The, a novel by Hawthorne (q.v.), published in 1860 (under the title in England of 'Transformation').

The scene is laid in Rome, and the title is taken from the resemblance of one of the principal characters, Count Donatello, to the Marble Faun of Praxiteles. The story is mainly concerned with the development of the innocent, morally unconscious, character of Donatello under the pressure of a great tragedy. Donatello loves the art student Miriam, who is dogged and persecuted by another man. Roused to sudden fury, on encountering him when with her on a moonlight expedition, Donatello kills the intruder. From a faunlike creature, Donatello becomes a conscious remorseful man, and finally surrenders himself to justice.

Marconi, GUGLIELMO (1874-1937), born at Bologna, the son of an Italian father and an Irish mother, is famous for establishing wireless telegraphy on a commercial basis, by means of electro-magnetic waves, the existence of which had been foreseen by Clerk-Maxwell in 1864. Marconi began to experiment in 1895. His first patent was taken out in 1896, and the system was soon after tested between Penarth and Weston and installed between the East Goodwin lighthouse and the South Foreland lighthouse. Communication across the English Channel was established in 1899, and across the Atlantic in 1902.

MARCONIGRAM, for a message transmitted by this system, is derived from his name.

MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS (A.D. 121-180), Roman emperor A.D. 161-180 and religious philosopher, was author of twelve books of 'Meditations' in Greek, imbued with a Stoic philosophy. Man's duty is to obey the divine law that resides in his reason, superior to pains and pleasures; to forgive injuries and regard all men as brothers; to await death with equanimity. The 'Meditations' were first printed in 1550 from a manuscript now lost.

Mardi, a fantastic South Sea romance by Herman Melville, published in 1849.

Marfisa, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and the 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), the sister of Rogero (q.v.). Brought up by an African magician, she becomes queen of India, and leads an army to the relief of Angelica (q.v.) besieged in Albracca. Later, discovering her own Christian parentage, Marfisa joins Charlemagne and is baptized. She falls in love with Rogero before discovering that he is her brother.

Marforio, see Pasquil.

Margaret, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.), the gentlewoman attending on Hero; (2) in Goethe's 'Faust' (q.v.), the principal female character ('Gretchen') of Pt. I, a girl of humble station, simple, confiding, and affectionate.

Margaret, LADY, see Lady Margaret.

Margaret, Queen and Saint of Scotland (d. 1093). She was a granddaughter of Edmund Ironside, and brought the West Saxon blood back to the Royal (Norman) House of England by the marriage of her daughter with Henry I.

Margaret of Anjou (1430-82), 'the she-wolf of Anjou', queen consort of Henry VI of England; she played a prominent part in the Wars of the Roses. She figures in Shakespeare's 'Henry VI'.

Margaret of Navarre, see Heptameron.

Margaret's Ghost, see William and Margaret.

Margarita, the heroine of Fletcher's 'Rule a Wife and Have a Wife' (q.v.).

Margaux, CHÂTEAU, see Claret.

Margitès, 'The Booby', the name of a lost Greek comic poem, perhaps of about 700 B.C., regarded by Aristotle as the germ of comedy. It dealt with a foolish jack-of-all-trades 'who knew many things, but knew them all badly' (Jebb).

Marguerite of Navarre, see Heptameron.

Margutte, a character in Pulci's 'Morgante Maggiore' (q.v.), a cunning companion of Morgante. Rabelais's Panurge (q.v.) is in part modelled on him.

Maria, (1) a character in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.); (2) a character in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (vol. vii) and 'A Sentimental Journey' (qq.v.); (3) a character in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.).

Mariamne, the wife of Herod the Great, executed by him in a fit of jealousy, the subject of tragedies by Voltaire and other authors.

Marian, MAID, see Maid Marian.

Mariana, in Shakespeare's 'Measure for Measure' (q.v.), the lady betrothed to Angelo and cast off by him, who lives, dejected, at the moated grange.

Mariana and Mariana in the South, two poems by A. Tennyson, suggested by the Mariana of 'the moated grange' (see preceding entry) in Shakespeare's 'Measure for Measure'.

MARIANA, JUAN DE (1532-1624), born at Talavera, a Jesuit, who taught theology at Rome and Paris, and then settled at Toledo, and wrote a long and remarkable history of Spain. He also wrote a notable Latin treatise 'de Rege et Regis Institutione' (Toledo, 1598), in which he spoke with approval of the assassination of Henri III of France by Jacques Clément and defined the circumstances in which it was legitimate to get rid, even by violence, of a tyrannical prince. This book was condemned in Paris to be burnt by the public executioner immediately after the assassination of Henri IV by Ravallac in 1610. See Mariannes.

Marianne, a familiar name given to the government of the French Republic. A secret society formed about 1852, with the object of establishing the Republic and effecting other reforms, had taken the name of Marianne. Some of its members were prosecuted in 1854 and sentenced to imprisonment. The name of Marianne was then transferred from the society to its republican ideal, and in the language of the partisans of the Empire, Marianne was used to designate the Republic.

MARIANNE

For a Frenchman, Marianne still signifies the republican form of government, and not France. By foreigners, it is used more and more as a name for France, as John Bull for England.

The I.D.C. contains many inquiries and notes as to the ulterior origin of the symbolical use of the name 'Marianne'. They are inconclusive. They only show that 'Marianne' figured in the sign and countersign of the secret society of 1852, and that the name was a symbol of republican institutions probably as early as the first Revolution. The most interesting suggestion (unsupported by evidence) connects it with Juan de Mariana (q.v.).

Marie Celeste, see Mary Celeste.

MARIE DE FRANCE, a late 12th cent. French poetess, of whom little that is certain is known. She appears to have been born in France and to have done much or all of her literary work in England. She was a woman of culture, who knew Latin and English as well as French. It has been conjectured that she was a natural daughter of Geoffrey Plantagenet (hence half-sister of Henry II) and abbess of Shaftesbury 1181-1215 (see 'English Historical Review', vol. 25). She wrote 'Lays', tales of love and adventure, in some of which Arthur and Tristram figure; a collection of Aesopic fables, to which she gave the name 'Isopet'; and a French version of the Latin legend of the Purgatory of St. Patrick (q.v.).

Marie Roget, The Mystery of, a detective story by Poe (q.v.).

Maries, THE QUEEN'S, see Queen's Maries.

Marina, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Pericles' (q.v.), the daughter of Pericles; (2) in Byron's 'The Two Foscari' (q.v.), the wife of Jacopo Foscari.

Marinell, see Florimell.

Mariner's Mirror, The, the quarterly journal of the Society for Nautical Research, founded in 1910. The name is taken from an old Elizabethan book.

MARINO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1569-1625), Neapolitan poet, the type of the seicento school of Italian literature, notable for its flamboyance and bad taste. He was the author of an extremely long poem entitled 'Adone' (1623).

Marino Fallero, Doge of Venice, a historical tragedy by Lord Byron (q.v.) published in 1821, and produced in the same year at Drury Lane (against Byron's wish).

Marino Faliero was elected Doge of Venice in 1354. Michele Steno, a gentleman of poor estate, having been affronted by the doge, a haughty and choleric man, wrote on the latter's chair of state a gross lampoon on the doge and his wife. He was tried by the Council of Forty and sentenced to a punishment which the doge considered utterly inadequate. The doge thereupon entered into a conspiracy with a number of discontented men to overturn the Venetian constitution and take vengeance on the senators. The plot was revealed and defeated, and Faliero decapitated.

The conspiracy of the doge was likewise the subject of a tragedy, 'Marino Faliero', by Swinburne (q.v.), published in 1885.

Mariolatry, the idolatrous worship of the Virgin Mary attributed by opponents to Roman Catholics. [OED.]

Marlon, FRANCIS (c. 1732-95), American soldier; his band of 'Guerrilla' volunteers, fearless riders and good marksmen, were known as 'Marion's Brigade' and became famous for successful exploits against the British.

Marischal College, ABERDEEN, was founded in 1593 by George Keith, fifth Earl Marischal (1553?-1623), a Scottish statesman who took an active part in affairs under James VI.

Maritornes, the chambermaid at the inn that Don Quixote (q.v.) took for a castle.

Marius among the ruins of Carthage, an allusion to an incident in the life of Gaius Marius, the great Roman general (157-86 B.C.), who had conquered Jugurtha in Africa and destroyed the Cimbri. Overcome by his rival Sulla, he fled in 88 to Africa and landed at Carthage. The Roman governor sent to bid him leave the country. His only reply was, 'Tell the praetor you have seen Gaius Marius a fugitive sitting among the ruins of Carthage.'

Marius the Epicurean, a philosophical romance by Pater (q.v.), published in 1885.

This is the story of the life, in the time of the Antonines, of a grave young Roman, his childhood on his family's Etruscan farm, his education at Pisa, and his maturer years in Rome. Against a background of the customs and modes of thought of that fortunate period, the author traces the reactions of Marius to the various spiritual influences to which he is from time to time subjected, from his first reading of the 'Golden Book' of Apuleius and the philosophies of Heraclitus and Aristippus the Cyrenaic, to the stoicism of Marcus Aurelius, the beauties of the ancient Roman religion, and the horrors of the Roman amphitheatre. Finally the quiet courage and enthusiasm of the young Christian community make a growing impression on his receptive mind, and his end comes as a result of an act of self-sacrifice undertaken in order to save a Christian friend. One of the pleasantest passages of the book is the version of the fable of 'Cupid and Psyche' (q.v.) from Apuleius.

MARIVAUX, PIERRE CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN DE (1688-1763), French author of prose comedies and romances, marked by an elaborate analysis of sentiment, and a subtle affected style which has given rise to the term Marivaudage.

Mark, a money of account, originally representing the value of a mark weight (usually regarded as equivalent to 8 oz.) of silver. In England, after the Conquest, the ratio of twenty sterling pennies to the ounce was the basis of computation; hence the value of the mark became fixed at 160 pence = 13s. 4d. or $\frac{2}{3}$ of the £ sterling. In Scotland the value of the mark was lowered proportionately with that of the shilling and the penny, so that it represented 13s. 4d. Scots = 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. English.

Mark, KING, in the Arthurian legend king of Cornwall, and husband of La Beale Isoud (see Tristram). He is held up to ridicule as a treacherous coward. According to Rhys ('Hibbert Lectures') his origin is perhaps to be found in a deformed deity of the underworld common to Gaelic and British mythology.

Mark, Sr., the evangelist, represented in art accompanied by a winged lion, and commemorated on 25 Apr. Keats left, unfinished, a poem on the Eve of St. Mark, with which day certain superstitions were connected.

MARK RUTHERFORD, see White (W. H.).

Mark Tapley, in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), servant at the Dragon Inn, who leaves it to find some position in which it will be a credit to show his indomitable good humour. He becomes the devoted attendant of Martin during his American tour, and finally marries the hostess of the Dragon.

MARK TWAIN, see Clemens.

Mark's, Sr., a famous Byzantine basilica built in 830 at Venice to receive the relics of the evangelist, which were brought from Alexandria. The church was rebuilt in 976 and 1052.

MARKHAM, MRS., pseudonym of Mrs. Elizabeth Penrose (1780–1837), née Cartwright, who wrote well-known school histories of England (1823) and France (1828).

MARKHAM, GERVASE (1568–1637), after a military career of some years in the Netherlands, became a writer on country pursuits, on the art of war, but especially on horsemanship and the veterinary art. He also wrote plays and poems. His principal works on horses are 'A Discourse of Horsemanshippe' (1593), 'Cavelarice, or the English Horseman', 1607 (in which there is mention of 'Bankes his Curtall', the wonderful performing horse Marocco, referred to in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost'), 'Markham's Method, or Epitome' (1616), 'The Faithful Farrier' (1635). His chief work on country occupations has the title 'A Way to get Wealth' (1631–8), containing treatises on 'Cheap and Good Husbandry' (the management of domestic animals); 'Country Contentments' (hunting, hawking, fishing), with a section on the 'English Huswife' (cooking, dairying, physic); and agriculture and horticulture. (These treatises had been separately published at earlier dates.) His other principal works were 'The most Honourable Tragedie of Sir Richard Grinville, Knight' (1595), 'The English Arcadia' (1607), 'The Soldier's Accidence' (1625). Markham is said to have been the first to import an Arab horse into England.

MARLOWE

Markleham, Mrs., in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), familiarly known as the 'Old Soldier', was the mother-in-law of Copperfield's old schoolmaster at Canterbury, Dr. Strong. Her nickname was due to the 'skill with which she marshalled great forces of relations against the Doctor'.

Marlborough House, was built by Wren for the great duke of Marlborough (an additional storey has since been added). It was acquired by the Crown early in the 19th cent. as a residence for members of the royal family.

Marley, in Dickens's 'A Christmas Carol' (q.v.), Scrooge's late partner, whose ghost appears.

Marlow, Sir Charles, and his son, characters in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.).

MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER (1564–93), son of a Canterbury shoemaker, was educated at King's School, Canterbury, and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He attached himself to the earl of Nottingham's theatrical company, which produced most of his plays. He was acquainted with the leading men of letters, including Raleigh. He wrote not later than 1587 'Tamburlaine' (q.v.), which was published in 1590 and gave a new development to blank verse. His 'Tragedy of Dr. Faustus' (q.v.) was first entered on the 'Stationers' Register' in 1601, but not apparently published till 1604. At some date after 1588 he wrote 'The Jew of Malta' (q.v.), which was first published in 1633; and about 1593 his best play, 'Edward II' (q.v.), first published in 1594; also two inferior pieces, the 'Massacre at Paris' (probably published in 1600) and 'Tragedy of Dido' (joint work of Marlowe and Nash), published in 1594. It has been suggested from internal evidence that he was part author of Shakespeare's 'Titus Andronicus'. He perhaps also wrote parts of 'Henry VI', which Shakespeare revised and completed, and of 'Edward III' (qq.v.). He translated Ovid's 'Amores' (published with Sir John Davies's 'Epigrammes and Elegies', c. 1597); paraphrased part of Musaeus's 'Hero and Leander' (completed by George Chapman and published 1598); translated 'The First Book of Lucan[us] Pharsalia' (published 1600); and wrote the song 'Come live with me and be my love' (published in 'The Passionate Pilgrim', 1599, and in 'England's Helicon'). Marlowe held and propagated atheistical opinions, and a warrant was issued for his arrest in 1593, but later researches have suggested that he was a government agent, and that his murder had a political complexion. He was killed, as Dr. Leslie Hotson has shown, by one Ingram Frisar, at a tavern in Deptford where the pair had supped, and, according to the inquiry held at the time, as the result of a quarrel about the score. Marlowe was spoken of with affection by Edward Blount, Nashe, and

MARLOWE

Chapman, and Jonson referred to his 'mighty line'. He was quoted and apostrophized by Shakespeare in 'As You Like It', and praised by Drayton ('To Henery Reynolds, Esq., of Poets and Poems') in the fine lines beginning:

Next Marlow, bathed in the Thespian
Springs,
Had in him those brave translunary things
That the poets had.

Marmion, A Tale of Flodden Field, a poem in six cantos by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1808.

The story relates to the year 1513. Lord Marmion, a fictitious character, a favourite of King Henry VIII and a compound of villainy and noble qualities, having tired of Constance de Beverley, a perjured nun who has followed him disguised as a page, seeks to marry the wealthy Lady Clare, who is affianced to Sir Ralph de Wilton. To effect his purpose he accuses de Wilton of treason, and proves it by a forged letter. In this he is assisted by Constance, who hopes to recover her hold over Marmion by her knowledge of his perfidy. She is, however, betrayed to her convent and walled up alive. Meanwhile, Marmion and de Wilton have fought in the lists, and the latter has been defeated and left for dead. The Lady Clare betakes herself to a convent to escape Marmion. Marmion in the course of an embassy to Scotland is unknowingly thrown into contact with de Wilton, who has survived and is now disguised as a Palmer; while de Wilton meets with the Abbess of St. Hilda, who has received from Constance the proofs of Marmion's crime, and with Clare in attendance on the Abbess. The Abbess entrusts these proofs to the Palmer, who reveals himself to Clare and escapes to the English camp, where he is rehabilitated. Marmion, with Clare in his train, joins the English forces at the battle of Flodden, where he is killed. De Wilton and Clare are finally united. The poem contains the two well-known songs, 'Where shall the lover rest', and 'Lochinvar', and beautiful introductions to each canto.

MARMION, SHACKERLEY (1603-39), educated at Wadham College, Oxford, was the author of several plays, of which the best is 'The Antiquary' (published in 1641), and of a poem in heroic couplets 'Cupid and Psyche' (q.v.). He contributed verse to the 'Annalia Dubrensis' (see Cotswold Games).

Marne, BATTLE OF THE, in September 1914, one of the decisive battles of the war of 1914-18. On 4 Sept. the advance of Von Kluck and the German First Army was diverted from the direction of Paris towards the south-east. He had then reached the line of the Ourcq, and at this point on the 5th the retirement of the French and British forces ceased. On the 6th the battle of the Marne opened with a general offensive of the Allies. Von Kluck's plan was to march across the front of Maunoury's 6th Army and of the British, in order to attack D'Espérey's 5th Army. He under-estimated the resilience of the forces he had been driving before him. By the 9th the British and D'Espérey had reached the Marne, while Maunoury had carried the Ourcq. On the 10th the Germans retreated farther, and took up a line on the northern bank of the Aisne from near Compiègne towards the Meuse.

The SECOND BATTLE OF THE MARNE (July-August 1918) was the turning-point of the last year of the War. The last German offensive near Rheims was checked on July 15, and followed by a counter-offensive of the reserve group of armies, the reoccupation of the south bank of the Marne by the centre group, the advance of both groups, leading to the battle of Tardenois, the recapture of Soissons, and the German retirement to the Vesle. The allied movement was under Pétain's direction.

Maro, the family name of the Roman poet Virgil (q.v.).

Marocco, the wonderful performing horse trained by Banks, the Scottish showman (fl. 1588-1637). Its power of counting is referred to in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (I. ii), and by other authors of the day. See also Markham (G.).

Maronites, a sect of Syrian Christians, inhabiting Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, named after their founder Maron, who lived probably in the 4th cent.

MAROT, CLÉMENT (1496-1544), French Protestant poet, whose sonnets and pastorals and translations of the Psalms had some influence on the contemporary school of English poetry. He figures in R. Browning's poem, 'The Glove'.

Marplot, a character in Mrs. Centlivre's 'The Busybody' (q.v.).

Marprelate Controversy, see Martin Marprelate.

Marquis of Granby, THE, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), the inn at Dorking kept by the second Mrs. Tony Weller.

Marriage, a novel by S. E. Ferrier (q.v.), published in 1818.

Lady Juliana, the daughter of the earl of Courtland, from romantic notions elopes with the penniless young officer Henry Douglas, who takes her to his Highland home, a gaunt, lonely house where she is greeted by 'three long-chinn'd spinsters' and 'five awkward purple girls'. The dismay of the worldly Lady Juliana at her new surroundings, and the characters of the members of the household and of the neighbouring gentry, are excellently depicted. Lady Juliana gives birth to twin daughters, the climax of her misfortunes. The couple move to London and get into debt. Henry is imprisoned; on his release he joins a regiment in India, and is permanently separated from his wife. Of the children, one is brought up in Scotland, and grows up plain and virtuous; the other accompanies her mother to Lord Courtland's house, and grows up beautiful and heartless. Their story is told as far as their respectively happy and unhappy marriages.

Marriage-à-la Mode, a comedy by Dryden (q.v.), produced in 1672.

The theme of the principal plot is expressed in the first lines of the lyric with which the play opens:

Why should a foolish marriage vow,
Which long ago was made,
Oblige us to each other now,
When passion is decayed?

This is the view of Rhodophil and his wife, Doralia, who, having been married two years, find that the first glamour of marriage has worn off. Rhodophil's friend, Palamede, returns from his travels, having been ordered by his father on pain of disinheritance to marry Melantha, whose delight is in the latest fashions and in newly imported French words. But Palamede has seen and fallen in love with Doralia, not knowing her to be his friend's wife, and views Melantha's affectations with disgust. And Rhodophil has begun to court Melantha, not knowing that she is the destined bride of Palamede. The two amorous intrigues go on, with amusing incidents, until the friends, each discovering that the other is in love with the woman on whom he himself has a claim, conclude that there must be some undiscovered charm in her, become jealous, quarrel, and finally decide not to trespass on each other's property.

Marrow of Modern Divinity, The, the title of a book advocating Calvinistic views, written by E. F. (Edward Fisher) in 1645, the condemnation of which (in 1718) by the general assembly of the Church of Scotland led to a prolonged controversy, known as the MARROW CONTROVERSY.

MARRYAT, FREDERICK (1792-1848), a captain in the Royal Navy, in which he served with distinction, was the author of a series of novels of sea-life, of which the best known are 'Frank Mildmay' (1829), 'Peter Simple' (q.v., 1834), 'Jacob Faithful' (q.v., 1834), and 'Mr. Midshipman Easy' (q.v., 1836). 'Japhet in Search of a Father' (1836), another of his most successful books, is not a story of the sea, but the autobiography of a foundling, who reaches fortune after a multitude of escapades. Mention should also be made of 'Snarleyow' (1837), the story of a mysterious and indestructible cur, 'The Pacha of Many Tales' (1836), 'The Phantom Ship' (1839), and 'Poor Jack' (1840). 'Masterman Ready' (1841), 'The Settlers in Canada' (1844), and others, were specially intended by the author for boys. Marryat spent the years 1837-9 in the U.S. and Canada, and in 1839 published his 'Diary in America' containing an unflattering account of American manners.

Mars, the god of war of the ancient Romans, identified by them with the Ares (q.v.) of the Greeks.

Mars is the name of the fourth planet in the order of distance from the sun, revolving in an orbit lying between that of the earth and Jupiter. Its proximity to the earth has enabled its surface to be carefully mapped, and the existence on it of what appear to be canals (discovered by Schiaparelli) and cultivated areas has given rise to conjectures that Mars is inhabited by intelligent beings (for a fanciful account of these, see Martians).

Mars, MLLS, stage name of Anne Boutet (1779-1847), a famous French actress. "'Did you ever see the Mars, Miss Fotheringay?'" "There was two Mahers in Crow Street," remarked Miss Emily, "Fanny was well enough, but Biddy was no great things." "Sure, the Major means the god of war," interposed the parent.' (Thackeray, 'Pendennis', ch. xi.)

Marsala, a class of white wines resembling Sherry or Madeira, exported from Marsala on the west coast of Sicily.

Marseillaise, The, the French national anthem, was composed by a young French engineer officer, Rouget de Lisle, at Strasburg in 1792, on the declaration of war against Austria. It was shortly afterwards sung at a banquet at Marseilles, and adopted by a Marseilles battalion that was starting for Paris. There it became popular, being known as the 'Chant des Marseillais'. It was suppressed by Napoleon and at the restoration of the Bourbons.

Marshalsea, a prison in Southwark, under the control of the knight-marshal, used latterly for debtors. It was abolished in the 19th cent. See Little Dorrit.

MARSTON, JOHN (1575?-1634), the dramatist, was born probably at Coventry, where he was educated, subsequently going to Brasenose College, Oxford. His mother was Italian. He renounced the drama in 1607 and took orders; he was incumbent of Christchurch, Hampshire, from 1616 to 1631. He figures as 'Kinsayder' in 'The Return from Parnassus', (see Parnassus Plays). He quarrelled with Ben Jonson, who attacked him in 'Every Man out of his Humour', 'Cynthia's Revels', and 'The Poetaster', where he is presented as Crispinus. But the pair made friends again. Marston published 'The Metamorphosis of Pigmalion's Image' (an erotic poem) and certain Satyres' in 1598, and further satires under the title 'The Scourge of Villanie' in the same year. Some of these were studies in social vices and others were directed against literary rivals, including Bishop Hall (q.v.). His dramatic works were printed as follows: the 'History of Antonio and Mellida' (q.v.), a tragedy, in 1602 ('Antonios Revenge' is the second part of this play); 'The Malcontent', a comedy, with additions by Webster, in 1604; 'Eastward Ho' (q.v.), a comedy, written with Jonson and Chapman, for which they were imprisoned in 1605; 'The Dutch Courtezan' (q.v.), in the same year; 'The Parasitaster' (a comedy), in 1606; 'Sophonisba' (a tragedy) in the same year; 'What you Will' (a comedy) in 1607; and 'The Insatiate Countess' (a tragedy) in

MARSTON

MARSTON, JOHN WESTLAND (1819–90), was author of some notable dramas: 'The Patrician's Daughter' (1842), 'Strathmore' (1849), 'Marie de Méranie' (1850), 'A Life's Ransom' (1857), and 'Life for Life' (1869). His most successful comedy was 'The Favourite of Fortune' (1866).

MARSTON, PHILIP BOURKE (1850–87), son of John Westland Marston (q.v.), a blind poet, author of some beautiful sonnets. He published 'Song-tide and other Poems' (1871), 'All in All' (1875), and 'Wind Voices' (1883). Three volumes appeared posthumously: 'For a Song's Sake' (short stories, 1887), 'Garden Secrets' (1887), and 'A Last Harvest' (1891).

Marsyas, in Greek mythology, a celebrated player on the pipe, of Celaena in Phrygia, who had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a musical contest, it being agreed that the victor should treat the loser as he wished. The victory having with difficulty been adjudged to Apollo by the Muses, Apollo tied Marsyas to a tree and flayed him alive. It is said by some that Marsyas had picked up the flute of Athene, which the goddess had thrown away after observing the distortion of the face of the person who played on it; she had invoked a melancholy death on him who found it.

Martello Tower, a small circular fort with massive walls. The name is a corruption of Cape Murtella in Corsica, where there was a tower of this kind which the English fleet captured in 1794. Many Martello towers were erected on the south and east coasts of England as a defensive measure about 1804.

Martext, SIR OLIVER, the vicar in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

MARTIAL, Marcus Valerius Martialis (c. A.D. 40–104), born at Bilbilis in Spain. He came to Rome in 64, and lived there for thirty-five years and then returned to Spain. He left a collection of short poems or epigrams, 1,500 in number, witty but frequently coarse, which throw a valuable light on Roman life and manners.

Martians, in H. G. Wells's 'The War of the Worlds', inhabitants of Mars, who, driven by the progressive cooling of their planet to seek a warmer world, invade the earth. They are described as round bodies, about 4 ft. in diameter, each body containing a huge brain, and having in front of it a face, with very large dark eyes, a kind of fleshy beak, sixteen slender tentacles, no nostrils, and an oily brown skin. They live by the injection into themselves of the fresh living blood of other creatures, mostly human beings. They rely on highly developed machinery for locomotion, warfare, &c. They devastate England by means of a terrible heat-ray and an asphyxiating gas; but soon fall victims to diseases caused by the bacteria against which they have no power of resistance.

MARTIANUS CAPELLA, or MARCIAN, a N. African writer celebrated in the Middle Ages who lived in the 5th cent. He was author of 'De Nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii' in prose and verse, in nine books, of which the first two deal with the wooing of Philology (in a wide sense) by Mercury, while the last seven are an allegorical encyclopaedia of the arts of the trivium and quadrivium. In one of these he anticipates the doctrine that the planets do not revolve about the earth. Marcian is referred to by Chaucer in the 'Merchant's Tale', ll. 488 et seq., and in the 'House of Fame', l. 985.

Martin, in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.), the ape. His wife is Dame Rukenawe.

Martin, in Dryden's 'The Hind and the Panther' (q.v.), symbolizes the Lutheran party; and in Swift's 'A Tale of a Tub' (q.v.) the Anglican Church, the allusion being to Martin Luther.

Martin, St., bishop of Tours about 371, the patron saint of tavern-keepers. Legend represents him as a Roman soldier who once divided his cloak in two to clothe a beggar. He is commemorated on 11 Nov., known as MARTINMAS or MARTLEMAS, which was formerly the usual time in England for hiring servants and for slaughtering cattle to be salted for winter provision. St. MARTIN'S SUMMER is a period of fine mild weather sometimes occurring about this date.

MARTIN, SIR THEODORE (1816–1909), educated at Edinburgh High School and University, practised as a solicitor at Edinburgh, and migrated to London, in 1846. He contributed, under the pseudonym 'Bon Gaultier' (q.v.), humorous pieces to 'Tait's' and 'Fraser's' magazines, some of which attracted the attention of W. E. Aytoun (q.v.). Martin and Aytoun formed 'a kind of Beaumont and Fletcher partnership' until 1844, and collaborated in the 'Bon Gaultier Ballads' (published 1845), parodying verse of the day. Martin was also a translator of Danish and German dramas, and of Horace. His 'Faust' appeared, Pt. I in 1865, and Pt. II in 1886, and 'Heine's Poems' in 1878. His 'Biography of the Prince Consort' was published in 1875–80; his 'Life of Lord Lyndhurst' in 1883.

Martin Chuzzlewit, The Life and Adventures of, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1843–4.

Martin, the hero, is the grandson of old Martin Chuzzlewit, a wealthy gentleman who has been rendered misanthropical by the greed of the members of his family. The old man has bred up Mary Graham, a young orphan, to tend him, and regards her as his daughter. Young Chuzzlewit is in love with Mary; but the grandfather, distrusting his selfish character, repudiates him and gets him dismissed from his position as pupil to his cousin, Mr. Pecksniff, an architect and an arch-hypocrite. Thrown nearly penniless on the world, young Martin, accompanied by the indomitably cheerful Mark Tapley as his servant, sails for America to try his fortunes. He goes as an architect to the settlement of the Eden Land Corporation, a fraudulent affair, where he loses his money and nearly dies of fever. (This part gave great offence in the United States.) Martin then returns to England, purged by his experiences of his earlier selfishness. Meanwhile his grandfather has established himself and Mary in Pecksniff's household, and pretends to place himself under the latter's direction. By this means he becomes satisfied of Pecksniff's meanness and treachery (Pecksniff tries to inveigle and bully Mary into marrying him), exposes the hypocrite, restores his grandson to favour, and gives him the hand of Mary.

A second plot runs through the book, concerned with the doings of Jonas Chuzzlewit, the son of Anthony, old Martin's brother, a character of almost incredible villainy. He murders his father (in intention if not in fact); marries Mercy, one of Pecksniff's daughters, and treats her with the utmost brutality; murders the director of a bogus insurance company, by whom he has been inveigled and blackmailed; is detected; and finally poisons himself.

Besides the finished portraits of Pecksniff and Mark Tapley, the book contains many pleasant characters: Tom Pinch, Pecksniff's gentle loyal assistant, and his sister Ruth; Charity and Mercy (Cherry and Merry), Pecksniff's daughters; and Mrs. Gamp, the disreputable old nurse; while in 'Todgers's' the author depicts the humours of a London boarding-house.

MARTIN MARPRELATE, the name assumed by the author of a number of anonymous pamphlets (seven are extant) issued in 1588-9 from a secret press, containing attacks in a railing rollicking style on the bishops and defending the Presbyterian system of discipline. They were occasioned by the decree issued in 1586 by Archbishop Whitgift and the Star Chamber, with the object of checking the flow of Puritan pamphlets, requiring the previous approval of the ecclesiastical authorities to every publication.

The importance of the Marprelate tracts lies in the fact that they are the best prose satires of the Elizabethan age. Their titles (in their abbreviated form) are: 'The Epistle', 'The Epitome', 'The Minerrall Conclusions', 'Hay any work for Cooper' (a familiar street-cry with allusion to the name of Thomas Cooper, bishop of Winchester), 'Martin Junior', 'Martin Senior', and 'The Protestation'. They called forth replies from such noted writers as Lyly and Nash, and Gabriel and Richard Harvey were presently involved in the controversy. But the replies show less literary ability than the original tracts.

The suspected authors of these, a Welshman named Penry and a clergyman named Udall, were arrested. The latter died in prison, the former was executed. Their collaborator, Job Throckmorton, probably the real author, denied his complicity at the trial of Penry, and escaped punishment.

MARTINEAU, HARRIET (1802-76), the daughter of a Norwich manufacturer, and sister of J. Martineau (q.v.). She was a Unitarian, and began her literary career as a writer on religious subjects. But she was chiefly successful in stories designed to popularize economic subjects, which show her as an ardent advocate of social reform: 'Illustrations of Political Economy' (1832-4), 'Poor Law and Paupers Illustrated' (1833), and 'Illustrations of Taxation' (1834). She visited America and wrote 'Society in America' (1837) and 'Retrospect of Western Travel' (1838). She published a novel, 'Deerbrook', in 1839; a historical romance, 'The Hour and the Man', in 1841; also a series of stories for young people, 'The Playfellow' (including 'The Settlers at Home' and 'Feats on the Fiord'), in 1841. She was also an active journalist, contributing to the 'Daily News' and 'Edinburgh Review'. Her later writings display anti-theological views. She issued a condensed translation of Comte's 'Philosophie positive' in 1853. Her 'History of the Thirty Years Peace, 1815-45', prejudiced on the Whig side, but otherwise sound, was published in 1849. Miss Martineau wrote an 'Autobiographical Memoir', published posthumously, which contains interesting comments on the great literary figures of her day.

MARTINEAU, JAMES (1805-1900), Unitarian divine and brother of Harriet Martineau (q.v.), was professor of mental and moral philosophy at Manchester New College for many years. His philosophical works, published very late in his life, show a religious and conservatively spiritual attitude and hostility to materialism and naturalism. They include 'Ideal Substitutes for God' (1879), 'Study of Spinoza' (1882), 'Types of Ethical Theory' (1885), 'A Study of Religion' (1888), 'The Seat of Authority in Religion' (1890). Martineau contributed much to the 'National Review', and was joint-editor of the 'Prospective Review' (1845-54).

Martinus Scriblerus, Memoirs of, a satirical work, directed against 'false tastes in learning', initiated by the Scriblerus Club (q.v.), and written mainly if not entirely by Arbuthnot (q.v.). It was printed in the second volume of Pope's prose works in 1741. Martinus is the son of Cornelius, an antiquary of Münster in Germany. His birth, christening, and education are described, all conducted in the light of the teaching of the ancients. He becomes a critic, a physician, and a philosopher, and sets out on travels, the sketch of which corresponds with the travels of Gulliver. The work is incomplete, and we have only the first book of it.

The name 'Martinus Scriblerus' was occasionally used by Pope as a pseudonym; and under it George Crabbe wrote some of his earlier poems.

MARTYN, EDWARD (1859-1924), born in co. Galway, and educated at Beaumont College, Windsor, and Christ Church, Oxford, was one of the founders of the Irish Literary Theatre (see Yeats). He also founded the Palestrina Choir in Dublin for the reform of liturgical music, and was the promotor of various movements for the improvement of education in Ireland. His best-known plays are 'The Heather Field' and 'Maevæ'. He is one of the central figures in G. Moore's (q.v.) 'Hail and Farewell'.

MARTYR, PETER, see Peter Martyr.

MARVELL, ANDREW (1621-78), was born at Winestead near Hull, and educated at Hull Grammar School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He spent four years on the Continent, part of the time at Rome, and in 1650 became tutor to the daughter of Lord Fairfax, at Nun Appleton in Yorkshire. Here he wrote poems in praise of gardens and country life, including 'The Hill and Grove at Billborow' and 'Appleton House'. These tastes are again shown in his well-known poem 'The Garden'. Another poem of this period, 'The Bermudas', is a beautiful song of praise and thanksgiving by a party of exiles on approaching those islands. In 1653 he became tutor to Cromwell's ward, William Dutton, and in 1657 Milton's assistant in the Latin secretaryship to the council. He wrote several poems in the Protector's honour, including the 'Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland' (1650) and the elegy upon his death. He sat in Richard Cromwell's parliament, and after the Restoration wrote political satires and pamphlets, attacking first the ministers, but afterwards Charles II himself. His principal verse satire is the 'Last Instructions to a Painter' (q.v.), on the subject of the Dutch War. The painter is to represent the corruption of the court, the State without a fleet, 'our ships unrigg'd, our forts unmanned', contrasting with the activity of the Dutch. Marvell vigorously defended Milton, and wrote lines in praise of 'Paradise Lost', which were included with the second edition of that poem. From 1660 to 1678 he wrote a series of newsletters to his constituents at Hull, which are of historical importance. The bulk of his poems were not published until 1681, the satires not until 1689, after the revolution.

Marvellous Boy, THE, a name given by Wordsworth to Chatterton (q.v.).

MARX, KARL (1818-83), born in Rhenish Prussia, of Jewish descent, was editor of the 'Rheinische Zeitung' at Cologne in 1842. His extreme radical views led to the suppression of the paper, and Marx went to Paris, where he came into touch with Friedrich Engels and collaborated with him in works of political philosophy. He was expelled from Paris, moved to Brussels, and at the time of the revolutionary movement of 1848 returned to Cologne, where, with Engels, he again conducted a newspaper, the 'Neue Rheinische Zeitung'. His revolutionary and communistic views caused him to be once more expelled, and he finally settled in London. In 1867 appeared the first volume of his treatise 'Das Kapital', in which he propounded his theory of political economy. This was completed by Engels after the death of Marx from his papers. It is a criticism of the capitalistic system under which, according to Marx, a diminishing number of capitalists appropriate the benefits of improved industrial methods, while the labouring class are left in increasing dependency and misery. Marx holds the view that the price of a commodity should be the remuneration of the labour required to produce it, and that it fails to be this because capital exacts a share of the price, while competition among the workers obliges them to accept less than their proper due. The remedy for this state of things Marx finds in the total abolition of private property, to be effected by the class war. When the community has acquired possession of all property and the means of production, it will distribute work to each individual and provide him with the means of sustenance: 'From everyone according to his faculties, to everyone according to his needs'.

Marx was the principal creator of the First International Working Men's Council.

Mary, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Mr. Nupkins's pretty housemaid, who marries Sam Weller.

Mary I, queen of England, 1553-9. She married Philip of Spain in 1554. Tennyson made her the subject of a drama.

Mary II, eldest child of James II, queen of England, 1689-94, and consort of William III, whom she married in 1677. Her little-known 'Memoirs' were edited by R. Doebner in 1886.

Mary Barton, a Tale of Manchester Life, a novel by Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in 1848. It was written soon after, and under the influence of, the death of her infant son.

The background of the story is Manchester in the 'hungry forties' of the last century, a period of acute distress in the industrial districts. John Barton, a steady, thoughtful workman, is one of the sufferers, and various circumstances have rendered him an active and embittered trade unionist. A group of workmen, driven to desperation, decide to kill one of the employers, young Henry Carson, as a warning to the class, and the lot falls on Barton to do the deed. Meanwhile Barton's daughter, Mary, has attracted the admiration of Henry Carson; she has been flattered by his attentions and the hope of a grand marriage, and has repulsed in his favour her lover in her own class, a brave young engineer, Jem Wilson. But she has come to her senses, discovered that her real love is for the latter, and endeavoured to break with Carson. At this moment Carson is shot dead by some person unknown, and circumstances point strongly to Jem Wilson, his rival, as the murderer, while Mary discovers that in fact it is her father who has done the deed. Jem is tried for his life and is saved by Mary's desperate and finally successful efforts to prove his innocence, while not betraying her father. The latter, brought by mental anguish to the verge of death, finally confesses his crime to the fiercely vindictive old father of Henry Carson, and wins his forgiveness as he dies.

The author's emphasis on the lack of sympathy shown by the employers for their workers provoked much criticism as being unjust, but the literary merits of the work were fully recognized.

Mary Celeste, The, an American brig bound from New York to Genoa, picked up in the North Atlantic by a British barque on 5 Dec. 1872, derelict but in perfect condition. The ship's boats were missing and the fate of the crew is unknown; it is one of the unsolved 'mysteries of the sea'.

Mary Magdalene, St., see Magdalen.

Mary Magdalene, Play of, the single surviving English drama of the late ME. period that is based on the legend of a saint (see Miracle Plays). It presents events in the saint's life both before the Resurrection and during her subsequent legendary residence in Provence.

Mary Morison, of Burns's song, was possibly Alison Begbie, an early love of the poet.

Mary Queen of Scots (MARY STUART) (1542-87), daughter of James V of Scotland, married to Francis II of France (1558), to Lord Darnley (1565), and to Bothwell (1567). She was imprisoned by Elizabeth and finally beheaded on a charge of conspiring against the latter's life. She figures in Scott's 'The Abbot' (q.v.), and is the subject of a tragedy by Schiller (q.v.), of a trilogy of plays by Swinburne (q.v.), and of the novel 'The Queen's Quair' (q.v.) by Maurice Hewlett; she also figures in Maurice Baring's 'In My End is My Beginning' (1931).

Maryland, American State, named after Henrietta Maria, queen of Charles I (1632).

Marylebone, a district of London, north of Oxford Street. The old church of St. John's, Tyburn (q.v.), stood in a lonely spot on the Tyburn Road, now Oxford Street, and was in the 15th cent. replaced by the church of St. Mary, nearer Tyburn village. This village thenceforth took the name of St. Mary le Bourne. The greater part of the old manor was acquired by the duke of Newcastle; it passed by marriage to the second earl of Oxford, from whom Oxford Street (q.v.) is named.

Marylebone Cricket Club, THE, better known as the M.C.C., the legislative authority of cricket, came into existence at the end of the 18th cent., when it succeeded the White Conduit Club. It acquired the lease of Lord's ground (q.v.) early in the 19th cent. The pavilion, with many early cricket records, was burnt in 1825.

Marys, THE THREE, AT THE CROSS, were Mary the mother of Jesus, Mary the wife of Cleophas (a disciple), and Mary Magdalene (John xix. 25).

Mas John or MESS JOHN, a term applied jocularly or contemptuously to a Scottish Presbyterian clergyman (shortened from Master John).

Masaniello (TOMMASO ANIELLO), a Neapolitan fisherman, who in 1647 led a revolt of the inhabitants of Naples against their Spanish rulers. He was assassinated after the temporary success of the revolt. He is the subject of an opera by Auber.

Mascarille, a type of clever impudent valet, occurring in three of Molière's comedies, 'L'Étourdi', 'Le Dépit amoureux', and 'Les Précieuses ridicules'. In this last it is he who, in the character of a marquis and in the clothes of his master, makes love to the précieuses, in order to render them ridiculous.

MASEFIELD, JOHN (1878-), ran away to sea early in life (an experience of which there are reminiscences in his narrative poem 'Dauber', 1913), went to America, where he undertook various humble occupations, and on his return to England became a journalist on the staff of the 'Manchester Guardian'. He then settled in London and during the first ten years of this century wrote poems ('Salt-Water Ballads', 1902, containing the well-known 'I must go down to the sea again', 'Ballads and Poems', 1910); collections of short stories ('A Mainsail Haul', 1905; 'A Tarpaulin Muster', 1907); plays ('The Tragedy of Nan', 1909; 'The Tragedy of Pompey the Great', 1910); and essays. In 1911 appeared his remarkable poem 'The Everlasting Mercy', the realistic story of the conversion of the ruffianly Saul Kane, followed by 'The Widow in the Bye Street' (1912), 'The Daffodil Fields' (1913), and 'Reynard the Fox' (1919). His later plays include 'The Faithful' (1915) and 'Good Friday' (1916). Among his other works may be mentioned the novels, 'Captain Margaret' (1908), 'Multitude and Solitude' (1909), 'The Hawbucks' (1929), 'The Bird of Dawning' (1933); the poems, 'Lollington Downs' (1917), and his edition of the 'Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers' (1910); also his nativity play, 'The Coming of Christ' (1928). He was appointed poet laureate in 1930.

Masks or MASQUES, dramatic entertainments, involving dances and disguises, in which the spectacular and musical elements predominated over plot and character. They were acted by amateurs, and were popular at court and among the nobility. They were perhaps of Italian origin, but assumed a distinctive character in England in the 16th and 17th cents. Many of the great dramatic writers, Beaumont, Middleton, Chapman, wrote masques, and they reached their highest degree of elaboration in the hands of Ben Jonson (q.v.), who introduced the 'anti-masque' and an element of Aristophanic comedy. The great architect, Inigo Jones (q.v.), designed the machinery and decorations for some of them. Ben Jonson's 'The Sad Shepherd' (q.v.), Fletcher's 'The Faithful Shepherdess' (q.v.), Randolph's 'Amyn-tas' (q.v.), and Milton's 'Comus' (q.v.), though sometimes described as masques, are strictly pastoral dramas.

MASTER OF BALLANTRAE

MASSINGER, PHILIP (1583–1640), was born at Salisbury, and educated at St. Alban Hall, Oxford. His father had been in the service of the Herbert family, to members of which the poet addressed various dedications and other pieces. He soon became a famous playwright, collaborating frequently with Fletcher, and also with Nathaniel Field and Dekker. He was buried at St. Saviour's, Southwark.

The principal surviving plays entirely written by him are 'The Duke of Milan' (q.v., 1623), 'The Bondman' (1624), 'The Renegado' (1630), 'The Unnatural Combat' (1639), 'The Parliament of Love' (licensed, 1624), 'The Roman Actor' (q.v., 1629), 'The Maid of Honour' (q.v., 1632), 'The Picture' (1630), 'The Emperor of the East' (1632), 'A New Way to pay Old Debts' (q.v., 1633), 'The Great Duke of Florence' (q.v., 1636), 'Believe as you list' ('Stationers' Register', 1653), 'The Guardian' and 'The Bashful Lover' (1655), 'The City Madam' (q.v., 1658). In collaboration with Fletcher he wrote 'The False One', 'The Elder Brother', and 'The Custom of the Country'. Some see his hand also in portions of 'Henry VIII' and of 'Two Noble Kinsmen' (q.v., 1634), in both of which a share is attributed to Shakespeare. In collaboration with Dekker he wrote 'The Virgin Martyr' (q.v., 1622); and with Field 'The Fatal Dowry' (q.v., 1632). His principal field was the romantic drama, of which his best examples are perhaps 'The Duke of Milan', 'The Great Duke of Florence', and 'The Fatal Dowry' (qq.v.). His best-known work is the fine comedy 'A New Way to pay Old Debts' (q.v.). His political views in favour of the popular party, and his religious views in sympathy with the Church of Rome, are freely indicated in his plays; in 'The Bondman' he denounced Buckingham under the guise of Gisco.

MASSON, DAVID (1822–1907), educated at Aberdeen University, was professor of rhetoric and English literature at Edinburgh University, 1865–95. His most important published work was his standard 'Life of Milton' (1859–80). He started 'Macmillan's Magazine' in 1859 and edited it till 1867. His voluminous writings include biographies of Drummond of Hawthornden (1873) and De Quincey (1878), and editions of Milton, Goldsmith, and De Quincey.

'45, disappears after Culloden, and is believed dead. After many adventures the Master returns, with a price on his head, to find that Henry has succeeded to his place and to the woman whom he was to have married. Embittered by misfortune, he enters on a course of persecution, first in Scotland, then America, which finally drives Henry mad, and brings both brothers to an untimely grave.

Master of the Sentences, Peter Lombard (q.v.).

MASTERS, EDGAR LEE (1869–), American poet and novelist. His best-known work is 'The Spoon River Anthology' (1916), a series of confessions and revelations from beyond the grave by the former inhabitants of a Middle Western village.

Matamoro (Spanish, 'slayer of Moors'), the Bobadil of Spanish comedy.

Materialism, in philosophy, the opinion that nothing exists except matter and its movements and modifications; also, in a more limited sense, the opinion that the phenomena of consciousness and will are wholly due to the operation of material agencies.

MATHER, COTTON (1663–1728), Presbyterian divine of Boston, America, a narrow, self-righteous minister and voluminous writer, one of the best-known examples of the tyranny exercised in his time by the Puritan ministers of New England. He was noted for his persecution of reputed witches.

Mathias, the chief character in 'The Bells' (a dramatization of Ware's 'The Polish Jew'), a respected burgomaster haunted by the consciousness of a murder that he has committed; one of Sir H. Irving's most successful parts.

MATHIAS, THOMAS JAMES (1754?–1835), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, became librarian at Buckingham Palace. In 1794 he published his 'Pursuits of Literature', a vigorous satire on contemporary authors, which went through sixteen editions and provoked many replies.

Irish Boy in 1808, and 'The Milesian Chief' in 1811. In 1816 his tragedy 'Bertram' was produced by Kean at Drury Lane, on the recommendation of Scott and Byron, with great success. He then returned to novels, publishing 'Women, or Pour et Contre' (a powerful story, turning on the rivalry of a mother and daughter for the love of the same man) in 1818, and his masterpiece, 'Melmoth the Wanderer' (q.v.), in 1820. His last novel, 'The Albigenses', was published in 1824. Maturin's other tragedies, 'Manuel' (1817) and 'Fredolfo' (1819), were failures.

Maud, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1855.

The poem is a monodrama in sections of different metres, in which the narrator, a man of morbid and unbalanced temperament, gives voice to his feelings at various stages of the story: first lamenting the mysterious death of his father, and his family's ruin by the contrivance of the old lord of the Hall; then expressing the gradual development of his love for Maud, the old lord's daughter, in spite of the scorn of her brother and the rivalry of a 'new-made lord', 'first of his noble line'; his triumph at winning the love of Maud; the fatal encounter with the brother; his own flight abroad and the madness that follows the blighting of his hopes; and his final reawakening to life in the service of his country. The poem contains several of Tennyson's best love-lyrics ('I have led her home', 'Come into the garden, Maud', &c.); but some of the opinions expressed or implied in it, notably the approval of war in certain circumstances, were distasteful to many.

MAUGHAM, WILLIAM SOMERSET (1874–), author, among whose chief works are: 'Liza of Lambeth' (1897), 'Of Human Bondage' (1915), 'The Moon and Sixpence' (1919), 'Cakes and Ale' (1930), all novels; 'A Man of Honour' (1904), 'Lady Frederick' (1907), 'Home and Beauty' (1909), 'Our Betters' (1923), 'The Circle' (1921), 'East of Suez' (1923), plays; 'On a Chinese Screen' (1923), 'The Trembling of a Leaf' (1921), 'Ashenden' (1928), short stories. Several of his short stories have been dramatized.

Maugis, a hero of the Charlemagne romances, the French equivalent of Malagigi (q.v.), a wizard who aids the emperor's cause.

Maugrabin, HAYRADDIN, a character in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.). Maugrabin is an Arabic word meaning 'man of the West', an African Moor.

Maul, in Pt. II of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), a giant slain by Mr. Greatheart.

or other eminent persons, or ecclesiastics, on the Thursday before Easter, and commonly followed by the distribution of clothing, food, or money. It was instituted in commemoration of Christ's washing the Apostles' feet at the Last Supper.

MAUPASSANT, GUY DE (1850-93), French novelist of the naturalistic school, a master of the short story, and a disciple of Gustave Flaubert (q.v.). His most remarkable work is the short story 'Boule de Suif', an audacious tale of an episode in the Franco-German war. His 'Une Vie' (1883), 'Bel Ami' (1885), 'Pierre et Jean' (1888) are notable works, marred by a certain morbidity.

Mauretania, in ancient geography, the western part of North Africa, having Numidia on the east and Gaetulia on the south; the country of the Mauri or Moors. It became a Roman province in A.D. 40.

MAURICE, JOHN FREDERICK DENISON (1805-72), the son of a Unitarian minister, and educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He took orders in the Church of England and felt himself called to the pursuit of religious unity. The basis of his theological belief was the infinite love of God for all his creatures, and he attacked any theological doctrines that appeared to him to conflict with this. He declared himself a Christian socialist, believing that 'a true socialism is the necessary result of a sound Christianity'. He was chaplain at Guy's Hospital, London, 1836-46, and subsequently held other incumbencies. He was professor of English literature and history at King's College, London, 1840-53, and was dismissed in the latter year because of his unorthodoxy on the subject of Eternal Punishment. He was appointed professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge in 1866. His religious views are principally contained in his 'The Religions of the World' (1847) and 'Theological Essays' (1853). A treatise by him on 'Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy', in the main an historical account of early thought, appeared in 1847 in the 'Encyclopaedia Metropolitana'. One of his most popular works, 'The Kingdom of Christ', a plea for religious unity, appeared in 1838. Tennyson's lyric to him is well known.

Maurists, a congregation of French Benedictine monks, named after St. Maurus, the legendary founder of the Benedictine rule in France. The Maurist congregation was established in 1618 with a view to the reform of the Benedictine order. But it became famous for the learning and literary industry of its members even more than for their monastic zeal. Under the impulse of its first superior-general, Dom Taisse, it carried out an immense amount of historical and critical work, in connexion with patristic and biblical literature, monastic and ecclesiastical history, collections of documents, palaeography, and other branches of technical erudition. Its chief house was at St. Germain-des-Prés near Paris.

MAX MÜLLER, FRIEDRICH (1823-1900), son of the German poet Wilhelm Müller, was born at Dessau and educated at Leipzig. He was naturalized a British subject under the name of Frederick Max-Müller. He came to England in 1846 and was commissioned by the directors of the East India Company to bring out an edition of the Sanskrit 'Rigveda' (see Veda), which was published in 1849-73. He settled at Oxford in 1848 and was Taylorian professor of modern European languages from 1854 to 1868, and one of the curators of the Bodleian Library, 1856-63 and 1881-94. Max Müller delivered two remarkable courses of lectures on 'The Science of Languages' at the Royal Institution in 1861-4, and was professor of comparative philology at Oxford from 1868 till his death, though he retired from the active duties of the chair in 1875. He devoted much attention to comparative mythology and the comparative study of religions. He edited, from 1875, the 'Sacred Books of the East', a series of English translations of the oriental religious classics. A collected edition of Max Müller's essays, entitled 'Chips from a German Work-shop', appeared in 1867-75. A full edition of his works, which dealt with the great variety of subjects indicated above, and others, began to appear in 1898.

MAXWELL, JAMES CLERK-, see Clerk-Maxwell.

MAY, THOMAS (1595-1650), educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, adopted the parliamentary cause and was secretary for the parliament (1646). He was author of two narrative poems on the reigns of Edward III and Henry II, and of a 'History of the Long Parliament' (1647). He also wrote translations of the 'Georgics' and of Lucan's 'Pharsalia' (which were praised by Ben Jonson), two comedies, 'The Heir' and 'The Old Couple' (c. 1620), and tragedies on classical subjects ('Antigone'; 'Cleopatra', 1626; 'Julia Agripina', 1628). Marvell speaks of his 'most servile wit and mercenary pen'.

MAY

MAY, SIR THOMAS ERSKINE, first Baron Farnborough (1815-86), clerk of the House of Commons, 1871-86, was author of the standard work, 'The Rules, Orders and Proceedings of the House of Commons' (1854), and of 'The Constitutional History of England since the accession of George III' (1861-3), a continuation of Hallam's treatise.

Maya, the name of an ancient race of Mexican and Central American Indians, noted for their architecture, stone-carving, pottery, and textiles. A feature of their architecture was the stepped pyramidal mound; the arch was unknown to them. The Maya had pictographic records of their history. Their art, which is of uncertain date, came to an end with the Spanish conquest.

May Day, the 1st of May, celebrated with garlands and dancing, the choice of a queen of the May (gaily dressed and crowned with flowers), the erection of a Maypole (painted with spiral stripes and decked with flowers) to dance round, and so forth. Perhaps derived from the Roman Floralia. The MAY-GAME was a set performance in the May-day festivities, in which Robin Hood and Maid Marian figured. May Day was adopted in 1889 as the international Labour holiday.

Mayfair, a district north of Piccadilly, London, so called from an annual fair held there in the month of May from Stuart times until the reign of George III (temporarily suppressed in 1708). Mayfair was, from about 1800 to 1914, the 'smart' quarter of London. It has now lost its exclusive character, and business premises are to be seen in its greatest squares.

Mayflower, The, the ship in which the Pilgrim Fathers sailed from Leyden in 1620 to Cape Cod, Massachusetts, where they founded New Plymouth.

May-game, see May Day.

Maylle, MRS. and HARRY, characters in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

Mayor of Casterbridge, The, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1886.

Michael Henchard, a hay-tresser, when drunk at a fair, sells his wife and child for five guineas to a sailor, Newson. Returning to his senses he takes a solemn vow not to touch intoxicants for twenty years. By his energy he becomes rich, respected, and the mayor of Casterbridge (Dorchester). After eighteen years his wife returns, Newson being then supposed dead, and is reunited to her husband; she brings with her her daughter, Elizabeth-Jane, and Henchard is led to believe that Elizabeth-Jane is his child, whereas she is Newson's. Trouble soon comes, owing to the wrong-headedness of Henchard. He quarrels with his capable assistant in his corn business, Donald Farfrae. Mrs. Henchard dies, and Henchard learns the truth about the girl. Farfrae becomes Henchard's successful rival in business and in love and marries the woman that Henchard had hoped to win. Henchard is ruined, the story of the sale of his wife is revealed, and he takes to drink. His stepdaughter is his only comfort, and Newson returns and claims her. Henchard becomes lonelier and more desolate, and dies wretchedly in a hut on Egdon Heath.

Mayor of Garratt, see Garratt.

Mayor of London, LORD: the first mayor of London on record is Henry FitzAylwin (1189), the appointment replacing that of sheriff or portreeve, whom Henry I had allowed the citizens to elect. But the mayor was still occasionally appointed by the king, for instance Richard Whittington by Richard II. The title of 'Lord Mayor' became current in Richard III's reign [Loftie].

Mayor of the Palace, the title borne by the steward of the royal household and principal political agent of the Merovingian (q.v.) kings of France. The mayors of the palace gradually became the real rulers of the country, and finally, in the person of Pepin the Short, ascended the throne.

Maypole in the Strand, THE, stood near the present church of St. Mary le Strand. Aubrey says that at the restoration maypoles were set up at every crossway, 'the most prodigious one for height' 'at the Strand near Drury Lane'. It was broken by a high wind in 1672. Strype says it was taken down and removed to Wansted in Essex, where it served the Rev. Mr. Pound for raising a telescope.

Mazarin, JULES (1602-61), of an ancient Sicilian family, was sent as papal legate to Paris in 1634, attracted the notice of Richelieu, entered the French service, and was made a cardinal in 1641. He succeeded Richelieu as prime minister, was retained in that office by the queen regent (Anne of Austria) on the death of Louis XIII, and governed France during the minority of Louis XIV. His internal administration provoked the civil wars of the Fronde (q.v.). He founded a splendid library in Paris, the Bibliothèque Mazarine.

Mazarin Bible, THE, the first printed bible, and the first important book to be printed with movable type. It was printed not later than 1456, and is generally attributed to Gutenberg (q.v.)—whence it is often spoken of as the Gutenberg Bible—or to his successors, Fust (q.v.) and Schöffer. It is called the 'Mazarin Bible' because the first known copy was discovered in the Mazarine Library (see preceding entry) in Paris. It is also known as the 'forty-two line Bible' from the number of lines it contains to the column.

Mazeppa, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1819.

The poem is founded on a passage in Voltaire's 'Charles XII'. Ivan Stepanovitch Mazeppa, a Polish nobleman, born about 1645, became in later life hetman (military commander) of the Eastern Ukraine. He abandoned his allegiance to Peter the Great and fought on the side of Charles XII of Sweden at the battle of Pultowa (1709). While the king and his band rest under an oak after their defeat, Mazeppa tells a tale of his early life, when he was a page to Casimir V, king of Poland. Being detected in an intrigue with the wife of a local magnate, he had been bound naked on the back of a wild horse of the Ukraine, which was then loosed and lashed into madness. The horse galloped off, through forest and river, carrying his torn and fainting rider, never stopping till he reached the plains of the Ukraine, where he fell dead. Mazeppa, himself at the point of death, was rescued by peasants.

Mazzini, GIUSEPPE (1805?-72), Italian patriot and revolutionary agitator, born at Genoa, was imprisoned in 1830 on a charge of political conspiracy, and subsequently resided in France and later in London, where he actively plotted for the liberation of Italy and its union under a republican government. He returned to Rome during the revolutionary movement in 1848, but was once more driven into exile. He fomented risings in Italian cities, but his activities impeded rather than assisted the policy of Cavour (q.v.) and contributed little directly to the liberation. Mazzini remained a republican and refused allegiance to Victor Emmanuel.

M.B. Waistcoat, THE: '[the undivided clerical waistcoat] was deemed so distinctly Popish, that it acquired the nickname of 'The Mark of the Beast' and . . . among the tailors . . . was familiarly known as "the M.B. waistcoat"' (W. E. Gladstone in 'Contemporary Review', Oct. 1874).

Meagles, MR., MRS., and their daughter PET, characters in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

Meal-tub Plot, THE, the pretended conspiracy of the duke of Monmouth in 1679, the papers of which were said to be kept in a meal-tub.

Meander, see Maeander.

Measure for Measure, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably first acted in 1604, but not printed till the folio of 1623. The plot is taken from Cinthio (translated by Whetstone).

The duke of Vienna, on the pretext of a journey to Poland, hands over the government to Angelo, that he may escape the odium of enforcing laws against unchastity that have long been disregarded. Angelo at once sentences to death Claudio as guilty of seduction. Claudio sends word of his position to his sister Isabella, a novice, and begs her to intercede with Angelo. Isabella's prayers fail to win her brother's pardon, but her beauty awakens Angelo's passion, and, at a second interview, he offers her her brother's life if she will sacrifice to him her honour. Isabella indignantly refuses; and there follows the famous scene in the prison, when Isabella tells her brother of Angelo's offer, and he, momentarily weakening, pleads with her for his life. Meanwhile the duke, who has not left Vienna, but assumed the disguise of a friar, and thus learnt the infamous conduct of Angelo, contrives the saving of Claudio as follows. He bids Isabella consent to go to Angelo's house at midnight, and obtains that Mariana, who had been betrothed to Angelo and loves him, but had been cast off by him, shall go there in Isabella's place. The ruse is successful; but none the less Angelo orders Claudio's execution at dawn. The provost of the prison disobeys. The duke, laying aside his friar's robes and simulating an unexpected return to Vienna, hears the complaint of Isabella and the suit of Mariana, and confutes Angelo, who denies their stories. Angelo is pardoned at the instance of Mariana and Isabella, and married to the former; and the duke reveals his love for Isabella. The play contains the beautiful song, 'Take, O take those lips away'.

Medal, The, a satirical poem by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1682.

The grand jury of Middlesex having thrown out the bill for high treason against the earl of Shaftesbury in 1681, the triumph of the Whigs was celebrated by the striking of a medal with the legend 'Laetamur'. Thereupon Dryden wrote this poem. It is a bitter attack on Shaftesbury, but contains none of the scurrilities to be found in 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.). Instead it ridicules the policy of demagogic appeal to the people. It was prefaced by a prose 'Epistle to the Whigs'.

These attacks called forth a number of replies, including the 'Medal of John Bayes' by Shadwell (q.v.) and 'The Medal Revers'd' by Samuel Pordage.

Medea, in Greek mythology, a magician, daughter of Aeëtes, king of Colchis. When Jason (q.v.) came to Colchis in quest of the golden fleece, he and Medea fell in love. After Jason had with her help overcome all the difficulties placed by Aeëtes in his way, Jason and Medea embarked to return to Greece; and to delay the pursuit of her father, Medea tore to pieces her brother Absyrtus and left his mangled limbs on the way that Aeëtes would pass. On their arrival at Iolcos, Medea restored Jason's father Aeson to youth by boiling him in a cauldron with magic herbs. The daughters of Pelias, king of Iolcos, were also desirous to see their father rejuvenated, and encouraged by Medea, who wished to revenge the injuries that her husband's family had suffered from Pelias, they killed Pelias and boiled his flesh in a cauldron; but Medea refused to restore him. Driven in consequence from Iolcos, Jason and Medea fled to Corinth, where Jason deserted her for Glauce, the daughter of the king. Medea avenged herself by killing the two children she had had by Jason and destroying Glauce. She then married Aegeus, the father of Theseus, plotted to poison the latter for fear of his influence, and finally escaped to Asia. One of the tragedies of Euripides has Medea for its subject.

Medes, THE, the earliest Iranian inhabitants of Persia. The Law of the Medes and Persians is proverbially immutable (Dan. vi. 8).

Medici, THE, the family that were rulers of Florence from 1434 and grand dukes of Tuscany from 1569 to 1737. The earlier Medici were great patrons of art and literature, chief among them Cosimo (1389-1464) and Lorenzo 'The Magnificent' (c. 1449-92), founders of the Medicean or Laurentian Library (q.v.). The latter, himself a poet, was father of Pope Leo X (q.v.). Clement VII also belonged to this family. Catherine de Médicis (as she is known in France, 1519-89), daughter of the grandson of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was consort of Henry II of France, and regent during the minority of Charles IX. Marie de Médicis (1573-1642), niece of the grand duke of Tuscany, was consort of Henry IV of France from 1600, and regent 1610-17.

Medina, in Arabia, the second great city of the Moslems, to which Mohammed went at the Flight or Hegira (q.v.), and where he died and was buried.

Medina, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. ii, represents the golden mean, her sisters Elissa and Perissa representing the extremes of sensibility.

Mediolanum, in imprints, Milan.

Medmenham Abbey, a ruined Cistercian abbey on the bank of the Thames near Marlow, rebuilt as a residence and notorious in the 18th cent. as the meeting-place of a convivial club known as the Franciscans or the Hellfire Club. This was founded by Sir Francis Dashwood, and Wilkes and Bubb Dodington were among its members. Its motto 'Fay ce que voudras' was adopted from that of Rabelais's Abbey of Thelema. There is a good deal about it in Johnstone's 'Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea' (III. ii, chs. 17 et seq.).

Médoc, see Claret.

Medora, a character in Byron's 'The Corsair' (q.v.).

Medoro, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), a young Moor of humble birth, with whom Angelica (q.v.) falls in love and whom she marries, thereby causing the despair and madness of Orlando.

Medusa, one of the three Gorgons (q.v.), and the only one that was mortal. According to Ovid, she incurred the resentment of Athene by granting her favours to Poseidon in the temple of the goddess, who changed the locks that Poseidon admired into serpents. For her

MEDWALL, HENRY, see Fulgens and Lucrece.

Meg Dods, in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.), the landlady of the old inn at St. Ronan's.

Meg Merrilies, the old gipsy woman in Scott's 'Guy Mannering' (q.v.). She is the subject of a poem by Keats, 'Old Meg she was a gipsy'.

Meg Murdockson, a character in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.).

Meg of Westminster, LONG, the subject of ballads and pamphlets that appeared in 1582, 1590, and 1594, and referred to in Middleton and Dekker's 'Roaring Girl' (q.v.), and by Nash, Harvey, and other authors of the period. Her biography appeared in 1635. She was a Lancashire girl who came to London, served in an alehouse, included among her acquaintance Will Sommers, Henry VIII's fool, and Skelton, assumed man's clothes and went to the wars, married a soldier and set up a public house at Islington.

Megæra, one of the Furies (q.v.).

Megaric, the name of a school of philosophy founded about 400 B.C. by Eucleides of Megara, a disciple of Socrates, noted for its study of dialectics and its invention of logical fallacies or puzzles (Jebb).

Megatherium, THE, a club mentioned in several of Thackeray's novels, e.g. 'The Newcomes' (v), 'Philip' (v, ix), &c.

Mein Kampf, see Hitler.

MEINHOLD, JOHANN WILHELM (1797-1851), German theologian and writer, a pastor in various parishes of Pomerania, author of 'Maria Schweidler die Bernsteinhexe' (1843), translated into English by Lady Duff Gordon as 'The Amber Witch'; and of 'Sidonia von Bork, die Klosterhexe', translated into English by Lady Wilde as 'Sidonia the Sorceress'.

Meiosis, an under-statement, sometimes ironical or humorous and intended to emphasize the size, importance, &c., of what is belittled. Except in litotes (q.v.), which is a form of meiosis, the use of meiosis is chiefly colloquial; e.g. the use of 'rather' as a strong affirmative, 'I should rather think so'.

Meissonier, JEAN LOUIS ERNEST (1815-91), a celebrated French painter of genre, military, and historical pictures.

Meistersinger, a title taken in the 15th cent. by certain professional German poets of high skill and culture, to distinguish themselves from the wandering gleemen. They were often craftsmen in their ordinary avocations—smiths, weavers, and the like. They represent a phase of the development of German verse from the minnesang (see Minnesingers). The Meistersang and singer were governed by an elaborate set of rules and organization, which are depicted in Wagner's opera on the subject, 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg', produced in 1868.

Mekhitarists, a congregation of Armenian monks of the Roman Catholic Church, originally founded at Constantinople in 1701 by Mekhitar, an Armenian, and by him finally established in 1717 in the island of San Lazzaro, south of Venice. They have devoted themselves to literary work and published ancient manuscripts relating to the Armenians.

Mel, THE GREAT, see Evan Harrington.

Melampus, the son of Amythaon, was regarded by the ancients as the first mortal to receive prophetic powers and to practise medicine, and as the founder of the worship of Dionysus in Greece. He took care of some young serpents whose parents had been killed by his servants, and these one day licked his ears as he was sleeping. On awakening he found that he understood the language of birds and could predict the future. His brother Bias sought the hand of Pero, daughter of Neleus, but the latter would give her only to the man who brought him the oxen of Iphiclus. Melampus obtained them for Bias, by the services he rendered to Iphiclus through his prophetic powers. He cured the women of Argos of an epidemic of frenzy, and obtained in consequence a share of that kingdom.

Melampus is the subject of a poem by G. Meredith (q.v.).

Melanchthon, the grecized name of PHILIP SCHWARTZERD (1497-1560), German humanist who was professor of Greek at Wittenberg University; one of the principal advocates of the Reformation.

Melantius, a character in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'The Maid's Tragedy' (q.v.).

Melba, DAME NELLIE, the great singer, whose original name was Helen Porter Mitchell (1859-1931), was born near Melbourne of Scottish parents settled in Australia. Her first appearance on the operatic stage took place in 1887 at Brussels in the part of Gilda in 'Rigoletto'. In England she first appeared in 1888 in 'Lucia di Lammermoor'. The wonderful purity of her voice and her engaging personality won her immense fame and popularity.

Melbury, GRACE, a character in Thomas Hardy's 'The Woodlanders' (q.v.).

Melchior, one of the three Magi (q.v.) or 'Wise men of the East'. He is represented as a king of Nubia.

Melchizedek, in Gen. xiv. 18, king of Salem and the priest of the most high God, who blessed Abraham and to whom Abraham gave tithes of all. He is sometimes quoted as the type of self-originating power, with reference to the words concerning him in Heb. vii. 3-4: 'Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life. . . . Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave a tenth of the spoils.'

Mélēāger, son of Oenēus, king of Calydon, and Althaea. The Parcae were present at his birth: Clotho said that he would be courageous, Lachesis that he would be strong, Atropos that he would live as long as the brand that was on the fire was not consumed. Althaea snatched the brand from the fire and kept it with jealous care. Meleager took part in the expedition of the Argonauts (q.v.) and subsequently in the hunt of the Calydonian boar that was ravaging his father's country. He slew the boar and gave the head to Atalanta (q.v.), who had first wounded it. This partiality angered the brothers of Althaea and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the prize. Meleager defended her and slew his uncles. As Althaea was going to the temple to give thanks for her son's victory over the boar, she learnt that he had killed her brothers, and in the moment of resentment threw into the fire the fatal brand, and as soon as it was consumed Meleager died.

Melesigēnēs, an ancient epithet of Homer, indicating that he was born near the Meles, the name of a stream that flowed through Smyrna, and bearing out the view that connects him with that city.

Meliadus, see Melioidas.

Meliagraunce, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (xix. ii), the knight who captures Queen Guinevere and carries her off to his castle. He is perhaps to be identified with Melwas, a god of the darkness in British mythology (Rhys, 'Arthurian Legend').

Mellan Dialogue, THE, in Thucydides, v. 84 et seq., the discussion between the Athenian envoys and the magistrates of Melos, an island colonized by the Lacedaemonians which had refused to surrender to Athens and which consequently the Athenians were proposing to subdue (416 B.C.). It is an exposition of the realpolitik and jingoism of Athens.

Melincourt, or Sir Oran Haut-ton, a novel by Peacock (q.v.), published in 1817.

The plot is, as usual in Peacock's novels, slight and unimportant, and is concerned with the attempts of various suitors to win the hand of the rich Anthelia Melincourt, attempts which bring together the usual collection of odd characters and give occasion for much discussion of slavery in the West Indies, rotten boroughs, the Lake poets, &c. A prominent feature in the story is Sir Oran Haut-ton (see under Monboddoo, Lord), an orang-outang whom Mr. Sylvan Forester, a rich young philosopher, has educated to everything except speech, and for whom he has bought a baronetcy and a seat in parliament. He is an amiable and chivalrous gentleman, and plays delightfully on the flute. The book includes a virulent and unjustified attack on Southey (Mr. Feathernest), while Gifford (Mr. Vamp), Coleridge (Mr. Mystic), and Wordsworth (Mr. Paperstamp) come in for a share of the author's satire. Mr. Simon Sarcastic appears to represent the author himself. The book contains long discussions on social and economic questions between Mr. Forester and Mr. Fax (in whom some have seen a caricature of Malthus).

Meliadas or MELIADUS, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (q.v.), king of Lyonesse and father of Tristram.

Melisande or MELISINDA, a name sometimes apparently confused with Melusina (q.v.). The historical Melisinda was daughter of Baldwin II, king of Jerusalem, and wife of Fulk, who succeeded him. In Spanish romance, Melisenda or Melisendra is the daughter of Charlemagne (see under Gayferos). 'Pelléas et Mélisande' is one of the earlier plays of Maeterlinck (q.v.).

Melisendra, see preceding entry.

Melissa, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), the beneficent witch who releases Rogero from the power of Alcina (q.v.).

Mēlita, the ancient name of Malta.

Mell, Mr., in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the poor usher at Creakle's school.

Mellefont, a character in Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.).

Mellifluous Doctor, THE, St. Bernard.

Melmoth the Wanderer, a novel by Maturin (q.v.), published in 1820.

This is one of the most powerful of the tales of mystery and terror of which a number were produced in the early part of the 19th cent. The theme is the sale of a soul to the devil in return for prolonged life, the bargain being transferable if anyone else can be persuaded to take it over. The original transaction in the story took place in the 17th cent., and Melmoth the Wanderer is still alive. The novel is a succession of different tales, the chief character in each of which, at the climax of his or her sufferings, is offered by Melmoth relief from distress on the condition indicated. But they all—Stanton imprisoned in a lunatic's cell, Monçada in the grip of the Inquisition, Walberg, who sees his children perishing from hunger, Elinor Mortimer, and Isidora, Melmoth's wife—reject the proposed compact.

About 1898 Oscar Wilde (q.v.) adopted the name Sebastian Melmoth—Melmoth from the romance of Maturin, a connexion of his mother, Lady Wilde; Sebastian suggested by the arrows on his prison dress. He had contributed some information to the 1892 edition of 'Melmoth the Wanderer'.

MEMNON

Melnotte, CLAUDE, a character in Bulwer Lytton's 'The Lady of Lyons' (q.v.).

Melodrama, in early 19th-cent. use, a stage play (usually romantic and sensational in plot and incident) in which songs and music were interspersed. In later use the musical element gradually ceased to be an essential feature, and the name now denotes a dramatic piece characterized by sensational incident and violent appeals to the emotions, but with a happy ending. [OED.]

Melpōmēnē, the Muse (q.v.) of tragedy.

Melton Mowbray, in Leicestershire, the centre of a celebrated hunting district, and famous for its pies.

Melusina, a fairy of French folk-lore, the water-sprite of the fountain of Lusignan in Poitou, and the legendary ancestress and tutelary spirit of the house of that name. She consented to marry Raymond of Poitiers on condition that he should never see her on a Saturday, on which day she reverted to her mermaid-like condition. Her husband broke the compact, whereupon she fled. She was supposed to give warning by shrieks when misfortune menaced a member of the family. The story was written by Jean d'Arras in his 'Chronique de la Princesse' (c. 1387), translated by A. K. Donald for the E.E.T.S. It resembles in certain features those of Undine and Lohengrin (qq.v.) and the legend of the Banshee. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') traces the origin of Melusina to the oriental goddess Mylitta.

Melvil, SIR JOHN, a character in Colman and Garrick's 'The Clandestine Marriage' (q.v.).

MELVILLE, HERMAN (1819–91), born in New York City, shipped as a cabin-boy to Liverpool (see Redburn) in 1839. In 1841 he sailed round Cape Horn in the whaler 'Acushnet', and the following year, owing to harsh treatment by the captain, left the ship with a comrade at Nuku Hiva in the Marquesas. The fugitives intended to go to the friendly Happar tribe, but instead found themselves in the adjoining valley of the cannibal Typees. Here they were held in captivity for a month and finally rescued. The record of this adventure is contained in Melville's romance 'Typee, a Peep at Polynesian Life' (1846). Melville's other best-known works are 'Omoo, a narrative of Adventures in the South Seas' (q.v., 1847), 'Mardi, and a Voyage Thither' (a philosophical romance, 1849), and, above all, 'Moby Dick' (q.v., 1851). Another work by Melville that has attracted attention is his 'Pierre, or, The Ambiguities' (q.v., 1852).

Memling, HANS (d. 1495), a celebrated Flemish painter. His most famous work is the 'Reliquary of St. Ursula' in the Hospital of St. John at Bruges.

Memnon, the son of Tithonus (q.v.) and Eös (Aurora). He is referred to in the 'Odyssey' as the handsomest of mortals. In the post-Homeric legends he was a prince of the Ethiopians who came to the Trojan War in support of his uncle Priam and was slain by Achilles. According to tradition, a colossal statue near Thebes (in reality that of Amenophis) was supposed to represent Memnon. It gave forth a musical note when struck by the rays of the rising sun, explained in modern times as due to currents of air created in the fissures of the statue by the change of temperature. The reference in Milton's 'Il Penseroso' to 'Prince Memnon's sister' is obscure; there is a reference to such a character in the History of the Trojan War of Dictys Cretensis.

MEMNON

Memoirs of a Cavalier, a historical romance attributed with good reason to Defoe (q.v.), published in 1724.

The pretended author, 'Col. Andrew Newport', a young English gentleman born in 1608, travels on the Continent, starting in 1630, goes to Vienna and accompanies the army of the emperor, being present at the siege and sack of Magdeburg, which is vividly presented. He then joins the army of Gustavus Adolphus, remaining with it until the death of that king, and taking part in a number of engagements which he describes in detail. After his return to England he joins the king's army, first against the Scots, then against the forces of parliament, being present at the battle of Edgehill, which he fully describes, the relief of York, and the battle of Naseby.

Memoirs of Captain Carleton, a narrative published in 1728, whose authorship has been contested, and attributed by some to Defoe (q.v.), by others to Swift (q.v.). Captain Carleton, who unquestionably existed, is the subject of an attractive story of soldierly adventure.

Carleton volunteers on board the 'London' on the declaration of war with the Dutch in 1672. In 1674 he enters the service of the Prince of Orange, remaining there until the peace of Nimwegen. Returning to England, he receives a commission from James II and serves in Scotland, and then in Flanders until the peace of Ryswick. The most interesting part of the memoirs follows. Carleton embarks with Lord Peterborough for Spain in 1705, and gives a stirring narrative of the siege and capture, and subsequent relief, of Barcelona, and of the campaign by which Peterborough, with scanty resources, temporarily placed the Archduke Charles on the throne of Spain. This is followed by some account of various parts of Spain visited by the author as a prisoner of war.

Memoirs of Several Ladies of Great Britain, see Amory.

Men and Women, a collection of poems by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1855. These were redistributed in the collection of 1868, and only thirteen (most of them dramatic monologues) of the original fifty pieces were retained under the heading of 'Men and

MENDOZA CODEX

Women'. The original issue contained many of Browning's finest love-poems, e.g. 'Love among the Ruins', 'A Woman's Last Word', 'Any Wife to Any Husband', and 'One Word More'. It also included 'Bishop Blougram's Apology' (q.v.), 'Fra Lippo Lippi' (q.v.), 'Cleon', and 'Andrea del Sarto' (q.v.).

Menaechmi, a celebrated comedy by Plautus (q.v.), turning on the mistakes that result from the resemblance of twin brothers. It probably suggested Shakespeare's 'Comedy of Errors'.

MÉNAGE, GILLES DE (1613-92), French philologist, author of the four volumes of 'Menagiana', containing some interesting literary anecdotes. He was a member of the circle of the Hôtel de Rambouillet (q.v.).

MENANDER (c. 342-292 B.C.), an Athenian poet, the most distinguished of the new school of comedy. He was drowned while swimming in the harbour of Piraeus. His plays, of which portions survive, presenting the life of contemporary Athens, were largely adapted by Plautus and Terence (qq.v.).

Menaphon, a prose romance, with interludes of verse, written by Greene (q.v.) and published in 1589; it was reprinted as 'Greene's Arcadia' in 1599. It tells the adventures of the Princess Sephestia, shipwrecked on the coast of Arcadia, where the shepherd Menaphon falls in love with her; and of her restoration to her husband and son. Among other pleasant lyrics, it contains the charming cradle-song, 'Weepe not, my wanton, smile upon my knee'.

MENCKEN, HENRY LEWIS (1880-), American journalist, born at Baltimore. He is known as a satirist of the 'cruder' manifestations of American civilization, and as a writer holding strong views about European 'patronage' of America. His chief works are: 'George Bernard Shaw—His Plays' (1905), 'In Defense of Women' (1918), 'Prejudices', 1st Series (1919), 2nd Series (1920), 3rd Series (1922), 4th Series (1924), 5th Series (1926), 6th Series (1927), 'Notes on Democracy' (1926). See also Nathan (G. J.).

Mendelism, the law or theory of heredity worked out by Gregor Johann Mendel (1822-84), abbot of Brunn, from his experiments on field and garden peas.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, FELIX (1809-47) the composer, was born at Hamburg, the son of a Jewish banker, and the grandson of a philosopher. Besides being a composer he was an eminent pianist, organist, and conductor. His works include oratorios and cantatas, the music to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' and other dramas, four symphonies, a quantity of chamber and pianoforte music, &c.

Mendoza Codex, an Aztec manuscript setting forth in pictures the history of the Mexican people from 1324 to 1502, with a description of the customs of the country. An explanation in the Mexican language is added and a translation into Spanish. It was obtained by the Spanish Governor of Mexico, Mendoza, and sent to Charles V, but was captured by a French man-of-war, together with the ship that carried it. Hakluyt bought it from André Thevet, the French king's geographer, and it passed to Purchas, who published it in the 'Pilgrimages' (iii. 1066 of the folio). The manuscript is now in the Bodleian.

Mênélâus, king of Sparta, son of Atreus (q.v.), and brother of Agamemnon (q.v.). He was the successful suitor of Helen (q.v.), but was robbed of her by Paris, the son of Priam. Thereupon he assembled the princes who had been suitors of Helen and had bound themselves to defend her, and the expedition against Troy was undertaken. During the war Menelaus behaved with spirit and would have slain Paris but for the interposition of Venus to protect her favourite. After the fall of Troy he was reunited to Helen.

Ménippée, Satire, see Satire Ménippée.

Menteith, EARL OF, a character in Scott's 'Legend of Montrose' (q.v.).

Mentor, a faithful friend of Ulysses, whose form Athene assumes when she accompanies Telemachus (q.v.) as guide and adviser in his search for his father. Hence 'a mentor' is frequently used for 'an adviser'.

Mephistopheles, a word of unknown origin, which appears first in the German 'Faustbuch' of 1587 as 'Mephostophiles'. It is the name of the evil spirit to whom Faust (q.v.) was said in the German legend to have sold his soul. Shakespeare in 'The Merry Wives' (I. i) mentions 'Mephostophilus'.

Mercantile System, DOCTRINE, or THEORY, a term used by Adam Smith (q.v.) and later political economists for the system of economic doctrine and legislative policy based on the principle that money alone constituted wealth.

Mercator, GERARDUS, the latinized form of the name of Gerhard Kremer (1512-94), a Flemish geographer who devised the form of map known as 'MERCATOR'S PROJECTION', in which the meridians of longitude are at right angles to the parallels of latitude, while it gives the navigator the correct compass bearing of his course from one point to another.

Mercator, a trade journal edited by Defoe (q.v.). It succeeded the 'Review' (q.v.) in 1713 and continued till the following year.

Merchant Adventurers, THE, originally merchants engaged independently in overseas trade, who combined in guilds in different areas (Germany, the Netherlands, Scandinavia) in the 15th cent. They are first heard of as infringing the privileges in the Baltic trade of the Hanseatic League in the reign of Henry IV; and they also to some extent infringed those of the 'Merchants of the Staple' (English wool exporters). Henry VII gave their first official 'patent', but not a regular charter. Then they were incorporated as a single company in 1564. Throughout the reign of Elizabeth this enjoyed a monopoly of the trade carried on by English subjects with the Low Countries and Germany, controlling not only the importation of most of the articles of foreign manufacture used in England, but also the exportation of the leading manufactures of England, especially its woollen cloth. It furnished the main agency for the taxation of foreign trade, and at certain periods it advanced money to the government on the security of that taxation; it also served as the machinery for the discharge of international debts. It thus became the greatest financial power in the country. It attacked the Hanse (q.v.) and finally drove it from England, and invaded the territory of the Hanse itself, contributing largely to its ultimate dissolution. Its headquarters on the Continent at various times were Antwerp, Emden, and Hamburg. (See G. Unwin, 'Studies in Economic History'.)

MERCHANT OF VENICE

Merchant of Venice, The, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably written about 1596, printed in quarto in 1600. It is based on material in Giovanni Fiorentino's collection of Italian novels, 'Il Pecorone', and the 'Gesta Romanorum', and perhaps on works in which this material was rehearsed.

Bassanio, a noble but poor Venetian, asks Antonio, his friend, a rich merchant, for three thousand ducats to enable him to prosecute fittingly his suit of the rich heiress Portia. Antonio, whose money is all employed in foreign ventures, undertakes to borrow the sum from Shylock, a Jewish usurer, whom he has been wont to upbraid for his extortions. Shylock consents to lend the money against a bond by which, in case the sum is not repaid at the appointed day, Antonio shall forfeit a pound of flesh. Bassanio prospers in his suit. By her father's will Portia is to marry that suitor who selects of three caskets (one of gold, one of silver, one of lead) that which contains her portrait. He makes the right choice—the leaden casket—and is wedded to Portia, and his friend Gratiano to her maid Nerissa. News comes that Antonio's ships have been wrecked, that the debt has not been repaid when due, and that Shylock claims his pound of flesh. The matter is brought before the duke. Portia disguises herself as an advocate, and Nerissa as her clerk, and they come to the court to defend Antonio, unknown to their husbands. Failing in her appeal to Shylock for mercy, Portia admits the validity of his claim, but warns him that his life is forfeit if he spills one drop of blood, since his bond gives him right to nothing beyond the flesh. Pursuing her advantage, she argues that Shylock's life is forfeit for having conspired against the life of a Venetian citizen. The duke grants Shylock his life, but gives half his wealth to Antonio, half to the State.

MERCHANT OF VENICE

Antonio surrenders his claim if Shylock will turn Christian and make over his property on his death to his daughter, Jessica, who has run away and married a Christian and been disinherited; to which Shylock agrees. Portia and Nerissa ask as rewards from Bassanio and Gratiano the rings that their wives have given them, which they have promised never to part with. Reluctantly they give them up, and are taken to task accordingly on their return home. The play ends with news of the safe arrival of Antonio's ships.

Merchants's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Mercia, a kingdom founded in the 6th cent. by the Anglian invaders known as Mercians (i.e. men of the mark or borderland), between Wessex, Northumbria, and Wales. At the treaty of Wedmore (878) the eastern half became part of the Danelaw, Alfred retaining the western. Under Canute and his successors until the Norman Conquest, Mercia was an earldom.

Mercia, LADY OF, see Æthelflæd.

Mercilla, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. viii, 'a mayden Queene of high renowne' (Queen Elizabeth), whose crown the Soldan seeks to subvert.

Mercurius Librarius, or a Faithful Account of all Books and Pamphlets, the first English literary periodical, published in 1680. It was a weekly or fortnightly catalogue of books issued.

Mercury, see Hermes.

Mercutio, a character in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.).

Mercy, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), a companion of Christiana.

Merdle and Mrs. Merdle, characters in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

MEREDITH, GEORGE (1828-1909), was grandson of Melchizedek Meredith, a prosperous tailor and naval outfitter of Portsmouth (a circumstance reflected in his novel 'Evan Harrington'). He was privately educated at Portsmouth and Southsea and at the Moravian school at Neuwied. In London, after being articled to a solicitor, he turned to journalism, contributing to 'Household Words' and 'Chambers's Journal', and in 1849 married Mary Ellen Nicolls, a widowed daughter of Thomas Love Peacock (q.v.). In 1858 he was deserted by his wife, who had borne him a son and who died in 1861. Meanwhile he had published 'Poems' (dedicated to Peacock) in 1851, and the burlesque fantasies 'The Shaving of Shagpat: an Arabian Entertainment' (q.v., 1856) and 'Farina, a Legend of Cologne' (1857). His first great novel, 'The Ordeal of Richard Feverel' (q.v.), appeared in 1859, and he became acquainted with Swinburne, Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelite group, and other notable people. But his book did not sell well and for long his means were scanty and precarious. He contributed to periodicals, and more especially to the 'Fortnightly Review', in which much of his later work was first published. 'Evan Harrington' (q.v.) appeared serially during 1860. During 1861-2 he lodged for a time with Swinburne and Rossetti in Chelsea, and in the latter year published his chief tragic poem, 'Modern Love' (q.v.). At the same time he became reader for Messrs. Chapman & Hall, a position which he retained until 1894. In 1864 appeared 'Emilia in England' (subsequently renamed 'Sandra Belloni', q.v.). He married in Sept. 1864 his second wife, Marie Vulliamy, who died in 1885. With her he settled for life at Flint Cottage, facing Box Hill, in 1867. He published 'Rhoda Fleming' (q.v.) in 1865, 'Vittoria' (q.v.) in 1866, 'The Adventures of Harry Richmond' (q.v., in the 'Cornhill' in 1870, separately in 1871), 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v., in the 'Fortnightly' in 1875, separately in 1876), and 'The Tale of Chloe' and 'The Egoist' (qq.v.) in 1879. He delivered in 1877 a characteristic lecture on 'The Idea of Comedy and the Uses of the Comic Spirit' (separately published in 1897). He published 'The Tragic Comedians' (q.v.), embodying the love-story of Ferdinand Lassalle, the German socialist, in 1880, and 'Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth' in 1883. Meredith obtained general popularity for his work for the first time by 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v., 1885). This was followed by 'Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life' (1887), containing the ode 'France, December 1870'; 'A Reading of Earth' (1888), including 'A Faith on Trial'; 'Odes in Contribution to the Song of French History' (1898), and 'A Reading of Life' (1901); some of his most characteristic volumes of verse. His last three novels were 'One of our Conquerors' (q.v., 1891), 'Lord Ormont and his Aminta' (q.v., 1894), and 'The Amazing Marriage' (q.v., 1895). 'Last Poems' appeared in 1909, and 'Celt and Saxon', an unfinished story, appeared in 1910 after his death. 'The Sentimentalists', a conversational comedy, was produced also in the same year. An edition de luxe of his collected works appeared in 1896-1911 and a memorial edition in 1909-11. There is a portrait of Meredith by Watts in the National Portrait Gallery.

MEREDITH, OWEN, the pseudonym under which E. R. B. Lytton (q.v.), first earl of Lytton, published some of his earlier works.

MERES, FRANCIS (1565-1647), educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and rector and schoolmaster at Wing, was author of 'Palladis Tamia, Wit's Treasury' (1598), containing quotations and maxims from various writers. In this, Meres reviewed all literary effort from the time of Chaucer to his own day, contrasting each English author with a writer of like character in Latin, Greek, or Italian. He thus commemorates 125 Englishmen; and his list of Shakespeare's works with his commendation of the dramatist's 'fine filed phrase', and his account of Marlowe's death, are notable elements in English literary history.

MÉRIMÉE, PROSPER (1803-70), French novelist and dramatist, a member of the court of Napoleon III, was the author of admirable novels and short stories ('Colomba', 'Carmen', &c.), of plays ('Théâtre de Clara Gazul'), of 'La Jacquerie' (feudal scenes in dialogue form), and of the historical novel, 'Chronique de Charles IX'. His well-known 'Lettres à une Inconnue' display his ironic and critical temperament. He was a strong supporter of the innocence of 'Libri the book-thief' (q.v.).

Merion, DIANA, the heroine of Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v.).

MERIVALE, CHARLES (1808-93), educated at Harrow and St. John's College, Cambridge, became dean of Ely, and published his 'History of the Romans under the Empire' in 1850-64, his 'Conversion of the Roman Empire' in 1864, and 'Conversion of the Northern Nations' in 1866. 'The Fall of the Roman Republic', an epitome by him of the early part of the first of the above works, appeared in 1853.

MERIVALE, HERMAN (1806-74), brother of Charles Merivale (q.v.), educated at Harrow and Oxford, became under-secretary for India, and published works on historical, colonial, and Indian subjects.

MERIVALE, HERMAN CHARLES (1839-1906), son of Herman Merivale (q.v.), educated at Harrow and Balliol College, Oxford, was a skilful playwright. He collaborated in 'All for Her' (1875) and 'Forget me not' (1879), successful plays, and wrote 'The White Pilgrim' (1883), a poetic drama, and 'Florien', a tragedy (1884). His farces and burlesques include 'The Butler' (1886) and 'The Don' (1888). He published a novel, 'Faucit of Balliol', in 1882, and a children's fairy tale, 'Binko's Blues', in 1884. He wrote some pleasant lyrics and sonnets, including 'Thaisa's Dirge'. He collaborated with F. T. Marzials in a short life of Thackeray (1891).

Merle, MADAME, a character in Henry James's 'Portrait of a Lady' (q.v.).

Merlin. The germ of the story of Merlin is found in Nennius's 'Historia Britonum'. The British king, Vortigern, is building a citadel against Hengist and the Saxons, but the foundations are swallowed up as they are laid. Ambrosius, a boy without mortal sire, explains that beneath the site of the citadel there live two dragons, one red and one white. The dragons are found, they fight, and the white dragon is defeated. The boy interprets this as an omen that the Saxons will be expelled by the Britons.

Geoffrey of Monmouth identifies this Ambrosius with Merlin and recounts the same story. He makes Merlin assist Uther in the deceit by which he becomes the husband of Igraine and father of Arthur (q.v.), and it is by Merlin's help that the great stones are brought to Stonehenge from Naas in Ireland. In 'Arthour and Merlin', a poem of the late 13th cent., the story is developed. Merlin's birth is narrated (the devil is his father) and he aids Arthur to defeat his foes by his counsel and magic. Reference is made to the beguiling of Merlin by Nimiane (Nimue or Vivien, see Nimue). According to Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (iii. iii) his mother was a nun, Matilda, daughter of Pubidius, king of Mathraval. In Malory's 'Morte Darthur' it is Merlin who makes the Round Table for Uther Pendragon. He dotes upon Nimue, who, to get rid of him, inveigles him under a great stone. Tennyson in his 'Idylls' makes Vivien induce Merlin to take refuge from a storm in an old oak-tree and leave him there spell-bound.

In Welsh vernacular literature there is a group of poems of a patriotic character attributed to a bard Merlin (Myrddhin), alluded to in Shakespeare ('1 Henry IV', iii. i. 150, and 'King Lear', iii. ii. 95); and the Welsh 'Dialogue between Merlin and Taliesin' (a brother bard, who lived about 550) may have some basis in genuine tradition. There is perhaps some connexion between this bard and the Merlin of the Arthurian legend. The bard, in turn, was perhaps originally a god of British mythology, especially worshipped at Stonehenge (Rhys, 'Hibbert Lectures').

In a trilogy composed by the French poet Robert de Boron (q.v.) in the late 12th or early 13th cent., Merlin, with his knowledge of the past and the future, forms the connecting link between the early history of the Grail (q.v.) and the days of King Arthur.

Merlin and Vivien, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1859.

Vivien, the wily and malignant daughter of a man killed fighting against King Arthur, filled with hatred for the king, leaves the court of Mark to go to that of Arthur and there sow suspicion. She sets herself to win the aged enchanter Merlin, accompanies him to Broceliande, and there extracts from him the knowledge of a charm, which she immediately uses to leave him shut up for ever in an old oak.

Mermaid Tavern, THE, a tavern that stood in Bread Street (with an entrance in Friday Street), London. One of the earliest of English clubs, the Friday Street Club, started by Sir Walter Raleigh, met there, and was frequented by Shakespeare, Selden, Donne, Beaumont, and Fletcher. It is celebrated by Beaumont in the fine lines ('Master Francis Beaumont to Ben Jonson'):

What things have we seen Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been

So nimble, and so full of subtle flame,
As if that every one from whence they came
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life.

MERMAID TAVERN

Keats also wrote 'Lines on the Mermaid Tavern' beginning: 'Souls of poets dead and gone'.

Meropë, (1) one of the daughters of Atlas, the wife of Sisyphus (q.v.), and one of the Pleiades (q.v.); (2) the daughter of Cypselus, wife of Cresphontes and mother of Aegyptus.

Matthew Arnold's tragedy 'Merope' is concerned with the latter. It deals with the revenge of Aegyptus on Polyphontes, who has killed Cresphontes, king of Messenia, the father of Aegyptus, and has, for reasons of state, proposed marriage to Merope, the widowed mother of Aegyptus.

Merovingian, the name of the first dynasty of Frankish kings, derived from Merwig or Merovaeus, its legendary founder in the 5th cent. It rose to importance under Clovis I (481-511), but declined owing to family feuds and the growing power of the Mayors of the Palace (q.v.), until the Merovingians were finally ousted by Pepin the Short in 751.

MERRIMAN, HENRY SETON, pseudonym of Hugh Stowell Scott (1862-1903), novelist, author of 'Young Mistle' (published anonymously, 1888), 'The Slave of the Lamp' (1892), 'With Edged Tools' (1894), 'The Sowers' (1896), 'In Kedar's Tents' (1897), &c.

Merry, ROBERT, see Della Crusca.

Merry Devil of Edmonton, The, a romantic comedy published in 1608, whose authorship is unknown. Charles Lamb, who praised it highly, suggested Drayton as the possible author. It was included in a volume in Charles II's library entitled 'Shakespeare', but there is no evidence in support of this attribution.

The prologue presents Peter Fabel of Edmonton, a magician, who has made a compact with the devil. The period of it has run out, and the fiend comes to claim Fabel. He is however tricked into sitting down in a necromantic chair, where he is held fast and is obliged to give a respite. The play itself, in which the magical element is practically absent, deals with the attempt of Sir Arthur Clare and his wife to break off the match between their daughter Millicent and Raymond Mouchensey, and its defeat by the elopement of the young couple, aided by the kindly magician Fabel.

Merry Monarch, THE, Charles II.

Merry Mount, the name given by Thomas Morton, a British trader and adventurer, to his settlement near Plymouth, Mass., which was established about 1625. Having come into conflict with the Plymouth settlers, Morton was captured and sent to England in 1628 and the settlement suppressed. He returned to Plymouth in the following year and made an abortive attempt to re-establish his colony.

MERTOUN

Merry Wives of Windsor, The, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably of 1600-1. An imperfect text was printed in 1602, the corrected text in the folio of 1623. It is said by Dennis to have been written by command of Queen Elizabeth to show Sir John Falstaff in love.

Falstaff (q.v.), who is 'out at heels', determines to make love to the wives of Ford and Page, two gentlemen dwelling at Windsor, because they have the rule of their husband's purses. Nym and Pistol, the discarded followers of Falstaff, warn the husbands. Falstaff sends identical love-letters to Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page, who contrive the discomfiture of the knight. At a first assignation at Ford's house, on the arrival of the husband, they hide Falstaff in a basket, cover him with foul linen, and have him tipped into a muddy ditch. At a second assignation, they disguise him as the 'fat woman of Brentford', in which character he is soundly beaten by Ford. The jealous husband having also been twice befooled, the plot is now revealed to him, and a final assignation is given to Falstaff in Windsor Forest, where he is beset and pinched by mock fairies and finally seized and exposed by Ford and Page.

The underplot is concerned with the wooing of Anne, the daughter of Page, by three suitors: Doctor Caius, a French physician, Slender, the foolish cousin of Justice Shallow, and Fenton, a wild young gentleman, whom Anne loves. Mistress Quickly, servant to Dr. Caius, acts as go-between for all three suitors, and encourages them all impartially. Sir Hugh Evans, a Welsh parson, interferes on behalf of Slender and incurs the enmity of, and receives a challenge from, the irascible Dr. Caius, but hostilities are confined to the 'hacking' of the English tongue. At the final assignation with Falstaff in the forest, Page, who favours Slender, arranges that the latter shall carry off his daughter, who is to be dressed in white; while Mrs. Page, who favours Dr. Caius, arranges that he shall carry her off dressed in green. In the event both of these find themselves fobbed off with a boy in disguise, while Fenton has run away with and married the true Anne.

Merry-Andrew, one who entertains people by antics and buffoonery, a clown. The OED. observes that Hearne's statement, in the preface to his edition of Benedictus Abbas (1735), that 'Merry Andrew' was originally applied to Dr. Andrew Borde (d. 1549) has neither evidence nor intrinsic probability, though Borde had a reputation for buffoonery.

Merton College, Oxford, was founded in 1264 by Walter de Merton, chancellor of England and bishop of Rochester (d. 1277). It is generally regarded as the first society on the present collegiate model. Roger Bacon, Duns Scotus, and Wychiffe are traditionally connected with it. Anthony Wood (q.v.) was educated there.

Mertoun, BASIL and MORDAUNT, characters in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

MERYGREEK

Merygreek, MATTHEW, a character in Udall's 'Ralph Roister Doister' (q.v.).

Mesmer, FRIEDRICH ANTON (1733-1815), an Austrian physician, who popularized the doctrine or system known as Mesmerism, according to which a hypnotic state can be induced by an influence exercised by the operator over the will and nervous system of the patient.

Mesopotamia, THAT BLESSED WORD: a contributor to 'N. and Q.' (Xlth Ser., i. 458) connects the phrase with the famous Methodist preacher George Whitefield, as the explanation 'commonly current in religious circles'. He says, "The genesis of the story was indicated several years ago by Mr. Francis Jacox. Garrick, who greatly admired Whitefield's preaching, was it seems responsible for its introduction in religious literature. Whitefield's voice was so wonderfully modulated that Garrick said "he could make men either laugh or cry by pronouncing the word Mesopotamia". No reference is given to Garrick's writings.

According to Brewer, the allusion is to the story of an old woman who told her pastor that she 'found great support in that blessed word Mesopotamia'. Cf. Cowper's 'Selkirk',

Religion, what treasure untold
Resides in that heavenly word!

Mesrour, in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), the executioner of the Caliph Haroun-al-Rashid, who with the vizier Jaffar used to accompany him when he walked at night disguised about the streets of Bagdad.

Mess John, see Mas John.

Messalina, the wife of the Roman emperor Claudius, proverbial for her profligacy. She was put to death in A.D. 48.

Messiah, the Hebrew title (meaning 'anointed') applied in the O.T. prophetic writings to a promised deliverer of the Jewish nation, and hence applied to Jesus of Nazareth as the fulfilment of that promise. Hence, in a transferred sense, an expected liberator of an oppressed people or country. [OED.]

Messiah, The, (1) a sacred eclogue by Pope (q.v.), published in 'The Spectator' in May 1712, embodying in verse the Messianic prophecies of Isaiah; (2) a famous oratorio by Handel (q.v.); (3) a religious epic ('Messias') by Klopstock (q.v.).

Mesty, a character in Marryat's 'Midshipman Easy' (q.v.).

Metalogicus, see John of Salisbury.

Metamorphoses, a series of mythological tales in verse by the Roman poet Ovid (q.v.), parts of which have been translated by various English poets, and which provide the material for many literary allusions.

Metaphor, the transfer of a name or descriptive term to an object different from, but analogous to, that to which it is properly applicable, e.g. 'abysmal ignorance'. MIXED METAPHOR is the application of two inconsistent metaphors to one object.

Metaphysical Poets, a term invented by Dryden and adopted by Johnson as the designation of certain 17th-cent. poets (chief of whom were Donne and Cowley) addicted to 'witty conceits' and far-fetched imagery (Johnson, 'Lives of the Poets', 'Cowley'). But modern opinion does not wholly endorse Johnson's condemnation of these poets.

Metaphysical Society, THE, was founded in 1869 by Sir J. T. Knowles (q.v.). It lasted until 1881 and brought together most of the leaders of English thought of the period, of all shades of opinion.

METASTASIO, or according to his original name, PIETRO BONAVENTURA TRAPASSI (1698-1782), Italian poet, who applied his literary gifts and dramatic powers to the writing of operas, of which the best were 'Didone Abbandonata' (1724), 'Artaserse' (1730), the 'Olimpiade' (1733), and 'Achille in Sciro' (1736).

Metathesis, the transposition of letters or sounds in a word. When the transposition is between the letters or sounds of two words, it is popularly known as a 'Spoonerism', of which a well-known specimen (attributed to the late Rev. W. A. Spooner, Warden of New College, Oxford) is 'Kinquering congs their titles take'.

Methodism, a movement of reaction against the apathy of the Church of England that prevailed in the early part of the 18th cent. Its leaders were J. and C. Wesley and Whitefield (qq.v.). John Wesley came under the influence of the Moravians, while Whitefield adopted Calvinistic views; their followers consequently separated, those of Whitefield becoming Calvinistic Methodists, sometimes called Lady Huntingdon's Connexion.

The name 'Methodist' was originally applied to the members of a religious society established at Oxford in 1729 by the Wesleys and other members of the University, having for its object the promotion of piety and morality. It was subsequently extended to those who took part in or sympathized with the movement above described.

Methuselah, proverbial for the extremely long life attributed to him in Gen. v. 27.

Metre, from Gk. μέτρον measure, any specific form of poetic rhythm, determined by the number and character of the feet which it contains. In the compounds DIMETER, TRIMETER, &c., it is the unit which is repeated a certain number of times in a line of verse. This unit consists of two iambuses, trochees, or anapaests, or of one dactyl (qq.v.). Thus an iambic dimeter consists of four iambuses, a hexameter (q.v.) of six dactyls (or equivalents). In English (accentual) verse stressed syllables replace the long syllables, and unstressed syllables the short syllables, of Greek and Latin (quantitative) verse.

Meyerbeer, GIACOMO (originally JAKOB) (1791-1864), born in Berlin of Jewish descent, a famous composer of operas, of which the most successful were: 'Robert le Diable' (1831), 'Les Huguenots' (1836), 'Le Prophète' (1842), 'L'Africaine' (1865).

MEYNELL, ALICE (1847-1922), poet, essayist, and critic. Her rare gifts, both in prose and poetry, may be seen in her volumes of essays: 'The Rhythm of Life' (1893), 'The Colour of Life' (1896), 'The Children' (1896), 'The Spirit of Peace' (1898), 'Ceres' Runaway' (1910), 'The Second Person Singular' (1921); and in her early volume of 'Preludes' (1875), 'Poems' (1893), 'Later Poems' (1901), 'A Father of Women' (1918), and 'Last Poems' (1923). A complete edition of her poems was published in 1923. See also Thompson (F.).

Michael, a pastoral poem by W. Wordsworth (1800).

Michael, ST., the archangel, mentioned as the leader of the angels against the dragon and his host in Rev. xii. 7, and described by Milton ('Paradise Lost', vi. 44) as 'of celestial armies prince'. He is one of the four principal angels enumerated in the Koran, the champion of the faith. His feast is celebrated on 29 Sept., known as MICHAELMAS (q.v.).

MICHAEL ANGELO TITMARSH, the pseudonym adopted by Thackeray (q.v.) in 'The Paris Sketch-Book', 'The Great Hogarty Diamond' (q.v.), 'The Irish Sketch-Book', 'Bluebeard's Ghost', 'A Legend of the Rhine', 'Rebecca and Rowena', 'Mrs. Perkins's Ball', &c.

Michael's Mount, ST., on the coast of Cornwall. See Namancos.

Michaelmas, the feast of St. Michael (q.v.), 29 Sept., one of the four quarter-days of the English business year, a date on which servants used to be hired, and from which leases frequently run, &c. There is an old proverb that 'Who eats goose on Michael's day, Shan't money lack his debts to pay' ('British Apollo', ed. 3, 1726, II. 648).

Shortyard and Falselight, as confederates, tries to effect the ruin of Easy, a simple country gentleman. He succeeds in getting from him bonds for his estate in Essex and is overjoyed at becoming a landed proprietor. Wishing to see how his wife and son will conduct themselves in their new dignity, he feigns death. He is dismayed to find that his wife promptly marries Easy, with whom she is in love, and that his son shows no particular respect for his late father. He is then tricked into signing a document releasing Easy from his obligations.

Michal, in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), is the queen of Charles II, Catharine of Portugal, accused by Oates of conspiracy against the king's life. For the biblical Michal see 1 Sam. xviii. 20.

MICHELANGELO BUONARROTI (1475-1564), the great Italian sculptor, painter, and poet, was born at Caprese of a Florentine family, was apprenticed to Ghirlandajo, and enjoyed, in his study of art, the patronage of Lorenzo de' Medici. Of his principal works, the statue of David was begun in 1501. The great fresco for the Sala Grande of the Palazzo Vecchio, representing Florentine soldiers surprised while bathing by English troopers under Sir John Hawkwood (q.v., the battle of Cascina, 1364), was painted in 1505, but unfortunately perished, and the cartoon for it has also disappeared. The mausoleum for Pope Julius II occupied him at intervals during his life, but he was constantly thwarted in its execution, and only the statue of Moses and the two figures of the Captives in the Louvre survive. The ceiling of the Sistine Chapel at Rome was painted in 1508-12. The monuments of Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici in the church of San Lorenzo at Florence were executed in 1520, and the great fresco of the 'Last Judgement' on the east wall of the Sistine Chapel was painted for Paul III during 1535-41. In 1529, when Florence was threatened by the Imperial forces, Michelangelo was appointed procurator-general over the fortification of the city. In a moment of panic he deserted his post, but returned when the enemy had approached the city, and appears to have resumed his duties. Florence capitulated in August 1530. Michelangelo succeeded Sangallo in 1546 as architect of St. Peter's at Rome, but only the dome represents, in a measure, his design. As a poet Michelangelo has left a number of remarkable sonnets and madrigals, some of them addressed to his friend Vittoria Colonna (q.v.). He is the only artist of supreme excellence both as a painter and a sculptor. 'He belongs to the genus of deep, violent, colossal, passionately striving natures; not, like Raffaello, to the smooth, serene, broad, exquisitely finished, calmly perfect tribe' (J. A. Symonds).

MICHELET, JULES (1798-1874), French historian, whose principal work, the 'Histoire de France' (1833-67), is remarkable for its luminous and eloquent style and for the part that the author attributes to physical circumstances, such as the health or heredity of the principal actors, in determining political events. Michelet wrote a number of monographs, 'Des Jésuites', 'Du Prêtre', 'La Sorcière', &c., on subjects allied to history in his broad conception of it.

Miching malicho, a phrase of uncertain meaning occurring in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet', III. ii. 148. 'Miching' is probably the participle of the Old English verb 'to miche' (surviving in 'to mike'), meaning to pilfer, skulk, play truant. 'Malicho' perhaps represents the Spanish malhecho, misdeed. This yields a fairly satisfactory sense, but there is no evidence that the Spanish word was familiar in English. [OED.] Lord Miching Malicho in Peacock's 'Gryll Grange' (q.v.) represents Lord John Russell.

Microcosmographie, a collection of character sketches on the model of Theophrastus (q.v.), chiefly by John Earle (1601?-65), bishop of Salisbury, published in 1628. The author analyses inconspicuous types, such as the plain country fellow, a modest man, and a poor man; interesting in the evolution towards the English essay.

Micromégas, a philosophical tale written by Voltaire (q.v.) in imitation of 'Gulliver's Travels'.

Midas, a semi-legendary king of Phrygia, who, having hospitably entertained Silenus, the tutor of Dionysus, when he had lost his way, was permitted by the god to choose his recompense. He asked that whatever he touched might be turned to gold. His prayer was granted, but when he found that the very meat he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he entreated Dionysus to relieve him of the gift. He was ordered to wash himself in the river Pactólus, whose sands thereafter contained gold. On another occasion Midas had the imprudence to declare that Pan was a superior flute-player to Apollo, whereupon the offended god changed his ears to those of an ass, to indicate his stupidity. This Midas attempted to conceal; but his barber saw the length of his ears, and unable to keep the secret, and afraid to reveal it, whispered the fact to some reeds, and these, whenever agitated by the wind, repeated to the world that Midas had the ears of an ass.

Midas, a prose play by Lyly (q.v.), published in 1592, on the legend of Midas, king of Phrygia (see above).

Middle Ages, THE, the period of time from the Roman decadence (5th cent. A.D.) to the Renaissance (about 1500). The notion is that of an interval between two periods of advancing knowledge (cf. Bacon, 'Novum Organum' I, § 78). The earliest use of Middle Age, in this sense, yet discovered is in one of Donne's sermons (1621), but the corresponding Latin terms, media aetas, medium aevum, &c., are found at various dates in the 16th cent. (See an article on this subject by George Gordon in S.P.E. Tract XIX.)

Middle Years, The, the title of a short story, and also of an autobiographical fragment, by Henry James (q.v.).

Middlemarch, a Study of Provincial Life, a novel by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1871-2.

The scene is laid in the provincial town of Middlemarch in the first half of the 19th cent. The story is concerned principally with Dorothea Brooke, a St. Theresa, ardent, puritanical, with a high ideal of life. She marries the elderly pedant Mr. Casaubon, possessed of an archangelical manner, for whom she feels 'the reverence of a neophyte entering on a higher grade of initiation'. The marriage is intensely unhappy. Mr. Casaubon spends the honeymoon in research into what his cousin, young Will Ladislaw, irreverently calls his 'mouldy futilities', and alienates Dorothea by his lack of sympathy. There supervenes a suspicion in his mind of his wife's preference for the said Will Ladislaw, and before he dies, which he shortly does, he adds with characteristic meanness a codicil to his will by which Dorothea forfeits her fortune if she marries Ladislaw. Nevertheless, in the end, Dorothea and Ladislaw are brought together. Parallel with this plot runs the story of the unhappy marriage of Tertius Lydgate, an ambitious young doctor, animated by hopes of scientific discoveries and medical reform, with the beautiful but commonplace Rosamond Vincy, whose materialism brings about the failure of his hopes.

The canvas is a broad one, and contains many good characters, including the humorous Mrs. Cadwallader, the rector's wife; the conventional English gentleman, Sir James Chettam; Dorothea's uncle, Mr. Brooke, a man 'of acquiescent temper, miscellaneous opinions, and uncertain vote'; and Mr. Bulstrode, the religious humbug.

Middlemas, RICHARD, a character in Scott's 'The Surgeon's Daughter' (q.v.).

Middleton, CLARA and DR., characters in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

MIDDLETON, CONYERS (1683-1750), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and subsequently fellow of the college, was involved in the disputes with Bentley, the master. He was protobibliothecarius of the university library (1721). His chief works were his 'Life of Cicero' (1741) and a latitudinarian 'Free Inquiry into Miracles' (1748). His conclusion that post-apostolic miracles were unreal aroused much controversy.

Middleton, Sir Hugh, see Myddelton.

MIDDLETON, THOMAS (1570?-1627), dramatist, was the son of parents settled in London. He wrote satirical comedies of contemporary manners, and later, under the influence of W. Rowley, romantic comedies. Much of his work was done in collaboration with Dekker, Rowley, Munday, and others. He also wrote pageants and masques for city ceremonials, and was appointed city chronologer in 1620. In 1624 he wrote a political drama 'A Game at Chesse' (q.v.), for which he and the actors were summoned before the Privy Council. His other plays (which were very popular) include 'The Mayor of Quinborough' (1661) and possibly 'The Old Law' (1656, in collaboration with Massinger and Rowley), 'Michaelmas Terme' (q.v., 1607), 'A Trick to catch the Old-One' (1608), 'The Familie of Love' (1608), 'A Mad World, my Masters' (1608), 'The Roaring Girle' (q.v., 1611, with Dekker), 'A Faire Quarrell' (q.v., 1617, with Rowley), 'The Changeling' (q.v., 1623, with Rowley), 'The Spanish Gipsy' (q.v., 1623, with Rowley), 'More Dissemblers besides Women' (1657), 'A Chast Mayd in Cheape-side' (1630), 'No Wit, no Help like a Woman's' (1657), 'Women beware Women' (q.v., 1657), 'The Witch' (q.v., not published until 1778), 'Anything for a Quiet Life' (1662), 'The Widdow' (1652, with Ben Jonson and Fletcher). His pageants and masques include 'The Triumphs of Truth' (1613), 'Civitatiss Amor' (1616), 'The Triumphs of Honor and Industry' (1617), 'The Inner Temple Masque' (1619), 'The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity' (1619), 'The World Tost at Tennis' (1620), 'The Triumphs of Honor and Virtue' (1622), 'The Triumphs of Integrity' (1623), 'The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity' (1626). He is supposed to have also written some miscellaneous verse and prose.

Midshipman Easy, Mr., a novel by Marryat (q.v.), published in 1836.

Jack Easy is the son of Mr. Nicodemus Easy, a rich country gentleman with a bee in his bonnet, who believes all men are equal, and instils these ideas into his son. When Jack Easy goes to sea as a midshipman his insistence on these ideas, and his argumentative disposition, bring him into conflict with naval discipline. But as he has the good fortune to meet with a kindly and sensible captain, and is moreover a plucky and straightforward youth, and heir to eight thousand a year, he gets well out of his scrapes. His adventurous disposition leads him into a number of exciting incidents; their fortunate outcome is largely due to the devotion of the resourceful Ashantee, Mesty, and of his fellow midshipman, Edward Gascoigne. Among the many amusing naval characters in the book may be mentioned the bellicose chaplain, Hawkins, Mr. Biggs, the boatswain ('Duty before decency'), and Mr. Pottyfar, the lieutenant who kills himself with his own universal medicine.

Midsummer Night's Dream, A, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably written in 1595 or 1596, and printed in 1600.

Hermia, ordered by her father, Egeus, to marry Demetrius, refuses, because she loves Lysander, while Demetrius has formerly professed love for her friend Helena, and Helena loves Demetrius. Under the law of Athens, Theseus, the duke, gives Hermia four days in which to obey her father; else she must suffer death or enter a nunnery. Hermia and Lysander agree to leave Athens secretly in order to be married where the Athenian law cannot pursue them, and to meet in a wood a few miles from the city. Hermia tells Helena of the project, and the latter tells Demetrius. Demetrius pursues Hermia to the wood, and Helena Demetrius, so that all four are that night in the wood. This wood is the favourite haunt of the fairies.

Oberon and Titania, king and queen of the fairies, have quarrelled, because Titania refuses to give up to him a little changeling boy for a page. Oberon tells Puck, a mischievous sprite, to fetch him a certain magic flower, of which he will press the juice on the eyes of Titania while she sleeps, so that she may fall in love with what she first sees when she wakes. Overhearing Demetrius in the wood reproaching Helena for following him, and desirous to reconcile them, Oberon orders Puck to place some of the love-juice on Demetrius's eyes, but so that Helena shall be near him when he does it. Puck, mistaking Lysander for Demetrius, applies the love-charm to him, and it chances that Helena is the first person that Lysander sees, to whom he at once makes love, enraging her because she thinks she is made a jest of. Oberon discovering Puck's mistake, now places some of the juice on Demetrius's eyes, and he on waking first sees Helena, so that both Lysander and Demetrius are now making love to Helena. The ladies fall in high words and the men go off to fight for Helena.

Meanwhile Oberon has placed the love-juice on Titania's eyelids, who wakes to find Bottom the weaver near her, with an ass's head in lieu of his own (Bottom and a company of Athenian tradesmen are in the wood to rehearse a play for the Duke's wedding, and Puck has put an ass's head on Bottom);

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

Titania at once becomes enamoured of him, and toys with his 'amiable cheeks' and 'fair large ears'. Oberon, finding them together, reproaches Titania for bestowing her love on an ass, and again demands the changeling boy, whom she in her confusion surrenders; whereupon Oberon releases her from the charm. Puck at Oberon's orders throws a thick fog about the human lovers, and brings them all together, unknown to one another, and they fall asleep. He applies a remedy to their eyes, so that when they awake they return to their former loves. Theseus and Egeus appear on the scene, the runaways are forgiven, and the couples married. The play ends with the scene of 'Pyramus and Thisbe', comically acted by Bottom and his fellow tradesmen, to grace these nuptials and those of Theseus and Hippolyta.

Miggs, Miss, in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), the shrewish maidservant of Mrs. Varden.

Migne, Jacques Paul (1800-75), French priest and publisher, who issued a large number of theological works, especially the great 'Patrologiae Cursus Completus', a collection of patristic writings (Latin series, 1844-55; Greek series, 1856-61) numbering over 300 volumes.

Mignon, in the 'Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship' of Goethe (q.v.), a fairy-like child rescued by Wilhelm from a troupe of rope-dancers. She becomes passionately attached to him, and from hopeless love and longing for her Italian home pines away and dies. She is the prototype of Fenella in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.). Goethe puts in her mouth the famous song 'Kennst du das Land', for which Beethoven wrote the music. Ambroise Thomas wrote the opera 'Mignon', founded on the above.

Miles Standish, The Courtship of, a poem in hexameters by Longfellow, published in 1858.

Miles Standish is the blunt old Puritan captain of Plymouth in the land of the Pilgrim Fathers. Having lost his wife, he sends his friend John Alden to make an offer of marriage on his behalf to the fair Priscilla.

MILL

She indignantly replies that if she is worth winning she is worth wooing, and, when John woos for his friend, exclaims, 'Why don't you speak for yourself, John?' But John Alden, though loving her, is faithful to his trust. He tells Miles Standish the result of his mission, and the latter departs in anger. At last news comes of his death in battle, after which John and Priscilla are married. On the completion of their wedding, Standish reappears, repentant, and is reconciled to his friend.

MILL, JAMES (1773-1836), born near Montrose, the son of a farmer, was educated for the ministry, but came to London in 1802 and took to journalism. He published in 1818 a 'History of British India', which obtained him a high post in the East India Company's service. He was closely associated with Bentham and Ricardo (q.v.), whose views in philosophy and political economy, respectively, he adopted. He published his 'Elements of Political Economy' in 1821, his 'Analysis of the Human Mind' in 1829, and his 'Fragment on Mackintosh' in 1835. In the 'Analysis' he provided, by his theory of association, a psychological basis for Bentham's utilitarianism. Associations may become inseparable and transform what had merely been means into ends sought on their own account, thus explaining disinterested conduct by the egoistic individual. He also endeavoured to found on the association of ultimate sensations a theory of knowledge and reality. The 'Fragment on Mackintosh' is a rejoinder to the attack on the utilitarians contained in the 'Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy' of Mackintosh (q.v.). Mill helped to found, and contributed to, the 'Westminster Review' (q.v.).

MILL, JOHN STUART (1806-73), son of James Mill (q.v.), by whom he was educated and by whose influence he obtained a clerkship in the India House. He formed the Utilitarian Society, which met during 1823-6 to read essays and discuss them, and in 1825 edited Bentham's 'Treatise upon Evidence'. But he gradually departed in some degree from the utilitarian doctrine expounded by Bentham, as is shown by his essay on that philosopher published in the 'London and Westminster Review' in 1832, and later in his 'Utilitarianism' (q.v.), published in 1861. In 1843 he published his chief work, the 'System of Logic' (q.v.), and his 'Principles of Political Economy' in 1848. In 1859 appeared his essay on 'Liberty' (q.v.), and two volumes of 'Dissertations and Discussions', and in 1865 his 'Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy' (q.v.). Among minor works may be mentioned the 'Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform' (1859), 'Representative Government' (1861), 'Auguste Comte and Positivism' (1865), his 'Inaugural Address' on being installed lord rector of the University of St. Andrews in 1867, an important discussion of the functions of a university, and 'The Subjection of Women' (1869). His interesting 'Autobiography' appeared in 1873.

On the dissolution of the East India Company in 1858 he retired with a pension, and was M.P. for Westminster, 1865-8. He passed most of the remainder of his life in France, and died at Avignon.

Mill on the Floss, The, a novel by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1860.

Tom and Maggie, the principal characters in the story, are the children of the honest but ignorant and obstinate Mr. Tulliver, the miller of Dorlcote Mill on the Floss. Tom is a prosaic youth, narrow of imagination and intellect, animated by conscious rectitude of purpose, and a disposition to exercise control over others. Maggie is of a far nobler type, highly strung and intelligent, of intense sensibility, and artistic and poetic tastes. From this conflict of temperaments and the incongruity of Maggie's character with her surroundings spring much unhappiness for the girl and ultimate tragedy. Maggie's love for her brother is thwarted by his lack of understanding, and the intellectual and emotional sides of her nature are starved. She finds in Philip Wakem, the deformed son of a neighbouring lawyer, a temperament like her own, and they are mutually attracted. Unfortunately lawyer Wakem is the object of Mr. Tulliver's suspicion and dislike, which develop into intense hatred when Tulliver is made bankrupt as a result of litigation in which Wakem is on the other side. Tom, loyal to his father, discovers the relations of affectionate friendship secretly maintained between Maggie and Philip, and the first deep dissension between brother and sister ensues; but Maggie yields to her brother's authority and ceases to see Philip. After Mr. Tulliver's death, accelerated by a scene of violence in which he thrashes the lawyer, Maggie leaves the Mill for a visit at St. Ogg's to her cousin Lucy Deane, who is to marry the cultivated and agreeable Stephen Guest. Stephen, though loyal in intention to Lucy, is attracted by Maggie's beauty; she, though similarly loyal to Philip, is drawn to Stephen. A boating expedition on the tidal river leads, partly by Stephen's design, partly by accident, to Maggie's being innocently but irremediably compromised. Her brother turns her out of his house; the society of St. Ogg's ostracizes her. Only Lucy and Philip, whose hopes of happiness she has ruined, show more understanding. The situation appears without issue. A great flood descends upon the town, in the course of which Maggie, whose first thought in danger is for her brother, courageously rescues Tom from the mill. There comes a moment of revelation to the spirit of the awe-struck Tom before the boat is overwhelmed, and brother and sister, reconciled at last, are drowned.

The tragedy of the story is somewhat relieved by a number of entertaining characters, notably Mrs. Tulliver's sisters, the strong-minded Mrs. Glegg and the melancholy Mrs. Pullet, with their respective spouses, and the ingenious packman Bob Jakin.

He wrote a number of dramas, of which 'Fazio' (1815), a tragedy placed in Italy, proved successful on the stage. But Milman is chiefly remembered for his historical writings: his 'History of the Jews' (1830), 'History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ . . .' (1840), and his principal work, 'The History of Latin Christianity' (1854-5), which gave him high fame as an historian. His 'Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral' were published in 1868.

MILNE, ALAN ALEXANDER (1882-), journalist and playwright, author of books of children's verse, 'When We Were Very Young', &c., which enjoyed great popularity; and also of plays including 'Mr. Pim Passes By' and 'The Truth about Blayds'.

MILNES, RICHARD MONCKTON (1809-85), first Baron Houghton, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was intimate with Tennyson, Hallam, and Thackeray. He became an active politician. Of his songs and other poems ('Poetical Works', 1876), those best known are 'The Brookside' and 'Strangers Yet'. He also wrote on political and critical subjects ('Monographs', 1873), and edited and wrote a Life of Keats (1848); in fact he was the first open champion of Keats as a poet of the first rank.

Milo, a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy, who attained immense strength, was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games and is said to have led the army of Crotona against Sybaris in 511 B.C. He fell a prey to wolves in the end, his hands caught in the trunk of a tree which he was trying to split open.

Milton, for the poem of that name by Blake, see Blake.

MILTON, JOHN (1608-74), was born in Bread Street, Cheapside, at the Sign of the Spread Eagle, the house of his father, John Milton the elder, a scrivener and composer of music. He was educated at St. Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge, becoming B.A. in 1629 and M.A. in 1632. While at Cambridge he wrote the poems 'On the Death of a Fair Infant' and 'At a Vacation Exercise', in his 17th and 19th year respectively, and some Latin elegies and epigrams; but he first struck a distinctive note in the stately ode 'On the Morning of Christ's Nativity' (1629), the fragmentary 'Passion', and the poem to Shakespeare (1630). The two pieces on Hobson, the university carrier, belong to the same period, also the 'Epitaph on the Marchioness of Winchester', and probably the Italian poems. After leaving Cambridge, Milton took up no profession, but lived at Horton in Bucks. with his father, reading the classics and preparing himself for his vocation as a poet, from 1632 to 1637. Here he composed 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' (qq.v.) in 1632, and at the invitation of Henry Lawes (who wrote the music for them) the 'Arcades' (part of a masque, 1633?) and 'Comus' (q.v., 1634, published 1637). In 1637 he wrote 'Lycidas' (q.v.). During the twenty years that elapsed between this and his composition of 'Paradise Lost', Milton wrote no poetry but sonnets, of which the most notable are those 'On the late Massacre in Piedmont', on his blindness, on his deceased wife, the addresses to Cromwell, Fairfax, and Vane, and those to Lawrence, Lawes, and Cyriack Skinner. From 1637 to 1639 Milton travelled abroad, chiefly in Italy, and visited Grotius and Galileo (the latter in prison). On his return he became tutor to his nephews, Edward and John Philips, and other pupils. In 1641 he published a series of pamphlets against episcopacy, engaging in controversy with Bishop Hall. These were followed in 1642 by his 'Apology against a pamphlet . . . against Smectymnuus' (see Smectymnuus), containing some interesting autobiographical details. Milton married Mary Powell, daughter of Royalist parents, probably in June 1642 (not 1643 as has been generally supposed: see B. A. Wright in 'Modern Language Review', Oct. 1931 and Jan. 1932). Within six weeks he consented to her going home to her parents on condition that she returned by Michaelmas. She did not do so, perhaps for reasons connected with the outbreak of the Civil War. Milton published in 1643 his pamphlet on the 'doctrine and discipline of divorce' which made him notorious. In 1644-5 he published three further pamphlets on divorce (including 'Tetrachordon', q.v.), his 'Tractate of Education', and the 'Areopagitica' (q.v.) on the liberty of the press. His wife rejoined him in 1645, and in 1647 he gave up teaching pupils, his circumstances having become easier on the death of his father in 1646. After the execution of Charles I he published the 'Tenure of Kings and Magistrates' (1649), and was appointed Latin secretary to the newly formed Council of State. He replied officially to 'Eikon Basilike' (q.v.) in 'Eikonoclastes' (i.e. Image-breaker, 1649), and to Salmasius (q.v.) in 'Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio' (1650), and also to Du Moulin's 'Clamor' (which he attributed to Morus, or More) in 'Defensio Secunda' (1654), containing some autobiographical passages (the two 'Defensiones' were in Latin). Having become blind, he was assisted in his secretarial duties successively by G. R. Weckherlin, Philip Meadows, and Marvell (q.v.). His first wife died in 1652, leaving three daughters, and in 1656 he married Catharine Woodcock, who died in 1658. He retained his post as Latin secretary until the Restoration, having lived while holding it chiefly in a house in Petty France, Westminster. At the Restoration he was arrested and fined, but released; he lost the greater part of his fortune. On the discomfiture of his principles and aspirations, he returned to poetry and set about the composition of 'Paradise Lost' (q.v.), the first sketch of which can be dated as early as 1642. He married his third wife, Elizabeth Minshull (who survived him), in 1662, and moved to what is now Bunhill Row, where he spent the remaining years of his life. The 'Paradise Lost' is said by Aubrey to have been finished in 1663, but the agreement for his copyright was not signed till 1667. His last poems, 'Paradise Regained' (q.v.) and 'Samson Agonistes' (q.v.), were published together in 1671. He published his Latin grammar and 'History of Britain' (from legendary times to the Norman Conquest) in 1669 and 1670 respectively; a compendium of Ramus's 'Logic', 1672; a tract on 'True Religion', 1673; 'Familiar Letters', 1674; and 'College Exercises', 1674. His 'Brief History of Moscovia', containing a curious account of the country, drawn from the Hakluyt and Purchas collections, appeared in 1682.

Of Milton's Latin poems, the finest is the 'Epitaphium Damonis', written in 1639, on the death of his friend Charles Diodati (q.v.); while the epistle 'Ad Patrem' and the address to 'Mansus' (Giovanni Battista Manso, the intimate friend of Tasso and Marini) have great interest.

The 'State Papers' that he wrote as Latin secretary are mostly concerned with the routine work of diplomacy, but include an interesting series of dispatches, from 1655 to 1658, on the subject of the expulsion and massacre of the Protestant Vaudois by the orders of the Prince of Savoy, which breathe the same indignation that found more unrestrained expression in his sonnet 'Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints'. The Latin prose writings include his 'De Doctrina Christiana', printed in 1825, which served as the occasion for Macaulay's essay on Milton.

Milton died from 'gout struck in', and was buried beside his father, in St. Giles', Cripplegate, London. His most important biography is David Masson's 'Life of Milton', narrated in connection with the Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of his Time' (1859-80).

Milward, RICHARD (1609-80), amanuensis to Selden (q.v.), whose 'Table Talk' he compiled.

Mime, a kind of simple farcical drama among the Greeks and Romans, characterized by mimicry and the ludicrous representation of familiar types of character; or a dialogue written for recital in a performance of this kind. The form is also occasionally applied to similar performances or compositions in modern times. [OED.] But in the modern usage the word generally means dumb acting.

Miming, in northern mythology, a magical sword forged by Völundr (Wieland, see Wayland the Smith). This sword, in the hands of Hödur, was, according to one form of the legend, the means of slaying Balder (q.v.).

Mímir or MIMER, in Scandinavian mythology, a giant water-demon who dwelt at the root of Yggdrasil (q.v.) guarding the waters of the well of wisdom.

Mincing Lane, in the City of London, originally, according to Stow, Mincheon Lane, from minchen, a nun, so called from the nuns of the priory of St. Helen's in Bishopsgate, which owned the lane. It is now the chief centre of the trade in tea, sugar, and other colonial produce. In Stow's day it was occupied by 'galley-men' from Genoa, who brought up wines and other merchandize, which they landed in Thames Street.

Mind, the philosophical periodical, see Bain.

Minerva, the Roman goddess of wisdom and of arts and trades, subsequently identified with the Greek Athene (q.v.), which led to her being regarded also as the goddess of war. She was further held to have invented musical instruments.

Minerva, Jahrbuch des gelehrten Welt, a reference book of the universities, colleges, libraries, museums, learned societies, scientific institutions, &c., of the whole world, published by Walter de Gruyter & Co., Berlin and Leipzig.

Minerva Press, a printing press formerly existing in Leadenhall Street, London; hence the series of ultra-sentimental novels issued with the imprint of this press about 1800.

Ming, the dynasty that ruled in China from 1368 until ousted by the Manchu (Tsing) dynasty in 1643. The porcelain of this period is highly esteemed.

Minifie, SUBANNAH, see Gunning.

Minim, a friar belonging to the mendicant order (Ordo Minimorum Eremitarum) founded by St. Francis of Paola (c. 1416-1507).

Minim, Dick, a character sketched in Johnson's 'Idler' (q.v.). Inheriting a fortune, he turns man of wit and humour and sets up as a critic. He has his own seat in a coffee-house and heads a party in the pit, where he prudently spares the authors whose reputation is well established and censures those who are unknown.

Minnehaha, see Hiawatha.

Minnesingers, German lyrical poets and singers of the 12th, 13th, and 14th cents., so called because love (minne) was the chief theme of their songs. They corresponded to the French troubadours. The best-known name among these poets of the old chivalry is that of Walther von der Vogelweide (fl. 1200).

Minōan, the name given by Sir A. Evans (q.v.) to the civilization revealed by his excavations at the Palace of Minos at Knossos in Crete, so called after the legendary King Minos (q.v.). Of this civilization (represented by products of arts and crafts, with hazy political inferences therefrom) he recognized three main phases, Early, Middle, and Late Minoan, and he subdivided each phase into three sub-periods, of advance, acme, and decline, I, II, and III. The earliest Minoan dates from the last part of the Neolithic Age. It has been found possible to relate this civilization to the history of Egypt, Early Minoan being roughly synchronous with the first ten Egyptian dynasties (3400–2100 B.C.), Middle Minoan with the 11th–17th Egyptian dynasties (2100–1600 B.C.), and Late Minoan with the 18th and 19th Egyptian dynasties (1600–1200 B.C.). Knossos was, in classical tradition, the seat of King Minos and the abode of the Minotaur.

Minories, a street leading from Aldgate to the Tower of London, which derives its name from the Minorettes, nuns of the second order of St. Francis, known as Poor Clares, whose house stood outside Aldgate.

Minorites, Franciscan friars.

Minos, a legendary king of Crete, son of Zeus and Europa (q.v.), who gave laws to his subjects and displayed so much justice and moderation that he was rewarded after death by being made supreme judge in the infernal regions. Attic legend, on the other hand, represented him as a cruel tyrant who imposed on Athens a yearly tribute of seven youths and seven maidens to be devoured by the Minotaur (q.v.). He caused Daedalus (q.v.), the constructor of the Labyrinth, to be imprisoned, and when Daedalus escaped, pursued him to Sicily, and was there slain by Cocalus, the king.

MINOT, LAURENCE, probably a soldier, the author, about 1352, of war-songs in various metres, on Halidon Hill, the Capture of Berwick, the battle of Crécy, the siege of Calais, and similar historical subjects. Though not of a high poetical order, the songs are spirited giving a vivid idea of medieval warfare, and marked by keen patriotism and loyalty to the king.

Minotaur, THE, a Cretan monster. Minos (q.v.) refused to sacrifice to Neptune a white bull which the god had given him for that purpose. The god to punish him caused his wife Pasiphaë to become enamoured of the bull, and she gave birth to this monster. Minos confined it in the labyrinth made by Daedalus (q.v.), where it consumed the youths and maidens paid by the conquered Athenians as a tribute, until Theseus (q.v.) delivered his country and destroyed the monster. Representations of a sport of bull-leaping or baiting (perhaps ritual or ceremonial) are frequent in Cretan art of the Minoan period.

Minstrel, The, see Beattie.

Minuscule, in palaeography, a small letter or script, distinguished from majuscule (q.v.) by being smaller and having one letter joined to the next.

Miðlnir or Mjðlnir, in Scandinavian mythology, the hammer of Thor (q.v.).

Mirabeau, GABRIEL HONORÉ RIQUETTI, COMTE DE (1749–91), a member, and in 1791 president, of the Constituent Assembly in the French Revolution; a man of fervid temperament and fiery eloquence, yet a cool politician, who played an important part in the early stage of the Revolution.

Mirabeau, VICTOR DE RIQUETTI, Marquis de, father of the preceding, see Physiocrats.

Mirabell, (1) the hero of J. Fletcher's 'Wild Goose Chase' (q.v.); (2) in Congreve's 'The Way of the World' (q.v.), the lover of Milla-mant.

Mirabilia Urbis Romae, a medieval guide-book to Rome. Its first form probably dates from the 12th cent., and it was perhaps 'kept up to date' till the 15th. There is a translation by F. Nichols (1889).

Miracle Plays, medieval dramatic representations based on sacred history or on legends of the saints. Whether they were evolved from alternating songs sung in church (e.g. at the service on Easter Eve, between the three women approaching the grave and the Angel who guards it), or were spontaneous expressions of the dramatic instinct, is a point on which the authorities are not agreed. What is perhaps the earliest English miracle play, 'The Harrowing of Hell' (q.v.), is of the late 13th or 14th cent., though such plays existed in France much earlier. They reached their fullest development in the 15th and 16th cents. The four great collections of extant English 'miracles' or 'mysteries' are known by the names of the towns where they were, or are supposed to have been, performed, York, Chester, Coventry, and Wakefield (the last being also known as the 'Towneley' plays). Their performance was supervised by the corporation of the town, the several episodes being generally distributed among the guilds of handicrafts, and acted on wheeled stages moved processionally from one open place to another, or only in one place. The scenes varied in length from 180 to 800 lines, and were written in different metres, sometimes rhymed, sometimes alliterative, sometimes both. They were played principally on festivals, Corpus Christi day, Christmas, Whitsuntide, Easter. See also Mary Magdalene (Play of).

Not only is there no dearth of humour in these plays, but they are notable in the history of the drama for the introduction of comic by-play and episode. A good instance of this is afforded by the 'Second Shepherd's Play' in the Towneley cycle. The shepherds are watching their sheep by night, when Mak the sheep-stealer makes his appearance. He succeeds in stealing a sheep and takes it to his home, where he and his wife put it in a cradle. When the shepherds search his house, Mak pretends that there is a new-born baby in the cradle; but the fraud is discovered and gives rise to much hilarity. They toss Mak in a blanket till they are tired; then lie down and sleep. They are awakened by an angel who tells them that the Redeemer is born and they must go to Bethlehem.

Sir E. K. Chambers's 'The Mediaeval Stage' is the classic work on this subject.

Miramolin (written Maramoline by R. Browning in 'Sordello'), a Spanish work, corruption of the Arabic Amir ul Muminin, 'Commander of the Faithful', the European designation in the Middle Ages of the emperor of Morocco.

Miranda, in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest' (q.v.), the daughter of Prospero.

Mirobolant, MONSIEUR, in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.), the French cook at Clavering Park.

Mirror for Magistrates, A, a work planned by George Ferrers, Master of the King's Pastimes in the reign of Henry VIII, and William Baldwin of Oxford, in which divers illustrious men, most of them characters in English history, recount in verse their downfall, after the manner of Lydgate's version of Boccaccio's 'Fall of Princes'. It was licensed for publication in 1559, and contained twenty tragedies by various authors. Thomas Sackville contributed the 'Induction' (in which Sorrow leads the poet to the realms of the dead) and 'The Complaint of Buckingham' (q.v.) to the enlarged edition of 1563. Further editions were published in 1574, 1578, 1587, and 1610. Sackville's contribution is the only part having literary merit.

Mirror of Fools, 'Speculum Stultorum', see Wireker.

Mirvan, CAPTAIN, a character in Miss Burney's 'Evelina' (q.v.).

Mirza, The Vision of, see Vision of Mirza.

Misanthrope, Le, one of the greatest comedies of Molière (q.v.), produced in 1666, in which he represents the conflict between the noble but cross-grained Alceste, exasperated by the corruption of society, and the worldly coquettish Célimène whom he loves.

Miserrimus, the sole inscription on a tombstone in the cloisters of Worcester Cathedral. The tomb is said to be that of the Rev. Thomas Morris, a minor canon, who refused to take the oaths to William III, was deprived of his preferment, and died destitute. Wordsworth takes a more mysterious view in his sonnet on 'A Gravestone', beginning:

'Miserrimus', and neither name nor date.

'Miserrimus, a Tale', by Frederic Mansel Reynolds (d. 1850), was published in 1833.

Misfortunes of Elphin, The, a novel by Peacock (q.v.), published in 1829.

MR. POLLY

It is an entertaining parody of the Arthurian legends. Elphin is king of Caredigion in southern Wales, but the bulk of his territory has been engulfed by the sea, owing to the drunkenness of Prince Seithenyn, who was charged with the duty of maintaining the embankment to keep out the waves. Elphin himself, during the greater part of the story, is imprisoned by a more powerful neighbour for refusing to recognize that the latter's wife is more chaste and beautiful than his own. The young bard Taliesin effects his rescue by enlisting the aid of King Arthur. This he obtains by restoring to him Guinevere, who has been abducted by King Melvas. The book includes the celebrated 'War-Song of Dinas Vawr'.

Mishnah, the collection of binding precepts or halakhoth (see 'Halachah' under Haggadah) which forms the basis of the Talmud (q.v.) and embodies the contents of the oral law of the Jews.

Misrule, KING, LORD, or ABBOT OF, at the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th cents., an officer appointed at court to superintend the Christmas revels. At the Scottish court he was called the 'Abbot of Unreason'. Lords of Misrule were also appointed in some of the university colleges and inns of court.

Miss Kilmansegg and her precious Leg, A Golden Legend, a tragi-comic poem by T. Hood (q.v.), published in the 'New Monthly Magazine' (1841-3).

Miss Kilmansegg, the daughter of the wealthy Sir Jacob, is born and brought up in the midst of gold. Her horse runs away with her and falls, and she has to lose her leg. It is replaced by one made of gold, and becomes famous. The heiress has many suitors, but marries a sinister foreign count, who breaks her heart, and finally her head, this last with the golden leg itself, and the jury bring in a verdict of felo de se, 'Because her own leg had killed her'.

Mississippi Bubble, see Law (J.).

Mr. Clutterbuck's Election, a novel by H. Belloc (q.v.).

'Mr. F's Aunt', an eccentric character in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story, see Scenes of Clerical Life.

Mr. Polly, The History of, a novel by Wells (q.v.), published in 1910.

Alfred Polly, when the story opens, is a dyspeptic inefficient shopkeeper with a literary turn, who after a career as salesman to various employers, a small legacy, and an injudicious marriage, has bought an unprofitable little shop in a small seaside town. After fifteen years of passive endurance he finds bankruptcy approaching and prepares for suicide. Instead, he sets his shop on fire and bolts. He chances upon a perfect situation as man of all work at the Potwell Inn—perfect but for the landlady's ferocious nephew, who terrorizes and persecutes his aunt and threatens destruction to Polly if he doesn't clear out. Polly, nobly conquering his innate timidity, in three murderous encounters defeats and finally ousts the villain, and is left completely happy, having in the course of the story entirely gained the reader's affection.

Mr. Sludge, the 'Medium', a poem by R. Browning (q.v.) included in 'Dramatis Personae', published in 1864.

The poet puts into the mouth of Sludge, the detected cheat, a confession and defence of his profession of fraudulent medium. Browning distrusted mediums, and was strongly antagonistic to the American spiritualist, Daniel D. Home. But here he allows Sludge to make the best of his case and to place a fair share of the blame on the folly of his audiences.

Mistletoe (from old English mistel, (1) basil (q.v.) or (2) mistletoe, and tan, twig), a parasitic plant growing on various trees. The mistletoe of the oak was regarded by the Druids as a sacred plant. The cutting of it by the Druids with a golden sickle at the beginning of the year and with attendant sacrifice is described by Pliny (xvi. 44). A trace of this practice is to be found in our use of mistletoe in Christmas decorations. Shakespeare ('Titus Andronicus', II. iii) speaks of it as the 'baleful mistletoe'. According to Scandinavian mythology, Balder (q.v.) was slain with a sprig of mistletoe, the only thing that could harm him.

Mistletoe Bough, The, see Ginevra.

MISTRAL, FRÉDÉRIC (1830-1914), a French poet of Provence, who revived the glory of Provençal literature. His best-known works are the pastoral epic 'Mirèio' (1859), 'Calendau' (1867), 'Lis Isclo d'or' (1875), 'Nerto' (1884), 'La Rèino Jano' (1890). These were accompanied by a French translation.

Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures, by Jerrold (q.v.), appeared in 'Punch' during the year 1845, and greatly added to that periodical's popularity.

Mr. Caudle is a 'toyman and doll-merchant' and his wife is a voluble and jealous scold. The lectures, addressed to him when he wants to go to sleep, are reproofs for his mildly convivial habits, exhortations to take the family to the seaside, or disquisitions on similar domestic subjects.

Mrs. Lirriper's Lodgings, and Mrs. Lirriper's Legacy, Christmas stories by Dickens (q.v.), which appeared in 'All the Year Round', 1863 and 1864. Mrs. Lirriper lets lodgings in Norfolk Street, Strand, and her lodgers and past lodgers tell their stories.

Mistress of Phil'Areta, Fair Virtue, the, a pastoral poem by Wither (q.v., 1622).

Mrs. Perkins's Ball, one of Thackeray's 'Christmas Books' (1847).

Mrs. Warren's Profession, a play by G. B.

MITRE TAVERN

Shaw (q.v.), included in 'Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant' (q.v.).

MITCHEL, JOHN (1818-75), an Irish nationalist, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and a solicitor. He wrote for, and was editor of, the 'Nation', and was tried for sedition and transported to serve a sentence of fourteen years in 1848. He has left in his 'Jail Journal, or Five Years in British Prisons' (1856) a vivid account of his experiences. He escaped to America, where he engaged in journalistic work. His writings also include a 'Life of Aodh O'Neill', earl of Tyrone (1845), and a 'History of Ireland' (1869).

MITCHELL, S. WEIR (1829-1914), American author, born in Philadelphia, whose experiences as a specialist in nervous diseases bore fruit in psychological and pathological fiction: 'The Case of George Dedlow' (1880), 'Roland Blake' (1886), 'The Autobiography of a Quack' (1900), 'Constance Trescott' (1905). He also wrote historical romances, among them: 'Hephzibah Guinness', 'Westways', 'Hugh Wynne', 'The Red City', and 'The Adventures of François'.

MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL (1787-1855), is remembered for her charming collection of essays, 'Our Village, sketches of rural life, character, and scenery', begun in 'The Lady's Magazine' (1819) and published separately, 1824-32. The scene of these is Three Mile Cross, near Reading. She also published 'Belford Regis, sketches of a country town' (Reading) in 1835, 'Country Stories' in 1837, a novel, 'Atherton', in 1854, various plays, and 'Recollections of a Literary Life' (1852), which is of value for its chapters on some of her contemporaries.

MITFORD, WILLIAM (1744-1827), educated at Queen's College, Oxford, was the author of a 'History of Greece' (1785-1810), down to the death of Alexander, written at the suggestion of Gibbon, which enjoyed great popularity. It was the work of a pioneer and was superseded by the histories of Grote and Thirlwall.

Mithraism, the religion of the worshippers of Mithras, one of the chief gods of the ancient Persians, in later times often identified with the sun. His worship was introduced among the Romans under the Empire, and spread over most of northern and western Europe during the first three centuries A.D., the principal rival of Christianity.

Mithridate, a composition of many ingredients in the form of an electuary (a paste made with honey or syrup) regarded as a universal antidote against poison and infectious disease, so called from Mithridates VI, king of Pontus (131-63 B.C.), who was said to have rendered himself proof against poisons by the constant use of poisons as antidotes.

Mitre Tavern, THE, frequented by Dr. Johnson, stood in Mitre Court, Fleet Street, over against Fetter Lane, not to be confused with the Mitre in Fleet Street of the days of Shakespeare and Jonson, which stood farther west (Wheatley and Cunningham, 'London Past and Present').

Mnemōsṓnē, the mother, by Zeus, of the nine Muses (q.v.). The name signifies 'Memory'.

Moabite Stone, THE, a monument erected by Mesha, king of Moab, about 850 B.C., which furnishes the earliest-known inscription in the Phœnician alphabet. It is now in the Louvre in Paris, restored after having been broken in pieces by Arabs.

Moby Dick, a romance of the sea, by Melville (q.v.), published in 1851.

Moby Dick is the name of a particularly cunning and ferocious whale, known to many whalers by the peculiarities of its appearance, which has been the cause of so many disasters to its pursuers that it has become an object of fear and superstition. It has bereft Captain Ahab of his leg, and he has vowed revenge, and the story is that of the voyage of the ship 'Pequod' in pursuit of it. The author gives a mass of detailed information concerning the varieties of whales, their habits, anatomy, and commercial value, and the methods of killing them. He also paints a vivid gallery of pictures of the strange characters aboard of the 'Pequod', and, strangest of all, of the monomaniac Ahab. From a story of whale-fishing, the work becomes the epic of Ahab's attempted vengeance on his personal enemy. After a search round three-quarters of the globe, Moby Dick is found, and a thrilling contest, drawn out through three days, ends in its triumphant victory. It breaks Ahab's neck, crunches up or swamps all the boats, and finally sinks the 'Pequod' herself, with all hands, save one survivor.

Mocha Dick, a whale legendary among whalers, which served as the model of Melville's white whale, Moby Dick (q.v.).

Modern Instance, A, one of W. D. Howells's (q.v.) best-known novels, published in 1881.

Modern Love, a series of fifty connected poems, each of sixteen lines, by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1862. It is the tragic tale, somewhat obscurely indicated in monodramatic form, of passionate married love giving place to discord, jealousy, and intense unhappiness, and ending in the separation and ruin of two ill-mated lives, and the death by poison of the wife.

Modern Painters, a treatise by Ruskin (q.v.), of which vol. i was published in 1843, vol. ii in 1846, vols. iii and iv in 1856, and vol. v in 1860.

The first volume, written when the author was only four-and-twenty, was conceived in a mood of indignation at the artistic ignorance of England, and written in particular to defend Turner against the attacks on his paintings. It expounds the author's views of the principles of true art, points out the faults of such painters as Claude, Gaspar Poussin, and Salvator Rosa, and explains the merits of Turner's work.

Vol. ii, in the author's words, 'expresses the first and fundamental law respecting human contemplation of the natural phenomena under whose influence we exist—that they can only be seen with their properly belonging joy and interpreted up to the measure of proper human intelligence, when they are accepted as the work and the gift of a Living Spirit greater than our own'. The latter part is chiefly concerned with the function of imagination in art. This volume expresses the author's admiration for Tintoretto.

The third volume, after an essay on the Grand Style and a discussion of Idealism, passes to a history of the appreciation of landscape through the ages, from Homer onwards. It winds up, oddly, with an excursus on the Crimean War.

The fourth volume contains the famous passage on the tower of Calais church, and chapters on colour and illumination; followed, in this and the last volume, by a study of natural landscape in its various details, such as leaves and clouds. There is a notable digression (part v, ch. xix) on the peasantry of the Valais mountains.

The fifth volume proceeds to discuss the four orders of landscape painters—Heroic (Titian), Classical (Poussin), Pastoral (Cuyp), Contemplative (Turner); Dürer and Salvator Rosa; Wouvermans and Angelico. In the chapter on 'The Two Boyhoods', Ruskin describes the Venice of Giorgione and the London of Turner, and the work closes with a final passionate lament for the latter painter.

Modest Proposal, A, see Swift.

Modish, LADY BETTY, the coquette in Colley Cibber's 'The Careless Husband' (q.v.).

Modo, in Shakespeare's 'King Lear', iv. i, the fiend of murder, one of the five that possess 'poor Tom'.

Modred or MORDRED, in the earliest Arthurian legends is the nephew of King Arthur, being the son of Lot, king of Norway, and Arthur's sister. In Geoffrey of Monmouth he is the son of Arthur and his sister Morgawse. He traitorously seized the kingdom and Guinevere during Arthur's absence, and was killed by Arthur in the final battle in Cornwall. Modred may be identified with the Medraut of British mythology, a god of darkness (see Rhys, 'Arthurian Legend').

Moellades, in the pastoral elegy, 'Tears on the death of Moeliades', by Drummond of Hawthornden (q.v.), was Prince Henry, son of James I.

Mogul, from the Persian and Arabic Mughal, a mispronunciation of the native name Mongol, is the name applied to the Mohammedan Mongol empire in Hindustan. This was founded by Baber (a descendant of Tamerlane) in 1526. It reached its height under Akbar, Jehangir, Shah Jehan, and Aurungzebe, was broken up after the death of the last named, and finally disappeared in 1857. The GREAT MOGUL was the common designation among Europeans of the Mogul emperor.

MOGUL

'Moguls', in the middle of the 19th cent., was the name given to the best quality of playing-cards, from a fancy picture of the Great Mogul on the wrapper.

Moguntia or MOGUNTIACUM, in imprints, Mainz.

Mohammed or MAHOMET, the name of the founder of the Moslem religion, born at Mecca about A.D. 570, died in 632.

After marrying his first wife, Khadijah, he declared himself a prophet about 611, and sought to turn his fellow-countrymen from their idolatry and to restore the ancient monotheistic religion of Adam, Noah, Abraham, &c. He fled to Medina (the Hegira) in 622. He imparted from time to time to his disciples the revelations that he claimed to receive, known as the Koran. His favourite wife was Ayesha (q.v.), his favourite daughter Fatima.

Legend records that Mohammed, invited to show his miraculous powers, summoned Mt. Safa to come to him. He attributed its failure to do so to the mercy of Allah, for if it had come it would have overwhelmed him and the bystanders. Therefore, said Mohammed, he must go to the mountain, a proverbial example of bowing to the inevitable. Another legend tells of his miraculous conveyance on the horse Al Borak from Mecca to Jerusalem, and of his journey thence with the angel Gabriel through the seven heavens, to within two bow-shots of the throne. He was touched by the band of God, returned to Jerusalem, and was carried back to Mecca. The story that Mohammed's iron coffin floated in mid-air at Mecca attracted by loadstones is said by Gibbon to have been invented by Greeks and Latins. Mohammed was buried at Medina and his tomb has been a regular object of pilgrimage.

to be cannibals. There are references to the Mohocks in Swift's 'Journal to Stella' (8 Mar. 1711/12), in Gay's 'Trivia' (iii. 326), and in the 'Spectator' (No. 324).

Mohun (Mōōn), CHARLES, fifth Baron (1675?-1712), was a noted duellist. He fought his first recorded duel in 1692, and was tried in the following year for being concerned in the death of William Mountfort, a player, but was acquitted. He distinguished himself in the army, and, after another duel, engaged in a dispute with the 4th duke of Hamilton. In the encounter that followed, both combatants were mortally wounded. Lord Mohun figures prominently in Thackeray's 'Esmond' (q.v.).

Moldore, a gold coin of Portugal current in England in the first half of the 18th cent., from moeda d'ouro, money of gold. It was worth about 27s. 6d. In later use the word survived as a name for the sum of 27s.

MOIR, DAVID MACBETH (1798-1851), physician, wrote for 'Blackwood's' 'The Life of Mansie Wauch, Tailor in Dalkeith' (reprinted 1828), an amusing study of life and character in a small Scottish town, as seen through the eyes of the simple tailor, and depicted in racy language and with much humour. He used the pseudonym 'Delta'.

Mokanna, the 'Veiled Prophet of Khorasan' in Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.).

MOLIÈRE, the name assumed by JEAN BAPTISTE POQUELIN (1622-73), French comic dramatist, the son of an upholsterer attached to the court. He began his career as groom-upholsterer to the king, but soon turned to the stage, became an actor and subsequently manager of a perambulating company, for which he composed some of his minor comedies and farces (L'Étourdi (1655), Le Dépit amoureux (1656)). His real genius is first shown in Les Précieuses ridicules, acted in Paris in 1659. In this, abandoning imitations of Plautus and Terence, he introduced the ridicule of actual French society, with its various types of folly, oddity, pedantry, or vice, as the subject of French comedy. His most famous plays were, besides that above mentioned: Sganarelle (1660), L'École des maris (1661), L'École des femmes (1662), Le Tartuffe (1664), Le Festin de Pierre (Don Juan) (1665), Le Misanthrope and Le Médecin malgré lui (1666), Amphitryon (q.v., 1668), George Dandin (1668), L'Avare (q.v., 1668), Le Bourgeois gentilhomme (1670), Les Femmes savantes and Le Malade imaginaire (1673).

Molina, LUIS (1535-1600), a Spanish Jesuit who propounded the doctrine that the efficacy of grace depends simply on the will which freely accepts it. The term MOLINISM is applied both to this doctrine and to the Quietism of Miguel Molinos (q.v.).

MOLINA, TIRSO DA, see Telles.

MOLINOS, MIGUEL (1640-96), a Spanish priest, founder of the Quietist (q.v.) sect. His Moll Cutpurse, Mary Frith, a notorious thief, fortune-teller, and forger, who lived about 1584-1659. She did penance at St. Paul's Cross in 1612. She is the heroine of Middleton and Dekker's 'The Roaring Girl' (q.v.).

Moll Flanders, The Fortunes and Misfortunes of the famous, a romance by Defoe (q.v.), published in 1722.

This purports to be the autobiography of the daughter of a woman who had been transported to Virginia for theft soon after her child's birth. The child, abandoned in England, is brought up in the house of the compassionate mayor of Colchester. The story relates her seduction, her subsequent marriages and liaisons, and her visit to Virginia, where she finds her mother and discovers that she has unwittingly married her own brother. After leaving him and returning to England, she is presently reduced to destitution. She becomes an extremely successful pickpocket and thief, but is presently detected and transported to Virginia, in company with one of her former husbands, a highwayman. With the funds that each has amassed, they set up as planters, and Moll moreover finds that she has inherited a plantation from her mother. She and her husband spend their declining years in an atmosphere of penitence and prosperity.

Molly Bawn, or The Shooting of his Dear, a traditional ballad (in Jamieson's 'Popular Ballads', 1806, Child's collection, &c.).

Molly Maguires, members of a secret society formed in Ireland in 1843 for the purpose of resisting the payment of rent. They 'were generally stout active young men, dressed up in women's clothes' (W. S. Trench, 'Realities of Irish Life').

Molly Mog, or the Fair Maid of the Inn, a ballad probably by John Gay, and it has been suggested that Pope and Swift were part authors. It first appeared in 'Mist's Weekly Journal', with a note to the effect that 'it was writ by two or three men of wit, upon the occasion of their lying at a certain Inn at Ockingham, where the daughter of the House was remarkably pretty, and whose name was Molly Mog'.

Moloch or MOLECH, the name of a Canaanite idol, to whom children were sacrificed as burnt-offerings (Lev. xviii. 21 and 2 Kings xxiii. 10), represented by Milton ('Paradise Lost', i. 392) as one of the chief of the fallen angels. Hence applied to an object to which horrible sacrifices are made.

Moly, a fabulous herb endowed with magic properties, said by Homer to have been given by Hermes to Odysseus as a charm against the sorceries of Circe ('Odyssey', x).

MOMMSEN, THEODOR (1817-1903), a great German historian and archaeologist, was from 1857 professor of ancient history at Berlin. He published his celebrated 'Roman History' in 1854-6, and other treatises and articles relating to Roman chronology, coins, law, &c. He edited Cassiodorus and was also editor of the great 'Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum' for the Berlin Academy. Mommsen took an active part in politics and was a member of the Prussian House of Delegates.

Momus, the god of fault-finding among the ancients, who criticized whatever the gods did. For instance he blamed Vulcan because, in the human form that he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in the breast by which its secret thoughts might be brought to light.

Mona Lisa, known in France also as 'La Joconde' and in Italy as 'La Gioconda', the wife of Francesco del Giocondo, painted by Leonardo da Vinci, one of the most beautiful and finished portraits in the world, noted for the strange smile that it depicts. The picture was brought to France by Francis I, and is now in the Louvre.

Monastery, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1820.

The story centres in the monastery of Kennaquhair, of which the prototype is Melrose Abbey on the Tweed, and the period chosen is the reign of Elizabeth, when the reformed doctrines were first making their way in Scotland and raising up troubles for the religious community that gives it title to the work. The plot is slight. Halbert and Edward, sons of a tenant of the monastery, Simon Glendinning, are brought up with Mary Avenel, orphan daughter of a noble house, whose misfortunes have brought her to the hospitable roof of the Glendinnings. Both lads fall in love with Mary, on whose affections the gallant Halbert gains a stronger hold than the more studious and contemplative Edward. An English knight, Sir Piercie Shafton, takes refuge in Scotland from the pursuit to which his intrigues in the Catholic interest have exposed him, and is lodged by the abbot of Kennaquhair at the home of the Glendinnings. His arrogance, vanity, and ridiculous euphuistic manner of speech incense Halbert, and a duel ensues in which the knight is left for dead. Halbert flees, enters the service of the earl of Murray, whose favour he wins by his gallant demeanour, and who finally bestows on him the hand of Mary Avenel. Edward, disappointed of Mary, becomes a monk.

The author makes use in this novel of supernatural machinery, in the form of the White Lady of Avenel, a spirit or sylph, to restore Sir Piercie Shafton to life after being mortally wounded, and to work other marvels.

MONBODDO, JAMES BURNETT, LORD (1714-99), a Scottish judge and a pioneer in anthropology, who published 'Of the Origin and Progress of Language' (1773-92) and 'Antient Metaphysics' (1779-99). He is perhaps chiefly remembered for his orang-outang, who figures in both these works as an example of 'the infantine state of our species', who could play the flute but 'never learned to speak', and who suggested to Peacock the character of Sir Oran Haut-ton in his 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

Monçada, a character in Maturin's 'Melmoth the Wanderer' (q.v.).

Monêta, JUNO, 'Juno the admonisher', a goddess in whose temple at Rome money was coined; the origin of our word 'money'.

Money, a comedy by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), produced in 1840.

Alfred Evelyn, private secretary to the wordly-wise Sir John Vesey, loves Clara Douglas, as poor as himself. She refuses him, not wishing to involve him in her own poverty. Evelyn comes into a large fortune, and, stung by Clara's refusal, which he attributes to the wrong motive, proposes to the worldly Georgina, daughter of Sir John; but soon has reason to regret the step. To test her affection and her father's loyalty, he pretends to be ruined by gambling and the breaking of a bank. Thereupon Georgina promptly transfers the promise of her hand to a rival suitor, while Clara comes forward to help Evelyn. Thus released, and earlier misconceptions removed, Evelyn marries Clara.

Monomotapa, an ancient African kingdom on the Zambezi, celebrated by old Portuguese writers for its gold-mines.

Monophysites, Christians who believe that there is only one nature in the person of Jesus Christ. They include at the present day the Coptic, Armenian, Abyssinian, and Jacobite churches. The dispute as to the single or dual nature of Christ began before the middle of the 5th cent. and lasted for more than 200 years; it did much towards the separation of the Eastern and Western Churches. The intellectuals in the East were on the whole Monophysites; the mob in the East and nearly everyone in the West were for the 'two Natures'. The dispute finally merged in that whether Christ had two 'wills' or one (Monothelite heresy).

Monotheists, those who believe that there is only one God.

Monroe Doctrine, a political doctrine derived from the annual message of the President (in this instance President Monroe) to the United States Congress in 1823, when interference in Spanish America by the powers of the Holy Alliance was anticipated. The President stated that interposition by any European power in the affairs of the Spanish-American republics would be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States, and that the American continents were no longer open to European colonial settlement.

Mons Meg, a great 15th-cent. gun in Edinburgh Castle, so called perhaps from having been cast at Mons in Flanders; but Maitland ('History of Edinburgh') calls it 'Mounts-Megg'. It was removed to the Tower of London after the campaign of 1745, and restored to Edinburgh (at Sir W. Scott's instance) in 1829.

Monsieur Beaucaire, a novel of 18th-cent. Bath, by Booth Tarkington, American novelist (1869–), published in 1900, concerned with the adventures of Philippe de Valois, cousin of Louis XV, who masquerades as a barber in the suite of the Marquis de Mirepoix.

Monsieur D'Olive, a comedy by Chapman (q.v.), published in 1606 and acted a few years before. The plot is of little interest, but the play is enlivened by the remarkable character, D'Olive, 'the perfect model of an impudent upstart', fluent, self-confident, good-humoured, witty, 'a mongrel of a gull and a villain'.

MONTAGU, BASIL (1770–1851), legal and miscellaneous writer, educated at Charterhouse and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he was intimate with Coleridge and Wordsworth. He published 'Essays' and edited Bacon (1825–37).

MONTAGU, MRS. ELIZABETH (1720–1800), née Robinson, married Edward Montagu, grandson of the first earl of Sandwich, and became well known as one of the leaders of the Blue Stocking (q.v.) circles. She combined beauty with wit and learning, and her conversation was highly praised by Dr. Johnson. She was author of the last three of the dialogues included in Lord Lyttelton's 'Dialogues of the Dead' (1760), and of an 'Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakespeare' (1769), in which she defended the poet against the strictures of Voltaire.

MONTAGU, LADY MARY WORTLEY (1689–1762), daughter of the fifth earl and the first duke of Kingston, and wife of Edward Wortley Montagu, ambassador to Constantinople in 1716. She wrote from there some charming 'Turkish Letters' (published in 1763 after her death), and introduced into England the practice of inoculation against the small-pox. In 1716 Curll piratically published some of her 'Town Eclogues' and 'Court Poems by a Lady of Quality'. The 'Eclogues' were republished in 1747. They are lively pictures of contemporary manners. In 1743 she settled on the Lago d'Isèo, and during her residence there wrote many letters, most of them to her daughter, Lady Bute, published in 1763–7. She is also remembered for her quarrels with Pope, who attacked her outrageously in his verse. The standard edition of her 'Letters and Works' is by Lord Harncliffe (1837, enlarged in 1861 and 1893).

Montagues, THE, in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.), the Montecchi, a noble house of Verona, to which Romeo belongs, enemies of the Capulets (Cappelletti).

MONTEM

MONTAIGNE, MICHEL EYQUEM DE (1533–92), born in Périgord, and educated at Bordeaux, where he had among other teachers George Buchanan (q.v.), was the author of the famous 'Essais', of which Bks. I and II appeared in 1580, an enlarged edition with Book III in 1588, and a posthumous edition in 1595. They were first translated into English by John Florio (q.v., 1603) and again by Charles Cotton (q.v., 1685). They have been recently translated by E. J. Trechmann (1927). The essays reveal the author as a man of insatiable intellectual curiosity, kindly and sagacious, condemning pedantry and lying, but tolerant of an easy morality. After the premature death of his friend La Boétie, he is much preoccupied with the subject of death. The general conclusion of the essays, embodied in his famous question, 'Que sais-je?', is the recognition of the fallibility of human reason and the relativity of human science.

Montalban, in the 'Orlando Innamorato', the home of Rinaldo (q.v.), and the scene of a great battle, in which the Christians under Charlemagne are driven back by the Saracens under Marsilio.

Montargis, DOG OF: Aubry de Montdidier, a courtier of Charles V of France, was murdered in 1371 in the forest of Montargis (in the Loiret) by Richard de Macaire. The murderer was discovered by the persistency with which Aubry's dog showed its enmity to Richard. The king ordered a judicial combat between dog and man. The latter was pulled down by the dog and confessed his crime.

Monte Carlo, one of the three communes of Monaco, a principality on the Mediterranean coast of France, under the protection (since 1861) of France. Monte Carlo is a fashionable pleasure resort. The gambling tables there were made a popular attraction by François Blanc of Homburg, who obtained in 1861 a fifty-year concession, since transferred to a company and extended.

Monte Cristo, Count of, a novel by Dumas (q.v.) the elder, published in 1844–5. Edmond Dantès, falsely denounced by a personal enemy as a Bonapartist conspirator in 1815, is imprisoned in the Château d'If for many years, escapes, recovers a concealed treasure in the Island of Monte Cristo, and devotes years to the pursuit of his revenge under various names, including that of Count of Monte Cristo.

Montem, from the Latin ad montem, 'to the hill', a festival formerly celebrated every third year on Whit-Tuesday by the scholars of Eton, who in fancy costumes went in procession to 'Salt Hill', a mound near Slough, and there collected money from the bystanders. The money collected (known as 'salt') was applied to defray the expenses of the senior collegier (the 'Captain of Montem') at King's College, Cambridge. The last celebration was in 1844. [OED.] There is a description of Montem in Disraeli's 'Coningsby' (q.v.).

MONTEMAYOR

MONTEMAYOR, JORGE DE (c. 1521-61), a Portuguese poet, who wrote in Spanish. His chief work is his prose pastoral, interspersed with verses, the 'Diana Enamorada', in which he transferred Arcadia to the heart of Spain. It was extremely popular and was translated into English, German, and French. The English translation was made by Bartholomew Young (1598), and was perhaps used by Shakespeare in his 'Two Gentlemen of Verona'. The scene is laid at the foot of the mountains of Leon and the pastoral is occupied with the misfortunes of Sereno and Sylvanus, two shepherd lovers of the fair Diana, a shepherdess; and the loves, transferences of affection, and disguises of various other shepherds and shepherdesses. Happiness is finally restored by the agency of enchanted potions. (This was one of the few books spared from the holocaust of Don Quixote's library, but parts of it were extinguished.)

Montesinos, a character of medieval romance, who retired to a cave in La Mancha and lived there. Don Quixote visited the cave, and had a vision of Montesinos and other heroes (II. xxii, xxiii).

MONTESQUIEU, CHARLES LOUIS DE SECONDAT DE (1689-1755), French political philosopher, best known for his 'Lettres Persanes' (1721), in which, through the medium of an imaginary Persian visitor, the author criticized French legal and political institutions; and his greatest work, 'De l'Esprit des lois' (1748), in which he analysed the various kinds of political constitutions, denounced the abuses of the French monarchical system, and advocated a liberal and beneficent (yet monarchical) type of government.

Montez, LOLA, see Lola Montes.

Montezuma (1466-1520), the ruler of Mexico at the time of the Spanish conquest. He was seized by Cortes and held as a hostage. The Aztecs rose and attacked the Spaniards' quarters, and Montezuma, who at the request of Cortes attempted to dissuade them, was mortally wounded. W. H. Prescott's 'Conquest of Mexico' may be consulted. Dryden's play 'The Indian Emperor' has Montezuma for its subject.

MONTFAUCON, BERNARD DE (1655-1741), served as a soldier under Turenne in Germany, and subsequently entered the Maurist (q.v.) community of Benedictines, working in various abbeys and at Rome on the study of manuscripts. His chief publication is 'Palaeographia Graeca' (1708), which did for the science of Greek palaeography what the 'De re diplomatica' of Mabillon (q.v.) had done for Latin palaeography. His other writings include editions of Athanasius (1698) and Chrysostom (1738), 'L'Antiquité expliquée et représentée en figures' (1719), and 'Les Monuments de la monarchie française' (unfinished, 1729-33).

MONUMENTA GERMANIAE HISTORICA

MONTGOMERIE, ALEXANDER (1556?-1610?), a Scottish poet, who held office in the Scottish court in 1577 and became laureate of the court, but got into trouble and was dismissed. His principal work is 'The Cherry and the Slae', a long allegorical poem in quatorzains, on the contrast between the cherry growing high up and valued, and the sloe growing close at hand and despised, in which Hope, Experience, Cupid, &c. take part in the conversation. This was published in 1597. He also wrote a 'Flying betwixt Montgomery and Polwart', published in 1621, and sonnets and miscellaneous poems.

MONTGOMERY, ROBERT (1807-55), poetaster, author of religious poems ('The Omnipresence of the Deity', 1828, and 'Satan', 1830) which were extravagantly praised in the press, and severely criticized by Macaulay in the 'Edinburgh Review', 1830.

Monthly Review, The, founded in 1749 by the bookseller Ralph Griffiths. Oliver Goldsmith contributed to it articles of literary criticism in 1757. It was conducted by Griffiths until 1803, by his son until 1825, and expired in 1845. It was a rival to the 'Critical Review' (q.v.).

Mont-Jole-Saint-Denis, the medieval war-cry of the French. Saint-Denis (q.v.) is the patron saint of France.

Montmartre, a district in the north of Paris, a centre of literary and artistic cabarets. The name is perhaps derived from Mons Martyrum, the hill where St. Denis (q.v.) and his companions suffered martyrdom.

Montrachet, see Burgundy.

Montrose, JAMES GRAHAM, first marquis and fifth earl of (1612-50), the great general and rival of the marquess of Argyle, took a prominent part in Scottish history on the royalist side in the period immediately preceding the downfall of Charles I. He is the principal figure in Scott's 'A Legend of Montrose' (q.v.). An admirable 'Life of Montrose' was published by J. Buchan (q.v.) in 1913, revised and enlarged 1928.

Mont-Saint-Jean, a hamlet near Waterloo, whose name is sometimes used to signify the battle of Waterloo.

Monument, THE, London, was erected by Wren in 1671-7 to commemorate the Fire of London, which broke out in Pudding Lane, near by. On its plinth there was formerly an inscription attributing the fire to the Roman Catholics. To this Pope refers in the lines:

Where London's column, pointing to the skies,

Like a tall bully, lifts its head, and lies.

Monumenta Germaniae Historica, a great series of the medieval texts bearing on the history of Germany, begun in 1816 and still continuing. Its editors have included many famous scholars, such as G. H. Pertz, G. Waitz, T. Mommsen (q.v.), and L. Traube (q.v.). There is a full history of the enterprise by H. Bresslau, Hanover, 1921.

Monumentum Ancyranum, a famous inscription in Latin and Greek in the temple of Augustus at Ancyra (modern Angora), a copy of the record of the chief events of the life of Augustus, which in accordance with his wish was after his death engraved on bronze tablets in Rome.

Moody and Sankey, Dwight Lyman Moody (1837-99) and Ira David Sankey (1840-1908), American evangelists. After undergoing 'conversion' as a young man, Moody began his evangelizing activities by starting a Sunday-school in Chicago. He devoted himself to missionary work there and among soldiers during the American Civil War. With Sankey as singer and organist, they carried on a revival campaign in America and England. The compilation of the well-known 'Sacred Songs and Solos' was due to Sankey.

Moon, MAN IN THE, see Man in the Moon.

Moonraker, a native of Wiltshire, so called according to Grose (1787) because 'some Wiltshire rustics seeing the figure of the moon in a pond attempted to rake it out'. In Wiltshire it is said that they were raking a pond for kegs of smuggled brandy, and put off the revenue men by pretending folly.

Moonstone, The, a novel by Wilkie Collins (q.v.), published in 1868.

The moonstone is an enormous diamond that had once been set in the forehead of an image of the Indian moon-god. At the siege of Seringapatam it had come into the possession of an English officer, John Herncastle, who had killed its three Brahmin guards. It proved a dangerous acquisition, for other Brahmins set to work, with the utmost determination, to recover it. The moonstone is handed to Miss Verinder, in accordance with a testamentary disposition, on her eighteenth birthday, and mysteriously disappears the same night. Suspicion falls on three Indian jugglers who have been seen in the neighbourhood of the house. It has in fact been taken from Miss Verinder's cabinet, unconsciously, by her lover Franklin Blake, while under the influence of opium, and he has been seen to take it by Miss Verinder, who consequently breaks off relations with him, though determined to screen him from detection. From Franklin Blake, while still unconscious, the villain Godfrey Ablewhite, Franklin's rival for the hand of Miss Verinder, has obtained it; and the story is occupied with the contest of cunning between Godfrey and the three Indians, ending in the murder of the former, the recovery of the diamond by the latter, and the revelation of the mystery. Sergeant Cuff, one of the first detectives in English fiction, figures in the story.

MOORE, EDWARD (1712-57), author of the lively comedy of intrigue 'Gil Blas' (1751), and of the tragedy 'The Gamester' (1753), an exposure of the vice of gambling, through which the weak creature Beverley is lured to ruin and death by the villain Stukeley.

The plot of the former play is taken from 'Gil Blas', iv. iii et seq., where a lady masquerades as a student in order to get acquainted with a young man who has taken her fancy, maintains by a series of quick changes the dual role of the lady and the student, and achieves her object of winning the young man's heart.

MOORE, GEORGE (1852-1933), author, among whose chief works are: 'A Modern Lover' (1883), 'A Mummer's Wife' (1885), 'A Drama in Muslin' (1886), 'Esther Waters' (q.v., 1894), 'Evelyn Innes' (1898) and its sequel 'Sister Teresa' (1901), 'The Brook Kerith' (1916), 'Héloïse and Abélard' (1921), all novels; 'Celibates' (1895), 'The Untilled Field' (1903), short stories; 'Confessions of a Young Man' (1888), 'Memoirs of my Dead Life' (1906), 'Hail and Farewell' ('Ave', 1911, 'Salve', 1912, 'Vale', 1914), all autobiographical.

MOORE, DR. JOHN (1729-1802), studied medicine at Glasgow, and accompanied the young duke of Hamilton in his travels abroad from 1773 to 1778. He published 'A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany' in 1779, with a continuation relating to Italy two years later. His most popular novel, 'Zeluco' (q.v.), appeared in 1786, 'Edward' in 1796, and 'Mordaunt' in 1800. He went with Lord Lauderdale to France in 1792, and his 'Journal during a Residence in France' was published during the next two years. He was father of General Sir John Moore (q.v.).

MOORE, SIR JOHN (1761-1809), lieutenant-general, son of the above, became commander-in-chief in the Peninsula on the recall of Sir Harry Burrard (1808). He led the historic retreat to Coruña during the winter of 1808-9 and began the embarkation of the British force on 13 Jan. The French, who now appeared, were repulsed, but Moore was mortally wounded, and buried at midnight of 16 Jan. 1809, in the citadel of Coruña. For the poem on this subject see Wolfe.

MOORE, JOHN, the 'author of the celebrated worm powder', an apothecary to whom Pope addressed the 'Lines to Mr. John Moore', ending:

O learned friend of Abchurch Lane
Who sett'st our entrails free,
Vain is thy art, thy powder vain,
Since worms shall eat ev'n thee.

MOORE, THOMAS (1779-1852), born in Dublin, the son of a grocer, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and entered at the Middle Temple. In 1801 he issued a volume of 'Poetical Works' under the pseudonym of 'Thomas Little', by which Byron refers to him in 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers'. In 1803 he received the appointment of admiralty registrar at Bermuda, which he transferred to a deputy. He became the national lyrist of Ireland (Moore was a musician as well as a poet) by the publication of his 'Irish Melodies' (1807-35). In 1813 he issued 'The Twopenny Post Bag', a collection of satires directed against the Regent. He acquired a European reputation by his 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.), published in 1817. Owing to the defalcation of his deputy in Bermuda he became responsible for a debt of £6,000, and left England, returning in 1822, when the debt had been paid. His 'Loves of the Angels' (q.v.), published in 1823, excited much reprobation. He received in 1835 a literary pension, to which a civil list pension was added in 1850. Among his other works may be mentioned his novel, 'The Epicurean' (q.v.), published in 1827; his 'History of Ireland', which was not a success (1846); 'The Fudge Family in Paris' (q.v.), 1818; 'The Fudges in England', 1835, and his lives of Sheridan (1825), Lord Edward Fitzgerald (1831), and Lord Byron (1830). Of the last Moore was an intimate friend and Byron left him his memoirs (these were destroyed by Moore). Moore's own 'Memoirs' were edited by Lord John Russell, 1853-6.

Moorfields, see Moorgate.

Moorgate, one of the gates in the old walls of the City of London, opening on Moorfields, 'the great fen or moor' on the north side of the city, caused perhaps by the damming up, by the walls, of the streams flowing towards the Thames. Stow relates the attempts repeatedly made to drain this marshy area.

Mopsa, a character in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.).

Moral and Political Philosophy, Principles of, by Paley (q.v.), published in 1785.

This exposition of theological utilitarianism is largely based on the doctrine of Abraham Tucker (q.v.), to which it gives method and clarity. The happiness of the individual is always the motive of his conduct. It is brought into conformity with the general happiness by the incentives and sanctions provided by the Christian religion. The virtuous or vicious character of our actions, their conformity to or variance from God's will (which is for the general happiness of his creatures), can be determined by their consequences on mankind. An act of prudence is distinguished from an act of virtue in that 'in the one case, we consider what we shall gain or lose in the present world; in the other case, we consider also what we shall gain or lose in the world to come'. In other words, posthumous rewards and penalties are an essential part of Paley's ethical system; and the evidence for these is marshalled in his later works.

Moral Essays, four ethical poems by Pope (q.v.), published 1731-5.

They were inspired by Lord Bolingbroke (q.v.) and take the form of four Epistles. Epistle I, addressed to Viscount Cobham, deals with the knowledge and characters of men; it sets forth the difficulties in judging a man's character and finds their solution in the discovery of the ruling passion, which 'clue once found unravels all the rest'. Epistle II, addressed to Martha Blount, deals with the characters of women, the most interesting of these being Atossa, intended for Sarah, duchess of Marlborough, Chloe for Lady Suffolk, Philomede for Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough. It was said, but never proved, that Pope received £1,000 for suppressing the character of Atossa. These three characters were withheld until Warburton's edition of 1751. Epistle III, to Lord Bathurst, deals with the use of riches, which is understood by few, neither the avaricious nor the prodigal deriving happiness from them. The Epistle contains the famous characters of the 'Man of Ross' and 'Sir Balaam' (qq.v.). Epistle IV, to Lord Burlington, treats of the same subject as Epistle III, giving instances of the tasteless use of wealth, particularly in architecture and gardening, where nature should be followed. The epistle ends with advice on the proper use of wealth.

Moral Ode, see Poema Morale.

Moral Sentiments, Theory of, see Theory of Moral Sentiments.

Moralities, medieval dramatic pieces in verse, in which the biblical personages of the Miracle Plays (q.v.) gave place to personified abstractions, such as the vices and virtues. The action was simple and the purpose edifying. They belong mainly to the 15th cent., developing alongside of the 'Miracles'. They perhaps reached their greatest elaboration in Sir David Lindsay's 'Ane Pleasant Satyre of the Three Estaitis' (q.v.). Other well-known moralities were 'Everyman' (q.v.), 'Lusty Juventus' (the punishment of extravagance and debauchery), 'The Cradle of Security' (on the vices of kings), 'Respublica' (acted in 1553, under Queen Mary, directed against those who had enriched themselves out of Church property), and 'Magnificence' (this last by Skelton).

MORAND, PAUL (1888-1952), French diplomatist, novelist, and travel writer, author of 'Ouvret la nuit' (1922), 'Fermé la Nuit' (1923), 'L'Europe galante' (1925), 'Rien que la terre' (1926), 'New York' (1931).

Morat, in the canton of Fribourg, Switzerland, the scene of the famous victory of the Swiss over Charles the Bold of Burgundy in 1476.

Moravians, the 'Unity of Moravian brethren', a Protestant sect founded early in the 18th cent. in Saxony by emigrants from Moravia, and continuing the tradition of the Unitas Fratrum, a body holding Hussite doctrines. Its virtual founder was Count Zinzendorf, and it obtained many adherents in England and the American colonies. They strongly influenced John Wesley (q.v.). Morddure, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene',

MORDDURE

II. viii. 20-1, the name of the sword made by Merlin for Prince Arthur. Its more general name is 'Excalibur'.

Mordecai, in the book of Esther, a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, the foster-father of Esther, who, when Ahasuerus (the Persian king Xerxes) made Esther his queen, sat in the king's gate and frustrated the design of the chamberlains to lay hands on the king, and also the machinations of Haman. Hence 'A Mordecai at the gate'.

Mordrains or MORDRIENS, in the legend of the Grail (q.v.), the name under which King Evalak was baptized.

Mordred, see Modred.

Mordure, see Morddure.

MORE, HANNAH (1745-1833), was educated at her sisters' boarding-school at Bristol, where she acquired Italian, Spanish, and Latin. In 1773 she published 'The Search after Happiness', a pastoral play for schools. She was engaged to a Mr. Turner, but the match was broken off. She came to London in 1774, where she became intimate with Garrick and his wife, and obtained the friendship of Burke, Horace Walpole, Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, Mrs. Montagu, and the other ladies of the Blue Stocking (q.v.) coterie. Her tragedy 'Percy' was successfully produced by Garrick in 1777. It deals, in the light of 18th-cent. social ethics, with the conflict, supposed to occur in the 12th cent., between a woman's passion for her lover and her duty to the husband whom she has been forced to marry. This was followed by another tragedy, 'The Fatal Falsehood', in 1779. After Garrick's death, Hannah More turned her attention to other subjects, and published tracts for the reformation of the poor, 'Village Politics' and 'Repository Tracts', which proved very successful and led to the foundation of the Religious Tract Society. The best known of these was the 'Shepherd of Salisbury Plain'. Her 'Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great' (1788) also met with great success. In 1809 she published a popular novel, 'Cælebs in Search of a Wife' (q.v.). The later part of her life was devoted to philanthropic objects. She was an excellent letter-writer, and gives a vivid picture of the intellectual world which she frequented. Samuel Wilberforce and Zachary Macaulay were among her later correspondents. Her letters were published in 1834.

MORE, HENRY (1614-87), educated at Eton and Christ's College, Cambridge, and a fellow of his college, was one of the leaders of the Platonist movement at Cambridge. He received holy orders but refused all preferment, including two bishoprics. His voluminous works include 'Ψυχολογία Platonica, or a Platonical Song of the Soul' (1642), reprinted in 'Philosophical Poems' (1647), 'An Antidote against Atheism' (1653), 'Conjectura Cabbalistica' (1653), 'Enthusiasmus Triumphatus' (1656, an exposure of the prevalent claim to inspiration in the interpretation of the Scriptures), 'The Immortality of the Soul' (1659), 'An Explanation of the Grand Mystery of Godliness' (1660), 'The Mystery of Iniquity' (1664), 'Enchiridion Ethicum' (1667), and 'Divine Dialogues' (1668), his best-known work. In his earlier writings More's object was to combat scepticism by calling pagan philosophy and contemporary science to the support of Christianity, though later (in his 'Enchiridion Metaphysicum' (1668)) he renounced Cartesianism.

MORE, SIR THOMAS (ST.) (1478-1535), son of Sir John More, a judge, was educated at St. Anthony's School, Threadneedle Street, London, and at Canterbury Hall, Oxford, where he was the pupil of Linacre and Grocyn. He was for a time in youth in the household of Cardinal Morton, and it was probably from Morton's information that he derived his knowledge of Richard III's murder of the Princes, &c. He was called to the bar, where he was brilliantly successful. He devoted his leisure to literature, becoming intimate (1497) with Colet, Lily, and Erasmus, who afterwards stayed frequently at his house. He entered parliament in 1504. During an absence as envoy to Flanders he sketched his description (in Latin) of the imaginary island of 'Utopia' (q.v.), which he completed and published in 1516. He became master of requests and privy councillor in 1518, being treated by Henry VIII with exceptional courtesy during his residence at court. He was present at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, 1520, where he met William Budé, or Budaeus, the greatest Greek scholar of the age. He completed his 'Dialogue', his first controversial book in English (directed mainly against Tyndale's writings), in 1528. He succeeded Wolsey as lord chancellor in 1529, but resigned the post in 1532 and lived for some time in retirement, mainly engaged in controversy with Tyndale and Frith.

Although willing to swear fidelity to the new Act of Succession, More refused to take any oath that should impugn the pope's authority, or assume the justice of the king's divorce from Queen Catharine, 1534; he was therefore committed to the Tower of London with John Fisher (q.v.), bishop of Rochester, who had assumed a like attitude. During the first days of his imprisonment he prepared a 'Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation' and treatises on Christ's passion. He was indicted of high treason, found guilty, and beheaded in 1535. His body was buried in St. Peter's in the Tower and his head exhibited on London Bridge. See also Roper.

More was a critic and a patron of art, and Holbein is said to have stayed three years in his house at Chelsea, and painted portraits of More and his family. More's other chief English works are his 'Life of John Picus,

MORE

Earl of Mirandula (printed by Wynkyn de Worde, 1510), his 'History of Richard III' (printed imperfectly in Grafton's 'Chronicle', 1543, used by Hall, and printed fully by Rastell in 1557), 'Supplycacyon of Soulys' (1529), 'Confutacyon of Tyndale's Answere' (1532), and 'An Apologye of Syr Thomas More' (1533). His English works were collected in 1557. His Latin publications (collected 1563, &c.) included, besides the 'Utopia', four dialogues of Lucian, epigrams, and controversial tracts in divinity. There is a pleasant description of More in his Chelsea home in the epistle of Erasmus to Ulrich Hutten, 23 July 1519 (No. 999 in P. S. and H. M. Allen's edition, translation in Froude's 'Erasmus').

More, Sir Thomas, a play of unknown authorship, which remained in manuscript until 1844. Parts of it have, on internal evidence and from handwriting, been attributed to Shakespeare.

It is based on some of the chief events in the life of More, as recorded in Hall's Chronicle: his rise to favour as a result of his successful handling of an insurrectionary movement in London, his friendship with Erasmus, his refusal to support Henry VIII's policy, and consequent imprisonment and execution. There are pleasant scenes where More is shown among his family, and giving a dinner to the Lord Mayor; and also an interesting fragment of a 'morality'. The play contains some fine poetry and is one of the best of the Shakespeare apocrypha.

More of More Hall, see Dragon of Wantley.

MORÈRI, LOUIS (1643-80), a French priest, author of a 'Grand dictionnaire historique' (1674), a pioneer work of its kind.

Moresque, the Moorish Arabesque style of decoration (see Arabesque).

MORGAN, CHARLES LANGBRIDGE (1894-), dramatic critic and author of 'The Fountain' (1932) and 'Sparkenbroke' (1936).

MORGAN, LADY (1783?-1859), née Sydney Owenson, the wife of Sir Thomas Charles Morgan, made her reputation as a writer by her romance of Irish life, 'The Wild Irish Girl' (1806). Her best works were 'O'Donnel' (1814) and 'The O'Briens and the O'Flahertys' (1827). A book on 'France' (1817) was popular. 'Italy' followed in 1821.

MORGAN, WILLIAM DE, see De Morgan.

Morgan, in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.), Major Pendennis's valet.

Morgan, Mr., a character in Smollett's 'Roderick Random' (q.v.).

Morgan le Fay, one of King Arthur's sisters, possessing magic powers, who married King Uriens. According to one version of the legend, she reveals to Arthur the intrigue of Lancelot and Guinevere. In the 'Morte d'Arthur' of Malory she endeavours to kill Arthur, by means of Sir Accolon, her paramour, to whom she sends Arthur's sword Excalibur; and also tries to kill her husband, but the latter is saved by Sir Uwaine, her son. She is one of the three queens in the ship in which Arthur is carried off to be healed of his wounds. See also Lady of the Lake.

As MORGANA she figures in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.). She lives at the bottom of a lake and dispenses the treasures of the earth. Orlando penetrates to her residence and forces her, in the name of Demogorgon her master, to release the knights whom she detains. The term Fata Morgana is given in Sicily to a mirage occasionally seen at sea on the Calabrian coast (there are various legends about Arthur in Sicily, perhaps imported by Norman conquerors; see E. K. Chambers, 'Arthur of Britain').

In the romance of Ogier the Dane (q.v.) the fairy Morgana rejuvenates Ogier, when over a hundred years old, and marries him.

Morgana and Fata Morgana, see Morgan le Fay.

MORGANN, MAURICE (1726-1802), secretary to the embassy for peace with America in 1782, is remembered as the author of an 'Essay on the Dramatic Character of Sir John Falstaff', a vindication of Falstaff's courage (1777).

Morgante Maggiore, a poem by Pulci (q.v.), a recasting, with a burlesque element, of the popular story of the giant Morgante, welded with that of Roland and Roncesvalles. The real hero of the poem is Roland (Orlando), who, driven from the court of Charlemagne, encounters three giants, of whom he slays two and subdues the third, Morgante, converts him, and makes him his brother in arms. Byron translated a portion of the poem.

Morgawse or MARGAWSE, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', sister of King Arthur, wife of King Lot, and mother of Mordred, Gawaine, Agravaine, Gaheris, and Gareth. She is called Anna by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Morgiana, a character in the story of 'Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves' (q.v.).

Morglay, the name of the sword of Bevis of Hampton (q.v.). It is sometimes used allusively for a sword in general.

Morgue, the name of a building in Paris where the bodies of persons found dead are exposed for purposes of identification. The origin of the word is unknown.

MORIER, JAMES JUSTINIAN (1780?-1849), born at Smyrna, entered the diplomatic service in 1807, being attached to Sir Harford Jones's mission to Persia, and became secretary of embassy. He published two books of travel, 'A Journey through Persia . . . in 1808 and 1809' (1812) and 'A Second Journey through Persia' (1818), which provided valuable information about a country then little known. He also published a number of oriental romances, of which the best is 'The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan' (1824), which, in the form of a picaresque story (the hero, successively barber, doctor, assistant-executioner, and rogue generally, undergoes amusing vicissitudes), gives an accurate picture of Persian life and manners, and is said to have provoked a remonstrance from the Persian minister in London. This was printed in Morier's introduction to the sequel, a book in which Hajji Baba is transferred to England, whose customs are seen through the astonished eyes of the Persian.

Morland, CATHERINE, the heroine of Jane Austen's 'Northanger Abbey' (q.v.).

Morland, GEORGE (1763-1804), son of Henry Robert Morland, a portrait-painter, and grandson of George Henry Morland, a genre painter, was himself a painter of remarkable precocity, who exhibited when ten years old at the Royal Academy. He was a master of landscape, genre, and animal painting, and his most characteristic pictures are faithful reflections of lowly life in England. He early developed a taste for dissipation, and died in a sponging-house, his own epitaph on himself being 'Here lies a drunken dog'.

MORLEY, JOHN, first Viscount Morley of Blackburn (1838-1923), educated at Cheltenham College and Lincoln College, Oxford, was twice chief secretary for Ireland (1886 and 1892-5), secretary of state for India (1905-10), and Lord President of the Council (1910-14). His chief publications were: 'Edmund Burke; an historical Study' (1867), 'Critical Miscellanies' (1871, second series, 1877), 'Voltaire' (1872), 'Rousseau' (1873), 'The Struggle for National Education' (1873), 'On Compromise' (1874), 'Diderot and the Encyclopaedists' (1878), 'Burke' (biography) (1879), 'The Life of Richard Cobden' (1881), 'Studies in Literature' (1891), 'Oliver Cromwell' (1900), 'Life of Gladstone' (1903), 'Politics and History' (1914), 'Recollections' (1917). He chose 'Machiavelli' for the subject of his Romanes Lecture of 1897. Morley was editor of the 'Fortnightly Review' from 1867 to 1882, and of the 'Pall Mall Gazette' from 1881 to 1883. He was also editor of the English Men of Letters series.

Morley, Mrs., the name under which Queen Anne corresponded with the duchess of Marlborough (Mrs. Freeman).

Mormons, a religious community in the United States, which styles itself 'The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints', founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith, of Sharon, Vermont. The 'Book of Mormon', it is claimed, was revealed to him in 1827 as a 'parallel volume' to the Bible. Its doctrines are in general harmony with those of the Bible. An additional revelation in favour of polygamy, which Smith claimed to have received in 1843, aroused general hostility to the sect. Under the leadership of Brigham Young (q.v.), who succeeded Smith as president of the Mormon church in 1844, they made a remarkable pilgrimage to Utah, where they founded Salt Lake City in 1847. The 'Book of Mormon' establishes government of the community by a complicated hierarchy, including a president, two counsellors, a patriarch and twelve apostles, elders, priests, deacons, &c. Polygamy was prohibited by the constitution of Utah in 1896.

Morning Advertiser, The, one of the oldest of London newspapers with a continuous history, having been founded in 1794. It was devoted primarily to the defence of trade interests, having been founded by the Society of Licensed Victuallers of London, whose organ it remains.

Morning Chronicle, The, a Whig journal founded by William Woodfall (1746-1803), the printer, in 1769, and successfully conducted by him for twenty years. It rose to importance when James Perry became chief proprietor and editor in 1789. Its staff then included Sheridan, C. Lamb, Thomas Campbell, Sir James Mackintosh, Henry Brougham, Thomas Moore, and David Ricardo. Perry was followed by John Black in 1821, a most successful editor. Among his contributors were James and John Stuart Mill; Charles Dickens was among his reporters, and Thackeray his art critic. The 'Morning Chronicle' came to an end in 1862.

Morning Herald, The, a London newspaper that ran from 1780 to 1869, having at one time a very large circulation. One of its special features for a time was a selection of reports of police cases, illustrated by George Cruikshank.

Morning Post, The, a London daily newspaper founded in 1772. Under the management of Stuart (q.v.), Sir J. Mackintosh and S. T. Coleridge were enlisted in its service at the end of the 18th cent., and Southey, Wordsworth, and Arthur Young also wrote for it. It fell on evil days about 1850, but recovered its position under the direction of Peter Borthwick and his son Algernon Borthwick (Lord Glenesk, 1830-1908). It was amalgamated with the 'Daily Telegraph' in 1937.

Morning Star of the Reformation, THE, Wycliffe (q.v.), so named by Daniel Neal in his 'History of the Puritans' (1732).

Morose, the principal character in Jonson's 'Epicæne' (q.v.).

Morphëus, the son of the god of sleep, and himself the god of dreams.

MORRICE

Morrice, GIL, see Gil Morrice.

Morris, DINAH, a character in G. Eliot's 'Adam Bede' (q.v.).

MORRIS, SIR LEWIS (1833-1907), born at Carmarthen and educated at Jesus College, Oxford, contributed actively to the establishment of the University of Wales. His principal poetical works were the 'Songs of Two Worlds' (1871) and the 'Epic of Hades' (q.v., 1876-7). His simplicity of expression, melodious verse, cheerful optimism, and occasional exaltation made his work extremely popular, in spite of its poetic mediocrity. Morris wrote many later poems ('Gwen, a Drama in Monologue' (1879), 'Songs Unsung' (1883), 'Gycia, a tragedy' (1886), 'A Vision of Saints' (1890)), of which a collection was published in 1907. 'A Vision of Saints' is a Christian counterpart of the 'Epic of Hades', in which eminent Christian characters (including Elizabeth Fry and Father Damien) take the place of the figures of Greek mythology. Morris also published a volume of essays, 'The New Rambler' (1905).

MORRIS, WILLIAM (1834-96), educated at Marlborough School and Exeter College, Oxford, was distinguished not only as a poet and artist, but also as a decorator, manufacturer and printer, and as a socialist. He was the lifelong friend of Edward Burne-Jones. After being articled to an architect, he followed from 1857 to 1862 the profession of painter. He was one of the originators of the 'Oxford and Cambridge Magazine', to which he contributed poems, essays, and tales. In 1858 he published his 'Defence of Guenevere, and other Poems'. He helped to found, in 1861, the manufacturing and decorating firm of Morris, Marshall, Faulkner & Co., in which Rossetti, Burne-Jones, Madox Brown, and Philip Webb were also partners; and by his activities in this direction during the remainder of his life he brought about a complete revolution in the taste of the English public. In 1867 he published the 'Life and Death of Jason' (q.v.), and in 1868-70 the 'Earthly Paradise' (q.v.). 'Love is enough' (a morality) appeared in 1872, a verse translation of the 'Aeneids of Virgil' in 1875, 'Three Northern Love Songs' in the same year, and the epic 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), perhaps his finest work, in 1876. He founded in 1877 the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, and in 1883 joined the Social Democratic Federation, the doctrine of which, largely under his leadership, developed into socialism. On its disruption in 1884 he became head of the seceders, who organized themselves as the Socialist League. The verse tale, 'The Pilgrims of Hope', appeared in the magazine 'The Commonweal' in 1885. In 1887 he published a verse translation of the 'Odyssey'. His later works, with the exception of 'Poems by the Way' (ballads and lyrics), published in 1891, were mainly in prose. Two of them, 'The Dream of John Ball' (mixed prose and verse, 1888) and 'News from Nowhere' (1891), were romances of socialist propaganda. The others were pure romances, of which 'The House of the Wolfings' (1889), 'The Roots of the Mountains' (1890), and 'The Story of the Glittering Plain' (1890) have their scene in the remote northern regions of Europe. These were followed by 'The Wood beyond the World' (1894), 'Child Christopher' (1895), 'The Well at the World's End' (1896), 'The Water of the Wondrous Isles' (posthumous, 1897), and 'The Story of the Sundering Flood' (1898). Morris started in 1890, at Hammersmith, the Kelmscott Press, for which he designed founts of type and ornamental letters and borders, and from which were issued fifty-three books, comprising (1) Morris's own works, (2) reprints of English classics, and (3) various smaller books.

Morris twice visited Iceland, and the influence of the Sagas (many of which he translated in collaboration with Magnusson), as well as that of Chaucer, is apparent in his writings.

Morris car, the generic name for various models of English motor-car, the products of the Morris factories near Oxford; a type of the English family car. Sir William Morris (Lord Nuffield) was the first to apply mass-production methods to the manufacture of English motor-cars.

Morris-dance, a grotesque dance performed by persons in fancy costume, usually representing characters in the Robin Hood legend, especially Maid Marian and Friar Tuck. Maid Marian sometimes appears as Queen of May. The dance is referred to as early as the 15th cent. See also Revesby Play.

Morte Arthur, Le, a late 14th-cent. poem of 3,800 lines, in eight-lined rhyming stanzas, dealing with the loves of Launcelot and the Maid of Astolat, with Launcelot's love for Queen Guinevere, and with the last battles of Arthur and his bearing away to Avalon. See Arthur and Launcelot.

Morte Arthure, a 14th-cent. poem of 4,300 alliterative lines, dealing with the later history of King Arthur, and similar in essentials to the narrative given in the 'Historia' of Geoffrey of Monmouth and Layamon's 'Brut' (see Arthur), but with some details from other sources or the poet's own imagination, and with allusions to contemporary history. The poem was written in northern England or southern Scotland, and has been attributed by some to the Scottish poet Huchoun (q.v.). It shows pathos and humour, and includes vivid scenes, such as the description of the sea-fight between Arthur and Modred.

Morte Darthur, Le, a prose translation made from the French, with adaptations from other sources, by Malory (q.v.), in twenty-one books, and finished between Mar. 1469 and Mar. 1470. It was printed by Caxton in 1485. A MS. contemporary with Caxton, and considerably fuller than his text, was found in Winchester College Library in 1933, and forms the basis of the edition by E. Vinaver. The work is a skilful selection and blending of materials taken from the mass of Arthurian legends. The central story consists of two main elements: the reign of King Arthur ending in catastrophe and the dissolution of the Round Table; and the quest of the Holy Grail, in which Launcelot fails by reason of his sin, and Galahad succeeds. See under Grail and the names of the various characters in the book.

Morte d'Arthur, The, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1842 and subsequently incorporated in 'The Passing of Arthur' (q.v.), one of the 'Idylls of the King'.

Morton, HENRY, OF MILNWOOD, the hero of Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

MORTON, JOHN MADDISON (1811-19), son of the dramatist Thomas Morton (see below), educated in France, wrote farces and showed a special gift for adaptations from the French. His most successful piece was 'Box and Cox' (q.v., 1847); 'Done on both Sides' appeared in the same year.

MORTON, THOMAS (1764?-1838), who entered Lincoln's Inn in 1784, was the author of the successful comedies, 'The Way to get Married' (1796), 'A Cure for Heartache' (1797), and 'Speed the Plough' (1798, q.v.), which contain some humorous situations. The last of these introduced the name of 'Mrs. Grundy' into England.

Morton's Fork, the dilemma that Cardinal Morton, Henry VII's chancellor, proposed to merchants and others whom he invited to contribute to benevolences. Either their handsome way of life manifested their opulence; or, if their course of living was less sumptuous, they must have grown rich by their economy.

Morven, in the Ossianic poems of Macpherson, the kingdom of Fingal, situated in the north-west of Scotland.

Mosca, in Jonson's 'Volpone' (q.v.).

MOSCHUS (fl. c. 150 B.C.), a pastoral poet of Syracuse. The beautiful 'Lament for Bion', doubtfully attributed to Moschus, is a dirge for the author's friend and teacher. There is an echo of it in Milton's Latin 'Epitaphium Damonis', in his 'Lycidas', in Shelley's 'Adonais', and in M. Arnold's 'Thyrsis'.

Moselle, the name given to certain good beverage wines, grown on the banks of the river Moselle, less potent than those of the Rhine. See Ausonius.

Mosses from an Old Manse, published in 1846, is a collection of tales and sketches by Nathaniel Hawthorne (q.v.). The Old Manse itself is the author's Concord home, and best known among the book's contents are: 'Roger Malvin's Burial', 'The Birth-Mark', and 'The Artist of the Beautiful'.

Moth, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), Armado's page, connected by Sir S. Lee with La Mothe, the French ambassador long popular in London; (2) a fairy in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

Mother Bumby, Mother Bunch, Mother Shipton, see under those names.

Mother Goose's Tales, and Mother Goose's Melody, nursery tales and verses published by Newbery (q.v.). The name is taken from the 'Contes de ma mère l'Oye' by Perrault (q.v.), though 'Mother Goose' probably had a traditional existence much earlier. Lockhart (lxxxii) mentions that Scott thought he had traced her, if not to her origin at Naples, at least to a period of remote antiquity in Italy.

Mother Hubbard, the subject of a nursery rhyme. She goes to the cupboard to find her dog a bone, but finds none; and then sets about other errands for his comfort. The rhyme ends with an interchange of civilities between Mother Hubbard and the dog.

Mother Hubbard's Tale, or Prosopopoia, a satire in rhymed couplets, by Spenser (q.v.), included in the volume of 'Complaints' published in 1590. The ape and the fox, 'disliking of their hard estate', determine to seek their fortunes abroad, and assume the disguises first of an old soldier and his dog, then of a parish priest and his clerk, then of a courtier and his groom; their knaveries in these characters are recounted. Finally they steal the lion's crown and sceptre and abuse the regal power, until Jove intervenes and exposes them. The poem is a satire on the abuses of the church and the evils of the court.

Mothering Sunday, Mid-Lent Sunday, so called from an old custom of visiting parents on that day and giving or receiving presents. See also the Epistle for the Fourth Sunday in Lent.

MOTHERWELL, WILLIAM (1797-1835), a native of Glasgow, became editor of the 'Paisley Advertiser' and 'Glasgow Courier'. In 1827 he published his 'Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern', a collection of ballads, and in 1832 his 'Poems, Narrative and Lyrical', of which the best known and least characteristic is 'Jeanie Morrison'. With Hogg (q.v.) he issued an edition of Burns's works in 1834-5.

Motion, the name given to puppet-plays in the 16th and 17th cents. These dealt originally with scriptural subjects, but their scope was afterwards extended. Shakespeare in the 'Winter's Tale' (iv. ii) refers to a 'motion of the Prodigal Son', and we have references to 'motions' in Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fair', 'Tale of a Tub', and 'Every Man out of his Humour'.

MOTLEY, JOHN LOTHROP (1814-77), was born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, Göttingen, and Berlin (where he formed a life-long friendship with Count Bismarck). He was American minister to Austria, 1861-7, and to Great Britain, 1869-70, and from that time until his death lived in England. His principal works are 'The Rise of the Dutch Republic' (1856), 'History of the United Netherlands' (1860-7), and 'The Life and Death of John Barneveld' (1874).

MOTTEUX, PETER ANTHONY (1660-1718), was born at Rouen and came to England in 1685. He edited the 'Gentleman's Journal' (q.v.), and completed Sir T. Urquhart's translation of Rabelais (1693-4). He published a free translation of 'Don Quixote' in 1700-3.

MOTTLEY, JOHN (1692-1750), author of two dull pseudo-classical tragedies, a few comedies, and lives of Peter the Great and Catharine I, is remembered as having published 'Joe Miller's Jest-book' in 1739.

Mouldy, RALPH, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', III. ii, one of Falstaff's recruits.

Mount Zion or SION, the hill on which Jerusalem was built, used sometimes figuratively for the Christian Church, or (e.g. in the 'Pilgrim's Progress') for heaven. The name has often been given to dissenting chapels, as in R. Browning's 'Christmas Eve'.

Mountain, THE, the extreme democratic party led at first by Danton and afterwards by Robespierre in the first French Revolution, so called from the fact that it occupied the highest benches in the hall of the National Convention.

Mountain, THE OLD MAN OF THE, see Assassins.

Mourning Bride, The, a tragedy by Congreve (q.v.), produced in 1697. This was the author's only attempt at tragedy, and was received with enthusiasm.

Almeria, daughter of Manuel, king of Granada, has been secretly married to Alphonso, prince of the enemy state of Valencia. Circumstances place him a captive in the power of Manuel. The discovery of his marriage to Almeria infuriates the king, who orders the immediate murder of Alphonso, and further to punish his daughter determines to personate the captive in his cell, so that when she comes to save him, he may mock her disappointment. As a result he is by mistake killed instead, and decapitated. Zara, a Moorish queen, a fellow captive in love with Alphonso, but repulsed by him, finding the headless body of, as she supposes, Alphonso, takes poison in despair. A revolt against Manuel releases the true Alphonso, and he and Almeria are reunited.

The play contains lines that are widely known, such as the first in the play:

Music has charms to soothe a savage breast, and those which close the third act:

Heaven has no rage, like love to hatred turned,

Nor hell a fury, like a woman scorned.

Mouse Tower, see Bishop Hatto.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING

Mousterian, a name applied by archaeologists to an early form of palaeolithic industry, in which flints were mainly worked on one side only. It is associated with Neanderthal (q.v.) man. The name is derived from Le Moustier, a rock shelter near Les Eyzies, in the Dordogne, France.

Mouton Rothschild, see Claret.

Mowbray, CLARA and MR., characters in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.).

Mowcher, Miss, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), a humorous and good-hearted dwarf, a hairdresser and manicure.

Mowgli, the child in Rudyard Kipling's 'The Jungle Book' (q.v.).

MOXON, EDWARD (1801-58), publisher and verse-writer, came to London from Wakefield in 1817 and entered the service of Messrs. Longman. He set up as a publisher in 1830, his first publication being Lamb's 'Album Verses'. He married Lamb's adopted daughter Emma Isola. He published for Southey, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Landor, and other well-known authors. Moxon published two volumes of his own sonnets, 1826 and 1837.

Mozart, WOLFGANG AMADEUS (1756-91), was born at Salzburg, and showed extraordinary precocity as a musician and composer. He composed his first oratorio in 1767 (when eleven years old), and his first opera was produced in 1769. His work met with great success, but he was improvident, experienced much poverty during his brief life, and died in destitution. His principal operas were 'Le Nozze di Figaro', 'Don Giovanni', 'Così fan tutte', and 'Die Zauberflöte'. Besides these, he wrote church music, songs, forty-one symphonies, concertos, pianoforte sonatas, and much chamber music.

Mucedorus, The Comedie of, a play, published in 1598, of uncertain authorship included in a volume with the title of 'Shakespeare' in Charles II's library (but not by Shakespeare).

Mucedorus, prince of Valencia, in order to discover the virtues of Amadine, the daughter of the king of Arragon, assumes the disguise of a shepherd, saves her from a bear, and falls in love with her. Banished from her father's court, he next appears as a hermit, saves Amadine from a 'wild man', reveals his identity to her father, and is now successful in his suit.

Much, in the Robin Hood legend, a miller's son, one of the outlaw's companions. He figures in 'A Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode' (Ritson's collection of ballads).

Much Ado about Nothing, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably produced in the winter of 1598-9, and printed in 1600. The trick played by Borachio is in Bandello and Ariosto.

The Prince of Arragon, with Claudio and Benedick in his suite, visits Leonato, duke of Messina, father of Hero and uncle of Beatrice. Claudio falls in love with Hero and their marriage is arranged. Beatrice, a mirthful, teasing creature, and the wild and witty Benedick are ever engaged in wordy warfare. A plot is devised to make them fall in love. It is contrived that Benedick shall overhear the Prince and Claudio speak of the secret love of Beatrice for him; and Beatrice is made to overhear a like account of Benedick's love for her. The scheme is successful and they are brought to a mutual liking.

Don John, the soured and malignant brother of the prince, in order to wreck Claudio's marriage, contrives with a follower, Borachio, that Claudio shall be brought to doubt of Hero's honour. Borachio converses at midnight with Margaret, Hero's maid, dressed as Hero, at Hero's window, and the prince and Claudio, who have been posted near, are deceived by the trick.

At the wedding ceremony, Claudio and the prince denounce Hero, who falls in a swoon. By the advice of the Friar, who is sure of Hero's innocence, Leonato gives out that she is dead. Benedick, at the instance of Beatrice, challenges Claudio for slandering her cousin. At this moment Borachio, overheard boasting of his exploit, is arrested and confesses. Claudio offers to make Leonato any amends in his power, and is required to marry a cousin of Hero in her place. This lady when unmasked turns out to be Hero herself. Benedick asks to be married at the same time, and Beatrice, 'on great persuasion, and partly to save your life, because I was told you were in a consumption', consents.

Mucklebackit, ELSPETH, STEENIE, &c., characters in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.).

Mucklewrath, HABAKKUK, a fanatical preacher in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

MUDDIMAN, HENRY (b. 1629), a pensioner at St. John's College, Cambridge, was authorized as a journalist by the Rump Parliament at the request of General Monk, in 1659, in which year he started 'The Parliamentary Intelligencer' and 'Mercurius Publicus'. He became the most famous of 17th-cent. journalists, and his newsletters in manuscript, sent twice a week to subscribers all over the kingdom, were an important political feature of the day. One of his principal rivals was L'Estrange (q.v.), whose papers, however, he drove from the field. In 1665, under the direction of his patron, Sir J. Williamson (q.v.), he started the 'Oxford Gazette' (the predecessor of the 'London Gazette'), the court being then at Oxford on account of the Great Plague.

Mug, MATTHEW, a character in Foote's 'Mayor of Garret', said to be a caricature of the duke of Newcastle.

Muggleton v. Dingley Dell, the cricket-match in ch. vii of the 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Muggletonians, a sect founded about 1651 by Lodowicke Muggleton and John Reeve.

MUM, SOTHSEGGER

The belief of the sect rested on the personal inspiration of the founders, who claimed to be the 'two witnesses' of Rev. xi. 3-6. Muggleton (1609-98) was a journeyman tailor, and was imprisoned and fined for blasphemy. Reeve and Muggleton's 'Transcendent Spiritual Treatise' was published in 1652.

Mugwump, from an American Indian word meaning 'great chief', the name applied in the United States in 1884 to the Republicans who refused to support the nominee (Blaine) of their party for the presidency. It is used to signify one who stands aloof from party politics, professing disinterested and superior views. [OED.]

Muhajirs, the companions of Mohammed in his migration from Mecca to Medina (the Hegira, 622).

MULCASTER, RICHARD (1530?-1611), educated at Eton and Christ Church, was headmaster of Merchant Taylors' School and high-master of St. Paul's School. He was author of two books on the education of children of the middle classes, 'The Positions' and 'The Elementarie', published in 1581 and 1582.

Mulciber, a name of Vulcan (q.v.), meaning 'the smelter' of metals.

MULGRAVE, EARL OF, see Sheffield.

Mulla, frequently referred to in Spenser's poems, is the river Mulla or Awbeg, a tributary of the Blackwater in Ireland, near which stood Kilcolman Castle, his residence when he composed the 'Faerie Queene'.

Mullah, THE MAD, a fanatical Moslem teacher, of Surat on the Indian frontier, who incited risings in 1897-8. A 'Mad Mullah' also led risings in Somaliland in 1899-1910. 'Mullah' is a corrupt pronunciation of an Arabic word meaning one learned in the sacred law.

MÜLLER, FRIEDRICH MAX, see Max Müller.

Mulliner, MR., (1) in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.), the Hon. Mrs. Jamieson's butler; (2) the teller of some of the stories by P. G. Wodehouse (q.v.).

MULOCK, DINAH MARIA (Mrs. Craik) (1826-87), author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman' (q.v.).

Mulready, WILLIAM (1786-1863), a genre painter, is remembered as the designer of the MULREADY ENVELOPE, the penny postage envelope issued by Rowland Hill in 1840. It was caricatured by Leech in 'Punch'.

Mulvaney, TERENCE, with Stanley Ortheris and John Learoyd, the three privates in Rudyard Kipling's 'Soldiers Three'.

Mum, Sothsegger, 'Hush, Truth-teller', the title of an alliterative poem of the time of 'Piers Plowman' (q.v.). The title has long been known. The identification of the poem with a fragment which occurs in one of the manuscripts of the B-text of 'Piers Plowman', named 'Richard the Redeless' by Skeat, has been rendered possible by the discovery of a manuscript published in 1936. The fragment, which deals with the misrule of Richard II, was ascribed by Skeat and Jusserand to the author of 'Piers Plowman', but internal evidence makes the ascription doubtful. It was published by the E.E.T.S. in 1936.

Mumbo Jumbo, a grotesque idol said to have been worshipped by certain negro tribes in Africa. According to the descriptions given by Moore and Mungo Park, it was a bugbear used by husbands to terrify their wives and keep them in order. The term is used in English to signify an object of unintelligent veneration and the ceremonies connected with it.

Mumm, see Champagne.

Mummers' Play, THE, or ST. GEORGE PLAY, a folk-play evolved from the sword-dance (q.v.), widely spread through England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. The play, in its characters and detailed action, varies in different localities, but the main lines are as follows. The principal characters are St. George (Sir George, King George, Prince George), the Turkish knight, Captain Slasher, and the Doctor. By the side of these are minor personages, bearing, according to the different versions, a great variety of names. After a brief prologue, the several fighting characters advance and introduce themselves, or are introduced, in vaunting rhymes. A duel or several duels follow, and one or other of the combatants is killed. The Doctor then enters, boasts his skill, and resuscitates the slain. Supernumerary grotesque characters are then presented, and a collection is made. The central incident of the play is doubtless connected with the celebration of the death of the year and its resurrection in the spring. The subject is treated in E. K. Chambers's 'The English Folk-Play' (1933).

Mumpsimus, used as a vague term of contempt, an 'old fogey'; also a traditional custom or notion obstinately adhered to, however unreasonable it is shown to be. The term originates from the story (in R. Pace, 'De Fructu', 1517) of an illiterate English priest, who when corrected for reading 'quod in ore mumpsimus' in the Mass, replied, 'I will not change my old mumpsimus for your new sumpsimus'. [OED.]

MUNBY, ARTHUR JOSEPH (1828-1910), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, published various poems: 'Benoni' (1852), 'Verses New and Old' (1865), and 'Dorothy' (1880). His later works include 'Poems, Chiefly Lyric and Elegiac' (1901) and 'Relicta' (1909). Munby was secretly and happily married to his servant, who refused to quit her station. The fact explains some of the allusions in his poems.

vellous Travels, by Rudolph Erich Raspe, published in 1785.

The original Baron Münchhausen is said to have lived in 1720-97, to have served in the Russian army against the Turks, and to have been in the habit of grossly exaggerating his experiences. Raspe (1737-94) was a Hanoverian who, when librarian at Cassel, stole gems from the Landgraf's collection, fled to England to escape the consequences, and added to his resources by publishing in English a version of the Baron's narratives. They include such stories as that of the horse who was cut in two, drank of a fountain, and was sewn up again; of the stag that the Baron shot with a cherry-stone, and afterwards found with a cherry-tree growing out of his forehead; and so forth.

MUNDAY, ANTHONY (1553-1633), wrote or collaborated in a number of plays, and was ridiculed by Ben Jonson as Antonio Balladino in 'The Case is Altered' (q.v.). Among his plays are 'John a Kent and John a Cumber' (acted c. 1594, dealing with a conflict between two wizards of those names) and 'The Downfall of Robert, Earle of Huntington' (printed 1601), followed by 'The Death' of the same, of which the subject is the legend of Robin Hood, with whom the earl is identified. Munday wrote ballads, which are lost, unless the charming 'Beauty sat by a spring' in 'England's Helicon' (q.v.) is his, as it appears to be. He also translated popular romances, including 'Palladino of England' (1588) and 'Amadis de Gaule' (q.v., 1590?), and wrote City pageants.

Mundungus (from Spanish mondongo, tripe, black-pudding), bad-smelling tobacco. Under the name of Mundungus, Sterne, in the 'Sentimental Journey' (q.v.), satirized Dr. S. Sharp, author of 'Letters from Italy' (1766). Munera, THE LADY, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. ii, the daughter of the Saracen Pollente, the personification of ill-gotten wealth, whom Sir Artegall besieges and Talus drowns in the moat of her castle after chopping off her golden hands and feet.

Munera Pulveris, chapters by Ruskin (q.v.) of an unfinished treatise on political economy contributed to 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1862-3, the remainder of which was suppressed by popular clamour. The work was published in book form in 1872.

It purports to be an 'accurate analysis of the laws of Political Economy', and begins with a series of definitions, of which the most important, being the key to the subsequent treatment of the subject, is that of Wealth. Wealth consists of things essentially valuable, intrinsic value being the life-giving power of anything. A cluster of flowers, for instance, has a fixed power of enlivening or animating the senses and heart. This intrinsic value is not affected by men's contempt for it, and is thus distinguished from exchange value.

MUNICH

Munich, the capital of Bavaria, a stronghold of the Nazi party from its early days. At Munich took place in 1938, after the German absorption of Austria, the negotiations between Neville Chamberlain and Hitler as a result of which the subjugation of Czechoslovakia was postponed but not averted. An informal peace pact was also signed by Chamberlain and Hitler. The name is sometimes used as a symbol of the policy of 'appeasement', of compromise or surrender in the face of threats.

Munin, see Odin.

MUNRO, HECTOR HUGH (1870-1916), writer of fiction, began his literary career as a political satirist for the 'Westminster Gazette', and during 1902-8 was correspondent in Russia and subsequently in Paris of the 'Morning Post'. 'Reginald', his first characteristic collection of short stories, was published under the pseudonym 'Saki' in 1904, and was followed by 'Reginald in Russia' (1910), 'The Chronicles of Clovis' (1911), and 'Beasts and Superbeasts' (1914). 'The Unbearable Bassington', a novel, appeared in 1912.

MUNRO, HUGH ANDREW JOHN-STONE (1819-85), educated at Shrewsbury School and Trinity College, Cambridge, one of the foremost of English latinists, produced a famous critical edition of Lucretius, with a translation into English prose, in 1864. His 'Criticism and Elucidations of Catullus' appeared in 1878. His 'Translations into Latin and Greek Verse' were privately printed in 1884.

Murdstone, EDWARD and JANE, characters in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

MURGER, HENRY (1822-61), French novelist, author of the 'Scènes de la vie de bohème' (1848), a vivid and entertaining picture of Bohemian life in Paris.

Murillo, BARTOLOMÉ ESTEBAN (1617-82), a celebrated Spanish painter, born at Seville. He painted principally religious pictures, the Virgin of the Assumption being one of his favourite subjects. He also painted Seville street-arab types. His death was due to a fall from a scaffold while painting in a church at Seville.

MURPHY, ARTHUR (1727-1805), a playwright of the Garrick era, of more industry than originality. He wrote comedies, some of them adapted from Molière, tragedies ('The Grecian Daughter' and 'Zenobia'), and farces, which met with some success. Among his best comedies are 'Three Weeks after Marriage' (q.v.), produced in 1764; and 'The Way to Keep Him' (1760), on the duty of wives to be bright and amiable, and of husbands to be faithful.

MURRAY, GEORGE GILBERT AIMÉ (1866-), classical scholar, Regius professor of Greek at Oxford 1908-36. A distinguished interpreter of Greek ideas, both by his editions and translations of the Greek dramatists, and special studies like 'The Rise of the Greek Epic' (1907).

MURRAY, SIR JAMES AUGUSTUS HENRY (1837-1915), the son of a clothier of Hawick, was educated at Cavers school, near his native village of Denholm, and at Minto school. He became a schoolmaster and showed great activity in the study of languages and antiquities. In 1879 he was appointed editor of the 'Oxford English Dictionary' (q.v.), of which work he laid down the lines and with which his name is principally associated. He had previously to this established his reputation as a philologist by his article on the English language in the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica'. He was also author of a treatise on the 'Dialect of the Southern Counties of Scotland' (1873), and sent many contributions to the 'Athenaeum'.

MURRAY, JOHN (1745-93), the first of the famous publishing house of that name, changed his name to Murray from Macmurray. In 1768 he bought the publishing business of William Sandby in London. He was succeeded by his son JOHN MURRAY (1778-1843), who started the 'Quarterly Review' (q.v.) in 1809. The latter moved to Albemarle Street in 1812 and became acquainted with Byron, whose works he published. He also published for Jane Austen, Crabbe, Borrow, and many others. In 1820 he published Mrs. Mariana Starke's 'Guide for Travellers on the Continent', which led to the series of Murray's guide-books, several of these being written by his son JOHN MURRAY (1808-92), who succeeded his father in the business. Among the third John Murray's publications were works of Layard, Grote, Milman, Darwin, and Dean Stanley.

MURRAY, LINDLEY (1745-1826), grammarian, born in Pennsylvania, settled in England in 1784. He published an 'English Grammar' (1795), 'Reader' (1799), and 'Spelling Book' (1804), which were used in schools to the exclusion of all others. The 'father of English grammar'.

MUSAEUS, (1) a legendary Greek poet, said to have been a pupil of Orpheus (q.v.); (2) a Greek poet, who perhaps lived about A.D. 500, the author of a poem on the story of Hero and Leander (q.v.), which provided the groundwork for Marlowe's poem.

Muse's Looking-Glass, The, a defence of the drama, in the form of a play, by Randolph (q.v.), printed in 1638.

'The scene lies in the play-house at Blackfriars. Bird and Mistress Flowerdew, two Puritans, who serve the theatre with feathers and other small wares, enter; they express their abhorrence of play-houses; Roscius joins them; he prevails on them to see the representation of the play; Roscius explains the drift of it to them as it proceeds. This play has no plot; the object of it is to show that all virtues, and every commendable passion, proceed from mediocrity or a just medium between two extremes. At the conclusion [Bird and Mistress Flowerdew] agree that a play may be productive of moral good' (Genest). Dodsley remarks of 'The Muse's Looking-Glass' that 'it has always been esteemed an excellent commonplace book for authors, to instruct them in the art of drawing characters'. The scenes between the personages representing the extremes, e.g. Colax, the flatterer, and Dyscolus, the churl, are spirited and entertaining.

Muses, THE, the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemōsynē, born in Pieria at the foot of Mt. Olympus, who presided over the various kinds of poetry, arts, and sciences. Their names were Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomēnē, Terpsichorē, Erato, Pōlyhymnia, Urania, and Calliōpē (qq.v.). Helicon was sacred to them, and Parnassus, with its Castalian spring, was one of their chief seats.

Musidōrus, a character in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.).

Musophilus, or Defence of all Learning, a poem in six- and eight-lined stanzas by S. Daniel (q.v.), published in 1599. It takes the form of a discussion between Musophilus and Philocosmus, in which the former defends the merits of knowledge and virtue against the more worldly unlettered arts, and it shows Daniel's gift for moral reflection at its best. It contains the notable prophetic lines:

And who, in time, knowes whither we may vent
The treasure of our tongue, to what strange shores
The gaine of our best glory shall be sent, T'inrich unknowing Nations with our stores?
What worlds in th'yet unformed Occident
May come refin'd with th'accents that are ours?

Muspellheim, in Scandinavian mythology, the home of Muspell or elemental fire, a region separated from Niflheim (q.v.) by the chasm Ginnungagap (q.v.). It is the sons of Muspell who, under Surtur their leader, destroy the world at Ragnarök (q.v.).

MUSSET, ALFRED DE (1810-57), French poet of the romantic school, who wrote some remarkable dramas, in particular 'On ne badine pas avec l'amour' (1834), 'Lorenzaccio', 'André del Sarto'; a prose romance, 'La Confession d'un Enfant du Siècle' (1836); and much passionate lyrical verse, included in the meditations entitled 'Nuits' (1835-7), 'Rolla', &c. The episode of his journey to Italy with George Sand in 1833-4 and their rupture, with its literary reverberations, had considerable notoriety.

Mussolini, BENITO (1883-1945), an Italian of humble origin, a man of some oratorical talent and a clever political showman, became prominent in the period of unrest and weak government that in Italy followed the war of 1914-18. He organized ex-service men's clubs (fasci, see Fascist) in support of his political group. A Fascist congress was held in Oct. 1922 at which he demanded that the government of the country should be surrendered to the Fascists. A march on the capital at once followed and before the end of the year Mussolini was prime minister. In 1925 a new constitution made him the dictator of the State. With the pursuit of economic self-sufficiency for the country he coupled a policy of extension of its overseas possessions, principally manifested in the conquest of Abyssinia in 1935-6. In the latter year Mussolini and Hitler decided to support Franco in the Spanish Civil war, and on 1 November 1936 the 'Berlin-Rome Axis' or political association of Germany and Italy was proclaimed. On the outbreak of the war of Britain and France against Germany in Sept. 1939 Mussolini announced the neutrality of Italy, but declared war in June 1940 when German victory seemed certain. In July 1943, when Sicily had been invaded by the Allies, Mussolini was forced by the Fascist Grand Council to resign. In September of that year he fell into allied hands, but was rescued by Germans and resumed direction of Fascism in Italy. He was captured by Italian partisans and executed on 28 April 1945.

Mustapha, a tragedy by Sir F. Greville (q.v.), published in 1609. Rossa, the wife of the Turkish Emperor Solymán, persuades her husband that Mustapha, his son by a former marriage, seeks his life; she endeavours thereby to advance the prospects of her own children. Camena, the virtuous daughter of Rossa, defends the innocence of Mustapha, in vain. Mustapha refuses to seek safety in the destruction of Rossa and her faction, and is presently executed.

Mustapha, a heroic play (1665) by R. Boyle (q.v.), based on the 'Ibrahim' of G. de Scudéry.

My Mind to me a Kingdom is, the first line of a philosophical song which appears to have been popular in the 16th cent. It is referred to by Jonson in his 'Every Man out of his Humour', i. i. The text is given in Percy's 'Reliques'. Bartlett ('Familiar Quotations') attributes it to Edward Dyer (q.v.), with alternative versions by other authors.

MY NOVEL

My Novel, or Varieties in English Life, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1853.

The main story is that of the career of Leonard Fairfield, a self-taught poet, who spends his infancy in a peasant household, suffers poverty and hardship, and turns out to be the son of Audley Egerton, a distinguished politician. With this is woven the tale of Dr. Riccabocca, an Italian refugee, who ultimately recovers his rights as duke of Salerno; of Harley, Lord L'Estrange, who has been ousted by his friend, Audley Egerton, from the affections of Nora Avenel, Leonard Fairfield's mother; and of the complicated intrigue by which the villains of the plot, the ambitious young Randal Leslie and Levy the money-lender, endeavour to effect the ruin of Audley Egerton, Frank Hazeldean (the squire's son), and Violante, the daughter of the Italian exile.

MYDDELTON or MIDDLETON, SIR HUGH (1560?–1631), a banker, goldsmith, and cloth-maker, remembered as having carried out the New River scheme, whereby a supply of pure water from the Chadswell Springs in Hertfordshire was brought to London by a canal forty miles long. He is mentioned in Lamb's 'Amicus Redivivus'.

MYERS, FREDERIC WILLIAM HENRY (1843–1901), educated at Cheltenham and Trinity College, Cambridge, became an inspector under the education department. He published several volumes of poems, including 'St. Paul' (1867), and 'Essays Classical and Modern' (1883). He wrote a monograph on Wordsworth (1881) for the English Men of Letters series, and also on Shelley for Ward's 'English Poets'. He gave much attention to phenomena of mesmerism and spiritualism and was one of the founders of the Society for Psychical Research. He was joint-author of 'Phantasms of the Living' (1886), which embodied the first considerable results of the society's labours.

Myrmidons, the name borne by a people on the southern borders of Thessaly who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan War, and were named after a legendary ancestor, Myrmidon, son of Zeus. According to another legend, a pestilence having destroyed all the subjects of Aeacus, king of Aegina, he entreated Zeus to repeople his kingdom. In consequence all the ants that were in an old oak were changed into men and called by Aeacus myrmidons from μύρμηξ, an ant.

Myrrha, the daughter of Cinyras, king of Cyprus, who became by him mother of Adonis (q.v.). When apprised of the incest that he had committed he attempted to stab her, and she, fleeing into Arabia, was changed into the plant called myrrh.

MYSTIC

'Myrrha' is also the name of a character in Byron's 'Sardanapalus' (q.v.).

Mysie Happer, the miller's daughter in Scott's 'The Monastery' (q.v.), who marries Sir Piercie Shafton.

Mysterles, a term used by modern writers as a name for 'Miracle Plays' (q.v.). A. W. Ward in 'English Dramatic Literature', i. 23, draws a distinction between 'Mysterles' as dealing with Gospel events only, and 'Miracle Plays' as concerned with legends of the saints. But this is not generally accepted. [OED.]

Mysterles of Udolpho. The, a novel by Mrs. Radcliffe (q.v.), published in 1794, which attained a wide fame.

The period of the story is the end of the 16th cent. Emily de St. Aubert, the beautiful daughter of a Gascon family, loses her mother and her father, and comes under the despotic guardianship of an aunt, Madame Cheron. An affection has sprung up between Emily and Valancourt, a young man of good family but moderate means. The aunt, who has more ambitious views, and has herself married a sinister Italian, Signor Montoni, carries off Emily to the sombre castle of Udolpho in the Apennines, the home of Montoni. Here, with all the apparatus of sliding panels, secret passages, abductions, and a suggestion of the supernatural, dark dealings are carried on. Emily escapes, returns to Languedoc, meets Valancourt again, and after further vicissitudes is finally united to him. Montoni, who proves to be the chief of a robber band, is captured and suffers the penalty of his crimes.

Mysterious Mother. The, a tragedy by H. Walpole (q.v.), published in 1768.

It deals with the remorse of a mother (the countess of Narbonne) for an act of incest committed many years before. Under the calamity of the marriage of her son, who had been the unwitting participant in her crime, with the girl born of their union, she takes her own life.

Mysterious Stranger. The, written by Mark Twain (q.v.) in 1898, and posthumously published in 1916, the tale of a visit of Satan to a medieval village.

Mystic, Mr., a character in Peacock's 'Melincourt', a caricature of Coleridge.

N

N.E.D., the 'New English Dictionary', more generally known now as the 'Oxford English Dictionary' (q.v.).

N or M, the first answer in the Catechism of the English Church. The most probable explanation is that N stood for nomen (name), and that nomen vel nomina (name or names) was expressed by N vel NN, the double N being afterwards corrupted into M (J. H. Blunt, 'Annotated Book of Common Prayer', 1890).

Naboth's Vineyard, the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, coveted by Ahab. Jezebel caused Naboth to be put to death that Ahab might have it (1 Kings xxi).

Nacless, in the legend of the Grail (q.v.), the brother-in-law of King Evalak of Sarraz. In the 'Morte Darthur', NACIEN is the hermit who tells how the quest of the Grail should be made.

Naglfar, in Scandinavian mythology, the ship that the giants will embark in at Ragnarök (q.v.).

Nag's Head Tavern, a tavern that stood in Friday Street, Cheapside. It was alleged by unscrupulous controversialists at the end of the 16th cent. that Archbishop Parker and others had, in 1559, after the Reformation, been irregularly and irreverently admitted bishops in this tavern, by Scory (formerly bishop of Chichester). As a matter of fact Parker was regularly consecrated by four bishops in the chapel of Lambeth Palace.

NAIRNE, CAROLINA, BARONESS, née Oliphant (1766–1845), was the author of some spirited Jacobite songs, of which the best-known are 'Will ye no come back again?', 'Charlie is my Darling', and 'He's o'er the Hills that I lo'e weel'; also of humorous and pathetic ballads, such as 'The Laird of Cockpen' (suggested by another song) and 'The Land o' the Leal'. Her poems, anonymous in her lifetime, were collected and published as 'Lays from Strathearn' in 1846.

Nala and Damayanti, one of the 'Indian Idylls' of Sir E. Arnold (q.v.), taken from the 'Mahābhārata' (q.v.). Prince Nala and Damayanti, daughter of the king of Vidarbha, fall in love. The four gods, Indra, Varuna, Yama, and Agni, hearing of her beauty, send Nala to her to bid her choose one of them for her husband. She rejects them all and adheres to her choice of Nala, and wins their approval of her action. They confer gifts on Nala, but later he loses his kingdom and all he has by gambling, and the pair are separated, to be united after many adventures.

Namancos, in Milton's 'Lycidas', 'Where the great vision of the guarded mount Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold', is a place in Galicia, near Cape Finisterre, shown in Mercator's Atlas of 1623. The Castle of Bayona is shown near it. A line from the 'guarded mount' (St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall) to Finisterre passes clear of Ushant.

NANSEN, FRIDTJOF (1861–1930), Norwegian explorer and statesman. His 'The First Crossing of Greenland' appeared in 1892. He sailed in the 'Fram' in 1893 with Johansen for the Arctic regions and reached on foot 86° 14' N., a voyage recorded in his 'Farthest North' (1897).

Nantes, EDICT OF, see Edict of Nantes.

NAPIER or NEPER, JOHN (1550–1617), laird of Merchiston, near Edinburgh, was educated at St. Andrews. He devoted himself for a time to the invention of instruments of warfare (including a prototype of the modern 'tank') and of a hydraulic screw for pumping out coal-pits. He then set himself to facilitate arithmetical operations, and devised logarithms, the nature of which he explained in his 'Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio', published in 1614 (the 'Constructio' followed in 1619). His 'Rab-dologia', published in 1615, explains the use of numerating rods, commonly called 'Napier's bones', and metal plates for effecting multiplications and divisions—the earliest form of calculating machine. He also invented the present notation of decimal fractions.

NAPIER, SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS PATRICK (1785–1860), served in Sir John Moore's campaign in Spain (1808), and in the subsequent war in the Peninsula. He published in 1828–40 his 'History of the Peninsular War', recounting events of which he had been in part an eye-witness. It earned a handsome commendation from the duke of Wellington in spite of the author's Radical outlook, and placed him high among historical writers; it was translated into many languages. He subsequently (1844-6) published a history of the conquest of Scinde (a defence of his brother Charles). He was promoted to Major-General in 1841 and to General in 1859.

Napoleon I, NAPOLEON BONAPARTE (BUONAPARTE) (1769-1821), of a Corsican family, first came into prominence as an artillery officer at the recapture of Toulon from the English in 1793. He was general-in-chief of the French army of Italy 1796-7, and was then sent to conquer Egypt, whence he returned in 1799. By a coup d'état at the end of that year he became master of the government and was named First Consul. Then followed the series of his European conquests. In 1804 he proclaimed himself emperor. The tide turned against him with the disastrous Russian campaign of 1812, followed by the defeat at Leipzig and by Wellington's victories. In 1814 Napoleon abdicated and was sent to Elba. He returned in 1815 and was in that year finally defeated at Waterloo. He died at St. Helena. He married in 1795 Joséphine, widow of the Comte de Beauharnais, divorced her, and married in 1810 Marie Louise, daughter of the Austrian Emperor Francis II, by whom he had a son, the duke of Reichstadt (d. 1832).

Napoleon III, (CHARLES) LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE (1808-73), was the nephew of Napoleon I (q.v.). In 1836 and 1840, while living in exile, he made two unsuccessful attempts, at Strasburg and Boulogne, to stir up Bonapartist risings. After the second of these he was imprisoned at Ham in France, whence he escaped in 1846. In December 1848, after the fall of Louis Philippe, he was elected president of the French Republic, became, as a result of a coup d'état, president for ten years in 1851, and was proclaimed emperor in 1852. Under him, France was Britain's ally in the Crimean War, and played an important part in the liberation of Italy by fighting with Sardinia against Austria in 1859. In the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-1 he was taken prisoner at Sedan in September 1870, and, after a period of captivity, spent the remainder of his life at Chislehurst. He married in 1853 Eugénie de Montijo (the Empress Eugénie).

Narcissa, in Pope's 'Moral Essays', is Anne Oldfield (q.v.). For the 'Narcissa' of Young's 'Night Thoughts', see under the name of that poem.

Nash, JOHN (1752-1835), architect, planned Regent Street and laid out Regent's Park. He enlarged Buckingham House, from which his large entrance gateway, known as the Marble Arch, was removed to Cumberland Gate, Hyde Park, in 1851.

Nash, RICHARD, 'Beau Nash' (1674-1762), born at Swansea, was educated at Carmarthen Grammar School and for a time at Jesus College, Oxford. He supported himself in London as a gamester, and went to Bath in 1705, where he established the Assembly Rooms, drew up a code of etiquette and dress, and became unquestioned autocrat of society. He assisted in founding the mineral-water hospital for poor patients. The gambling laws of 1740-5 deprived him of his source of income, and his popularity waned after 1745. In 1758 he was allowed £10 a month by the corporation of Bath. A biography of Nash was written by Oliver Goldsmith.

NASH or NASHE, THOMAS (1567-1601), was a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge. He made a hasty tour through France and Italy, and before 1588 settled in London. His first publication was an acrid review of recent literature (prefixed to Greene's 'Menaphon', 1589), which he discussed at greater length in the 'Anatomic of Absurditie' (1589). He was attracted to the Martin Marprelate controversy (q.v.) by his hatred of Puritanism. Under the pseudonym of 'Pasquil' he wrote 'A Countercuffe given to Martin Junior' (1598), 'The Returne of the renowned Cavaliero Pasquil of England' (1589), and 'The First Parte of Pasquils Apologie' (1590). He was possibly the author of other attacks on the Martinists. Nash replied in 1591 to the savage denunciations of Richard Harvey, the astrologer and brother of Gabriel Harvey (q.v.), with 'A wonderful, strange, and miraculous Astrologically Prognostication', and in 1592 wrote 'Pierce Pennilesse his Supplication to the Divell' (q.v.). This was translated into French, and the second edition was called 'The Apologie of Pierce Pennilesse'. Nash avenged Gabriel Harvey's attack on Greene (q.v.) with 'Strange Newes of the Intercepting certaine Letters' (1593). Being subsequently troubled with religious doubts, he published his repentant reflections under the title 'Christes Teares over Jerusalem' (q.v.) in 1593. 'The Terrors of the Night', notable for the praise of Daniel's 'Delia', appeared in 1594, and in the same year 'The Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jacke Wilton' (q.v.), a spirited romance of adventure. Nash further satirized Harvey in 'Haue with you to Saffron-Walden' (1596), to which Harvey replied, the government subsequently ordering the two authors to desist. He attacked so many current abuses in the State in his lost comedy 'The Isle of Dogs' (1597) that he was sent to the Fleet prison for some months. He published in 1599 'Lenten Stuffe', a burlesque panegyric of the red herring, written to repay hospitality enjoyed at Yarmouth, and a comedy still extant, called 'Summers Last Will', 1600. Nash's original personality gives him a unique place in Elizabethan literature, and his writings have something of the fascination of Rabelais. His romance of 'Jacke Wilton' inaugurated the novel of adventure in England.

NATHAN, GEORGE JEAN (1882-), American essayist and critic, born in Indiana, co-founder with H. L. Mencken (q.v.) of 'The American Mercury', of which he remained an editor until 1930. Its publication is of importance in the literary history of America, for it has been the mouthpiece of the sophisticated attitude of the American city towards the middle-western and western elements in the country, and of the aggressive 'hands-off' position which certain American authors have taken up in regard to Europe. His chief published works are: 'The Popular Theatre' (1918), 'The American Credo' (with H. L. Mencken) (1920), 'The Critic and the Drama' (1922), 'The Autobiography of an Attitude' (1925).

National Anthem, THE. The first recorded public performance of 'God save the King' took place at Drury Lane Theatre on 28 September 1745, during the excitement and alarm caused by the Jacobite invasion of that year. It was an unannounced addition by the actors to the ordinary programme of the day and a manifestation of their loyal zeal. The score used on this occasion was prepared by Thomas Augustine Arne (1710-78), leader of the orchestra at the theatre and composer of 'Rule, Britannia' (q.v.). The example set at Drury Lane was followed at other theatres and the song was soon very popular. It became customary about 1747 or 1748 to greet the king with it when he entered a place of public entertainment. In George III's reign it figured as a political battle-song in connexion with the Regency troubles and later during the dissensions aroused by the French Revolution. It was sung at the coronation banquet of George IV and the description of it as National Anthem appears to have been adopted early in the 19th cent. Variant versions, imitations, and parodies have been very numerous; among the imitations may be mentioned the 'New National Anthem' written by Shelley in 1819 after Peterloo, and the 'New National Anthem' of Ebenezer Elliott (q.v.), the Corn-law Rhymmer (1830).

The remoter origin of 'God save the King' is obscure. Before being sung at Drury Lane in 1745, words and tune, with slight differences, had appeared in 'Thesaurus Musicus', a song collection published in 1744. The opening words in the Drury Lane version were

God bless our noble King,
God save great George our King,
God save the King.

In the 'Thesaurus Musicus' they were God save our Lord the King,
Long live our noble King, which might apply equally to a Stuart or a Hanoverian monarch. There is good evidence that the song was originally written in favour of James II in 1688 (when the invasion by the Prince of Orange was threatening) or possibly of Charles II in 1681; but the author is unknown. As regards the melody, various 17th-cent. tunes of the same rhythm more or less resemble that of 'God save the King'. The closest resemblance is that of a galliard composed by Dr. John Bull (q.v.) in the early 17th cent. But this may be the key-board setting of some folk-tune or other well-known air of the time, and the tune of 'God save the King' may have been drawn directly from that original. The tune has been adopted by a number of continental countries for their national anthems.

For a fuller treatment of the subject see Percy Scholes, 'God save the King' (Oxford, 1942), on which the above article is based.

National Biography, Dictionary of, designed and published by George Smith (q.v.), was begun in 1882 with Sir Leslie Stephen (q.v.) as editor. It included in its original form biographies of all national notabilities from earliest times to 1900. Supplements carry the work down to 1930, and decennial supplements are projected. The 'Concise D.N.B.' is an epitome of the whole work. Sir Leslie Stephen was succeeded in the editorship by Sir Sidney Lee. Their names appear jointly on the title-pages of vols. xxii-xxvi (1890), and Lee's name appeared alone from vol. xxvii till 1913. In 1917 the Dictionary was transferred to the Oxford University Press. The 1912-21 volume was edited by H. W. C. Davis and J. R. H. Weaver; 1922-30 by J. R. H. Weaver.

Nature, a periodical founded in 1869, with Norman Lockyer as editor, for the purpose of providing the public with information on scientific matters. Charles Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and Lubbock were among its distinguished early supporters.

Nature and Art, a romance by Mrs. Inchbald (q.v.), published in 1796. It is the story of two contrasted brothers, William and Henry, and their sons. William, worldly and ambitious, becomes a dean. His son, a capable villain, becomes a judge, and hangs the victim of his own seduction. Henry, the good brother, a fiddler, marries beneath him, loses his wife, and goes to Africa. He is wrecked on Socotra with his infant son, and some years later sends home this boy, the younger Henry, to be educated by his uncle William. Young Henry, who has lived far from the conventions of the civilized world and retained his natural simplicity, makes pungent comments on what he sees in England, meets with various misfortunes, but eventually attains happiness, while the younger William becomes the prey of remorse and ends wretchedly.

Nausicaa, in Homer's 'Odyssey', daughter of Alcinous, king of Phaeacia. She finds Ulysses (q.v.) shipwrecked on the coast, feeds and clothes him, and brings him to her father's court. Samuel ('Erewhon') Butler (q.v.) argued that she was the authoress of the 'Odyssey'.

NEAL, JOHN (1793-1876), American author of Quaker stock, born at Portland, Maine, whose contributions to 'Blackwood's' (written as though the author were an Englishman) were among the first estimates of American culture to appear in England. His autobiography, 'Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life', appeared in 1869.

NEALE, JOHN MASON (1818-66), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, a man of much versatility, was the founder of the Cambridge Camden Society (q.v.). He was author of a 'History of the Holy Eastern Church' (1847-50) and of many well-known hymns, including 'Jerusalem the Golden', 'The day is past and over', 'Art thou weary, art thou languid', 'Brief life is here our portion', several of them translated from the 'Rhythm' of Bernard de Morlaix (q.v.), others from hymns of the Eastern Church. He also wrote an historical novel, 'Theodora Phranza', on the subject of the fall of Constantinople, reprinted in 1857 from the 'Churchman's Companion' of 1853-4.

Neanderthal, near Düsseldorf in Germany, gives its name to an early type of the human race, from a skull-cap and other bones found there in deposits of the Middle Pleistocene period. Neanderthal man, who is associated with what is known as the Mousterian (q.v.) industry, is believed to have arrived in Europe from the East, probably from northern Asia. He spread over the greater part of Europe, but died out, and modern man is not descended from him. He was succeeded by Aurignacian man (see Aurignac). (Peake and Fleure, 'Apes and Men', 'Hunters and Artists'.)

Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylonia 605-562 B.C., who built the walls of Babylon, and perhaps the famous 'Hanging Gardens' (q.v.), which are also attributed to Cyrus. His insanity is related in Dan. iv.

Necker, MADAME (SUSANNE CURCHOD) (1739-94), a Swiss woman, at one time engaged to Gibbon the historian (q.v.); she became the wife of Jacques Necker, the French financier and statesman. She was prominent in French literary circles of the period preceding the Revolution. Her daughter was the celebrated Mme de Staël (q.v.).

Neckett, Mr., the sheriff's officer in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.), generally referred to as COAVINSES, the name of the sponging-house which he keeps. He has three children, Tom, Emma, and Charlotte (known as 'Charley', who becomes Esther Summerson's maid).

Nemo, CAPTAIN, the hero of Jules Verne's 'Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea', in which the author anticipated the development of the submarine.

NENNIUS (fl. 796), the traditional author, but probably only the reviser, of the 'Historia Britonum', lived on the borders of Mercia, in Brecknock or Radnor, and was a pupil of Elbod, bishop of Bangor (d. c. 811). There are several versions of the 'Historia', the North-Welsh, the South-Welsh, the Irish, and the English. It is a collection of notes, drawn from various sources, on the history and geography of Britain, and is chiefly interesting for the account it purports to give of the historical Arthur, who, as dux bellorum, after Hengist's death led the Britons against the Saxons in twelve battles, which Nennius enumerates (including Mount Badon).

NERO

It is one of the sources on which Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.) drew for his 'Historia Regum Britanniae'. The 'Historia Britonum' was first printed by Gall, 1691, in 'Scriptores Quindecim'.

Neoplatonism, a philosophical and religious system, combining Platonic ideas with oriental mysticism, which originated at Alexandria in the 3rd cent., and is especially represented in the writings of Plotinus, Porphyry, and Proclus. The works of St. Augustine show its influence. One of the best-known exponents of Neoplatonism was Hypatia (murdered by the Alexandrian mob in A.D. 415), whose noble figure is depicted in C. Kingsley's novel called by her name (q.v.).

Neoptölēmus, the son of Achilles (q.v.), also called PYRRHUS on account of his yellow hair. It was he who killed Priam. When the Trojan captives were distributed, Andromache (q.v.) fell to his portion. He subsequently married Hermione, daughter of Menelaus, and was slain by Orestes, to whom Hermione had been betrothed.

Nepenthe, a drug supposed to banish sorrow (see Thone). 'Nepenthe' is the title of a beautiful poem by G. Darley (q.v.).

Nephelococcygia, 'cloud-cuckoo-land', in the 'Birds' of Aristophanes, an imaginary city built in the air by the birds.

Nepomuk, St. JOHN, the patron saint of Bohemia, born at Pomuk in that country, an ecclesiastic whom King Wenceslaus in 1393 caused to be drowned in the river Moldau at Prague.

NEPOS, CORNELIUS (1st cent. B.C.), Roman historian, a friend of Atticus and Catullus. His chief work was 'De Viris Illustribus', of which part survives.

Neptune, the Roman god of the sea, identified with the Poseidon (q.v.) of the Greeks.

The planet NEPTUNE was discovered in 1846, as a result of the mathematical calculations of J. C. Adams in England and Leverrier in France.

Nē'reids, THE, in Greek mythology, the daughters of Nerēus, a deity of the sea; the nymphs (q.v.) of the Mediterranean.

Neri, see Bianchi and Neri.

Nerissa, in Shakespeare's 'The Merchant of Venice' (q.v.), Portia's waiting-maid.

Nero, a Roman emperor (A.D. 54-68), the last of the Julio-Claudian dynasty, proverbial for his tyranny and brutality. He was an artist and actor of some merit, and started well under the tuition of Seneca and Burrus. Some ancient authors assert that the burning of Rome in 64 was due to his order and that he fiddled while it burnt. His subjects revolted against his oppression in 68, and Nero took his own life. 'Qualis artifex pereo!' ('What an artist dies with me!') are said to have been his dying words.

Nestor, king of Pylos in the Peloponnese, and a grandson of Poseidon, led his subjects to the Trojan War, where he distinguished himself among the Grecian chiefs, in his old age, by his wisdom, justice, and eloquence.

Nestorians, followers of Nestorius, sometime a disciple of St. Chrysostom and patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 428, who held that Christ had distinct human and divine persons (the doctrine opposite to that of the Monophysites, q.v.). Nestorius was condemned by the Councils of Ephesus in 431 and Chalcedon in 451, his fiercest opponent being Cyril of Alexandria. The missionaries of the sect penetrated to Central Asia. A remnant of Nestorian Christians survives in the mountains of E. Anatolia and Kurdistan (driven into Iraq during the war of 1914-18). See Prester John.

Neville, Miss, a character in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.).

New Atlantis, see Manley.

New Atlantis, The, a treatise of political philosophy in the form of a fable, by Francis Bacon (q.v.). The work, which was left unfinished, was published in 1626.

It is an account of a visit to an imaginary island of Bensalem in the Pacific and of the social conditions prevailing there; and also of 'Solomon's House', a college of natural philosophy 'dedicated to the study of the works and creatures of God'.

New Bath Guide, see Anstey (C.).

New Deal, the name applied to the programme of economic and social reform of President F. D. Roosevelt's administration (1933-45). The measures comprised in it, some of them devised by the Brain Trust (q.v.), were intended to promote recovery from the economic depression prevalent in the U.S. in 1933, and to establish a better social and economic order for the future.

New England Nun and Other Stories, A, by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman (q.v.).

New English Dictionary, The, more generally known now as the 'Oxford English Dictionary' (q.v.).

New Grub Street, a novel by Gissing (q.v.), published in 1891.

In this work Gissing depicts the struggle for life, the jealousies and intrigues, of the literary world of his time, and the blighting effect of poverty on artistic endeavour. The main theme is the contrast of the career of Jasper Milvain, the facile, clever, selfish, and unscrupulous writer of reviews (who accepts the materialistic conditions of literary success), with those of more artistic temperaments. Among these are Edwin Reardon, the author of two fine works, who is hampered by poverty and by the lack of sympathy of his worldly-minded wife, and the generous

NEW TIMON

Harold Biffen, a poor scholar, the author of a work of 'absolute realism in the sphere of the ignobly decent'. The literary world is presented in a multitude of characters, of which one of the best is the learned pedant Alfred Yule, rendered rancorous and sardonic by constant disappointment. Jasper is attracted to Yule's daughter and assistant, Marian, who passionately loves him; but he proposes to her only when she inherits a legacy of £5,000. When this legacy proves not to be forthcoming, he shabbily withdraws, and marries Amy Reardon, the young widow of Edwin, whom failure and his wife's desertion have driven to an early grave. The sombre story ends with Jasper's success, the triumph of self-advertisement over artistic conscience.

New Holland, a former name of Australia. The Dutch were among the first discoverers of the continent (1606), and their navigators surveyed some part of its coasts between 1618 and 1627. The West coast was probably known to the Portuguese earlier.

New Inn, The, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1629, when it was a complete failure, not being heard to the conclusion.

Frances, the young Lady Frampul, invites some lords and gentlemen to make merry at the New Inn at Barnet. One of the guests, Lord Beaufort, falls in love with, and is promptly married to, the son of the innkeeper, who has been dressed up as a lady, while Frances falls in love with Lovel, a melancholy gentleman staying at the inn. Finally the host turns out to be the lost father of Frances, and his son to be not a boy, but Lactitia, sister of Frances.

New Model Army, THE, was organized by the parliament in 1645, after the passing of the 'Self-denying Ordinance', the dispersal of Waller's army, and the indecisive second battle of Newbury. It was composed solely with a view to military efficiency, was regularly paid, and was composed largely of Puritans, the officers being mostly Independents. Sir Thomas Fairfax was its general.

New Monthly Magazine, The, a periodical founded in 1814, and continued, with various changes in its sub-title, until 1871, when it was continued without sub-title till 1881, and then until 1884 as 'The New Monthly'. It had as editors, at various periods, Thomas Campbell, Bulwer Lytton, Theodore Hook, Thomas Hood, and W. H. Ainsworth.

New Order, the term used to denote the political, economic, and social system, involving German domination over Europe and the annexation of vast eastern territories for German settlement, which the Nazis hoped to establish. The project was renounced in November 1944.

Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1846, in which he sketches various celebrities of the day.

New Way to pay Old Debts, A, a comedy by Massinger (q.v.), published in 1633, perhaps the best known of his works.

The play deals with the discomfiture of Sir Giles Overreach, a character modelled on the notorious extortioner, Sir Giles Mompesson (1584-1651?), who was fined and imprisoned for his proceedings. The cruel and rapacious Overreach, having got possession of the property of his prodigal nephew Frank Wellborn, who is reduced to utter poverty, treats him with contumely. Lady Allworth, a rich widow, to whose husband Wellborn had rendered important services, consents to help him by giving ground for the belief that she is about to marry him. Overreach, deceived, changes his attitude, and gives Wellborn assistance. Tom Allworth, Lady Allworth's stepson, and page to Lord Lovell, is in love with Overreach's daughter Margaret, who returns his love. Overreach is consumed with a desire that his daughter shall marry Lord Lovell and become 'right honourable'. Lord Lovell consents to help Allworth to win Margaret, and a trick is played on Overreach by which he facilitates the marriage, thinking that Lord Lovell is to be the bridegroom. Overreach becomes crazy on discovering the deceit and on finding that, by the device of one of his satellites, his claim to Wellborn's property cannot be maintained; he is sent to Bedlam. Wellborn receives a company in Lord Lovell's regiment, and Lord Lovell marries Lady Allworth.

Newbery, JOHN (1713-67), a publisher and bookseller, who established himself in 1744 in St. Paul's Churchyard, London, and originated the publication of children's books. Goldsmith (q.v.) was among those who worked for him, probably writing 'Goody Two Shoes'. Newbery figures in 'The Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.).

NEWBOLT, SIR HENRY (JOHN) (1862-1938), barrister, author, and poet. Among his poems are 'Admirals All and Other Verses' (1897), which includes 'Drake's Drum'; 'Songs of the Sea' (1904); 'Songs of the Fleet' (1910). His 'Naval History of the War, 1914-18' appeared in 1920.

NEWCASTLE, MARGARET, DUCHESS OF (1624?-74), daughter of Sir Thomas Lucas, was the second wife of William Cavendish, duke of Newcastle. She wrote a multitude of verses, essays, and plays (1653-68), and a biography of her husband. She is principally remembered for Pepys's condemnation of her as 'a mad, conceited, ridiculous woman', and on the other hand for Charles Lamb's encomium of her, 'that princely woman, the thrice noble Margaret of Newcastle'.

Newcomen, THOMAS (1663-1729), an ironmonger or blacksmith of Dartmouth, inventor of the atmospheric steam-engine.

NEWGATE

Newcomes, The, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published serially in 1853-5.

The story, which purports to be told by Pendennis (q.v.), centres round the career of young Clive Newcome, a youth of generous instincts and human failings, the son of Colonel Thomas Newcome, an officer of the Indian army, in whom Thackeray has drawn an admirable portrait of a simple-minded gentleman, guided through life solely by the sentiments of duty and honour. Clive Newcome falls in love with his cousin, Ethel Newcome, daughter of the wealthy banker Sir Brian Newcome. But she is destined for a more exalted match by her grandmother, the countess of Kew, a worldly, cynical old woman, and by her other relatives. The most vigorous opponent of Clive's suit is Ethel's brother, Barnes Newcome, a mean, venomous little snob, in whom Thackeray has almost overdrawn the character of a villain. Ethel, a fine and honourable girl, though capricious and at times influenced by ambition and her worldly surroundings, yields to these so far as to engage herself first to her cousin, Lord Kew, and then to a worthless puppy, Lord Farintosh; but both these matches she breaks off. Meanwhile Clive, despairing of Ethel, allows himself to be married to a pretty nonentity, Rosey Mackenzie, the daughter of a scheming widow. The marriage turns out miserably. Moreover, Colonel Newcome loses his fortune; and his household, including Clive and his wife and Mrs. Mackenzie, the 'campaigner', are reduced to dire poverty. This brings out the worst qualities of Mrs. Mackenzie. A virago and a harpy, she subjects the Colonel to a long martyrdom by her taunts and reproaches, until he takes refuge in the Greyfriars (Charterhouse) almshouses. The pathos of the story reaches its climax with the scene of the Colonel's death-bed, where 'he, whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of The Master'. Rosey having meanwhile died, we are left to infer that Clive and Ethel are finally united.

Newdigate, SIR ROGER (1719-1806), educated at Westminster School and University College, Oxford, M.P. successively for Middlesex and Oxford University, was founder of the NEWDIGATE PRIZE at Oxford for English verse (1805).

Newgate, the principal west gate of the ancient city of London, so called probably because it was the reconstruction of an earlier gate dating from Roman times, at the point where Watling Street (q.v.) reached London (roughly along the line of Oxford Street and Holborn). Its gate-house was a prison from the 12th cent. This prison was enlarged, reconstructed, and improved out of funds left by Sir Richard Whittington. Attention was drawn to its insanitary condition by John Howard, the prison reformer (1726-90) (two Lord Mayors died of jail fever caught at the sessions), and in 1780 it was burnt down by the Gordon rioters. It was then rebuilt, and finally demolished in 1902, when the Central Criminal Court was built on its site.

Newgate Calendar, or Malefactor's Bloody Register, The, was published (the original series) about 1774, and dealt with notorious crimes from 1700 to that date. Later series ('The Newgate Calendar, comprising interesting memoirs of the most notorious characters' and 'The New Newgate Calendar') were issued about 1826 by Andrew Knapp and William Baldwin.

Borrow's 'Lavengro' (q.v.) compiled the 'Chronicles of Newgate' (c. xxxvi).

NEWLAND, ABRAHAM (1730-1807), chief cashier of the Bank of England from 1782. Bank-notes were long known as 'Abraham Newlands' from bearing his signature. See Abraham-man.

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY (1801-90), educated privately at Ealing and at Trinity College, Oxford, became a fellow of Oriel, where he came in contact with his brother-fellows Keble and Pusey, and later with R. H. Froude (qq.v.). In 1828 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Oxford. In 1832 he went to the south of Europe with R. H. Froude, and with him wrote in Rome much of the 'Lyra Apostolica' (1836), sacred poems contributed in the first instance to 'The British Magazine'. In 1833 he composed the hymn 'Lead, kindly Light', during a passage from Palermo to Marseilles. In the same year he resolved with William Palmer, R. H. Froude, and A. P. Perceval to fight for the doctrine of apostolical succession and the integrity of the Prayer-book, and began 'Tracts for the Times' (see Oxford Movement), in which he found a supporter in Dr. Pusey (q.v.). In 1837-8 he published a number of treatises in defence of the Anglo-Catholic view, including the 'Lectures on the Prophetic Office of the Church', and in 1841 his famous Tract XC, on the compatibility of the Articles with Catholic theology; this tract brought the Tractarians under the official ban. He retired to Littlemore in 1842, wrote his 'Essay on Miracles' in that year, resigned the living of St. Mary's in 1843, and joined the Church of Rome in 1845. He went to Rome in 1846, where he was ordained priest and created D.D., and became an Oratorian. He returned to England in 1847 and established the Oratory at Birmingham. His 'Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine' was written at the time of his transition and published in 1845. In 1851 appeared his 'Lectures on the Present Position of the Roman Catholics', a fiercely contemptuous reply to the No-Popery agitation of the moment. In 1854 he was appointed rector of the new Catholic University of Dublin, and in 1852, previous to his formal appointment, delivered his lectures on 'The Scope and Nature of University Education'. 'Lectures on Universities' appeared in 1859. The third edition (1873) of 'The Idea of a University Defined' contains both series of lectures. In these Newman, opposing the popular doctrines of the day, maintained that the duty of a university is instruction rather than research, and to train the mind rather than to diffuse useful knowledge; and defended theological teaching and tutorial supervision as parts of the university system. Newman found the Irish clergy and the 'New Catholic University' quite intractable and soon gave up his appointment.

In 1864 appeared his 'Apologia pro Vita sua', in answer to Charles Kingsley, who in 'Macmillan's Magazine', misrepresenting Newman, had remarked that Newman did not consider truth as a necessary virtue. The 'Apologia' came out serially, and when it was published as a book much of the controversial matter was omitted. It is an exposition, written with the utmost simplicity and sincerity, and in a style of limpid clearness, of his spiritual history, and has obtained recognition as a literary masterpiece. In 1866 appeared his poem, 'The Dream of Gerontius', a dramatic monologue of a just soul leaving the body at death, which made a wide appeal to religious minds. In 1868 was published his 'Verses on Various Occasions', containing many poems of tender beauty. In 1870 Newman published 'The Grammar of Assent' (q.v.), and at various times volumes of sermons preached at St. Mary's, Oxford, and elsewhere. Mention should also be made of his religious novels, 'Loss and Gain' (1848), containing a celebrated account of an Oxford tutor's breakfast party, and 'Callista' (1856). In 1877 he was made an honorary fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and in 1879 was created Cardinal of St. George in Velabro.

Newnes, GEORGE (1851-1910), publisher and magazine proprietor. He founded in particular 'The Strand Magazine' (in which Conan Doyle's 'Adventures of Sherlock Holmes' first appeared) and 'Tit-Bits'.

Newnham College, a college for women at Cambridge, opened in 1876, developed from an earlier house of residence for women students, of which Sidgwick (q.v.) was one of the chief promoters, and Anne Jemima Clough (1820-92) the first principal.

News, The, see L'Estrange.

Newsbooks, or DIURNALLS, the successors of the 'Corantos' (q.v.) in the evolution of the newspaper. Newsbooks, consisting of one printed sheet (8 pages) or later of two printed sheets (16 pages), and containing domestic intelligence and the principal features of the modern newspaper, were issued, by various journalists and under various titles, during the period 1641-65. They then gave place to the 'Oxford' (later 'London') 'Gazette' (see Gazette).

Newsletters, a term specially applied to the manuscript records of parliamentary and court news, sent twice a week to subscribers from the London office of Muddiman (q.v.) in the second half of the 17th cent. A survival of these may be seen in the 'London Letter' which still appears in many provincial journals, as well as in contemporary 'newsletters'.

Newsome, Mrs. and CHAD, leading characters in H. James's 'The Ambassadors' (q.v.).

NEWTON, SIR ISAAC (1642-1727), the philosopher, was born at Woolsthorpe near Grantham, and educated at Grantham Grammar School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He made his first communication to the Royal Society on his theory of light and colours in 1672. His researches on this subject were summed up in his 'Optics', published in 1704, to which was appended his 'Method of Fluxions', his great mathematical discovery, and the source of a bitter quarrel with Leibniz as to the priority of the invention. The first book of his 'Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica', embodying his laws of motion and the idea of universal gravitation, was exhibited at the Royal Society in 1686, and the whole published in 1687. Newton was elected president of the Royal Society in 1703, and was annually re-elected for 25 years. He was knighted in 1705, became master of the Mint in 1699, and presented reports on the coinage in 1717 and 1718. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. But it is his statue in the ante-chapel of Trinity College, Cambridge, that is his best-known memorial, perhaps because of Wordsworth's glorious lines on it (in 'The Prelude'):

The marble index of a mind for ever Voyaging through strange seas of Thought alone.

Newton's works (incomplete) were edited by Samuel Horsley in 1779-85.

Níamh, in the second or southern cycle of Irish mythology, the daughter of Manannán, the sea-god. She fell in love with Ossian, the son of Finn (q.v.), carried him off over the sea, and kept him with her for three hundred years. She then let him return to his own country, mounted on a magic steed, but on condition that he should not set foot on earth. Ossian disregarded the caution, immediately lost his youth, and became a blind, decrepit old man.

Nibelung (NIBLUNG, NIEBELUNG), in the Norse sagas and German 'Nibelungenlied', a mythical king of a race of dwarfs, the Nibelungs, who dwelt in Norway. The Nibelung kings and people figure in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.) and in W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.).

Nibelungen, Ring der, see Ring der Nibelungen.

Nibelungenlied, a German poem of the 13th cent. embodying a story found in primitive shape in both forms of the Edda (q.v.). In these the story is substantially as told by William Morris in his 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), Sigurd being the Siegfried of the German poem.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY

In the 'Nibelungenlied' the story is somewhat different. Siegfried, son of Siegmund and Sieglind, king and queen of the Netherlands, having got possession of the Nibelung hoard guarded by Alberich, rides to woo Kriemhild, a Burgundian princess, sister of Gunther, Gernot, and Giselher. Hagen, their grim retainer, warns them against Siegfried, but the match is arranged, and the hoard is given to Kriemhild as marriage portion. Siegfried undertakes to help Gunther to win Brunhild, queen of Island, by defeating her in trials of skill and strength, which he succeeds in doing. The double marriage takes place, but Brunhild remains suspicious and ill-humoured, and Siegfried, called in by Gunther to subdue her, does so in Gunther's semblance and takes away her ring and girdle, which he gives to Kriemhild. The two queens quarrel, and Kriemhild reveals to Brunhild the trick that has been played on her. Hagen, who thinks his master's honour injured by Siegfried, treacherously kills the latter at a hunt.

Kriemhild later marries Etzel (Attila), king of the Huns, and in order to avenge her husband and secure the hoard, which her brothers have seized and sunk in the Rhine, persuades them to visit Etzel's court. There they are set upon and overcome, but refuse to betray the hiding-place of the hoard, and are slain. Hagen, the last survivor of the party who knows the secret, is killed by Kriemhild with Siegfried's sword; and Kriemhild herself is slain by Hildebrand, a knight of Dietrich of Bern.

Nicholas, ST., said to have been bishop of Myra in Asia Minor about A.D. 300, is the patron saint of Russia, and of children, scholars, sailors, virgins, and thieves, in consequence of various legends relating to benefits conferred by him on these. His festival is 6 Dec. See also Santa Claus and Nicholas's Clerk.

Nicholas's Clerk, ST., a highwayman, thief. So used in Shakespeare's '1 Henry IV', II. i, and in Scott's 'Ivanhoe'. It was also used to signify a poor scholar. St. Nicholas being the patron saint of scholars.

Nicholas Nickleby, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1838-9.

Nicholas, a generous, high-spirited lad of nineteen, his mother, and his gentle sister Kate are left penniless on the death of his father. They appeal for assistance to his uncle, Ralph Nickleby, a griping usurer, of whom Nicholas at once makes an enemy by his independent bearing. He is sent as usher to Dotheboys Hall, where Wackford Squeers starves and maltreats forty urchins under pretence of education. His special cruelty is expended on Smike, a half-witted lad left on his hands and employed as a drudge. Nicholas, infuriated by what he witnesses, thrashes Squeers and escapes with Smike, who becomes his devoted friend. For a time he supports himself and Smike as an actor in the provincial company of Vincent Crummles; he then enters the service of the brothers Cheeryble, whose benevolence and good humour spread happiness around them. Meanwhile Kate, apprenticed to Madame Mantalini, dressmaker, is by her uncle's designs exposed to the gross insults of Sir Mulberry Hawk, one of his associates. From this persecution she is released by Nicholas, who breaks Sir Mulberry's head and makes a home for his mother and sister. Nicholas himself falls in love with Madeline Bray, the support of a selfish father and the object of a conspiracy of Ralph Nickleby and another revolting old usurer, Gride, to marry her to the latter. Ralph, whose hatred for Nicholas has been intensified by the failure of his plans, knowing Nicholas's affection for Smike, conspires to remove the latter from him; but Smike succumbs to failing health and terror of his enemies. All Ralph's plots are baffled by the help of Newman Noggs, his eccentric clerk. Confronted with ruin and exposure, and finally shattered by the discovery that Smike was his own son, Ralph hangs himself. Nicholas, befriended by the Cheerybles, marries Madeline, and Kate marries the Cheerybles' nephew, Frank. Squeers is transported, and Gride is murdered.

NICHOLS, JOHN (1745–1826), printer and author, apprenticed to William Bowyer the younger (1699–1777, 'the learned printer'), joined David Henry in the management of the 'Gentleman's Magazine' (q.v.) in 1778, and was sole manager from 1792 to 1826. He published his 'Royal Wills' in 1780, a 'Collection of Miscellaneous Poems' (1780–2), his 'Bibliotheca Topographica' (1780–90), and 'Biographical Anecdotes of Hogarth' (1781). His most important work, 'The History and Antiquities of Leicester', appeared between 1795 and 1815, and in 1801 his edition of Swift's works (19 vols.). In 1812–15 appeared the 'Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century', an invaluable bibliographical and biographical storehouse of information in nine volumes; six volumes of a supplementary work, 'Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth Century', appeared between 1817 and 1831, two being published posthumously, and John Bowyer Nichols (his son, 1779–1863) added two more volumes in 1848 and 1858.

Nicias, an Athenian general during the Peloponnesian War, a man of upright character, and an advocate of peace. NIGHT THOUGHTS

Nick of the Woods, by Robert Montgomery Bird, published in 1837, was an attempt to counterbalance Cooper's sentimental depiction of the American Indian. In the view of Bird and his hero the Indian is not a romantic figure, but a cruel, crafty, filthy savage who deserves to be hunted down and exterminated without mercy.

NIEBUHR, BARTHOLD GEORG (1766–1831), the son of a distinguished German traveller, was educated at Kiel, and studied physical science at Edinburgh in 1798. His great 'History of Rome', which originally took the form of lectures delivered at Berlin in 1810–12, appeared in 1827–8. Niebuhr was the first historian to deal with the subject in a scientific spirit, discussing critically the early Roman legends and paying more attention to the development of institutions and to social characteristics than to individuals and incidents. The 'History' was translated into English by J. C. Hare and Bishop Thirlwall in 1828–42.

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1844–1900), a brilliant and paradoxical German ethical writer, of Polish descent, whose lack of balance developed into lunacy in 1889. The principal features of his doctrine are: contempt for Christianity with its compassion for the weak, hostility to the asceticism preached by Schopenhauer, exaltation of the 'will to dominate' and of the 'superman', an unscrupulous pitiless demigod, superior to ordinary morality, who tramples on the feeble; this superman will replace the Christian ideal. Nietzsche's works include 'Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen' ('Thoughts out of Season', 1876) on Schopenhauer and Wagner, whom he regarded as his first masters, 'Morgenröte' ('Dawn', 1881), 'Die fröhliche Wissenschaft' ('The Joyful Wisdom', 1882), and 'Also sprach Zarathustra' ('Thus spake Zarathustra', 1883–91, perhaps the best known in England of his writings).

Niflheim, in Scandinavian mythology, an underworld of cold and darkness, the abode of the dead, who were distributed among its nine regions. It was ruled over by Hel (see Hell). It was separated by Ginnungagap (q.v.) from Muspellheim (q.v.), and Yggdrasil (q.v.) had its roots there.

Night Thoughts on Life, Death, and Immortality, The Complaint or, a didactic poem of some 10,000 lines of blank verse, in nine books, by E. Young (q.v.), published in 1742–5.

The first book is occupied with the poet's reflections on life's vicissitudes, death, and immortality. The next seven form a soliloquy, partly argumentative, partly reflective, addressed to a certain worldly infidel, named Lorenzo, who is exhorted to turn to faith and virtue. The ninth book, entitled 'The Consolation', contains a vision of the last day and of eternity, a survey of the wonders of the firmament at night, a final exhortation to Lorenzo, and an invocation to the Deity.

NIGHT THOUGHTS

The poem for a time enjoyed great popularity. It contains a few autobiographical allusions. Narcissa and Philander have not been identified, but may have been his step-daughter and her husband, Mr. Temple. Mrs. Temple died of consumption at Lyons in 1736; but she was not buried surreptitiously, as told in the poem.

Nightmare Abbey, a novel by Peacock (q.v.), published in 1818.

The book is an entertaining satire on Byronism, Coleridgean transcendentalism, and pessimism in general. There is, as usual in Peacock's novels, little plot, but the house-party of amusing characters brings together Mr. Glowry, his son Scythrop, and Mr. Toobad, pessimists of various shades; Mr. Flosky, a caricature of Coleridge, and Mr. Cypress, of Byron; Mr. Larynx, the versatile and accommodating clergyman; and Mr. Hilary, 'a very cheerful and elastic gentleman'. Scythrop, in his inability to fix his affections on one or other of two charmers, resembles Shelley. It is characteristic of Shelley's sweetness of temper that he did not in the least resent his friend's caricature of him.

Nihilism (Latin nihil, nothing), originally a movement in Russia repudiating the customary social institutions, such as marriage and parental authority. The term was introduced by the novelist Turgenev (q.v.). It was extended to a secret revolutionary movement, social and political, which developed in the middle of the 19th cent.

Nile, BATTLE OF THE, fought on 1 Aug. 1798, in which Nelson destroyed in Abukir Bay the French fleet that had conveyed Buonaparte to Egypt, and by cutting off the latter's army from France, defeated his project of creating a French empire in the East.

Nimrod, 'the mighty hunter before the Lord' (Gen. x. 9), of whom Milton says (basing himself on the Targum) 'and men not beasts shall be his game' ('Paradise Lost', xii. 30). He is represented in Genesis as the ruler of Shinar (Sumeria) and builder of Nineveh, but the monuments of Assyria and Babylonia are silent about him.

Nineteenth Century, The, a monthly review founded in 1877 by Sir J. T. Knowles (q.v.), who was its first editor. It was more impartial in its attitude than the 'Fortnightly' (q.v.), bringing together in its pages the most eminent advocates of conflicting views. When the said century ended, the Review added to its old title 'And After'.

Ninian, St. (d. 432?), a native of Britain, who in youth made a pilgrimage to Rome and was educated there. He was sent on a mission to convert the pagans in the northern parts of Britain. Ninian was consecrated bishop and his see was established in Galloway at Whit-horn, where he built a stone church, known as Candida Casa, dedicated to St. Martin of Tours. He evangelized the Southern Picts. St. Ninian is commemorated on 16 Sept. He is also called St. Ringan (see, e.g., Scott's 'The Pirate'), and is frequently invoked as St. Treignan in Rabelais.

Ninus, see Semiramis.

Niöbë, a daughter of Tantalus and wife of Amphiön (qq.v.). She was the mother of six sons and six daughters, and this so increased her pride that she boasted herself superior to Latona, the mother of Apollo and Artemis. For this arrogance the sons of Niobe were immediately slain by the darts of Apollo, and the daughters (except one, Chloris) by Artemis; and Niobe herself was changed into stone, and still wept for her children in streams that trickled down the rock; so that the group was a favourite one for a fountain. Hence also 'Niobe all tears' (Shakespeare, 'Hamlet', i. ii. 149).

Njörd, or Njördhr, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the Vanir (q.v.), a god of the waters, the father of Frey and Freya.

Niphates, a mountain-chain in Armenia. Milton makes Satan light on it when he first comes to the earth ('Paradise Lost', iii. 742).

Nipper, SUSAN, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.).

Nirvana, in Buddhist theology, the extinction of individual existence and the absorption of the soul in the supreme spirit, or the extinction of all desires and passions and the attainment of perfect beatitude. [OED.]

Nisroch, an Assyrian deity, in whose temple at Nineveh Sennacherib was slain (2 Kings xix. 37). Milton calls him 'of Principalities the prime' in the council of Satan ('Paradise Lost', vi. 446).

Nisus, a Trojan, who accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and signalized himself by his valour against the Rutulians. He was united in closest friendship to Euryalus, another Trojan, and together at night they penetrated the enemy's camp. After slaying many of the Rutulians, they were returning, when Euryalus fell into the enemies' hands. Nisus in endeavouring to rescue his friend perished with him, and their great friendship has become proverbial.

Nitouche, SAINTE, a French term for a person who affects an air of excessive innocence, a facetious adaptation of 'n'y touche'.

Nixle, a female water-elf (from German and Scandinavian folk-lore).

Nizam-ul-Mulk, the vizier of Alp Arslan the son, and of Malik Shah the grandson, of Toghrul Beg (the founder of the Seljuk dynasty). Fitzgerald in his introduction to the 'Rubáiyát' of Omar Khayyám (q.v.) quotes Nizam-ul-Mulk's story (difficult to reconcile with the dates) of his studying at Naishapur under a doctor of law with Omar Khayyám and Hasan-ben-Sabbah (the 'Old Man of the Mountain'—see under Assassins), and of the pledge of the three friends to help each other in after-life. Nizam-ul-Mulk, when he became vizier, granted Omar a pension. He was himself ultimately murdered by the order of Hasan-ben-Sabbah.

No Cross, no Crown, a dissertation by Penn (q.v., 1669).

Nobel Prizes, THE, were established under the will of Alfred Bernhard Nobel (1833-96), a Swedish chemist distinguished in the development of explosives, by which the interest on the greater part of his large fortune is distributed in annual prizes for the most important discoveries in physics, chemistry, and physiology respectively, to the author of the most important literary work of an idealist tendency, and to the person who shall have most promoted the fraternity of nations.

Noble, in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.), the name of the lion.

Noble, a former English gold coin, first minted by Edward III, issued as the equivalent of 6s. 8d. silver. It was a handsome coin, showing on the obverse the king in armour in a ship, and bearing the inscription: IHC : TRANSIENS : PER : MEDIUM : ILLORUM : IBAT : from Luke iv. 30, perhaps used as a charm against theft.

The ANGEL, called more fully at first the ANGEL-NOBLE, being originally a new issue of the Noble, had as its device the archangel Michael standing upon, and piercing, the dragon. It was first coined by Edward IV in 1465, when its value was 6s. 8d. Under Edward VI it was 10s. It was last coined by Charles I. This was the coin always presented to a patient 'touched' for the king's evil. When it ceased to be coined, small medals having the same device were substituted for it.

The ROSE-NOBLE or RYAL was a gold coin first issued by Edward IV, as the equivalent of 10s. silver. The general design of the king in his ship was retained, but a very large Yorkist rose covered part of the hull of the ship.

Noble Numbers, the title of the collection of religious poems written by Herrick (q.v.).

Nobs, Dr. Dove's horse in Southey's 'The Doctor' (q.v.).

Noctes Ambrosianae, a series of papers that appeared in 'Blackwood's Magazine' (q.v.) from 1822 to 1835. They were by several hands, Prof. John Wilson's, Lockhart's, Hogg's, and Maginn's (qq.v.); but of the 71, 41 were by the first of these, Wilson ('Christopher North'), and have been reprinted in his works. The 'Noctes' take the form of imaginary conversations, of a boisterous, convivial kind, at Ambrose's (q.v.), between the Ettrick Shepherd, Christopher North, and a few others, on a great variety of topics, from literary and political criticism to the rearing of poultry. The impersonation of the Ettrick Shepherd (Hogg) is particularly brilliant, and the novelty, wit, and humour of the conversations added greatly to the popularity of the magazine.

NOEL, RODEN BERKELEY WRIO-THESLEY (1834-94), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, was author of several volumes of verse, including 'Livingstone in Africa' (1874), 'A Little Child's Monument' (1881), and 'Songs of the Heights and Deepes' (1885). A selection of his poems was edited by P. Addleshaw in 1897, and his collected works were issued in 1902.

Noetics, THE, a group of fellows of Oriel College, Oxford, who in the first quarter of the 19th cent. were noted for their free criticism of current theology. Chief among them was Whately (q.v.). The name is derived from Gr. νόησις, intelligence.

Noggs, NEWMAN, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), Ralph Nickleby's clerk, who has seen better days.

Noh or Nō Plays, THE, a form of traditional, ceremonial, or ritualistic drama peculiar to Japan, symbolical and spiritual in character. It was evolved from religious rites of Shinto worship, was perfected in the 15th cent. and flourished during the Tokugawa period (1652-1868). It has since been revived. The plays are short (one or two acts), in prose and verse, and a chorus contributes poetical comments. They were formerly acted as a rule only at the Shogun's court, five or six in succession, presenting a complete life drama, beginning with a play of the divine age, then a battle piece, a 'play of women', a psychological piece (dealing with the sins and struggles of mortals), a morality, and finally a congratulatory piece, praising the lords and the reign. The text was helped out by symbolic gestures and chanting. About two hundred Noh Plays are extant. Of these the most interesting are the psychological pieces, in which some type of human character or some intense emotion is taken as the subject. In various respects the Noh Plays are comparable with the early Greek drama (see 'Noh, or Accomplishment', by Ernest Fenollosa and Ezra Pound).

Noli me tangere, Latin, 'Touch me not', a phrase occurring in the Vulgate, John xx. 17, applied to paintings representing the appearance of Christ to the Magdalen at the sepulchre; also used generally as a warning against interference.

Noll or Old Noll, a nickname of Oliver Cromwell.

Nomentanus, L. CASSIUS, frequently mentioned by Horace in his Satires, and proverbial for riotous living.

Nominalism, the view of those schoolmen and later philosophers who regard universals or abstract conceptions as mere names without corresponding reality. See Ockham, the father of this school.

Nonce-word, a term employed in the OED. to describe a word which is apparently used only for the nonce, coined for the occasion.

Nones, in the ancient Roman calendar, the 7th of March, May, July, and October, and the 5th of all the other months.

Non-Intrusionists, in the Church of Scotland, those who, in the 19th cent., resisted the intrusion by patrons of unacceptable ministers upon resisting congregations (see Miller, H.).

Nonjurors, the beneficed clergy who refused in 1689 to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary.

Nore, THE, a sandbank in the mouth of the Thames off Sheerness. A mutiny broke out in 1797 in the fleet stationed there, occasioned by the inadequate pay and bad food of the sailors. Its leader, Parker, was hanged.

Norimberga, in imprints, Nuremberg.

Norman, the name of a style of Romanesque architecture developed by the Normans and employed in England after the Conquest. It is characterized by the use of the round arch, the use of geometrical ornament, such as zigzags, and a great development in the plan of the churches, due to the energy of the Norman bishops.

Norna of the Fitful-head, Ulla Troil, a character in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Norns, in Scandinavian mythology, the three fates, Urd, Verdandi, and Skuld, who live at the summit of the rainbow (Bifröst), under the branches of Yggdrasil (q.v.), by the fountain Urda.

Norris, Mrs., a character in Jane Austen's 'Mansfield Park' (q.v.).

NORRIS, FRANK (1870-1902), an American novelist whose early death interrupted a promising career, is chiefly remembered as the author of 'The Octopus' (1901) and 'The Pit' (1903), parts of an unfinished trilogy, an 'Epic of the Wheat'.

NORRIS, JOHN (1657-1711), educated at Winchester College and Exeter College, Oxford, and a fellow of All Souls, became rector of Bemerton. He is chiefly remarkable for his 'Essay towards the Theory of an Ideal and Intelligible World' (1701-4), in which he shows himself a supporter of Malebranche's spiritual development of Cartesianism (q.v.). He held that our perception of the external world is a perception of ideas, and that these ideas are the Divine ideas, an element in the Divine nature.

Norroy, the title of the third king-of-arms, whose jurisdiction lies north of the Trent. See Clarenceux.

North American Review, The, was founded in 1815 in the U.S. as a quarterly review of the old solid type. It is now a monthly semi-popular periodical.

North, CHRISTOPHER, a pseudonym used by J. Wilson (1785-1854, q.v.).

NORTH, ROGER (1653-1734), educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, and a lawyer, was the author of interesting biographies, published in 1742-4, of his brothers, Francis North, Lord Guilford, Keeper of the Great Seal; Dudley North, the great Turkey merchant; and John North, master of Trinity College, Cambridge. His own 'Autobiography' was published in 1887. His 'Discourse of Fish and Fish Ponds' appeared in 1683, and in 1740 his 'Examen' or criticism of Kennett's volume of the 'Compleat History of England' (1706).

NORTH, SIR THOMAS (1535?-1601?), son of Edward North, first baron North, perhaps studied at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He entered Lincoln's Inn, was knighted in 1591, and pensioned by Queen Elizabeth in 1601. He is famous for his translations, which include the 'Diall of Princes' (1557) from Guevara's 'El Relox de Principes', 'The Morall Philosophie of Doni', from the Italian (1570), and Plutarch's 'Lives' from the French of Amyot (1579), to which he made additions from other authors (1595). His Plutarch, written in a noble and vivid English, formed Shakespeare's chief storehouse of classical learning, and exerted a powerful influence on Elizabethan prose.

North and South, a novel by Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in 'Household Words' in 1854-5. The book, as its title suggests, is a study in the contrast between the inhabitants of the North and of the South of England. It is also a study of the relations of employers and men in industry.

Circumstances bring Margaret Hale from a luxurious life in London and a quiet parsonage in the New Forest, imbued with prejudices against trade of every sort, to a humble home in a murky, cotton-spinning town. Here she is brought into contact with the workers and with the employers, at a time of conflict between them, and particularly with John Thornton, a stubborn, hard-headed leader of the masters. In spite of her unpalatable advocacy of a more sympathetic attitude towards the men, he is fascinated by her beauty and proud bearing. The courage with which she exposes herself to protect him from a dangerous mob of strikers leads him, from a misunderstanding of her motives, to propose to her, and he is deeply hurt by her contemptuous rejection. An incident occurs to increase the estrangement. Thornton sees Margaret under equivocal circumstances with an unknown man (in fact her brother), and her denial (for the purpose of screening her brother, who is in danger of arrest) intensifies Thornton's suspicions. Margaret now discovers, from her unhappiness at being degraded in Thornton's estimation, that she loves him. It is only after much suffering on both sides, when misfortunes have come on Thornton and he has learnt the need of more humane relations between masters and men, that the misunderstanding is cleared up, and the two are brought together.

North Briton, The, a weekly political periodical founded in 1762 by Wilkes (q.v.), in opposition to the 'Briton', which Smollett was conducting in the interests of Lord Bute. In this venture Wilkes was assisted by Charles Churchill (q.v.), the author of 'The Rosciad'. The 'North Briton' purports ironically to be edited by a Scotsman, who rejoices in Lord Bute's success and the ousting of the English from power. Wilkes's attacks on the government grew bolder, and in No. 45 of the 'North Briton', in an article on the speech from the throne, he exposed himself to prosecution for libel. Though Wilkes was discharged on the ground of privilege, the 'North Briton' was suppressed. It was revived later, but was no longer of importance.

Northanger Abbey, a novel by J. Austen (q.v.), begun in 1798, prepared for the press in 1803, but not published until 1818, when it appeared with 'Persuasion'. The origin of the story is the desire to ridicule tales of romance and terror such as Mrs. Radcliffe's 'Mysteries of Udolpho' and to contrast with these life as it really is.

Catherine Morland, the daughter of a well-to-do clergyman, is taken to Bath for the season by her friends, Mr. and Mrs. Allen. Here she makes the acquaintance of Henry Tilney, the son of the eccentric General Tilney, and his pleasant sister Eleanor. Catherine falls in love with Henry, and has the good fortune to obtain his father's approval, founded upon an exaggerated report of her parents' wealth given him by the crazy young fop, John Thorpe, brother of Catherine's friend, Isabella. Catherine is invited to Northanger Abbey, the medieval seat of the Tilneys.

NORTHERN LASSE

Somewhat unbalanced by assiduous reading of Mrs. Radcliffe's novels, Catherine here conjures up a gruesome mystery in which she persuades herself that General Tilney is criminally involved, and suffers severe humiliation when her suspicions are discovered. Presently General Tilney, having received from John Thorpe a report as misleading as the first, representing Catherine's parents as in an extremely humble situation, packs her off back to her family, and forbids Henry to have any further thought of her. Henry, disobeying his father, follows Catherine to her home, proposes, and is accepted. General Tilney's consent is before long obtained, when he discovers the true situation of Catherine's family and is put in good humour by the marriage of his own daughter to a peer.

The main plot is complicated by a flirtation between Captain Tilney, Henry's elder brother, and the vulgar Isabella Thorpe, who is engaged to marry Catherine's brother; the consequent rupture of the engagement and of the friendship between Catherine and Isabella; and the latter's failure to secure Captain Tilney, who has formed a just estimate of Isabella's character, and pays his attentions in a spirit of mischief.

NORTHCLIFFE, ALFRED CHARLES WILLIAM HARMSWORTH, VISCOUNT (1865-1922), born in Dublin, his father belonging to a Hampshire family, laid the foundation of his career as a newspaper proprietor by starting in 1888 'Answers to Correspondents', which, as 'Answers', and with other weekly periodicals owned by him and his brother Harold (Lord Rothermere), became extremely popular. In 1894 the brothers acquired the 'Evening News', and in 1896 Alfred started the 'Daily Mail', a half-penny morning paper, the pioneer of a new phase of journalism, which was followed in 1903 by the illustrated 'Daily Mirror'. In 1905 Alfred Harmsworth was raised to the peerage, and in 1908 acquired the control of 'The Times', which he retained for some years. Through the influence which his newspapers exerted, Northcliffe took an important part in the war of 1914-18; and in 1918 was appointed to have charge of propaganda in foreign countries.

Northern Farmer, The ('Old Style' and 'New Style'), two poems in Lincolnshire dialect by A. Tennyson (q.v.).

Northern Lasse, The, a comedy by Brome (q.v.), printed in 1632.

This is the earliest of Brome's extant plays, and was very popular. Sir Philip Luckless is about to marry the rich city widow, Fitchow, when he receives a letter from Constance, the 'northern lass', reminding him of her love for him. Mistaking the writer for another Constance of a less reputable character, he disregards the letter and marries the widow, only to discover his mistake too late. The play is occupied with the devices by which the widow is induced to agree to a divorce, while her foolish brother, whom she tries to marry to Constance, is fobbed off with an inferior substitute, and Luckless and the true Constance are united.

Northward Hoe, a comedy by Webster and Dekker (q.v.), printed in 1607.

Greenshield, having failed to seduce Mayberry's wife, but having obtained by force her ring, to avenge himself produces the ring to her husband as evidence of her infidelity. The husband, assisted by the little old poet Bellamont, a genial caricature of Chapman, becomes convinced of her innocence, and obtains an appropriate revenge on Greenshield and his confederate Featherstone.

The play was a good-humoured retort to the 'Eastward Hoe' (q.v.) of Chapman, Jonson, and Marston. Like 'Westward Hoe' (q.v.) it presents a curious picture of the manners of the day.

North-West Passage, a passage for ships round the north coast of the American continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific which it was long the object of Arctic explorers to discover. When found, as the result of the explorations of Franklin, Parry, and McClure, it proved of no practical utility.

It was first navigated by Roald Amundsen in 1903-5, and for the first time from west to east by the St. Roch, a Canadian Mounted Police patrol ship of eighty tons, commanded by Sergeant Henry Larsen, in 1940-2.

Norton, CHARLES ELIOT (1827-1908), professor of Fine Arts at Harvard University, made only small contributions to literature, but was an intellectual leader of great influence in America. His aim was, in his own words, to arouse in his countrymen 'the sense of connection with the past and gratitude for the effort and labours of other nations and former generations'. Norton was joint-editor of the 'North American Review', 1864-8.

Nostradamus (1503-66), a Provençal astrologer, whose prophecies, published under the name of 'Centuries', had an extensive vogue. Catherine de Médicis brought him to her court, and he was physician to Charles IX.

There is an allusion to him in the opening scene of Goethe's 'Faust'.

Notes and Queries, a periodical founded in 1849 by Thoms (q.v.), designed to furnish a means for the interchange of thought and information among those engaged in literature, art, and science, and a medium of communication with each other. Its motto was (until 1923) Captain Cuttle's 'When found, make a note of'.

Notions of the Americans, by J. F. Cooper (q.v.), published in 1828, was an attempt by the author to explain his countrymen to Europeans.

Notre Dame de Paris, the cathedral church of Paris. Also the title of a romance by Victor Hugo, in which he depicts the Paris of the time of Louis XI.

Notre Dame des Amours, a name given by Horace Walpole to Ninon de Lenclos (see Lenclos).

Novum Organum, a philosophical treatise in Latin by Francis Bacon (q.v.), published in 1620.

The ambition of Bacon was to extend to the utmost the dominion of man over nature by means of knowledge. The 'Novum Organum' describes, in a series of aphorisms, the method by which knowledge was to be universalized. It may be very briefly summarized as follows.

Experience is the source, and induction is the method, of knowledge. The syllogism, the instrument of the deductive method, based on abstractions which may be hasty or confused, 'is no match for the subtlety of nature'. The rational processes of the mind must be applied to the fruits of experience by the method of induction. But the mind is subject to defects, which Bacon picturesquely classifies under four heads or 'Idols', that is false images of the mind, which vitiate knowledge. (1) Idols of the Tribe (Idola tribus), which have their origin in human nature itself, e.g. the tendency to observe instances favourable to a preconceived opinion. (2) Idols of the Cave (Idola specus), originating in the peculiar constitution and circumstances of the individual. (3) Idols of the Market-place (Idola fori), verbal fictions and confusions which have crept into the understanding as a result of the association of men with one another. (4) Idols of the Theatre (Idola theatri), received into the mind from philosophical systems, which like so many stage-plays represent worlds of their own creation after an unreal and scenic fashion. This analysis of the sources of error leads to the 'just and methodical process' of interpreting nature by three inductive methods, which correspond, in some sort, to Mill's methods of Agreement, of Difference, and of Concomitant Variations.

This procedure of investigation is to be applied to the facts of nature. Bacon claimed only to have provided the 'machine'. Like an image at a cross-roads 'he points the way but cannot go it'. But although his method was defective owing to his neglect of hypothesis and rejection of the deductive method, and in practice useless for purposes of scientific discovery, his principles of investigation were correct, and gave a great impulse to experimental science.

An important part in Bacon's system is played by his doctrine of 'Forms'. 'Of a given nature to discover the form . . . is the work and aim of human knowledge.' The 'form' is what differentiates one thing from another, its essential being, the very thing itself, differing from it only as the real differs from the apparent. These 'forms' constitute the 'alphabet of nature', out of the manifold combinations of whose letters all the variety of its phenomena may be explained. Bacon here shows how incompletely he had broken with Scholasticism. 'The position of Bacon', Fowler remarks, is 'midway between Scholasticism, on the one side, and Modern Philosophy and Science, on the other.'

The title 'Novum Organum', meaning 'new instrument', is taken from the Greek word 'organon', which was applied to the logical treatises of Aristotle.

Nupkins, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Nur-ed-Din and Shems-ed-Din, in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.) were two brothers, sons of a vizier of the sultan of Cairo. The son of Nur-ed-Din, Hasan Bedr-ed-Din, was, by the interposition of a jinn, married to Sittel-Hosn, the daughter of Shems-ed-Din, in place of an ugly hunchback, her destined bridegroom, and then miraculously borne away to Damascus, where he was ultimately found plying the trade of pastry-cook, and restored to his bride. He was discovered owing to his skill in making a confection of pomegranate grains (or according to another version cream-tarts without pepper in them).

There was a real Nur-ed-Din, sultan of Aleppo and later of Damascus (1154), the most politic and dangerous enemy of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem before Saladin. He died in 1174.

Nut-Brown Maid, The, a 15th-cent. poem in praise of woman's fidelity. The lover, to prove the Maid, tells her that he must to the greenwood go, 'alone, a banyshed man' and live the life of an outlaw. She declares her intention of accompanying him, nor can be dissuaded by the prospect of hardships and humiliations. The lover finally reveals his deceit and that he is an earl's son 'and not a banyshed man'. The poem is included in Percy's 'Reliques'. It is the foundation of Prior's 'Henry and Emma' (see Prior).

Nutmeg State: Connecticut, see United States.

Nym, in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' and 'Henry V' (qq.v.), a follower of Falstaff, a corporal and an amusing rogue and thief.

Nymphidia, a fairy poem by Drayton (q.v.), which appeared in 1627.

Nymphidia, a fairy attendant on Queen Mab, reports to the poet the doings at the fairy court. It appears that Pigwiggin has fallen in love with Mab and made an assignation to meet her in a cowslip. The queen in her snail-shell coach, and the maids of honour hurrying after her on a grasshopper and shrouded with a spider's web, set off for the cowslip. King Oberon, roused to frenzy by the loss of his queen, and armed with an acorn cup, goes in pursuit, belabouring whomsoever he finds, and meeting with mortifying adventures. He comes upon the faithful Puck (or Hobgoblin) and sends him to continue the search. Meanwhile Pigwiggin sends a challenge to Oberon, and a combat ensues between the two, mounted on earwigs. Proserpina, goddess of fairyland, intervenes, with mist and Lethe water, and restores harmony.

Nymphs, in Greek mythology, female personifications of various natural objects, mountains, springs, rivers, and trees. The water nymphs were the OCEANIDES (the daughters of Oceanus, nymphs of the Ocean), NEREIDS (nymphs of the Mediterranean Sea), and NAIADS (nymphs of lakes, rivers, and fountains). The OREADS were nymphs of the mountains. The DRYADS and HAMADRYADS were nymphs of trees. They possessed some divine gifts, such as that of prophecy, and were long-lived, but not immortal. They had no temples, but were honoured with gifts of milk, honey, fruit, &c.

NYREN, JOHN (1764–1837), a famous early cricketer and cricket chronicler. He belonged to the Hambledon Club (q.v.), and was a left-handed batsman of average ability and a fine field at point and mid-wicket. His recollections were published in 'The Young Cricketer's Tutor' (edited by Charles Cowden Clark, 1833, and E. V. Lucas, 1907). Andrew Lang (in the 'Badminton Library') described him as the 'delightful Herodotus of the Early Historic Period of cricket'.

Oak-apple Day, 29 May, the anniversary of the restoration of Charles II, when oak-apples or oak-leaves are worn in memory of his hiding in the oak at Boscobel (q.v.) on 6 Sept. 1651.

Oaks, THE, a race for three-year-old fillies, run at Epsom on the Friday after the Derby, founded in 1779 by the earl of Derby.

Oannes, in Babylonian mythology, a god with the head of a man and the body of a fish, who appeared from the Persian Gulf and gave the Babylonians their civilization.

Oates, TITUS (1649–1705), the fabricator of the Popish Plot (1678), figures in Scott's 'Feveril of the Peak' (q.v.). He is the 'Corah' of Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.).

Obadiah, in the O.T. is (1) the minister of Ahab who protected the prophets of the Lord (1 Kings xviii), and (2) the author of the prophetic book which bears his name; (3) in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.), a servant of Mr. Walter Shandy.

Obadiah Prim, a character in Mrs. Centlivre's 'A Bold Stroke for a Wife' (q.v.). The word Obadiah is sometimes used as slang for a Quaker.

Obeah or OBI, a pretended sorcery practised by the negroes in Africa and formerly in the West Indies. The word is West African and signifies a thing put into the ground to act as a charm, producing sickness or death.

Obelisk or OBELUS, a straight horizontal stroke, either simple or with a dot above and below, used in ancient manuscripts to indicate a spurious or corrupt word or passage. Hence to obelize. In modern use the word obelisk is applied to the mark † used in printing for reference to footnotes, &c. It is derived from the diminutive of Gr. obelós, a spit, and is used also of the tapering shafts of stone which are a characteristic monument of ancient Egypt.

Oberammergau, a village in Upper Bavaria, noted for the performances there, every tenth year, of the Passion Play. These performances are said to have had their origin in a vow taken by the villagers in 1633 in order to stay an epidemic of the plague. The text of the play was probably written by the monks of the neighbouring monastery of Ettal.

Obermann, a psychological romance by Étienne Pivert de Senancour (1770–1846), French novelist, describing the sentimental speculations and aspirations of a melancholy egoist. Matthew Arnold (q.v.), in his 'Stanzas in Memory' of its author, compares its message with that of Wordsworth and Goethe. See also M. Arnold's 'Obermann once more', the last of his published poems.

Observer, The, see L'Estrange. The title was also adopted in 1702 by John Tutchin for his Whig periodical.

Observer, The, a Sunday paper founded in 1792 by William Clement. It added greatly to its popularity by the early adoption of wood engraving to illustrate sensational incidents. A London paper, still in existence.

OCCAM, and OCCAM'S RAZOR, see Ockham.

OCCLEVE or HOCCEVE, THOMAS (1370?-1450?), was for many years a clerk in the office of the Privy Seal. His principal work, 'De Regimine Principum', written c. 1411-12, edited by Thomas Wright, 1860, is an English version in rhyme-royal of a Latin treatise by Aegidius (a disciple of St. Thomas Aquinas) on the duty of a ruler, addressed to Henry, Prince of Wales. The poem of 2,000 lines contains a eulogy of Chaucer and other interesting material. In 1406 he wrote a curious autobiographical poem 'La Male Règle', in which he petitions for payment of his salary, and confesses to various mean vices. He also wrote two verse-stories from the 'Gesta Romanorum', a manly 'Ars Sciendi Mori', a 'Complaint' and a 'Dialogue' containing autobiographical matter, and some shorter poems.

Oceana, see Froude (J. A.).

Oceana, The Commonwealth of, a political romance by James Harington (q.v.), published in 1656.

The work depicts the author's conception of an ideal government, 'Oceana' being England. At the head of the State is a prince or Archon, elected like all the other magistrates by the people, who live in a condition of freedom and equality, and detestation of war. Property in land is limited, 'so that no one man or number of men . . . can come to overpower the whole people'. The senate debate and propose, the people resolve, the magistracy execute. None the less there is room for a prince as leader, and for a gentry. The scheme is in contrast to that of Hobbes's 'Leviathan', published a few years previously.

Oceanus, in early Greek cosmology, the river supposed to encircle the plain of the Earth. Also personified as one of the Titans (q.v.), the progenitor (with his consort 'Tethys') of the gods, and the father of the rivers and water-nymphs.

Ochiltree, EDIE, a character in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.).

OCKHAM or OCCAM, WILLIAM (d. 1349?), 'Doctor invincibilis', studied at Oxford, became a Franciscan, and graduated in Paris. He entered into the Franciscan controversy concerning poverty, and defended against Pope John XXII the doctrine of 'Evangelical poverty'. He was imprisoned at Avignon on a charge of heresy (1328), but escaped and spent the remainder of his life at the Franciscan house at Munich, where he died and was buried.

His principal importance lies in his philosophical work. He condemned the doctrine of Realism without accepting the extravagances of Nominalism. The real is always individual, not universal. The realists had abstracted the common or universal element from individual things, and attributed to it a higher degree of reality than to those individual things. But this universal is quoddam fictum, a 'term' or 'sign', not a 'thing', and 'entities must not be unnecessarily multiplied' (a principle known as Occam's razor). This concept nevertheless has importance, and the duty of science is to investigate the real likenesses between individual things. He thus approaches the point of view of Roger Bacon. Instead of reasoning from universal premisses, received from authority, we must generalize from experience of the natural order, the doctrine which we find advocated later by F. Bacon, Hobbes, and Berkeley.

Ocnus, in Roman fable, a man remarkable for his industry, who had a wife remarkable for her prodigality. He is represented as twisting a rope, which an ass standing by eats up as fast as he makes it; whence the CORD OF OCNUS, proverbial for wasted labour.

O'CONNOR, RT. HON. THOMAS POWER (1848-1929), M.P. and founder and first editor of 'The Star', 'The Sun', &c.; author of a life of Beaconsfield, &c.

Octavia, the sister of Octavian (Augustus) and Mark Antony's wife, figures in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' and Dryden's 'All for Love' (qq.v.).

Octavo, a book in which the sheets are so folded that each leaf is one-eighth of a whole sheet.

OCTOBER CLUB

October Club, THE, a club of Tory members of parliament of Queen Anne's time, who met at the Bell (afterwards the Crown) in King Street, Westminster, to drink October ale, 'consult affairs and drive things on to extremes against the Whigs' (Swift, Letter of 10 Feb. 1710-11).

Octopus, The, a novel by F. Norris (q.v.).

Octosyllabic, consisting of eight syllables, usually applied to the eight-syllabled rhyming iambic metre of, e.g., 'The Lady of the Lake'.

Od or ODYL, a hypothetical force, held by Baron von Reichenbach (1788-1869) to pervade all nature, manifesting itself in certain persons of sensitive temperament (streaming from their finger-tips) and exhibited especially by magnets, heat, light, &c. It has been held to explain the phenomena of mesmerism and animal magnetism. [OED.]

Ode, in ancient literature, a poem intended or adapted to be sung; in modern use, a rhymed (rarely unrhymed) lyric, often in the form of an address, generally dignified or exalted in subject, feeling and style, but sometimes (in earlier use) simple and familiar (though less so than a song). [OED.]

Ode on a Grecian Urn, see Keats.

Ode to Evening, see Collins (William).

Ode to the West Wind, see Shelley.

Odhaerir or ODHROERIR, in Scandinavian mythology, a golden mead, symbolizing poetry, a gift of Odin to gods and men, made from the blood of Kvasir, a wise man killed by the dwarfs.

Odin, the Norse form of the Old English Woden (whence our 'Wednesday'), in northern mythology the supreme god and creator; also the god of the atmosphere, of the infernal regions, of wisdom, and of eloquence. He is the son of Bôr, the husband of Frigga, and the father of Thor, Balder, and Hödr (qq.v.). He obtained wisdom by drinking from the well of Mimer (q.v.), sacrificing an eye for the purpose. He has a horse called SLEIPNIR, a magic ring called DRAUPNIR, his abode is GLADSHEIM, and he is attended by two black ravens HUGIN and MUNIN (thought and memory). See the first of Carlyle's 'Lectures of Heroes', 'The Hero as Divinity'.

Odoric, FRIAR, see Cathay.

O'Dowd, MAJOR, MRS., and GLORVINA, characters in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Odyt, see Od.

Odysseus, see Ulysses.

Odyssey, The, a Greek epic poem attributed to Homer (q.v.), describing the adventures of Odysseus in the course of his return from the Trojan War to his kingdom of Ithaca (see Ulysses).

Oedipus, son of Laius, king of Thebes, and Jocasta. His father was informed by an oracle that he must perish at his son's hands, and consequently ordered the destruction of the child. Oedipus was exposed, hung to a tree by a twig passed through his feet (whence his name, 'swollen-foot'), but was rescued by a shepherd. In ignorance of his parentage, Oedipus later slew Laius his father, and went on to Thebes, which was then plagued by the Sphinx (q.v.). Creon, brother of Jocasta and regent of Thebes, offered the kingdom and his sister's hand to whoever should rid the country of this pest. Oedipus, having solved the Sphinx's riddle, thus obtained the kingdom and Jocasta, his mother, for his wife, by whom he had two sons, Polyneices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismene and Antigone. Having discovered the facts of his parentage, Oedipus, in horror at his crimes, put out his own eyes, while Jocasta hanged herself. He retired, led by his daughter Antigone, to Colonus in Attica, where he died. The story of Oedipus is the theme of tragedies by Sophocles (q.v.). For 'Davus sum, non Oedipus' see Davus.

Oedipus complex, in the psycho-analysis of Freud (q.v.), a manifestation of infantile sexuality in the relations of the child to its parents.

Œil-de-bœuf (bull's-eye), an antechamber in the palace of Versailles, adjoining the king's bedroom, so named from a small oval window in one of the walls; here the courtiers awaited the king's appearance, intrigued, and discussed the news.

Oenomāus, see Pelops.

Oenônê, a nymph of Mt. Ida, who became enamoured of the youthful shepherd, Paris (q.v.), before he was known to be the son of Priam, and lived with him in great happiness. Having the gift of prophecy, she foretold to him the disasters which would ensue from his voyage into Greece, and that he should have recourse to her knowledge of medicine at the hour of death. When Paris had received his fatal wound, he had recourse to Oenone, whom he had scurvily abandoned, and sought her help to cure him. She refused, but later, when she learnt that he was dead, took her own life from remorse. The story of Oenone is the theme of 'The Death of Paris' in Morris's 'The Earthly Paradise' (q.v.), and of two poems by A. Tennyson, 'Oenone' and 'The Death of Oenone'.

Oeta, MT., a branch of Mt. Pindus in Thessaly, on which Hercules erected his own funeral pyre. Spenser calls Hercules 'that great Œtean knight' ('Faerie Queene', VIII. ii. 4).

Oexmelin, see Esquemeling.

Offa's Dyke, an entrenchment running from near the mouth of the Wye to near the mouth of the Dee, built (or repaired) by Offa, king of Mercia (757-95), for defence against the Welsh. This line is still roughly the border line between England and Wales.

OFFENBACH

Offenbach, JACQUES (1819-80), born at Cologne, the son of a Jew, the 'creator of French burlesque opera', a composer of sprightly humorous music which has enjoyed great popularity. His best-known operas are 'Orphée aux Enfers' and 'The Tales of Hoffmann'.

Office, THE HOLY, see Inquisition.

Og, in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), represents Thomas Shadwell (q.v.), in allusion to his stoutness (Deut. iii. 11).

Ogham or OGAM, an alphabet of twenty characters used by the ancient British and Irish, and consisting of strokes upright or sloping, and dots, in various numbers; adapted to, and only used for, inscriptions on stone or wood. The alphabet is traditionally attributed to a mythical inventor OGMA. There was a Gaulish deity OGMOS, who presided over language and eloquence.

Ogier the Dane, a hero of the Charlemagne cycle of legends, identified with a Frankish warrior Autgarius who fought against Charlemagne and then submitted to him. According to the Charlemagne romances he is hostage for his father Gaufrey of 'Danne-march' at Charlemagne's court. He gains the emperor's favour by his exploits in Italy. His son having been killed by the son of Charlemagne in a quarrel, Ogier in a fury kills the queen's nephew, and would have killed the king himself but for the intervention of his knights. Ogier flies and is besieged, and at last imprisoned. He is released to fight the Saracen chiefs, and recovers favour by his success. He marries an English princess and receives from Charlemagne the fiefs of Hainaut and Brabant. When over a hundred years old, according to another legend, he was rejuvenated by the fairy Morgana, who retained him in her palace of oblivion for two hundred years, after which he reappeared for a time at the court of France; but, when on the point of marrying the widowed queen of that country, was snatched away again by Morgana. Ogier is included in some of the lists of Charlemagne's paladins (q.v.). It is doubtful whether he had anything to do with Denmark, 'Dannemarch' signifying perhaps the marches of the Ardennes. None the less, as Holger Danske, he became the subject of Danish folk-song and a Danish national hero, who fought with the German Dietrich of Bern (q.v.).

OGILBY, JOHN (1600-76), author and printer, published verse translations of Virgil, 'Aesop's Fables', and Homer, with plates by Hollar; and 'Road Books of England and Wales', constantly re-edited till they faded into Mogg's 'Road Books'.

Ogre, a man-eating monster of fairy-tale, usually represented as a hideous giant. The origin of the word is unknown. It is said [OED.] to be first used by Perrault (q.v.) in his 'Contes', but Hatzfeld and Darmeteter give a quotation of 1527 containing the word.

OLAUS MAGNUS

Ogýgia, in the 'Odyssey', the mythical island of Calypso. It is represented as being far away to the westward, beyond Scheria, the land of the Phaeacians.

Oisín, the legendary Gaelic warrior, son of Finn, also known as Ossian (q.v.). His wanderings are the subject of a poem by Yeats (q.v.).

Okba, the magician in Southey's 'Thalaba' (q.v.).

O'KEEFE or O'KEEFFE, JOHN (1747-1833), actor and dramatist, produced his 'Tony Lumpkin in Town' in 1778, after which he wrote some fifty comic and musical pieces. Of these the best known are 'Wild Oats' (1791) and 'The Castle of Andalusia' (1782). He was the author of the famous song 'I am a Friar of Orders Grey' (in his opera 'Merry Sherwood').

Olaf, St., son of King Harald Grenske, was king of Norway, 1015-28. In his youth he is said to have gone to England as an ally of Æthelred. The 'Heimskringla' (q.v.) relates how his fleet, sailing up the Thames, was stopped by a bridge, between London and Southwark, which the Norsemen attacked and pulled down. Like his cousin and predecessor, Olaf Trygvesson, St. Olaf was active in the diffusion of Christianity in his kingdom. He was expelled from Norway by Canute in 1028, and, returning in 1030, met the rebels at Stiklestad, where he fell mortally wounded. Among the churches in London dedicated to St. Olave, that in Tooley Street, Southwark, is probably a survival of a Danish settlement (G. R. Stirling Taylor). Tooley Street itself preserves, in a corrupt form, Olaf's name.

Olaf Trygvesson, king of Norway, 995-1000, not to be confused with Olaf Haraldson (St. Olaf, q.v.). He invaded England, and with Svend (or Sweyn) of Denmark attacked London in 994. According to the 'Heimskringla' (q.v.) he harried the coast from Northumberland to Scilly, where he was converted to Christianity. He deposed Hakon the Bad and became king of Norway in his stead in 995, and introduced Christianity into his realm by forcible methods. He was defeated and killed in 1000 by the kings of Denmark and Sweden, aided by his disaffected subjects. The story of his last great sea-fight, of the capture of his ship the 'Long Worm', and of his leap to death in the sea, makes one of the most stirring narratives in the 'Heimskringla'. He is described as a man of surpassing strength and nimbleness, who could walk outboard along the oars of the 'Worm' while his men were rowing.

OLAUS MAGNUS (1490-1558), Swedish ecclesiastic and historian, was archbishop of Upsala. After the triumph of the Reformed Faith in Sweden, he settled at Rome in 1527, where he lived most of the remainder of his life. His 'Historia de Gentibus Septentrionalibus' (1555) contains interesting information on the early Norsemen.

OLCOTT

Olcott, COLONEL H. S., see Theosophy.

Old Bachelor, The, the first comedy of Congreve, produced in 1693.

The 'Old Bachelor' is Heartwell, 'a surly old pretended woman-hater', who falls in love with Silvia, not knowing her to be the forsaken mistress of Vainlove, and is inveigled into marrying her, only discovering her true character afterwards, from the gibes of his acquaintances. The parson who has been brought in to marry them, however, is in fact Vainlove's friend Belmour, who has assumed the disguise for the purpose of an intrigue with Laetitia, the young wife of an uxorious old banker, Fondlewife; and Heartwell is relieved to discover that the marriage was a pretence. The comedy includes the amusing characters of Sir Joseph Wittol, a foolish knight, who allows himself to be really married to Silvia, under the impression that she is the wealthy Araminta; and his companion, the cowardly bully, Captain Bluffe, who under the same delusion is married to Silvia's maid. The success of the play was in part due to the acting of Betterton and Mrs. Bracegirdle (qq.v.).

Old Buccaneer, The, Captain John Peter Kirby, a character in Meredith's 'The Amazing Marriage' (q.v.).

Old Cloak, The, an anonymous poem ('Oxford Book of Sixteenth-Century Verse', No. 99).

Old Curiosity Shop, The, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published as a separate volume in 1841. It was originally intended to be fitted into the framework of 'Master Humphrey's Clock' (1840-1), and Master Humphrey is, in fact, the narrator of the first few chapters. But this idea was soon abandoned.

Little Nell (Trent) lives in the gloomy atmosphere of the old curiosity shop kept by her grandfather, whom she tends with devotion. Reduced to poverty by a spendthrift son-in-law, and his remaining means drained by Nell's profligate brother Fred, he has borrowed money from Daniel Quilp, a hideous dwarf and a monster of iniquity, and this money he secretly expends in gambling, in the vain hope of retrieving his fortunes, for Little Nell's sake. Quilp, who believes him a rich miser, at last discovers where the borrowed money has gone, and seizes the shop. The old man and the child flee and wander about the country, suffering great hardships, and haunted by the fear of being discovered by Quilp, who pursues them with unrelenting hatred. They at last find a haven in a cottage by a country church, which they are appointed to look after. The grandfather's brother, returning from abroad, and anxious to relieve their needs, has great difficulty in tracing them. At last he finds them, but Nell, worn out with her troubles, has just died, and the grandfather soon follows her.

The novel contains a number of well-known characters. Besides the loathsome and grotesque Quilp (who is drowned when on the point of being arrested for felony), there are his associates, the attorney Sampson Brass and his grim sister Sally; the honest lad Kit Nubbles, devoted to Little Nell, who incurs the hatred of Quilp, and is nearly transported through his machinations; Mr. and Mrs. Garland, the kindly old couple who befriend Kit; Dick Swiveller, the disreputable facetious friend of Fred Trent, placed by Quilp for his own purposes as clerk to Brass; 'the Marchioness', the half-starved drudge in the Brass household (she marries Dick in the end); Codlin and Short, the Punch and Judy men, whom Little Nell and her grandfather accompany for a time in their wanderings; and Mrs. Jarley, of the wax-works.

Old Fortunatus, a comedy by Dekker (q.v.), published in 1600, based on a story contained in the German 'Volksbuch' of 1509 and dramatized by Hans Sachs in 1553.

The beggar Fortunatus, encountering Fortune, is offered the choice between wisdom, strength, health, beauty, long life, and riches, and chooses the last. He receives a purse from which he can at any time draw ten pieces of gold. He goes on his travels, in the course of which he secures the marvellous hat of the Soldan of Turkey, which transports the wearer wherever he wishes to go. But at the height of his success Fortune steps in and puts an end to his life. His son Anadelocia, refusing to take warning by his father's fate, and equipped with the purse and hat, goes through a series of adventures at the court of Athelstane, is finally deprived of his talismans and meets a miserable death.

The character of Orleans, the 'frantic lover' of Athelstane's daughter, has been much praised by Charles Lamb.

OLD MOORE, Francis Moore (1657-1715), physician, astrologer, and schoolmaster, who in 1699 published an almanac containing weather predictions in order to promote the sale of his pills. In 1700 appeared his 'Vox Stellarum, an Almanac for 1701 with Astrological Observations'. There are now several almanacs called 'Old Moore', and the predictions range far beyond the weather.

Old Mortality, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1816 (first series of the 'Tales of My Landlord').

The title is taken from the nickname of a certain Robert Paterson, who towards the end of the 18th cent. wandered about Scotland cleaning and repairing the tombs of the Cameronians, a sect of strict Covenanters who took up arms for their religious opinions in the reign of Charles II. The story is based on the anecdotes told by this supporter of their cause, and covers the period from the military operations undertaken against them in 1679, under the command of John Grahame of Claverhouse, to the more peaceful days of religious toleration introduced by William III. It is particularly concerned with the fortunes of Henry Morton of Milnwood, a young man of courage and high character, and a moderate Presbyterian, who, at the outset of the tale, is arrested by the dragoons of Claverhouse for having harboured an old friend of his father, the fanatical Covenanter, John Balfour of Burley, not knowing that this man had just taken part in the assassination of the archbishop of St. Andrews. Morton narrowly escapes immediate execution, and this act of oppression, coupled with a sense of his countrymen's sufferings, induces him to throw in his lot with the Covenanters, who have taken up arms for the cause of religious freedom, little as he shares their extreme religious opinions. He accordingly becomes one of their leaders. This brings him into violent antagonism with Lady Margaret Bellenden, the Royalist owner of Tillietudlem Castle, with whose granddaughter Edith he is in love. It is to the latter's intervention with Lord Evandale, one of Claverhouse's officers and Morton's rival for the hand of Edith, that Morton owes his life when first brought before Claverhouse. This act of generosity on Evandale's part is repaid by Morton at the skirmish of Drumclog, and again when the rebel forces under Burley have almost reduced Tillietudlem to surrender and have captured Evandale himself. Morton thus retains his place in Edith's heart. But the final defeat of the Covenanters at Bothwell Bridge, and his own capture and banishment, sever him for years from Edith, who believes him dead; and she is on the point of yielding to the patient suit of Evandale, when Morton, after the accession of William III, returns to England, and his arrival puts an end to the preparations for Edith's marriage. Evandale, in spite of the efforts of Morton to save him, is killed in a skirmish with a few fanatics, and Morton marries Edith. The story includes an interesting study of the character of Claverhouse and a vivid picture of the follies to which religious enthusiasm carried the Covenanters.

Old Nick, the Devil, where Nick is probably the familiar abbreviation of Nicholas, though the reason for the appellation is obscure. The earliest occurrence of the expression quoted in the OED. is 1643. Brewer suggests as origin Nickel, the German mischievous demon of the mines.

Old Parr, see Parr (T.).

Old Pretender, THE, James Francis Edward Stuart (1688-1766), son of James II and Mary of Modena. He was popularly, but erroneously, believed to be a supposititious child. He served with the French army and distinguished himself at Oudenarde (1708) and Malplaquet (1709). He took a part in the unsuccessful rising in Scotland of 1715, and gave money for the rising of 1745. He is buried in St. Peter's, Rome.

Old Q, the nickname of William Douglas, third Earl of March and fourth duke of Queensberry (1724-1810), a friend of the Prince of Wales, notorious for his escapades and dissolute life, much interested in horse-racing. He was satirized by Burns, and is the 'degenerate Douglas' of Wordsworth's sonnet.

Old Vic, THE, a theatre in the Waterloo Bridge Road, London, opened in 1818 as the 'Royal Coburg', shortly after the building of Waterloo Bridge. The foundation-stone was laid by the Prince of Saxe-Coburg, the husband of Princess Charlotte, daughter of the Regent. It was renamed the 'Victoria' in 1833. Before long it declined into a music-hall with a promenade. It was started afresh in 1880 on more respectable lines. Miss Lilian Baylis became manager in 1912, and made it famous by her notable productions of Shakespeare plays.

Old Wives' Tale, THE, a play in prose by Peele (q.v.), published in 1595.

The play is a satire on the romantic dramas of the time, the first English work of this kind. Two brothers are searching for their sister Delia, who is held captive by the magician Sacrapant. The brothers also fall into his hands. They are all rescued by the knight Eumenides aided by Jack's Ghost, who is impelled by motives of gratitude, because the knight had borne the expense of Jack's funeral.

Old Wives' Tale, THE, a novel by E. A. Bennett (q.v.), published in 1908.

It is the long chronicle of the lives of two sisters, Constance and Sophia Baines, daughters of a draper of Burslem (Burslem, one of the 'Five Towns', q.v.), from their ardent girlhood, through disillusionment, to death. The drab life of the draper's shop, its trivial incidents, are made interesting and important. Constance, a staid and sensible young woman, marries the estimable and superficially insignificant Samuel Povey, the chief assistant in the shop, and spends all her life in Bursley. The more passionate and imaginative Sophia elopes with the fascinating Gerald Scales, a commercial traveller who has come into a fortune. He is an unprincipled blackguard, has to be forced to marry her, carries her to Paris, where she is exposed to indignities, and finally deserts her. She struggles to success as a lodging-house keeper in Paris, where she lives through the siege of 1870. The sisters are reunited, and spend their last years together in Bursley.

Oldbuck, JONATHAN, Laird of Monkbarns, the principal character in Sir W. Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.). MISS GRISELDA ('GRIZZY') OLDBUCK is his sister.

Oldcastle, SIR JOHN (d. 1417), Lord Cobham in right of his wife, a leader of the Lollards (q.v.), after heterodox declarations of faith, was declared a heretic in 1414 and imprisoned in the Tower. He escaped, was outlawed, captured near Welshpool, and 'hung and burnt hanging' in St. Giles's Fields.

Oldcastle, The First Part of Sir John, a play published in 1600, of unknown authorship, included in the 3rd and 4th Shakespeare folios, but certainly not by him.

It deals with the proceedings in Henry V's reign against Sir John Oldcastle (q.v.), as the chief supporter of the Lollards.

Oldfield, ANNE (1683-1730), an actress who excelled both in tragedy and comedy. She first made her mark as Lady Betty Modish in Colley Cibber's 'The Careless Husband' (q.v.), but her best parts are said to have been Cleopatra, Calista (in Rowe's 'Fair Penitent', q.v.), and Lady Townly (in Cibber's 'The Provok'd Husband', q.v.). She was buried in Westminster Abbey, beneath Congreve's monument. She is the 'Narcissa' of Pope's 'Moral Essays'.

OLDHAM, JOHN (1653-83), educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, published several Pindaric odes, but is chiefly remembered for his ironical 'Satire against Virtue' and 'Satires against the Jesuits' (1681). He also wrote imitations of Horace, Bion, Moschus, and Boileau. His 'Poems and Translations' were collected in 1683. Scott ('Waverley') speaks of him as 'the English Juvenal'. Dryden addressed some beautiful lines to his memory.

OLDMIXON, JOHN (1673-1742), a Whig historian and pamphleteer, published 'The British Empire in America' (1708), 'The Secret History of Europe' (1712-15), and histories of England during the Stuart reigns (1729) and those of William III, Anne, and George I (1735-9). By his 'Essay on Criticism', prefixed to the third edition (1727) of his 'Critical History of England' (1724-6), he incurred the hostility of Pope, who pilloried him in the 'Dunciad' and the 'Art of Sinking in Poetry'.

OLIPHANT

OLDYS, WILLIAM (1696-1761), antiquary, and editor of the 'Harleian Miscellany' (q.v.). He wrote a 'Life of Sir Walter Raleigh' and contributed many biographies to the 'Biographia Britannica'. He was also author of one well-known poem, 'Busy, curious, thirsty fly!' ('Oxford Book of English Verse', No. 438). He was relieved from poverty and the Fleet prison by being appointed Norroy king-of-arms.

Olindo, the lover of Sophronia in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v.).

OLIPHANT, LAURENCE (1829-88), was born at Cape Town of Scottish descent, and after a desultory education and extensive travels with his parents, became a barrister in Ceylon, where his father was chief justice. He published a 'Journey to Khatmandu' (in Nepal) in 1852, and 'The Russian Shores of the Black Sea' in 1853. In 1853-4 he was secretary to Lord Elgin at Washington and in Canada, and then accompanied Lord Stratford de Redcliffe to the Crimea. He acted as correspondent to 'The Times' in Circassia during the war. He next accompanied Lord Elgin to China as private secretary, and in 1859 published a 'Narrative of a Mission to China in 1857-8-9'. He is then heard of as plotting with Garibaldi in Italy, as secretary of legation in Japan, and in other parts of the world. He was 'Times' correspondent during the Franco-German War. His satirical novel, 'Piccadilly', which had appeared in 'Blackwood' in 1865, was republished in 1870. In 1867 he had come under the subjection of the American 'prophet', Thomas Lake Harris, to whom he surrendered his property at Brocton, and by whom he was commercially employed in America, an experience which led to the publication, in 1876, of 'The Autobiography of a Joint-Stock Company', exposing the methods of American financiers. Oliphant had married Miss L'Estrange in 1872, and with her wrote the strange 'Sympteneumata' (1885), a work which they believed to have been dictated by a spirit. He wrote his novel 'Altiora Peto' (1883) and several mystical works at Haifa in Palestine, where, with his second wife, he founded a community of Jewish immigrants. His many experiences provided materials for 'Episodes of a Life of Adventure' which appeared in 1887, not long before his death. His 'Life' was written by Margaret Oliphant (q.v.).

OLIPHANT, MARGARET OLIPHANT (1828-97), née Wilson, married her cousin, Francis William Oliphant, a painter and designer of stained glass. She published many novels, of which the best known are the 'Chronicles of Carlingford', issued anonymously between 1863 and 1876, including 'Salem Chapel', 'The Perpetual Curate', 'The Rector', 'Miss Marjoribanks', and 'Phoebe Junior'. Of these the best are 'Miss Marjoribanks' (the story of the social ambitions of a young lady, told with genial humour) and 'Salem Chapel' (which depicts the narrow and intolerant piety of a dissenting community). In 'A Beleaguered City' (1880) and 'A Little Pilgrim of the Unseen' (1882), Mrs. Oliphant introduces a supernatural element. She wrote a number of stories of which Scotland is the scene, beginning with 'Passages in the Life of Mrs. Maitland' (1849) and including 'Kirsteen' (1890). She also published lives of Edward Irving (1862) and Laurence Oliphant (1892), 'Makers of Florence' (1888), and 'Makers of Venice' (1889). Her 'Annals of a Publishing House: William Blackwood and his Sons' appeared in 1897. Her 'Autobiography' (1899) describes her efforts, by her voluminous writings, to provide for the maintenance and education of her own and her brother's children.

Olivant, the ivory horn (from Oliphaunt) of Orlando.

Oliver, in the Charlemagne cycle of legends, one of Charlemagne's paladins (q.v.). He is the close friend of Roland, with whom he has a prolonged and undecided single combat (the origin of their comradeship, see Roland for an Oliver), and his equal in bravery, but more prudent. At the battle of Roncevaux (see Roland) he urges Roland to summon help by sounding his horn, but Roland postpones doing so till too late. Oliver's sister Aude is betrothed to Roland.

Oliver, a character in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

Oliver Dain (OLIVIER LE DAIN), barber and counsellor of Louis XI; he figures in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.).

Oliver Twist, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1837-8.

Oliver Twist is the name given to a child of unknown parentage born in a workhouse and brought up under the cruel conditions to which pauper children were formerly exposed, the tyrant at whose hands he especially suffers being Bumble, the parish beadle. After experience of an unhappy apprenticeship, he runs away, reaches London, and falls into the hands of a gang of thieves, at the head of which is the old Jew Fagin, and whose other chief members are the burglar, Bill Sikes, his companion Nancy, and 'the Artful Dodger', an impudent young pickpocket. Every effort is made to convert Oliver into a thief. He is temporarily rescued by the benevolent Mr. Brownlow, but kidnapped by the gang, whose interest in his retention has been increased by the offers of a sinister person named Monks, who has a special interest, presently disclosed, in Oliver's perversion. Oliver is now made to accompany Bill Sikes on a burgling expedition, in the course of which he receives a gunshot wound, and comes into the hands of Mrs. Maylie and her protégée Rose, by whom he is kindly treated and brought up. After a time, Nancy, who develops some redeeming traits, reveals to Rose that Monks is aware of Oliver's parentage, and wishes all proof of it destroyed; also that there is some relationship between Oliver and Rose herself. Inquiry is set on foot. In the course of it Nancy's action is discovered by the gang, and she is brutally murdered by Bill Sikes. A hue and cry is raised; Sikes, trying to escape, accidentally hangs himself, and the rest of the gang are secured and Fagin executed. Monks, found and threatened with exposure, confesses what remains unknown. He is the half-brother of Oliver, and has pursued his ruin, animated by hatred and the desire to retain the whole of his father's property. Rose is the sister of Oliver's unfortunate mother. Oliver is adopted by Mr. Brownlow. Monks emigrates and dies in prison. Bumble ends his career in the workhouse over which he formerly ruled.

Olivia, (1) one of the principal characters in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.); (2) a character in Wycherley's 'The Plain Dealer' (q.v.); (3) the elder daughter of Dr. Primrose, in Goldsmith's 'The Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.).

Olney Hymns, see Cowper.

Olor Iscanus, a collection of poems by Vaughan (q.v.), published in 1651, but written some years earlier. The poem which gives its title to the book is in praise of the river Usk.

Olympia, a small plain in Elis in the north-west of the Peloponnese, where the Olympic Games (q.v.) were celebrated. It contained a sacred precinct, in which were temples of Zeus and Hera. Here stood the famous statue of the Olympian Zeus by Pheidias (see under Zeus), and here was found the statue of Hermes by Praxiteles, now in the museum of Olympia.

Olympiad, see Olympic Games.

Olympian Odes, THE, of Pindar were written to celebrate victories at the Olympic Games (q.v.), while the Pythian Odes were written in honour of victories at the Pythian Games held at Delphi. The other two books of Pindar's odes were the Nemean and the Isthmians, for the Nemean Games (at Nemea) and the Isthmian Games (at the Isthmus of Corinth). They were written to the order of any victor who would pay for them. The four groups of odes are known together as the 'Epinicia'.

Olympian Zeus, THE STATUE OF, see Zeus.

Olympic Games, THE, were held every fourth year at Olympia in Elis in the Peloponnese. Their origin is lost in antiquity, but legend attributes it to Hercules. The intervals of four years between the successive celebrations were known as Olympiads and were reckoned in Greek chronology from the year 776 B.C., when Coroebus won the foot-race. The games included foot-races, wrestling, boxing, the pancratium (a mixture of boxing and wrestling), the chariot-race, and the horse-race. The Olympic Games were revived in 1896, on an international basis, at the suggestion of Baron Pierre de Coubertin.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Other important periodic games were the Pythian Games of the Boeotians, the Nemean Games of the Argives, and the Isthmian Games of the Corinthians.

Olympus, a lofty mountain standing at the eastern extremity of the range that divided Greece from Macedonia, on the Thermaic Gulf. It was regarded in Greek mythology as the home of the gods, who met in conclave on the summit.

The MYSIAN OLYMPUS was a lofty chain of mountains in the north-west of Asia Minor. Olyssipo, in imprints, Lisbon.

Om, a mystic and holy word in Hindu religious literature, regarded as summing up all truth. It is also the first word in the Buddhist formula om mani padme hum, regarded as of special sanctity and potency, and variously translated.

Omai, a native of Tahiti (Otaheite) who was brought to England by Captain Cook, and returned with him on the latter's last voyage.

Omar, the second caliph, who succeeded Abu Bakr (q.v.) in 634.

Omar, Mosque of, or 'Dome of the Rock', a famous mosque on the platform of the Temple at Jerusalem. It was originally a Byzantine church (much altered) and contains the rock on which, according to legend, Abraham prepared to sacrifice Isaac.

Omar Khayyám, The Rubáiyát of, a translation of the rubais or quatrains of the Persian poet of that name, by Edward Fitzgerald (q.v.), first published anonymously in 1859 (75 quatrains), remodelled and enlarged (110 quatrains) in 1868, and further modified and reduced (101 quatrains) in 1872 and 1879.

Omar Khayyám ('Khayyám' means 'tent-maker'), an astronomer and poet, was born at Naishapur in Khorassan in the latter half of the 11th cent. and died in 1123. For the story of his relations with Nizam-ul-Mulk and Hasan-i-Sabbah (the 'Old Man of the Mountain'), see Nizam-ul-Mulk. The original 'rubáiyát' or quatrains are independent stanzas, of which the form is reproduced in the translation; but the translator has woven them together in a connected train of thought. The stanzas contain the poet's meditations and speculations on the mysteries of existence, and his counsel to drink and make merry while life lasts.

Ombre (from Spanish hombre, man), a card game played by three persons with forty cards, the 'ombre' being the player who undertakes to win the pool. The game was very popular in the 17th and 18th cents., until superseded by quadrille. It figures prominently in Pope's 'The Rape of the Lock' (q.v.).

Ommiades, see Umayyads.

Omnium, DUKE OF, a character in A. Trollope's 'Dr. Thorne' and 'Framley Parsonage' (q.v.). His successor in the title, Plantagenet Palliser, figures in the 'Phineas Finn' (q.v.) series of Trollope's novels.

ONEIDA COMMUNITY

OMNIUM, JACOB, see Higgins.

Omoo, a Narrative of Adventures in the South Seas, a romance by Melville (q.v.), published in 1847.

'Omoo' is a continuation of the adventures begun in 'Typee' (see under Melville). The narrator is taken off (from the island of Nukahura) by a whaler, the crew mostly desperadoes, and the conditions on board abominable. At Papeete in Tahiti he and some other malcontents are put ashore and sent to the 'calabooza', where they spend some weeks in the custody of an old native, 'Captain Bob'. The narrator and a humorous companion, 'Doctor Long Ghost', escape and live a wandering life, the story of their experiences furnishing vivid pictures of the manners and customs of the superficially converted Polynesians, and including a visit to the court of Queen Pomaree.

Omphälë, a queen of Lydia. When Hercules (q.v.) in a fit of insanity murdered Iphitus, the oracle required him to go into slavery for three years. He was accordingly sold to Omphale and set to women's work, while his mistress assumed his lion's skin and club.

On, the Hebrew name of Heliopolis in Egypt, the chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the sun.

One of our Conquerors, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1891.

Victor Radnor has, as a young man, married a rich elderly widow and then fallen in love with her young companion Natalia Dreighton. Victor and Natalia have defied convention and united their lives. They have a daughter, Nesta Victoria, attractive and courageous, who presently becomes aware of the stain on her birth. The novel is a study of the resulting situation: Victor's wife prolonging her life interminably; a constant threat of social exposure to the young couple; Victor optimistic, energetic, and financially prosperous; Natalia timid and shrinking under the cloud and anxiety; Nesta growing up, with several suitors around her, the most eligible being the Hon. Dudley Sowerby, heir to an earldom. The discovery of the fact of Nesta's illegitimate birth damps his ardour for a time. Her determined befriending of Mrs. Marsett, the frail and notorious but not depraved mistress of a young officer, is the final blow to their projected union, as it is the source of deep affliction to her mother. Harassed by her anxieties and cares, Natalia at this crisis dies, Victor's wife surviving her by a few hours. Victor, driven insane by grief, lives a few years longer. Nesta marries Dartrey Fenellan, a man with a juster perception than Sowerby of the girl's noble qualities. Daniel Kerpsey, Victor's pugilistic little clerk, is an amusing figure in the story.

Oneida Community, a religious society also called PERFECTIONISTS, founded in 1848 by John H. Noyes, at Oneida Creek, New York State. Its principles were thoroughly communistic until, in 1879, in deference to public opinion, marriage was introduced.

ONEIDA COMMUNITY

O'NEILL, EUGENE GLADSTONE (1888-1953), American dramatist. His works include 'Moon of the Caribbees' (1918), 'The Emperor Jones' (1920), 'Anna Christie' (1921), and 'Strange Interlude' (1928).

Oneiza, in Southey's 'Thalaba' (q.v.), the wife of Thalaba.

Onestl, NASTAGIO DEGLI, see Theodore and Honoria.

Only Way, The, a play adapted by F. Wills from Dickens's 'A Tale of Two Cities' (1890).

Onomatopoeia, the formation of a word by an imitation of the sound associated with the object or action designated; as 'hurlyburly'.

Open, Sesamè!, the magic formula in 'Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves' (q.v.).

Opera, a dramatic performance in which music forms an essential part, consisting of recitatives, arias, and choruses, with orchestral accompaniment and scenery. [OED.] It was first adopted in Italy. The first English work that may be called an opera was D'Avenant's 'Siege of Rhodes' (q.v.).

Opera Bouffe, comic opera, especially of a farcical character.

Ophelia, in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.).

Ophir, in O.T. geography, the place from which the ships of King Solomon brought gold and precious stones (1 Kings x. 11). It has been variously identified, and was probably in south-eastern Arabia, where the tribes trace their descent to Joktan (cf. Gen. x. 29; Sayce, 'Races of the O.T.', c. iii); perhaps Dhufar (see B. Thomas, 'Arabia Felix', 1932).

Ophiuchus, 'the Serpent-bearer', a northern constellation in ancient astronomy. In modern astronomy it extends north and south of the equinoctial near the Scorpion.

OPIE, Mrs. AMELIA (1769-1853), née Alderson, wife of John Opie the painter. She was a novelist and poet, and intimate with Sydney Smith, Sheridan, and Mme de Staël. Her writings include: 'Adeline Mowbray' (suggested by the story of Mary Wollstonecraft, 1804), 'Simple Tales' (1806), 'Lays for the Dead' (1833). She wrote a memoir of her husband (1809).

Opimian, THE REV. DR. THEOPHILUS, a character in Peacock's 'Gryll Grange' (q.v.). (Opimianum was a celebrated wine of the vintage of A.U.C. 633 = B.C. 121, when Opimius was consul. Lewis and Short.)

Opium Eater, Confessions of an English, see Confessions of an English Opium Eater.

Opptdan, from the Latin oppidum, a town; at Eton College, a student not on the foundation (who boards in the town or at one of the assistant masters' houses), distinguished from a Culleger. Formerly also at other great schools.

ORCADES

Ops, a Roman goddess of fertility and agriculture, regarded as the wife of Saturnus.

Oran Haut-ton, SIR, the amiable orang-outang, a character in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

Orange, a name applied to the ultra-Protestant party in Ireland, in reference to the secret Association of Orangemen formed in 1795. The exact origin of this use of 'Orange' is somewhat obscure, but it is supposed to be due to the fact that two members (by name Cope) of the 'Orange Lodge' of Freemasons existing in Belfast in 1795 were active in organizing the Protestant party, who were in consequence styled 'Orange boys'. The name of this 'Orange Lodge' probably had reference to William of Orange, or to the use of orange badges at the anniversaries at which his memory was celebrated. William of Orange derived his title from the small town and principality of that name on the Rhône, which passed to the House of Nassau in 1530. The name of this town is derived from its ancient Latin name Arausio, and has no connexion with the name of the fruit, which comes through Spanish from the Arabic naranj. [OED.]

Oranges and Lemons: what the bells of St. Clement's say, in the old rhyme that accompanies a nursery game. The rhyme begins:

Gay go up and gay go down

To ring the bells of London town, and a couplet follows for each church, St. Clement's, St. Martin's, &c., ending with 'the great bell at Bow'. The text is in Halliwell, 'Nursery Rhymes'.

Orator Henley, see Henley (J.).

Orator Hunt, HENRY HUNT (1773-1835), an active radical politician and agitator, who presided at the meeting in St. Peter's Fields, Manchester (the 'Peterloo Massacre'); a violent and stentorian but impressive speaker. He published memoirs in 1820.

Oratorians, an order founded at Rome by St. Philip Neri (Filippo de' Neri, 1515-95) an Italian priest. Its members are priests under no vows. Newman (q.v.) attached himself to the order and founded the Oratory at Birmingham in 1847 and in London in 1850.

Orbaneja, the painter of Ubeda referred to in 'Don Quixote' (II. i. 3), who, when asked what he was painting, replied 'As it may turn out'.

Orbillus, the schoolmaster of Horace, a flogger:

Delendaque carmina Livl, . . . meminl quae plagosum mihi parvo Orbiliū dictare.

(Horace, Ep. II. i. 69.)

Orc, in the mystical poems of Blake (q.v.), the symbol of rebellious anarchy, the opponent of Urizen.

Orcaades, the Orkney Islands.

ORCUS

Orcus, a Roman name for the Lower World, the abode of the dead.

Ordeal of Richard Feverel, The, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1859.

Richard is the son of Sir Austin Feverel, a wealthy baronet, who has been deserted by his wife and left with the boy to bring up. Sir Austin prides himself on his wisdom, which is less than he supposes, and has a 'system' of education, which consists in keeping him at home, for he thinks schools corrupt, and in trusting to parental vigilance. The breakdown of the system at adolescence is the underlying theme of the book. Richard, a spirited youth, and Lucy Desborough, a neighbouring farmer's niece, fall in love at first sight. An idyllic courtship ends in their discovery. She has every charm that nature can give, but not the birth that Sir Austin demands for his son's bride. Attempts to break the attachment result in their secret marriage and the anger of Sir Austin, who cruelly secures the separation of the young couple by working on his son's love for him. Richard, ordered to await his father's pleasure in London, sets about the redemption of an erring beautiful woman, and falls instead momentarily a victim to her lures. These have been spread at the instance of Lord Mountfalcon, who has designs on the innocent Lucy. Overwhelmed with shame at his infidelity to his wife, Richard prolongs his absence from her until he learns that he is a father and that Lucy and Sir Austin are reconciled. At the moment of returning to her, when the way to happiness seems at last open, he learns of the designs of Lord Mountfalcon, challenges him to a duel, and is seriously wounded. The shock is too severe for Lucy, who becomes crazy and dies.

Order, in classical architecture, a mode of architectural treatment founded upon the proportions of columns and the form of their capitals, with the relative proportions and amount of decoration used in their entablatures. [OED.]

The FIVE ORDERS OF CLASSICAL ARCHITECTURE are the Doric, Ionic, Corinthian (qq.v.), Tuscan, and Composite, of which the first three are the original Greek orders, the other two Roman varieties.

An ATTIC ORDER has a square column of any of the five above orders.

An ATTIC is originally a decorative structure consisting of a small order placed above another order of much greater height constituting the main façade. This was usually an Attic order, whence the name. From this the term is applied to the top storey of the building, under the beams of the roof, when there are more than two storeys above ground.

ORDERICUS VITALIS (1075-1143?), a Norman born in England, and a monk of St. Évroul in Normandy. He wrote an 'Ecclesiastical History' in Latin extending from the beginning of the Christian era down to 1141, one of the standard authorities for the Norman period.

ORFEO

Orders in Council, THE, of 1807, declared the ports of France and her allies in a state of blockade, and all neutral ships that attempted to enter them liable to seizure unless they had first called at a British port. These Orders in Council were provoked by Napoleon's Berlin Decree excluding British commerce from European ports and declaring the blockade of British ports. They were answered by Napoleon's Milan Decree making neutral vessels liable to seizure if they called at a British port. They resulted in the war of 1812-14 with the United States.

Orders, MONASTIC, see Benedictines, Capuchins, Cordeliers, Dominicans, Franciscans, Observants, Oratorians, Recollects, &c.

Oreads, nymphs (q.v.) of the mountains.

Oregon Trail, The, 'Sketches of the Prairie and Rocky-Mountain Life', by Francis Parkman, published in the 'Knickerbocker Magazine' in 1847, and in book form in 1849.

Orellana, an early name for the river Amazon, from Francisco de Orellana (fl. 1540), who served with Pizarro and first explored it. In the course of his voyage he heard from Indians of the existence of a tribe of Amazons or female warriors, and asserted that he had encountered them. Hence the present name of the river.

Orestes, son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (qq.v.). When his father was murdered by Clytemnestra and Aegisthus, the life of the young Orestes was saved and he was educated by his uncle Strophius with his son Pylades. Between Orestes and Pylades the closest friendship sprang up. When Orestes reached manhood he avenged his father's death by assassinating Aegisthus and Clytemnestra. To obtain purification from this murder Orestes was directed by the oracle at Delphi to bring to Greece a statue of Artemis from the Tauric Chersonese. Orestes and Pylades undertook the enterprise, and, having reached the Chersonese, were seized and ordered to be sacrificed, in accordance with the custom of the country. Iphigenia (q.v.) was then priestess of the temple of Artemis and it was her office to immolate these strangers. Having discovered that one of them was her brother, she resolved to fly with them from the Chersonese, carrying away the statue of Artemis. This they accomplished. Subsequently, after his return, Orestes carried off Hermione, daughter of Menelaus, who had been betrothed to him, but had married Neoptolemus.

Orfeo, Sir, a metrical romance of the Middle English period, in which the classical story of Orpheus and Eurydice (see Orpheus) is reproduced in Celtic guise. Queen Heurodys is carried off to fairyland, and pursued by King Orfeo, as a minstrel, whose melodious lays succeed in bringing her back to the world of men. On this was founded the ballad 'King Orfeo' (in Child's collection).

Orgilus, a character in Ford's 'The Broken Heart' (q.v.).

Orgoglio (Ital., signifying haughtiness), in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', i. vii. 9 and 10, captures the Red Cross Knight, and is slain by Prince Arthur.

Orgon, the credulous dupe in Molière's 'Tartuffe' (q.v.).

Oriana, see under Amadis of Gaul. Oriana is (1) a name frequently applied by the Elizabethan poets to Queen Elizabeth; (2) the heroine of Fletcher's 'The Wild-Goose Chase' (q.v.); (3) the subject of a ballad by Tennyson.

Oriflamme, said to be derived from aurea flamma, 'golden flame', a small red silk three-pointed banner of the abbots of Saint-Denis, which, when the abbey passed into the hands of the kings of France, became the French royal banner. The French armies fought under it from 1124 to 1415. The kings 'took it' from the altar of Saint-Denis before each campaign.

ORIGEN (c. 185–c. 253), the second great Christian thinker and scholar of the Alexandrian school (Clement was the first). He combined with his orthodox Christianity personal speculations which were rejected by the Church. He was author of many theological works, and compiler of the famous Hexapla versions of the Old Testament (see Bible).

Origin of Species, The, the great work of C. Darwin (q.v.), of which the full title was 'On the Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life', was published in 1859.

Original, The, a weekly publication by Thomas Walker (1784–1836), a collection of his thoughts on many subjects, but especially remembered for his admirable papers on health and gastronomy.

Original Poems for Infant Minds, see Taylor (Jane and Anne).

Orinda, THE MATCHLESS, see Philips (K.).

Orion, a giant and hunter of Boeotia, the subject of various legends, according to which he was deprived of sight by Dionysus, or killed by Artemis, or died of the sting of a scorpion, after boasting that he would clear the earth of all wild beasts. After his death he was placed among the stars. His constellation used to set about November, whence it was associated with storms and rain.

Orion, an allegorical poem by R. H. Horne (q.v.), published in 1843 at one farthing, as a satirical comment on the current estimation of poetry.

The poem is based on the myth of Orion (q.v. above), and is 'an attempt to re-establish the union which had existed in ancient times between philosophy and poetry' (Gosse). Orion here is 'the worker, the builder-up of things and of himself', 'a type of the struggle of man with himself, the contest between the intellect and the senses'. He is taken into the train of the goddess Artemis, 'the Queen of maiden immortality', who guides him in his duties and instils knowledge into his mind. But presently Orion is led astray by love of the beautiful Merope and loses his sight. He devotes himself to the service of mankind, and strives to admit the light of dawn to the temple of Artemis, by hewing down the trees and destroying the poisonous Harpies that obstruct it. But Artemis slays him. Orion is contrasted with Akinetos, his brother giant, the 'Great Unmoved' or Apathy, who discourages all effort as useless and fatal to the agent. Nevertheless Orion, after his death, is raised to the sky to continue his beneficent and stimulating work.

Orlando, (1) the Italian form of Roland (q.v.), a hero of the Charlemagne romances (see also Orlando Furioso and Orlando Innamorato); (2) in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.), the lover of Rosalind; (3) the title of a novel by V. Woolf (q.v.).

Orlando Friscobaldo, in Dekker's 'The Honest Whore' (q.v.), the father of Bellafront.

Orlando Furioso, a poem by Ariosto (q.v.), published in its complete form in 1532, designed to exalt the house of Este and its legendary ancestor Rogero (Ruggiero) and to continue the story of Orlando's love for Angelica begun by Boiardo in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.).

The main theme of the poem is this: Saracens and Christians, in the days of Charlemagne, are at war for the possession of Europe. The Saracens under Agramante, king of Africa, are besieging Charlemagne in Paris with the help of Marsilio, the Moorish king of Spain, and two mighty warriors, Rodomont and Manricardo. Christendom is imperilled. Angelica, who at the end of Boiardo's poem had been consigned by Charlemagne to the care of Namor, escapes. Orlando, chief of the paladins, a perfect knight, invincible and invulnerable, is lured by her beauty to forget his duty and pursue her. Angelica meets with various adventures, finally coming upon the wounded Moorish youth Medoro, whom she tends, falls in love with, and marries. A charming description follows of their honeymoon in the woods. Orlando, arriving there by chance, and learning their story, is seized with a furious and grotesque madness, runs naked through the country, destroying everything in his path, and at last returns to Charlemagne's camp, where he is finally cured of his madness and his love, and in a great conclusive battle kills Agramante.

Although the madness of Orlando gives the poem its name, a not less important theme in it is the love of Rogero (q.v.) for Bradamant, a maiden warrior, sister of Rinaldo (q.v.), and the many adventures and vicissitudes that interrupt the course of true love. Other notable episodes in the work are the voyage of Astolfo (q.v.) on the hippogriff to the moon, whence he brings back the lost wits of Orlando; and the self-immolation of Isabella, the widow of the Scottish prince Zerbino, to escape the attentions of the pagan king, Rodomont (q.v.). Orlando's horse is Brigliadoro; his sword Durindana.

The best translation of the 'Orlando Furioso' into English is that of Sir John Harington (q.v.). Unfortunately the book is rare. That of Hoole is more accessible, but less inspired. There are some well-told 'Tales from Ariosto' by J. Shield Nicholson.

Orlando Innamorato, a poem by Boiardo (q.v.), on the subject of the falling in love of Orlando (the Roland of the Charlemagne cycle) with Angelica, daughter of Galafron, the king of Cathay. She arrives at the court of Charlemagne, with her brother Argalia, under false pretences, to carry off the Christian knights to her father's country. Several knights attempt to win her, the chief of them being Astolfo, Ferragus, Rinaldo, and Orlando (qq.v.). Argalia is slain and Angelica flees, but, drinking of an enchanted fountain, falls in love with Rinaldo, who, drinking of another enchanted fountain, conceives a violent aversion to her. He runs away pursued by her, and they reach her father's country, where she is besieged in the capital, Albracca, by Agrican, king of Tartary, to whom her hand had been promised (an incident referred to by Milton, 'Paradise Regained', iii. 337-43). Orlando comes to Angelica's rescue, slays Agrican, and carries off Angelica to France, whither he has been summoned to assist Charlemagne against Agramante, king of the Moors. Owing once more to enchanted waters, Rinaldo this time falls in love with Angelica, and Angelica into hatred of him. A fierce combat ensues between Orlando and Rinaldo, suppressed by Charlemagne, who entrusts Angelica to Namo, duke of Bavaria.

The poem, which was left unfinished, was refashioned by Berni, but its true sequel is in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.) of Ariosto.

Orley Farm, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1862.

Sir Joseph Mason, having remarried late in life, is found on his death to have left by codicil Orley Farm, an estate forming part of his property, to his baby son Lucius. The validity of the codicil is disputed by the eldest son, but affirmed after a trial, and the widow and Lucius remain in possession for twenty years. Then Mr. Dockwrath, an attorney of questionable character, a tenant of part of Orley Farm, is given notice to quit, and, exasperated by what he considers unjust treatment, seeks vengeance in a revival of the question of the codicil. He discovers that there is another document that purports to have been signed by Sir Joseph on the same day as the codicil and witnessed by the same witnesses, whereas the witnesses declare that they attested only one document. The inference is that the codicil with its signatures is a forgery. The story deals with the gradual growth of the belief that Lady Mason has forged the codicil, her increasing anguish and final confession of the fact to Sir Peregrine Orme, her aged lover, her trial and acquittal, thanks to the dialectical skill of Mr. Chaffanbrass (see 'The Three Clerks'), her surrender of the property, and the influence of these events on the love-affairs and fortunes of the various minor characters in the novel.

Ormandine, in R. Johnson's 'The Seven Champions of Christendom' (q.v.), the necromancer in whose enchanted garden St. David slept for seven years, being at last released by St. George.

Ormazd or ORMUZD (AHURA MAZDA), in the Avesta or Zoroastrian religion, the god of goodness and light, in perpetual conflict with Ahriman, the spirit of evil.

ORME, ROBERT (1728-1801), born in India and a successful Anglo-Indian official, was author of the important 'History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Indostan' (1763-78), and of 'Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire' (1782).

Ormond, a novel by M. Edgeworth (q.v.), published in 1817.

This is a tale of life in Ireland, and in a minor degree in fashionable Paris society in the 18th cent. The principal characters are Harry Ormond, an orphan; his fascinating but unprincipled and designing guardian, Sir Ulick O'Shane; the kind-hearted eccentric Cornelius O'Shane, the 'king of the Black Islands'; and his daughter Dora, who has been plighted, before her birth, to one or other of the twin sons of Cornelius's boon companion, Connal, with disastrous results.

Ormulum, The, a poem of some 10,000 lines in the vernacular, written in the first half of the 13th cent., by one Orm or Ormin, an Augustinian monk who probably lived in the east of England. It consists of paraphrases of the gospels for the year as arranged in the mass book, supplemented by a homily on each; but the scheme was not completed. It is orthodox and conservative in matter. It is composed of lines of fifteen syllables without rhyme or alliteration. The author has his own system of spelling and his work is important for the light it throws on the evolution of the English language and literary form.

Ormuz or HORMUZ, an ancient city on an island at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, an important centre of commerce in the Middle Ages; referred to by Milton, 'Paradise Lost', II. 2. The Portuguese were the first Europeans to take it. In 1622 the Persian 'Sultan' invoked the aid of the East India Company, and captured it (after a gallant resistance) with English vessels.

Oroonoko, or the Royal Slave, a novel by Aphra Behn (q.v.), published about 1678. (For the tragedy by Southerne, see below.)

Oroonoko, grandson and heir of an African king, obtains the love of the beautiful Imoinda, daughter of the king's general, of whom the king himself is enamoured. Infuriated at learning this, the king orders Imoinda to be sold out of the country as a slave. Oroonoko himself is presently entrapped by the captain of an English slave-trading ship, and carried off to Surinam, an English colony in the West Indies. There he discovers Imoinda and is reunited to her. He presently stirs up the other slaves to escape from their miserable condition. They are pursued and induced to surrender on promise from the deputy-governor, Byam, of a pardon. Nevertheless, Oroonoko, when once in the governor's hands, is cruelly whipped. Oroonoko, determined to avenge himself on Byam, but not expecting to survive the attempt, and fearing to leave Imoinda a prey to the enraged slave-drivers, decides to kill her. Imoinda welcomes her fate and meets death smiling. Oroonoko is found near her dead body, attempts to take his own life, but is prevented and cruelly executed.

The novel is remarkable as the first expression in English literature of sympathy for the oppressed negroes. It no doubt reflects the authoress's memories of her early days in Surinam. It was made the subject of a tragedy by Southerne (q.v.), 'Oroonoko: A Tragedy', which was produced in 1695, and kept the stage for a considerable time. The play follows the broad lines of the novel, except that the deputy-governor's passion for Imoinda is one of the chief motives of action. The play is further enlivened by a comic underplot.

OROSIUS, a priest of Tarragona in Spain, fl. A.D. 500, disciple of St. Augustine and friend of St. Jerome, author of the 'Historia adversus Paganos', a universal history and geography, which King Alfred translated.

Orphan, The, a tragedy in blank verse by Otway (q.v.), produced in 1680.

Castalio and Polydore are the twin sons of Acasto. Monimia, the orphan daughter of a friend of Acasto's, has been brought up with them. Castalio and Polydore, loyally devoted to one another, have both fallen in love with Monimia, who returns the love of Castalio. But the latter, out of mistaken consideration for his brother, feigns indifference for Monimia. Chamont, an honest but rough and tactless soldier, brother of Monimia, comes as a guest to Acasto's house; he suspects that Monimia has been wronged by one of the young men, and annoys her with his questions. Castalio and Monimia thereupon are secretly married. Polydore, ignorant of this, and overhearing them arranging for a meeting in the night, takes Castalio's place in the darkness, and is not detected. Castalio, coming later, is shut out, and curses his wife for what he supposes to be her heartless and rebellious conduct. The truth being discovered through Chamont, the brothers fall into despair. Both kill themselves, and Monimia takes poison.

ORPHICISM

The play proved a great success, and was frequently revived. Monimia was one of Mrs. Barry's (q.v.) most celebrated parts.

Orphëus, a legendary pre-Homeric poet, said to be son of the muse Calliope, and a follower of Dionysus (q.v.). He was so skilled a player on the lyre that the wild beasts were spellbound by his music. He took part in the expedition of the Argonauts (q.v.) and helped them by his song to resist the lure of the Sirens (q.v.). He passionately loved his wife Eurydice, and, when she died of the bite of a serpent, determined to recover her. He entered the infernal regions and charmed Pluto and Persephone with his music. They consented to restore Eurydice to him on condition that he forbore to look behind him until he had emerged from Hades. Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions when he forgot the condition and turned back to look at Eurydice. She instantly vanished from his sight, and his attempts to rejoin her were vain. He now separated himself from the society of mankind, and the Thracian women, whom he had offended by his coldness, tore him in pieces and threw his head, which still uttered the name 'Eurydice', into the river Hebrus. Poems ascribed to Orpheus were current in Greece in the 6th and 5th cents. B.C. and were known to Plato. They embodied the doctrines of the mystical religion known as Orphicism (q.v.). The poems now extant that bear the name of Orpheus are Neoplatonist forgeries. Orpheus, in the eyes of the ancients, was the founder of religious mysteries, 'sacer interpresque deorum' in the words of Horace. There are echoes of the story of Orpheus in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', vii. 30 et seq.; 'Lycidas', 58-63; and 'L'Allegro', 145 et seq.

Orphicism, a mystic religion of ancient Greece, of which Orpheus (q.v.) was the centre. Its origins are obscure, but it appears to have developed in the 6th cent. B.C., when there was an abundant Orphic literature, little of which has survived. It sank to the level of a sectarian superstition in the 5th cent., but the profound thoughts which underlay it affected Pindar and Plato. In the Orphic doctrine, the abstract principle Time stood at the origin of all things. Time formed an egg, from which the gods proceeded. Zeus and Persephone had a son, Dionysos-Zagreus, who was torn in pieces by the Titans. They ate his limbs, but his heart was saved by Athena and brought to Zeus, and from it was afterwards born the new Dionysos. The Titans were reduced to ashes by the lightning of Zeus, and from those ashes man was formed. He thus contains something of the divine, derived from Zeus, and something of his enemies, the Titans. The Orphics taught the transmigration of souls, retribution in a future life, and final liberation from man's Titanic inheritance by the observation of strict purity (M. P. Nilsson, 'A History of Greek Religion', 1925).

ORSINO

Orsino, in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.), the duke of Illyria.

Orson, see Valentine and Orson.

Ortelius, ABRAHAM (1527-98), a geographer of Antwerp, who came to England and became familiar with Camden (q.v.). He published his atlas, "Theatrum Orbis Terrarum", in 1570.

Ortheris, STANLEY, with Terence Mulvaney and John Learoyd, the three privates in Rudyard Kipling's 'Soldiers Three'.

Orthodox Church or GREEK CHURCH, THE, the Eastern Church which recognizes the headship of the Patriarch of Constantinople, together with the national churches of Russia, Rumania, &c., which hold the same 'orthodox' creed. It repudiates the papal claim to supremacy and the celibacy of the clergy, and holds the doctrine that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father through the Son. It rejects the filioque clause of the Nicene Creed as being unauthorized by the Universal Church. In most other respects it agrees with the Roman Catholic Church. The epithet 'orthodox' was originally assumed to distinguish it from the various divisions of the Eastern Church (e.g. the Monophysite, Nestorian, &c.), which separated on points of doctrine and have not accepted all the decrees of successive general councils. [OED.] The final severance of the Orthodox Church from the Roman Church occurred in 1054, when Pope and Patriarch mutually excommunicated each other's churches. Owing to the non-acceptance by the Orthodox Church of the Gregorian calendar (q.v.), Easter Day (q.v.) falls to be observed in that Church, in most years, on a later date than in the other churches.

Orton, ARTHUR, see Tichborne Case.

Orville, LORD, the hero of Miss Burney's 'Evelina' (q.v.).

Osbaldeston, GEORGE (1787-1866), a famous sportsman, who was master of hounds while at Brasenose College, Oxford. He was master of the Quorn hounds, 1817-21 and 1823-8, and afterwards of the Pytchley. In 1831 he rode 200 miles in less than nine consecutive hours.

Osbaldistone, MR., FRANCIS, RASHLEIGH, and SIR HILDEBRAND, characters in Scott's 'Rob Roy' (q.v.).

Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, at one time a royal residence, purchased by Queen Victoria, who died there. It was given to the nation by Edward VII, and a Royal Naval College was opened there in 1903 (closed in 1921).

Osborne, DOROTHY (1627-95), married Sir W. Temple (q.v.) in 1655. Her letters to him during the period 1652-4 were published in 1888. A new edition by G. C. Moore Smith appeared in 1928.

Osborne, MR., GEORGE, his son, and MARIA and JANE, his daughters, characters in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Osborne, THOMAS (d. 1767), bookseller, remembered as having issued Richardson's 'Pamela' (q.v.), and published the 'Harleian Miscellany' (q.v.). He was beaten by Dr. Johnson for impertinence and ridiculed by Pope.

Oscan Fables, see Atellan Fables.

Oscar, the son of Ossian (q.v.), figures in many of the Ossianic poems of Macpherson.

Oscar of Alva, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), included in 'Hours of Idleness' (1807).

The poem shows the influence of the ballad poets and of Macpherson's 'Ossian'. Oscar the heroic, and Allan the smooth-tongued, are two brothers of the Alva clan. Oscar is to marry Mora, but disappears on the wedding-day and is not heard of for three years. Then Allan is to marry Mora in his stead. At the wedding feast, Oscar's wraith appears in the guise of a stranger chief and bids the assembled guests drink to the memory of the lost Oscar. Allan betrays himself by his terror, and is declared by the apparition his brother's murderer.

O'Shane, SIR ULICK and CORNELIUS, characters in Miss Edgeworth's 'Ormond' (q.v.).

Osiris, a great deity of the ancient Egyptians. As king of Egypt he civilized and educated his people. He then resolved to spread civilization to other regions of the earth, and left the kingdom in the charge of his wife Isis. On his return he found his subjects disturbed by the sedition of his brother Set, and was by him murdered and his body cut into pieces. Isis, with her son Horus, defeated Set and his partisans, and revenged her husband's death. She recovered the mangled remains of his body, and had statues of him distributed over Egypt and divine honours paid to him. Osiris is sometimes identified with the sun and Isis with the moon; and the ox was taken as the symbol of the former, the cow of the latter. Osiris was regarded as the god of the dead, and his son Horus as the god of renewed life. By the Greeks Osiris was identified with Dionysus, and Set, the god of evil, with Typhon (q.v.).

OSLER, SIR WILLIAM (1849-1919), born in Canada, a great physician, Regius professor of medicine in the University of Oxford. His valuable medical library is now at McGill University, Montreal. His great 'Principles and Practice of Medicine' appeared in 1891; his essays and addresses have been collected in, e.g., 'Aequanimitas' (1904), 'An Alabama Student' (1908), and 'A Way of Life' (1913). He edited Sir T. Browne's 'Religio Medici' and William MacMichael's 'The Gold-headed Cane' (biographies of five 18th-cent. physicians). 'Too old at forty' has been attributed to him.

Osney, a wealthy priory (afterwards abbey) founded in 1129 by Robert d'Oilgi II (a Norman baron) on a branch of the Thames near Oxford, where his wife had noticed the noise of 'chattering pyes', explained by her confessor as complaints of souls in purgatory. It no longer exists.

Osorius, JEROME (d. 1580), a Portuguese, an associate of Loyola (q.v.), noted for his knowledge of Hebrew and theology, professor of theology at Coimbra, and a bishop. In 1562 he wrote an attack on the English Reformation, which was answered by Haddon, Master of Requests to Elizabeth, and by John Foxe (1577, English translation 1581). His library was seized on the occasion of Essex's expedition of 1596 and subsequently given to the newly founded Bodleian.

Ossa, a lofty mountain in Thessaly, which the Giants (q.v.) heaped on Pelion in their endeavour to reach heaven.

Ossian, the name commonly given to Oisín, a legendary Gaelic warrior and bard, the son of Finn (Fingal), supposed to have lived in the 3rd cent. For the poems attributed to him, see under Macpherson. They deal with tales of Finn (q.v.) and his fellow warriors, which (according to Alfred Nutt) are Gaelic variants of legends common to the Celtic and other 'Aryan' races. Both Ireland and Scotland, as inhabited by Gaels, have claim to them. So far as historical facts are embodied in them against a mythical background, those facts are Irish. See also Finn and Niamh.

Oswald, St. (d. 992), was nephew of Archbishop Odo (d. 959). He became a Benedictine monk in the abbey of Fleury, and accompanied Osketil, archbishop of York, to Rome. On St. Dunstan's initiative he was appointed bishop of Worcester in 961, and co-operated with him and with St. Ethelwold (q.v.) in the revival of religion and learning in the land, bringing scholars from the Continent, among them the distinguished Abbo of Fleury. He founded monasteries at Westbury, Worcester, Winchcombe, and in the Isle of Ramsey. In 972 he was promoted archbishop of York, but retained the government of the see of Worcester, for which he had a special affection. St. Oswald was buried in the church of St. Mary at Worcester. He is commemorated on 28 February.

Othello, The Moor of Venice, a tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), acted in 1604, printed in quarto in 1622. The story is drawn from Cinthio.

Desdemona, daughter of the Venetian senator, Brabantio, has secretly married the Moor, Othello, a gallant general in the service of the Venetian state, who has won her love by the tale of his adventures and encounters. Haled before the duke, Othello is accused by Brabantio of carrying off his daughter; simultaneously comes news of an impending attack on Cyprus by the Turks, against whom Othello is needed to lead the Venetian forces. Othello explains by what simple means he has won Desdemona, who confirms his story.

OTWAY

Brabantio reluctantly hands his daughter over to the Moor, who at once sets out with Desdemona for Cyprus.

Othello had lately promoted to the lieutenant Cassio, a young Florentine whom he trusted. By this promotion he had deeply offended Iago, an older soldier who thought he had a better claim, and who now plots his revenge. By a device he first discredits Cassio, as a soldier, with Othello, so that Cassio is deprived of his lieutenantancy. He instigates the latter to ask Desdemona to plead in his favour with Othello, which Desdemona warmly does. At the same time he craftily instils in Othello's mind suspicion of his wife's fidelity, and jealousy of Cassio. Finally by a trick he arranges that a handkerchief given by Othello to Desdemona shall be found on Cassio. He stirs Othello to such a frenzy of jealousy that the Moor smothers Desdemona in her bed. Shortly afterwards Cassio, whom Iago had set Roderigo, one of his associates and dupes, to assassinate, is brought in wounded. But Roderigo has failed in his purpose, and has been killed by Iago to prevent discovery of the plot; on him are found letters revealing the guilt of Iago and the innocence of Cassio. Othello, thunderstruck by the discovery that he has murdered Desdemona without cause, kills himself from remorse.

O'Trigger, SIR LUCIUS, a character in Sheridan's 'The Rivals' (q.v.).

Ottava rima, an Italian stanza of eight eleven-syllabled lines, rhyming a b a b a b c c, employed by Tasso, Ariosto, &c. The English adaptation, as used by Byron, has English heroic lines of ten syllables.

Otter, CAPTAIN, a character in Jonson's 'Epicoene' (q.v.).

Otterbourne, The Battle of, one of the earliest of English ballads, included in Percy's 'Reliques'.

The Scots in 1388, returning from a raid into England, attacked the castle of Otterburn in Northumberland, and after an unsuccessful assault were surprised in their camp by Henry Hotspur, Lord Percy. In the ensuing engagement James, earl of Douglas, commanding the Scottish force, was killed, and Percy taken prisoner. These events are the subject of the ballad.

Ottilla, PRINCESS OF EPPENWELZEN-SARKELD, a character in Meredith's 'Harry Richmond' (q.v.).

Ottoman Empire, the Turkish Empire, so called from its founder Othman or Osman (whence Osmanli), who flourished c. 1300.

Otuel, SIR, a pagan knight, miraculously converted, who became one of Charlemagne's paladins.

OTWAY, THOMAS (1652-85), born at Miland near Trotton in Sussex, was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford. He appeared unsuccessfully on the stage, being given a part by the kindness of Mrs.

OTWAY

Aphra Behn (q.v.). He for many years cherished an unrequited passion for Mrs. Barry (q.v.), the actress. In 1678 he enlisted in the army in Holland and received a commission, but soon returned. He died in destitution at the early age of 33.

Of his three great tragedies, 'Don Carlos' (q.v.), in rhymed verse, was produced in 1676; 'The Orphan' (q.v.), in blank verse, in 1680; 'Venice Preserved' (q.v.), also in blank verse, in 1682. Of his other plays, 'Alcibiades', a tragedy, was produced in 1675 (and provided Mrs. Barry with her first successful part); 'Titus and Berenice', adapted from a tragedy by Racine, and 'The Cheats of Scapin' from a comedy by Molière, in 1677; 'Friendship in Fashion', a comedy, in 1678; 'The Soldier's Fortune', a comedy, in 1681; 'The Atheist', a comedy, in 1684. He also wrote prologues, epilogues, and a few poems. The complete works of Otway, edited by J. C. Ghosh, were published in 1932.

OIDA (MARIE LOUISE DE LA RAMÉE) (1839-1908), was born at Bury St. Edmunds, the daughter of Louis Ramé, a teacher of French. Her pseudonym, 'Ouida', was a childish mispronunciation of her name Louise. She first became known by the publication in 'Bentley's Miscellany' in 1859-60 of a number of short tales. Her forty-five novels deal chiefly with fashionable life and show a spirit of rebellion against the moral ideals reflected in much of the fiction of the time. She incurred a good deal of ridicule on account of the languid guardsmen, miracles of strength, courage, and beauty, whom she frequently presented as her heroes, and of her amusing mistakes in matters of men's sports and occupations. But these faults were redeemed by her gift for stirring narrative and other merits. Her novels include 'Under Two Flags' (1867), 'Tricotrin' (1869), 'Puck' (1870), 'Folle Farine' (1871), 'Two Little Wooden Shoes' (1874), 'Moths' (1880), 'In Maremma' (1882), and 'Bimbi, Stories for Children' (1882). She wrote some good animal stories, of which 'A Dog of Flanders' (1872) is the best. Her novel 'A Village Commune' (1881) was highly praised by Ruskin as a faithful picture of peasant life.

Oulton, THE OLD MAN OF: Borrow (q.v.).

Our Mutual Friend, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in monthly parts between May 1864 and Nov. 1865.

John Harmon returns from the exile to which he has been sent by a harsh father, a rich dust-contractor; he expects to receive the inheritance to which his father has attached the condition that he shall marry a certain girl, Bella Wilfer. Bella is unknown to him, and he confides to a mate of the ship which is bringing him home his intention of concealing his identity until he has formed some judgement of his allotted wife. The mate lures him to a riverside haunt, attempts to murder him, throws his body into the river, and is in turn murdered and his body likewise thrown into the river. Harmon recovers and escapes; the mate's body is found after some days, and, owing to Harmon's papers found upon it, it is taken to be that of Harmon. Harmon's intention of remaining unknown is thus facilitated, and he assumes the name of John Rokesmith, and becomes the secretary of the kindly, disinterested Mr. Boffin, old Harmon's foreman, who, in default of young Harmon, inherits the property. He is thrown into close contact with Bella, a flighty minx, who is adopted by Boffin, and who is turned by her first taste of wealth into an arrogant mercenary jade. Rokesmith nevertheless falls in love with her and is contemptuously rejected. Harmon's identity is now discovered by the amiable Mrs. Boffin, and the Boffins, devoted to their old master's son and convinced of Bella's soundness of heart, contrive a plot to prove her. Boffin pretends to be transformed by his wealth into a hard and griping miser, and heaps indignities on Harmon, who is finally dismissed with contumely. Bella, awakened to the evils of wealth and to the merits of Rokesmith, flies from the Boffins and marries her suitor. His identity presently comes to light, and with his assistance the scheme of the one-legged old villain, Silas Wegg, to blackmail Boffin is exposed.

Concurrently with this main theme we have the story of the love of Eugene Wrayburn, a careless insolent young barrister, for Lizzy Hexam, daughter of a disreputable boatman. His rival for her affections, Bradley Headstone, a schoolmaster, attempts to murder Wrayburn. The latter is saved by Lizzy and marries her. Among the notable characters in the book are the Veneerings, types of social parvenus; the good Jew Riah; the blackmailing waterside villain, Rogue Riderhood; Jenny Wren, the dolls' dress-maker; Bella Wilfer's grotesque father, mother, and sister; and the spirited Betty Higden, an old woman with a haunting dread of the workhouse.

Oval, THE KENNINGTON, the cricket ground of the Surrey County Club, in south London. It was laid out in 1845, having previously been a market-garden, and was at first in the occupation of the Montpelier Club, which was finally merged in the county club.

OVERBURY, SIR THOMAS (1581-1613), of a Warwickshire family, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, and went to the Middle Temple. He opposed the marriage of his patron, Robert Carr (afterwards earl of Somerset), with the divorced countess of Essex, and on the pretext of his refusal of diplomatic employment was sent to the Tower, where he was slowly poisoned by agents of Lady Essex. Four of these were hanged; Somerset and his wife were convicted and pardoned. The prosecution was conducted by F. Bacon (q.v.). The whole business is a historical mystery. Overbury's poem 'A Wife' was published in 1614. But he is chiefly remembered for his 'Characters', on the model of those of Theophrastus (q.v.)—not all of which, however, were written by Overbury himself—including such types as 'The fayre and happy Milkmaid', 'The Mere Fellow of a College', &c. The first edition of these appeared in 1614. His 'Miscellaneous Works in Verse and Prose' were edited by E. F. Rimbault in 1856.

Overdo, JUSTICE, a character in Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fayre' (q.v.).

Overreach, SIR GILES, a character in Massinger's 'A New Way to pay Old Debts' (q.v.).

OVID (PUBLIUS OVIDIUS NASO) (43 B.C.—A.D. 18), the Roman poet, was banished from Rome by Augustus in A.D. 8 to Tomi (Kustendje) near the mouths of the Danube for reasons connected with his 'Ars Amatoria' and some scandal affecting the imperial family, and there died. His 'Tristia' and 'Epistulae ex Ponto' contain a pathetic account of his sufferings in exile. His works include (in rough chronological order) the Amores, Heroides, Ars Amatoria, Remedia Amoris, Metamorphoses, Fasti, Tristia, and Epistulae ex Ponto. Ovid wrote in elegiacs (q.v.), and was the favourite Latin poet of the Middle Ages.

Owain, SIR, see Patrick's Purgatory.

OWEN, JOHN (1563?–1622), educated at Winchester College and New College, Oxford, was the author of several volumes of Latin epigrams, mostly elegiac couplets, marked by great neatness and wit, which have been compared to those of Martial. They deal with a wide range of subjects, institutions such as Oxford University, literary works, imaginary personages, and familiar types. They were translated into several languages and frequently reprinted down to the 19th cent.

OWEN, SIR RICHARD (1804–92), educated at Lancaster School with Whewell (q.v.), became conservator of the Hunterian museum and first Hunterian professor of comparative anatomy and physiology. He did much to advance the science of animal structure. His great feat was to reconstruct the extinct New Zealand moa, a giant wingless bird, from its femur (1839). His chief works include 'Lectures on the Comparative Anatomy and Physiology of the Invertebrate Animals' (1843–6), 'A History of British Fossil Mammals and Birds' (1846), 'A History of British Fossil Reptiles' (1849–84), 'Geology and Inhabitants of the Ancient World' (1854), &c. He opposed Darwin's views on evolution and was a very fierce controversialist.

OWEN, ROBERT (1771–1858), socialist and philanthropist, was a successful owner of cotton-spinning mills in Manchester. He became famous for his 'institution for the formation of character' (New Lanark), including infant schools and schools of two other grades (opened in 1816), and for other proposals of social reform. His example was largely instrumental in bringing about the Factory Act of 1819. Owen was the pioneer of co-operation between labour and consumption. His head was perhaps a little turned by the adulation he received, and at last he became mainly a dreamer of noble (but unpractical) dreams. He published 'A New View of Society' in 1813, 'Revolution in Mind and Practice' in 1849, and his autobiography in 1857–8.

Owl and the Nightingale, The, a poem of some 2,000 lines, in octosyllabic couplets, probably of the middle of the 13th cent. It is a debate between the grave Owl and the gay Nightingale as to the benefits they confer on man, symbolizing perhaps respectively the religious poet and the poet of love. It is marked by a sense of the charm of nature in its milder aspects, the coming of spring and the golden autumn. The poem is attributed to one Nicholas de Guildford (fl. 1250), who is stated in the poem to have lived at Portisham in Dorset; but John of Guildford (probably fl. 1225), who is known to have written verse about this time, is also possibly the author.

Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, The, a periodical of the year 1856, of which twelve monthly numbers appeared, financed mainly by William Morris (q.v.). Among its contributors were Morris and Burne-Jones (of Oxford), Lushington (of Cambridge), and by invitation D. G. Rossetti, whose 'Burden of Nineveh' appeared in its pages.

Oxford, JOHN, EARL OF, figuring as the merchant Philipson, a character in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.).

Oxford English Dictionary. The scheme of 'a completely new English Dictionary' was conceived in 1858, and Herbert Coleridge (1830–61), and after him Dr. F. J. Furnivall (1825–1910), were the first editors. Their work, which covered twenty years, consisted only in the collection of materials, and it was not until Dr. J. A. H. Murray (q.v.) took the matter up in 1878 that the preparation of the Dictionary began to take active form. The first part was published in 1884, at which time Dr. Murray estimated that the whole might be completed in another twelve years. It was not in fact finished until 1928, seventy years from the inception of the undertaking. Dr. (afterwards Sir James) Murray, who laid down the lines of the work, did not live to see it completed, but more than half was produced under his personal editorship. He was succeeded by Dr. H. Bradley (q.v.). Dr. (now Sir) William Alexander Craigie (b. 1867), and Dr. Charles Talbot Onions (b. 1873). The essential feature of the Dictionary is its historical method, by which the meaning and form of the words are traced from their earliest appearance on the basis of an immense number of quotations, collected by more than 800 voluntary workers. The Dictionary contains a record of 414,825 words, whose history is illustrated by 1,827,306 quotations. An important supplement, which rounds off the work by bringing all parts of the alphabet up to date, appeared in 1933. A reissue of the main work has also been published. The original title of the work was 'A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles' (abbreviated as NED.). The title 'The Oxford English Dictionary' first appeared in the reprint of 1933.

Oxford Gazette, The, see Gazette.

Oxford Movement or TRACTARIAN MOVEMENT, THE, a movement initiated in 1833 in revival of a higher conception than was generally prevalent of the position and functions of the Church, as 'more than a merely human institution' and as possessing 'privileges, sacraments, a ministry, ordained by Christ'. The movement began with a sermon preached in July 1833 at Oxford by Keble (q.v.) before the judges of assize, on national apostasy, directed against the Latitudinarian and Erastian tendencies of the day. This was followed by concerted action among the men who shared his views, and in September of the same year appeared the first of the 'Tracts for the Times' (q.v.). The principal leaders of the movement were, besides Keble, Newman, R. H. Froude, and Pusey (qq.v.). It was Pusey, already Regius professor of Hebrew, and a man of real learning (he joined the party in 1835), who first gave the movement cohesion, fame, and a name; its adherents soon came to be called 'Puseyites'. Other leaders were J. W. Bowden, W. Palmer, A. P. Perceval, and Isaac Williams. In course of time, with new recruits, including W. G. Ward (q.v.), new forces came into play, which had a disruptive effect on the movement, while public feeling was roused against it by the issue of the first volumes of the 'Literary Remains of Richard Hurrell Froude' (1838), with its strictures on the Reformation. Newman's famous Tract XC on the compatibility of the Thirty-nine Articles with Roman Catholic theology intensified the general hostility. Newman's own confidence in his position was presently shaken by an article by Dr. Wiseman. In 1843 he resigned his living and in 1845 he joined the Church of Rome. In the latter year W. G. Ward's book, 'The Ideal of the Christian Church', was condemned by Oxford Convocation. From this time the movement in its original form was broken up.

A remarkable history of the Oxford Movement was written by Dean Church (1891), while much light is also thrown on it by the 'Autobiography' of I. Williams (q.v.) and Newman's 'Apologia'.

Oxford Street took its name early in the 18th cent. from Edward Harley, and earl of Oxford, the collector of the Harleian MSS.,

who obtained by marriage the Marylebone estate of John Holles, duke of Newcastle. It was the old Tyburn (q.v.) Road. This, in turn, probably followed approximately the line of the ancient Roman road from east to west, the Here Street, which crossed Watling Street where the Marble Arch now stands.

Oxford University was organized as a studium generale soon after 1167, perhaps as a result of a migration of students from Paris. A Legatine Ordinance of 1214 mentions its Chancellor. Roger Bacon and Duns Scotus testify to its importance in the 13th cent. University College, the first of its colleges, was founded in 1249, Balliol about 1263, Merton in 1264. Oxford was the home of Wycliffism in the 14th cent. Erasmus lectured there, and Grocyne, Colet, and More (qq.v.) were among its famous scholars in the 15th-16th cents. The University was incorporated by Act of 1571. It sided with the king in the Civil War. Under James II it opposed the king's attempt to open the University to Roman Catholics, a quarrel which culminated in the king's endeavour to impose his nominee as president of Magdalen (1687). See also Oxford Movement, All Souls, Balliol, Christ Church, Magdalen, Merton.

Oxford University Press, THE, or the CLARENDON PRESS. Printing was carried on at Oxford with the permission of the University from Caxton's time (the famous St. Jerome is ascribed to the year 1478). But the beginning of the University Press, that is of printing financed and controlled by the University, dates from 1585, when Joseph Barnes started work with a loan from the University, a committee De Libris Imprimendis having been set up. The venture was recognized by an ordinance of the Star Chamber of 1586, and was patronized by Laud.

It was Fell (q.v.), dean of Christ Church and bishop of Oxford, who first gave the University Press its great development, obtaining for it from abroad the type and matrixes that bear his name, encouraging the printing of learned works, and with three other University men undertaking the financial responsibility of the printing which had hitherto been leased to craft printers. The next impulse came with the printing (in 1702) of Clarendon's great history, from the profits of which the new Clarendon printing-house in Broad Street was erected. Early in the 19th cent. the Press moved to its present buildings, 'near a place called Jericho' in what is now Walton Street, Oxford. During that century it came under the influence of Bartholomew Price (1818-98), Master of Pembroke, who was secretary from 1868 to 1884, and a delegate of the Press for even longer, and who greatly improved its organization. A further rapid development was made under the secretaryship of Charles Cannan (d. 1919).

OXYMÖRON

Oxymöron, from two Greek words meaning 'sharp', 'dull', a rhetorical figure by which two incongruous or contradictory terms are united in an expression so as to give it point; e.g. 'Faith unfaithful kept him falsely true.'

Oyer and terminer, COMMISSION OF, a commission 'to hear and determine', granted to judges on circuit, directing them to hold courts for the trial of offences.

Ozymandias of Egypt, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.). The Ramesseum (of Rameses II) at Thebes is called by Diodorus Siculus (i. 47 et seq.) the tomb of Ozymandias.

P

Pacha of Many Tales, The, a novel (1835) by Marryat (q.v.).

Pacific Ocean, THE, said to have been so named by the Portuguese explorer Magellan, who was the first to navigate it (1520), on account of the calm weather he experienced there.

Pacolet, in the tale of 'Valentine and Orson' (q.v.), a dwarf in the service of the Lady Clerimond. He possessed a winged horse, who bore off Valentine, Orson, and Clerimond from the castle of the giant Ferragus.

'Pacolet' is the name of Mr. Bickerstaff's 'familiar' in Steele's 'The Tatler' (No. 15), and of Norna's dwarf in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Pactölus, a river in Lydia, rising in Mt. Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus after watering the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas (q.v.) washed himself when his touch converted everything to gold. Its sands were in consequence turned to gold.

PACUVIUS, Roman tragic poet, born about 220 B.C. Only fragments of his work survive.

Padishah, a Persian title, meaning 'lord King', equivalent to 'Great King' or 'Emperor', applied in Persia to the Shah, in Europe (in former days) usually to the Sultan of Turkey, in India to the Great Mogul.

Padlock, The, a comic opera by Bickerstaffe (q.v.), produced in 1768 and very successful.

The elderly Don Diego is the temporary guardian of the young Leonora and is about to make her his wife. But, in spite of a large padlock on the door, Leander, a young lover, presents himself during Diego's absence, cajoles the duenna and Mungo, the negro servant, and gains admission to the lady. Diego returns unexpectedly, but sensibly accepts the situation and handsomely endows Leonora. The story is taken from one of Cervantes's novels.

Prior (q.v.) wrote a short poem called 'An English Padlock', containing advice to the jealous husband of a young wife. It contains the well-known lines:

Be to her virtues very kind;
Be to her faults a little blind;
Let all her ways be unconfin'd,
And clasp a padlock on her mind.

Paeon, in Greek antiquity an invocation or thanksgiving addressed to Apollo (later to other gods also), so called from its refrain 'Iē Paion'; especially a song of triumph after victory. The word is now used for a song of praise or thanksgiving, or a shout or song of triumph.

Paeon, a metrical foot of four syllables, one long and three short, named, according to the position of the long syllable, a first, second, third, or fourth paeon.

Paeonia, the ancient name of a country lying north of Macedonia and east of Illyria, on the upper course of what is now the Vardar.

Paetus, CAECINA, was sentenced to death in A.D. 42 on a charge of conspiring against the emperor Claudius. When he hesitated to take his own life in accordance with the sentence, his wife Arria stabbed herself and handed him the dagger, saying, 'Paetus, it does not hurt' (Plin. Ep. iii. 16).

PAGAN, ISOBEL (Tibby) (d. 1821), hostess of an Ayrshire inn, the reputed author of the songs 'Ca' the Yowes to the Knowes' and 'The Crook and Plaid', in which there is an anticipation of the genius of Burns.

Paganini, NICOLO (1782-1840), a famous Italian violinist, whose playing produced an extraordinary effect on his hearers. 'With the first notes his audience was spell-bound; there was certainly in him . . . a daemonic element which irresistibly took hold of those that came within his sphere' (Grove).

Pagett, M.P., the subject of one of Kipling's poems, an arrogant M.P. who goes to India on a short visit to 'study the East', but is cured of his arrogance by a taste of Indian hot weather, and flees from the country before his time is up.

Pahlavi or PEHLEVI, the name given by the followers of Zoroaster to the character in which are written the ancient translations of their sacred books; also the name for Middle Persian speech (the language transitional from Old Persian to Modern Persian) written in Aramaic script. The word is used in this sense in Fitzgerald's translation of Omar Khayyám.

PAIN

PAIN, BARRY ERIC ODELL (1864-1928), British novelist, author of 'The One Before' (1902), 'Eliza' (1900), 'Eliza Getting On' (1911), 'Exit Eliza' (1912), 'Eliza's Son' (1913), &c.

PAINE, THOMAS (1737-1809), son of a staymaker and small farmer of Thetford. After following various humble avocations he became an excise officer, but was dismissed from the service in 1772 in connexion with an agitation for an increase of excisemen's pay. He sailed for America, where he published in 1776 his pamphlet, 'Common Sense', a history of the transactions that had led to the war with England, and in 1776-83 a series of pamphlets, 'The Crisis', encouraging resistance to England. He held various posts under the American government until 1787, when he returned to England. In 1791 he published the first part of his 'Rights of Man' (q.v.) in reply to Burke's 'Reflections on the Revolution in France' (q.v.), and the second part in 1792. He fled to France to avoid prosecution, and was there warmly received and elected a member of the Convention. He opposed the execution of Louis XVI and narrowly escaped the guillotine. He published in 1793 'The Age of Reason', a defence of Deism against Christianity and Atheism, written in a tone of arrogance and coarse violence. This work increased the odium in which he was held in England. He returned to America in 1802, where his 'Age of Reason' and his opposition to Washington and the federalists made him unpopular. He died at New York. His connexion with the American struggle and afterwards with the French Revolution gave him a unique position, and his writings, which show him a shrewd political thinker, became a sort of text-book for the extreme radical party in England.

PAINTER, WILLIAM, see Palace of Pleasure.

Pair of Blue Eyes, A, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1873.

The scene of the story is the northern coast of Cornwall. Stephen Smith, a young architect, having come to Endelstow to restore a church tower, falls in love with Elfride Swancourt, the blue-eyed daughter of the vicar. It comes to light that he is the son of humble parents, and the vicar is highly incensed at the idea of his daughter's marrying him. Stephen and Elfride run away together to be married, but the project is frustrated by the girl's vacillation, and Stephen, hoping for better luck when he has made a fortune, accepts a post in India. While he is there, his place as Elfride's wooer is taken by Henry Knight, a man of letters, formerly Stephen's friend and patron. Elfride saves his life on a cliff, and they are engaged. But Knight is rather a stern character. He has never kissed a woman in his life, and expects the same inexperience in his bride. Elfride's escapade with Stephen has been witnessed by a woman who, having a motive for revenge on Elfride, reveals what she knows to Knight, putting the worst aspect on the matter. Knight harshly breaks off the engagement and leaves Elfride heart-stricken. After a time he and Stephen meet; Stephen learns that Elfride is still unmarried, Knight learns the true facts of her escapade. They both rush down to Cornwall, only to find that the train which carries them also carries her corpse.

There is, incidentally, some admirable Shakespearian dialogue among the workmen preparing the vault of the Luxellian family for a burial.

Palace of Pleasure, a collection of translations into English of 'pleasant histories and excellent novels' 'out of divers good and commendable authors', made by William Painter (1540?-94), master of Sevenoaks school in Kent, published in 1566 and 1567. It served as a storehouse from which the Elizabethan dramatists drew many of their plots. Many of the translations are from Boccaccio and Bandello, but the compiler draws also on Herodotus and Livy.

Paladins, THE, in the cycle of Charlemagne legends, were the twelve peers who accompanied the king. The origin of the conception is seen in the 'Chanson de Roland' (see Roland), where the twelve peers are merely an association of particularly brave warriors, under the leadership of Roland and Oliver, who all perish at Roncevaux. From the Spanish war the idea was transported by later writers to other parts of the cycle, and Charlemagne is found always surrounded by twelve peers. In England the word 'douceper' (q.v.) in the singular was even adopted to signify a paladin. The names of the twelve are differently stated by different authors, most of the original names given by the 'Chanson de Roland' being forgotten by them; but Roland and Oliver figure in all the enumerations. Among the best known are Fierabras or Ferumbras and Ogier the Dane. In the early 13th (and probably in the late 12th) cents. there were in fact 'Twelve Peers of France', forming a 'Court of Peers', six ecclesiastical and six lay. This court in 1202 declared King John deprived of his fiefs in France.

Paladis Tamia, see Meres.

Palaemon, see Ino.

Palaeologi, a Byzantine dynasty which furnished rulers of the Eastern empire from 1261 (Michael Palaeologus) to the fall of Constantinople (1453).

Palafox, in Wordsworth's sonnet ('Sonnet to Liberty', 1810), was José de Palafox y Melzi, a Spanish general, who defended Saragossa against the French in 1808.

Pålāmēdēs, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius, king of Euboea, sent by the Greek princes to oblige Ulysses to join the expedition to Troy.

PALAMÉDES

Ulysses, reluctant to leave his wife Penelope, feigned madness, but Palamedes exposed the deceit. Ulysses in consequence conceived a bitter enmity against him, and forged a letter supposed to be written by King Priam to Palamedes treating of the delivery of the Greek army into Trojan hands. He also had a large sum of money concealed in a hole in Palamedes' tent, and by these means caused him to be convicted of treason and stoned to death. Palamedes is credited with much learning and ingenuity, the addition of certain letters to the alphabet of Cadmus, and the invention of various games and devices.

Palamides, SIR, in the Arthurian legend, a Saracen. He falls in love with La Beale Isoud in Ireland, and comes into conflict with Tristram (q.v.), who defeats him and makes him be baptized. His constant occupation is the pursuit of the 'Questing Beast'.

Palamon and Arcite, the subject of the 'Knight's Tale' in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.). This tale was paraphrased in heroic couplets by Dryden (q.v.) under the title 'Palamon and Arcite'. It is also the subject of Fletcher's 'The Two Noble Kinsmen' (q.v.), and of a play, no longer extant, but praised by Meres, by Richard Edwards (q.v.).

Palatine, see County Palatine, Elector Palatine.

Pale, THE ENGLISH, also simply THE PALE, in Ireland, that part of Ireland (varying in extent at different times) over which English jurisdiction was established. The term appears to have been first used (in respect of Ireland) in a statute of Edward IV, which orders it to be fortified with a double ditch and palisade. The Statute of Kilkenny (1367) had recognized some such condition, viz. that the inhabitants of that part of Ireland where the king's writ ran were not to have intercourse with the wild Irishry outside it. The term was also applied to the territory of Calais.

Palemon, see Lavinia and Palemon.

Palès, in Roman religion, a rustic spirit, supposed to protect shepherds and their flocks.

Palestrina, GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA (1524?-1594), born at Palestrina near Rome, the great composer of sacred music for the Roman Catholic Church. He composed a large number of masses, litanies, hymns, and chants, and was hailed as the 'saviour of music' on account of his 'Missa papae Marcelli' (of which the story is told in 'N. & Q.', III. vi. 84). His 'Improperia' are still sung every Good Friday in the Sistine Chapel.

PALEY, WILLIAM (1743-1805), educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was senior wrangler in 1763. Paley was one of the principal exponents of theological utilitarianism, of which his 'Moral and Political Philosophy' (q.v.), published in 1785, is the text-book. In his 'Horae Paulinae' (1790), 'Evidences of Christianity' (1794), and 'Natural Theology' (1802) he finds proof of the existence of God in the design apparent in natural phenomena, and particularly in the human body, and controverts the theory of the adaptation of the organism to its circumstances by use, taking up a position that has been weakened by subsequent evolutionary discoveries. For his utilitarian theory of morality see Moral and Political Philosophy.

PALGRAVE, SIR FRANCIS (1788-1861), the son of Meyer Cohen, a Jew, was the author of 'The Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth' (1832) and of 'The History of Normandy and England' (1851-64); also of an 'Essay on the Original Authority of the King's Council' (1834) and of 'Truth and Fictions of the Middle Ages: the Merchant and the Friar' (1837). He was deputy-keeper of the records, 1838-61, and rendered great service in promoting the critical study in England of medieval history.

PALGRAVE, FRANCIS TURNER (1824-97), son of Sir F. Palgrave (q.v.), was educated at Charterhouse and Balliol College, Oxford, and was a close friend of Tennyson. He was an official in the education department from 1855 to 1884. From 1885 to 1895 he was professor of poetry at Oxford. He is chiefly remembered for his anthology, 'The Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics' (1861; second series, 1896), but was also himself a poet, and published several volumes of lyrics, &c. 'The Visions of England' (1881) is perhaps his best work.

PALGRAVE, WILLIAM GIFFORD (1826-88), son of Sir F. Palgrave (q.v.), educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Oxford, became a Jesuit missionary in Syria and Arabia. He published in 1865 his 'Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia'. Some doubt has been cast on the accuracy of his reminiscences. He severed his connexion with the Jesuits in 1865 and entered the diplomatic service. His pleasant romance 'Hermann Agha', somewhat after the style of Hope's 'Anastasius' (q.v.), appeared in 1872.

Palimpsest, from πάλιν 'again', and ψηφιστός 'rubbed smooth', a manuscript in which a later writing is written over an effaced earlier writing. Of frequent occurrence in the early Middle Ages because of the cost of parchment.

Palindrome, from παλινδρομος, 'running back again', a word, verse, or sentence that reads the same forwards or backwards, e.g.:

Lewd did I live & evil I did dwell

(Philips, 1706),

and the Latin line descriptive of moths:

In girum imus noctes et consumimur igni.

Pallinode, from παλινωδία, 'singing over again', a recantation. 'Palinode' is the name of the Catholic shepherd in the fifth eclogue of Spenser's 'Shepherds Calender' (q.v.).

Palinurus, the pilot of Aeneas, who 'nodded at the helm', fell into the sea, and after reaching the shore was murdered by the inhabitants of the place.

Palisse, LA, see La Palisse.

Palissy, BERNARD (1510-89), a celebrated French potter, who discovered the secret of Italian enamels. He was a Huguenot and died in the Bastille for his faith.

Pall Mall, London, from the obsolete French pallemaille, literally 'ball-mallet', the name of a game introduced into England in the 17th cent., in which a wooden ball was driven through an iron ring suspended at some height above the ground in a long alley. [OED.] The present street was developed from one of these alleys. Nell Gwyn lived there in the latter part of the 17th cent., and a century later Gainsborough and Cosway.

Pall Mall Gazette, The, was founded in 1865 by Frederick Greenwood (1830-1909), to combine the features of a newspaper with the literary features of the 'Spectator' and 'Saturday Review'. Its name was taken from Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.), where Captain Shandon in the Marshalsea prepares the prospectus of 'The Pall Mall Gazette', 'written by gentlemen for gentlemen'. Its early contributors included Sir Henry Maine, Anthony Trollope, and Sir James Fitzjames Stephen. In 1880, the 'Pall Mall Gazette' having been bought by a Radical, Greenwood was superseded by John Morley as editor, with W. T. Stead as his lieutenant; and Greenwood produced instead the newly founded Conservative 'St. James's Gazette'.

Palladio, ANDREA (1518-80), an Italian architect, who imitated the ancient Roman style without regard to classical principles, and gave his name to the PALLADIAN school or style of architecture. He designed many edifices at Vicenza, Venice, Padua, &c.

Palladium, a statue of Pallas Athene, which was supposed to confer security on the town that contained it and was accordingly kept hidden. The most celebrated statue of this kind was that supposed to have fallen from heaven when Ilus was building Troy, where it was retained until carried off by Odysseus and Diomedes, or, according to another version, by Aeneas.

Pallas, a name of Athens (q.v.).

Palliser, PLANTAGENET, and his wife LADY GLENCORA, characters appearing in several of A. Trollope's (q.v.) novels ('The Small House at Allington', 'Can You Forgive Her?', 'Phineas Finn', 'The Prime Minister', and 'The Duke's Children'). He is the nephew and heir of the duke of Omnium and becomes prime minister, 'a very noble gentleman—such a one as justifies to the nation the seeming anomaly of an hereditary peerage and of primogeniture', wrote the author himself. He looked upon his presentation of Palliser and his wife in these novels as the best work of his life.

Palm Sunday, the Sunday next before Easter Day, observed, in commemoration of Jesus Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, by processions in which branches of palm, or, in northern regions, of other trees, are carried.

Palmerin of England (Palmeirim de Inglaterra), a chivalric romance of uncertain authorship, attributed to the Portuguese Francisco de Moraes (c. 1500-72) or the Spaniard, Luis Hurtado (1530-79?).

The 'Palmerines' consist of eight books dealing with exploits and loves of Palmerin de Oliva, emperor of Constantinople, and his various descendants, of which Palmerin of England is the subject of the sixth. The daughter of Palmerin de Oliva, Florida by name, married Don Duardos, son of Fadrique, king of Great Britain, and became the mother of Palmerin of England and his brother, Floriano of the Desert. Duardos having been imprisoned in the castle of the giant Dramusiando by Eutropa, a magician, a savage carries off the young children (Palmerin and Floriano) intending them as food for his hunting lions, but his wife insists on bringing them up. Palmerin is taken to Constantinople and appointed to wait on his cousin Polinarda, with whom he falls in love; while Floriano is taken to London and appointed to wait on Florida. Palmerin and Floriano undertake the quest of Don Duardos, and the former is successful. Thereafter the identity of the brothers is revealed and Palmerin marries Polinarda. Then the Soldan advances against the Christians and demands the surrender of Polinarda as a condition of peace. Finally the Turks attack Constantinople; all the Turks and most of the Christians perish, but Palmerin survives. Southey (q.v.) published a revised translation of this romance (1807).

'Palmerin of England' and 'Amadis of Gaul' were two romances of chivalry specially excepted from the holocaust of such works carried out by the curate and the barber in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.).

Palmetto State: South Carolina, see United States.

Palmÿra or TADMOR, the capital of a country situated east of Syria, once the seat of the famous Zenobia (q.v.), now in ruins.

PALTOCK, ROBERT (1697-1767), author of 'Peter Wilkins' (q.v.). He was an attorney of Clement's Inn.

Pam, (1) a familiar abbreviation of Palmerston (Henry John Temple, third Viscount Palmerston, 1784-1865, the statesman); (2) the knave of clubs, ranking as the highest trump in 'five-card loo', apparently an abbreviation of French pamphile, the name of a card game, and of the knave of clubs in it.

Pamêla, a character in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.).

PAMELA

Pam'ela, or Virtue Rewarded, a novel by Richardson (q.v.), published in 1740.

This was the author's first work of fiction, and the first example of what may be called the modern English novel of character. The story is told in a series of letters from the heroine, Pamela Andrews, a young maid-servant, whose mistress has just died when the story opens. The lady's son, Mr. B., becomes enamoured of Pamela, and, taking a dishonourable advantage of her position, pursues her with his advances. She indignantly repels them, leaves the house, is pursued by B., and shows considerable astuteness in defending herself. Finally B., being much in love with her, comes to terms and decides to marry her.

The second part of the book (published in 1741), which is less interesting, presents Pamela married, suffering with dignity and sweetness the burden of a profligate husband.

The novel was translated into French and Dutch and made the object of several skits. The most famous of these were 'An Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews' (1741), of which the authorship is uncertain (it was perhaps by Fielding), and Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

Pamphlet, a small unbound treatise, especially on a subject of current interest. The word is apparently a generalized use of Pamphilet, a familiar name of the 12th-century Latin amatory poem or comedy called 'Pamphilus, seu de Amore', a highly popular opuscle in the 13th cent. [OED.]

Pan, the god of shepherds and huntsmen, represented as a monster, with two small horns on his head, flat nose, ruddy complexion, and the legs and feet of a goat. He is said by some authors to have been the son of Hermes and to have been carried to heaven by his father, where the oddity of his appearance greatly delighted the gods, and in particular Bacchus. Pan invented the flute with seven reeds, which he called syrtinx in honour of the beautiful nymph of that name. Shelley's 'Hymn of Pan' is an echo of a story that Pan once engaged in a musical contest with Apollo (see Midas). His worship was widespread and particularly established in Arcadia. Plutarch mentions that in the reign of Tiberius a ship with passengers was driven near the coast of the Isles of Paxi. A loud voice was heard calling to one Thamuz that the great god Pan was dead. The emperor ordered an inquiry, but the astrologers were unable to explain the meaning of this supernatural announcement. The incident in Christian legend is associated with the birth of Christ. According to M. Salomon Reinach the explanation may be found in the lament of the worshippers of the god Thamuz (q.v.), 'Θαμμοῦς ὁ πάμμεγας τεθνῆκε', overheard and misunderstood by the passengers of a ship while his annual obsequies were being celebrated.

PANIC FEAR is the fear that seizes people without obvious cause: Pan was thought responsible for the alarms felt by people, especially travellers in remote and desolate places.

Panchatantra, a Sanskrit collection of fables, from which are derived the 'Fables of Bidpai' (q.v.) and many more or less direct European versions.

Pancks, a character in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

Pandārus, son of Lycaon, leader in the Trojan war of the Trojans who lived about the foot of Mt. Ida. The part which he played in the tale of Troilus (q.v.) and Cressida has no foundation in classical antiquity. In Chaucer's 'Troilus and Cryseyde' and in Shakespeare's 'Troilus and Cressida' (q.v.) he is the uncle of Cressida and the go-between in her relations with Troilus; hence our word 'pander'.

Pandects, The, or Digest, of Justinian, a compendium in fifty books of Roman civil law, made by order of the Emperor Justinian in the sixth cent., systematizing opinions of eminent jurists, to which the emperor gave the force of law.

Pandemonium, the abode of all the demons; a place represented by Milton ('Paradise Lost', i. 756) as the capital of Hell, containing the council-chamber of the Evil Spirits.

Pandēmus, meaning 'common to all the people', a surname of the goddess Aphrodite (see Venus) in her character of Worldly or Profane Love, as distinguished from the Uranian Aphrodite, Heavenly or Sacred Love.

Pandion, the father of Philomela (q.v.) and Procne.

Pandōra, according to Hesiod, the first woman that ever lived. She was made of clay by Hephaestus at the request of Zeus, who wished to be revenged on Prometheus for his championship of mankind. When this woman of clay had received life, she was endowed by the gods with every gift, and Zeus gave her a box, which she was directed to present to the man who married her. Hermes then conducted her, not to Prometheus, who was too sagacious to accept her, but to Epimetheus, his brother. The latter, less prudent, married her and opened the box, whereupon there issued from it all the evils and distempers that have since afflicted the human race. Hope alone remained at the bottom of the box to assuage the lot of man. The fable is charmingly turned (to the advantage of Epimetheus) in Kingsley's 'Water Babies'.

Pandosto, or Dorastus and Fawnia, a prose romance by Greene (q.v.) published in 1588, is chiefly memorable as the basis of Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.). In certain details the story is treated less effectively by Greene. In 'Pandosto' for instance the queen Bellaria (Shakespeare's Hermione) actually dies on hearing of the death of her son, so that her final restoration to her husband does not occur. The escape of Dorastus and Fawnia (Florizel and Perdita), and the final identification of the latter, are less pleasantly contrived by Greene than by Shakespeare. Characters corresponding to Antigonus, Paulina, Autolycus, and the Clown are not found in Greene's version.

Pandours, the name borne by a local force organized in 1741 by Baron Trenck on his estates in Croatia, to clear the country near the Turkish frontier of bands of robbers. The Pandours were subsequently enrolled as a regiment in the Austrian army, where their rapacity and brutality caused them to be dreaded over Germany, and made Pandour synonymous in Western Europe with 'brutal Croatian soldier'. The word is derived from medieval Latin banderius, originally 'a follower of a standard or banner'.

Panem et circenses, 'bread doles and circus-shows', the only things that, according to Juvenal (x. 78-81), the degenerate Roman populace cared about:

nam qui dabat olim
Imperium fasces legiones omnia, nunc se
Continet atque duas tantum res anxius optat,
Panem et circenses.

And those who once, with unresisted sway,
Gave armies, empires, every thing away,
For two poor claims have long renounced the whole,

And only ask—the Circus and the Dole.
(Gifford's translation.)

Pangloss, DR., in the 'Candide' of Voltaire (q.v.), an optimistic philosopher who holds that all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds, in spite of a series of most distressing adventures (including unsuccessful hanging by the Inquisition and subsequent dissection). He is brought however to recognize that, to be happy, man must work and must 'cultivate his garden'. The intended object of the satire was Leibniz (q.v.).

Pangloss, DR., in 'The Heir-at-Law' of Colman (q.v.) the younger, a pompous avaricious pedant.

Panhandle State: West Virginia, see United States.

Panjandrum: 'and there were present the Picinnies, and the Jobillies, and the Garyulies, and the Grand Panjandrum himself, with the little round button at top', part of the farrago of nonsense composed by Foote to test the memory of Macklin (qq.v.), who asserted that he could repeat anything after once hearing it. Hence 'Panjandrum' is used as a mock title for an imaginary personage of much power, or a personage of great pretensions. [OED.]

Panöpē, one of the Nereids (q.v.), whom mariners invoked in a storm.

Pantagruel, the second book (in chronological order of the narrative) of Rabelais's great work, but the first to be written and published (1532). The name had been given in 15th-cent. French mysteries to a demon who provoked thirst, and its primitive sense appears to have been 'suffocation'. Rabelais uses it to mean 'the all-thirsty one'. Pantagruel is presented as the son of Gargantua (q.v.) and Badebec, daughter of the king of the Amaurotes of Utopia (a reference to Sir Thomas More's work). The book tells of his birth and education, satirizing the ancient learning and mingling serious and pious advice with burlesque. It then introduces Panurge (q.v.), and describes the ridiculous dispute by signs between Panurge and the English philosopher Thaumast. A war with the invading Dipsodes ('Thirsty People') follows, involving the interesting voyage to Utopia round the Cape of Good Hope, and the notable account of Epistemon's visit to the nether world. In the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Books (for their dates and the question of the authenticity of the Fifth Book, see Rabelais), Panurge becomes the principal figure, Pantagruel retires into the background as a kindly, serious, courteous prince, and the fantastic giant element disappears. The question arises whether Panurge shall marry. It is debated with the help of an old poet (Raminagrobis), an astrologer (Trippa), a physician (Rondibilis), a philosopher (Trouillogan), and the fool (Triboulet). The episode of Justice Bridlegoose (who decides all cases by throw of dice) is here introduced. No conclusion being reached, Panurge, Pantagruel, and the rest of the party set out on a voyage to Cathay to consult the oracle of the Bottle (Bacbus). On the account of this voyage, in the course of which they visit a number of different countries, recent researches have thrown an interesting light. It is evidently based on the narratives of contemporary explorers in their search for the North-West Passage. The travellers finally reach the oracle, whose advice is summed up in the one word 'Trinch' (drink). Whether this was intended by Rabelais as the conclusion of the whole story, or indeed was written by him, is doubtful. At the end of the Second Book Rabelais had promised to tell how Panurge was married and what came of it, and how Pantagruel married the daughter of Prester John, but this the work never does. The narrative provides occasion for abundant satire directed against monks and schoolmen, the Papacy (especially in the episode of the Papimanes and Bishop Homenas), and the magistrature (in the ferocious description of the Chats Fourrés or Furred Law-cats).

Pantagruellon, THE HERB, in Rabelais, III. xlix et seq., is hemp.

Pantagruellism, defined by Rabelais in the prologue to his Fourth Book as 'a certain gaiety of spirit steeped in disregard of things fortuitous'.

Pantaloon, adapted from the Italian pantalone, 'a kind of mask on the Italian stage, representing the Venetian', of whom Pantalone was a nickname, supposed to be derived from San Pantaleone, formerly a favourite saint of the Venetians. The Venetian character in Italian comedy was represented as a lean and foolish old man, wearing slippers, pantaloons, and spectacles. In modern pantomime or harlequinade he is represented as a foolish and vicious old man, the butt of the clown's jokes, and his abettor in his tricks. [OED.]

Panthêa, in Xenophon's 'Cyropaedia', the wife of Abradatus, king of Susa. She was taken prisoner by Cyrus, who refused to visit her, lest he should be ensnared by her charms. She killed herself on the body of her husband, who had been slain in battle. Panthea is also the name of the heroine of Beaumont and Fletcher's 'A King and no King' (q.v.).

Panthelism, (1) the doctrine that God and the universe are identical, that God is everything, and everything is God (implying a denial of the personality and transcendence of God); (2) the heathen worship of all the gods.

Pantheon, originally a temple dedicated to all the gods, especially that at Rome built by Agrippa c. 25 B.C., and transformed in A.D. 609 into a Christian church. The name is now used of a building serving to honour the illustrious dead of a nation. The Panthéon at Paris, which is devoted to this purpose, was formerly the church of Ste Geneviève, and was named the Panthéon at the Revolution.

Pantheon, THE, Oxford Street, London, originally a theatre and public promenade, with a rotunda like that at Ranelagh (but Johnson and Boswell thought it inferior to the latter). There are references to it in Walpole's letters and in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer'. It was famous for its masquerades, to which Gibbon at one time subscribed (letter to Holroyd, 1774). The Pantheon was burnt down in 1792 and rebuilt, but never recovered its former glory (Wheatley and Cunningham).

Pantisocracy, see Coleridge (S. T.).

Pantomime, (1) originally a Roman actor, who performed in dumb show, representing by mimicry various characters and scenes; (2) an English dramatic performance, originally consisting of action without speech, but in its further development consisting of a dramatized tale, the denouement of which is a transformation scene followed by the broad comedy of clown and pantaloon and the dancing of harlequin and columbine.

Panurge, one of the principal characters in Rabelais's 'Pantagruel' (q.v.), a cunning, voluble, witty, and in the later books cowardly buffoon, 'and a very dissolute and debauched fellow, if there were any in Paris: otherwise and in all matters else, the best and most virtuous man in the world; and he was still contriving some plot, and devising mischief against the sergeants and the watch'.

Panza, SANCHO, see Don Quixote.

PARACELSUS

Paolo and Francesca: Francesca, daughter of Giovanni da Polenta, count of Ravenna, was given in marriage by him to Giovanni (Sciancato, the Lame) Malatesta, of Rimini, an ill-favoured man, in return for his military services. She fell in love with Paolo, her husband's handsome brother, and, their relations being discovered, the two lovers were put to death in 1289. Dante, at the end of the fifth canto of his 'Inferno', relates his conversation with Francesca, who told him how her fall was occasioned by the reading of the tale of Launcelot and Guinevere. The Galeotto mentioned by Dante is Galahault, the prince who, in the story of the early loves of Launcelot and Guinevere, not included in Malory, introduces Launcelot to the queen.

The story of Paolo and Francesca was made by Leigh Hunt (q.v.) the subject of his poem 'The Story of Rimini'; it was also the subject of a play that had a temporary vogue, by Stephen Phillips (1866-1915).

Paolo Veronese, the name usually given to PAOLO CAGLIARI (1528-88), of Verona, the celebrated painter. From 1555 he lived principally at Venice, where most of his chief works were executed. He was remarkable for the spaciousness and splendour of his paintings, many of them designed to decorate large expanses of wall in the Doge's Palace and other buildings, and for his skill in grouping numerous figures.

Paperstamp, MR., in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.), a caricature of Wordsworth.

Paphos, a city of Cyprus sacred to Aphrodite. Hence PAPHIAN, a courtesan.

Papimany, in Rabelais's 'Pantagruel', iv. xlviii et seq., an island visited by Pantagruel and his companions. Its inhabitants, the Papimanes, carry their blind zeal for the pope and the Decretals (q.v.) to the point of absurdity. Their bishop was Homenas. When this satire was written Henry II of France was in acute conflict with Pope Julius III.

Pappe with an hatchet, the title of a tract contributed in 1589 by Lyly (q.v.) to the Marprelate controversy (see Martin Marprelate) on the side of the bishops. The sense of the expression appears to be 'the administration of punishment under the ironical style of a kindness or benefit' [OED.]. Lyly's pamphlet is a worthless mixture of abuse and ribaldry.

Paracelsus, PHILIPPUS AUREOLUS THEOPHRASTUS BOMBASTUS AB HOHENHEIM (1493-1541), born at Einsiedeln near Zürich in Switzerland, the son of a doctor of medicine. He wandered from country to country, practising magic, alchemy, and astrology, and visiting the universities of Germany, France, and Italy. He returned to Germany, effected there many remarkable cures, and was appointed to a chair of physic and surgery at Basel. He publicly burnt the works of Galen and Avicenna, boasting himself their superior. He was, however, presently pronounced a quack, fled from Basel, resumed his wanderings, and died at Salzburg in the Hospital of St. Sebastian. He initiated modern chemistry.

Paracelsus, a dramatic poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1835.

It is based on the actual life of Paracelsus, summarized above. Paracelsus is presented as a man possessed from childhood with an aspiration to discover the secret of the world, and a conviction that he is chosen to conquer that knowledge. He sets out to seek it in strange places, in spite of the dissuasion of his common-sense friend, Festus, and the gentle, loving Michal. Pt. II shows him at Constantinople, having learnt much, but despondent, for the ultimate secret has escaped him. He meets Aprile the poet, who unconsciously reveals to him the error he has made in pursuing knowledge to the exclusion of love—'the worth of love in man's estate and what proportion love should hold with power'. We next find Paracelsus at Basel, at first admired, then dismissed as a charlatan; and finally dying at Salzburg, where he makes the last proclamation of his faith. He has failed because, in spite of his learning, he has lacked sympathy with mankind; has failed to appreciate their half-reasons, faint aspirings, dim

Struggles for truth, their poorest fallacies, Their prejudice and fears and cares and doubts;

All with a touch of nobleness, upward tending.

Meanwhile he has 'done well, though not all well', and will 'emerge one day'.

Paraclete, THE, from a Greek word meaning advocate, intercessor, a title of the Holy Spirit, used frequently in the sense of 'the Comforter' (John xiv. 16, &c.).

Paradise, derived from an Old Persian word meaning enclosure or park, was used in its Greek form by the Septuagint translators for the Garden of Eden; and in the N.T. for the abode of the blessed, which is the earliest sense recorded in English [OED.]. It is now used (1) in the sense of the Garden of Eden; (2) by some theologians, as used in Luke xxiii. 43, in the sense of an intermediate state or place where the souls of the righteous await the Last Judgement; (3) in that of Heaven, the final abode of the righteous; and (4) also figuratively as a place of surpassing delight or bliss. It was also used for a pleasure-garden in general, e.g. the garden of a convent, in which sense it sometimes survives in the street nomenclature of old towns (e.g. 'Paradise Square', Oxford). In slang it was used for the gallery of a theatre, where the 'gods' sit. See also Paradise of Fools.

Paradise, THE EARTHLY: the belief in the existence of a terrestrial paradise was widespread in the Middle Ages, and references to it are found in manuscripts and maps of the time, e.g. in the legend of the navigation of St. Brendan (q.v.). It is sometimes regarded as the old Garden of Eden, in the extreme east of the world.

Paradise Lost, an epic poem by Milton (q.v.), originally in ten books, subsequently rearranged in twelve, first printed in 1667.

Milton formed the intention of writing a great epic poem, as he tells us, as early as 1639. A list of possible subjects, some of them scriptural, some from British history, written in his own hand about 1640-1, still exists, with drafts of the scheme of a poem on Paradise Lost. The work was not, however, begun in earnest until 1658, and it was finished, according to Aubrey, in 1663. It was licensed for publication by the Rev. Thomas Tomkyns, chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury. Milton entered into an agreement for the copyright with Samuel Simmons by which he received £5 down, and a further £5 when the first impression of 1,300 copies was exhausted. His widow subsequently parted with all further claims for the sum of £8.

Book I. The general subject is briefly stated: man's disobedience and the loss thereupon of Paradise, with its prime cause, Satan, who, having revolted from God, has been driven out of heaven. Satan is presented, with his angels, lying on the burning lake of hell. He awakens his legions, comforts them, and summons a council. Pandemonium, the palace of Satan, is built.

Book II. The council debates whether another battle for the recovery of Heaven shall be hazarded, but decides to examine the report that a new world, with new creatures in it, has been created. Satan undertakes alone the search. He passes through Hell-gates, guarded by Sin and Death, and passes upward through the realm of Chaos.

Book III. God sees Satan flying towards our world, and foretells his success and the fall and punishment of Man. The Son of God offers himself a ransom for Man, is accepted, and exalted. Satan alights on the outer convex of our universe, the future Paradise of Fools (q.v.). He finds the stairs leading up to Heaven, descends to the Sun, and is directed by Uriel to this Earth, alighting on Mount Niphates.

Book IV. The Garden of Eden is described, where Satan first sees Adam and Eve, and overhears their discourse regarding the Tree of Knowledge, of which they are forbidden to eat the fruit. He decides to found his enterprise upon this, and proceeds to tempt Eve in a dream; but is discovered by Gabriel and Ithuriel, and ejected from the garden.

Book V. Eve relates her disquieting dream to Adam. Raphael, sent by God, comes to Paradise, warns Adam of his enemy, and enjoins obedience. At Adam's request he relates how and why Satan incited his legions to revolt.

PARADISE LOST

Book VI. Raphael continues his narrative, how Michael and Gabriel were sent to fight against Satan. After indecisive battles the Son of God himself, causing his legions to stand still, alone attacked the hosts of Satan, and, driving them to the edge of Heaven, forced them to leap down into the deep.

Book VII. Raphael relates how thereafter God decided on the creation of another world with new creatures to dwell therein, and sent his son to perform the creation in six days.

Book VIII. Adam inquires concerning the motions of the heavenly bodies, and is answered ambiguously. [The controversy regarding the Ptolemaic and Copernican systems was at its height when the 'Paradise Lost' was written, and Milton was unable to decide between them, as seen in Bk. X, 668 et seq.] Adam relates what he remembers since his own creation, and discourses with the angel regarding the relations of man with woman. Raphael departs.

Book IX. Satan enters into the serpent, and in this form finds Eve alone. He persuades her to eat of the Tree of Knowledge. Eve relates to Adam what has passed and brings him of the fruit. Adam, perceiving that she is lost, from extreme love for her, resolves to perish with her, and eats of the fruit. This robs them of their innocence: they cover their nakedness, and fall to recriminations.

Book X. God sends his Son to judge the transgressors. He passes sentence on the man and on the woman. Sin and Death resolve to come to this world and make a broad highway thither from Hell. Satan returns to Hell and relates his success; he and his angels are temporarily transformed into serpents. Adam and Eve confer how to evade the curse upon their offspring, and finally approach the Son of God with repentance and supplication.

Book XI. The Son of God intercedes for Adam and Eve. God decides on their expulsion from Paradise. Michael comes down to carry out the decree. Eve laments, Adam pleads but submits. The angel leads him to a high hill and shows him in a series of visions the future misery of man and what shall happen till the Flood.

Book XII. Michael relates what shall follow, and explains the future coming of the Messiah, his incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension, and foretells the corrupt state of the Church till his second coming. Adam and Eve, submissive, are led out of Paradise.

Paradise of Fools: Milton in 'Paradise Lost', III. 448 et seq., describes, on the outer edge of our universe, a 'Limbo large and broad, since called the Paradise of Fools', to which are consigned 'all who in vain things Built their fond hopes of glory or lasting fame' (see Limbo).

Paradise Regained, an epic poem in four books by Milton (q.v.), published in 1671. See Ellwood.

PARADYSE OF DAYNTY DEVICES

It is a sequel to 'Paradise Lost', and deals exclusively with the temptation of Christ in the wilderness. According to the poet's conception, whereas Paradise was lost by the yielding of Adam and Eve to Satan's temptation, so it was regained by the resistance of the Son of God to the temptation of the same spirit. Satan is here represented not in the majestic lineaments that we find in the 'Paradise Lost', but as a cunning, smooth, and dissembling creature, a 'Spirit unfortunate', as he describes himself. There is a comparative scarcity of similes and ornament, and only a vivid and ingenious expansion of the Biblical texts.

Book I relates the baptism of Christ by John at Bethabara, and the proclamation from Heaven that he is the Son of God. Satan, alarmed, summons a council of his peers, and undertakes his temptation. Christ is led into the wilderness, where, after forty days, Satan in the guise of 'an aged man in rural weeds' approaches him and suggests that he, being now hungry, should prove his divine character by turning the stones around him into bread. Christ, seeing through his guile, sternly replies. Night falls on the desert.

Books II and III. Meanwhile Andrew and Simon seek Christ, and Mary is troubled at his absence. Satan confers again with his council. He once more tries the hunger temptation, placing before the eyes of Christ a 'table richly spread', which is contemptuously rejected. He then makes appeal to the higher appetites for wealth and power, and a disputation follows as to the real value of earthly glory. Satan, confuted, next reminds Christ that the kingdom of David is now under the Roman yoke, and suggests that he should free it. He takes Christ to a high mountain and shows him the kingdoms of the earth. A description follows (iii. 231-346) of the contemporary state of the eastern world, divided between the powers of Rome and of the Parthians, as seen in this vision. Satan offers an alliance with, or conquest of, the Parthians, and the liberation of the Jews then in captivity.

Book IV. Christ remaining unmoved by Satan's 'politic maxims', the tempter, turning to the western side, draws his attention to Rome and proposes the expulsion of the wicked emperor Tiberius; and finally, pointing out Athens, urges the attractions of her poets, orators, and philosophers. All these failing, Satan brings Christ back to the wilderness, and the second night falls. On the third morning, confessing Christ proof against all temptation, Satan carries him to the highest pinnacle of the temple and bids him cast himself down, 'to know what more he is than man', only to receive the well-known answer. Satan falls dismayed, and angels bear Christ away.

Paradys of Daynty Devises, The, a collection of works by poets of the second rank who wrote in the early part of the 16th cent. (Lord Vaux, Lord Oxford, Kinwelmersh, Hunnis). It was compiled by Richard Edwards (q.v.) and published after his death, in 1576.

Parasitaster, The, or The Fawn, a comedy by J. Marston (q.v.), published in 1606.

Hercules, the widowed duke of Ferrara, wishes his son Tiberio to marry Dulcimet, daughter of a neighbouring prince, and, in order to defeat his unwillingness, declares that he will marry Dulcimet himself, and sends Tiberio to negotiate the marriage. Hercules, under the name of Faunus, follows in disguise to watch the issue. Dulcimet falls in love with Tiberio, and, being a woman of wit and resource, manages to win him.

Parcae or FATES, THE, the MOIRAE of the Greeks, goddesses who presided over the birth and life of men. They were sisters, three in number, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos. Clotho, the youngest, presided over the moment of man's birth and held a distaff in her hands. Lachesis with her spindle spun out the events and actions of his life. Atropos, the eldest, cut the thread of human life with her shears. They were held to be inexorable, and the gods could not alter their decrees.

Pardiggle, Mrs., in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.), a lady 'distinguished for rapacious benevolence'.

Pardoner's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Parian Chronicle, THE, one of the Arundel Marbles (q.v.), a marble inscription in which are recorded the chief events of Greek history from the reign of the mythical Cecrops to 354 B.C. It was first deciphered by John Selden (q.v.).

Paridell, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', a false and libertine knight (Bks. III. viii, ix, and x, and iv. i) who consorts with Duessa (q.v.) and elopes with Hellenore, the wife of Malbecco (q.v.).

Paris, also known as ALEXANDER, was a son of Priam, king of Troy, and of Hecuba. He was exposed as a child because of a prophecy that he should bring destruction on Troy, but was brought up by shepherds on Mt. Ida. Here he won the favour of the nymph Oenone, with whom he lived happily until appointed by the gods to adjudge the prize of beauty among the three goddesses, Hera, Aphrodite, and Athene. Each tried by promises to influence his judgement; Aphrodite offered him the fairest woman in the world for wife, and to her he awarded the prize. At an athletic contest held at Priam's court, Paris was recognized as Priam's son, and soon after visited Sparta, where he persuaded Helen, the wife of Menelaus, the fairest woman of her age, to elope with him. This brought about the expedition of the Greek princes against Troy. In the course of the ensuing war Paris was mortally wounded by an arrow shot by Philoctetes, and sought Oenone's help in vain (see under the name of the latter).

PARISIAN MASSACRE

Paris, COUNT, a character in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.).

PARIS, MATTHEW (d. 1259), historian and monk, entered the monastery of St. Albans in 1217, and became an expert in writing, in drawing and painting, and in working gold and silver. He succeeded Roger of Wendover in his office of chronicler to the monastery, 1236, and carried on the 'Chronica Majora' from the summer of 1235. He expanded the scope of the chronicle, introducing narratives and accounts of events in foreign countries as well as in England, which he obtained from kings and all manner of great persons who came to St. Albans. He was a favourite with Henry III, and visited Norway in 1248 on a mission from Innocent IV. He carried his greater chronicle down to May 1259, where he ends abruptly, and certainly died about that time. In vigour and brightness of expression he stands before every other English chronicler; and his writing possesses peculiar historic value. Besides the great chronicle he wrote a summary of the chief events between 1200 and 1250, which is known as the 'Historia Minor', or 'Historia Anglorum'. The Cotton manuscripts include 'Vitae duae Offarum', which are attributed to Matthew Paris, though probably spurious. These lives are followed by 'Vitae Abbatum S. Albani', being the lives of the first twenty-three abbots to 1255, of which all were certainly compiled, and the last two or three composed, by him. They were incorporated, with some alterations, by Thomas Walsingham in his 'Gesta Abbatum'. The whole of his writings are discussed by Luard in the prefaces to his edition of the 'Chronica Majora'. Paris describes himself in the manuscripts as 'Matheus Parisiensis'; whether from birth or residence in Paris, or because Paris was his family name, is uncertain. Leland and Pits favour the latter view, which is borne out by the numerous instances of persons of that name living in England (particularly in Lincolnshire) in the 13th cent. On the other hand he perhaps spent some time in Paris, for he knew French (Madden).

Paris Garden, a place for bull- and bear-baiting on Bankside, Southwark, referred to in Shakespeare's 'Henry VIII', v. iv.

Paris Sketch Book, The, a collection of six short stories, with essays and criticisms, by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 1840.

Parish Register, The, a poem by Crabbe (q.v.), published in 1807.

A country parson relates the memories awakened in him as he looks through the entries in his registers of births, marriages, and deaths. It includes the well-known pathetic tale of Phoebe Dawson, which pleased Fox and Sir Walter Scott.

Parisian Massacre or WEDDING, THE, the massacre of St. Bartholomew in Paris (1572), when many Huguenots were slain during the festivities in celebration of the marriage of Henry of Navarre with Margaret of France.

Parisians, The, a novel (unfinished) by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1873.

Lytton here depicts the corrupt Parisian society of the last days of the second Empire, and the revolutionary forces that sprang up to overthrow it. The main elements in the story are two. Graham Vane, an Englishman of good family, has been left a fortune by his uncle, Richard King, with the request that he shall seek out the daughter of the wife who many years before deserted King and disappeared, and, if she survives, bestow the bulk of the fortune upon her or marry her. The search brings him in contact with various circles of French society. The second is the story of the efforts of a ruined French nobleman, Alain de Rochebriant, to rehabilitate his fortunes, efforts which make him the pawn of rival financiers and moneylenders.

Parisi'na, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1816.

The poem is founded on the following passage in Gibbon's 'Antiquities of the House of Brunswick' ('Miscellaneous Works', iii. 470): 'Under the reign of Nicholas III [A.D. 1425] Ferrara was polluted by a domestic tragedy. By the testimony of a maid, and his own observation, the marquis of Este discovered the incestuous loves of his wife Parisina and Hugo his bastard son, a beautiful and valiant youth. They were beheaded in the castle by the sentence of a father and husband, who published his shame, and survived their execution.'

PARK, MUNGO (1771-1806), born near Selkirk, was educated at Edinburgh University and became a surgeon in the mercantile marine. He explored the course of the Niger and became famous by his 'Travels in the Interior of Africa', published in 1799. He returned to the Niger in 1805, and perished at Boussa in a conflict with the natives. He was a friend of Sir W. Scott.

PARKER, MATTHEW (1504-75), educated at St. Mary's Hostel, Cambridge, and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, was licensed to preach by Cranmer in 1533, and in 1535 appointed chaplain to Anne Boleyn and dean of Stoke-by-Clare, where he spent much of the next ten years. He was in 1544 elected Master of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he reformed the library. He subsequently bequeathed to the college his fine collection of manuscripts. He was made dean of Lincoln in 1552, espoused the cause of Lady Jane Grey, was deprived of his preferments by Queen Mary, and fled to Frankfort-on-the-Main during the persecution. He reluctantly accepted the archbishopric of Canterbury on Elizabeth's accession and was consecrated at Lambeth (see Nag's Head Tavern) in 1559. He identified himself with the party (afterwards known as the Anglican party) which sought to establish a via media between Romanism and Puritanism. From 1563 to 1568 he was occupied with the production of the 'Bishops' Bible' (see Bible, the English), his most distinguished service to the theological studies of the day. With respect to this he informed Cecil that he contemplated undertaking, besides the prefaces, Genesis, Exodus, Matthew, Mark, and the Pauline Epistles, except Romans and 1 Corinthians. In his later years he retired more and more from society, being conscious of the strength of the opposing current, headed by Leicester. He was buried in his private chapel at Lambeth. In 1648 his remains were disinterred and buried under a dunghill, but after the Restoration they were restored to their original resting-place. He was a great benefactor to his college and to the University of Cambridge, where he constructed a handsome new street, which he named University Street, leading from the schools to Great St. Mary's. To his efforts we are indebted for the earliest editions of Gildas, Asser, Ælfric, the 'Flores Historiarum', Matthew Paris, and other important early chroniclers. In spite of Queen Elizabeth's dislike of clerical matrimony, he was married, and left one son. His 'De Antiquitate Ecclesiae et Privilegiis Ecclesiae Cantuariensis cum Archiepiscopis ejusdem 70' (1572) is said to be the first book privately printed in England.

PARKINSON, JOHN (1567-1650), king's herbarist, author of 'Paradisi in sole Paradisus terrestris, or a garden of all sorts of pleasant flowers which our English ayre will permit to be noursed up . . .' (1629), with woodcuts; also of a great herbal, 'Theatrum botanicum' (1640).

Parlement of Briddes, see Parliament of Fowls.

Parliament, Houses of: before the erection of the present Houses of Parliament, the House of Commons sat in the chapel of St. Stephen, and the House of Lords in the Painted Chamber, in the ancient palace of Westminster, originally built by Edward the Confessor, and rebuilt by Henry III. These were destroyed by fire in 1834. The present houses were built from the designs of Sir Charles Barry.

Parliament of Bees, The, a dramatic allegory or masque by J. Day (fl. 1606, q.v.), published, it appears, in 1607, though the earliest extant copy is of the year 1641.

It consists first of the opening of the parliament, with the viceroy's, 'Mr. Bee's', opening address; then of a series of 'characters' of different bees with their virtues and vices: the hospitable bee, the reveller, the neglected soldier, the neglected poet, the 'usuring' bee, the quacksalver, the thrifty bee, the passionate bee. Finally we have Oberon's Starchamber, with the pronouncement of penalties on offenders, the wasp, the drone, and the humble-bee.

Parliament of Fowls, The, or The Parliament of Briddes, a poem of 700 lines in rhyme-royal by Chaucer, probably written between 1372 and 1386. In a vision the poet sees the Court of Nature on St. Valentine's day, 'when every fowl cometh there to choose his mate'. Three tiercel eagles advance their claims to a beautiful 'formel' (female), and a debate of the fowls follows. Nature decides that the formel shall make election, and the formel asks for a year's respite 'to advise' her. The poem probably refers to some lady sought by royal lovers, perhaps Anne of Bohemia, and is noteworthy, inter alia, for its fine opening lines:

PARLIAMENT OF FOWLS

The lyf so short, the crafte so long to lerne, Thassay so harde, so sharpe the conquerynge,

and its descriptive catalogues of trees and birds.

Parménidēs (b. c. 513 B.C.), of Elea in Italy, the founder of the Eleatic school of philosophy. He rejected the views of Heraclitus (q.v.), and regarded the universe as a single, continuous, unchanging, indivisible whole; what is mutable, and phenomena such as motion, are in his view illusions.

Parmenides, MY FATHER: in Plato's dialogue 'The Sophist', the Eleatic Stranger speaks of laying hands on his father Parmenides (q.v.) in the sense of criticizing the doctrines in which he has been brought up.

Parménion, one of the generals of Alexander the Great (q.v.). When Darius, king of Persia, offered Alexander his daughter Statira in marriage, with the territories west of the Euphrates and a large sum of money, Parmenion observed that he would accept the offer if he were Alexander. Alexander replied, 'So should I, if I were Parmenion.'

Parnassian School, THE, the name given to a group of French poets of the latter half of the 19th cent. who diverged from the earlier romantics in the importance they attached to form in poetry. The name is taken from the title, 'Le Parnasse contemporain', of three collections of their poems published in 1866-76. They include Leconte de Lisle, Catulle Mendès, Mallarmé, Verlaine, Sully Prudhomme, &c.

Parnassus, a mountain in Greece, a few miles north of Delphi, sacred to the Muses. One of its peaks was sacred to Apollo; the other, as George Saintsbury reminds us, to Dionysus.

Parnassus Plays, THE, the name given to a trilogy, produced about the year 1600 by the students of St. John's College, Cambridge, consisting of 'The Pilgrimage to Parnassus' and 'The Returne from Parnassus', the latter in two parts, with 'The Scourge for Simony' as sub-title of the second. They have been attributed to J. Day (fl. 1606, q.v.), but their authorship is doubtful.

The 'Pilgrimage' deals allegorically with the journey of Philomusus and his cousin

PARNELL

Studioso to Parnassus by way of the Trivium, and the regions of Rhetoric and Philosophy; and their encounters with Madido, the votary of wine, Amoretto, the voluptuary, and Ingenioso, who has given up the voyage and burnt his books. But the travellers resist their counsels and struggle on to their goal.

In the 'Return', where the tone becomes satirical, the students are seen on their way back to London, learning how to catch a patron or cheat a tradesman; and following menial occupations, as sexton and private tutor, as fiddlers, and so forth; and finally, in utter discouragement, as simple shepherds.

The second part of the 'Return' contains an interesting review of the merits of certain contemporary poets, including Shakespeare and Jonson; and introduces Kemp and Burbage. Some of the scenes deal with the feud between town and gown at Cambridge, and hold up to obloquy Brackyn, the recorder of Cambridge, who figures again in 'Ignoramus' (q.v.).

Parnell, CHARLES STEWART (1846-91), born at Avondale, co. Wicklow, and educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge. He entered parliament as M.P. for Meath in 1875 and by his extreme attitude won the confidence of the Fenians and obtained an alliance with the Clan-na-Gael or new Fenians, who had hitherto despised parliamentary agitation. He was elected chairman of the Home Rule party in the House of Commons in 1880 and, in spite of his being a Protestant, exerted an extraordinary sway over his supporters and enormous influence outside the house. He was arrested for his incendiary speeches in 1881 and imprisoned in Kilmainham jail, gaining thereby great popularity and the appellation of 'the uncrowned king of Ireland'. With the help of the Liberal party he overthrew the Tory government in 1886, and converted Gladstone to his home-rule scheme. He vindicated himself in 1888-9 of the charge of connivance with outrage and crime brought in the articles on 'Parnellism and Crime' which were published in 'The Times' in 1887. His career was ruined by his appearance as co-respondent in a suit for divorce by Capt. O'Shea against his wife in 1890. His influence may be estimated by the fact that within eleven years of his entering public life he had induced a majority of one of the great English political parties to regard home rule for Ireland, hitherto viewed as an impracticable dream, as an urgent necessity.

PARNELL, THOMAS (1679-1718), born in Dublin and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was archdeacon of Clogher and a friend of Swift and Pope (to whose 'Iliad' he contributed an introductory essay). His works, which were published posthumously by Pope, include 'The Night Piece on Death', 'The Hymn to Contentment', and 'The Hermit', the two first being octosyllabic odes of great fluency, and the last a narrative poem in heroic couplets. Parnell's life was written by

Goldsmith. His 'Elegy to an Old Beauty' includes the couplet:

And all that's madly wild, or oddly gay
We call it only pretty Fanny's way.

'Pretty Fanny's way' has become proverbial for some perverse or annoying habit regarded with toleration by the friends of the person guilty of it. Parnell's 'Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice with the Remarks of Zoilus', satirizing Theobald and Dennis, was published in 1717.

Parolles, a character in Shakespeare's 'All's Well that Ends Well' (q.v.).

Paronomasia, a play on words, a pun:

As we curtail the already cur-tailed cur
(You catch the paronomasia, play 'po' words?).

Calverley, 'The Cock and the Bull'
(parody of Browning).

PARR, SAMUEL (1747-1825), educated at Harrow and Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was headmaster of three schools, and then settled at Hatton in Warwickshire as perpetual curate, where he built up a library containing 10,000 volumes. He engaged in political controversy as a strong Whig, and in numerous literary quarrels. He was a fine Latin scholar, and excelled as a writer of Latin epitaphs (he wrote that on Samuel Johnson in St. Paul's). He was regarded as the Whig Johnson, but his conversation was apparently far inferior to that of his model. His works, which contain little of permanent value, and are marked by verbosity and mannerism, were collected in eight volumes in 1828. His reputation was severely handled by De Quincey in an essay, 'Dr. Samuel Parr, or Whiggism in relation to Literature'.

Parr, THOMAS (1483?-1635), OLD PARR, a native of Alderbury, near Shrewsbury, whose longevity was celebrated by Taylor, the water-poet. He was sent to court in 1635 by the earl of Arundel, where the change in his mode of life killed him. Sir G. Cornewall Lewis and W. J. Thoms regard the story of his extraordinary age as unsupported by any trustworthy evidence.

Parrhāsīus (fl. c. 400 B.C.), a native of Ephesus, one of the most celebrated painters of antiquity. For his contest of skill with Zeuxis, see Zeuxis.

PARRY, SIR WILLIAM EDWARD (1790-1855), Arctic explorer, was author of four narratives of voyages to the Polar Sea, published in 1821-4, 1824, 1826, and 1828.

Parsees, descendants of those Persians who fled to India in the 7th and 8th cents. to escape Mohammedan persecution, and who still retain their religion (Zoroastrianism, q.v.). They are also known as Guebres. They are fairly numerous in the Bombay Presidency.

Parstfal, the title of a music-drama by R. Wagner (q.v.). See Parzival and Perceval.

PARSON LOT, see Kingsley (C.).

PARZIVAL

Parson's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Parthenissa, see Boyle (R.).

Parthenon, THE, a temple at Athens sacred to Athene. It was destroyed by the Persians and rebuilt in a more splendid manner by Pericles. The statue in it of the goddess, made of gold and ivory, passed for one of the masterpieces of Pheidias. The temple was turned into a Christian church probably in the reign of Justinian I, into a mosque soon after 1453, and was almost destroyed in 1687 by an explosion of gunpowder during the siege of Athens by the Venetians.

Parthenopean Republic, the short-lived republic established by the French at Naples in 1799. Parthenope was the name of a Greek settlement from Cumae on the site where Naples now stands, derived from the association of the locality with the siren of that name.

Parthenophil and Parthenope, a collection of sonnets by B. Barnes (q.v.), issued in 1593, notable as one of the first of such collections to appear after Sidney's 'Astrophel and Stella'.

Parthians, THE, a people of Scythian origin who lived SE. of the Caspian Sea and came into conflict with the Romans. They were celebrated as mounted archers, who spread round the enemy, poured in a shower of arrows, and then fled, avoiding close contact, and still shooting their arrows as they retreated. Whence the expression 'a Parthian shaft'.

Particularism, in theology, the dogma that Divine Grace is provided for or offered to a selected part, not the whole, of the human race.

Partington, MRS., referred to by Sydney Smith (q.v.) in his speech at Taunton in Oct. 1831 on the rejection of the Reform Bill. He compares the attempts of the House of Lords to stop the progress of reform to the efforts of Mrs. Partington, who lived close to the beach at Sidmouth, to keep out the Atlantic with a mop when a great storm in 1824 caused a flood in that town.

Benjamin Penhallow Shillaber (1814-90), American humorist, published in 1854 the 'Life and Sayings of Mrs. Partington', a benevolent village gossip, an American variety of Mrs. Malaprop.

Partlet or DAME PARTLET, the hen in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.) and in Chaucer's 'Nun's Priest's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales). 'Sister Partlet with her hooded head' in Dryden's 'The Hind and the Panther' (q.v.) stands for the Roman Catholic nuns.

Partridge, a character in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.).

Partridge, JOHN, the victim of a mystification by Swift. See Bickerstaff.

Parzival, an epic by Wolfram von Eschenbach (q.v.), composed early in the 13th cent. on the subject of the legend of Perceval (q.v.) and the Holy Grail. See also Titwæl.

PASCAL

PASCAL, BLAISE (1623–62), French mathematician, physicist, and moralist, came early under the influence of Jansenism (q.v.). His first important ethical work was the 'Lettres à un Provincial' (1656–7), polemical letters directed against the casuistry of the Jesuits. His famous 'Pensées' (issued posthumously in 1670) were fragments of an uncompleted Defence of the Christian Religion, directed principally against the free-thinkers. A contemporary of Descartes (q.v.), he contested that philosopher's view of the supremacy of human reason, and showed its inability to deal with ultimate metaphysical problems. He finds room in his own philosophy for the teaching of the Scriptures, and for intuition alongside of reason. Pascal showed his mathematical and scientific aptitudes by a juvenile treatise on conic sections, by inventing a calculating machine, and by proving experimentally the weight of air.

Pasha, a title borne in Turkey by officers of high rank, e.g. military commanders and governors of provinces. There were three grades of pashas, distinguished by the number of horse-tails displayed as a symbol in war; the highest grade (of three tails) corresponding to a commanding general, admiral, or governor of equivalent rank.

Pasht, a cat-headed goddess of the ancient Egyptians, especially worshipped at Bubastis.

Pasiphæë, see Minotaur.

Pasquill, PASQUIN. Pasquino or Pasquillo was the name popularly given to a mutilated statue disinterred at Rome in 1501, and set up by Cardinal Caraffa at the corner of his palace near the Piazza Navona. It became the custom to salute Pasquin on St. Mark's day in Latin verses. In process of time these pasquinade or pasquinades tended to become satirical, and the term began to be applied, not only in Rome but in other countries, to satirical compositions and lampoons, political, ecclesiastical, or personal. According to Mazocchi, the name Pasquino originated in that of a schoolmaster who lived opposite the spot where the statue was found; a later tradition made Pasquino a caustic tailor or shoemaker; another calls him a barber. [OED.] Replies to the pasquinades used to be attached to the Marforio, an ancient statue of a river-god, thought to be of Mars.

Passtyme of Pleasure, or the Historie of Graunde Amoure and La Belle Pucel, an allegorical poem in rhyme-royal and decasyllabic couplets by Hawes (q.v.), written about 1506 and first printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1509 (edited by Southey, 1831, and by Wright for the Percy Society, 1845). It describes the education of a certain Graunde Amour in the accomplishments required to make a knight perfect and worthy of the love of La Belle Pucel, and narrates his encounters with giants (representing the vices), his marriage, and his death; the whole constituting an allegory of life in the form of a romance of chivalry. It contains a well-known couplet in perhaps its original form:

For though the day be never so longe,
At last the belles ringeth to evensong.

Passing of Arthur, The, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1869.

Sir Bedivere, the last surviving of Arthur's knights, relates the final scenes of the king's life, the coming of the ghost of Gawain with its warning of the impending end; the pressing back of Modred's forces to the western bound of Lyonesse; the great battle when all but Arthur, Bedivere, and Modred are killed; the slaying of Modred by Arthur and his own mortal wound; the throwing of Excalibur into the mere; and the coming of the black barge with the three queens, who bear off Arthur.

The poem incorporates the 'Morte d'Arthur', the earlier fragment published in 1842.

Passion, THE, the sufferings of Jesus Christ on the Cross (also often including the Agony in Gethsemane). A CROSS OF THE PASSION is a term of Heraldry, used of a cross not crossed in the middle but somewhat below the top. PASSION WEEK was, until the middle of the 19th cent., generally used to signify the week immediately before Easter. Since then this period has been designated Holy Week, and the term Passion Week has been applied by some to the week beginning with Passion Sunday, i.e. the fifth week in Lent.

Passion Play, a miracle play (q.v.) representing the Passion of Christ. See also Oberammergau.

Passionate Pilgrim, A, a story by H. James (q.v.), his earliest work, written in 1870 and published in 1875.

It is the tragic tale of an American out of sympathy with his own country and broken by misfortune, who comes to England, where he has some sort of claim to the home of his English forefathers. The hope that the claim will prove valid proves unfounded, and he is reduced to utter despair. Nevertheless, he is prevailed on to visit this ancestral home. Here, in its congenial atmosphere, his despondent spirit suddenly blazes out into a passionate ardour. Events unexpectedly bring the possession of the home and a belated happiness within his reach, but too late, and he dies.

Passionate Pilgrim, The, an unauthorized anthology of poems by various authors, published by William Jaggard in 1599, and attributed on the title-page to William Shakespeare.

Passover, THE, the name of a Jewish feast, held on the evening of the 14th day of the month Nisan, commemorative of the 'passing over' of the houses of the Israelites whose doorposts were marked with the blood of the lamb, when the Egyptians were smitten with the death of their first-born (Exod. xii). It is extended to include the seven following days.

PASTEUR

Pasteur, Louis (1822–95), a famous French chemist and biologist, the founder of the science of bacteriology, the author of many works on bacteria and the preventive treatment of disease, and the discoverer of the method of inoculation for hydrophobia.

Pastiche, a literary composition made up from various authors or sources, or in imitation of the style of another author; or a picture made up of fragments pieced together or copied with modification from an original, or in professed imitation of the style of another artist.

Paston Letters, a collection of letters preserved by the Pastons, a well-to-do Norfolk family, written between 1440 and 1486.

They concern three generations of the family and were written under three reigns, Henry VI, Edward IV, and Richard III. They are unique as materials for history, and interesting as showing the violence and anarchy that prevailed in the land, and the domestic conditions in which a family of this class lived. The history of the manuscripts is curious. The second earl of Yarmouth (1652–1732), the head of the Paston family, sold some of his family papers to Peter Le Neve, the antiquary. They passed through various hands into those of John Fenn, who published two volumes of selected letters in 1787. These attracted the interest of the king, and Fenn presented to the Royal Library the manuscript of the letters which he had published, and was knighted in acknowledgement. Two further volumes of letters were published in 1789, and a fifth in 1825. The originals of these volumes were all for a time lost. Those of the fifth volume were found in 1865, those of the third and fourth in 1875; but it was not until 1889 that the originals of the first two volumes were discovered in the library of Orwell Hall, where they had come with the papers of Bishop Tomline. The whole collection, with many additional documents, has since been re-edited by Dr. J. Gairdner.

Pastor Fido, Il, see Guarini.

Pastoral poetry was, in its origin, distinctively Dorian and especially Sicilian. Theocritus (q.v.) was its principal Greek representative. Pastoral romances and plays were developed in England in the 16th and 17th cents. from Italian and Spanish works, notably from the 'Diana' of Jorge de Montemayor (printed c. 1560, and translated into English by Bartholomew Young, 1598), which inspired Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.); also from Tasso's 'Aminta' (1581) and 'Il Pastor Fido' of Guarini (1590), translated in 1596 and 1602 respectively, the latter of which served as a model for Fletcher's 'Faithful Shepherdess' (q.v.). The essence of the pastoral is simplicity of thought and action in a rustic setting. The most important examples of this kind of composition in English include, besides the two works above mentioned,

PATERNOSTER ROW

Lodge's 'Rosalynde' (q.v.), Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.), Jonson's 'Sad Shepherd' (q.v.), and Milton's 'Comus' (q.v.).

Pastorella, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', vi. ix–xii, a shepherdess, loved by Coridon the shepherd and by Sir Calidore, believed to be the daughter of Meliboe. She is carried off by brigands, rescued by Sir Calidore, and discovered to be the daughter of Sir Bellamour and the Lady Claribell.

Patavinity, provincialism in style. The word originally means the dialectal peculiarities of Patavium (Padua), as shown in the writings of Livy (q.v.); hence provincialism in style.

Patavium, in imprints, Padua.

Patch, originally the name or nickname of Cardinal Wolsey's domestic fool (perhaps an anglicized form of the Italian pazzo, fool), hence a synonym for fool (whence 'cross-patch').

Patellin, see Pathelin.

PATER, WALTER HORATIO (1839–94), educated at King's School, Canterbury, and Queen's College, Oxford, and a fellow of Brasenose, became associated with the Pre-Raphaelites, particularly with Swinburne, whom perhaps he never met, and began his literary career by contributing in 1867 to the 'Westminster Review' an essay on 'Winckelmann', subsequently embodied in his volume of 'Studies in the History of the Renaissance' (1873). This work first made Pater's fame. It was followed in 1885 by 'Marius the Epicurean' (q.v.), a philosophic romance; 'Imaginary Portraits' (1887), 'Appreciations' (1889) containing his judgements of Shakespeare, Wordsworth, and other English writers; 'Plato and Platonism' (1893), and 'The Child in the House' (1894). 'Greek Studies' (1895) and 'Gaston de Latour' (1896) were published posthumously. 'Gaston', which remained unfinished, is a story of the France of Charles IX, containing a portrait of Montaigne, and introducing Ronsard and Giordano Bruno.

PATERCULUS, GAIUS VELLEIUS (c. 19 B.C.–A.D. 31), Roman historian, who served in Germany under Tiberius; author of a succinct history of Greece and Rome to his own time, contrasting with Tacitus and Suetonius in its praise of Tiberius.

Paternoster, from the L. pater noster, 'Our Father', the first two words of the Lord's Prayer in Latin, used to signify that prayer especially in the Latin version. It is some times extended to any form of words repeated or muttered by way of prayer, imprecation, or charm, e.g. Devil's Paternoster, a muttered imprecation; also to a special bead in a rosary indicating that a paternoster is to be said; and to the whole rosary.

Paternoster Row, London, adjoining St. Paul's Cathedral, was perhaps so called from the makers of rosaries or paternosters. Stow records that 'Pater noster makers of olde time, or beade makers, and text writers are gone out of Pater noster Rowe'. Or it may have been here that processions going to St. Paul's began their pater noster (cf. Amen Corner, Ave Maria Lane, &c., in the vicinity).

Path to Rome, The, see Belloc.

Pathelin or Patelin, Maitre Pierre, the most famous of early French farces, probably of the 15th cent., of unknown authorship.

Pathelin, the lawyer, tricks the close-fisted Joceume, the draper, out of a piece of cloth. Joceume presently discovers that he is being defrauded by his shepherd Aignelet, whom he hales before the judge. Aignelet consults Pathelin as to his defence. Joceume, confused at seeing the rascal Pathelin in court, mixes up his two complaints, against the lawyer and against the shepherd, and is recalled to the business of the moment by the judge in the famous phrase, 'Revenons à ces moutons'. Aignelet, who to every question replies, in accordance with Pathelin's advice, by merely bleating, is discharged as an idiot. But the tables are turned on Pathelin when, in reply to his demand for his promised fee, Aignelet merely bleats.

Among modern editions of this amusing piece may be mentioned those of E. Fournier, 1872, and of R. T. Holbrook (Classiques français du moyen âge), 1924.

Pathfinder, The, one of the 'Leatherstocking' novels of J. F. Cooper (q.v.), and a nickname of the hero, Natty Bumppo.

Patience, an alliterative poem of 500 lines, of the later 14th cent., of which the story of Jonah is the subject. It is attributed to the same author as 'The Pearl' and 'Cleanness' (qq.v.).

Patience, an opera by Gilbert and Sullivan (q.v.), produced in 1881, ridiculing the aesthetic movement (q.v.).

Patient Grisil, a comedy by Dekker (q.v.) in collaboration with Chettle and Haughton, printed in 1603.

The marquess of Saluzzo, smitten with the beauty of Grissil, the virtuous daughter of a poor basket-maker, makes her his bride. Wishing to try her patience, he subjects her to a series of humiliations and cruelties, robbing her of her children and making her believe them dead, and finally pretending to take another wife, and making her attend upon the new bride. All these trials she bears submissively. The new bride is revealed to be Grissil's daughter, and Grissil is restored to honour. The play contains the beautiful song: 'Art thou poor, yet hast thou golden slumbers, O sweet content.'

The same subject is treated in Chaucer's 'Clerkes Tale' (see Canterbury Tales). It was taken originally from the 'Decameron' (x. x).

PATMORE, COVENTRY KERSEY DIGHTON (1823-96), was an assistant in the printed book department of the British

PATRICK'S PURGATORY

Museum. He was a friend of Tennyson and Ruskin, and made the acquaintance of the Pre-Raphaelite (q.v.) group, to whose organ, 'The Germ', he contributed. In 1854 he issued 'The Betrothal'; in 1856 'The Espousals'; in 1860 'Faithful for Ever'; and in 1862 'The Victories of Love'—four poems forming part of 'The Angel in the House', a long work designed to be the apotheosis of married love. Felix courts and weds Honoria, a dean's daughter, and the poet traces the progress of a deep pure love amid the incidents of a commonplace life, giving the subject in the end a mystical turn. Patmore became a Roman Catholic in 1864. In 1877 he published 'The Unknown Eros', odes on high themes very different from the domesticity of his previous poems; and 'Amelia' in 1878. His collected poetical works were published, with an appendix on English metrical law, in 1886. Articles contributed mostly to the 'St. James's Gazette' were subsequently issued under the titles of 'Principle in Art' (1889) and 'Religio Poetae' (1893). His 'Rod, Root, and Flower', chiefly meditations on religious subjects, appeared in 1895.

Patmos, the island in the Aegean Sea, one of the Sporades, where, according to legend, St. John saw the visions of the Apocalypse.

Patrick, Sr. (373?-463?), the patron saint of Ireland, originally named Sucat, and apparently of mixed Roman and British parentage, was born probably in Ailclyde (now Dumbarton). He was captured in a raid of Picts and Scots in 389 and sold to Miluic, a chieftain of Antrim. After six years of bondage, he went to Gaul and studied under Martin of Tours. He then returned to Britain and, feeling a supernatural call to preach to the heathen Irish, landed in Wicklow in 405 (432?), proceeding thence to Strangford Lough, where he converted all the Ulstermen. He subsequently journeyed through Ireland and founded his first mission settlement near Armagh, where, according to St. Bernard, he was buried. Some 'epistles' of St. Patrick, believed to be genuine, are extant. His festival is on 17 Mar. His life has been written by J. B. Bury (1905).

Patrick's, THE DEAN OF ST., Swift (q.v.).

Patrick's Purgatory, St., a cave on an island on Lough Derg in the west of Ireland, where, according to legend, an entrance to purgatory was revealed to St. Patrick, that he might overcome the obstinacy of those whom he was trying to convert. Henry of Saltery (fl. 1150), a Cistercian of Saltrey in Huntingdonshire, who had the story from Gilbert of Louth, wrote an account of the visit of Sir Owain, a knight of King Stephen, to St. Patrick's Purgatory, undertaken by way of penance for his sins. This was translated into other languages, and pilgrimages to the cave were frequent, until it was closed in 1497 by order of the pope. Calderón (q.v.), the Spanish dramatist, has a play on this subject, translated (1853, and again 1873) by D. F. MacCarthy.

PATRICK'S PURGATORY

Patrick Spens, Sir, an early Scottish ballad. According to Andrew Lang 'it is a confused echo of the Scotch expedition which should have brought the Maid of Norway to Scotland, about 1285'. Sir Patrick's ship is wrecked off Aberdour (in Aberdeenshire) on the return journey with the king's daughter aboard. The ballad is included in Percy's 'Reliques'.

Patriot King. The Idea of a, a political treatise by Viscount Bolingbroke (q.v.), written in 1738, and published in 1749.

The institution of monarchy, the author declares, has been degraded by the spirit of tyranny, ambition, and vanity, aided by the adulation of interested men. Monarchy should be limited so far as to preserve liberty. Liberty without government becomes licence; government without liberty becomes tyranny. The role of the patriot king is to maintain the constitution. Only he can save a country whose ruin is so far advanced as that of England. He must begin to govern as soon as he begins to reign, and call into the administration such men as will serve on the same principles as he intends to follow, dismissing the adventurers previously in power. He will espouse no party, but govern like the common father of the people, aiming to subdue faction. The proper personal conduct of the patriot king is illustrated from the example of Elizabeth and of various rulers of antiquity.

This treatise is generally accounted the best, as it was practically the last, of Bolingbroke's political writings.

Patroclus, one of the Grecian warriors during the Trojan War, and the close friend of Achilles (q.v.). When the latter retired to his tent, Patroclus followed his example, until Nestor, in consequence of the many defeats of the Greeks, prevailed upon him to return to the field. To this Achilles consented, and lent Patroclus his armour. In the ensuing battle Patroclus was slain by Hector with the aid of Apollo. Achilles now left his seclusion and set about avenging the death of his friend. He slew Hector, who had increased his wrath by appearing in the armour taken from the body of Patroclus.

Patrologia, see Migne.

Patterne, SIR WILLOUGHBY, ELEANOR and ISABEL, LIEUTENANT, and CROSSJAY, characters in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Patti, ADELINA (1843-1919), a famous soprano opera-singer, born at Madrid, who first appeared at New York in 1859 and in London in 1861, and became one of the most popular singers of her time.

Pattleson, PETER, a schoolmaster, the imaginary author of the 'Tales of My Landlord' of Sir W. Scott (q.v.).

PATTISON, MARK (1813-84), educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and a fellow and tutor of Lincoln College, Oxford, was for a time an ardent follower of Newman, but when the latter entered the Roman Church, gradually separated himself from the high church party, and contributed to 'Essays and Reviews' (q.v.) a valuable paper on the 'Tendencies of Religious Thought in England, 1688 to 1750'. In 1851 he failed to be elected rector of Lincoln College, a disappointment that seems to have permanently embittered him. He threw up his tutorship in 1855 and wrote principally on educational subjects. In 1861 he became rector of Lincoln College, continuing his literary activity in a wider field. He wrote a life of Isaac Casaubon (1875), and for the English Men of Letters series a life of Milton (1879); contributed to the E.B. articles on Erasmus, More, and Grotius, and edited certain works of Milton and Pope. He also collected materials for a life of Joseph Scaliger (q.v.). He dictated in 1883 his interesting 'Memoirs' to the year 1860 (published posthumously). His collected 'Essays' appeared in 1889.

Paul Clifford, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1830. The work was written with the object of securing an improvement of English penal discipline and penal law, a cause in which Romilly, Mackintosh, and others were working. It is interesting as one of the first novels of philanthropic purpose.

Paul Clifford, whose parents are unknown, is brought up by an innkeeper among undesirable companions, is arrested for a theft of which he is guiltless, and is imprisoned among hardened criminals. Escaping, he becomes the leader of a band of highwaymen. While residing at Bath under the name of Captain Clifford, he falls in love with, and wins the affection of, Lucy Brandon, an heiress and niece of Sir William Brandon, an ambitious and hard-hearted judge. Realizing the impossibility of their marriage, he takes leave of her, hinting at the nature of the obstacle in its way. He presently rescues two of his associates who have been captured in the course of a robbery, but is himself wounded and taken prisoner. Sir William Brandon is the judge before whom he is tried. Just as Brandon is about to pronounce sentence of death on Clifford, a piece of paper reaches him intimating that the prisoner is his son, stolen from him in infancy. Brandon nevertheless pronounces sentence, but is shortly afterwards found dead in his carriage. The paper on him reveals the facts, and Clifford's sentence is commuted to transportation. Clifford escapes, with Lucy, to America, where his remaining days are devoted to philanthropic work.

Paul Emanuel, MONSIEUR, one of the principal characters in C. Brontë's 'Villette' (q.v.).

Paul et Virginie, a romance by Bernardin de St. Pierre (q.v.), published in 1787.

It is a simple tale of a boy and a girl, children of two mothers who have sought refuge from their troubles in the Ile de France (Mauritius). Brought up together far from the civilization and conventions of Europe, they fall deeply in love. Virginie is summoned to France for a few years by a rich relative and her return is awaited by Paul, with intense longing. The ship arrives, but is wrecked by a hurricane within sight of the shore, and Paul's efforts to reach it fail. Virginie is seen on the poop. A naked sailor approaches and entreats her to take off her clothes and allow herself to be saved, but she refuses and perishes—an excess of delicacy which probably appeared less singular when the book was written than it may to-day. Paul shortly after dies of grief.

Paul Ferroll, a novel by Mrs. Clive (q.v.), published in 1855.

Paul Ferroll, a man of wealth, culture, and ability, murders his wife, a woman of violent and domineering character, who by a stratagem has prevented him from marrying the woman that he loved. He escapes suspicion, but will not allow any innocent person to suffer for his crime, even though this attitude, after eighteen years of happy life with his second wife, the woman of his heart, entails his voluntary confession, the death from shock of his wife, and the ruin of his daughter.

This remarkable novel was followed by a less powerful sequel, 'Why Paul Ferroll Killed his Wife'.

Paul Pry, the title of a farce by Poole (q.v.), produced in 1825.

Paul Pry is an inquisitive, meddlesome fellow, said to be drawn from one Thomas Hill, who turned his inquisitiveness to account by writing for the press.

PAUL THE DEACON (PAULUS DIACONUS), a Lombard of the 8th cent., and at one time inmate of the Benedictine house at Monte Cassino, where he made the acquaintance of Charlemagne; one of the best chroniclers of the Dark Ages, author of the 'Historia Longobardorum' included in the 'Monumenta Germaniae Historica' (q.v.).

PAUL THE SILENTIARY (PAULUS SILENTIARIUS), one of the silentiarii or secretaries of the Emperor Justinian, was a Greek elegiac poet, author of a description of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople.

Paul's, CHILDREN OF, a company of boy actors (recently revived), recruited from the choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral, whose performances enjoyed great popularity at the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th cents. The CHILDREN OF THE CHAPEL, recruited from the choristers of the Chapel Royal, was another company enjoying popular favour at the same time. Their rivalry with men actors is alluded to in 'Hamlet', II. ii.

Paul's, St., Covent Garden, built about 1635 by Inigo Jones, and after destruction by fire in 1795 rebuilt according to the original design. It contains the burial-places of Samuel Butler (the author of 'Hudibras'),

PAUL'S LETTERS TO HIS KINSFOLK

Wycherley, Mrs. Centlivre, Dr. Arne, and Grinling Gibbons (qq.v.).

Paul's Cathedral, St., was founded early in the 7th cent. by Mellitus (or according to Bede by King Æthelbert for Mellitus), who was sent to England from Rome in 601 and consecrated bishop of London by St. Augustine in 604. Erkenwald, son of Offa, was a notable early successor (675-93) of Mellitus. Miracles were associated with him, and his shrine, says Lethaby ('London before the Conquest'), was the palladium of the city until the Reformation. The cathedral that preceded the present edifice, now spoken of as old St. Paul's, was begun in the 11th cent. after the great fire of 1087, and not finished until 1314. It had a tall wooden spire (destroyed by lightning in 1561), and Inigo Jones added an Ionic façade to it. It lost much of its sacred character. As early as the days of Bishop Braybrooke (end of the 14th cent.) we hear of its being used as a market. There are frequent references in the 16th and 17th cents. to the secular uses to which it was put. Its central aisle, known as 'Paul's Walk', is mentioned as a promenade, place of business and assignation, and an exchange of gossip. Whence the term 'Paul's man'. Thus the scene of Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour', III. i, is laid there. It was a place where servants were hired: Falstaff says of Bardolph, 'I bought him in Paul's and he'll buy me a horse in Smithfield' ('2 Henry IV', I. ii). Earle, in his 'Microcosmographie' (q.v.), gives a full account of 'Paul's Walk' (c. 52). In the course of this he says: 'The principal inhabitants and possessors are stall knights, captains out of service, men of long rapiers and breeches, which after all turn merchants here, and traffic for news.' (Cf. A. J. C. Hare, 'Walks in London', I. 111 (ed. 1894), and Milman, 'Annals of St. Paul's', pp. 284 et seq.)

Old St. Paul's was destroyed in the Fire of London (1666), and the cathedral as we know it was built by Sir C. Wren (q.v.). Besides the tombs of naval and military heroes, it contains those of Wren himself, Reynolds, and Turner, and a monument to Dr. Johnson. Among the eminent persons buried in old St. Paul's may be mentioned Sir P. Sidney, Colet, and Donne (qq.v.).

Paul's Cross, St.: 'about the midst of this churchyard (St. Paul's) is a Pulpit Crosse of timber, mounted upon steppes of stone and covered with lead, in which are sermons preached by learned Divines every Sundaye in the fornoone' (Stow). The Cross was demolished in 1643. Another cross now occupies its place.

Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk, a series of letters by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1816, describing a visit by the author to Brussels, Waterloo, and Paris a few weeks after the battle of Waterloo. The account of the battle is interesting for the details it contains, some of them obtained from Napoleon's Belgian guide.

PAUL'S MAN

Paul's Man, see Paul's Cathedral.

Paul's School, Sr., was founded in 1512 by Colet (q.v.). Lily (q.v.) was its first master. The school was removed from St. Paul's Churchyard to Hammersmith in 1884. Among its many distinguished scholars may be mentioned Milton, Samuel Pepys, and Sir Philip Francis (qq.v.).

Paul's Walk, see Paul's Cathedral.

Paulicians, a religious sect that arose in Armenia about the 7th cent., holding modified Manichaean opinions. They asserted that all matter is evil and that Christ's body was ethereal, and rejected the authority of the O.T. They probably derive their name from Paul of Samosata, patriarch of Antioch, 260-72. They spread to Europe and Syria, becoming very numerous by the time of the Crusades.

Paulina, a character in Shakespeare's 'Winter's Tale' (q.v.).

Pauline, the first published poem of R. Browning (q.v.). It appeared anonymously in 1833, when the author was only twenty, and was subsequently an object of aversion to him. It is an obscure and incoherent confession of the young poet's sentiments, largely it would seem of admiration for Shelley, made to a very shadowy Pauline.

Pauline Deschappelles, the heroine of Bulwer Lytton's 'Lady of Lyons' (q.v.).

PAUSANIAS, traveller and geographer, perhaps a native of Lydia, wrote in the reign of Marcus Aurelius his 'Periegesis' (Itinerary) of Greece, in which he describes the legends and objects of antiquity connected with the places that he visited. A very important writer, for he saw the monuments of ancient Greece before any serious destruction had taken place. The first Renaissance edition of him was printed at Venice in 1510.

Pavia, a town of N. Italy, the old capital of the Lombard kingdom; the Iron Crown (q.v.) was kept there. Under its walls was fought in 1525 the battle in which Francis I of France was defeated and captured by the army of the Emperor Charles V.

Paxarete or PAXARETTE, a Spanish wine made at an old monastery near Xeres, a rather rich sweet sherry.

Paxarett, SIR TELEGRAPH, a character in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

PAYN, JAMES (1830-98), went as a boy to Eton, Woolwich Academy (for a year), and Trinity College, Cambridge, but can hardly be said to have been educated there, for, according to Leslie Stephen's memoir, he refused to be moulded by them and developed unconventionally. He began early in life to contribute to 'Household Words' (he had a strong admiration for its editor, Dickens) and to 'Chambers's Journal', of which he became co-editor in 1858 and sole editor from 1859 to 1874. From 1883 to 1896 he was editor of the 'Cornhill Magazine'. He published a volume of 'Poems' in 1853, 'Some Private Views' in 1882, 'Some Literary Recollections' in 1884, and 'Gleams of Memory' in 1894. 'The Backwater of Life' and other essays appeared posthumously in 1899. Payn was the author of a large number of novels, including 'Lost Sir Massingberd' (1864), 'By Proxy' (1878), 'The Luck of the Darrells' (1885).

PAYNE, JOHN HOWARD (1791-1852), American actor and playwright, born in New York City, famous as author of the popular song, 'Home, Sweet Home' (q.v.).

Peace with honour: the gain that Lord Beaconsfield, in his speech of 16 July 1878, claimed to have brought back from the Congress of Berlin. The expression occurs in Shakespeare's 'Coriolanus', III. ii.

PEACHAM, HENRY (1576?-1643?), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, an author and a man of very varied talents. He published in 1606 'Graphice', a practical treatise on art, issued in many subsequent editions under the title 'The Gentleman's Exercise'. He published 'The Compleat Gentleman', the work by which he is best known, in 1622. From the last edition of this (1661) Johnson drew all the heraldic definitions in his dictionary.

Peachum, and his daughter POLLY, characters in Gay's 'Beggar's Opera' (q.v.).

PEACOCK, THOMAS LOVE (1785-1866), novelist and poet, was the son of a London merchant. He found mercantile occupation uncongenial, and for a time lived on his private means, producing some verse, and his satirical romances, 'Headlong Hall' (1816), 'Melincourt' (1817), and 'Nightmare Abbey' (1818). He entered the East India Company's service in 1819, published another satirical novel, 'Crotchet Castle', in 1831, and late in life, in 1860 or 1861, the last of these, 'Gryll Grange'.

The above works (noticed under their respective titles) are a curious mixture of satire (personal, social, and political) and romance, and are written in a piquant and attractive style. They are diversified by some capital songs. The general scheme is the same in all of them, the gathering of a miscellaneous party of odd characters in a country house, followed by diverting dialogue and absurd incidents. In Peacock's other novels, 'Maid Marian' (q.v., 1822) and 'The Misfortunes of Elphin' (q.v., 1829), the satire is veiled under a more simply romantic form. Peacock also published two or three volumes of verse, which are of less interest. Peacock married Jane Gryffyd, the 'White Snowdonian antelope' of Shelley's 'Letter to Maria Gisborne', and was the father of George Meredith's first wife. He was an intimate friend of Shelley, and his executor. His 'Memorials of Shelley' were edited by H. Brett Smith (1909). There is a life of Peacock by Carl van Doren (1911).

Pearl, an alliterative poem in twelve-lined octosyllabic stanzas, of the period 1350-80.

PEARL

The author is unknown. The two poems 'Patience' and 'Cleanness' (qq.v.) are attributed to the same author, and also 'Gawain and the Green Knight' (q.v.).

Pearl is the author's daughter, an only child, whom he has lost when she was less than two years old. Wandering disconsolate in the garden where she is buried, he has a vision of a river beyond which lies Paradise. Here he sees a maiden seated, in whom he recognizes his daughter grown to maturity. She upbraids him for his excessive grief, and explains her blessed state. He strives to join her and plunges into the river, and awakes from his trance, comforted and resigned to his lot.

Pearl Harbour, a great naval base constructed by the United States on the island of Honolulu in the Pacific, where on 7 December 1941 the Japanese, without declaration of war and while negotiations were proceeding between the two governments, made a crippling attack on the American fleet.

PEARSON, JOHN (1613-86), a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, a Royalist chaplain during the Civil War, and after the Restoration Master of Jesus College, and subsequently of Trinity College, Cambridge. He became bishop of Chester in 1673. In 1654 he preached at St. Clement's, Eastcheap, London, the series of sermons which he published in 1659 as an 'Exposition of the Creed'. This work, on which his reputation still mainly rests, has long been a standard book in English divinity. The notes of the 'Exposition'—a rich mine of patristic and general learning—are at least as remarkable as the text, and form a complete catena of the best authorities upon doctrinal points. He was probably the ablest scholar and best systematic theologian among Englishmen of the 17th cent.

Peau de Chagrin, La, the title of a novel by Balzac (q.v.). The 'peau de chagrin' (shagreen or ass's skin) has the magic property of giving its owner his every wish, but shrinks with every wish thus gratified, till it entirely disappears, and the owner dies.

Pecksniff, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.).

PECOCK, REGINALD (1395?-1460?), a Welshman by birth and bishop successively of St. Asaph and Chichester. He distinguished himself by his writings against the Lollards, notably by his 'Repressor' of over much Blaming of the Clergy' (1455), a monument of 15th-cent. English, clear and pointed, if voluminous, in style. His 'Book of Faith', also in English, was issued in 1456. In his 'Donet' he sought to find a minimum of religious belief acceptable by all, asserting that the Apostles' Creed was named after them, not drawn up by them. He alienated by his writings every section of theological opinion in England, was cited before the archbishop of Canterbury, and obliged to resign his bishopric and make public abjuration (1458). He was sent to Thorney Abbey, where he probably lived in seclusion. His 'Repressor' and 'Book of Faith' have been printed, and a collection of excerpts from his works included in Foxe's 'Commentarii Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum' (1554). His work is important from a literary standpoint for its development of the English vocabulary, and from a theological standpoint for his advocacy of converting the Lollards by argument instead of by burning them.

Peculiar People, a name applied to the Jews as God's chosen people; also to a religious sect founded in 1838 and most numerous about London, who have no preachers, creed, or church organization, and rely on prayer for the cure of disease, rejecting medical aid. [OED.]

Pecunia, LADY, an allegorical character in Jonson's 'The Staple of News' (q.v.).

Pedro, DON, the Prince of Aragon in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.).

Peebles, PETER, a character in Scott's 'Redgauntlet' (q.v.).

Peel, JOHN, the hero of the well-known hunting song, 'D'ye ken John Peel?', was born at Caldbeck, Cumberland, in 1776, and for over 40 years ran the famous pack of hounds that bore his name. He died in 1854. The words of the song were composed by his friend John Woodcock Graves. The tune is based on that of an old rant called 'Bonnie Annie', and is the regimental march of the Border Regiment. ('The Times', 19 Oct. 1929.)

PEELE, GEORGE (1558?-97?), son of a London citizen and salter, was educated at Christ's Hospital, London, and Broadgates Hall (Pembroke College) and Christ Church, Oxford. He led a dissipated life, and in 1579 was turned out of his father's dwelling, within the precincts of Christ's Hospital, by the governors of the institution. He was almost certainly a successful player as well as playwright, and his lyrics were popular in literary circles. His works, which are very numerous, fall under three heads, plays, pageants, and 'gratulatory' and miscellaneous verse. Among his plays may be mentioned 'The Arraignment of Paris' (q.v., c. 1581), 'The Battle of Alcazar' (q.v., printed in 1594), 'The Old Wives' Tale' (q.v., 1595), and 'David and Bethsabe' (q.v., 1599). Among his miscellaneous verse were 'Polyhymnia' (q.v., 1590) and 'The Honour of the Garter' (1593), a gratulatory poem to the earl of Northumberland on his being created a knight of that order. The lyrics in Peele's plays are particularly attractive.

Peelers, a nickname first given to the Irish constabulary instituted in 1814 by Sir Robert Peel, and extended to the police in England (cf. Bobby).

Peep of Day Boys, a Protestant organization in the north of Ireland (c. 1784-95), whose members visited the houses of their Roman Catholic opponents at daybreak in search of arms.

Peeping Tom, see Godiva.

Peer Gynt, a lyrical drama by Ibsen (q.v.), published in 1867. Peer Gynt was intended by the author as the embodiment of certain aspects in the character of his countrymen at the end of the romantic period, and the work is an indictment of the half-heartedness, lack of character, and egoism that Ibsen reproved.

The hero is a Norwegian peasant, indolent and dissipated, a dreamer and a braggart, though possessed of fascination and plentiful capacities for good. His good angel is the virtuous maiden, Solvejg, but effort and perseverance are required to win her, and to the difficulties involved Peer Gynt is unequal. Instead he carries off Ingrid, the destined bride of another, and becomes an outlaw. The poem presents through a multitude of episodes his gradual degradation, his association with the trolls, Solvejg's fruitless efforts to reclaim him, and the wonderful scene of the death of his mother, Aase. In the 4th and 5th acts, we see him a selfish worldling who has made a fortune dealing in negro slaves, posing as a prophet in Africa, flirting with the Arab damsel Anitra, and finally returning, an old disillusioned man, to Norway, to find the button-moulder waiting to melt him up, as waste, into raw material. But he finds redemption in the pure love of Solvejg, who has waited faithfully for him during many years.

Peerybingle, JOHN and DOT, characters in Dickens's 'The Cricket on the Hearth' (q.v.).

Peg Woffington, a novel by Reade (q.v.), published in 1853 and based on the successful play 'Masks and Faces' (1852), composed by him jointly with Tom Taylor.

It deals with an episode in the life of the famous Irish actress, Margaret Woffington (q.v.), who makes a conquest of a wealthy gentleman, Ernest Vane, not knowing him to be recently married. She cuts out the face from a portrait of herself by a poor scene-painter and substitutes her own, to fool a party of critics who have come to abuse the portrait. She then plays the same trick on Mabel Vane, with the result that she hears the young wife's touching prayer, that the actress shall not steal her husband's heart. Peg is moved by the prayer and a tear on her face reveals the deception. She effects the reconciliation of the young couple, and the story ends with her retirement to a life of piety and good deeds.

Peg-a-Ramsey, the heroine of an old song popular in Shakespeare's day. He refers to her in 'Twelfth Night', II. iii.

Pegāsus, a winged horse sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus cut off her head. By striking Mt. Helicon with his foot, Pegasus gave rise to the fountain Hippocrene. He became the favourite of the Muses, and, being tamed by Neptune or Minerva, was given to Bellerophon (q.v.) to enable him to conquer the Chimaera. Some authors have supposed that Bellerophon attempted to fly to heaven upon Pegasus, and that this act of temerity was punished by Jupiter, who sent an insect to torment Pegasus and caused the fall of the rider.

Peggotty, DANIEL, CLARA, and HAM, characters in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Pegler, MRS., in Dickens's 'Hard Times' (q.v.), Bounderby's mother.

Peirēnē, a fountain at Corinth, where Bellerophon, according to one form of his legend, is supposed to have caught the horse Pegasus (qq.v.).

Peirithōus, see Theseus and *Centaur*s.

Pelistrātus (d. 527 B.C.) became tyrant of Athens in 560 B.C., was twice expelled, but returned to power. He endowed Athens with many splendid buildings, including the temple of the Olympian Zeus, which was not completed until the days of the Emperor Hadrian. He also encouraged literature. It was probably under his auspices that dramatic contests were introduced at Athens, and he is said to have commissioned some learned men, among them the poet Onomacritus, to collect the poems of Homer.

Pelagian, derived from Pelagius, the latinized form of the name of a British monk, Morgan, of the 4th and 5th cents., whose doctrines were fiercely combated by Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, and by St. Augustine, and condemned by Pope Zosimus in 418. The Pelagians, his followers, denied the Catholic doctrine of original sin, asserting that Adam's fall did not involve his posterity, and maintained that the human will is of itself capable of good without the assistance of divine grace. They did not admit the doctrine of the eternal punishment of unbaptized infants.

Pelayo, a character in Southey's 'Roderick' (q.v.).

Pelēus, son of Aeacus, king of Phthia in Thessaly. Being guilty of some murder, he went to Iolcos, where Acastus, the king, purified him. Hippolyte, wife of Acastus, fell in love with him, but being repulsed denounced him to her husband. Acastus tried to have him killed by wild beasts on Mt. Pelion, but with the help of Cheiron (q.v.) Pelēus was able to overcome these. He courted Thetis, a Nereid (q.v.), who tried in vain to escape him by assuming various shapes. Of their union was born Achilles (q.v.). All the goddesses were invited to the nuptials, except Eris or Discord, who to avenge herself threw among the guests an apple inscribed 'To the fairest', which was claimed by Hera, Aphrodite, and Athene (see Paris).

Pelham, or The Adventures of a Gentleman, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1828.

PELHAM

This was Lytton's second novel, and is generally considered his best. Henry Pelham, a young dandy, wit, and zealous politician, falls in love with the accomplished Ellen, sister of his old friend Sir Reginald Glanville. The latter is suspected of the murder of Sir John Tirrell, against whom he has had grave cause of complaint, and the circumstantial evidence against him appears overwhelming. Glanville tells his story to Pelham and asserts his innocence. With the assistance of the disreputable Job Jonson, Pelham unearths the real murderer, Thornton, who is convicted on the testimony of a confederate. The character of Thornton was drawn from the well-known murderer, Thurtell. The story is enlivened with amusing scenes of social and political life. Thackeray made some of his best fun of Bulwer Lytton about this novel in his 'Diary of James de la Pluche'.

Pelias, a king of Iolcos, whom his daughters put to death and boiled at the instigation of Medea (q.v.), in order to restore him to youth. Alcestis (q.v.) was one of his daughters.

Pelican, The, see Golden Hind.

Pelican State: Louisiana, see United States.

Pelican's Piety, more correctly Pelican in her Piety, a heraldic term signifying a pelican represented as vulning (i.e. wounding) her breast in order to feed her young with her blood.

Pellon, a mountain in Thessaly, which the Giants (q.v.) in their war with the gods heaped on Mt. Ossa, in order to scale the heights of heaven. The spear of Achilles (q.v.) was made from a tree cut on this mountain.

Pell, SOLOMON, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers', an attorney in the Insolvent Court.

Pella, in Macedonia, the capital of the Macedonian kings and the birthplace of Alexander the Great. It stood near the modern town of Yenidje (Yanitsa), west of the lower course of the Vardar. Little trace of it remains.

Pelleas, SIR, in the Arthurian legend, the lover of Ettard or Ettarre (see below, Pelleas and Ettarre). He may, like Pelles (q.v.), have been developed from the Pwyll of British mythology. It is noteworthy that after Ettard's death he marries (Malory, iv. xxiii) the damsel of the lake, Nimue, who is thought to be identical with Rhannon, the wife of Pwyll (see Rhys, 'Arthurian Legend').

Pelleas and Ettarre, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1869.

The youth Pelleas, strong and guileless, on his way to Arthur's court to seek knighthood falls in with the vain and heartless Ettarre, and is smitten with love for her. She, thinking that Pelleas may win the prize at the forthcoming tournament, encourages his love. Pelleas wins the prize and gives it to her. Her object gained, she now becomes ungracious to him. He follows her to her castle, from which he is excluded, and day by day sits on his horse outside it. She sends her three knights to kill him, but he defeats them. Finally Gawain, the 'light-of-love', appears, and, on the pretext of furthering the suit of Pelleas, borrows his armour, claims to have killed him, and gains admission to the castle. Pelleas, distrustful, presently follows, and discovers Gawain's perfidy. Riding away distraught, he comes upon Percivale, and learns from him that not Gawain alone is faithless, but Lancelot and Guinevere, and the knights generally. He presently meets Lancelot, declares himself 'a scourge to lash the treasons of the Table Round', fights with him, and is defeated; but his life is spared, and the two knights return to the hall. Then fear falls upon the queen and her lover, and each foresees 'the dolorous day to be'. The poem closes under the shadow of impending calamity.

Pelles, KING, in Malory's 'Morte Darthur', 'cousin nigh unto Joseph of Arimathe', and intimately connected with the story of the Holy Grail. He was father of Elaine, who becomes the mother of Galahad by Sir Lancelot. He is thought by Prof. Rhys ('Arthurian Legend') to have had his origin in the Pwyll of British mythology (see Mabinogion and Pelleas).

Pellinore, KING, in Malory's 'Morte Darthur', the father of Sir Lamorak, Sir Percival, and Sir Tor.

Peloponnesian War, THE, between Athens and Sparta and their respective allies, 431-404 B.C. It ended in the surrender of Athens and the brief transfer of the leadership of Greece to Sparta.

Pelops, the son of Tantalus (q.v.) and founder of the Pelopid dynasty from which the Peloponnesians took its name. According to legend his father, having invited the gods to a repast, killed his son and set the flesh before them to eat. But they knew what it was and ordered Hermes to restore Pelops to life. Demeter, however, distracted by grief for the loss of Persephone, had consumed the shoulder, and its place was supplied by one made of ivory. Pelops won Hippodamia, daughter of King Oenomaus, for his wife by defeating her father in a chariot race. To effect this he bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, and subsequently threw him into the sea when he claimed his reward. This murder was the origin of the curse that fell upon the house of Pelops. By Hippodamia Pelops was father of Atreus (q.v.) and Thyestes.

Pelörus, the north-east point of Sicily, Capo del Faro.

Pembroke, MARY HERBERT, COUNTESS OF (1561-1621), Sir Philip Sidney's sister. She is referred to as 'Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother' in her epitaph by W. Browne (q.v.). She suggested the composition of her brother's 'Arcadia' (q.v.), which she revised and added to. She was a patron of Samuel Daniel, Nicholas Breton, Jonson, and other poets.

Pendennis, The History of, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published serially in 1848-50.

Arthur is the son of John Pendennis, a gentleman of old family, formerly an apothecary and surgeon, and Helen his wife, a woman of saintly character. Leaving school at 16 on the death of his father, Arthur falls in love with an actress, Emily Costigan (Miss Fotheringay), the daughter of Captain Costigan, a wild tipsy Irishman, who persuades himself that Arthur is the heir to a fine estate, and when undeceived by Major Pendennis, Arthur's tactful uncle, is very angry and breaks off the engagement. Arthur, a frank but selfish and conceited young fellow, goes to the university, where he is idle and extravagant, and involves himself and his mother in financial difficulties from which they are rescued by Laura Bell, an amiable girl, the daughter of a former unfortunate lover of Helen, whom she has adopted. Laura also enables Arthur to start on a literary career in London. Here he shares chambers with George Warrington (a descendant of the Warringtons of 'The Virginians', q.v.), a fine character, one of the good influences in Arthur's life. Helen's hope is that Arthur shall marry Laura, but their relations are those of affectionate brother and sister, and when Arthur in deference to his mother's wish proposes half-heartedly to Laura, not concealing his motive for doing so, she indignantly refuses him. Arthur's second entanglement is with Blanche Amory, daughter of Lady Clavering by her first husband. Blanche, though outwardly pretty and accomplished, is in reality a selfish little shrew. Old Major Pendennis, Arthur's uncle, is so actuated by worldly ambition on his nephew's behalf as to lose all sense of rectitude, and strongly favours the match, although aware that Blanche's father, an escaped convict, is, unknown to Lady Clavering, still alive. The story is much concerned with the doings of this convict, who masquerades as Col. Altamont, and blackmails Sir Francis Clavering, a despicable creature.

After a flirtation with Fanny Bolton, the porter's daughter of Shepherd's Inn, and a period during which Laura is in love with Warrington (who in fact has had his life ruined by an imprudent early marriage), Laura and Arthur are finally united. But this occurs only after the latter has narrowly escaped from marriage with Blanche Amory. For, under the influence of his uncle's advice and his own cynicism, he accepts a loveless match with her for the sake of the wealth and position it promises. At this point comes the exposure of the whole affair of Blanche's convict father. Arthur feels it his duty to be faithful to Blanche in her troubles and goes to tell her so, but finds himself supplanted by his friend Harry Foker, who has just inherited the great fortune of his father, proprietor of 'Foker's Entire'.

PENN

Among the many amusing characters in the story may be mentioned Captain Shandon, the first editor of the 'Pall Mall Gazette', of which he drafts the prospectus in the Fleet; the rival publishers Bungay and Bacon; the jovial adventurer Capt. Strong, Clavering's factotum; the vulgar but amiable 'Begum', Lady Clavering; and Morgan, the Major's blackmailing servant.

Pendragon, a title given to an ancient British or Welsh chief holding or claiming supreme power. In English chiefly known as the title of Uther Pendragon, father of Arthur. The word means 'chief dragon', the dragon being the war standard.

Pendrell or PENDEREL, the name of the five brothers, tenants on the demesnes of Boscobel (q.v.) and White Ladies, who helped to conceal Charles II after the battle of Worcester (1651). By patent dated 24 July 1676, certain fee farm rents were settled on them and their heirs for ever, with benefit of survivorship to the others on failure of heirs of any one of the beneficiaries. ('Boscobel Tracts', edited by J. Hughes.) It was recently stated ('The Times', 26 Nov. 1931) that 'the Penderell Pension is now drawn by Mr. George Penderell, of Brooklyn, U.S.A., a retired laundryman.

Penēlopē, daughter of Icarius, wife of Ulysses, and mother of Telemachus. When, at the close of the Trojan War, her husband did not return to Ithaca, and she received no news of him, she was beset by importunate suitors. She received their addresses coldly; but, being without power to get rid of them, she flattered them with hopes and declared that she would make choice of one of them when she had completed the piece of tapestry on which she was engaged. To prolong the period she undid at night the work that she had done during the day, whence the proverb of Penelope's web for a labour that is never ended. The return of Ulysses after twenty years delivered her from the suitors.

Penelophon, the name of the beggar maid loved by King Cophetua, in the ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques'. Shakespeare ('Love's Labour's Lost', IV. i) gives it as 'Zenelophon'.

Penfeather, LADY PENELOPE, a character in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.).

Penia, poverty; according to Motteux's translation of Rabelais, IV. lvii, the mother of 'the ninety-nine Muses'.

PENN, WILLIAM (1644-1718), a Quaker and the founder of Pennsylvania, son of Sir William Penn, the admiral. He was committed to the Tower of London in 1668 for publishing his once celebrated 'The Sandy Foundation Shaken' (an attack on the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity, the Anselmian theory of the atonement, and the Calvinistic theory of justification), and there wrote 'No Cross, no Crown' (1669), an eloquent and learned dissertation on the Christian duty of self-sacrifice. He suffered frequent persecutions and imprisonments, and turned his thoughts to America as a refuge for his co-religionists. In 1682 he obtained grants of East New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and framed, in concert with Algernon Sydney, a constitution for the colony, by which religious toleration was secured. In the same year he sailed for America. He returned to England in 1684, hoping much from the accession of James II, whom he believed to be a sincere advocate of toleration. Penn obtained in 1693 a formal expression of William III's goodwill towards him, and was in Pennsylvania again, 1699-1701, but spent the remaining years of his life in England. His 'Some Fruits of Solitude', a collection of aphorisms praised by R. L. Stevenson, was published anonymously in 1693.

PENNANT, THOMAS (1726-98), naturalist, antiquarian, and traveller, published his 'Tour in Scotland' in 1771, 'A Tour in Wales' in 1778-81, 'A Tour in Scotland and Voyage to the Hebrides' in 1774-6, and 'The Journey from Chester to London' in 1782. He also wrote 'British Zoology' (1768-70), and a 'History of Quadrupeds' (1781), which long remained classical works. He figures in Gilbert White's 'Selborne' as one of the author's correspondents.

Penseroso, II, a poem by Milton (q.v.), written at Horton in 1632 with its companion piece 'L'Allegro' (q.v.).

The title suggests, as Dean Church pointed out, that Milton at this time had not attained full proficiency in the Italian tongue; the word, which is intended to mean 'contemplative', should be 'pensieroso'. The poem is an invocation to the goddess Melancholy, bidding her bring Peace and Quiet, and Leisure and Contemplation. It describes the pleasures of the studious, meditative life, of tragedy, epic poetry, and music.

Pentameron, The, one of the longer prose works of Landor (q.v.), published in 1837. 'The Pentameron' is an expression of Landor's enthusiastic admiration of Boccaccio (q.v.), and was written at the Villa Gherardesca, at Fiesole, near Florence, where Boccaccio had in part laid the scene of his 'Decameron'.

It consists of imaginary conversations between Petrarch and Boccaccio, the latter lying ill at his villa near Certaldo, and Petrarch being supposed to visit him on five successive days (whence the name of the work). They discourse mainly of Dante's 'Divina Commedia', but also of other matters. In particular Petrarch reproves Boccaccio for the licentious character of some of his tales. Whatever may be thought of the criticisms of Dante that the author puts into the mouth of the interlocutors, there can be nothing but praise for the form of the dialogue, the pleasant picture of the two old friends, the humorous scene of the dignified canonico struggling to saddle his palfrey, the little maid Assuntina, and Ser Biagio, the village priest.

Pentameter, in Greek and Latin prosody, a form of dactylic verse of which each half consists of two feet and a long syllable. In English literature, a line of verse of five feet, e.g. the English 'heroic' or iambic verse of ten syllables, as used for instance in 'Paradise Lost', or in the rhymed couplets of Dryden (an exception to the rule given under Metre, q.v.).

Pentapollin, see Alifanfaron.

Pentateuch, THE (Greek πέντε five, τεύχος implement or vessel), the first five books of the Old Testament (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy) taken together as a connected group, and traditionally ascribed to Moses.

Pentecost, from the Greek word meaning fiftieth [day], a name for the Jewish harvest festival observed on the fiftieth day of the Omer, i.e. at the conclusion of seven weeks from the offering of the wave-sheaf, on the second day of Passover (q.v.). Also a festival of the Christian Church, observed on the seventh Sunday after Easter, Whit-Sunday, in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples on the day of Pentecost.

Pentheia, a character in Ford's 'The Broken Heart' (q.v.).

Penthésilëa, a daughter of Ares and queen of the Amazons. She came to the aid of the Trojans after the death of Hector, and was slain by Achilles, who, moved by her youth and beauty, mourned over her. Thersites (q.v.) mocked at the grief of Achilles and was thereupon slain by him.

Penthëus, a king of Thebes, who resisted the introduction of the worship of Dionysus into his kingdom. He was driven mad by the god, his palace destroyed, and himself torn to pieces by the Bacchanals, among whom were his mother and two sisters.

Pentonville, the name applied originally to the houses built about 1773 on the land in Clerkenwell of one Henry Penton (d. 1812). The Pentonville Prison, in Caledonian Road, Islington, is at some distance from Pentonville. It was built in 1840-2 as part of the scheme for abolishing the system of transportation.

PEPYS, SAMUEL (1633-1703) (pron. Peeps or Pēpys), son of John Pepys, a London tailor, was educated at St. Paul's School, London, and at Trinity Hall and Magdalene College, Cambridge. In 1655, when 22, he married Elizabeth St. Michel, a girl of 15, the daughter of a French father and English mother. He entered the household of Sir Edward Montagu (afterwards first earl of Sandwich), his father's first cousin, in 1656; and his subsequent successful career was largely due to Montagu's patronage. His famous 'Diary' opens on 1 Jan. 1660, when Pepys was living in Axe Yard, Westminster, and was very poor. Soon after this he was appointed 'clerk of the King's ships' and clerk of the privy seal, with a salary of £350 (supplemented by fees). In 1665 he became surveyor-general of the victualling office, in which capacity he showed himself an energetic official and a zealous reformer of abuses. Owing to failing eyesight he closed his diary on 31 May 1669, and in the same year his wife died. In 1672 he was appointed secretary to the Admiralty. He was committed to the Tower on a charge of complicity in the 'Popish Plot' in 1679 and deprived of his office, but was soon set free. In 1683 he was sent to Tangier with Lord Dartmouth and wrote an interesting diary while there. In 1684 he was reappointed secretary to the Admiralty, a post which he held until the revolution, labouring hard to provide the country with an efficient fleet. At the revolution he was deprived of his appointment and afterwards lived in retirement, principally at Clapham. His 'Diary' remained in cipher (a system of shorthand) at Magdalene College, Cambridge, until 1825, when it was deciphered by John Smith and edited by Lord Braybrooke. An enlarged edition by Mynors Bright appeared in 1875-9, and the whole, except a few passages, was published by Henry B. Wheatley in 1893-6. It is a document of extraordinary interest, on account both of the light that its sincere narrative throws on the author's own lovable character, and of the vivid picture that it gives of contemporary everyday life, of the administration of the navy, and of the ways of the court. Pepys's 'Memoirs of the Navy, 1690' were edited by J. R. Tanner, 1906, who also published 'Mr. Pepys: an Introduction to the Diary' in 1925.

Perceforest, a vast French prose romance of the 14th cent., in which the author seeks to link the legends of Alexander and Arthur. Alexander, after the conquest of India, is driven by a storm on the coast of England, and makes one of his followers (called Perceforest because he has killed a magician in an impenetrable forest) king of the land. Under the latter's grandson the Grail (q.v.) is brought to England.

Perceval. The legend of Perceval, of great antiquity as a folk-tale, is first found in poetical form in the French 'Perceval' of Chrétien de Troyes (q.v.) and in the German 'Parzival' of Wolfram von Eschenbach (q.v.). In English it was treated in 'Sir Percival of Gales' and by Malory. The former, a 15th-cent. verse romance, is a narrative of the childhood of Perceval and the adventures that led to his being knighted by King Arthur; it contains no mention of the Holy Grail. Malory's 'Morte Darthur' makes Percivale a son of King Pellinore, and narrates his adventures in the course of his quest of the Grail (q.v.), and his final admission, with Galahad and Bors, to its presence. He may be identified with the Peredur of Welsh mythology, the hero of the tale of 'Peredur, Son of Evrawc' in Lady C. Guest's 'Mabinogion' (q.v.), an early form of the Grail story.

PERCY, THOMAS (1729-1811), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, became bishop of Dromore in 1782. He published in 1765 his 'Reliques of Ancient English Poetry' (see Percy's Reliques). This work did much to promote the revival of interest in the older English poetry. In 1763, stimulated by the success of the Ossianic publications, Percy issued 'Five Pieces of Runic Poetry', from the Icelandic, including the 'Incantation of Hervor' and the 'Death-Song of Ragnar Lodbrog'.

Percy, a tragedy by H. More (q.v.).

Percy Folio, THE, a manuscript in mid-17th-cent. handwriting, which belonged to Humphrey Pitt of Shifnal, the most important source of our ballad literature and the basis of Child's collection. From it T. Percy (q.v.) drew the ballads included in Percy's 'Reliques' (q.v.). It also contains the 14th-cent. alliterative allegorical poem 'Death and Liffe' (modelled on 'Piers the Plowman') and 'Scottish Feilde' (mainly on the battle of Flodden). The Percy Folio was printed in its entirety by Hales and Furnivall in 1867-8. It is now in the British Museum.

Percy Society, THE, was founded in 1840 by Thomas Wright, Thomas Crofton Croker, Alexander Dyce, J. O. Halliwell(-Phillips), and John Payne Collier, for the purpose of publishing old English lyrics and ballads. It was so named in honour of T. Percy (q.v.).

Percy's 'Reliques' of Ancient English Poetry, a collection of ballads, sonnets, historical songs, and metrical romances, published in 1765 by T. Percy (q.v.). The majority of them were extracted from the Percy Folio (q.v.) and were edited and 'restored' by Percy. They were of very different periods, some of great antiquity, others as recent as the reign of Charles I. Ancient poems drawn from other sources and a few of more modern date were added by the editor. The editions of 1767, 1775, and 1794 each contained new matter.

Perdiccas, a favourite general of Alexander the Great, who received the ring of Alexander from the hand of the dying monarch. On this he based his claim to succeed him; but his ambitious schemes were opposed by Antipater, Antigonus, and Ptolemy. He was murdered while attacking Egypt.

Perdita, a character in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.). 'Perdita' was a name given to the actress Mary Robinson (1758-1800), who took the part. She attracted the attention of the Prince of Wales (afterwards George IV) and became his mistress for a short time.

PÈRE GORIOT

Père Goriot, Le, the title of one of the greatest of Balzac's (q.v.) novels.

Père la Chaise, the most important cemetery of Paris, named after the Jesuit confessor of Louis XIV, who figures in one of Landor's 'Imaginary Conversations' (q.v.). The cemetery was established on the site of a house belonging to his order, where he frequently resided.

Peredur, the Welsh name of one of the chief heroes of Arthur's court, and the subject of the tale of 'Peredur, Son of Evrawc' in Lady C. Guest's 'Mabinogion' (q.v.), where he is identifiable with the Perceval of the Grail legend.

Peregrine Pickle, The Adventures of, a novel by Smollett (q.v.), published in 1751.

The hero is a scoundrel and a swash-buckler, with little to his credit except wit and courage; and the book is mainly occupied with his adventures in England and on the Continent, many of them of an amatory character. In the course of these he visits Paris, fights a duel with a mousquetaire, is imprisoned in the Bastille, visits the Netherlands, hoaxes the physicians of Bath, sets up as a magician, endeavours to enter parliament, is confined in the Fleet and released on inheriting his father's property, finally marrying Emily Gauntlet, a young lady whom he has, from the outset of the story, intermittently pursued with his attentions (even attempting to achieve his ends by drugging her).

The principal attraction of the work lies in the amusing characters that it includes: Peregrine's father, the phlegmatic Gamaliel, and his aunt Grizzle; and chief of all, the old sea-dog Commodore Hawser Trunnion, the ferocity of whose language is equalled only by the kindness of his heart. His house is called 'the garrison', and is run like a fortress, with the assistance of Lieut. Hatchway, 'a very brave man and a great joker', who has had one leg shot away; and the boatswain, Tom Pipes, who becomes the devoted companion of Peregrine Pickle on his foreign travels. A famous episode in the story is the ridiculous dinner in the manner of the ancients; and the last part of the book contains much satire on the social, literary, and political conditions of the day. The course of the narrative is interrupted by the long and offensive 'Memoirs of a Lady of Quality' (contributed by Viscountess Vane, 1713-88, a woman notorious for gambling and profligacy).

Perfectibilism, the doctrine that man, individual and social, is capable of progressing indefinitely towards physical, mental, and moral perfection. Mr. Foster in Peacock's 'Headlong Hall' (q.v.) was a 'perfectibilian'.

Perfectionists, see Oncida Community.

Peri, in Persian mythology, one of a class of superhuman beings, originally represented as of malevolent character, but subsequently as good genii or fairies, endowed with grace and beauty. According to the Koran, they were under the sway of Eblis, and Mohammed undertook their conversion. For 'Paradise and the Peri' see Lalla Rookh.

Periander, son of Cypselus and tyrant of Corinth (c. 625-c. 585 B.C.). The first years of his rule were mild and popular until he consulted Thrasylus, the tyrant of Miletus, as to the best means of securing himself on the throne. The latter returned no answer to the messenger, but walked about a field of corn, plucking the ears that seemed to tower above the rest. Periander understood what was signified and put to death the richest and most powerful citizens of Corinth. (Cf. the story of Tarquinius Superbus, under Tarquins.) Though cruel, Periander was a patron of learning and the arts (see Arion).

Pericles, the great Athenian statesman and military commander, who controlled the affairs of the State from 460 B.C. until his death in 429 B.C., including the earlier period of the Peloponnesian War. During his administration Athens reached the summit of her power, and the Parthenon and Propylaea were built. See also Aspasia, Pericles and Aspasia, and Funeral Oration.

Pericles, MR., a character in Meredith's 'Sandra Belloni' and 'Vittoria' (qq.v.).

Pericles, Prince of Tyre, a romantic drama by Shakespeare (q.v.), produced probably about 1608, and first printed (in a mangled form) in 1609, and in the third folio of 1664. Internal evidence suggests that the play was not written entirely by Shakespeare. The story is drawn from the 'Apollonius of Tyre' in Gower's 'Confessio Amantis' (q.v.). Gower himself appears as Chorus.

Pericles, prince of Tyre, having guessed the secret infamy of Antiochus, emperor of Greece, and his life being threatened in consequence, leaves his government in the hands of his honest minister, Helicanus, and sails from Tyre. His ship is wrecked on the coast of Pentapolis, Pericles alone being saved. Here he defeats in the lists the other suitors for the hand of Thaisa, daughter of King Simonides, whom he weds. Shortly after, Helicanus makes known to him that Antiochus is dead and the people are clamouring to make him (Helicanus) king. Pericles and Thaisa set off for Tyre, but, a storm arising, Thaisa falls in travail with fear, and gives birth to a daughter. A deep swoon gives the impression that Thaisa is dead, and she is committed to the waves in a chest. The chest is cast ashore near Ephesus, where Cerimon, a physician, opens it and restores Thaisa to life. She, thinking her husband drowned, becomes a priestess in the temple of Diana. Pericles carries his daughter Marina to Tarsus, where he leaves her with Cleon, the governor, and his wife, Dionyza. When the child grows up, Dionyza, jealous of her superior accomplishments, designs to kill her; but Marina is carried off by pirates and sold in Mitylene into a brothel, where her purity and piety win the admiration of Lysimachus, the governor of Mitylene, and the respect of even the brothel-keeper's brutal servant, and secure her release. Pericles, mourning the supposed death of his daughter, comes to Mitylene, where he discovers her, to his intense joy. A dream directs him to go to the temple of Diana at Ephesus and there recount the story of his life. This he does, with the result that the priestess Thaisa, his lost wife, recognizes him, and is reunited to her husband and daughter. Marina is married to Lysimachus. Cleon and Dionysa are burnt as a penalty for their intended crime.

Pericles and Aspasia, one of the longer prose works of Landor (q.v.), published in 1836.

It consists of imaginary letters relating to the period of the union of Pericles and Aspasia (q.v.). The majority of them are from Aspasia to the friend Cleone whom she has left at Miletus, and Cleone's replies. Others are addressed by Pericles to Aspasia, or by her to him; while others again are from or to noted personages of the time, such as Anaxagoras and Alcibiades. They include discussions of artistic, literary, religious, philosophical, and political subjects, and contain passages of great beauty. The letters terminate with the death of Pericles.

Perignon, DOM PIERRE (1638-1715), often spoken of as the inventor of sparkling Champagne wine. He was procurator of the Benedictine monastery near Épernay, and was charged with the care of its vines. He was a man of very delicate palate, and greatly improved the taste and sparkling quality of the wine by attention to its manufacture.

Perker, MR., in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Mr. Pickwick's attorney.

Perkin Warbeck, an historical play by J. Ford (q.v.), published in 1634.

The play deals with the arrival of Warbeck at the court of King James IV of Scotland, and his marriage at the king's instance and against her father's wish to Lady Katherine Gordon; the treason of Sir William Stanley and his execution; the expedition of James IV with Warbeck into England; the desertion of Warbeck's cause by James; Warbeck's landing in Cornwall, his defeat, capture, and execution. The portrait of Warbeck is a sympathetic one, and the devotion of Lady

PERSEUS

Katherine to him is touchingly drawn. The play is entirely unlike Ford's other work, and is a good historical drama.

For the facts and dates of Perkin Warbeck's history, see Warbeck.

PERRAULT, CHARLES (1628-1703), a French poet, critic, and member of the Academy, chiefly known in England for the fairy tales published by him under the title 'Histoires ou Contes du Temps Passé' (1697) with the legend on the frontispiece, 'Contes de Ma Mère l'Oye' ('Mother Goose's Tales'). They were translated into English by Robert Samber (1729?), and were doubtless French popular tales collected from various sources. Andrew Lang, in his 'Perrault's Popular Tales' (1888), discusses their origins and analogies in the fables current in different times and among different peoples. The tales are the following: La Belle au bois dormant ('Sleeping Beauty', q.v.), Le Petit Chaperon rouge ('Red Riding Hood', q.v.), La Barbe bleue ('Blue Beard', q.v.), Le Maître Chat, ou le Chat botté ('Puss in Boots', q.v.), Les Fées ('The Fairy'), Cendrillon ou la petite pantoufle de verre ('Cinderella', q.v.), Riquet à la houppe ('Riquet with the Tuft', q.v.), Petit Poucet ('Hop o' My Thumb, Little Thumb', q.v.).

To each story is attached a moral; though, as Lang points out, it is not very obvious in the story of the success of that 'unscrupulous adventurer', Puss in Boots.

Perseus, the son of Zeus and Danae. His early story will be found under Danae. Polydectes, having received the mother and child, became enamoured of Danae. Wishing to get rid of Perseus, Polydectes sent him to fetch the head of the Medusa (q.v.), thinking that he would be destroyed. But the gods favoured Perseus. Pluto lent him a helmet that would make him invisible, Athene a buckler resplendent as a mirror (so that he did not need to look directly at the Medusa), and Hermes the talaria or wings for the feet. He was thus enabled to escape the eyes of the Gorgons (which turned what they gazed on to stone) and cut off the Medusa's head. Continuing his flight, he came to the palace of Atlas (q.v.), who received him inhospitably. Thereupon Perseus showed him the Medusa's head, and Atlas was changed into a mountain. In his further course, Perseus discovered Andromeda (q.v.) exposed on a rock to a dragon that was about to devour her. Having obtained from Cepheus, her father, the promise of her hand, Perseus slew the dragon. But Phineus, another suitor, attempted to carry away the bride, and, with his attendants, was changed into stones by the Medusa's head. Perseus then returned to Seriphos, just in time to save Danae from the violence of Polydectes, whom he likewise destroyed. Perseus now placed the Medusa's head on the aegis of Athene, where it is usually represented, and embarked to return to his native country. At Larissa he took part in some funeral games that were proceeding, and when throwing the quoit, had the misfortune to kill a man in the throng, who turned out to be Acrisius, his grandfather, thus fulfilling the prophecy concerning Danae's son. He refused to ascend the throne of Argos to which he became heir by this calamity, but exchanged this kingdom for another and founded the new city of Mycenae, or withdrew to Asia, where his son Perseus became king of the Persians, supposed to be named after him.

PERSIUS (AULUS PERSIUS FLAC-CUS) (A.D. 34-62), Roman satirist, author of six satires, which show the influence of Horace and of the Stoic philosophy.

Persuasion, a novel by Jane Austen (q.v.), finished in 1816 and published in 1818.

Sir Walter Elliot, a foolish spendthrift baronet and a widower, with an overweening sense of his social importance and personal elegance, is obliged to retrench, and lets his seat, Kellynch Hall, to Admiral and Mrs. Croft. His eldest daughter Elizabeth, haughty and unmarried, is now 29; the second, Anne, pretty, intelligent, and of an amiable disposition, had some years before been engaged to a young naval officer, Frederick Wentworth, the brother of Mrs. Croft, but had been persuaded by her trusted friend, Lady Russell, to break off the engagement on the ground of his lack of fortune and from a misunderstanding of his sanguine temper. The breach had produced deep unhappiness in Anne and intense indignation in Wentworth. Anne is now 27 and the bloom of her beauty gone. The youngest daughter of Sir Walter, Mary, is married to Charles Musgrove, the heir of a neighbouring landed proprietor. Capt. Wentworth, who has had a successful career and is become rich, is now thrown again into Anne's society by the letting of Kellynch to the Crofts; and the story is concerned with the gradual revival of Wentworth's passion for Anne. The course of the reconciliation is, however, hindered by various impediments. Charles Musgrove has two sisters, Louisa and Henrietta. Wentworth at first is attracted by them both, and presently becomes entangled with Louisa, though no explicit declaration passes. A crisis arrives during a visit of the party to Lyme Regis, when Louisa, being 'jumped down' from the Cobb by Capt. Wentworth, falls to the ground and is dangerously injured. Wentworth's partial responsibility for the accident makes him feel an increased obligation to Louisa at the very time that his heart is being drawn back to Anne. Fortunately, during her convalescence and Wentworth's absence, Louisa becomes engaged to Capt. Benwick, a brother naval officer of Wentworth's, and the latter is free to proceed with his courtship. He goes accordingly to Bath, where Sir Walter is now established with his two elder daughters and Elizabeth's companion, Mrs. Clay, an artful woman with matrimonial designs on Sir Walter. But at Bath Wentworth finds the field occupied by another suitor for Anne's hand, in her cousin William Elliot, the heir presumptive to the Kellynch estate, who is paying assiduous attention to Anne and at the same time carrying on an intrigue with Mrs. Clay, so as to detach her from Sir Walter. Anne, however, becomes awakened to the duplicity and cunning of Mr. Elliot, and indeed her affection for Wentworth has remained unshaken. Being accidentally made aware of Anne's constancy, Wentworth takes courage to renew his offer of marriage and is accepted.

PETER BELL

In this, Miss Austen's last work, satire and ridicule take a milder form, the tone is graver and tenderer, and the interest lies in a more subtle interplay of the characters: indeed, it is a matter of tradition that a love-story of her own life is reflected in Anne Elliot's.

Pertelote, the hen in Chaucer's 'Nun's Priest's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales); also the wife of Chanticleer in Reynard the Fox (q.v.). The word in Old French was a female proper name. Its later equivalent, used as the proper name of a hen, is Partlet.

Perugino, PIETRO VANNUCCI (1446-1524), called IL PERUGINO because of his residence in Perugia, a famous Italian painter, and the master of Raphael.

Pervigillum Veneris, the name of a short Latin poem by an unknown author, perhaps of the 2nd cent. A.D. It is a hymn to love and springtime, with the refrain, 'Cras amet qui nunquam amavit, quique amavit cras amet'.

Pet Marjorie, see Fleming.

Pétaud, KING, the king formerly elected by the community of beggars in France, so named facetiously from the Latin peto, I beg. His authority over his subjects was slight, and the 'court of King Pétaud' is proverbial for an assembly where every one wishes to command or speak at once.

Peter ad Vincula, ST., see Tower of London.

Peter Bell, a poem by Wordsworth (q.v.), published in 1819 with dedication to Southey, but written long before at Alfoxden, in 1798, the year of the 'Lyrical Ballads'.

Peter Bell is a potter, a lawless man insensible to the beauties of nature. Coming to the edge of the Swale, he espies a solitary ass and thinks to steal it. The ass is gazing into the water at something, which turns out to be the dead body of its owner. Peter mounts the ass to seek the cottage of the drowned man and tell his widow. His spiritual experiences on this ride make him a reformed man.

The ludicrous character of parts of the poem diverted attention from its merits, and it was received with much hilarity and made the subject of many parodies (among others one by Shelley). A stanza that occurred in the first two editions but was subsequently suppressed was the following (Peter Bell is staring at the object floating in the river):

Is it a party in a parlour?
Cramm'd just as they on earth are cramm'd—
Some sipping punch, some sipping tea,
But as you by their faces see,
All silent and all damn'd!

PETER LOMBARD (c. 1100–c. 1160), Magister Sententiarum, or master of the sentences, born of an obscure family at Novara, and educated at Bologna. He came to France and became professor of theology, and subsequently in 1159 bishop of Paris. He wrote his 'Sententiae' between 1145 and 1150. They are a collection of opinions of the Fathers, dealing with God, the creature, redemption, and (their most important feature) the nature of the sacraments. The work was very popular and became a theological text-book. It was the subject of many commentaries both abroad and in England.

Peter Martyr, PIETRO VERMIGLI (1500–62), born in Florence, an Augustinian monk, who accepted the Reformed faith, fled from Italy in 1542 to Switzerland, and subsequently to England, and became Regius professor of divinity at Oxford (1548). He helped Cranmer in the preparation of the second Prayer Book. In 1553 he escaped to Strasburg and died at Zürich. His wife is buried in Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford.

PETER MARTYR of Anghiera in the state of Milan (fl. 1510), the author of a history of the early Spanish explorations, entitled 'De Orbe Novo', of which the first 'Decade' appeared in 1511. The work was translated into English by Richard Eden ('The Decades of the Newe Worlde or West India', 1555) and re-edited by Hakluyt in 1587. It helped to stimulate the Elizabethan explorers and contributed to their knowledge of the science of navigation.

Peter Pan, or the Boy who wouldn't grow up, a dramatic fantasy by Barrie (q.v.), produced in 1904. The story of the play was published in 1911 under the title 'Peter and Wendy'.

It is a story of the three children of Mr. and Mrs. Darling, Wendy, John, and Michael, the nurse Nana (who is a Newfoundland dog), and the motherless Peter Pan, who, with the fairy Tinker Bell, takes the children off to Never-Never Land, where they encounter

Peter Simple, a novel by Marryat (q.v.), published in 1834, generally considered his masterpiece.

The hero is sent to sea as the 'fool of the family', and his simplicity at first exposes him to several ludicrous adventures. But he soon shows himself a gallant and capable officer, sees many exciting naval actions, is taken prisoner and escapes, rises in the service, and wins a charming wife. Of the many entertaining characters in the book, the best is Chucks the boatswain, who aspires to be a gentleman and emerges in the end as the Danish Count Shucksen; he begins his reproofs with an elegant courtesy, but winds them up with a volley of expletives. Mention may also be made of Swinburne, the quartermaster; Terence O'Brien, the plucky and very human Irishman; Capt. Kearney, the incorrigible liar; and that fine seaman, Capt. Savage.

Peter the Great (1672–1725) became Tsar jointly with his half-brother Ivan in 1682. He was colossal in stature, a heavy drinker, magnanimous but capable of barbarous cruelty, deeply interested in science, fond of manual labour, especially ship-building. He founded St. Petersburg, created the Russian fleet, and modernized Russia. He acquired Esthonia and Livonia from Charles XII of Sweden, whom he utterly defeated at Pultowa (1709). He visited England in 1698.

Peter the Hermit, PETER OF AMIENS (c. 1050–1115), a gentleman of Picardy, who first followed the career of arms and then became a monk. He preached the first crusade, and led a multitude of followers into Asia Minor (1096). Nearly all these died or were killed by the Turkish garrison of Nicaea before the real 'Crusaders' arrived. Peter, however, survived and accompanied these Crusaders eastwards in 1097. He was certainly present at the siege and counter-siege of Antioch in 1098, but there were other 'holy men' called Peter among the Crusaders, and his later history is uncertain.

Peter Wilkins, The Life and Adventures of, a romance by Paltock (q.v.), published in 1751.

This is a tale after the manner of 'Robinson Crusoe', but not written with the convincing touch of Defoe. Wilkins is shipwrecked in the Antarctic region and reaches a land inhabited by a strange winged race of 'glums' and 'gawries', enveloped in an outer silk-like skin which can be spread and enables them to fly. One of these, the beautiful Youwarkee, falls by accident outside his hut. He takes her up, tends her, and marries her, and presently becomes a person of importance in the kingdom.

Southey's 'Glendoveers' in his 'Curse of Kehama' (q.v.) were suggested by the 'Gawries'.

Peter's, Sr., Eaton Square, a church built in 1824-6, frequently mentioned in connexion with fashionable ceremonies.

Peter's, St., Rome, the metropolitan church of the Roman see, near the site of the old basilica of St. Peter and the traditional place of crucifixion of the saint. The erection of the present church was begun by Pope Julius II in 1506 from designs by Bramante (d. 1514). It involved the demolition of the old basilica, the most venerable church in Christendom, adorned with splendid mosaics and interesting monuments, an object of pilgrimage from all parts of Europe. The work of construction was carried on by Michelangelo from 1547 until his death in 1563, under Paul III and Julius III. Michelangelo's modifications of Bramante's plans were subsequently much altered, but the dome, which is the work of Giacomo della Porta, in the main carries out the idea of Michelangelo. The church was dedicated in 1626, the colonnade leading to it being added in 1667 by Bernini.

Peter's Pence, an annual tax or tribute of a penny from each householder having land of a certain value, paid before the Reformation to the papal see at Rome. It is traditionally ascribed to Offa (see Mancus) and was called in Anglo-Saxon times the Romescot. The term Peter's Pence is now used of voluntary contributions by Roman Catholics to the papal treasury.

Peterloo, the name (a burlesque adaptation of Waterloo) given to a charge of cavalry and yeomanry on the Manchester reform meeting held in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, on 16 Aug. 1819, as a result of which 11 persons are said (the figures are doubtful) to have been killed and about 600 injured.

cepted by Charles I and became law. The point of proceeding by the method of a 'Petition of Right' instead of a 'Bill' was that the Crown had to give an immediate answer instead of waiting for the end of the session.

Petowker, HENRIETTA, a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby'. She marries Mr. Lillyvick.

PETRARCH (FRANCESCO PETRARCA) (1304-74), Italian poet and humanist, was born at Arezzo, the son of a notary, by name Petracco, who was expelled from Florence (in the same year as Dante) by the Guelph party and migrated to Avignon in 1313. Here in 1327 Petrarch first saw Laura, according to tradition the daughter of Audibert de Noves, and the wife of Count Hugues de Sade, who died in 1348 after bearing eleven children to her husband. It was she who inspired the long series of love-poems for which Petrarch is to-day perhaps most famous, and which bear the title of 'Rime in Vita e Morte di Madonna Laura' or 'Canzoniere'. But to his contemporaries and the generations that immediately succeeded him, Petrarch was best known as a humanist and a patriot. Whether in his retreat at Vaucluse near Avignon, or at Arquà in the Euganean hills, Petrarch devoted himself to the study of classical antiquity, particularly Cicero and Virgil, and wrote much in Latin. In 1341 he was crowned poet laureate at Rome. In spite of his zeal for Italian liberties (he supported the republican movement of Rienzi), he was a welcome guest in the palaces of the Italian princes and despots, and was much occupied with political and diplomatic affairs. His famous 'Ode to Italy' reveals his ardent patriotism. He died at Arquà. His works, besides the Laura poems, include a large number of letters and treatises in Latin, among others an 'Epistle to Posterity' and a Latin epic, 'Africa', on the contest between Rome and Carthage.

Petrarch was the earliest of the humanists, and his life marks the dawn of the Renaissance in Italy. He awakened the interest of his countrymen in the ancient Greek and Roman world, encouraged education and culture, and sought to reconcile the pagan and Christian ideals.

PETRONIUS, GAIUS, one of the emperor Nero's companions, and director of the pleasures of the imperial court (arbiter elegantiae). He had been proconsul in Bithynia. He was the author of 'Petronii Arbitri Satyricon', a prose satirical romance interspersed with verse, which has survived in a fragmentary state. The 'Cena Trimalchionis', the most important episode in this, describes the sumptuous dinner at which the rich, vulgar upstart Trimalchio entertains Encolpius, the hero of the romance. Tacitus mentions that Petronius committed suicide (about A.D. 65) to avoid being killed by Nero.

PETRUCHIO

Petruchio, in Shakespeare's 'Taming of the Shrew' (q.v.), the husband of the termagant Katharina.

PETTY, SIR WILLIAM (1623-87), political economist, studied on the Continent and became the friend of Hobbes. He executed for the Commonwealth the 'Down Survey' of forfeited lands in Ireland, the first attempt on a large scale at carrying out a survey scientifically. Petty acquiesced in the Restoration, and was knighted and made an original member of the Royal Society in 1662. He published economic treatises, the principal of which was entitled 'Political Arithmetic', 1690, a term signifying that which we now call statistics. In this he examined, by the quantitative method, the current allegations of national decay. He rejected the old 'prohibitory' system, and showed the error of the supporters of the 'mercantile' system in regarding the abundance of the precious metals as the standard of prosperity. He traced the sources of wealth to labour and land.

Petulengro, JASPER, the principal gipsy character in Borrow's 'Lavengro' and 'The Romany Rye' (qq.v.), founded upon the Norfolk gipsy, Ambrose Smith, with whom Borrow was acquainted in his youth. 'Petulengro' means 'shoeing smith'.

Peutinger, KONRAD (1465-1547), a German antiquary, who has given his name to an ancient map of the roads of the Roman empire which he discovered. This is one of our few sources of knowledge of this road-system. It is said to be a 12th-cent. copy of a set of maps dating from about A.D. 365-6 when Theodosius the elder was fighting on the frontiers. The best edition is that of Desjardins, Paris, 1869.

Peveril of the Peak, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1822.

The story, which is one of the most laboured that Scott wrote and shows signs of the author's ill health, is in the main concerned with the times of the pretended Popish Plot (1678), though it is only in the 14th chapter that the principal theme is reached. Sir Geoffrey Peveril, an old Cavalier, and Major Bridgenorth, a fanatical Puritan, are neighbouring landowners in Derbyshire, and though of widely different opinions and modes of life, have been connected by ties of reciprocal kindness in the days of the Civil War. Julian, son of Sir Geoffrey, and Alice, the daughter of Bridgenorth, are deeply in love. The recrudescence of bitter political feeling during the period of the 'Popish Plot' brings the parents into acute conflict. Julian, who has spent some years in the household of the countess of Derby, the queen in the Isle of Man, goes to England on her service. He arrives at the moment when popular suspicion of the Catholics has reached its greatest intensity, finds his father under arrest by Bridgenorth as a suspected Papist, attempts to liberate him, is himself arrested, is rescued by Derbyshire miners, and finally reaches London. Meanwhile the fate of Alice Bridgenorth is gravely imperilled. Edward Christian, Bridgenorth's brother-in-law, to whom Alice has been entrusted by her father, contrives with Chiffinch, the minister of Charles II's pleasures, to bring her to the king's notice, with a view to her becoming his mistress. In order to avenge his brother, the victim of a judicial murder carried out in the Isle of Man under Lady Derby's authority, he has, moreover, placed in the latter's service Fenella, his daughter by a Moorish woman. This creature, gifted with strange beauty and grace, has maintained for years the character of a deaf-mute, in order to worm herself into her employer's secrets. In the events that ensue she plays an important part. Alice Bridgenorth falls into the hands of the licentious Buckingham, and is rescued by Fenella's agency. Julian Peveril, with whom Fenella has fallen in love, is by her action brought to the notice of the king and Buckingham, incurs the hostility of the latter, and is imprisoned and involved, with his father, in an accusation of participation in the 'Plot'. They are acquitted on trial, thanks to the intervention of the king, who shows some sense of obligation to the old Cavalier; and all ends well.

The author draws elaborate portraits of Charles II and Buckingham, and gives glimpses of such historical characters as Titus Oates, Colonel Blood (the impudent revolutionary who tried to steal the crown jewels from the Tower), and Sir Geoffrey Hudson (Henrietta Maria's dwarf).

Pew, the blind buccaneer in Stevenson's 'Treasure Island' (q.v.).

Pfefferkorn, an apostate Jew, the associate of the Dominicans in their controversy with Reuchlin (q.v.) regarding the proposed destruction of works of Jewish literature and philosophy. See Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum.

Phaeacians, THE, in the 'Odyssey', the inhabitants of the island Scheria, in the extreme western part of the earth, where Odysseus landed after leaving Ogygia, the island of Calypso. They were famous sailors. Alcinoüs was king of the Phaeacians, and Nausicaa was his daughter.

Phaedra, a daughter of Minos (q.v.) and Pasiphae, and wife of Theseus (q.v.). She became enamoured of Hippolytus (q.v.), the son of Theseus by the amazon Hippolyta. Her advances being rejected, she accused Hippolytus to Theseus of attempts upon her virtue and caused his death. This story is the subject of tragedies by Euripides, Seneca, and Racine.

Phaedria, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. vi, the Lady of the Idle Lake, symbolizing immodest mirth.

PHAEDRUS, a Thracian slave who came to Rome and became a freedman in the household of Augustus. He was author of a collection of Latin fables, based on those attributed to Aesop (q.v.).

Phaëton or PHAETHON, a son of Phoebus, the sun, by Clymene, daughter of Minyas of Orchomenus in Boeotia. He became proud and aspiring, and begged his father to allow him to drive the chariot of the sun. He soon betrayed his incapacity and the horses departed from their usual course, threatening the earth with a conflagration. Zeus, perceiving the disorder, hurled a thunderbolt and struck Phaeton, who fell into the river Eridanus (Po), mourned by his sisters till they turned into trees from which amber is distilled. 'Phaethon' is the title of a poem by G. Meredith (q.v.), written in galliambics.

The name Phaeton is given to a four-wheeled open carriage of light construction, usually drawn by a pair of horses, with one or two seats facing forward; but also applied to carriages variously modified and distinguished as Stanhope, Mail, Park, &c.

Phalstos Disk, a clay disk inscribed on both sides with uninterpreted hieroglyphic characters arranged spirally; thought not to be Cretan but possibly of SW. Asia Minor. It was found by Italian archaeologists in the excavation of Phaistos, Crete.

Phalaris, a tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily, probably in the first half of the 6th cent. B.C., said to have been a cruel ruler. Perillus made him a brazen bull, in which criminals were put to death by a fire lit under the beast's belly, so that their cries were like the bellowing of a bull. Phalaris made the first experiment of it on the person of its inventor. The people of Agrigentum revolted c. 554 B.C. and put Phalaris to death.

For the 'Phalaris controversy' see Phalaris (Epistles of).

Phalaris, Epistles of, certain letters attributed to Phalaris (q.v.), which were praised by Sir William Temple (q.v.) and edited by Charles Boyle (q.v.) in 1695. Richard Bentley (q.v.) was able to show that they were spurious, for towns were mentioned in them that did not exist in the days of Phalaris, the dialect was Attic not Dorian, &c. There is an echo of the controversy in Swift's 'Battle of the Books' (q.v.).

Phantasmion, see Coleridge (Sara).

Phantom Ship, THE, see Flying Dutchman.

Phaon, a boatman of Mitylene in Lesbos. It is said that, when old and ugly, he carried Venus, who presented herself in the guise of an old woman, over to Asia without accepting payment, and the goddess in consequence bestowed on him youth and beauty. Sappho (q.v.), a legend relates, fell in love with him, and when he received her advances coldly, threw herself into the sea. Lyly (q.v.) wrote a play on the subject, 'Sappho and Phaon'.

PHAON, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. iv, is the unfortunate squire who, deceived by

PHIEDIPPIDÈS

Philemon and under the influence of Furor (mad rage), slays Claribel and poisons Philemon.

Pharamond, the legendary first king of the Franks, the subject of an heroic novel by La Calprenède (q.v.). Pharamond is also the name of a character in (1) Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Philaster' (q.v.), and (2) W. Morris's 'Love is Enough'.

Pharaoh, from an Egyptian word meaning 'great house', the generic appellation of the ancient Egyptian kings, especially used of those of the time of Joseph and the Exodus. Rameses II, the great builder of temples, may have been the Pharaoh of the Oppression; his son Meneptah, the Pharaoh of the Exodus. In Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' 'Pharaoh' stands for the king of France.

Pharisees, from a Hebrew word meaning 'separated', an ancient Jewish sect distinguished for their strict observance of the law, and by their pretensions to superior sanctity. The word is applied to self-righteous or hypocritical persons.

Pharonnida, see Chamberlayne.

Pharos, a small island in the bay of Alexandria, which was joined to the Egyptian shore by a causeway built by order of Alexander the Great. On it was erected in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus a tower on the top of which fires were kept burning to direct sailors. Hence the word is often used as a synonym for a lighthouse (pharos, faro, phare).

Pharsälia, the epic poem of Lucan (q.v.) on the civil war between Pompey and Caesar; so named from the battle of Pharsälus (48 B.C.), in which the latter was victorious.

Phebe, a shepherdess in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

Phaidias, a celebrated statuary of Athens, born c. 500 B.C. Under the administration of Pericles (q.v.) he contributed to the adornment of Athens, where his principal works were three statues of Athene on the Acropolis (one wrought in ivory and gold), and where he perhaps designed and certainly supervised the construction of the frieze of the Parthenon. He also made the great statue of Zeus at Olympia. He fell a victim to the enemies of his patron, Pericles, was accused in 432 B.C. of appropriating some of the gold intended for the statue of Athene (which he disproved), was thrown into prison, and died there. He was eminent for the dignity and breadth of his style.

Phaidippidès, the best runner in Greece, was sent from Athens to Sparta to announce the arrival of the invading Persians in 490 B.C. and beg for help. He covered the distance between the two cities, 150 miles, in two days. But the Spartans were unwilling to send help until the time of the full moon. On his return journey, Phaidippides had a vision of the god Pan, who spoke words of encouragement for the Athenian cause. Browning in one of his

'Dramatic Idyls' makes Pheidippides fight at Marathon, and, though now released from service as a messenger, run once more to Athens (a distance of 22 miles) to announce the victory, and fall dead after doing so. The basis of this story is in Plutarch ('de Gloria Athen.' 347 c), who tells it of a different messenger. The exploit has in recent times been commemorated in the 'Marathon Race' of the modern Olympic Games.

Phi Beta Kappa Society, the name of the first of a number of college fraternities established in American colleges. It was founded at the William and Mary College, Williamsburg, Virginia, in 1776; and the name is said to be taken from the initial letters of its motto, φιλοσοφία βίου κυβερνήτης 'Philosophy the guide of life' (Chambers). A large number of similar fraternities have since been founded, most of them named from letters of the Greek alphabet. It was before the P.B.K. Society of Harvard that Emerson delivered his famous oration, 'The American Scholar' (1837).

Phigalia, see Bassae.

Philander, To, to play the Philander or trifling and even promiscuous lover. Philander, in an old ballad, was the lover of Phillis; and in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Laws of Candy', the lover of Erotia.

Philaster, or Love lies a-bleeding, a romantic drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (see Fletcher, J.), produced in 1611 and printed in 1620.

The king of Calabria has usurped the crown of Sicily. The rightful heir, Philaster, loves, and is loved by, Arethusa daughter of the usurper, but the latter designs to marry her to Pharamond, prince of Spain. To secure communication with her, Philaster places his page, Bellario, in her service. Arethusa reveals to the king an amour between Pharamond and Megra, a lady of the court, who in revenge accuses Arethusa of misconduct with Bellario. Philaster bids farewell to the princess, being assured that the accusation is true, and dismisses Bellario. The events that follow lead to the discovery that Bellario is the daughter of a Sicilian lord, who, having fallen in love with Philaster, has assumed the disguise of a page in order to serve him.

Philémon and Baucis, an aged couple who lived in a poor cottage in Phrygia when Zeus and Hermes travelled in disguise over Asia. They entertained the gods hospitably, and Zeus transformed their dwelling into a splendid temple, of which the old couple were made the priest and priestess. Having lived to extreme old age, they died in the same hour, according to their request, and were changed into trees, whose boughs intertwined. They are the subject of a poem by Swift (q.v.).

Philp, The Adventures of, the last complete novel of Thackeray (q.v.), published in the 'Cornhill' in 1861-2.

PHILIP VAN ARTEVELDE

The story is told by Arthur Pendennis (q.v.), who, with his wife Laura, figures slightly in the incidents. Philip is the son of Dr. George Firmin, a fashionable and prosperous London physician, but under the surface an unprincipled and heartless scoundrel. As told in 'A Shabby Genteel Story' (contributed by Thackeray to 'Fraser' in 1840), Dr. Firmin, when a young man, has, under the name of Brandon, gone through a form of marriage with the daughter, Caroline, of a Margate lodging-house keeper, has then cruelly deserted her, and has married Philip's mother while Caroline was alive. The parson who performed the ceremony, a disreputable villain named Hunt, uses his knowledge of the incident to blackmail Dr. Firmin; and when the latter revolts and confesses the story to his son, endeavours to ruin them by revealing the marriage, which he declares a genuine one, to Twysden, Dr. Firmin's brother-in-law, who will benefit largely if Philip is proved illegitimate. But Caroline has a heart of gold and refuses the testimony required to prove the case. She has become a sick-nurse (the 'Little Sister'), has nursed Philip through scarlet fever, has become devoted to him, and will do nothing to injure him. But, though this plot is defeated, misfortune awaits Philip, for his father presently bolts to America, ruined by speculations which have engulfed not only his own means but Philip's fortune, carelessly entrusted to Dr. Firmin by his co-trustee General Baynes. Philip forgoes his claim on Baynes, and becomes a struggling journalist. He falls in love with and marries Baynes's daughter, Charlotte, in spite of her virago of a mother; and, as Dr. Firmin continues to sponge on him, barely keeps his head above water. He is saved in the end by a deus ex machina device, the 'machine' in this case being an old post chariot of Lord Ringwood, Philip's great-uncle, in the pocket of which is found a will leaving Philip a handsome legacy.

Philip drunk to Philip sober, APPEAL FROM: Valerius Maximus (vi. 2) relates that a foreign woman undeservedly condemned by Philip of Macedon (who reigned 359-336 B.C., father of Alexander the Great) in his cups, declared that she would appeal to Philip, 'sed sobrius', 'but when he was sober'.

Philip Quarll, Adventures of, the story of a pseudo-Robinson Crusoe, attributed to one Edward Dorrington, published in 1727, and frequently adapted for children.

Philpp van Artevelde, an historical drama in two parts, in blank verse, by Sir H. Taylor (q.v.), published in 1834.

The historical events described in the play occurred in 1381-2. It Pt. I the Flemish town of Ghent is in rebellion against the count of Flanders and at enmity with his capital, Bruges. Ghent is torn with dissension between the war party and the peace party of its citizens. Its only hope of salvation is to appoint a leader whom all will accept, and the choice falls on the hitherto peaceful, meditative Philip van Artevelde, who is recommended by the memory of his great father, Jacques van Artevelde (the 'Brewer of Ghent', president of Flanders about 1337, ally of Edward III). As soon as elected, Philip develops unexpected qualities of determination and valour, quells sedition with a stern hand, defeats the count of Flanders, captures Bruges, and becomes Regent of Flanders.

In Pt. II of the play Philip is seen declining from the zenith of his power, and at war with the French and the duke of Burgundy, the heir presumptive of the count of Flanders. The drama closes with the defeat of the Flemish forces at Rosebecque and the death of van Artevelde at the hands of the perfidious Sir Fleurbaert of Heurlée.

With these historical events is woven the story, in the first part, of the love of van Artevelde for Adriana van Merestyn, whom he marries; and in the second part, after the death of his wife, of his less hallowed union with the Italian Elena della Torre.

Philip Wakem, a character in George Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

Philippi, a town in Macedonia founded by Philip of Macedon, famous as the site of the battle in 42 B.C. in which Octavianus and Antony defeated Brutus and Cassius. This defeat figures in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar' (q.v.).

Philippics, see Demosthenes and Cicero.

PHILIPS, AMBROSE (1675?–1749), poet, and fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, is principally remembered on account of a quarrel between him and Pope about the relative merits of their pastorals. Pope drew, in the 'Guardian', 'a comparison of Philips's performance with his own, in which, with an unexampled and unequalled artifice of irony, though he has himself always the advantage, he gives the preference to Philips' (Johnson, 'Lives of the Poets'). Philips's adulatory verses, in a seven-syllabled measure, addressed 'to all ages and characters, from Walpole steerer of the realm, to miss Pulteney in the nursery', earned him the nickname of 'Namby-Pamby', though, as Johnson says, they are his pleasantest pieces.

PHILIPS, JOHN (1676–1709), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and author of 'The Splendid Shilling' (q.v.), published in 1705, and 'Cyder' (q.v.), published in 1708. He was employed by Harley and St. John to write verses on the battle of Blenheim as a Tory counterpart to Addison's 'Campaign'.

PHILIPS, KATHERINE (1631–64), the 'Matchless Orinda', was daughter of John Fowler, a London merchant. She married in 1647 James Philips of Cardigan and instituted a 'Society of Friendship', a literary salon for the discussion of poetry, religion, and similar topics, in which she assumed the pseudonym 'Orinda', to which her contemporaries added the epithet 'Matchless'. Her earliest verses were prefixed (1651) to the 'Poems' of Henry Vaughan (q.v.). Her translation of Corneille's 'Pompée' was acted in Dublin with great success. Her collected verses appeared in 1667. Jeremy Taylor (q.v.) dedicated to her his 'Discourse on the Nature of Friendship', and Cowley (q.v.) mourned her death in an elegy.

Phillipson, in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.), the name under which the earl of Oxford and his son, Arthur de Vere, visit the court of Charles the Bold.

Phillistine, the name of an alien warlike people who occupied the southern sea-coast of Palestine, and in early times constantly harassed the Israelites. The name is applied, (1) humorously or otherwise, to persons regarded as 'the enemy' into whose hands one may fall, bailiffs, literary critics, &c.; (2) to persons deficient in liberal culture and enlightenment, from philister, the term applied by German students to one who is not a student at the university, a townsman. In sense (2) the word was introduced into English by Matthew Arnold ('Essays in Criticism', 'Heine'). Philister is said to have originated at Jena in 1693 in a sermon preached at the funeral of a student killed in a 'town and gown' quarrel, from the text 'The Philistines be upon thee, Samson!' [OED.]

Phillipps Library, THE, a collection of manuscripts and books made by Sir Thomas Phillipps, first baronet (1792–1872, educated at Rugby and University College, Oxford). The collection was rich in classical, historical, and topographical manuscripts. Phillipps established a private printing-press at his residence at Broadway, Worcestershire, where he printed visitations, extracts from registers, cartularies, &c. Much of the collection has been sold, but part remains with the family.

PHILLIPS, EDWARD (1630–96?), elder nephew of Milton, by whom he was educated. He was a hack-writer in London, and tutor (1663) to the son of John Evelyn (q.v.) and (1665) to Philip Herbert, afterwards seventh earl of Pembroke. His 'New World of Words' (1658), a philological dictionary, was very popular.

PHILLIPS, JOHN (1631–1706), younger nephew of Milton, by whom he was brought up, wrote a scathing attack on Puritanism in 1655 in his 'Satyr against Hypocrites'. He was employed as a translator and hack-writer. He translated La Calprenède's 'Pharamond' and Madeleine de Scudéry's 'Almahide', and wrote a travesty of 'Don Quixote'. He also wrote in support of Titus Oates and edited a serious periodical, 'The Present State of Europe', from 1690 till his death.

Philoclea, a character in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.).

Philoctètès, one of the Greek heroes of the

PHILOCTETES

Trojan War, who had inherited the bow and arrows of Heracles. He brought warriors from Methone and other places to the war in seven ships, but was left by his companions in the island of Lemnos, at the instance of Odysseus, owing to a noisome wound in his foot. But in the tenth year of the war, a seer having revealed that only with the bow of Philoctetes could Troy be taken, Odysseus and Diomedes came to fetch him to Troy, where he slew Paris. He was the subject of a play by Sophocles.

Philomela, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. Her sister Procne, having married Tereus, king of Thrace, pined for the company of Philomela. Tereus obtained Pandion's permission to conduct Philomela to her sister, but became enamoured of her, and after having offered violence to her, cut off her tongue that she might not be able to discover his ill-usage, and hid her in a lonely place. He then told Procne that her sister was dead. But Philomela during her captivity depicted her misfortunes on a piece of tapestry and privately conveyed this to Procne, who delivered her and concerted with her how they should be avenged on Tereus. Procne accordingly murdered her son Itys and served up his flesh to Tereus. Tereus drew his sword to punish Procne and Philomela, but at that moment he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomela into a nightingale, and Procne into a swallow.

Philosophes, LES, a name given in France to a group of 18th-cent. authors, sceptical in religion, materialist in philosophy, and hedonist in ethics, of whom the principal were Diderot, D'Alembert, the Baron d'Holbach, Helvétius, and Condorcet. The 'Encyclopédie' (q.v.) embodied their ideas.

Philotas, a Senecan tragedy in blank verse by Samuel Daniel (q.v.), published in 1605.

Philotas, a gallant and bountiful soldier, held in high estimation among the Macedonians, incurs the suspicion of Alexander by his boasts, and, having concealed his knowledge of a conspiracy against the king, is accused and tortured, and, having confessed, is stoned to death.

The author had subsequently to defend himself against the charge of covertly defending, by this play, the rebellion of Essex.

Philotimē, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. vii. 48, 49, the daughter of Mammon, symbolizes ambition.

Philtrā, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. iv, a self-seeking damsel in the episode of Amidas and Bracidas.

Phineas Finn, Phineas Redux, The Prime Minister, and The Duke's Children, novels of parliamentary life by A. Trollope (q.v.), published respectively in 1869, 1873, 1875, and 1880.

These novels form a series. The first presents Phineas, an irresistible but penniless young Irishman, who enters parliament and comes to London, leaving behind him an Irish sweetheart, Mary Flood-Jones. In London he falls more or less in love with Violet Effingham, Lady Laura Standish, and the wealthy widow, Madame Max Goesler. He becomes under-secretary for the colonies, but quarrels with the government, resigns, bids adieu to his ladyloves, and returns to marry Miss Flood-Jones and accept a modest post at Cork.

Phineas Redux comes back, a widower, to London and parliamentary life, almost gets a seat in the cabinet, again receives the love or friendship of ladies of position, is accused of the murder of a political enemy, narrowly escapes the gallows, and marries Madame Goesler, who has been instrumental in saving him.

The 'Prime Minister' and 'The Duke's Children' are principally occupied with the affairs, domestic and political, of Plantagenet Palliser and Lady Glencora (now duke and duchess of Omnium), who have figured in the earlier novels. Phineas Finn occasionally reappears.

The series contains some capital parliamentary and hunting scenes, and good characters: Phineas himself, somewhat of a philanderer, weak, but on the whole honest and attractive; the high-spirited Violet Effingham; while Trollope himself regarded the characters of Plantagenet Palliser (q.v.) and Lady Glencora as his chief titles to fame.

Phineūs, son of Agenor and king of Thrace, a soothsayer blinded by the gods on account of his cruelty to his sons, whose eyes he had put out on a false accusation by their step-mother. He was constantly harassed by the Harpies, who carried off the food that was put before him. When the Argonauts (q.v.) visited Thrace, he was delivered from these pests by Zetes and Calais, the brothers of his first wife, and in return instructed them regarding their way to Colchis.

Phiz, see Browne (H. K.).

Phlégēthon or Pyriphlegethon, a river of Hades, whose waters were flames. The name means 'blazing'. See Styx.

Phlegraean Plain, the volcanic region on the coast of Italy between Cumae and Capua. It was fabled that the giants had been buried beneath it by the gods.

Phobētōr, see Icelus.

Phocaeen, an epithet sometimes applied to Marseilles, in accordance with a legend that this town was founded by emigrants from Phocaea, a Greek colony in Ionia between Smyrna and Cyme. Landor has a long blank-verse poem called 'The Phocaeans'.

PHOEBE AND PHOEBUS

Phoebe and Phoebus, names given respectively to Diana (the moon) and Apollo (the sun), signifying bright, radiant.

Phoebe Dawson, the heroine of one of the tales in Crabbe's 'The Parish Register', II (q.v.).

Phoebus, Mr., a character in Disraeli's 'Lothair' (q.v.), the most successful painter of his age, gallant, brilliant, and boastful.

Phoenix, a fabulous bird, of golden and red plumage, which, according to a tale reported by Herodotus (ii. 73), came to Heliopolis every 500 years, on the death of his father, and there buried his body in the temple of the sun. According to another version, the phoenix, after living 500 years, built himself a funeral pile and died upon it. From his remains a fresh phoenix arose.

'The Phoenix and the Turtle', a poem attributed to Shakespeare, was included in 1601 in Robert Chester's 'Love's Martyr'.

Phoenix, THE, a theatre that stood in the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London, in the 16th and 17th cents. It was adapted from a cockpit.

Phoenix Nest, The, a poetical miscellany published in 1593, containing, amongst others, poems by Lodge and Breton (qq.v.).

Phonetic Spelling, a system of spelling in which each letter represents invariably the same spoken sound, e.g. the system proposed for the reform of English spelling, as opposed to the traditional (historical or etymological) system.

Phorcyds, THE, see Graiae.

Phorcys, a sea deity, father of the Gorgons, the Graiae (qq.v.), and other monsters.

Phosphorus, 'the light-bringer', the morning star of the Greeks, corresponding to the Lucifer of the Romans. It is the planet Venus, which also figures as Hesperus, the evening star. 'Sweet Hesper-Phosphor, double name' occurs in Tennyson's 'In Memoriam'.

Phrygian bonnet, see Cap of Liberty.

Phrygian mode, one of the three modes of ancient Greek music, a minor scale appropriate to passion (Jebb).

Phrynē, a celebrated Greek courtesan, said to have been the model of the Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles and of the Venus Anadyomene of Apelles.

Phunky, Mr., in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Serjeant Snubbin's junior in the case of Bardell v. Pickwick.

Phylip Sparowe, a poem by Skelton (q.v.).

Physiocrat, one of a school of political economists founded by François Quesnay (1694-1774) in France in the 18th cent. They maintained that society should be governed according to an inherent natural order, that the soil is the sole source of wealth and the only proper object of taxation, and that security of property and freedom of industry and exchange are essential. [OED.] The other principal exponents of the physiocrat doctrines were Jacques Turgot (1727-81), an able financier, whose dismissal in 1776 from the post of controller-general of the finances was the prelude of the French national bankruptcy; and Victor de Riquetti, Marquis de Mirabeau (1715-89), the author of 'L'Ami des hommes' and father of the revolutionary statesman. Adam Smith, though no physiocrat in the technical sense of the word, was strongly influenced by the sounder doctrines of the school.

Physiologist, see Bestiaries.

Piastra, from the Italian pietra, short for pietra d'argento, 'plate of silver', a name applied to the Spanish peso, or piece of eight or dollar (q.v.); in modern usage, the small Turkish coin, $\frac{1}{100}$ of a Turkish pound.

Picardil, a stiff collar attached to the coat, worn in the early 17th cent., 'generally understood to be the origin of the name Pickadilly Hall, given before 1622 to a house in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, London, and now perpetuated in the street called Piccadilly'. [OED.]

Picaresque, from the Spanish pícaro, a rogue, a term applied to a class of romances that deal with rogues and knaves, of which the earliest important examples, such as 'Lazarillo de Tormes' and 'Guzmán de Alfarache' (qq.v.), were written in Spanish. 'Gil Blas' (q.v.) is the most famous picaresque story in French.

Picasso, PABLO, see Cubism.

Piccadilly, see Picardil.

Piccadilly Weepers were a fashion of drooping whiskers affected by men in the sixties of the last century.

Piccini or PICCINNI, NICOLÒ (1728-1800), an Italian composer of opera. He went to Paris in 1776 and became the subject of a celebrated dispute between his followers and those of Gluck (q.v.).

Pickering, WILLIAM (1796-1854), publisher, commenced business in London in 1820, and did much to raise the standard of design in printing. He published the 'Diamond Classics' 1821-31, and in 1830 adopted the trade-mark of the Aldine press (see Aldus Manutius). He increased his reputation by his Aldine edition of the English poets in fifty-three volumes.

Pickle the Spy, ALASTAIR RUADH MACDONELL (1725?-61), chief of Glengarry. He was employed by the Highland chiefs on a secret mission to Prince Charles Edward in 1745, was captured by the English, and imprisoned in the Tower. Under the pseudonym of 'Pickle', he acted as a spy on Prince Charles Edward, 1749-54. He is the subject of a book by A. Lang (q.v.).

Pickle-herring, a clown or buffoon. This application of the term originated in Germany, where it was the name of a humorous character in an early 17th-cent. play, and of the chief actor in a series of 'Pickelhärings-spiele'.

PICKLE-HERRING

Pickwick Papers, The (The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club), a novel by Dickens (q.v.), first issued in twenty monthly parts from April 1836 to Nov. 1837, and as a volume in 1837 (when Dickens was only 25 years old).

Mr. Samuel Pickwick, general chairman of the Pickwick Club which he has founded, Messrs. Tracy Tupman, Augustus Snodgrass, and Nathaniel Winkle, members of the club, are constituted a Corresponding Society of the Club to report to it their journeys and adventures, and observations of character and manners. This is the basis on which the novel is constructed, and the Club serves as a connecting link for a series of detached incidents and changing characters, without elaborate plot. The entertaining adventures with which Mr. Pickwick and his associates meet are interspersed with incidental tales contributed by various characters. The principal elements in the story are: (1) the visit of Pickwick and his friends to Rochester, where they fall in with the specious rascal, Jingle, who gets Winkle involved in the prospect of a duel (fortunately averted). (2) The visit to Dingley Dell, the home of the hospitable Mr. Wardle; the elopement of Jingle with Wardle's sister, their pursuit by Wardle and Pickwick, and the recovery of the lady; followed by the engagement of Sam Weller as Pickwick's servant. (3) The visit to Eatanswill, where a parliamentary election is in progress, and Mr. Pickwick makes the acquaintance of Pott, editor of a political newspaper, and Mrs. Leo Hunter. (4) The visit to Bury St. Edmunds, where Mr. Pickwick and Sam Weller are fooled by Jingle and his servant, Job Trotter. (5) The pursuit of Jingle to Ipswich, where Mr. Pickwick inadvertently enters the bedroom of a middle-aged lady at night; is in consequence involved in a quarrel with Mr. Peter Magnus, her admirer; is brought before Mr. Nupkins, the magistrate, on a charge of intending to fight a duel; and obtains his release on exposing the nefarious designs of Jingle on Nupkins's daughter. (6) The Christmas festivities at Dingley Dell. (7) The misapprehension of Mrs. Bardell, Mr. Pickwick's landlady, regarding her lodger's intentions, which leads to the famous action of Bardell v. Pickwick for breach of promise of marriage, in which judgement is given for the plaintiff, with damages £750. (8) The visit to Bath, in which Winkle figures prominently, first in the adventure with the blustering Dowler, and secondly in his courtship of Arabella Allen. (9) The period of Mr. Pickwick's imprisonment in the Fleet in consequence of his refusal to pay the damages and costs of his action; and the discovery of Jingle and Job Trotter in that prison, and their relief by Mr. Pickwick. (10) The affairs of

PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN

Tony Weller (Sam's father) and the second Mrs. Weller, ending in the death of the latter and the discomfiture of the pious humbug and greedy drunkard Stiggins, deputy shepherd in the Ebenezer Temperance Association. (11) The affairs of Bob Sawyer and Benjamin Allen, medical students and subsequently struggling practitioners. The novel ends with the happy marriage of Allen's sister, Arabella, to Winkle.

Pickwickian sense, IN A, applied to uncomplimentary language which in the circumstances is not to be interpreted in its strictly literal meaning; from the scene in ch. i of 'Pickwick Papers', where the Chairman calls upon Mr. Blotton to say whether he had used the word 'humbug' of Mr. Pickwick in a common sense. Mr. Blotton 'had no hesitation in saying that he had not—he had used the word in its Pickwickian sense'.

PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI (1463–94), an Italian humanist and Neoplatonist philosopher, born at Mirandola, of which his family were the lords, a man, it appears, of exceptional charm and beauty, as well as intellectual daring. He spent part of his short life at Florence, and was obliged to withdraw for some years to Spain on account of philosophical propositions published by him, some of which were condemned by the pope (in 1486 he offered to maintain at Rome 900 theses de omni scibili). He was a pioneer in the study of Hebrew philosophy and the Cabbala, and in this direction influenced Reuchlin (q.v.). His life ('Life of John Picus, Erle of Myrandula, Greate Lorde of Italy'), and also some of his pious writings, were translated by Sir Thomas More into English.

Picrochole, see Gargantua.

Pict-hatch, a notorious resort of disreputable characters in Clerkenwell, frequently referred to by the Elizabethan dramatists.

Picumnus and Pilumnus, two Roman divinities, probably gods of agriculture, regarded also as protectors of women in childbed. Pilumnus was thought to be the inventor of the pestle (pilum) for grinding corn.

Pidgin, a Chinese corruption of the English word 'business'. Hence PIDGIN-ENGLISH, the jargon, consisting chiefly of English words, often corrupted in pronunciation, and arranged according to Chinese idiom, used for intercommunication between Chinese and Europeans in China, the Straits Settlements, &c. [OED.]

Piece of Eight, see Dollar.

Pied Piper of Hamelin, The, A Child's Story, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Dramatic Romances', published in 1845, based on an old legend.

The town of Hamelin in Brunswick is overrun by rats, and the mayor and corporation are at their wits' end. The Pied Piper offers to get rid of the pest by a secret charm, and is promised a thousand guilders if he does so.

PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN

He goes along the street playing on his pipe, and all the rats come out and follow him down to the river Weser, where they are drowned. The Piper claims his reward, which the mayor and corporation refuse. Thereupon the Piper again walks down the street piping, and all the children run out and follow him to a hill called the Koppenberg, where 'a wondrous portal opens wide', and the Piper and the children enter, and the door shuts fast. The last words of the poem indicate that the children emerged in Transylvania, where their descendants are still to be found. Another version had been written by Browning's father.

The event was long regarded as historical and is supposed to have occurred in 1284. The piper's name was Bunting. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') discusses the origin of the legend, which is told, with variations, of other places. The story is commonly held to be connected with the 'Children's Crusade' of 1212, when, at a moment of crusading enthusiasm, a child named Nicolas, of Cologne, is said to have gathered 20,000 young crusaders, many of whom perished.

Plepowder Court, from French pieds poudreux ('dusty feet'), a court of justice formerly held at fairs to determine disputes between persons resorting to them. There is a reference to these courts in Ben Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fair', II. i.

Pierce Penniless, His Supplication to the Divell, a fantastic prose satire by T. Nash (q.v.), published in 1592. The author, in the form of a humorous complaint to the Devil, discourses on the vices of the day, throwing interesting light on the customs of his time. One of the best passages is that relating to the recently developed practice of excessive drinking, 'a sinne, that ever since we have mixt ourselves with the Low-Countries, is counted honourable', and containing a description of the various types of drunkards, drawn with a coarse Rabelaisian humour and vigour. The work is directed in part against Richard Harvey the astrologer (brother of Gabriel Harvey) and the Martinists (see Martin Marprelate). It ends with a discussion of the nature of spirits.

Pierian, PIERIDES, names applied to the Muses (q.v.), from Pieria near Mt. Olympus, where they were worshipped.

Pierides is also a name of the nine daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia, who challenged the Muses in a contest of song, and, being defeated, were changed into magpies.

Pierre, a character in Otway's 'Venice Preserved' (q.v.).

Pierre, or the Ambiguities, by H. Melville (q.v.), published in 1852, a strange novel of morbid psychology and incestuous passion, which bewildered and did much to alienate the public that the author had won for himself with his earlier books.

Pierrot, a typical character in French pantomime; now, in English, applied to a buffoon or itinerant minstrel, having, like the stage Pierrot, a whitened face and loose white fancy dress.

Piers Plowman, The Vision concerning, the most important work in Middle English with the exception of Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales', is an alliterative poem of which the three versions, of very different length (2,500 to 7,300 lines), are attributed to William Langland, 'Long Will' as he calls himself. He seems to have been an educated man, and to have lived near Malvern, and in later life in London. He is supposed to have written them between 1360 and 1399. But recent critical discussion has left the question of the authorship of the three versions (known as the A, the B, and the C texts), and of the component parts of the A text, undecided. As to the details regarding the life of the author, drawn from the poem itself, modern criticism has thrown doubt on their validity, and the whole subject remains involved in obscurity.

Taking first the A text, the work may be very briefly summarized as follows:

Wandering on the Malvern Hills, the poet sees a vision of a high tower (Truth), a deep dungeon (Wrong), and a 'fair field full of folk' (the earth) between, with the people going about their various avocations, beggars, friars, priests, lawyers, labourers idle or hard-working, hermits and nuns, cooks crying 'hot pies, hot', and taverners, 'White wine of Osey'. There follows a vision in which Lady Meed (reward, but more particularly in a bad sense, bribery), Reason, Conscience, and other abstractions are confronted. Then we have Conscience preaching to the people, and Repentance moving their hearts, the confession of the seven deadly sins (which includes a vivid description of a tavern scene), and 'a thousand of men' moved to seek St. Truth. But the way is difficult to find, and here Piers Plowman makes his appearance, and offers to guide the pilgrims if they will help him plough his half-acre. Some help him, but some are shirkers. Then follows a discussion of the labour problem of the day. Able-bodied beggars must be severely dealt with. Labourers must not be dainty in their food and extravagant in their demands.

This takes us to the end of passus VIII. With passus IX (where according to some authorities the work of a continuator begins) the poem passes to a search for 'Do-well', 'Do-bet', and 'Do-best', who are vainly looked for among the friars, the priests, and in Scripture, with the help of Thought, Wit, and Study.

The additions contained in the B and C texts, though characterized by sincerity and power of impression, are too incoherent to be easily summarized. Their author is specially concerned with the corruption in the Church, with the merits of poverty, and the supreme virtue of love. The seven new visions include a long disquisition by 'Ymaginatif' on wealth and learning; a theological discussion between Reason, Conscience, Clergy, and a doctor of divinity; a conversation between Patience and 'Activa-Vita', the humble worker, who receives his reward hereafter; narratives of Christ's life in which Christ and Piers Plowman blend one into the other; and finally the attack of Antichrist and Pride upon the house 'Unity', and of Death upon Man-kind.

Pierston, JOCELYN, the lover in Hardy's 'The Well-Beloved' (q.v.).

Pilgwiggen, a character in Drayton's 'Nymphidia' (q.v.).

Pilate's Question, 'What is truth?' (John xviii. 38).

Pilatus, MR., a mountain south-west of Lucerne in Switzerland, so named from a tradition that the corpse of Pontius Pilate found its final resting-place there (or that Pilate was banished, or committed suicide, there). The name is perhaps a corruption of 'pileatus', i.e. 'capped' with clouds.

Pilgarlic, originally applied to a 'peeled' or bald head, ludicrously likened to a peeled head of garlic; then to a bald-headed man; and from the 17th cent. used in a ludicrously contemptuous or mock-pitiful way, a 'poor creature'. [OED.]

Pilgrim Fathers, THE, the English Puritans who in 1620 set out from Delft Haven and Plymouth in the 'Mayflower', and who founded the colony of Plymouth in New England.

Governor Bradford in 1630 wrote of his company as 'pilgrims' in the spiritual sense. The same phraseology was repeated by Cotton Mather, and others, and became familiar in New England. Later, anniversary feasts were held of the 'Sons' or 'Heirs' of the 'Pilgrims', and thus the expression 'Pilgrim Fathers' naturally arose, first as a rhetorical phrase, and finally as an historical designation. [OED.] Mention may be made of the poems by Mrs. Hemans, 'The Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers', and by O. W. Holmes, 'The Pilgrim's Vision'.

Pilgrim Trust, THE, a sum of some £2,000,000 placed in September 1930 by Mr. Edward Stephen Harkness, the American railway magnate and philanthropist, in the hands of trustees to be spent for the benefit of Great Britain. Mr. Harkness, who was born at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1874 and educated at Yale, has made other generous gifts for British purposes, as has also his mother, Mrs. Stephen Harkness.

Pilgrim's Progress, The, from this World to that which is to come, an allegory by Bunyan (q.v.), published in 1678 (a second edition with additions appeared in the same year, and a third in 1679).

The allegory takes the form of a dream by the author. In this he sees Christian, with a burden on his back, and reading in a book, from which he learns that the city in which he and his family dwell will be burned with fire. On the advice of Evangelist, Christian flees from the City of Destruction, having failed to persuade his wife and children to accompany him. Pt. I describes his pilgrimage through the Slough of Despond, the Interpreter's House, the Palace Beautiful, the Valley of Humiliation, the Valley of the Shadow of Death, Vanity Fair, Doubting Castle, the Delectable Mountains, the country of Beulah, to the Celestial City. On the way he encounters various allegorical personages, among them Mr. Worldly Wiseman, Faithful (who accompanies Christian on his way but is put to death in Vanity Fair), Hopeful (who next joins Christian), Giant Despair, the foul fiend Apollyon, and many others.

Pt. II relates how Christian's wife, Christiansa, moved by a vision, sets out with her children on the same pilgrimage, accompanied by her neighbour Mercy, despite the objections of Mrs. Timorous and others. They are escorted by Great-heart, who overcomes Giant Despair and other monsters, and brings them to their destination.

The work is remarkable for the beauty and simplicity of its language (Bunyan was permeated with the English of the Bible), the vividness and reality of the impersonations, and the author's sense of humour and feeling for the world of nature. The extraordinary appeal which it makes to the human mind is shown by the fact that it has been translated into no fewer than one hundred and eight different languages and dialects [C.H.E.L.].

Pilgrimage of Grace, THE, a rising in Yorkshire in 1536 in protest against the dissolution of the monasteries. It was at the same time North versus South, the old nobility against the new. The insurgents, headed by Robert Aske, and carrying a banner on which were depicted the five wounds of Christ, adopted this name, and became so numerous that the duke of Norfolk, sent to disperse them, made terms. These were not kept, and the leaders were seized and executed.

PILUMNUS

Pilumnus, see Picumnus.

Pimlico, or Runne Red-Cap, a satirical pamphlet, published in 1609, of unknown authorship, in which the poet describes a crowd of persons of all classes of society, from courtiers to 'greasie lownes', pressing towards Hogsden to drink Pimlico ale.

The origin of the name 'Pimlico' is obscure, and has been the subject of much discussion in 'N. and Q.', especially series XI and XII. The name first appears in a tract, 'News from Hogsden', of 1598, where 'Ben Pimlico's nut-browne' is referred to. The derivations are discussed also in E. Walford, 'Old and New London' (1892, v. 39), in which Hogsden's Pimlico is referred to Hoxton, where there is still a Pimlico Walk. It appears that 'pimlico' is the natives' name for a wading bird in the West Indies, and that some of the West Indian islets are named after them. The word, as the name of a bird, first appears in 1614. How it came to be applied to a district in the SW. of London has not been ascertained.

PINDAR (c. 522-442 B.C.), the great Greek lyric poet, was born at or near Thebes. He acquired fame at an early age and was employed by many winners at the Games to celebrate their victories. The only complete poems of his that are extant are his 'Epinicia' or triumphal odes (see Olympian Odes); but he wrote many kinds of verse, hymns, paeans, processional odes, &c., enumerated by Horace in Od. iv. 2, and fragments of these survive. He exercised a great influence on Latin poetry (especially Horace). The English Ode (e.g. Dryden's 'Alexander's Feast') is written in imitation of the odes of Pindar. It is characterized by the irregularity in the number of feet in the different lines and the arbitrary disposition of the rhymes.

PINERO, SIR ARTHUR WING (1855-1934), the son of a solicitor and intended for his father's profession, took to the stage at 19, but in 1882 gave this up for dramatic writing. His first notable play, 'The Money Spinner', was produced in 1881, and was followed by three successful farces, 'The Magistrate' (1885), 'The Schoolmistress' (1886), and 'Dandy Dick' (1887). He then turned to more serious dramatic works, of which the most important were 'Sweet Lavender' (1888), 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray' (1893), and 'Trelawny of the Wells' (1898). His numerous other plays include: 'Lady Bountiful' (1891), 'The Cabinet Minister' (1892), 'The Weaker Sex' (1894), 'The Amazons' (1895), 'The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith' (1895), 'The Princess and the Butterfly' (1898), 'The Gay Lord Quex' (1899), 'Iris' (1901), 'His House in Order' (1906), 'The Thunderbolt' (1908), 'Mid-Channel' (1909), 'The Widow of Wasdale Head' (1912), 'Playgoers' (1913).

Pippa Passes, a dramatic poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1841 (the first of the series entitled 'Bells and Pomegranates').

It is Pippa's yearly holiday, and she wanders through the town singing and wondering which of four happy and beloved persons she would rather be, Ottima, Phene, Luigi, or the Bishop. She decides for the last, because he has God's love.

Now, Ottima and her lover Sebald have just murdered Ottima's husband. Pippa's song ('God's in His heaven') as she passes fills Sebald with remorse.

Phene is the newly married bride of Jules, the French sculptor. Jules finds that he has been tricked off with an ignorant girl, and is about to dismiss her. Pippa's song ('Give her but a least excuse to love me') awakens better feelings in him, and he decides to retain and save Phene.

Luigi, the patriot, has resolved to kill the Austrian emperor. His loving mother almost succeeds in dissuading him. Pippa's song ('A King lived long ago') rouses him to action, and he rushes away, thereby escaping the pursuit of the police.

The Bishop is planning with his intendant the destruction of Pippa herself; for she is the daughter of the Bishop's murdered brother, whose riches he has appropriated. Pippa's song ('Suddenly God took me') awakens his conscience. Pippa goes home at sunset, all unconscious of what her songs have effected.

PIRANDELLO, LUIGI (1867-1936), Italian dramatist and novelist. His best-known works are: 'Sei personaggi in cerca di autore' ('Six Characters in Search of an Author') (1921), 'Enrico IV' (1922), 'Così è (se vi pare)' (1925), plays; 'Il fu Mattia Pascal' (1904), novel. His plays are all built upon a pseudo-metaphysical presupposition that existence is relative.

Pirate, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1822. Lockhart refers to 'the wild freshness' of its atmosphere. Scott absorbed the 'local colour' on a voyage of the Scottish Lighthouse Commissioners (on which he was an invited guest) with R. L. Stevenson's grandfather.

The scene is laid principally in Zetland (or Shetland) in the 17th cent. In a remote part of the island live a misanthropical recluse, Basil Mertoun, of whose antecedents nothing is known, and his son, Mordaunt, a gallant attractive youth. Mertoun is tenant of Magnus Troil, a rich Zetlander of noble Norse ancestry, the father of two daughters, Minna, high-minded and imaginative, and Brenda, of a cheerful and more homely temperament. Mordaunt is their constant guest, and friend of the girls. Their pleasant relations are interrupted by the arrival of Clement Cleveland, a buccaneer captain, shipwrecked on the coast, and rescued from the sea by Mordaunt. Between these two a bitter enmity springs up. Minna, ignorant of the true character of a pirate's life, falls in love with Cleveland and he with her. Mordaunt, on the other hand, finds himself excluded from the friendship of the Troils, owing to false reports about him which have reached Magnus, but Brenda remains faithful to him and attracts thereby his love. The story is largely occupied with the doings of the pirates, who capture Magnus and his daughters, and after various lively incidents are engaged by the 'Halcyon' frigate and taken prisoners; Cleveland and Minna are parted for ever, Brenda and Mordaunt are united.

A connecting link in the story is a half-crazed relative of Magnus, Ulla Troil, known as Norma of the Fitful-head, a woman who is credited with, and believes herself possessed of, supernatural powers, especially control of the winds, and who helps to shape the destinies of the various characters. She turns out to be an early love of Basil Mertoun (himself in his youth a buccaneer), and mother of Cleveland, Mordaunt being Mertoun's son by a later marriage.

Pisa, THE LEANING TOWER OF, the campanile of the Cathedral of Pisa, in northern Italy, built at the end of the 12th cent. It is circular, in eight stories, each story surrounded with small columned arcades. It is 181 feet high and leans some 14 feet from the perpendicular, part of this inclination dating from its construction.

Pisistratus, see Peisistratus. Pisistratus Caxton is a character in B. Lytton's 'The Caxtons' (q.v.).

Piso's Justice: Seneca ('Dial'. III. 18) relates this story of Gnaeus Piso, a man who took obstinacy for firmness. He had sentenced a soldier to death for murder, but when the execution was about to take place the man supposed to have been murdered appeared. The centurion stopped the execution and reported the matter to Piso. Piso thereupon condemned all three to death, the first as having already been sentenced, the centurion for disobeying orders, and the man who was supposed to have been murdered for being the cause of the death of the other two.

Pistol, ANCIENT, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', 'Henry V', and 'The Merry Wives of Windsor' (qq.v.), one of Falstaff's associates, a braggart with a fine command of bombastic language.

Pistole, a name applied specifically from c. 1600 to a Spanish gold coin equivalent to four silver pieces of eight (see Dollar) and worth from 16s. 6d. to 18s.; also applied (after the French) to the louis d'or of Louis XIII issued in 1640. The name, apparently shortened from pistolet, is ultimately derived from Pistoia, a town in Tuscany which still manufactures iron and steel, and especially guns. But the history of the word, and the connexion of the coin with the weapon, are obscure.

Pitt Diamond, see Pitt (T.).

Pitt, THOMAS, known as DIAMOND PITT (1653-1726), East India merchant and governor of Madras, who obtained the great Pitt diamond from an Indian merchant. He sold it to the French regent for £135,000 and it is still among the State jewels of France. Thomas Pitt was grandfather of the earl of Chatham.

Pitt, WILLIAM, first earl of Chatham (1708-78), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford, a great Whig statesman and orator. He entered parliament in 1735, was admitted to office in Pelham's administration, and was dismissed in 1755 owing to his attacks on Sir Thomas Robinson (leader of the House of Commons) and even Newcastle the premier. He was secretary of state in 1756-7, but his fame as a great administrator rests chiefly on the period that immediately followed, when Pitt and Newcastle were the chief ministers in coalition and when, thanks to Pitt's choice of able commanders for the prosecution of the Seven Years War and the new spirit and courage that he breathed into the services, 'the wind, from whatever quarter it blew, carried to England tidings of battles won, fortresses taken, provinces added to the empire' (Macaulay). Pitt resigned in 1761, having failed to convince the cabinet of the necessity of war with Spain. He formed an administration in 1766 and accepted an earldom, but ill health forced his resignation in 1768. He strenuously opposed from 1774 onwards the harsh measures taken against the American colonies, though unwilling to recognize their independence. His speeches were marked by lofty and impassioned eloquence, and, judged by their effect on their hearers, place him among the greatest orators. But only fragments have survived.

Pitt, WILLIAM (1759-1806), second son of the first earl of Chatham, educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He became chancellor of the exchequer in his twenty-second, and prime minister in 1783 in his twenty-fifth year, and retained the position until 1801, during the troubled years which followed the outbreak of the French Revolution, forming the great European coalitions that opposed French military aggression. He returned to office in 1804, formed the third coalition, and died in January 1806, shortly after the battle of Austerlitz, his last words being, 'Oh, my country! How I leave my country!'

Pittacus (7th-6th cent. B.C.), of Mitylene, where he was chosen to be ruler, was one of the so-called 'Seven Sages of Greece' (q.v.). Two maxims were attributed to him: Χαλερόν ἐσθλὸν ἐμμεναι (eminence is difficult), and καὶρὸν γνῶθι (know the opportunity).

Placêbo, Latin, 'I shall be pleasing', occurring in Ps. cxiv. 9 (Placebo Domino in regione vivorum), is used allusively in such phrases as 'sing placebo' to signify 'play the sycophant'. Plague of London, THE GREAT, the epidemic of bubonic plague that visited London in 1665.

Plague Year, A Journal of the, an historical fiction by Defoe (q.v.), published in 1722.

It purports to be the narrative of a resident in London during 1664-5, the year of the Great Plague. It describes the gradual spread of the plague, and the growing terror of the inhabitants. It relates the public measures taken by the authorities, such as the sequestration of the sick, the closing of infected houses, and the prohibition of assemblies, with their effect on the minds of the people. The symptoms of the disease, the circulation of the dead-carts, the burials in great pits, and the lamentable scenes witnessed by the supposed narrator are described with extraordinary vividness. The general effects of the epidemic, notably in the cessation of many trades, and the exodus from the city, are also set forth, and an estimate made of the total number of deaths from the disease.

The 'Journal' no doubt embodies much information that Defoe received from one source or another, including official documents. Some scenes, it has been pointed out, appear to be borrowed from Dekker's 'Wonderful Year 1603'. Sir Walter Scott observes that even if Defoe had not been the author of 'Robinson Crusoe', he would have deserved immortality for the genius displayed in this work.

Plain, THE, the name applied to the more moderate (or perhaps the more timid) party in the French national convention at the time of the Revolution, from the fact that they sat on the floor of the hall. (Cf. Mountain.) They were also called the 'Marais' or 'crapauds du Marais'. It was their junction with the rump of the Dantonists that overthrew Robespierre (q.v.) on the 9th Thermidor.

Platn Dealer, The, a comedy by Wycherley (q.v.), produced in 1677.

This, perhaps the best of Wycherley's plays, a remote adaptation of Molière's 'Le Misanthrope', shows the author at his fiercest as a satirist. The 'plain dealer' is Manly, an honest misanthropic sea-captain, who has lost confidence in every one save his one trusty friend Vernish, and his love, Olivia, to whom he has confided his money. The plot turns on the perfidy of Vernish and Olivia. On his return from fighting the Dutch, Manly finds that Olivia scorns him, has married another, and makes pretexts for not returning his money. Fidelia, a young lady who cherishes a secret passion for Manly and has followed him to sea in man's clothes, continues to attend him in spite of his rebuffs, and her disguise is not suspected. Manly, still hoping to win Olivia's favour, sends Fidelia to plead for him. Olivia becomes enamoured of the disguised Fidelia, who, by Manly's direction, makes an assignation with Olivia, to which Manly, under cover of darkness, also comes, intending to expose Olivia's perfidy. Olivia's husband, who has helped to appropriate Manly's money, and who now turns out to be the trusted Vernish, finds Olivia with Manly and Fidelia, and rushes at Manly to kill him. Fidelia saves Manly and is herself wounded in the scuffle; her disguise is discovered. Manly, cured of his infatuation for Olivia, and touched by Fidelia's devotion, gives her his heart.

Among other amusing characters is the widow Blackacre, a litigious creature thoroughly at home in the courts and in legal jargon, who trains up her son to follow in her footsteps, and thereby overreaches herself. The son, Jerry Blackacre, is the literary ancestor of Tony Lumpkin.

Plan of Campaign, THE, a method of conducting operations against landlords in Ireland who refused to reduce rents, entered upon in 1886-7. The tenants in a body were to pay what they considered the fair rent into the hands of a political leader, charged to retain it until the landlord should accept the sum offered, less any amount expended in maintaining the struggle. PLATO (c. 427-348 B.C.), the great Greek philosopher, was the son of an Athenian of ancient family. He became a pupil and devoted admirer of Socrates, and after his death in 399 retired to Megara, and subsequently paid three visits to the courts of Dionysius I and Dionysius II at Syracuse. After the first of these, about 386, he began teaching philosophy in the Academy, an olive-grove near Athens, whence his school derives its name. He twice made some attempt to enter political life, but was repelled by the iniquities he encountered. The remainder of his life was mainly occupied with instruction and the composition of the Dialogues in which he embodied his views, and in which Socrates figures as conducting the discussions. All these Dialogues are extant. They are based on the teaching of Socrates (q.v.) and show the influence of the Pythagoreans (q.v.), but are not altogether self-consistent, and indicate an evolution of Plato's thought. Much of their charm lies in their dramatic setting, the description of the scenes in which they take place, the amusing and interesting characters that he stages, and the genial irony of Socrates.

PLATONISTS

One of Plato's principal contributions to philosophical thought is his 'Theory of Ideas'. The idea or form of a thing, in this theory, is somewhat of the nature of our abstract conception of that thing, but having a real existence outside the world of sense; it is the unchanging reality behind the changing appearance. The supreme idea is that of the Good. With Plato, as with Socrates, virtue is knowledge, knowledge of this supreme idea, which implies the effort to realize it. This perfect virtue is given to very few. Ordinary practical virtue consists in conduct in accordance with man's true nature, developed by education, which represents the constraint of the State's laws.

Plato's principal dialogues were the 'Protagoras', 'Gorgias', 'Phaedo', 'Symposium', 'Republic', 'Phaedrus', 'Parmenides', 'Theaetetus', 'Sophist', 'Philebus', 'Timaeus', 'Laws', and the 'Apology' (a reproduction of Socrates' defence at his trial). Jowett's (q.v.) classic translation of the dialogues appeared in 1871.

Platonic love, love of a purely spiritual character, free from sensual desire. Amor Platonicus was used by the Florentine Marsilio Ficino (1433-99), synonymously with Amor Socraticus, to denote the kind of interest in young men which was imputed to Socrates; cf. the last few pages of Plato's 'Symposium'. As thus originally used it had no reference to women. [OED.]

Platonic year, a cycle imagined by some ancient astronomers, in which the heavenly bodies were to return to their original relative positions (after which, according to some, all events would recur in the same order as before); sometimes identified with the period of the revolution of the equinoxes (about 25,800 years).

Platonists, THE CAMBRIDGE, a group of philosophers, whose headquarters were Cambridge University, and who flourished in the middle of the 17th cent. For the chief features of their philosophy see Cudworth. The principal members of the group, besides Cudworth, were Henry More, John Smith (1618-52), and Culverwel (qq.v.).

PLAUTUS

PLAUTUS, TITUS MACCIUS (c. 254-184 B.C.), the celebrated Roman comic poet, was born in a village of Umbria. He was poor when he came to Rome and accepted humble employments, at one time turning a hand-mill for a baker. We possess twenty of his comedies, some of them imitations of Menander's plays: Amphitruo, Asinaria, Aulularia, Bacchides, Captivi, Casina, Cistellaria, Curculio, Epidicus, Menaechmi, Mercator, Miles, Mostellaria, Persa, Poenulus, Pseudolus, Rudens, Stichus, Trinummus, Truculentus. Several of his plays have been imitated by Molière, Shakespeare, and other modern writers.

Playboy of the Western World, The, a comedy by Synge (q.v.), published in 1907.

Christy Mahon, 'a slight young man, very tired and frightened', arrives at a village in Mayo. He gives out that he is a fugitive from justice, who in a quarrel has killed his bullying father, splitting him to the chine with a single blow. He is hospitably entertained, and his character as a dare-devil gives him a great advantage with the women over the milder-spirited lads of the place. But admiration gives place to angry contempt when the father himself arrives in pursuit of the fugitive, who has merely given him a crack on the head and run away.

Plays for Puritans, a collection of three plays by G. B. Shaw (q.v.), published in 1901. The plays are 'The Devil's Disciple', 'Caesar and Cleopatra', and 'Captain Brassbound's Conversion'.

Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant, a collection of seven plays (in two volumes) by G. B. Shaw (q.v.), published in 1898. The plays are (pleasant): 'Arms and the Man', 'Candida', 'The Man of Destiny', and 'You Never Can Tell'; (unpleasant): 'Widowers' Houses', 'The Philanderer', 'Mrs. Warren's Profession'.

Pleasant Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis in Commendatioun of Vertew and Vituperatioun of Vyce, Ane, a morality play by Sir D. Lindsay (q.v.), produced in 1540.

Pt. I represents the temptation of Rex Humanitas by Sensuality, Wantonness, Solace, and other evil companions, while Good Counsel is hustled away, Verity is put in the stocks, and Chastity is warned off. An interlude follows in which are described the adventures of Chastity among humbler folks, a tailor, a souter, and their wives. Then Chastity is put in the stocks. But the arrival of Correction alters the situation. Verity, Good Counsel, and Chastity are admitted to the king, and Sensuality is banished.

After an interlude in which an impoverished farmer exposes his sufferings at the hands of the ecclesiastics, and a pardoner's trade is ridiculed, Pt. II presents the Three Estates summoned before the king, and their misdeeds denounced by John the Common Weal. The Lords and Commons repent, but the clergy remain impenitent, are exposed, and the malefactors brought to the scaffold.

PLEIÄDES

The play, which is extremely long, is written in various metres, eight and six-lined stanzas and couplets. It is, as a dramatic representation, in advance of all contemporary English plays, and gives an interesting picture of the Scottish life of the time.

Pleasures of Hope, The, a poem by Campbell (q.v.), published in 1799.

In Pt. I the poet considers the consolation and inspiration of Hope in various circumstances, its effects on the individual and on the community, and by contrast the hard fate of a people deprived of it (the well-known passage on the downfall of Poland). In Pt. II he passes to the consideration of Love in combination with Hope, and to the blessings of the belief in a future life. The poem contains single lines that have become proverbial, such as

'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view, and

Like angel-visits, few and far between.

Pleasures of Imagination, a didactic poem by Akenside (q.v.), published in 1744; it was completely re-written and issued as 'Pleasures of the Imagination' in 1757.

The object of the poet, in his own words, is

To pierce divine Philosophy's retreats,
And teach the Muse her lore.

He examines the pleasures of imagination, dividing them into (a) primary pleasures connected with the sublime, the wonderful, and the beautiful, whose connexion with the moral faculties he traces; and (b) secondary pleasures, such as those of sense and all the passions of men's hearts, finding delight even in 'ennobling sorrows'. In the third of the three books composing the poem, he considers the origin of vice, the nature of ridicule, the pleasures of memory and association of ideas, and the nature of taste.

Akenside is indebted to Addison, Shaftesbury, and Hutcheson for the philosophical groundwork of his poem.

Pleasures of Memory, see Rogers (S.).

Pléiade, LA, a group of French poets of the latter part of the 16th cent., consisting of Pierre de Ronsard (q.v.), Joachim du Bellay, Pontus de Thiard, Jodelle, Belleau, Baif, and Dorat (or, according to other authorities, Peletier), animated by a common veneration for the writers of antiquity, and a desire to improve the quality of French verse. Their inauguration in France of the sonnet stimulated the interest in England in this form of verse. The title was taken ultimately from the Pleiades (q.v.), and was first given to a group of seven Hellenist poets of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, including Theocritus, Lycophron, and Aratus.

Plēiādes, seven daughters of Atlas, who after their death were placed in heaven and form a group of stars. Their names were Alcýōnē, Mērōpē, Maia, Electra, Taygētē, Stērōpē, and Celaeno. Of these Merope married Sisyphus (q.v.), the others had gods for their lovers. Therefore Merope is dimmer than her sister stars. The rising of the constellation was in May and its setting in November. Hence the connexion of the Pleiades with the beneficent showers of spring, the autumn seed-time, and autumn storms.

Pleydell, MR. COUNSELLOR PAULUS, a character in Scott's 'Guy Mannering' (q.v.).

Pliable, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), one of Christian's companions, who turns back at the Slough of Despond.

Pliant, SIR PAUL, see Plyant.

PLINY THE ELDER, GAIUS PLINIUS SECUNDUS (A.D. 23-79), the author of the 'Historia Naturalis', and the intimate friend of Vespasian. He perished while observing the eruption of Vesuvius that destroyed Herculaneum and Pompeii.

PLINY THE YOUNGER, GAIUS PLINIUS CAECILIUS SECUNDUS (b. A.D. 61), nephew of the above, an advocate who held many public offices, was author of a 'Panegyricus' of Trajan, and of a number of interesting letters ('Epistolae') throwing much light on Pliny's time and contemporaries. As proconsul in Bithynia he gives (in one of his letters to Trajan) one of the earliest authentic references to the sect of 'Christians'.

Plornish, MR. and MRS., in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), a plasterer and his wife who lived in Bleeding Heart Yard. Mrs. Plornish was a notable interpreter of the Italian language.

PLOTINUS (c. A.D. 203-62), born at Lycopolis in Egypt, was the chief exponent of the Neoplatonic philosophy. After studying at Alexandria, he opened his school at Rome. He is generally described as a 'mystic', who developed Plato's teaching, and appears to have had some knowledge of oriental philosophies. His aim was the conversion of his disciples to the highest and most spiritual mode of life. The 'Enneads' are the six divisions of Porphyry's collections of Plotinus' works, each of which contains nine books (recently translated by Stephen McKenna). Plotinus has been elucidated, and his influence on Christianity discussed, by Dean Inge in the Gifford Lectures of 1918.

Plough-Monday, the first Monday after Epiphany, on which, especially in the north and east of England, the commencement of the ploughing season was celebrated by a procession of disguised ploughmen and boys drawing a plough from door to door. See Plough Monday Play.

Plough Monday Play, a folk-drama of the East Midlands. In the version from Cropwell in Nottinghamshire the characters are Tom the Fool, a Recruiting Sergeant, a Ribboner or Recruit, three farm-servants, a Doctor, and Beelzebub; and two women, a Young Lady and old Dame Jane. The Ribboner's suit is rejected by the Young Lady and he enlists; Tom Fool consoles the Lady. The farm-servants describe their several occupations. Dame Jane claims Tom Fool as father of her child. Beelzebub strikes her with his club and kills her. The Doctor, after vaunting his abilities, declares that she is only in a trance and revives her. The play concludes with dance and songs and a collection. The other extant version, from Lincolnshire, is in its main features similar. Like the St. George play, the Plough Monday play probably symbolizes, in its central incident, the death and resurrection of the year. The subject is treated in E. K. Chambers, 'The Medieval Stage', on which the above is based. (For the Cropwell version, Chambers refers to Mrs. Chaworth Musters, 'A Cavalier Stronghold'.)

PLYANT

Plumdamas, PETER, a character in Scott's 'Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.).

Plume, CAPTAIN, a character in Farquhar's 'The Recruiting Officer' (q.v.).

Plumian Professorship, THE, of Astronomy and Experimental Philosophy at Cambridge, owes its name to Thomas Plume (1630-1704), of Christ's College, Cambridge, archdeacon of Rochester, who left sums of money for the erection of an observatory and the maintenance of this professorship.

Plummer, CALEB and BERTHA, characters in Dickens's 'The Cricket on the Hearth' (q.v.).

PLUTARCH, the biographer and moral philosopher, was born at Chaeronea in Boeotia; the date of his birth is unknown, but according to his own statement he was studying philosophy in A.D. 66. His most famous work is the 'Parallel Lives' of twenty-three Greeks and twenty-three Romans, arranged in pairs. These biographies are the source of the plots of many of our dramas, including some of Shakespeare's.

Sir Thomas North's version of them (1579) is a translation not of the original Greek, but of the French rendering of Jacques Amyot. It is not a strictly accurate version, but is embellished by North's vivid English. Another important translation of the 'Lives' is that of John and William Langhorne (1770). Plutarch also wrote lives of Artaxerxes II, Aratus, Galba, and Otho, and a collection of Essays known as 'Moralia', some of them ethical, some on historical subjects; these were translated by Philemon Holland in 1603.

Pluto, another name of the god Hades (q.v.).

Plutus, the son of Demeter (q.v.), and the god of wealth. The Greeks represented him as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately; as lame, because riches come slowly; and with wings, because riches disappear more quickly than they come.

Plyant, SIR PAUL, in Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.), 'an uxorious foolish old knight'.

PLYMLEY

Plymley, Peter, Letters of, by S. Smith (q.v.), published in 1807-8.

The letters purport to be written by one Peter Plymley to his brother in the country, the Rev. Abraham Plymley, in favour of Catholic Emancipation. The supposed arguments of the Rev. Abraham for maintaining the disabilities of the Roman Catholics are taken one by one, and demolished with an abundance of good sense, wit, and humour; while at the same time the author ridicules what he calls the 'nonsense' of the Roman Catholic religion.

Plymouth Brethren, a religious body that arose at Plymouth, c. 1830. They have no formal creed (though believing in Christ) or official order of ministers.

Pocahontas or MATOAKA (1595-1617), an American-Indian princess, the daughter of Powhattan, an Indian chief in Virginia. According to the untrustworthy account of Capt. John Smith (q.v.), one of the Virginia colonists who had been taken prisoner by the Indians, he was rescued by her when her father was about to slay him in 1607 (she was then only 12). In 1612 she was seized as a hostage by the Colonists for the good behaviour of the Indian tribes (or for the restitution of English captives), became a Christian, was named Rebecca, and married a colonist, John Rolfe. She was brought to England in 1616, where she at first attracted considerable attention, but died neglected and in poverty in 1617. Those who claim descent from her are legion. She is introduced by Ben Jonson in his 'The Staple of News' (q.v.), II. i. George Warrington, in Thackeray's 'The Virginians', composes a tragedy on her.

Pocket, HERBERT, a character in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.).

Pocock, MRS. SARAH and JIM, characters in H. James's 'The Ambassadors' (q.v.).

Podsnap, MR., a character in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.), a type of self-satisfaction and self-importance.

POE, EDGAR ALLAN (1809-49), born at Boston, Mass., of actor parents, became an orphan in early childhood, and was brought up and protected by John Allan, a tobacco exporter of Richmond, who appears to have reaped little satisfaction or gratitude from Poe for his kindness. Poe was brought to England and sent to school at Stoke Newington (see his 'William Wilson'), and was subsequently at the university of Virginia for a year. His first publication, 'Tamerlane, and other Poems', belongs to the year 1827. In 1828 he enlisted in the U.S. army. His discharge was procured and he entered the Military Academy at West Point, but was dismissed in 1831. Meanwhile his poems had met with no success and he turned to journalism. He became editor of various periodicals, including the 'Southern Literary Messenger', in which he published some of his best stories.

POETASTER

His 'Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque' appeared in 1839; 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue' in 1841; 'The Gold Bug', dealing with the solution of a cryptogram, in 1843; 'The Raven', the first poem that brought him wide popularity, in 1845. But he had already written some notable verse, 'To Helen', 'Israfel', 'The City in the Sea', 'The Haunted Palace', and 'Dream Land', between 1831 and 1844. His 'Ulalume' appeared in 1847; 'For Annie', 'Annabel Lee', and 'The Bells', in 1849. Among his other remarkable tales may be mentioned 'The House of Usher', 1839; 'A Descent into the Maelstrom', 1841; 'The Masque of the Red Death' and 'The Mystery of Marie Roger', 1842; and 'The Cask of Amontillado', 1846. Poe also wrote much literary criticism.

Poeana, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', IV. viii. 49 et seq., the daughter of the giant Corflambo (q.v.). She falls in love with Amyas, the 'Squire of low degree', whom her father has taken prisoner. But Amyas loves Aemylia. His friend Placidus, who closely resembles him, goes to him in his captivity and is mistaken for him by Poeana, but escapes from her. Amyas is released by Prince Arthur.

Poema Morale, or Moral Ode, a poem in English of the period 1200-50, chiefly interesting for its metrical form, rhymed couplets of fourteen syllables. It is a disquisition on the shortness of life, the failure of wisdom to increase with age, the coming of Judgement, and the joys of Heaven.

Poems and Ballads, see Swinburne (A. C.).

Poet Laureate, the title given to a poet who receives a stipend as an officer of the Royal Household, his duty (no longer enforced) being to write court-odes, &c. The title formerly was sometimes conferred by certain universities.

The first poet laureate in the modern sense was Ben Jonson, but the title seems to have been first officially given to Dryden. The other laureates in chronological order are as follows: Shadwell, Tate, Rowe, Eusden, Cibber, Whitehead, T. Warton, Pye, Southey, Wordsworth, A. Tennyson, A. Austin, Bridges, Masfield (qq.v.). See E. K. Broadus, 'The Laureateship' (1921).

Poets' Corner, part of the south transept of Westminster Abbey containing the tombs or monuments of Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Milton, Drayton, Samuel Butler, and many later distinguished poets and authors. It is called in the 'Spectator' (1711) 'the poetical Quarter'.

Poetaster, The, a satirical comedy by Jonson (q.v.), produced in 1601. The scene is the court of Caesar Augustus, but the play deals with the quarrels and rivalries of the poets of Jonson's own day, though many of the incidents alluded to are now lost to us. The principal characters, besides the emperor, are Horace, representing Jonson himself, Virgil, perhaps representing Shakespeare, Crispinus, who stands for Marston, and Demetrius, who is described as 'a dresser of plays about the town', for Dekker. Another notable character is Tucca, a foul-mouthed bully and coward, copied from a certain Capt. Hannam, a notorious parasite of the day. The plot, so far as there is one, consists in a conspiracy of Crispinus and Demetrius, instigated by Tucca, to defame Horace. The matter is tried before Caesar. The arraignments, in ridiculous verse, are read, Horace is acquitted, and a 'light vomit' is administered to Crispinus to rid him of his long words. The incident of Ovid's banishment by Augustus is also introduced.

To the attack on Marston and Dekker the latter replied in 'Satiromastix' (q.v.).

Poetical Rapsody, A, a collection of Elizabethan verse, published by F. Davison (q.v.) and his brother Walter in 1602, and edited by Bullen in Arber's 'English Scholar's Library'. It includes 'The Lie', attributed to Sir Walter Raleigh; the song 'In praise of a Beggar's Life', quoted by Izaak Walton in 'The Compleat Angler'; and poems by Greene, Wotton, Sidney, Spenser, Donne, and others.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, GIAN FRANCESCO (1380-1459), Italian humanist, who recovered many lost works of Roman literature.

Pollu (French 'hairy'), a familiar name for the French private soldier, which came into use in the war of 1914-18.

Polins, in Shakespeare's '1 and 2 Henry IV' (q.v.), one of Falstaff's companions.

Polrot, HERCULE, the detective in Mrs. Agatha Christie's stories of crime.

Polack, an obsolete name for a Pole, used by Shakespeare in 'Hamlet', 1. i, and four times in other places in the same play.

Pole, WILFRID, a character in Meredith's 'Sandra Belloni' and 'Vittoria' (qq.v.).

Policraticus, see John of Salisbury.

Polinarda, a character in 'Palmerin of England' (q.v.).

Polite Learning, An Enquiry into the Present State of, see Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning.

POLITIAN, see Poliziano.

Political Arithmetic, see Petty.

Political Eclogues, see Rolliad.

Political Register, The, a weekly newspaper founded in 1802 by Cobbett (q.v.), which he continued to issue even when in prison. It obtained a large circulation and gave Cobbett a strong hold on public opinion. It survived until 1835.

Pollick Would-be, SIR and LADY, characters in Jonson's 'Volpone' (q.v.).

Polixenes, a character in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.).

POLO

POLIZIANO, ANGELO (1454-94), known in English as POLITIAN, so named from his birthplace, Monte Pulciano, Italian humanist and friend of Lorenzo the Magnificent (see Medici), wrote Latin poems on the classical authors, translated into Latin part of the 'Iliad', and wrote a number of poems in the vernacular, notably 'La Giostra' and 'La Favola di Orfeo'.

POLLARD, ALFRED WILLIAM (1859-1944), bibliographer and scholar, joint-secretary of the Bibliographical Society (q.v.) and fellow of the British Academy (q.v.). He wrote many bibliographical works, was editor of the 'Globe' Chaucer, and made important contributions to Shakespearean scholarship.

Pollentè, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. ii, the 'cruel sarazin' who holds a bridge and despoils those who pass over it, the father of Munera (q.v.). He is slain by Sir Artegall.

Pollexfen, SIR HARGRAVE, the villain in Richardson's 'Sir Charles Grandison' (q.v.).

POLLOCK, SIR FREDERICK (1845-1937), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, was professor of jurisprudence at Oxford, 1883-1903. His numerous publications on legal subjects include: 'The Principles of Contract' (1876), 'Essays in Jurisprudence and Ethics' (1882), 'The Law of Torts' (1887), 'History of English Law before the time of Edward I' (with F. W. Maitland, 1895), 'The Expansion of the Common Law' (1904). He also wrote 'Spinoza, his Life and Philosophy' (1880, 1899, 1912) and with E. F. Maitland published 'The Etchingham Letters' in 1899.

Pollux, see Castor.

Polly, a musical play by J. Gay (q.v.), published in 1729. Its production on the stage was prohibited by the lord chamberlain. The play is a sequel to 'The Beggar's Opera' (q.v.).

The principal characters are the Macheath and Polly Peachum of the earlier play. Macheath has been transported to the West Indies, has run away from the plantation, and is thought dead, but is in fact disguised as Morano, chief of the pirates. Polly comes to the West Indies to seek him, is entrapped into the household of Ducat, a planter, from whose amorous intentions she escapes owing to an attack of the pirates on the settlement. Disguised as a man she joins the loyal Indians, helps to beat off the attack, takes Morano prisoner, learns his identity too late to save him from execution, and marries an Indian prince.

Thanks to the advertisement which the play received by its prohibition, it brought in £1,200 to the author.

POLO, MARCO (1254-1324), a member of a patrician family of Venice, accompanied his father and uncle in 1271 on an embassy from the Pope to Kublai, Grand Khan of Tartary. They travelled through Armenia, Iraq, Kho-rasan, and the Pamir, to Kashgar; thence to Khoten, across the desert of Lop and into Chinese territory, where they were well received by the emperor and where Marco was employed on services of importance. After seventeen years in the territories of the Grand Khan, the Polos obtained permission to return home, which they did by sea to the Persian Gulf, eventually reaching Venice after an absence of twenty-four years. Marco Polo's account of his travels was written while imprisoned by the Genoese, by whom he had been captured in a sea-fight with the Venetians. The original text appears to have been in French. The existence of other and wilder romances of Eastern travel (such as Mandeville, &c.) tended to make Polo 'suspect', at least in places; but there is no reason for any such suspicion. The work became very popular and was translated into many languages. It was englished by John Framp-ton in 1579; but the first serious English translation was by W. Marsden early in the 19th cent. The classical one is by Sir Henry Yule, with full notes, which first appeared in 1871 (there are subsequent editions). A standard edition of the Italian text, with new materials, by L. F. Benedetto was published in Florence in 1928.

POLO

Polonius, a character in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.).

Poltergeist (from the German polter, noise, geist, spirit), a spirit that makes its presence known by noises.

Polton, in the detective stories of Austin Freeman, the laboratory assistant of Dr. Thorndyke (q.v.).

POLYBIUS (c. 204-122 B.C.), born at Megalopolis in Arcadia, and brought to Rome as a hostage in 167, became the friend of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Minor. He was enabled through his patronage to obtain access to materials for his great historical work (written in Greek). This consisted of forty books, of which five, besides passages from the others, are extant. It begins at 264 B.C. with the Punic Wars, and extends to 146 B.C. There is a good translation by E. S. Shuck-burgh (2 vols., 1889).

Polychronicon, The, see Higden.

Polyclētus or POLYCLETUS of Sicyon (fl. c. 450-420 B.C.), a celebrated sculptor who paid special attention to embodying in his statues the most perfect proportions of the human form. His statue of the DORYPHOROS or Spear-bearer was known as 'The Canon' or rule, as being an ideal representation of a man's figure. There is a replica of this statue at Naples.

Polycratēs, a tyrant of Samos, who acquired great riches by his piratical enterprises. Amasis, king of Egypt (572-528 B.C.), his ally, alarmed, according to Herodotus, by the un-failing good fortune of Polycrates, advised him to throw away something that he valued highly, so as to avert the disaster that must sooner or later overtake him. Polycrates thereupon threw into the sea a ring of extra-ordinary beauty. But shortly afterwards the ring was found in the belly of a fish that a fisherman had presented to Polycrates. Polycrates was finally captured by Oroetes, satrap of Sardis, and crucified.

Polydore, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), the name borne by Guiderius while in the Welsh forest; (2) a character in Otway's 'The Orphan' (q.v.); (3) a character in Fletcher's 'The Mad Lover'.

POLYDORE VERGIL, see Vergil (P.).

Polyglot Bible, The, edited in 1654-7 by Brian Walton (1600?-61), bishop of Chester, with the help of many scholars. It contains various oriental texts of the Bible with Latin translations, and a critical apparatus.

Polyhymnia or POLYMNIA, the Muse (q.v.) of sacred song.

Polyhymnia, a poem by Peele (q.v.) written in 1590, commemorating the retirement of Sir Henry Lee from the office of queen's champion, and describing the ceremonies that took place on this occasion. It contains at the end the beautiful song 'His golden locks time hath to silver turned . . .' made widely known by Thackeray's quotation of it in 'The Newcomes'.

Polyneices, see Eteocles.

Poly-Olbion, The (this is the spelling of the 1st edition), the principal work of Drayton (q.v.). It was written between 1613 and 1622 and consists of thirty 'Songs' each of 300-500 lines, in hexameter couplets, in which the author endeavours to awaken his readers to the beauties and glories of their country. Travelling from the SW. to Chester, down through the Midlands to London, up the eastern counties to Lincoln, and then through Lancashire and Yorkshire to Northumberland and Westmorland, he describes, or at least enumerates, the principal topographical features of the country, but chiefly the rivers and rivulets, interspersing in the appropriate places legends, fragments of history, catalogues of British saints and hermits, of great discoverers, of birds, fishes, and plants with their properties. The first eighteen songs were annotated by John Selden (q.v.). The word 'poly-olbion' (from the Greek) means 'having many blessings'.

Polyphēmus, one of the Cyclopes (q.v.), a son of Poseidon (q.v.). He kept his flocks on the coast of Sicily when Ulysses, returning from the Trojan War, was driven there. Ulysses and twelve companions were seized by Polyphēmus, who confined them in his cave, blocked the entrance with a huge stone, and daily devoured two of them. Ulysses would have shared this fate, had he not intoxicated the Cyclopes, put out his eye with a firebrand while he slept, and escaped from the cave by concealing himself in the wool under the belly of one of the rams of Polyphēmus as they were let out to feed. Polyphēmus loved the nymph Galatea (q.v.) and crushed his rival Acis with a rock.

Polyxēna, a daughter of Priam (q.v.) and Hecuba, who was loved by Achilles. When the Greeks were returning from the siege of Troy, the ghost of Achilles appeared to them and demanded her. Polyxena was accordingly sacrificed by Neoptolemus on the tomb of Achilles.

Pomare (pron. Pō-mā-rē), the name of a succession of native rulers of Tahiti (Otaheite), one of the Society Islands in the Pacific. The best known is Queen Pomare IV, who reigned from 1827 to 1877. She figures in Herman Melville's 'Omoo' (q.v.).

POMFRET, JOHN (1667-1702), chiefly remembered as the author of a poem, 'The Choice' (1700), which for a time enjoyed great popularity and secured for Pomfret inclusion in Johnson's 'Lives of the Poets'. It describes the kind of life and modest competence that the author would choose.

Pommard, see Burgundy.

Pommery, see Champagne.

Pomōna, an Italian goddess of gardens and fruit-trees. She was loved by Vertumnus (q.v.).

Pompadour, MARQUISE DE (1721-64), mistress of Louis XV of France, an intelligent patroness of art and literature, but her political influence was less fortunate. It was she who said, 'Après nous le déluge!' The name 'pompadour' is applied to fashions, colours, &c., popular in her day.

Pompell, The Last Days of, see Last Days of Pompeii.

Pompey, naval slang for Portsmouth.

Pompey (GNAEUS POMPEIUS) (106-48 B.C.), surnamed 'The Great', a famous Roman general, who joined forces with Sulla and showed great military ability in the campaigns against the Marians. He aided in finishing the Servile War in 71, cleared the western Mediterranean of pirates in 67, and brought to an end the war with Mithridates. He formed with Julius Caesar and Crassus the first triumvirate in 60; but Caesar's increasing power in the ensuing years made a struggle between him and Pompey inevitable, and the death of Pompey's wife Julia (Caesar's daughter) in 54 severed one of the links between them. Pompey became the leader of the aristocracy and conservative party, and began the civil war with Caesar in 49. He was defeated at Pharsalus in 48, and sailed for Egypt. While landing from a small boat, he was stabbed in the back and killed by Septimius, formerly one of his centurions.

Pompey the Great, his faire Corneliaes Tragedy, a Senecan tragedy in blank verse by Kyd (q.v.), published in 1595. An anonymous text entitled 'Cornelia' had appeared in the preceding year. The work is a translation from the French of Garnier, and deals with the story of Cornelia, daughter of Metellus Scipio, and wife of Pompey the Great. The latter, after the battle of Pharsalus, is killed on the way to Egypt. Scipio, Cornelia's father, then assembles new forces, but is defeated by Caesar at Thapsus in Africa, and ultimately takes his own life. The play consists, in great part, of Cornelia's lamentations for her misfortunes.

'The Tragedy of Pompey the Great' is the title of a play by Massfield (q.v.).

Pompey the Little, The History of, see Coventry (F.).

Pompey's Pillar, a Corinthian column of red granite, erected at Alexandria in A.D. 302 in honour of the Emperor Diocletian. It has no connexion with Pompey.

Pomplila, in R. Browning's 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.), the murdered wife of Count Guido Franceschini.

Pomponius Ego, the sporting journalist in 'Handley Cross', by R. S. Surtees (q.v.).

Pons Asinorum (Latin, the bridge of asses), a name humorously given to the fifth proposition of the first book of Euclid, owing to the difficulty that beginners or dull-witted persons find in 'getting over' it.

Pontet Canet, see Claret.

PONTOPPIDAN, ERIK (1698-1764), a Danish author and bishop of Bergen in Norway. His principal works are the 'Gesta et vestigia Danorum extra Daniam' (1740), and a 'Natural History of Norway' (1755), frequently mentioned on account of its description of the kraken or sea-serpent.

Pooh-Bah, a character in Gilbert and Sullivan's opera 'The Mikado', who has been described as 'the essence of cultivated diplomacy behind which lurks the basest of motives'.

POOLE, JOHN (1786?-1872), dramatist, remembered chiefly as the author of the successful farces 'Paul Pry' (1825), 'Twixt the Cup and the Lip' (1827), and 'Lodgings for Single Gentlemen' (1829).

Poor Richard's Almanack, a series of almanacs, with maxims, issued by B. Franklin (q.v.), 1732-57. They contain much proverbial philosophy and some good fooling, in ridicule of the prophecies of almanac-makers. They attained remarkable popularity and were translated into many languages.

Poor Robin, the name of a facetious almanac, first published in 1661 or 1662.

Poor Tom, a name assumed by an 'Abraham man' (q.v.), who feigns madness, in the 'Fraternity of Vacabones' (q.v.); also by Edgar in Shakespeare's 'King Lear', III. iv.

Pooter, CHARLES, see Diary of a Nobody.

POPE, ALEXANDER (1688-1744), was the son of a Roman Catholic linen-draper of London. His health was ruined and his figure distorted by a severe illness at the age of 12, brought on by 'perpetual application'. He lived with his parents at Binfield in Windsor Forest and was largely self-educated. He showed his precocious metrical skill in his 'Pastorals', written, according to himself, when he was 16, and published in Tonson's 'Miscellany' (vol. vi) in 1709. (For Pope's quarrel with Ambrose Philips on this subject see under Philips, A.) He became intimate with Wycherley, who introduced him to London life. His 'Essay on Criticism' (q.v.), 1711, made him known to Addison's circle, and his 'Messiah' (q.v.) was published in the 'Spectator' in 1712. His 'Rape of the Lock' (q.v.) appeared in Lintot's 'Miscellanies' in the same year and was republished, enlarged, in 1714. His 'Ode for Music on St. Cecilia's Day', published in 1713, one of his rare attempts at lyric, shows that his gifts did not lie in this direction. In 1713 he also published 'Windsor Forest' (q.v.), which appealed to the Tories by its references to the Peace of Utrecht, and won him the friendship of Swift (q.v.). He drifted away from Addison's 'little senate' and became a member of the 'Scriblerus Club', an association that included Swift, Gay, Arbuthnot, Atterbury, and others. He issued in 1715 the first volume of his translation in heroic couplets of Homer's 'Iliad'. This work, completed in 1720, though not an accurate version of the original, is one of the great poems of the age. It was supplemented in 1725-6 by a translation of the 'Odyssey', in which he was assisted by William Broome and Elijah Fenton. The two translations added considerably to his fortune. He bought in 1719 the lease of a house at Twickenham, where he spent the remainder of his life.

In 1717 had appeared a collection of his works including two poems of importance, not only on account of some beautiful passages, but also as dealing, alone among his writings, with the passion of love. They are the 'Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady', an impassioned elegy on a lady who has taken her life to escape the torture of hopeless love, and 'Eloisa to Abelard', a longer poem expressing the conflict in the soul of a woman who loves and has renounced love for the service of God. About this time he became strongly attached to Martha Blount, with whom his intimacy continued throughout his life, and to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whom in later years he assailed with bitterness.

Pope assisted Gay in writing the comedy 'Three Hours after Marriage' (1717), but made no other attempt at drama. In 1723, four years after Addison's death, appeared (in a miscellany called 'Cytherea') Pope's portrait of Atticus, a satire on Addison, probably written some years earlier. An extended version of this appeared as 'A Fragment of a Satire' in a 1727 volume of the 'Miscellanies' (by Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, and Gay), and it took its final form in 'An

Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot' (1735). In the same 'Miscellanies' volume Pope published his 'Martinus Scriblerus ΠΕΡΙ ΒΑΘΟΥΣ, or the Art of Sinking in Poetry', ridiculing among others Ambrose Philips, Theobald, and J. Dennis (qq.v.). In 1725 Pope published an edition of Shakespeare, the errors in which were pointed out in a pamphlet by Theobald (q.v.). This led to the selection of Theobald by Pope as the hero of his 'Dunciad' (q.v.), a satire on Dullness, in three books, on which he had been at work for some time and of which the first edition appeared anonymously in 1728. A further enlarged edition was published in 1729. An additional book, 'The New Dunciad', was published in 1742, perhaps at the suggestion of his friend William Warburton; and the complete 'Dunciad' (q.v.) in four books appeared in 1743. In this Cibber replaces Theobald as the hero. Influenced by the philosophy of his friend Bolingbroke, Pope published a series of moral and philosophical poems, 'An Essay on Man' (q.v.), 1733-4, consisting of four Epistles; and 'Moral Essays' (q.v.), four in number: 'Of the Knowledge and Characters of Men', 'Of the Characters of Women', and two on the subject 'Of the Use of Riches' (1731-5). A fifth epistle was added, addressed to Addison, occasioned by his dialogue on Medals. This was originally written in Addison's lifetime in 1715. In 1733 Pope published the first of his miscellaneous satires, 'Imitations of Horace', entitled 'Satire I', a paraphrase of the first satire of the second book of Horace, in the form of a dialogue between the poet and William Fortescue, the lawyer. In it Pope defends himself against the charge of malignity, and professes to be inspired only by love of virtue. He inserts, however, a gross attack on his former friend Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. He followed this up with his 'Imitations' of Horace's Satires II, ii and I, ii ('Sober Advice from Horace'), in 1734, and of Epistles I, vi; II, ii; II, i, and I, i, in 1737. Horace's Epistle I, vii and the latter part of Sat. II, vi, 'imitated in the manner of Dr. Swift', appeared in 1738. The year 1735 saw the appearance of the 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot' (above referred to), the prologue to the above Satires, one of Pope's most brilliant pieces of irony and invective, mingled with autobiography. It contains the famous portraits of Addison (ll. 193-214) and Lord Hervey (q.v.), and lashes his minor critics, Dennis, Colley Cibber, Curll, Theobald, &c. In 1738 appeared 'One Thousand Seven Hundred and Thirty Eight', two satirical dialogues. These satires, and the 'Satires (II and IV) of Dr. Donne Versified' (1735), with the 'New Dunciad', previously mentioned, closed his literary career.

He was partly occupied during his later years with the publication of his earlier correspondence, which he edited and amended in such a manner as to misrepresent the literary history of the time. He also employed discreditable artifices to make it appear that it was published against his wish. Thus he procured the publication by Curll of his 'Literary Correspondence' in 1735, and then endeavoured to disavow him. He appears to have taken advantage of Swift's failing powers to saddle him with the responsibility for a similar publication in 1741.

Minor works by Pope that deserve mention are:

Verse: the Epistles 'To a Young Lady [Miss Blount] with the works of Voiture' (1712), to the same 'On her leaving the town after the Coronation' (1717), 'To Mr. Jervas with Dryden's translation of Fresnoy's Art of Painting' (1716), and 'To Robert, Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer' (1721); 'Vertumnus and Pomona', 'Sappho to Phaon', and 'The Fable of Dryope', translations from Ovid (1712); 'January and May', 'The Wife of Bath, her Prologue', and 'The Temple of Fame', from Chaucer (1709, 1714, 1715).

Prose: 'The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris' (1713), a satirical attack on J. Dennis, (q.v.); 'A full and true Account of a horrid and barbarous Revenge by poison, on . . . Mr. Edmund Curll' (1716), an attack on Curll (q.v.), the publisher.

Pope was buried in Twickenham Church. The first collective edition of his 'Works' appeared in 1751. The standard edition is that edited by Whitwell Elwin and W. J. Courthope, and published between 1871 and 1889.

Pope, GIANT, see Giant Pope.

Pope-figs, in Rabelais, iv. xlv, the inhabitants of an island visited by Pantagruel, representing the Calvinists or Lutherans, so named because they said, 'a fig for the pope's image'.

Pope Joan, see Joan (Pope).

Popish Plot, THE, a plot fabricated in 1678 by Titus Oates. He deposed before the Middlesex magistrate Sir Edmond Berry Godfrey that it was intended to murder Charles II, place James on the throne, and suppress Protestantism. Godfrey was found murdered the next morning. The existence of the plot was widely believed and great excitement prevailed. Many persons were falsely accused and executed. J. Pollock ('The Popish Plot', 1903) has written a careful study of the story. He inclines to think that the Jesuits had some plot afoot, not necessarily anything so extensive as Oates pretended, but not stopping short of assassination if necessary.

Porch, THE, a name given to the Stoic school of Greek philosophy (see Stoics).

PORDAGE, SAMUEL (1633-91?), author of 'Azaria and Hushai' (1682), a feeble reply to Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), and of 'The Medal Revers'd' (1682).

Porphyron, in Greek mythology, one of the giants who made war against the gods. He was overcome by Zeus and Hercules.

PORPHYRIUS (233-c. 301), a Neoplatonic philosopher and opponent of Christianity, author of the PORPHYRIAN TREE, a kind of genealogical table or tree, furnishing a definition of man. It starts with the summum genus 'substance', and arrives at man by a process of dichotomy.

Porphyrogenite, originally one born of the imperial family at Constantinople, and (as is said) in a chamber called the Porphyra (purple). Hence, a child born after his father's accession to the throne; and, in a more general sense, one 'born in the purple'. Constantine VII (911-59) called himself or was called 'Porphyrogenitus'. He was a man of letters and wrote a book about the administration of the Empire.

Porrex, see Gorboduc.

Porsenna or PORSENA, LARS (6th cent. B.C.), a king of Etruria, who according to legend declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin (q.v.) to the throne. He would have entered Rome but for the bravery of Horatius Cocles (q.v.) at the bridge. This legend conceals an invasion of Rome by the Etruscans for purpose of conquest.

PORSON, RICHARD (1759-1808), son of the parish clerk at East Ruston, near North Walsham, showed extraordinary memory when a boy, and by the help of various protectors was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge. He was elected Regius professor of Greek at Cambridge in 1792. He edited four plays of Euripides, the 'Hecuba' in 1797, 'Orestes' in 1798, 'Phoenissae' in 1799, and 'Medea' in 1801. 'His finest single piece of criticism' (Jebb) was his supplement to the preface to his 'Hecuba', in which he states and illustrates certain rules of iambic and trochaic verse, in opposition to the views of Hermann. Some of his best English writing is to be seen in his 'Letters to Archdeacon Travis' (1788-9) on the authenticity of the text of 1 John v. 7 ('For there are three that bear record in heaven'); the letters also show his spirit of mischievous humour. His literary remains were published after his death, between 1812 and 1834. His correspondence appeared in 1867. He advanced Greek scholarship by his elucidation of Greek idiom and usage, by his knowledge of Greek prosody, and by his emendation of texts. He was also famous as a lover of wine.

Port Wine, from Oporto, the chief place of shipment in Portugal of the wines of that country, a well-known strong dark-red wine, often fortified with brandy. Its consumption in this country was stimulated by the Methuen treaty of 1703, under which the duty on Portuguese wine was lowered, to the disadvantage of French wines.

The references to port in English literature are innumerable. Perhaps the story in which it exercises the most potent influence on the course of events is Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v., 'An aged and a great wine'). Saintsbury in 'Notes on a Cellar-Book' observes that 'there is something about it which must have been created in pre-established harmony with the best English character'. But its excessive consumption in the 18th and 19th cents. undoubtedly did great harm to England.

Porte, THE SUBLIME, a translation of the Turkish bab-i-ali, the high or sublime gate, the official title of the central office of the Ottoman government under the rule of the Sultans. 'Gate' is supposed to refer to the ancient place of audience, &c., at the gate of the tent or the king's gate. The attribute 'high' is not literal but honorific.

Porteous, CAPTAIN JOHN, see Heart of Midlothian.

PORTER, ANNA MARIA (1780-1832), sister of J. Porter (q.v.), and authoress of 'The Hungarian Brothers' (1807), a tale of the French revolutionary war, and other novels.

Porter, ENDYMION (1587-1649), was brought up in Spain, and on his return obtained a place in Buckingham's household. He became groom of the bed-chamber to Prince Charles and accompanied him and Buckingham on the visit to Spain in 1623. He was the friend and patron of poets, including Jonson, Herrick, D'Avenant, and Dekker, and the subject of their encomiums. He sat in the Long Parliament, but was expelled, lived abroad in poverty, and compounded with the parliament for a small fine in 1649.

PORTER, JANE (1776-1850), authoress of two successful novels, 'Thaddeus of Warsaw' (q.v.), published in 1803, and 'The Scottish Chiefs' (q.v.), published in 1810. The latter was translated into German and Russian. She attempted plays with less success. She was sister of A. M. Porter (q.v.).

Porter, WILLIAM SYDNEY, see O. Henry.

Porthos, see Three Musketeers.

Portia, (1) the heroine of Shakespeare's 'The Merchant of Venice' (q.v.); (2) in his 'Julius Caesar', the wife of Brutus.

Portland Club, THE, a London card-playing club, the recognized authority on the game of bridge, as formerly on whist.

Portland Vase, also known as the BARBERINI VASE, a celebrated urn found in a sarcophagus near Rome, and purchased by Sir William Hamilton in 1770, from whom it passed into the possession of the Portland family. It is of dark blue transparent glass ornamented with cameos of opaque white glass, representing probably scenes from the legend of Peleus and Thetis. It was broken to pieces by a lunatic in 1845, and mended.

Portpipe, MR., a convivial cleric in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

Portrait of a Lady, The, a novel by H. James (q.v.), published in 1881.

This is one of the best of James's early works, in which he presents various types of American character transplanted into a European environment. The story centres in Isabel Archer, the 'Lady', an attractive American girl, whom circumstances have brought to Europe. Around her we have the placid old American banker, Mr. Touchett; his hard repellent wife; his ugly, invalid, witty, charming son Ralph, whom England has thoroughly assimilated; and the crude, brilliant, indomitably American Henrietta Stackpole, the journalist. Isabel refuses the offer of marriage of a typical English peer, the excellent Lord Warburton, and of a bulldog-like New Englander, Caspar Goodwood, to fall a victim, under the influence of the slightly sinister Madame Merle (another cosmopolitan American), to a worthless and spiteful dilettante, Gilbert Osmond, who marries her for her fortune and ruins her life; but to whom she remains loyal in spite of her realization of his vileness.

Port-Royal, originally a Cistercian nunnery near Chevreuse (Seine-et-Oise, France), became in 1636 a place of retreat for pious and learned men holding the Jansenist (q.v.) doctrine, where they devoted themselves to prayer, study, and manual employments. It became the headquarters of Jansenism and the centre of a system of education, and exercised a wide influence, notably on Pascal and Racine. The institution was persecuted by the Jesuits, and finally destroyed by Louis XIV in 1710. A history of Port-Royal was published by Sainte-Beuve (q.v.) in 1840-48.

Poseidon, called NEPTUNE by the Romans, was according to Greek mythology a son of Cronos and Rhea, and brother of Zeus and Hades. He shared with these his father's empire, receiving as his portion the kingdom of the sea. He was the husband of Amphitrite, the builder (with Apollo) of the walls of Troy for Laomedon, and the implacable enemy of the Trojans because Laomedon refused to give the gods the reward stipulated for this service.

Positivist Philosophy, see Comte.

Posthumus Leonatus, a character in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.).

Post-Impressionism, a term invented by Mr. Roger Fry to cover various movements in modern art, directed to the expression of the inner truths of structure, as opposed to the surface effects of light pursued by the impressionists. The principal names associated with the movement are those of the French painters Paul Cézanne (q.v.), Paul Gauguin (1848-1903), Henri Matisse (b. 1869), and the Dutch painter Vincent van Gogh (1853-1890).

Postumus, a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addressed his Ode, II. xiv, 'Eheu fugaces, Postume, Postume'.

POTIPHAR'S WIFE

Potiphar's Wife, who tempted Joseph (Gen. xxxix), 'some call her Rail, but the name by which she is best known is Zoleikha' (Sale's notes to the Koran).

Potō'mac, THE ARMY OF THE, the principal federal (Northern) army in the American Civil War.

Pott, Mr., in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), the editor of the 'Eatanswill Gazette'.

Potter, PAUL (1625-54), a famous Dutch painter, who excelled in depicting animals.

Pottyfar, MR., a character in Marryat's 'Midshipman Easy' (q.v.).

Potwalloper, a popular alteration of pot-waller, i.e. pot-boiler, the term applied in some English boroughs, before the Reform Act of 1832, to a man qualified for the parliamentary vote as a householder, the test of which was his having a separate fireplace, on which his own pot was boiled.

Poulter's measure, a fanciful name for a metre consisting of lines of 12 and 14 syllables alternately. Poulter = poulterer.

'Poulter's measure, which giveth xii for one dozen, and xiii for another.'

(Gascoigne, 'Steele Glas').

Pounce, PETER, a character in Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

Poundtext, REV. PETER, in Scott's 'Old Mortality', a Presbyterian divine, the 'indulged' pastor of Milnwood's parish.

Povey, SAMUEL, a character in Bennett's 'The Old Wives' Tale' (q.v.).

Powls, MERTHYR, a character in Meredith's 'Sandra Belloni' and 'Vittoria' (qq.v.).

Poyser, MARTIN and MRS., characters in G. Eliot's 'Adam Bede' (q.v.).

PRAED, WINTHROP MACKWORTH (1802-39), was educated at Eton, where he founded the 'Etonian', and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He went to the bar and then into parliament, and was appointed secretary to the Board of Control in 1834. He is remembered principally as a humorous poet, though like Hood, with whom he is naturally compared, he sometimes uses humour to clothe a grim subject, as in 'The Red Fisherman'. Of his lighter verse, social and political, 'The County Ball', 'The Letter of Advice', 'Goodnight to the Season', 'Stanzas on seeing the Speaker asleep', 'Molly Mog', 'The Vicar', 'Twenty-Eight and Twenty-Nine', are among the best examples. In purely serious poetry, Praed fell far short of Hood at his best; in this kind, 'Time's Song' and 'Arminius' are perhaps Praed's most notable works.

Praeterita, Outlines of scenes and thoughts perhaps worthy of memory in my past life, an uncompleted autobiography by Ruskin (q.v.), published at intervals during 1885-9.

It tells of the influence on Ruskin of Copley Fielding and Turner, of his childhood, of his first visit to the 'Gates of the

PRE-ADAMITE

Hills' (the Alps), of his travels in France and Italy, and of his friends, Dr. John Brown and Charles Eliot Norton.

Praetorian Guard, THE, at Rome, originally the praetoria cohors or select troops which attended the person of the praetor or general of the army; subsequently the force instituted by Augustus for the protection of Italy (where no legion was stationed). Their number was increased in the reign of Vitellius to 16,000 men, and they acquired great political power, often, especially in the 3rd cent., deposing and elevating emperors.

Pragmatic sanction, a rendering of the late juridical Latin pragmatica sanctio, 'an imperial decree relating to the affairs of a community', the technical name given to some imperial and royal ordinances issued as fundamental laws. It was applied first to edicts of the Eastern emperors; subsequently to certain decrees of Western sovereigns, as the Pragmatic sanction attributed to St. Louis of France, 1268, containing articles directed against the assumptions of the papacy. In more recent history it is applied particularly to the ordinance of the Emperor Charles VI in 1724, settling the succession to the territories of the House of Hapsburg. [OED.]

Pragmatism, in philosophy, the doctrine that the test of the value of any assertion lies in its practical consequences, i.e. in its practical bearing upon human interests and purposes. See James (W.).

Prairie State: Illinois, see United States.

Prajapati ('lord of creatures'), in Hindu theology of the Vedic period, a name applied to various gods in their character of protectors of the human race. In later speculation the Prajapatis are the offspring of Manu (q.v.) and progenitors of living creatures.

Prasutagus, king of the Icenii (a British tribe), husband of Boadicea, died A.D. 61.

Pratt, Miss, a character in Miss Ferrier's 'The Inheritance' (q.v.).

Praxitélès (b. c. 390 B.C.), a great Greek sculptor and a citizen of Athens, one of the leaders of a school which succeeded that of Pheidias (q.v.). He excelled in the representation of beauty of form. Among his finest works were his statue of Aphrodite, purchased by the Cnidians (of which there is a copy at Munich), and his statue of Hermes bearing the infant Dionysus, discovered at Olympia.

Prayer, THE BOOK OF COMMON, see Common Prayer.

Pre-adamite, an appellation given by Isaac de la Peyrère in his 'Prae-adamitae', 1655, to a race of men, the progenitors of the Gentile peoples, supposed by him to have existed long before Adam, whom he held to be the first parent of the Jews only.

For the PRE-ADAMITE SULTANS see Vathek.

PRÉCIEUSE

Précieuse, the French equivalent of our Blue Stocking (q.v.). See Rambouillet.

Prelude, The, an autobiographical poem, in fourteen books, by Wordsworth (q.v.), commenced in 1799 and completed in 1805, but not published until 1850, after the author's death.

In his preface to the 'Excursion', Wordsworth explains that, having retired to his native mountains with the hope of writing a literary work that might live, he thought it reasonable to take a review of his own mind, and record in verse the origin and progress of his own powers. This record we have in the 'Prelude'. It is addressed to his friend Coleridge. Wordsworth successively recalls his childhood, schooldays, his years at Cambridge, his first impressions of London, his first visit to France and the Alps, his residence in France during the Revolution (but not his connexion with Annette), and his reaction to those various experiences; showing the development of his love for human-kind and for the unassuming things that hold

A silent station in this beautiful world.

The full text, showing the work of Wordsworth on it in his later years, was recently published by E. de Selincourt (Oxford, 1926). The early versions (1805-6 and 1817-19), which were much altered in the 1850 standard text, are there printed for the first time.

Premium, Mr., the name taken by Sir Oliver Surface in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.), when he assumes the character of a money-lender.

Premonstratensians, a Roman Catholic order of regular canons founded early in the 12th cent. by St. Norbert at Prémontré, near Laon in France, so called because the site of their original house is said to have been prophetically pointed out to St. Norbert. They were known in England, where they had many monasteries (and still have one at Storrington, Sussex), as the White Canons.

Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, a group of young artists and men of letters who, about the year 1850, united to resist existing conventions in art and literature by a return to art forms as they supposed them to exist in European art before the time of Raphael. They published their doctrines in 'The Germ' (q.v.). The group was composed of William Holman Hunt, John Everett Millais, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, William Michael Rossetti, Thomas Woolner, Frederick George Stephens, and James Collinson.

Presbyterianism, a system of church government (the National Church of Scotland) in which no higher order than that of presbyter or elder is recognized, and all elders are ecclesiastically of equal rank. Each congregation is governed by its session of elders; these are subordinate to provincial Presbyteries, and these again are subordinate to the General Assembly of the Church.

PRESTER JOHN

PRESCOTT, WILLIAM HICKLING (1796-1859), born at Salem, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, had his sight affected by an accident while at college, but nevertheless devoted himself, with the help of a reader, to the study of ancient and modern literatures. His first work, 'The History of Ferdinand and Isabella', appeared in 1838. It was followed by the 'History of the Conquest of Mexico' (1843) and the 'History of the Conquest of Peru' (1847). The first two volumes of his unfinished 'History of Philip II, King of Spain' appeared in 1855, the third in 1858.

Present Discontents, Thoughts on the cause of the, a political treatise by E. Burke (q.v.), published in 1770.

The occasion of this work was the turbulence that had attended and followed the expulsion of Wilkes from parliament after his election for Middlesex, and in it Burke expounds for the first time his constitutional creed. He attributes the convulsions in the country to the control of parliament by the cabal known as the 'King's friends', a system of favouritism essentially at variance with the constitution. Burke considers in detail the Wilkes case, of which the importance lies in its being a test whether the favour of the people or of the court is the surer road to positions of trust. He dismisses various remedies that have been proposed, as endangering the constitution, which 'stands on a nice equipoise'. He thinks the first requirement is the restoration of the right of free election, and looks for further safeguards in the 'interposition of the body of the people itself' to secure decent attention to public interests, and in the restoration of party government.

Present State of Europe, The, see Phillips (J.).

Present State of the Nation, Observations on a late publication intitled the, a political treatise by E. Burke (q.v.), published in 1769.

This was Burke's first controversial publication on political matters. It is a reply to an anonymous pamphlet attributed to George Grenville, in which the decision of the Grenville administration to tax America was defended on the ground that the charges left by the war had made this course necessary. Burke reviews the economic condition of England and France, and defends the repeal of the Stamp Act by the Rockingham administration for the reason that 'politics should be adjusted, not to human reasonings, but to human nature', and that 'people must be governed in a manner agreeable to their temper and disposition'.

Prester John, i.e. 'Priest John', the name given in the Middle Ages to an alleged Christian priest and king, originally supposed to reign in the extreme Orient, beyond Persia and Armenia, but from the 15th cent. generally identified with the king of Ethiopia or Abyssinia. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') thinks it probable that the origin of the legend lies in the reports which reached Europe of the success of the Nestorian (q.v.) religion in the East. Marco Polo identifies Prester John with a certain Un-Khan, a historical person (d. 1203), who received tribute from the Tartars and was overcome and slain by Genghis Khan.

PRESTON, GEORGE F., see Warren (J. B. L.).

PRESTON, THOMAS (1537-98), dramatist. He was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 1584-98, and vice-chancellor of Cambridge University, 1589-90. He wrote 'A Lamentable Tragedy mixed full of Mirth conteynyng the Life of Cambises, King of Percia' (1569), which illustrates the transition from the morality play to historical drama. The bombastic grandiloquence of the piece became proverbial.

Pretenders: THE OLD, James Francis Edward Stuart (1688-1766), son of James II; THE YOUNG, Charles Edward Stuart (1720-88), son of the Old Pretender. 'Pretender' here means one who makes pretensions, a claimant.

Pretty-man, PRINCE, in Buckingham's 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.), 'sometimes a fisher's son, sometimes a prince', falls asleep while making love to Cloris, his mistress.

PRÉVOST, MARCEL (1862-1941), French novelist, author of 'Les Demi-Vierges' (1894), 'Le Jardin secret' (1895), 'Frédérique', 'Confession d'un Amant', 'Monsieur et Madame Moloch' (1906), &c.

PRÉVOST D'EXILES, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS (1697-1763), generally known as the ABBÉ PRÉVOST, at one time a soldier, at another a Benedictine monk, was an industrious writer principally remembered for his novel, 'L'Histoire du Chevalier des Grieux et de Manon Lescaut' (q.v., 1731). Among Prévost's translations from the English are those of Richardson's three novels.

Priam, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon, husband of Hecuba, and father of many sons (fifty according to Homer) and daughters, of whom the most famous were Hector, Paris, and Cassandra (qq.v.). Many of his sons were killed during the siege of Troy, and he himself was slain by Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, at the taking of the city.

Priāpus, a god of fertility whose cult spread from the East to Greece and Italy. He was said to be the son of Aphrodite and Dionysus or some other god. In his statues, often placed in gardens or at the doors of houses, he was represented as a grotesque deformed creature; and it was customary to inscribe short humorous poems or epigrams on these statues.

Price, FANNY, the heroine of Jane Austen's 'Mansfield Park' (q.v.).

PRICE, RICHARD (1723-91), a native of Glamorgan, was a Unitarian minister in London. He published in 1756 his best-known work, a 'Review of the Principal Questions in Morals', directed against Hutcheson's doctrine of the 'moral sense' and Hume's development thereof. He agrees with the views of J. Butler (q.v.) concerning conscience, self-love, and benevolence, and regards right and wrong as self-evident ideas, belonging to the nature of things, incapable of proof, but apprehended by the understanding. Price subsequently became known as a writer on financial and political questions, advocating the reduction of the national debt, 1771, and attacking the justice and policy of the American War, 1776. He was the intimate friend of Franklin, and in 1778 was invited by Congress to transfer himself to America. He was denounced by Burke for his approbation of the French Revolution.

Pride and Prejudice, a novel by J. Austen (q.v.). It was begun in 1796, and in its early form entitled 'First Impressions'. It was offered to Cadell, the publisher, in 1797 and refused. In its revised form it was published in 1813.

Mr. and Mrs. Bennet live with their five daughters at Longbourn in Hertfordshire. In the absence of a male heir, the property will pass by entail to a cousin, William Collins (q.v.), who, by the patronage of the haughty and insolent Lady Catherine de Bourgh, has been presented to a rectory in the immediate vicinity of her seat, Rosings, near Westerham in Kent. Charles Bingley, a rich bachelor, takes Netherfield, a house near Longbourn, and brings there his two sisters and his friend, Fitzwilliam Darcy, nephew of Lady Catherine. Bingley and Jane, the eldest Bennet girl, fall mutually in love. Darcy, though attracted to her next sister, the lively Elizabeth, offends her by his supercilious behaviour at a ball. The dislike is increased by the (false) account given to her by George Wickham, a young militia officer, and son of the late steward of the Darcy property, of the unjust treatment he has met with at Darcy's hands. The aversion is still further intensified when Darcy and Bingley's sisters, disgusted with the impropriety of Mrs. Bennet and her younger daughters, effect the separation of Bingley and Jane.

Meanwhile Mr. Collins, urged to marry by Lady Catherine, for whom he shows the most obsequious respect, and thinking to remedy in part the hardship caused to the Bennet girls by the entail, proposes to Elizabeth and is rejected. He promptly transfers his affections to Charlotte Lucas, a friend of the latter, who accepts him. Staying with the newly married couple at the parsonage, Elizabeth is again thrown into contact with

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE

Darcy, who is visiting Lady Catherine. Captivated by her in spite of himself, Darcy proposes to her in terms which do not conceal the violence that the proposal does to his pride. Elizabeth indignantly rejects him, adducing as reasons the part he has played in separating Jane from Bingley, and his alleged treatment of Wickham. Much mortified, Darcy in a letter justifies the former action and proves the baselessness of the latter charge, Wickham being in fact an unprincipled adventurer.

On a trip to the north of England with her uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner, Elizabeth visits Pemberley, Darcy's place in Derbyshire, thinking Darcy himself absent. Darcy appears on the scene, welcomes the visitors, and introduces them to his sister, showing greatly improved manners. At this point news reaches Elizabeth that her sister Lydia has eloped with Wickham. By Darcy's help the fugitives are traced, their marriage is brought about, and they are suitably provided for. The attachment between Bingley and Jane is renewed and leads to their engagement. In spite, and indeed in consequence, of the insolent intervention of Lady Catherine, Darcy and Elizabeth also become engaged. The story ends with the marriages of Jane and Elizabeth, an indication of their subsequent happiness, and the eventual reconciliation of Lady Catherine.

PRIESTLEY, JOHN BOYNTON (1894-), novelist and critic; educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His best-known novel is 'The Good Companions' (1929). He contributed a Life of George Meredith to the English Men of Letters series in 1926.

PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH (1733-1804), the son of a Yorkshire cloth-dresser, was educated at Batley Grammar School and Heckmondwike, and at Daventry academy. He became Presbyterian (Unitarian) minister at Nantwich and other places. He published in 1768 his 'Essay on the First Principles of Government', advocating the view that the happiness of the majority is 'the great standard by which everything relating to' social life 'must finally be determined', the theory taken up and developed by Bentham. His celebration of the fall of the Bastille led to a riot in which his house was wrecked. As a psychologist he was a materialist, but was influenced by Hartley (q.v.), of whose work he published a simplification, omitting the theory of vibrations. In 1774 he published his 'Examination of Scottish Philosophy'.

Priestley was also a chemist. He was the discoverer of oxygen ('dephlogisticated air'), and author of 'The History and present State of Electricity' (1767) and of other works recording valuable investigations. Finding life in England uncomfortable, owing to his opinions, he emigrated in 1794 to America, where he died.

Prig, Betsy, a character in Dickens's

PRIMROSE PATH

'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), who nurses in partnership with Mrs. Gamp, until her remark concerning the apocryphal Mrs. Harris, 'I don't believe there's no sich person', causes a difference between them.

Primas, a clericus vagus or wandering scholar, a 12th-cent. cleric of Orléans, mighty drinker and light-minded poet, one of the names associated with the arch-poet Goliath (q.v.). There was also a 13th-cent. Primas, canon of Cologne.

Prime Minister, The, a novel by A. Trollope, see Phineas Finn.

Primer, originally a name for prayer-books or devotional manuals for the use of the laity, used in England before, and for some time after, the Reformation. The medieval Primer was mainly a copy or translation of different parts of the Breviary and Manual. The name was also given in the 16th cent. to books similar in character, partly based upon the 'Sarum Horae', whether put out by private persons or by royal authority (the 'King's Primer' of 1545 and successive recensions issued in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Elizabeth). After the Reformation, primer was also applied to books in which the offices for daily prayers were based upon the orders contained in the Book of Common Prayer. Later forms of this appeared at various times down to 1783. [OED.] From this sense was gradually developed that of an elementary school-book. Johnson defines Primer as 'a small prayer-book in which children are taught to read'.

Primrose, Dr., the hero of Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.). The other principal members of the family are: DEBORAH his wife; GEORGE their eldest son, who wanders about the Continent, much as Goldsmith himself did, seeking his fortune, then returns home, becomes a captain, and finally marries Miss Wilmot, an heiress; MOSES, the second son, a simpleton and a pedant, who, when sent to the fair to sell a horse, comes home with a gross of green spectacles in exchange; OLIVIA, the elder daughter, sprightly and commanding, who wishes for many lovers; and SOPHIA, her sister, 'soft, modest, and alluring', who wishes to secure one. All four children are 'equally generous, credulous, simple, and inoffensive'.

Primrose League, THE, was formed in 1883, in memory of Lord Beaconsfield (whose favourite flower is said to have been the primrose), for the maintenance of Conservative principles. It is said to have included at one time over 1,000,000 members, and is still active. The anniversary of Lord Beaconsfield's death (19 April) is celebrated as 'Primrose Day'.

Primrose path, way to destruction; probably from two phrases of Shakespeare: 'primrose path of dalliance', 'Hamlet', i. iii. 47, and 'primrose way to the everlasting bonfire', 'Macbeth', ii. iii. 22.

PRIMUM MOBILE

Primum Mobile (Latin, 'first moving thing'), the supposed outermost sphere (at first reckoned the ninth, later the tenth), added in the Middle Ages to the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, and supposed to revolve round the earth from east to west in twenty-four hours, carrying with it the contained spheres. Hence, a prime source of motion.

Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1871.

It takes the form of a monologue by Louis Napoleon, emperor of the French, under the above pseudonym; in which he defends the policy of expediency, of making the best of things as they are instead of endeavouring to reform them; and in particular his course of action in some of the principal conjunctures of his career.

Prince Imperial, THE, Napoléon Eugène Louis Jean Joseph (1856-79), son of Napoléon III, educated at the Military Academy, Woolwich. He asked permission to join the British forces in the Zulu War of 1879, and was allowed to go as a guest. He was killed on a reconnoitring party on 1 June 1879.

Prince of the Peace, Manuel de Godoy (Marquis of Alcudia) (1767-1851), who as prime minister of Spain negotiated peace between that country and France in 1795. He was the queen's paramour, incurred popular hatred, and in 1808 was obliged to flee from the country. His 'Memoirs' were translated by J. B. D'Esménard in 1836.

Prince of the Powers of the Air, Satan (Eph. ii. 2).

Princes in the Tower, THE, Edward V and Richard, duke of York, his brother. They were lodged in the Tower in 1483 and were there secretly murdered in the same year, by order of their uncle, Richard III, Edward being then 13 years old. The story is told by Sir Thomas More in his 'History of King Richard III'. The discovery in the reign of Charles II of two skeletons buried at the foot of a staircase in the Tower (being those of boys of the age of the two princes) makes More's story almost a certainty.

Prince's Progress, The, an allegorical poem by C. Rossetti (q.v.), published in 1866.

The princess waits in her tower for her appointed bridegroom. The prince sets out, strong and light-hearted, to seek his waiting bride. But the way is long and arduous, and the prince tarries, yielding first to one allure-ment, then another. When at last he arrives he is too late, and his bride is dead.

Princess, The, A Medley, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1847. The beautiful lyrics enshrined in it were added in the third edition, 1853. The poem pur-ports to be a tale of fancy composed by some young people on a summer's day, based on a text in an old chronicle. Gilbert and Sullivan's opera 'Princess Ida' is founded on it.

A prince has been betrothed in childhood to the Princess Ida, daughter of the neigh- bouring King Gama. But the princess be- comes a devotee of the rights of women, abjures marriage, and founds a university to promote her ideal. The prince and two com- panions, Cyril and Florian, gain admission to the university in the disguise of girl students. They are detected by the two tutors, the amiable Lady Psyche, Florian's sister, and the sour duenna, Lady Blanche, who from different motives are induced temporarily to conceal their knowledge. The deceit is, how- ever, presently detected by Princess Ida, but not before the prince has had occasion to save her from drowning. This, however, does not avail to shake her determination, and the three comrades are in peril of their lives, when the arrival of the prince's father with his army is announced. To decide the matter, a com- bat is arranged between fifty warriors led by the prince, and fifty led by King Gama's mighty son Arak. The latter are victorious, and the three comrades are laid wounded on the field. What neither force nor wooing could effect is now achieved by womanly pity. The university is turned into a hospital, the wounded are kindly tended, and the princess's heart is won.

Princesse de Clèves, La, a French romance by Mme de La Fayette (1633-93), published in 1678. It initiated a new era in the history of the romance, and may be regarded as one of the first examples of the novel of character. The scene is laid at the court of Henry II of France and the story is that of the passion of the Duc de Nemours for the virtuous wife of the Prince de Clèves, a passion which she returns; but she is faithful to her husband, to whom she avows the situation, hoping to be fortified in her virtue. His life is now em- bittered by jealousy and he dies of a broken heart, and the princess retires to a convent.

PRINGLE, THOMAS (1789-1834), born near Kelso, the son of a farmer, studied at Edinburgh University, made a friend of Sir Walter Scott, and became editor of the 'Edinburgh Monthly Magazine'. In 1819, the year in which his first volume of poems was published, he emigrated to South Africa, and is remembered chiefly as a poet of that country. His 'Ephemerides' (1828) and 'African Sketches' (1834) contain many striking pieces revealing his interest in the native races and wild life of Africa. In 1835, after Pringle's death, appeared his prose 'Narrative of a Residence in South Africa'.

Printing House Square, London, now the office of 'The Times' newspaper, is so named as the place where formerly the King's Printers had their premises.

PRIOR, MATTHEW (1664-1721), the son of a joiner of Wimbome, Dorset, was sent to Westminster School under the patronage of Lord Dorset, and went thence to St. John's College, Cambridge. He was appointed secretary to the ambassador at The Hague and employed in the negotiations for the treaty of Ryswick. He joined the Tories and in 1711 was sent to Paris as a secret agent at the time of the peace negotiations, the subsequent treaty of Utrecht (1713) being popularly known as 'Matt's Peace'. He was recalled on Queen Anne's death and imprisoned for two years. A folio edition of his poems was brought out by his admirers after his release, by which he gained four thousand guineas, and Lord Harley gave him £4,000 for the purchase of Down Hall in Essex. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. He was one of the neatest of English epigrammatists, and in occasional pieces and familiar verse he had no rival in English. Among his longer poems may be mentioned 'Henry and Emma', a paraphrase (or travesty) in classical style of the old ballad 'The Nut-Brown Maid' (q.v.); 'Alma or the Progress of the Mind', a dialogue, in three cantos, in the metre and manner of 'Hudibras', nominally on the progress of the soul upwards from the legs in childhood to the head in maturity, in fact on the vanity of worldly concerns; 'Solomon on the Vanity of the World' (1718), a long soliloquy, in three books, in heroic couplets, on the same theme; 'Down-Hall, a Ballad' (1723), the lively account of a trip to Essex; 'Carmen Saeculare' (1700), celebrating the arrival of William III from Holland; and 'The Secretary', a pleasant piece of reminiscence of his early diplomatic days. He joined with Charles Montagu (Halifax) in writing 'The Hind and the Panther Transvers'd to the Story of the Country and City Mouse' (1687), a satire, after the manner of Buckingham's 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.), on Dryden's 'The Hind and the Panther' (q.v.). His more important prose works include an 'Essay upon Learning', an 'Essay upon Opinion' and 'Four Dialogues of the Dead' (q.v.).

Priscilla, the heroine of Longfellow's 'The Courtship of Miles Standish' (see Miles Standish).

Priscillian, a Spanish heretic executed in A.D. 385, to whom is attributed the composition of the verse 1 John v. 7, 'For there are three that bear record in heaven'.

Prisoner of Chillon, The, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1816.

The poem deals with the imprisonment of Bonnivard in the castle of Chillon, on the Lake of Geneva. François de Bonnivard was born in 1496, became prior of the monastery of St. Victor near Geneva, and conspired with a band of ardent patriots of that city to throw off the yoke of the duke of Savoy and establish a free republic. For this he was twice imprisoned by the duke; his second imprisonment was in the castle of Chillon and lasted from 1530 to 1536, when he was released by the Bernese. He lived a long time after this, received a house and pension in Geneva, and was married no less than four times. He is said to have died in 1570.

Prisoner of Zenda, The, and its sequel, 'Rupert of Hentzau', successful novels by Anthony Hope (see Hawkins), published in 1894 and 1898.

They deal with the perilous and romantic adventures of Rudolf Rassendyl, an English gentleman, in Ruritania, where, by personating the king at his coronation, he defeats a plot to oust him from the throne. He falls in love with the Princess Flavia and she with him, releases the imprisoned king, and surrenders Flavia to him. In the sequel he defeats a plot of the villain Rupert of Hentzau against Flavia, now the unhappy wife of the king, and has another chance of taking the throne, this time permanently, and of marrying Flavia. But he is assassinated before his decision is known.

Prize Novelists, Mr. Punch's, by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 'Punch' in 1847, and re-issued as 'Novels by Eminent Hands' in 'Miscellanies' (1856), are parodies of Disraeli, Lever, Lytton, Mrs. Gore, G. P. R. James, and Fenimore Cooper.

PROCTER, ADELAIDE ANNE (1825-64), daughter of B. W. Procter (q.v.), was author of 'Legends and Lyrics' (1858-61, including 'A Lost Chord'), 'A Chaplet of Verses' (1862), and 'The Message' (1892). Her complete works were issued in 1905.

PROCTER, BRYAN WALLER (1787-1874), was educated at Harrow, practised as a solicitor in London, and was made a commissioner in lunacy. He was intimate with Leigh Hunt, Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, and Dickens, and had a considerable reputation as a writer, under the pseudonym of 'Barry Cornwall', of pretty songs, of which, however, not many are remembered to-day. In 1821 he produced a successful tragedy, 'Mirandola', at Covent Garden Theatre. His 'Dramatic Scenes' (1819) were praised by Charles Lamb, of whom, as well as of Edmund Kean, Procter wrote a biography.

Prodigal Son, THE, the general subject of a group of plays written about 1540-75, showing the influence of the continental neo-classic writers of the period on the early Tudor dramatists. The chief of these are 'Misogonus', written about 1560 (author unknown), and Gascoigne's 'Glasse of Government' (1575). The parable of the Prodigal Son is in Luke xv. 11-32.

Prodigious! the favourite exclamation of Dominie Sampson, in Scott's 'Guy Mannerling' (q.v.).

Professor, The, a novel by C. Brontë (q.v.), written in 1846 (before 'Jane Eyre' and 'Shirley'), but not published until 1857.

The story, based on the authoress's experiences in Brussels, is in subject the same as that more successfully told in 'Villette' (q.v.), with the two principal characters transposed. Instead of a girl, we have a young man, William Crimsworth, going to seek his fortune as a schoolmaster in Brussels. At the girls' school where he teaches English he falls in love with an Anglo-Swiss pupil-teacher, over whom he exercises the same sort of influence that M. Paul Emanuel exercised over the heroine of 'Villette'.

Progress of Poetry, a Pindaric ode by Gray (q.v.), written in 1754 and published in 1759.

The poet describes the sources of poetry and its progress, now smooth and majestic, now headlong and impetuous. It can calm the frantic passions of the soul or give graceful motion to the body. It can charm away the ills of life, and has power over the most uncivilized nations. It came from Greece to Italy and England, where Shakespeare, Milton, and Dryden have been great poets, but no one equals them to-day.

Projectors, The, see Wilson (J., 1627-96).

Prométhēus, a son of the Titan Iāpētus and Themis or Clymene, and brother of Epimetheus (qq.v.). He made mankind out of clay, and when Zeus oppressed them and deprived them of fire, he stole fire for them from heaven and taught them many arts. Zeus, to avenge himself, sent Pandora (q.v.) and her box to earth, and Epimetheus, in spite of the warning of Prometheus, married her. Zeus, moreover, caused Prometheus to be chained to a rock on Mt. Caucasus, where during the daytime a vulture fed on his liver, which was restored each succeeding night. From this torture Prometheus was delivered by Hercules.

The name PROMETHEAN was given to a contrivance used, before the introduction of lucifer matches, for obtaining fire; it consisted in bringing concentrated sulphuric acid into contact with an inflammable mixture.

PROMETHEAN FIRE, the divine spark; often so used in literature; as where Browne in 'Love's Labour's Lost', iv. iii, says:

From women's eyes this doctrine I derive:
They are the ground, the books, the academes,

From whence doth spring the true Promethean fire.

But cf. Shakespeare's use of 'Promethean heat' in 'Othello', v. ii. 12.

Prometheus Bound, a tragedy by Aeschylus, translated by E. B. Browning (q.v.).

Prometheus the Firegiver, a poem by Bridges (q.v.).

Prometheus Unbound, a lyrical drama in four acts, by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), published in 1820.

Prometheus, the champion of mankind, is chained to a rock and subjected to perpetual torture. Characterized by 'courage, majesty, and a firm and patient opposition to omnipotent force, and exempt from the taints of ambition, envy, and revenge', instinct also with the spirit of love, he remains unyielding to the threats of Jupiter (Zeus), the spirit of evil and hate. He is supported by Earth, his mother, and the thought of Asia, his bride, the spirit of Nature. At the appointed hour, Demogorgon, the Primal Power of the world, drives Jupiter from his throne, and Prometheus is released by Hercules, typifying strength. The reign of love follows, when 'Thrones, altars, judgement-seats, and prisons' are things of the past and 'Man remains

Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, but man

Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless,
Exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king

Over himself; just, gentle, wise, but man'.

a certain 'Cynthia', identified, according to tradition, with Hostia, a lady of good position.

Prophecy of Famine, The, see Churchill (C.).

Proserpine, or, according to her Greek name, PERSEPHONÊ, was a daughter of Zeus and Demeter. Legend tells that she was carried off by Pluto (Hades) while gathering flowers in the vale of Enna in Sicily, and made queen in the lower world. Demeter wandered over the earth seeking her, and at her prayer Zeus consented to the return of Persephone on condition that she had eaten nothing in the infernal regions. But she had eaten some pomegranate seeds there, as was revealed by Ascalaphus, son of Acheron (who was turned into an owl for his betrayal). Finally, to appease the resentment of Demeter, Zeus allowed Persephone to spend six months of the year on earth and the remainder with Pluto, a myth symbolical of the burying of the seed in the ground and the growth of the corn. The story has been treated by Tennyson in his 'Demeter and Persephone', and by Robert Bridges in his masque 'Demeter'. See also the allusion in Milton, P.L. iv. 268-72. Swinburne's 'Hymn to Proserpine' is included in 'Poems and Ballads'.

Prosopopola, the sub-title of Spenser's 'Mother Hubbard's Tale' (q.v.).

Prospero, in Shakespeare's 'Tempest' (q.v.), the duke of Milan and father of Miranda.

Proteüs, an old man of the sea, who tended the flocks of Poseidon. He had received the gift of prophecy from the god, but those who wished to consult him found him difficult of access. For he, on being questioned, assumed different shapes, and eluded their grasp. Among his daughters was Eidothea, who taught Menelaus how to obtain the information he desired from her father. Homer places the residence of Proteus in the island of Pharos, off the Egyptian coast, Virgil in Carpathos, between Crete and Rhodes, whence Milton ('Comus') speaks of him as the 'Carpathian wizard'.

Proteus, one of the 'Two Gentlemen of Verona' (q.v.) in Shakespeare's play of that name.

Prothalamion, a 'spousal verse' written by Spenser (q.v.), published in 1596, in celebration of the double marriage of the Lady Elizabeth and the Lady Katherine Somerset, daughters of the earl of Worcester. The name was invented by Spenser on the model of 'Epithalamion' (q.v.).

Protomartyr, the first (Christian) martyr, St. Stephen.

Proudfute, OLIVER, the bonnet-maker in Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

Proudie, DR. and MRS., characters in A. Trollope's Barsetshire series of novels (see in particular Barchester Towers).

PROUST, MARCEL (1871-1922), French

novelist, author of the series of volumes grouped under the title 'À la recherche du temps perdu', remarkable for their expression of a particular metaphysical attitude, i.e. the conception of the unreality and reversibility of time, the power of sensation rather than intellectual memory to recover 'the past', and the subject's consequent power to cheat time and death; also for their minute psychological analysis and for their objective presentation of a wonderful gallery of portraits. But many readers may be repelled by the studies of homosexuality in which the work abounds. It has been translated into English by C. K. Scott Moncrieff.

Proverbs of Alfred, a poem dating, in the form which has reached us, from the 13th cent., though much older in substance. It begins by giving some account of King Alfred, and proceeds to a number of stanzas each beginning 'Thus quod Alfred', and containing instruction of various kinds, precepts as to conduct, shrewd proverbs of popular origin, and religious teaching. The connexion of the proverbs with King Alfred is more than doubtful.

Provok'd Husband, The, or a Journey to London, a comedy written by Vanbrugh (q.v.) and finished by Cibber (q.v.), produced in 1728.

The 'provok'd husband' is Lord Townly, a man of regular life, who is driven to desperation by the extravagance and dissipation of his wife, and decides to separate from her and let the cause be known. This sentence (according to Cibber's ending) brings Lady Townly to her senses and contrition, and a reconciliation follows, promoted by Manly, Lord Townly's sensible friend, the successful suitor of Lady Grace, Lord Townly's exemplary sister. A second element in the plot is the visit to London of Sir Francis Wronghead, a simple country gentleman, with his wife, a foolish woman who wants to be a fine lady and seeks to achieve her end by extravagance, and their son and daughter. They are the intended prey of Count Basset, an unprincipled gamester, who, under cover of making love to Lady Wronghead, designs to entice her daughter into a secret marriage, and to effect a match between her son and his own cast-off mistress. The plot nearly succeeds, but is discovered and frustrated by Manly.

Provok'd Wife, The, a comedy by Vanbrugh (q.v.), produced in 1697.

Sir John Brute, a churlish man of quality, ill-uses his wife, and is a coward to boot. She is courted by Constant, but has remained faithful to her husband. Constant's friend, Heartfree, who prides himself on his cynical indifference to women, falls in love with her niece Belinda. The two ladies, for a frolic, invite Constant and Heartfree to meet them in Spring Garden. Here Lady Brute's virtue is on the point of yielding to the ardent addresses of Constant, when they are interrupted by the jealous Lady Fancyfull. The two couples return to Lady Brute's house and sit down to cards, confident that Sir John will not return from a drinking-bout for some hours. Sir John, however, having been arrested by the watch for brawling in the streets disguised in a parson's gown, has been dismissed by the magistrate after an amusing scene. He comes home unexpectedly early, finds the two men concealed in a closet, but has no stomach for the duel offered him by Constant. The presence of the men is attributed to the proposed marriage of Heart-free and Belinda, and, in spite of the attempts of Lady Fancyfull to make mischief, all ends happily.

Prunes and prism: 'Father is rather vulgar . . . Papa . . . gives a pretty form to the lips. Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prism, are all very good for the lips, especially prunes and prism.' (Dickens's 'Little Dorrit', II. v and vii.)

Prussian Blue, a deep blue pigment of great body, so called from being accidentally discovered by Diesbach, a colour-maker in Berlin, in 1704. In Dickens (where Sam Weller calls his father 'My Prooshan Blue') probably a variant or intensive of 'true blue' [OED.], or with reference to a public-house sign common after the battle of Waterloo, the 'King of Prussia' in a blue uniform.

Prynne, HESTER, the heroine of Hawthorne's 'The Scarlet Letter' (q.v.).

PRYNNE, WILLIAM (1600-69), Puritan pamphleteer, was educated at Bath grammar school and Oriel College, Oxford, and was a barrister of Lincoln's Inn. He wrote against Arminianism from 1627, and endeavoured to reform the manners of his age. He published 'Histriomastix', an enormous work directed against stage-plays, in 1632. For a supposed aspersion on Charles I and his queen in 'Histriomastix' he was sentenced by the Star Chamber, in 1634, to be imprisoned during life, to be fined £5,000, and to lose both his ears in the pillory. He continued to write in the Tower of London, and (1637) was again fined £5,000, deprived of the remainder of his ears, and branded on the cheeks with the letters S. L. (seditious libeller) which Prynne, with humour, asserted to mean 'Stigmata Laudis' (i.e. of Archbishop Laud). He was released by the Long Parliament, and his sentences declared illegal in November 1640. He continued an active paper warfare, attacking Laud, then the independents, then the army (1647), then, after being arrested by Pride, the government. In 1660 he asserted the rights of Charles II, and was thanked by him. He was M.P. for Bath in the Convention Parliament and was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower of London. He published his most valuable work, 'Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva', in 1662. He published altogether about two hundred books and pamphlets.

PSALMANAZAR, GEORGE (1679?-1763), a literary impostor, was a native of the south of France. His real name is unknown, his usual designation being fashioned by himself from the biblical character, Shalmaneser. He was educated at a Dominican convent and commenced life as a mendicant in the character of a native Japanese Christian, but afterwards represented himself as still a pagan, living on raw flesh, roots, and herbs, and invented an elaborate alphabet and grammar and a worship of his own. He enlisted in a regiment of the duke of Mecklenburg, and attracted the attention of William Innes, chaplain to the Scottish regiment at Sluys, who became a confederate in the imposture, baptized Psalmanazar as a Protestant convert, and for security persuaded him to remove his birthplace to the obscurity of Formosa. He came to London at the end of 1703 and became a centre of interest, presenting Bishop Compton with the catechism in 'Formosan' (his invented language), and talking volubly in Latin to Archbishop Tillotson. He published in 1704 a 'Description' of Formosa, with an introductory autobiography. After the withdrawal of his mentor Innes, who was rewarded for his zeal in converting Psalmanazar by being appointed chaplain-general to the forces in Portugal (c. 1707), he was unable to sustain the imposture unaided, and passed from ridicule to obscurity, although he still found patrons. He renounced his past life after a serious illness in 1728, became an accomplished hebraist, wrote 'A General History of Printing', and contributed to the 'Universal History'. Psalmanazar was regarded with veneration by Dr. Johnson, who used to sit with him at an alehouse in Old Street, London. In 1764 appeared posthumously his autobiographical 'Memoirs', containing an account of the imposture.

Psalms, The, the Book of Psalms, one of the books of the Old Testament, forming the hymn-book of the Jewish Church, often called the Psalms of David, in accordance with the belief that they, or part of them, were composed by David, king of Israel. (In 2 Sam. xxii, Psalm xviii is attributed to David.) The Psalms were the basis of the medieval church services, probably the only book in the Bible on the use of which, by the laity, the medieval church imposed no veto at all. For our own Prayer Book version of them, one of our greatest literary inheritances, see Coverdale. A Metrical Version of the Psalms was begun by Sternhold (q.v.) and Hopkins (2nd ed., 1551), and continued at Geneva during Mary's reign by Protestant refugees. The complete Old Version (metrical) was published in 1562. The New Version by Dr. Nicholas Brady and Nahum Tate (q.v.) appeared in 1696. The word psalm is from the Greek ψάλλω, to twitch (the strings of the harp).

Psapho's birds: Psapho was a Libyan who kept a number of birds in captivity and taught them to say 'Psapho is a god'. He then liberated them. The Africans in consequence paid divine honours to Psapho. The story is attributed in Lemprière to Aelian. Other dictionaries give no reference. It is given by Erasmus ('Adagia', i. ii. 99), who merely says, 'Narrant in Lybia fuisse quendam Psaphonem', &c.

Ptah, the Vulcan of Egyptian mythology, the deity regarded as a creative force, the builder of the world and vivifying power. He was worshipped in particular at Memphis.

PTOLEMY (CLAUDIUS PTOLEMAEUS), who lived at Alexandria in the 2nd cent. A.D., was a celebrated mathematician, astronomer, and geographer. He devised the system of astronomy (according to which the sun, planets, and stars revolved round the earth) which was generally accepted until displaced by that of Copernicus. His work on this subject is generally known by its Arabic name of 'Almagest'. His great geographical treatise remained a text-book until superseded by the discoveries of the 15th cent. Ptolemy compiled a map of the world in which both the parallels and meridians are curved. Though defective in details, it had a great influence on map-making in the 15th cent. His underestimate of the circumference of the earth is said to have encouraged Columbus to undertake his voyage to the west.

Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.), king of Egypt, the son of Ptolemy Soter (the first king of the Ptolemaic dynasty, 323-285), is important in a literary connexion as a patron of learning. In his reign Alexandria was the resort of the most distinguished men of letters of the time, and the celebrated Alexandrian Library, begun by his father, was increased. Manetho (q.v.) wrote during his reign, and according to tradition the Septuagint (q.v.) version of the Scriptures was made at his request.

Public Advertiser, The, originally 'The London Daily Post and General Advertiser', was started in 1752 and expired in 1798, being then amalgamated with the 'Public Ledger' (q.v.). From 1758 to 1793 it was edited by Henry Sampson Woodfall, and published the famous 'Letters' of 'Junius' (q.v.). It contained home and foreign intelligence, and correspondence, mainly political, from writers of all shades of opinion. Wilkes and Tooke (qq.v.) carried on a dispute in its columns. The notable pamphlets of 'Candor' against Lord Mansfield (1764) also appeared originally as letters to the 'Public Advertiser'. The author of these is unknown.

Public Ledger, The, a commercial periodical founded in 1759 by Newbery (q.v.), to which Goldsmith (q.v.) contributed his 'Chinese Letters'. It absorbed the 'Public Advertiser' (q.v.) in 1798.

Puccini, GIACOMO (1858-1924), a popular opera composer, born at Lucca. His most successful works were 'Manon Lescaut' (1893), 'La Bohème' (1896), 'La Tosca' (1899), 'Madama Butterfly' (1904), 'La Fanciulla del West' (1910).

Pucelle, La ('The Maid'; i.e. Joan of Arc), a burlesque epic by Voltaire (q.v.) on the subject of Joan of Arc (q.v.), published in 1755. Joan is called 'la Pucelle' in Shakespeare's '1 King Henry VI'.

Puck, originally an evil or malicious spirit or demon of popular superstition; from the 16th cent. the name of a fancied mischievous or tricky goblin or sprite, called also Robin Goodfellow and Hobgoblin. In this character he figures in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (ii. i. 40) and Drayton's 'Nymphidia' (xxxvi), qq.v.

Puddingfield, a character in 'The Rovers' (see Anti-Jacobin).

Puff, a character in Sheridan's 'The Critic' (q.v.).

Pugilistica, a work on British boxing by Henry Downes Miles, published in 1906. It carries on the story of the prize-ring begun in the 'Boxiana' of Egan (q.v.).

PULCI, LUIGI (1432-84), Florentine poet and humanist, is celebrated as the founder of the romantic epic in Italy, of which he left the prototype in his 'Morgante Maggiore' (q.v.).

Pullitzer, JOSEPH (1847-1911), a Hungarian by birth who settled in America, was one of the chief founders of American sensational journalism, first in the 'St. Louis Post-Dispatch' which he acquired in 1878, and then in the 'New York World' which he took over in 1883. His object was the remedy of abuses and the reform of social and economic inequalities by the exposure of striking instances and by the vigorous expression of democratic opinion. The success of this appeal to the emotions found many imitators among journalists not actuated by the same creditable motives.

Pulitzer Prizes, annual prizes established under the will of Joseph Pulitzer (q.v.). The prizes, which are confined to American citizens, are offered in the interest of letters (American history and biography, poetry, drama, and novel-writing), music, and good newspaper work. The amount of the prizes is about $14,500. (Don C. Seitz, 'Joseph Pulitzer', 1926.)

PULLEN, THE REV. HENRY WILLIAM (1836-1903), remembered as the author of the allegorical pamphlet, 'The Fight in Dame Europa's School' (1870), accusing England of cowardice and selfishness in observing neutrality in the Franco-Prussian War.

Pullet, Mr. and Mrs., characters in George Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

Pumblechook, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.).

Pumpnickel, the name under which Thackeray genially satirizes the minor German principalities, particularly in 'Vanity Fair', where the description of Pumpnickel is based on his recollections of Weimar in 1831. The word in German means a kind of dark brown bread made from coarsely ground unbolted rye.

Punch, probably short for Punchinello, apparently adapted from Neapolitan dialectal polecenella, equivalent to Italian pulcinella. The latter word is the diminutive of pulcina chicken; and polecenella is diminutive of polecena, the young of the turkey-cock, to the hooked bill of which the nose of Punch's mask bears a resemblance. [OED.] See further under Punch and Judy.

Punch and Judy, a puppet-show drama probably introduced into England from the Continent towards the end of the 17th cent. The character of Pulcinella (see Punch) is stated by Italian authors to have been invented by Silvio Fiorillo, a comedian, about the year 1600, for the Neapolitan impromptu comedies, to imitate the peasants of Acerra, a town near Naples. But the origin is uncertain.

The plot of the drama and the dialogue have varied in different presentations, but the main outline is as follows. Punch is a hump-backed, long-nosed creature, dissipated, violent, and cunning. In a fit of anger he kills his child. His wife Judy, discovering the murder, attacks him with a bludgeon, but he wrests the weapon from her and kills her. The dog Toby seizes him by the nose, and he kills it. He is visited by a doctor when ill, kicks him, and when the doctor retaliates, bludgeons him to death. He is arrested and sentenced to death. He beguiles the hangman into putting his own head in the noose and promptly hangs him. Finally he is visited by the devil, whom he likewise vanquishes. (Much information is contained in J. Payne Collier's 'Punch and Judy', 1870. The character of Punch may be in part derived from the Vice of the old Moralities.)

Punch, or the London Charivari, an illustrated weekly comic periodical, founded in 1841; at first a rather strongly Radical paper, but gradually coming round to its present attitude.

PURCELL

The circumstances of the birth of this famous paper have been variously stated. One or two illustrated comic papers had already appeared in London, notably Gilbert Abbott & Beckett's 'Figaro in London' (1831) and 'Punchinello' (1832) illustrated by Cruikshank. It appears that the idea of starting in London a comic paper somewhat on the lines of Philippon's Paris 'Charivari' first occurred to Ebenezer Landells, draughtsman and wood-engraver, who submitted it to the humorist Henry Mayhew (1812-87). Mayhew took up the proposal, and enlisted the support of Lemon (q.v.) and Joseph Stirling Coyne (1803-68), these three being the first joint-editors. The first number was issued on 17 July 1841. Joseph Last was the first printer, and Landells the first engraver. A Beckett (q.v.) and Jerrold (q.v.) were among the original staff, soon joined by Thackeray, Hood, Leech, and Tenniel (qq.v.) among others. Shirley Brooks (1816-74) became editor in 1870, Tom Taylor (q.v.) in 1874, and Burnand (q.v.) in 1880. Sir Owen Seaman was editor from 1906 to 1932. Among other famous draughtsmen may be mentioned Charles Keene (1823-91), whose first drawing in 'Punch' appeared in 1851 and who joined the staff in 1860; and Du Maurier (q.v.), who contributed drawings from 1860 and joined the staff in 1864. The design for the wrapper, as we have it now, the sixth that appeared, was drawn by Richard Doyle (q.v.), and adopted in 1849.

Punch's Prize Novelists, Mr., see Prize Novelists.

Punic Faith, faithlessness. The Carthaginians were proverbial among the Romans for perfidy; as, no doubt, the Romans were among the Carthaginians. (For the derivation of Punic, see under Carthage.)

Puntarvolo, in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.), a vainglorious knight.

Puppet-play, see Motion.

Purāṇas, THE, sacred mythological works in Sanskrit containing the mythology of the Hindus. They are of comparatively recent date, none of them being thought to be more ancient than the 8th cent. A.D. They divide themselves into three groups, relating respectively to Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva.

Purcell, HENRY (1658?-95), one of the greatest of English composers. His father and uncle were both musicians, the former being master of the choristers of Westminster Abbey. Purcell became, when six years old, a chorister of the Chapel Royal, and in 1680, when 22, was appointed organist of Westminster Abbey. About 1690 he produced the music of 'Dido and Aeneas' (Nahum Tate composing the words), his best-known work, including the great song, 'When I am laid in earth'. He wrote the incidental music for many plays and much church music. He is buried beneath the organ in Westminster Abbey.

PURCHAS

PURCHAS, SAMUEL (1575?-1626), was born at Thaxted in Essex, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was rector of St. Martin's, Ludgate, London, 1614-26. In 1613 he published 'Purchas his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World and the Religions observed in all Ages'; in 1619 'Purchas his Pilgrim, Microcosmus or the Histories of Man'; and in 1625 'Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas his Pilgrimes, containing a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Land Travell by Englishmen and others'. This last is in part based on manuscripts left by Hakluyt (q.v.) and is a continuation of the latter's work (Purchas appears to have assisted Hakluyt to arrange papers which were unpublished at the latter's death). It consists of two divisions, each of ten books. In the first division, after an introductory book, are set forth narratives of voyages to India, China, Japan, Africa, and the Mediterranean. The second division deals with attempts to discover the North-West Passage, the Muscovy expeditions, and explorations of the West Indies and Florida. Among the best narratives are William Adam's description of his voyage to Japan and residence there, and William Hawkins's account of his visit to the court of the Great Mogul at Agra. The works of Purchas were not reprinted until the Glasgow edition of 1905-7.

Puritan, a member of that party of English Protestants who regarded the reformation of the Church under Elizabeth as incomplete, and called for its further 'purification' from what they considered to be unscriptural and corrupt forms and ceremonies retained from the unreformed Church. The term appears in early use as one of reproach by opponents, and was applied to the Presbyterians, Independents, or Baptists, and consequently to the typical 'Roundheads' of the Commonwealth period, whose Puritanism was sometimes little more than political. In later times the term has become historical, without opprobrious connotation; but is also often used of one who affects extreme strictness in morals.

Puritan, The, or the Widow of Watling-Street, a comedy published in 1607 as 'written by W.S.' and included in the 3rd and 4th Shakespeare folios, but certainly by some other hand, perhaps Marston.

The play is a farcical comedy of London manners, and sets forth the tricks played on the widow and her daughter by Capt. Idle and George Pye-boord in order to win their hands, with scenes in the Marshalsea.

PUTTENHAM

Purple Island, The, a philosophical poem on the human body by P. Fletcher (q.v.).

Pursuits of Literature, see Mathias.

PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE (1800-82), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, was elected in 1822 a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, where Keble and Newman (qq.v.) were also fellows. In 1828 he was appointed Regius professor of Hebrew. Becoming alarmed by the spread of rationalism in the Church of England and convinced that it could only be checked by a wider sense of her divine institution, he joined Newman and Keble in the production of 'Tracts for the Times' (1833, see Oxford Movement), contributing 'Tracts on baptism' (1835) and the holy eucharist (1837). He supported Newman's explanation of the Thirty-nine Articles in the famous 'Tract XC', and in 1843 was suspended from the office of university preacher for heresy. He continued to maintain high Anglican views, publishing in 1856 his learned 'Doctrine of the Real Presence', while endeavouring to hinder secessions to the Church of Rome among his supporters. Later he attempted to bring about the union of the English and Roman churches, and of the English Church with the Wesleyans and Eastern Church. PUSEY HOUSE at Oxford, founded in memory of him, was opened in 1884. A 'Life of Pusey' by Liddon (q.v.) was published in 1893-7.

PUSHKIN, ALEXANDER SERGIVICH (1799-1837), the first national poet of Russia, a liberal and a disciple of Byron. His first considerable poem, 'Ruslan and Liudmila', was published in 1820. 'Eugene Onegin', a Byronic verse-romance of contemporary life, was completed in 1831 and has been translated into English by Lt.-Col. Spalding (1881). His historical tragedy on the Shakespearean model, 'Boris Godunov', appeared in 1825. His other best-known works include 'The Prisoner of the Caucasus' (1821), 'The Tzigrani' (1827), 'Poltava' (the story of Mazeppa, 1829), besides lyrics and fairytales. Some of these have been translated by C. E. Turner (1899).

Puss in Boots, a popular tale, from the French of Perrault (q.v.), translated by Robert Samber (1729?).

A miller bequeathes to his three sons respectively, his mill, his ass, and his cat. The youngest, who inherits the cat, laments his ill-fortune. But the resourceful cat, by a series of unscrupulous ruses, in which he represents his master to the king as the wealthy marquis of Carabas, secures for him the hand of the king's daughter.

Andrew Lang, in his 'Perrault's Popular Tales', discusses the origin of the story, which is found, in various forms, in several countries.

PUTTENHAM, RICHARD (1520?-1601?), author of 'The Arte of English Poesie', a critical discussion of English poetry, chiefly in its formal aspect, published anonymously in 1589. The work is sometimes assigned to his brother George.

Pwyll, in British mythology, prince of Dyfed and 'Head of Hades'; see Mabinogion. The stories of Pelles and of Pelleas in the 'Morte Darthur' are perhaps connected with his myth (see Rhys, 'Arthurian Legend').

Pyanet Sneakup, Mrs., a character in Brome's 'The City Witt' (q.v.).

PYE, HENRY JAMES (1745-1813), became poet laureate in 1790, and was the constant butt of contemporary ridicule.

Pygmalion, a king of Cyprus and a sculptor. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue that he had made of a woman, and at his prayer Aphrodite gave it life. The story is told in Ovid's 'Metamorphoses', in Marston's erotic poem, 'The Metamorphoses of Pygmalion's Image' (1598), in William Morris's 'Earthly Paradise' (q.v.), and is the subject of a comedy by W. S. Gilbert ('Pygmalion and Galatea'). 'Pygmalion' is also the title of a play by G. B. Shaw (q.v.).

Pygmies, a race of men of very small size, mentioned by ancient writers as inhabiting parts of Africa. In the last quarter of the 19th cent. dwarf races were ascertained to exist in equatorial Africa, who may be the 'pygmies' of Homer and Herodotus. According to ancient fable, the cranes came annually from Scythia and made war on them.

Pyke and Pluck, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), the toadies of Sir Mulberry Hawk.

Pyliadēs, see Orestes.

Pyncheon, HEPHZIBAH, a character in N. Hawthorne's 'The House of the Seven Gables' (q.v.).

Pynson, RICHARD (d. 1530), a Norman by birth and a printer in London, the successor, with Wynkyn de Worde (q.v.), of Caxton. He was appointed King's Printer on the accession of Henry VIII, and introduced Roman type into England. He issued an edition of Chaucer in 1526 and of Barclay's 'Ship of Fools' (q.v.).

Pyraemon, see Cyclopes.

Pyramid, a word of uncertain derivation, perhaps of Egyptian origin, the name of a number of ancient monumental structures still existing in Egypt, of which the largest and best known are three at Gizeh, near Cairo, those of Cheops, Chephren, and Menkaure, kings of the 4th dynasty (c. 2900-2800 B.C.). There was a legend that the last was built by Rhodope (q.v.).

Pyramus, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe. The two lovers, whom their parents forbade to marry, exchanged their vows through a chink in the wall which separated their two houses. They agreed to meet at the tomb of Ninus, outside the walls of Babylon, under a white mulberry tree. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but being frightened by a lioness fled into a cave, dropping her veil, which the lioness covered with blood. Pyramus, arriving, found the bloody veil, and, concluding that Thisbe had been devoured, stabbed himself with his sword. Thisbe, emerging from the cave, distraught at the sight of the dying Pyramus, fell upon his sword. This tragic scene occurred under the mulberry tree, which thereafter bore only red fruit. The story, of Asiatic origin, is the subject of the 'tedious brief scene' played by Bottom and his friends in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

Pyrgopolynicēs, a braggart, the hero of the 'Miles Gloriosus' of Plautus (q.v.). The name is a combination of 'fortress' and 'much victory'.

Pyriphlêgêthôn, see Phlegethon.

Pyrochles, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', symbolizes rage. He is the brother of Cycloches (q.v.), the son of 'old Acrates and Despight' (II. iv. 41). On his shield is a flaming fire, with the words 'Burnt I do burn'. He is overcome by Sir Guyon (II. v), and tries to drown himself in a lake to quench his flames. He is rescued and healed by Archimago (II. vi. 42-51), and finally killed by Prince Arthur (II. viii).

Pyrocles, one of the chief characters in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.).

Pyrrha, the wife of Deucalion (q.v.).

Pyrrhic, in ancient Greek and Latin verse, a foot consisting of two short syllables. In modern accentual verse, the term is sometimes applied to a group of two unstressed syllables.

Pyrrhic dance, the war-dance of the ancient Greeks, in which the motions of warfare were gone through in armour, to a musical accompaniment. It is said to have been so named from Pyrrhus, the inventor.

Pyrrhic victory, a victory gained at too great a cost; in allusion to the exclamation attributed to Pyrrhus (q.v.) after the battle of Asculum (in which he routed the Romans but with the loss of the flower of his army), 'One more such victory and we are lost.'

Pyrrho, a native of Elis in the Peloponnese, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great and joined his expedition. He was the founder of the Sceptical or PYRRHONIAN school of philosophy, and maintained that certain knowledge on any matter was unattainable, and that suspension of judgement was true wisdom and the source of happiness.

Pyrrhus, (1) see Neoptolemus; (2) king of Epirus (318-272 B.C.), a great military adventurer, who carried on a series of campaigns against Rome and in Sicily, 280-275.

Pythley ('Py' pronounced as 'pie'), THE, a famous pack of fox-hounds, whose country lies between Rugby and Northampton. It was much associated with the Spencer family in the 18th cent. The name is said to be derived from that of an Elizabethan house, now demolished. But Charles Clarke is quoted, in the Badminton Library volume on 'Hunting', as having traced it back to one William of Pightesley who hunted 'wolves, foxes, and other vermin' in Henry III's reign.

Pythagoras, the Greek philosopher, a native of Samos, lived in the 6th cent. B.C. He settled at Crotona in Italy, where he founded a brotherhood who followed his ascetic practices (especially in the matter of food) and studied his philosophical teaching. The brotherhood incurred political suspicion, and was suppressed, but the Pythagorean doctrines survived. Pythagoras assigned a mathematical basis to the universe, and musical principles were also prominent in his system. The heavenly bodies he supposed to be divided by intervals according to the law of musical harmony, whence arose the idea of the harmony of the spheres. He discovered the rotation of the earth on its own axis, and found in this the cause of day and night. He adopted the Orphic doctrine of metempsychosis or the transmigration of souls from man to man, or man to animal, or animal to man, in a process of purification or punishment. He himself, it is said, claimed to remember having assisted the Greeks in the Trojan War in the character of Euphorbus. There are references to this Pythagorean doctrine in the dialogue between Feste and Malvolio ('Twelfth Night', iv. ii), in 'The Merchant of Venice', iv. i, and in 'As You Like It', iii. 2.

As a mathematician Pythagoras is credited with the discovery of the proof of the 47th proposition of the 1st book of Euclid, that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the other two sides, hence called the PYTHAGOREAN THEOREM. The PYTHAGOREAN LETTER is the Greek γ , used by Pythagoras as a symbol of the divergent paths of vice and virtue. None of his writings are extant.

Pytheas, a Greek of Marseilles, contemporary with Alexander the Great, who made a courageous voyage up the W. coast of Europe to Britain, Jutland, and the Orkneys and Shetlands. His narrative is lost, but was used by Strabo.

Pythia, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi (q.v.).

Pythian Games, see Python and Delphi.

Pythias, see Damon and Pythias.

Python, a serpent that rose from the mud left by the deluge of Deucalion. It lived in a cave on Mt. Parnassus and was slain by Apollo, who established the Pythian Games to celebrate the event.

Pythoness, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi (q.v.).

Q

Q, the initial of German Quelle, 'source', is the symbol used, in the comparative study of the synoptic Gospels, to designate a supposed Greek translation of a collection attributed to Matthew of the logia of Christ, from which the parts common to the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, but omitted from Mark, are derived. It is supposed to have contained certain narrative parts, but not the Passion.

'Q', see Ferrolld and Quiller-Couch. See also Old Q.

Quackleben, DR., a character in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.).

Quadrilateral, THIS, the region lying between, and defended by, the four fortresses of Mantua, Verona, Peschiera, and Legnano. It was of special importance in the wars of the Risorgimento in Italy.

Quadrille, a card game played by four persons with forty cards (the eights, nines, and tens being discarded). It replaced ombre (q.v.) as the fashionable game about 1726, and was in turn superseded by whist. The square dance called quadrille is of French origin. The first mention of it quoted in the OED. is dated 1773.

Quadrivium, in the Middle Ages, the higher division of the seven liberal arts, comprising the mathematical sciences (arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music); see Trivium.

Qual d'Orsay, sometimes used as a synonym for the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which stands on this quay (on the left bank of the Seine in the centre of Paris).

Quakers, members of the religious society (the Society of Friends, q.v.) founded by George Fox in 1648-50. According to Fox, the name was first given to himself and his followers by Justice Bennet at Derby in 1650 'because I bid them, Tremble at the word of the Lord'. It appears, however, that the name had previously been applied to some foreign religious sect. [OED.]

QUARITCH, BERNARD (1819-99), bookseller and author of the valuable bibliographical work, 'A General Catalogue of Old Books and MSS.' (1887-9; index, 1892); he was the leading second-hand bookseller in London.

QUARLES, FRANCIS (1592-1644), born near Romford in Essex, was educated at

QUARLES

Christ's College, Cambridge, and at Lincoln's Inn. He went abroad in the suite of the Princess Elizabeth on her marriage with the Elector Palatine. He wrote pamphlets in defence of Charles I, which led to the sequestration of his property and the destruction of his manuscripts. He published in 1620 his 'Feast of Wormes', a paraphrase of the book of Jonah; but is chiefly remembered for his 'Emblems' (q.v.), published in 1635. He was appointed chronologer to the City of London in 1639. A complete collection of his works was edited by Grosart in 1874 for the 'Chertsey Worthies Library'.

Quarll, Adventures of Philip, see Philip Quarll.

Quarterly Review, The, was founded in Feb. 1809 by J. Murray (q.v.), as a Tory rival to the 'Edinburgh Review' (q.v.). The liberal, conciliatory, and impartial lines on which it should be run were indicated by Sir W. Scott, an ardent promoter of the venture, in a letter to Gifford (q.v.), the first editor. Gifford was succeeded by Sir J. T. Coleridge (nephew of the poet) and Lockhart (q.v.). Among famous contributors to it have been Sir W. Scott, Canning, Southey, Rogers, Lord Salisbury, and Gladstone. Sir J. Barrow (q.v.) was a pillar of the Review during the years 1809-48. Special interest attaches to Scott's favourable review in it of Jane Austen's 'Emma', in which he speaks of the 'spirit and originality of her sketches', the first encouragement from high quarters received by the young writer; and to Scott's review (Jan. 1817) of his own 'Tales of My Landlord', written to defend himself against Dr. McCrie's suggestion of an anti-covenanting bias in 'Old Mortality' and for fun (the review criticized the 'flimsiness and incoherent texture' of the narrative, and the insipidity of the heroes); also to Croker's article (in 1818) on Keats's 'Endymion', which was supposed to have hastened the poet's death in 1821.

Who killed John Keats?

(Byron.)

Quarto, a volume in which the sheets are folded twice, so that each leaf is a quarter of the sheet. Twenty of the plays of Shakespeare were printed separately in quarto during his lifetime or before the Restoration.

Quasimodo Sunday, the first Sunday after Easter, so called from the first two words of the Introit of the mass of that day.

QUASIMODO is the name of the deformed bell-ringer of Notre Dame in Victor Hugo's 'Notre Dame de Paris'.

Queen Anne's Bounty, a fund formed out of the first-fruits and tenths of clerical livings, payable before the Reformation to the papal see, transferred to the Crown by Henry VIII, and vested by Queen Anne in trustees for the augmentation of poor livings.

QUEEN'S QUAIR

Queen Mab, in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet', i. iv, 'the fairies' midwife', who brings to birth men's secret hopes in the form of dreams, by driving 'athwart their noses' in her chariot as they lie asleep. In Drayton's 'Nymphidia' (q.v.) she is Oberon's wife and queen of the fairies. For Shelley's poem 'Queen Mab', see below. 'Mab' is perhaps from the Irish 'Medb', a legendary queen of Connaught, or from the Welsh 'Mab', a child.

Queen Mab, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), surreptitiously published in 1813.

This poem was written by Shelley when he was eighteen, and, whatever promise it may show, is a crude and juvenile production. The fairy Queen Mab carries off in her celestial chariot the spirit of the maiden lanthe, and shows her the past history of the world and expounds to her the causes of its miserable state. The poet inveighs through her mouth against 'kings, priests, and statesmen', human institutions such as marriage and commerce, and the Christian religion. The fairy finally reveals the future state of a regenerate world when 'all things are re-created, and the flame of consentaneous love inspires all life'.

Queen Mary, an historical drama by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1875.

The play presents the principal events of the reign of Mary Tudor, Wyatt's rebellion, the marriage with Philip, the submission of England to Cardinal Pole as the Pope's legate, the death of Cranmer at the stake, the loss of Calais, and the death of the unhappy and disappointed Mary.

Queen Mother, The, a play on Catherine de' Medici (1861), by A. C. Swinburne (q.v.).

Queen of Cornwall, The Famous Tragedy of the, a drama by Hardy (q.v.) on the story of King Mark, the two Iseults, and Tristram, produced in 1923.

Queen of Hearts, THE, figures prominently in Lewis Carroll's 'Alice's Adventures in Wonderland' (q.v.); also an endearing name for Elizabeth (1596-1662), eldest daughter of James I, wife of Frederick, Elector Palatine and king of Bohemia in 1619-20. She was mother of Prince Rupert and of Sophia (the mother of George I).

Queen of the May, see May Day.

Queen's Maries or MARYS, THE, the four ladies named Mary attendant on Mary Queen of Scots. The list is variously given, including: Mary Seton, Mary Beaton, Mary Livingstone, Mary Fleming, Mary Hamilton, and Mary Carmichael. They are frequently mentioned in Scottish ballads.

Queen's Quair, The, a historical romance by Hewlett (q.v.), published in 1904. It deals with the life of Mary Queen of Scots from the time of the death of her first husband, Francis II of France, to her marriage with Bothwell and his flight. (Quair = quire, little book.)

QUEEN'S WAKE

Queen's Wake, The, a poem by Hogg (q.v.), published in 1813.

Queen Mary of Scotland holds her 'wake' at Holyrood, during which seventeen bards, including Rizzio, sing their songs in competition. These are a number of verse-tales in various styles, martial, comic, horrible, or mystical. The best of these, according to modern opinion, is the beautiful tale of 'Kilmeny' (q.v.). But 'The Witch of Fife' is also a fine work, humorous and fantastic.

Queenhithe, previously, according to Stow, called Edredshithe, one of the early quays pertaining to the city of London. The queen commemorated in the name is, according to Lethaby, Matilda, wife of Henry I. There was a drawbridge in old London Bridge which allowed ships to pass through to Queenhithe.

Queensberry Rules, The, for boxing, were drawn up in 1867 under the supervision of Sir John Sholto-Douglas, 8th marquess of Queensberry (1844-1900).

Quentin Durward, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1823.

The scene is laid in the 15th cent. and the principal character is Louis XI of France, crafty, cruel, and superstitious, yet prudent and capable. With him is contrasted his vassal and enemy, the violent and impetuous Charles the Bold of Burgundy. The story is concerned with the intrigues by which Louis attempts to procure, with the assistance of William de la Marck, the Wild Boar of the Ardennes, the revolt of Liège against Charles; with the murder of the bishop of Liège; and with the famous visit of Louis to Charles at Péronne and their temporary reconciliation. The romance of Quentin Durward is subordinate to these. He is a young Scot of good family who engages himself in the corps of the Scottish Archers of the Guard of Louis. He is sent to conduct the young Countess Isabelle de Croye, a Burgundian heiress who has fled from a threatened marriage with the odious Campo-Basso, to the protection of the bishop of Liège; saves her from many perils; and finally wins her hand by compassing the destruction of William de la Marck. Among the interesting secondary characters may be mentioned: Tristan l'Hermite, Louis's provost marshal; Oliver le Dain, his counsellor and whilom barber; Martius Galeotti, his astrologer; the Cardinal La Balue (q.v.), and Philip de Commines (q.v.). The well-known lyric 'County Guy' occurs in ch. iv.

Querno, in Pope's 'Dunciad', ii. 15 ('Rome in her capitol saw Querno sit'), was an Apulian poet to whom the author compares Cibber. According to Paulus Jovius (quoted in Elwin and Courthope's notes on the 'Dunciad'), Querno, hearing that Pope Leo X patronized literature, set out for Rome, where he recited some 20,000 lines of his 'Alexias', and was made poet laureate as a joke. He was introduced to the pope as a buffoon, and frequented his table.

QUINAPALUS

Questing Beast, The, in Malory's 'Morte Darthur' (q.v.), pursued by Palamedes the Saracen.

QUEVEDO, FRANCISCO GOMEZ DE (1580-1645), Spanish writer, author of the picaresque romance 'Pablo de Segovia' (the 'Great Sharper') and of 'Visions' of various vicious and rascally types, which last were translated into English by L'Estrange (q.v.); also of much satirical poetry.

Quickly, MISTRESS NELL, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV' and 'Henry V' (qq.v.), hostess of the Boar's Head Tavern in Eastcheap.

Quickly, MISTRESS, in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.), the servant of Dr. Caius.

Quietism, a form of religious mysticism (originated prior to 1675 by Molinos, q.v., a Spanish priest), consisting in passive devotional contemplation, with extinction of the will and withdrawal from all things of the senses. [OED.] One of the best-known exponents of Quietist doctrines was Fénelon (q.v.), archbishop of Cambrai, whose 'Maximes des Saints', embodying his opinions, was condemned by Rome. Another noted Quietist was Mme Guyon (1648-1717). There is a good deal about the Quietists in Shorthouse's novel, 'John Inglesant' (q.v.).

Qui-hi, from Urdū koī hai, 'Is any one there?', a call used in India to summon a servant, a nickname for an Anglo-Indian.

QUILLER-COUCH, SIR ARTHUR THOMAS (1863-1944), a Cornishman, educated at Newton Abbot College, Clifton College, and Trinity College, Oxford, became professor of English literature at Cambridge in 1912. His publications (most of them under the pseudonym 'Q') include: 'Dead Man's Rock' (1887), 'Troy Town' (1888), 'The Splendid Spur' (1889), 'Noughts and Crosses' (1891), 'The Ship of Stars' (1899), 'The Oxford Book of English Verse' (1900, 1939), 'The Oxford Book of Ballads' (1910), 'The Oxford Book of Victorian Verse' (1912), 'On the Art of Writing' (1916), 'Studies in Literature' (1918, 1922), 'On the Art of Reading' (1920), 'The Oxford Book of English Prose' (1925). He wrote the conclusion of Stevenson's unfinished 'St. Ives' (chs. 31 to the end). His collected poems were published in 1929.

Quilp, DANIEL and MRS., characters in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.).

Quin, JAMES (1693-1766), an actor who first came into note by his impersonation of Bajazet in Rowe's 'Tamerlane' (q.v.). He took leading parts in tragedy at Drury Lane, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and Covent Garden. He was the last of the old school of actors, which gave place to that of Garrick. Smollett introduces him in 'Humphry Clinker'.

Quinapalus, a character invented by the clown in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (i. v.), as authority for a saying of his own.

QUINCE

Quince, PETER, in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), a carpenter, the stage-manager of the interlude 'Pyramus and Thisbe'.

QUINTILIAN (MARCUS FABIUS QUINTILIANUS) (c. A.D. 35–c. 100), a great Roman rhetorician. Pliny the younger was among his pupils, and he was given the title of consul by Domitian. His great work was the 'De Institutione Oratoria', the tenth book of which contains a history of Greek and Roman literature. Milton in one of his sonnets refers to 'Those rugged names . . . that would have made Quintilian stare and gasp'.

Quinze Joyes de Mariage, a famous 15th-cent. French satire on women, doubtfully attributed to Antoine de la Salle (1388–c. 1470), translated into English as the 'Fifteen Comforts of Matrimony' (1682).

Quirinus, originally the local deity (perhaps the war god) of the Sabine community settled on the Quirinal hill. He became one of the state gods of Rome and was later identified with Romulus, the founder of the city. The derivation from Cures, the name of a Sabine town (Lewis and Short), is now questioned.

Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, a firm of scoundrelly solicitors in Warren's 'Ten Thousand a Year' (see Warren, S.).

Quisling, VIKTOR, leader of the Norwegian Nazi party, formed on 9 April 1940, under German direction, a puppet Government of Norway. He was sentenced to death in

RABELAIS

Sept. 1945. The name quisling has been popularly adopted to signify a traitor to the cause of his country's freedom.

Quiteria, see Camacho.

Quixote, see Don Quixote.

Quorn, THE, one of the most celebrated English packs of fox-hounds, came into prominence in 1753, when the famous Mr. Meynell began his long mastership of nearly half a century. It takes its name from Quorndon Hall, where the kennels now are. Melton Mowbray in Leicestershire is the most important point in the Quorn country. Among other famous masters of this pack were Thomas Assheton Smith (1806–16) and George Osbaldestone (q.v., 1817–21 and 1823–8).

Quorum (Latin, 'of whom'), originally certain justices of the peace, usually of eminent learning or ability, whose presence was necessary to constitute a bench. 'Justice of the peace and coram', Slender calls Shallow in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (I. i). Hence a fixed number of any body whose presence is necessary for the valid transaction of business.

Quos ego—, from Virgil's 'Aeneid', i. 139, where Neptune is threatening the rebellious winds with punishment, but breaks off at the words 'Whom I—', in an eloquent aposiopesis. The words are proverbial for a threat of punishment.

Quraysh, see Koraysh.

R

Ra, in Egyptian mythology, the sun-god and supreme deity, often identified with Horus, and generally represented as a hawk. The ancient kings of Egypt, at least from the time of the 5th dynasty (c. 2750 B.C.), were regarded as his sons. His cult was in a measure superseded by that of Ammon, under the Theban Pharaohs, to be temporarily restored to supremacy under Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton).

Rab and his Friends, see Brown (Dr. J.).

Rabbi Ben Ezra, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.) included in 'Dramatis Personae' (q.v.). It is an exposition of the author's religious philosophy through the mouth of a learned Jew. The soul is immortal; life is but the fashioning of the pot for the Master's hand.

RABELAIS, FRANÇOIS (1494?–1553), French humanist, satirist, and physician, was born near Chinon in Touraine, where his father was a well-to-do lawyer. He was a Franciscan friar at Fontenay-le-Comte in Poitou in 1520 and probably earlier, but, being persecuted there for his addiction to the study of Greek, became a monk at the Benedictine abbey of Maillezais, also in Poitou.

This he left, visited various provincial universities, and studied medicine at Paris, giving up the Benedictine dress. He took his medical degrees at Montpellier, and practised and lectured on medicine at Lyons, at that time a great intellectual centre. He thrice visited Rome as physician to his friend and protector, Cardinal Jean du Bellay (1534, 1535–6, and 1548–50), and was at Turin in 1540–1 with the cardinal's brother, Guillaume. In the course of his second visit to Rome he obtained from Paul III absolution for his 'apostasy'. In 1550 he was appointed to two livings, Meudon near Paris and Jambet near Le Mans, but appears to have discharged personally the duties of neither. He published 'Pantagruel' (q.v.) in 1532, 'Gargantua' (q.v.) in 1534, the 'Third Book' in 1546, part of the 'Fourth Book' in 1548, and the whole in 1552. The authenticity of the 'Fifth Book' is questionable; it certainly contains work by other hands and is not in a form which Rabelais intended for publication. The first sixteen chapters of it, under the title of 'L'Isle sonnante', appeared in 1562, after his death; the whole book in 1564.

Rabelais was held in high regard in his own day as an eminent physician, as a pioneer of humanism and enlightenment, and as the author of an entertaining book. His courageous attacks on obscurantism brought on him the enmity of the Sorbonne and the Paris Parliament, and, in spite of the protection of Francis I, he was obliged repeatedly to withdraw from France (to Rome, as stated above, and in 1546-7 to Metz).

The first three books of his chief work were translated into English by Urquhart (q.v.), two being published in 1653, the third in 1693; the last two by Motteux (q.v.) in 1693-4. There is a modern translation with useful notes by W. F. Smith (1893, 1934). The whole five books are generally numbered consecutively, 'Gargantua' being reckoned the first, 'Pantagruel' the second.

Rachel (ÉLISA FÉLIX) (1821-58), a celebrated French actress, of Jewish descent, whose finest parts were in the tragedies of Racine and Corneille. There is a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.) on her last illness.

RACINE, JEAN (1639-99), French dramatic poet, spent some years of his youth among the Jansenists of Port Royal (with whom he subsequently quarrelled); then was introduced to the fashionable world of the Paris of Louis XIV, and acquired the friendship of Molière, La Fontaine, and Boileau. As a tragedian, he presented his characters in a more human and natural form than did Corneille; they are governed more by their passions, less by their wills. He gave them classical names, but what he depicted were the loves, the failings, and the intrigues of the society around him. His tragedies divide themselves into three groups, those whose subjects are taken from Euripides: 'Andromaque' (1667), 'Iphigénie' (1674), and 'Phèdre' (1677); from history: 'Britannicus' (1669), 'Bérénice' (1670), 'Mithridate' (1673); from the Scriptures: 'Esther' (1689) and 'Athalie' (1691). 'Phèdre' and 'Athalie' were his greatest works. Racine also wrote one comedy, 'Les Plaideurs' (1668).

Radcliffe, JOHN (1650-1714), physician, who attended William III, Queen Mary, and Queen Anne. He left property from which the Radcliffe Library, Infirmary, and Observatory at Oxford were built.

RADCLIFFE, MRS. ANN (1764-1823), née Ward, a novelist whose fame rests on her 'Romance of the Forest' (1791), 'The Mysteries of Udolpho' (q.v., 1794), and 'The Italian' (1797, a romance of the Inquisition). She also wrote 'A Sicilian Romance' (1790) and 'An Italian Romance' (1791). Mrs. Radcliffe's method, which found a number of imitators, was to arouse terror and curiosity by events apparently supernatural, but afterwards explained by natural means.

'Radical Jack', the first earl of Durham (1792-1840). See Durham Report.

Radlgund, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. iv-vii, a queen of the Amazons, who subdues Artegall, and forces him to spin flax and tow until he is rescued by Britomart.

Radnor, VICTOR, NATALIA, and NESTA VICTORIA, characters in Meredith's 'One of our Conquerors' (q.v.).

Raeburn, Sir HENRY (1756-1823), a Scottish portrait-painter, sometimes called the 'Scottish Reynolds', who settled in Edinburgh in 1787 and during thirty years painted portraits of a large number of his contemporaries. In the estimation of many good critics, the greatest portrait-painter Britain ever produced.

Raffaello Sanzio or SANTI (1483-1520), of Urbino, commonly known as RAPHAEL, the great Italian painter. After studying under Perugino and spending four years at Florence, he went in 1509 to Rome, where he became the favourite painter of Pope Julius II and was entrusted with the decoration of the Stanze in the Vatican. He was no less favoured by Leo X, who appointed Raphael to succeed Bramante as architect of St. Peter's. For him Raphael executed the cartoons for the tapestries intended for the Sistine Chapel. Seven of these came into the possession of Charles I of England and are now in the South Kensington Museum. In his short life Raphael painted, besides these works, a large number of magnificent pictures, the majority of them Madonnas.

Rag Fair, see Rosemary Lane.

Rages, RHAGES or RHAGAE (modern Rayy), a great city of Media, on the southern slope of the mountains bordering the southern shore of the Caspian Sea. It was more than once destroyed, first by earthquake, then in the Parthian wars, and finally by the Tartars (1221). It is mentioned in the Book of Tobit (q.v.). RHAGES POTTERY is fine glazed Persian pottery of the 10th-12th cents., datable by the occurrence of examples in the ruins of Rhages.

Ragman Roll, see Roll.

Ragnar Lodbrog, The Death-Song of, an old Icelandic poem translated by T. Percy (q.v.), in his 'Five Pieces of Runic Poetry'. Its publication exerted a great literary influence and stimulated the study in England of ancient Norse writings. The hero was a Norse viking who, according to legend, invaded England in the 8th cent.

Ragnarök, in Scandinavian mythology, the day of the great battle between the gods and the powers of evil, when both are destroyed and the old order and most of the old gods disappear, to be replaced by another and a happier scheme of things. Vidar and Vali survive, and Balder and Höder return from the nether world.

Ragnel, a devil in medieval mystery plays.

Rahere (d. 1144), born in the reign of William the Conqueror, followed a church career and became prebendary of St. Paul's in 1111. Legend attributes to him the position of King's jester to Henry I, before his conversion to clerical life. He made a pilgrimage to Rome, where, while convalescent from a fever, he made a vow to build a hospital and church in honour of St. Bartholomew. He began to build St. Bartholomew's Hospital in London in 1123 on land granted for the purpose by Henry I. He is also said to have founded St. Bartholomew's Church, Smithfield, in which a fine monument to him is still to be seen.

Rahu, in Hindu mythology, the demon who pursues the sun and moon, occasionally catches them, and causes their eclipses.

Ralkes, JACK, a character in Meredith's 'Evan Harrington' (q.v.).

Rakshas or RAKSHASAS, in Hindu belief, evil demons, who in hideous shape haunt cemeteries and devour men, or ensnare them by assuming beautiful forms.

RALEGH, SIR WALTER (1552?-1618), son of a Devonshire gentleman, was born at Hayes Barton in South Devon, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. He served in the Huguenot army at Jarnac and Moncontour (1569), and was engaged in various voyages of discovery and expeditions to the American continent, and in the plantation of Munster. He obtained the favour of Queen Elizabeth, but forfeited it and was committed to the Tower (1592) on account of his relations with Elizabeth Throgmorton, whom he subsequently married. After a most unfair trial he was condemned to death, respited, and again sent to the Tower in 1603 on a charge of conspiring against James I. He lived there with his wife and son until 1616, when he was permitted to undertake an expedition to the Orinoco in search of gold, in the course of which the Spanish settlement of San Tomás was burnt. On the failure of the expedition, and at the demand of the Spanish ambassador, Raleigh was arrested, and executed at Westminster on 29 Oct. 1618; his remains were buried in St. Margaret's, Westminster. Much of his poetry is lost. About thirty short pieces survive, the principal of which is a fragment of a long elegy entitled 'Cynthia, the Lady of the Sea', expressing devotion to Elizabeth. Another notable poem is his introductory sonnet to the 'Faerie Queene'—'Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay'. The well-known short pieces 'The Lie' and 'The Pilgrimage' were probably written during his imprisonments, and the lines found in his Bible in the Gate-house at Westminster, beginning 'Even such is time', on the night before his execution. In prose he published 'A Report of the Truth of the Fight about the Isles of the Azores' (1591), which contains a narrative of the famous encounter of Sir Richard Grenville with the Spanish fleet; and 'The Discovery of the Empyre of Guiana' (1596), giving an account of his first expedition to those parts in 1595. His 'History of the World' (1614) was designed for Prince Henry, who showed sympathy with Raleigh and visited him in the Tower. One passage from it is famous as a specimen of English prose ('Oxford Book of English Prose', No. 88). The first volume, which alone was completed, deals with the history of the Jews, early Egyptian history and Greek mythology, and Greek and Roman times down to 130 B.C. His object, according to his preface, is to show God's judgement on the wicked. In addition he wrote many essays on political subjects, some of which were published after his death. Though Raleigh spelt his name in several different ways, he never used the common modern form 'Raleigh'. After 1584 he used only the form 'Ralegh'. His pronunciation of the name is shown by the fact that in early life he often wrote it 'Rauley'. [C.H.E.L.] Raleigh figures as the 'Shepherd of the Sea' in Spenser's 'Colin Clouts come home againe' (q.v.). He is introduced in Scott's 'Kenilworth' (q.v.), where is told the story of his laying down his cloak in a muddy spot at Greenwich for the queen to step on.

RALEIGH, SIR WALTER (1861-1922), professor of English literature at Oxford from 1904. Among his works are Lives of Milton (1900), Wordsworth (1903), Shakespeare (1907), 'Six Essays on Johnson' (1910), 'Some Authors' (posthumous, 1923), and the first volume of the official 'War in the Air' (1922).

Ralph Roister Doister, the earliest known English comedy, by Udall (q.v.), probably written about 1553 and printed about 1567, and perhaps played by Westminster boys while Udall was headmaster of that school. The play, in short rhymed doggerel, represents the courting of the widow Christian Custance, who is betrothed to Gawin Goodluck, an absent merchant, by Roister, a swaggering simpleton, instigated thereto by the mischievous Matthew Merygreek. Roister is repulsed and beaten by Custance and her maids; and Goodluck, after being deceived by false reports, is reconciled to her. The play shows similarity to the comedies of Plautus and Terence.

Ralph the Rover, see Inchcape Rock.

Ralpho, the squire in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.).

Ram, THE, or ARIES, one of the zodiacal constellations, and the zodiacal sign entered by the sun on 21 March. According to mythology the constellation represents the ram which carried Phrixus and Helle on its back and whose golden fleece was carried off by the Argonauts (q.v.) from Colchis.

Ram Alley, now Mitre Court, Fleet Street (Wheatley and Cunningham), was noted for its cooks' shops and public-houses, and 'a place of no great reputation' (Strype). Its cooks' shops are referred to in Massinger's 'A New Way to pay Old Debts', Ben Jonson's 'Staple of News', &c.

RĀMA

Rāma, see Rāmāyana.

Ramadan, one of the months of the Arabian year, during which Mohammedans, according to the precept of the Koran, fast from sunrise to sunset.

Rāmāyana, The, one of the two great Hindu epic poems, the other being the 'Mahābhārata' (q.v.), originally composed, it is thought, not later than 500 B.C.: the 'Rāmāyana' as we have it dates probably from about 300 B.C. Its main subject is the war waged by Rama, the son of King Dasaratha of Ayodha and an impersonation of Vishnu (q.v.), against the Giant Rāvan, the fierce king of Lanka or Ceylon and the dread enemy of gods and men, who carries off Rama's wife, Sita, and whom Rama slays.

Rambler, The, a periodical in 208 numbers issued by S. Johnson (q.v.) from 20 Mar. 1749/50 to 14 Mar. 1751/52.

The contents are essays on all kinds of subjects, character-studies, allegories, criticism, &c., and were, with the exception of five, all written by Johnson himself. Their object was the instruction of his readers in wisdom or piety, and at the same time the refinement of the English language. The contributors of the remaining numbers were Richardson (q.v.), Elizabeth Carter (q.v.), Mrs. Chapone (q.v.), and Catherine Talbot (1720-70).

'The Rambler' was also the name of a 19th-cent. periodical directed successively by J. H. Newman and Lord Acton (qq.v.), and converted under the latter's management into 'The Home and Foreign Review' (see Acton).

Rambouillet, CATHERINE DE VIVONNE-PISANI, Marquise de (1588-1665), a distinguished Frenchwoman who presided over a salon in her house, the Hôtel de Rambouillet, near the Louvre, in which the most eminent writers and wits of her day met and conversed. Among these were La Rochefoucauld, Mlle de Scudéry, Saint-Evremond, Corneille, and Mme de Sévigné. The delicacy of thought and expression aimed at in this and similar assemblies developed into a spirit of pedantry and affectation, which was ridiculed by Molière in 'Les Précieuses ridicules'. Nevertheless, the Hôtel de Rambouillet helped to purify the language and introduce greater refinement in manners.

Ramillie or RAMILLIES Wig, a wig having a long plait behind with a bow at top and bottom, from Ramillies in Belgium, the scene of Marlborough's victory in 1706.

Raminagrobis, an old French word meaning 'big purring cat'. Rabelais applied it satirically to an ancient French poet, probably Jean le Maire de Belges (15th cent.), whom Panurge consults on the subject of his proposed marriage. La Fontaine uses it ('Fables', vii. 16) as the name of the cat who, being chosen as an umpire between the rabbit and the weasel, eats them both.

RANDS

Ramona, a novel by H. H. Jackson (q.v.), published in 1884, which, in the guise of a romantic and tragic love-story, sought to do for the American Indian what 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' did for the American Negro.

Ramorny, SIR JOHN, a character in Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

RAMSAY, ALLAN (1686-1758), a Scottish poet, and an Edinburgh wig-maker and subsequently bookseller by trade. He wrote elegies, partly pathetic, partly humorous, and satires, and published a collection of these in 1721. In 1724-32 he issued the 'Tea-table Miscellany', and in 1724 'The Evergreen', collections of old Scottish and English songs, with some by himself and contemporary poets, important as contributing to the revival of vernacular Scottish poetry. Ramsay's pastoral drama, 'The Gentle Shepherd', his principal work, appeared in 1725. He also composed two additional cantos to 'Christis Kirk on the Green' (q.v.).

Ramsay, MARGARET, a character in Scott's 'The Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

RAMUS, PETRUS, latinized form of Pierre la Ramée (1515-72), a French logician and holder of a royal professorship in 1551, was famous as an opponent of the Aristotelian logic. The Ramist doctrine, as expounded in his 'Dialectica', was introduced into England in the latter part of the 16th cent. by Andrew Melville and William Temple, and obtained a wide currency in the universities, notably at Cambridge. Ramus fell a victim to the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Ran, in Scandinavian mythology, the wife of Aegir, the cruel goddess of the sea, the cause of shipwrecks and the dread of mariners.

Randolph, LORD, a character in Home's 'Douglas' (q.v.).

RANDOLPH, THOMAS (1605-35), was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge, and became a fellow of Trinity. He made the acquaintance of Ben Jonson and, after becoming famous in Cambridge as a writer of English and Latin verse, went to London in 1632. His 'Aristippus, or the Joviall Philosopher', an early dramatic sketch, is an amusing dispute on the rival merits of ale and sack (printed in 1630). His principal plays are 'Amyntas', a pastoral comedy, and 'The Muses' Looking-Glasse' (q.v.), printed in 1638; and 'Hey for Honesty' (q.v.), printed in 1651. He was also the author of a pleasant eclogue included in 'Annalia Dubrensis', verses in celebration of Captain Dover's 'Cotswold Games' (q.v.). His plays and poems were edited by W. C. Hazlitt in 1875.

RANDS, WILLIAM BRIGHTY (1823-82), 'the laureate of the nursery', who wrote sometimes under the pseudonyms Henry Holbeach and Matthew Browne. After much struggle with poverty he became a reporter in the House of Commons. He was especially esteemed for his poems and fairy tales for children. See Lilliput Levée.

Ranelagh Gardens, Chelsea, a place of public amusement opened in 1742 in the grounds of the earl of Ranelagh. It had a famous Rotunda, 150 feet in diameter, with an orchestra in the centre and boxes round it, where people promenaded. The gardens were closed in 1804. They now form part of Chelsea Hospital Gardens, between Church Row and the river, to the east of the hospital (Wheatley and Cunningham). The modern 'Ranelagh' is at Barn Elms, a club where polo and other games are played.

Ranger, (1) a rakish man of fashion in 'Love in a Wood' by Wycherley (q.v.); (2) a character in Hoadly's 'The Suspicious Husband' (q.v.).

Ranjitsinhji, KUMAR SHRI, later the Jam Sahib of Nawanager (1872-1933), a Rajput, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and a famous cricketer. He played for Sussex and England in 1900, making over 3,000 runs with an average of 87. With Fry he was one of the founders of modern batting, by his development of backplay and the leg-glide.

RANKE, LEOPOLD VON (1795-1886), a celebrated German historian. His history of 'The Popes of Rome' (1834-7) is, among his numerous works, that best known in England. He began writing a 'History of the World' when he was over 80 and got down to the 12th cent. A.D. before his death.

Ranks of Tuscany, in Macaulay's 'Lays of Ancient Rome' ('Horatius', lx), the opposing aide moved to applause:

And even the ranks of Tuscany
Could scarce forbear to cheer.

Ranz-des-vaches, the melodies peculiar to Swiss herdsmen, usually played on an Alpine horn. The origin and meaning of the word ranz (Swiss dialect of Fribourg) is uncertain.

Rape of the Lock, The, a poem by Pope (q.v.), in two cantos, published in Lintot's 'Miscellany' in 1712; subsequently enlarged to five cantos and thus published in 1714.

Lord Petre having forcibly cut off a lock of Miss Arabella Fermor's hair, the incident gave rise to a quarrel between the families. With the idea of allaying this, Pope treated the subject in a playful mock-heroic poem, on the model of Boileau's 'Le Lutrin'. He presents Belinda at her toilet, a game of ombre, the snipping of the lock while Belinda sips her coffee, the wrath of Belinda and her demand that the lock be restored, the final wafting of the lock, as a new star, to adorn the skies. The poem was published in its original form with Miss Fermor's permission. Pope then expanded the sketch by introducing the machinery of sylphs and gnomes, and its renewed publication gave offence to the lady, who thought that her affairs had been sufficiently brought before the public.

Raphael, one of the archangels (see Angel).

RASPUTIN

In the 'Book of Tobit' (q.v.) he accompanies and instructs Tobias on his journey. Milton makes him the seraph, 'the sociable Spirit', also (alas!) 'the affable Archangel', sent to Paradise to converse with Adam ('Paradise Lost', v. 221, vi. 41).

Raphael, the Italian painter, see Raffaello Sanzio.

Raphael, DON, see Don Raphael and Ambrose Lamela.

RASHDALL, THE VERY REV. HASTINGS (1858-1924), philosopher, theologian, and historian, educated at Harrow and New College, Oxford. His philosophical works include: 'The Theory of Good and Evil' (1907) and 'The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology' (1919). 'The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages' (1895, a new edition, ed. Powicke and Emden, 1935) is a standard work.

RASPE, RUDOLPH ERICH, see Munchausen.

Rasselas, Prince of Abissinia, The History of, a didactic romance by S. Johnson (q.v.), published in 1759.

It was composed in the evenings of a week to defray the expenses of the funeral of Johnson's mother and to pay her debts. It is an essay on the 'choice of life' and consists mainly of dissertations strung on a thin thread of story. Rasselas, a son of the emperor of Abyssinia, weary of the joys of the 'happy valley', where the inhabitants know only 'the soft vicissitudes of pleasure and repose', escapes to Egypt, accompanied by his sister Nekayah and the much-travelled old philosopher Imlac. Here they study the various conditions of men's lives, and, after a few incidents of no great interest, return to Abyssinia. The charm of the work lies in the wisdom, humanity, and melancholy of the episodes and disquisitions, enlivened with a few gleams of humour. Rasselas thinks that 'surely happiness is somewhere to be found'; but he finds it nowhere. The teachers of philosophy are unable to support their own misfortunes. The hermit admits that the solitary life will be certainly miserable, but not certainly devout. The prosperous man lives in terror of the Bashaw, and the Bashaw of the Sultan. The Sultan is subject to the torments of suspicion. Virtue can afford only quietness of conscience and a steady prospect of a happier state. The monks of St. Antony alone endure without complaint a life, not of uniform delight, but of uniform hardship.

Rasputin (GREGORY EFIMOVICH) (1871-1916), the son of a Russian peasant (to whom the nickname 'Rasputin', meaning 'dissolute', was given), and an uneducated monk, a man of great physical strength and magnetic personality. He claimed that he could save souls by virtue of some divine attribute in his nature. He was introduced at the Russian court, where he acquired great influence over the Empress. His name became associated with court scandals, and a plot to kill him was formed by persons of high social position, as a result of which he was assassinated.

Rastignac, one of the principal characters drawn by Balzac (q.v.). He figures intermittently throughout the series of the 'Scènes de la Vie Parisienne', but is especially analysed in 'Le Père Goriot'. He starts as a humble student, and with the help of his female admirers achieves success in the corrupt society of the Paris of the day.

Rat, the Cat, and Lovel the dog, THE, in the political rhyme:

The Rat, the Cat, and Lovel the dog
Rule all England under the Hog, refers to three adherents of Richard III: Sir Richard Ratcliffe (killed at Bosworth, 1485), Sir John Catesby (d. 1486), and Francis, first Viscount Lovell (1454-88?; his skeleton was found in a vault, where he had evidently starved to death). The Hog is a reference to the boar that figured as one of the supporters of the royal arms.

Ratcliffe, JAMES, a character in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.); a notorious thief who ingratiates himself with the magistrates and becomes a warder in the Tolbooth.

Ratcliffe Highway, see Wapping.

Ratsey, GAMALIEL, a Northamptonshire highwayman, hanged at Bedford in 1605, and frequently mentioned in 17th-cent. literature.

Rattlin, JACK, a character in Smollett's 'Roderick Random'.

Rattlin the Reefer, a novel of the sea by Edward Howard (d. 1841)—according to Prof. Elton ('Survey') the Hon. Edward George Greenville Howard—a shipmate of Capt. Marryat, published in 1836. The book was announced as edited by the author of 'Peter Simple' and was in consequence wrongly attributed to Marryat.

The story resembles the sea-yarns of Marryat, but without his high spirits. We have the bullying captain; the adventures, hoaxes, and horse-play; and some good fighting in the West Indies. But the general atmosphere is more serious.

Rauf Collyear, a rhymed poem of the Charlemagne cycle, in stanzas of thirteen lines, of which a copy survives, printed in Scotland in 1572.

The poem, which is quaint and humorous, recounts how Charles, lost and benighted, takes refuge in the hut of Rauf, a plain-spoken and self-willed charcoal-burner, who treats him hospitably but with excessive freedom.

Ravalllac, FRANÇOIS (c. 1578-1610), the assassin of Henry IV of France.

Ravel, MAURICE (1875-1937), one of the most prominent French composers of his time.

The Raven, a poem by Poe (q.v.).

RAY

Ravenshoe, a novel by H. Kingsley (q.v.), published in 1861.

The Ravenshoes are a wealthy Roman Catholic family, but Charles, the second son of Densil Ravenshoe and a Protestant mother, is brought up in his mother's religion. On Densil's death, Father Mackworth, the confessor of the family, produces evidence that Charles is not Densil's son, as had been supposed, but son of Densil's illegitimate half-brother, the keeper, the children having been exchanged when babies. But the Jesuit keeps back what he also knows, that this half-brother was not illegitimate and that Charles is the true heir of the estate. Other blows fall on Charles; for his old school-friend, Lord Welter, runs off with the woman whom Charles loves; and it is discovered that Welter has also seduced Ellen, the keeper's daughter, Charles's sister. Disinherited, disgraced, and broken-hearted, Charles hides himself from the world and enlists. One of the few survivors of Balacava, he returns to England, shattered in mind and body, and is on the point of suicide when he is discovered by his friends. The true facts have now come to light, the death of Charles's elder brother solves the difficulties of the succession, and Charles is tardily restored to his rightful position.

Ravenswood, EDGAR, MASTER OF, the hero of Scott's 'The Bride of Lammermoor' (q.v.).

RAWLINSON, GEORGE (1812-1902), educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and a fellow of Exeter College, was Camden professor of ancient history, 1861-89. He was author of 'The History of Herodotus' (1858-60), a translation accompanied by valuable historical and ethnological notes, for which the discoveries of his brother, Sir Henry Rawlinson, the Assyriologist, provided much material. He also published histories of the seven great monarchies of the Eastern world (1862-76), and other kindred works. He wrote a life of his brother, which appeared in 1908.

Rawlinson, SIR HENRY CRESWICKE (1810-95), who held various important positions in the service of the East India Company, is remembered chiefly as an Assyriologist. He deciphered the great Behistun (q.v.) inscription in 1846.

Rawlinson, THOMAS (1681-1725), educated at Eton and St. John's College, Oxford, a book-collector, whose manuscripts are in the Bodleian Library. He was satirized by Addison in the 'Tatler' (No. 158) as 'Tom Folio'.

RAY, JOHN (1627-1705), one of England's greatest naturalists. He was pre-eminently a botanist (he originated the division of plants into monocotyledons and dicotyledons), but also took up the unfinished zoological work of his friend Francis Willughby. In later life he devoted himself especially to the study of insects. His 'Historia Plantarum' was published in 1686-1704. His work was not limited to these fields: he published 'A Collection of English Proverbs' in 1670, and was keenly interested in philology.

Raymond, HENRY JARVIS (1820-69), founder of the 'New York Times' (1851) and one of the outstanding figures in the history of American journalism, which he did much to refine and improve.

READE, CHARLES (1814-84), born at Ipsden in Oxfordshire, was a demy¹ and subsequently a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and entered Lincoln's Inn. He was an ardent reformer of abuses, but appears to have been cantankerous and perverse. He began his literary career as a dramatist, his most successful play 'Masks and Faces' appearing at the Haymarket in 1852. This he turned into a novel with the title 'Peg Woffington' (q.v.), published in 1853. The pleasant romance 'Christie Johnstone' and the propagandist novel 'It is Never too Late to Mend' (qq.v.) appeared also in 1853, and were followed by 'The Course of True Love never did run Smooth' (1857), 'The Autobiography of a Thief' and 'Jack of all Trades' (1858), stories of strange avocations, in the manner of Defoe; 'Love me Little, Love me Long' (1859); 'The Cloister and the Hearth' (q.v., 1861), Reade's greatest work; 'Hard Cash' (q.v., 1863), 'Griffith Gaunt' (q.v., 1866), 'Foul Play' (q.v., 1869); 'Put Yourself in his Place' (1870), dealing with the form of terrorism organized by trade unions known as 'rattening'; 'A Terrible Temptation' (q.v., 1871), 'The Wandering Heir', suggested by the Tichborne trial (published in 'The Graphic', 1872), 'A Hero and a Martyr' (1874), 'A Woman Hater' (1874). Reade also wrote 'The Courier of Lyons' (1854), the well-known melodrama frequently produced by Sir H. Irving under the name of 'The Lyons Mail'. His play 'Drink' (1879) was based on Zola's 'L'Assommoir'.

Reade was an admirable story-teller. He relied greatly on documentary information, which he accumulated in great ledgers in his well-known house in Albert Terrace (immediately opposite Sloane Street). There is a description of his methods in 'A Terrible Temptation'.

READE, WILLIAM WINWOOD (1838-75), traveller, novelist, and controversialist, nephew of Charles Reade (q.v.). He made exploratory voyages in West and South-West Africa in 1861 and 1869, and was special correspondent of 'The Times' in the Ashanti War. He published 'Savage Africa' in 1863 and 'The African Sketch-book' in 1873. 'The Martyrdom of Man' (1872 and many subsequent editions) contains his criticism of religious beliefs.

Realism, in scholastic philosophy, the doctrine that attributes objective or absolute existence to universals, of which Thomas Aquinas (q.v.) was the chief exponent. Duns (q.v.) Scotus also maintained realism in an extreme form. Also in the arts a loosely used term meaning truth to the observed facts of life (especially when they are gloomy).

Reason, GODDESS OF, a divinity invented by the National Convention during the French Revolution, personated by Mlle Candeille of the Opera, who was borne in procession to Notre Dame and there made the object of a mock-worship (1793). There were other 'Goddesses of Reason' (including Mme Momoro) and the worship was conducted at several churches.

Rebecca, (1) the name given (in allusion to Gen. xxiv. 60) to the leader, in woman's attire, of the rioters who demolished toll-gates in S. Wales in 1843-4; (2) a character in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.).

Rebecca and Rowena, a Romance upon Romance, by Mr. Michael Angelo Tismarsh, a humorous sequel to Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.), by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 1850.

Ivanhoe soon wearies of life with his wife, the Lady Rowena, who rules the roost and bores everybody with stories of Edward the Confessor; he goes off to join King Richard in France. He is present when the latter is killed at the siege of Chalus, and is himself left for dead on the field. Wamba rather precipitately carries home the news to Rowena, who promptly marries Athelstane, in whom she finds a congenial mate. Ivanhoe recovers, returns to find Rowena besieged in her castle, and Athelstane dead in the siege. Rowena dies, making Ivanhoe promise he will 'never marry a Jewess'. After many adventures Ivanhoe rescues Rebecca, who has turned Christian and been imprisoned by old Isaac, and marries her.

Récamier, MME (1777-1849), a Frenchwoman famous for her beauty and wit, whose salon during the Restoration was frequented by the most brilliant society of the day, including Chateaubriand.

Rechabite, one of a Jewish family descended from Jonadab, son of Rechab, who refused to drink wine or live in houses (see Jer. xxxv). Hence one who abstains from intoxicating liquors, and specifically a member of the Independent Order of Rechabites, a benefit society founded in 1835; or a dweller in tents. [OED.]

Recluse, The, see Excursion.

RECOLLECT

Recollect or RECOLLECT, a member of the Observantine (q.v.) branch of the Franciscan (q.v.) order, which originated in Spain in the end of the 15th cent. and was so named 'from the detachment from creatures and recollection in God which the founders aimed at' (Catholic Dictionary).

Record Office, PUBLIC: before the construction of the present office in Fetter Lane, the national records were kept in the Tower of London and Rolls House (q.v.). Among important keepers of the records may be mentioned Selden and Prynne (qq.v.), Samuel Lysons the antiquary (1803), and Sir F. Palgrave (q.v.).

Recovery, see Fest of Fines.

Recruiting Officer, The, a comedy by Farquhar (q.v.), produced in 1706.

It deals with the humours of recruiting in a country town, with a vividness suggesting that the author drew on his own experience. The plot is slender; it presents Capt. Plume making love to the women in order to secure their followers as recruits; Kite, his resourceful sergeant, employing his wiles and assuming the character of an astrologer, for the same purpose; while Sylvia, daughter of Justice Ballance, who is in love with Plume, but has promised not to marry him without her father's consent, runs away from home disguised as a man, gets herself arrested for scandalous conduct, is brought before her father, and by him delivered over to Capt. Plume, as a recruit. Capt. Brazen, a rival recruiting officer, who boasts of battles and friends in every quarter of the globe, endeavours to marry the rich Melinda, but finds himself fobbed off with her maid.

Red Badge of Courage, The, by Stephen Crane (q.v.), published in 1895, is the author's best-known work and won him immediate recognition in England as well as America. It is a study of an inexperienced soldier's reactions to the ordeal of battle during the American Civil War. Determined to be a hero, he suddenly turns coward; then recovers himself and behaves as the fighter he had wished to be.

Red Book of Hergest, a Welsh manuscript of the end of the 14th cent., containing the 'Mabinogion' (q.v.), chronicles, and poems.

Red Cotton Night-Cap Country, or, Turf and Towers, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1873.

The story is based on a series of dramatic incidents that occurred in France shortly before the poem was written (see Nicoll and Wise, 'Literary Anecdotes', i. 516), and describes the spiritual experiences of Leonce Miranda, a wealthy Spaniard resident in France and devotedly united to Clara Mulhausen, the wife of another man. He makes repeated attempts at suicide under the influence of his conscience, provoked successively by his mother's rebuke, by her death, and by the desire to test the miraculous powers of Christianity. For this last purpose he throws himself from a tower and is killed.

The title of the book arose out of a meeting with Miss Annie Thackeray, to whom it is dedicated, at St. Aubin, which she had nicknamed 'White Cotton Night-Cap Country' from its sleepy appearance and the white caps of the women. The change to 'Red Cotton Night-Cap' is symbolical of the contrast of this with the tale of blood.

Red Cross, THE, the badge (adapted from the Swiss national flag under the Geneva Convention of 1864) of military ambulance and hospital services.

A red cross was the mark made on the doors of infected houses during the London plagues of the 17th cent.

Red Cross Knight, THE, in Bk. I of Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' is Saint George, the patron saint of England. He is the 'patron' or champion of Holiness, and represents the Anglican Church. He is separated from Una (the true religion) by the wiles of Archimago (hypocrisy), and is led away by Duessa (the Roman Catholic religion) to the House of Pride. He drinks of an enchanted stream, loses his strength, and is made captive by the giant Orgoglio (pride). Orgoglio is slain by Prince Arthur, and Una leads her knight to the House of Holiness, to learn repentance and be healed. The Knight and Una are finally united.

Red Riding Hood, Little, a popular tale translated from the French of Perrault (q.v.) by Robert Samber (1729?).

Little Red Riding Hood is sent by her mother to take a cake and a pot of butter to her sick grandmother. She loiters on the way, and gets into conversation with a wolf, who learns her errand. He hurries on, eats up the grandmother, takes her place in the bed, and personates her when Red Riding Hood arrives, finally devouring the child. In the German variant the child is resuscitated. Andrew Lang, in his 'Perrault's Popular Tales', discusses the analogies of the story in other legends.

Redbreasts, according to Dickens ('Letters', 18 Apr. 1862), a nickname for the old Bow Street 'runners' or police officers, because they wore red waistcoats.

Redburn, by H. Melville (q.v.), published in 1849, a largely autobiographical narrative, dealing with the period of the author's voyage to Liverpool in 1839.

Redgauntlet, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1824.

The story is concerned with an apocryphal return of Prince Charles Edward to England some years after 1745, to try once more his fortunes, an attempt that meets with inglorious failure. Mr. Redgauntlet, otherwise known as Herries of Birrenswark, a fanatical Jacobite, is the leader of the movement, and, to promote its success, kidnaps his young nephew, Darsie Latimer (whose true name Is Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet), the head of his house, in order that he may get the support of his followers. Darsie's experiences, and those of his young friend Alan Fairford, who sets out to rescue him, make up the substance of the novel; which also contains the notable characters of Joshua Geddes, the Quaker, the hypocrite Thomas Trumbull, Nanty Ewart the sea-captain, and the blind fiddler 'Wandering Willie'; together with some amusing pictures of old legal Edinburgh (including the grotesque-pathetic figure of Peter Peebles, the crazy litigant). Though not generally accounted one of the three or four greatest Waverley novels, 'Redgauntlet' (written in the last years of Scott's prosperity) contains some of his finest writing, notably in 'Wandering Willie's Tale', a perfect example of the short story.

REDGAUNTLET

REDI, FRANCESCO (1626-98), physician to the grand duke of Tuscany and author of a spirited dithyrambic poem, 'Bacco in Toscana' ('Bacchus in Tuscany'), which Leigh Hunt (q.v.) translated. It may have helped to inspire Dryden's 'Alexander's Feast'.

Redlaw, a character in Dickens's 'The Haunted Man' (q.v.).

Redmond O'Neale, a character in Scott's 'Rokeby' (q.v.).

Redworth, THOMAS, a character in G. Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v.).

REEVE, CLARA (1729-1807), a disciple of Horace Walpole as a novelist, published 'The Champion of Virtue, a Gothic Story', her best-known work, in 1777. The title was changed to 'The Old English Baron' in the second edition. It is a romance of the 15th cent. in which a slight element of the supernatural is introduced, in the shape of the ghost of a murdered baron. Clara Reeve also wrote 'The Progress of Romance through Times, Centuries, and Manners' (1785).

Reform Bill, a bill for widening the parliamentary franchise and removing inequalities and abuses in the system of representation, introduced by Lord John Russell (a member of Lord Grey's government) in 1831 and carried after an acute struggle in 1832. The second Reform Bill, giving a more democratic representation, was carried in 1867; the third in 1884. Several more were needed to produce the present state of things.

Reformation, THE, the great religious movement of the 16th cent., having for its object the reform of the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome, and ending in the establishment of the various Reformed or Protestant churches of central and north-western Europe. Its principal leaders were Luther in Germany, Calvin in France and Geneva, Zwingli in Switzerland, and Knox in Scotland. The principal points contended for by the reformers were the general use and authority of the Scriptures and the need of justification by faith; while they repudiated the doctrine of transubstantiation, the worship of the Virgin Mary, and the supremacy of the pope.

Regan, in Shakespeare's 'King Lear' (q.v.), the second of Lear's daughters.

Regency, THE, in English history, the period (1811-20) during which George, Prince of Wales, acted as Regent, owing to the insanity of George III; in French history, the period (1715-23) during which Philip, duke of Orleans, acted as Regent, owing to the minority of Louis XV.

Regent Street, London, designed and carried out by John Nash (q.v.) to connect the Regent's residence, Carlton House, with Regent's Park, as authorized by an Act of 1813. It was completely rebuilt in 1922-6.

Regent's Park was laid out, on royal property, in 1814 by John Nash, and named in honour of the Prince Regent. It contains the Zoological Gardens (q.v.), and until recently contained the gardens of the Royal Botanic Society.

Regicide Peace, Letters on a, by E. Burke (q.v.), the first two published in 1796, the third in 1797, the fourth posthumously in the collected works.

By the end of 1796 France had reached a dominating position on the Continent. Her only serious enemies during that year had been England, Austria, and Sardinia, and the Austrian and Sardinian armies had been defeated by Buonaparte in Italy. In Oct. 1796 Pitt sent Lord Malmesbury to Paris to negotiate a peace, but his proposals were scornfully rejected. It was in these circumstances that Burke wrote these letters, which purport to be addressed to a member of parliament. Their theme is the necessity for stamping out the Jacobin government of France, that 'vast tremendous unformed spectre'; the futile and humiliating character of the negotiations undertaken; and the ability of England from an economic standpoint to carry on the struggle. Burke defines Jacobinism as the revolt of the enterprising talents of a country against its property, and their association for the destruction of its pre-existing laws and institutions.

Regillus, Lake, see Lake Regillus.

Regiomontium, in imprints, Königsberg.

Regiomontanus, JOHANN MÜLLER (1436-76), of Königsberg, from which place he took his Latin name, a German mathematician and astronomer, and bishop of Ratisbon. He was the author of 'Ephemerides', a navigators' almanac, published in 1474, and calculated for the years 1474-1506. His alleged prediction of political convulsions in 1588 (the year of the Armada) is referred to by Bacon in Essay xxxv.

REGIUS PROFESSORSHIPS

Regius professorships were first founded by Henry VIII in 1540 at Cambridge (divinity, civil law, physic, Hebrew, and Greek). In 1546 five further Regius professorships were founded at Oxford (divinity, medicine, civil law, Hebrew, and Greek). Regius professorships of modern history at Cambridge, and of ecclesiastical history, modern history, and moral and pastoral theology at Oxford, have since been added.

Regulus, MARCUS ATILIUS, Roman consul in 267 and 256 B.C. He is quoted as an instance of heroic constancy in misfortune. It is related that, having been taken prisoner by the Carthaginians, and kept in captivity for five years, he was allowed to accompany an embassy to Rome on condition that he should return if the Carthaginian proposals were not accepted; that he advised the senate not to consent to peace, and that when, through his influence, the terms proposed were refused, he returned to Carthage and was put to death with torture. (See Horace, 'Odes', III. v, 'Atqui sciebat quae sibi barbarus Tortor pararet'.)

Rehearsal, The, a farcical comedy attributed to George Villiers, 2nd duke of Buckingham, but probably written by him in collaboration with others, among whom are mentioned S. Butler (q.v.) and Martin Clifford, Master of the Charterhouse. It was printed in 1672.

The play is designed to satirize the heroic tragedies of the day, and consists of a series of parodies of passages from these, strung together in an absurd heroic plot. The author of the mock play is evidently a laureate (hence his name 'Bayes'), and D'Avenant was probably intended; but there are also hits at Dryden (particularly his 'Conquest of Granada') and his brothers-in-law, Edward and Robert Howard. Bayes takes two friends, Smith and Johnson, to see the rehearsal of his play, and the absurdity of this work (which includes the two kings of Brentford, entering hand in hand), coupled with the comments of Bayes, his instructions to the actors, and the remarks of Smith and Johnson, makes excellent reading. Prince Prettyman and Prince Volscius are among the characters.

Rehoboam, a name given to a wine-bottle of the largest size, equivalent to eight standard bottles (Saintsbury). C. Brontë in 'Shirley' (chs. 1 and 17) applies the name to a shovel hat.

REID, THOMAS (1710-96), was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, where he became professor of moral philosophy in 1751. He was appointed to a similar post at Glasgow University in 1764. He published his 'Inquiry into the Human Mind' in 1764, his essay on the 'Intellectual Powers' in 1785, and that on the 'Active Powers' in 1788. He is the leading representative of the school of common sense, by which phrase he meant not vulgar opinion, but the beliefs common to rational beings as such. His most important doctrine was that belief in an external world is intuitive or immediate. He contested the view of Locke, Berkeley, and Hume (qq.v.) that the objects of knowledge are 'ideas', maintaining that the object of perception, not the unrelated idea, is that which exists.

REID, THOMAS MAYNE (1818-83), novelist; author of 'The Rifle Rangers' (1850), 'The Scalp-Hunters' (1851), 'The Headless Horseman' (1866), &c.

Reign of Terror, THE, or THE TERROR, that period of the first French Revolution from March (or according to another view June) 1793 to July 1794 when the ruling faction ruthlessly executed persons of both sexes and all ages and conditions whom they regarded as obnoxious. It was terminated by the fall of Robespierre. The RED TERROR is the term applied to the last six weeks before 27 July 1794, when 1,366 people were guillotined in Paris alone.

Reim-kennar, one skilled in magic rhymes, a name apparently invented by Scott in his 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

REINACH, SALOMON (1858-1932), French scholar and archaeologist, curator of the national museum of Saint-Germain-en-Laye, author of a number of learned works.

Rejected Addresses, a collection of parodies by James and Horace Smith (q.v.), published in 1812.

On the occasion of the opening of the present Drury Lane Theatre, which replaced Sheridan's building destroyed by fire, the committee in charge advertised for a suitable address to be spoken at the opening. The addresses submitted proved unsatisfactory, and the task of preparing a prologue was finally entrusted to Byron. It was suggested to the two Smiths that they should avail themselves of this opportunity, which they did by composing the imaginary addresses submitted by a number of the popular poets of the day, parodying their style. These include Wordsworth, Byron, Moore, Southey, Coleridge, Crabbe, and Sir Walter Scott. Not least is the parody in prose of Cobbett called 'The Hampshire Farmer's Address'. The remarkable appositeness and humour of the parodies made them extremely popular.

Relapse, The, or Virtue in Danger, a comedy by Vanbrugh (q.v.), produced in 1696.

This was Vanbrugh's first play and was very well received. It is an avowed continuation of 'Love's Last Shift' by Colley Cibber (q.v.), the characters being retained, though more effectively presented. It contains two plots, very slenderly related to each other. Loveless, a reformed libertine, living in the country in mutual affection with his wife, Amanda, is obliged to go with her to London, where he suffers a relapse under the temptation of the beautiful Berinthia, an unscrupulous young widow. Worthly, a former lover of Berinthia, prevails on her to favour Loveless's suit and to persuade Amanda of the infidelity of her husband, in order to promote his own chances of seducing Amanda. But Amanda, though bitterly resenting her husband's faithlessness, remains firm in her virtue.

The second plot is more entertaining. Sir Novelty Fashion, the perfect beau, who has just become (by purchase) Lord Foppington, is about to marry Miss Hoyden, daughter of Sir Tunbelly Clumsey, a country squire, neither father nor daughter having yet seen him. Foppington's younger brother, Young Fashion, having outrun his allowance, appeals to Foppington for assistance, but is repulsed with contumely. To revenge himself and rehabilitate his fortunes, he decides to go down to Sir Tunbelly's house, personate his brother, and marry the heiress. The plot is at first quite successful. Sir Tunbelly welcomes him unsuspectingly, and Miss Hoyden is only too ready to marry him next morning; but Sir Tunbelly will not hear of the marriage for a week. In view of the danger of delay, Fashion bribes the nurse and parson, and a secret marriage is at once celebrated. No sooner is this done than Foppington arrives, is treated as an impostor, and subjected to indignities, until a neighbour vouches for his identity. Meanwhile young Fashion escapes. Hoyden, the parson, and the nurse decide to say nothing of the former marriage, and Hoyden is now married to Foppington, who immediately brings his wife to London. Here young Fashion claims his bride, the nurse and parson are bullied and cajoled into admitting the earlier marriage, and Hoyden is reconciled to her lot on learning that Fashion is Lord Foppington's brother.

The play was adapted by Sheridan and produced as 'A Trip to Scarborough'.

Relations, a name applied to printed news-pamphlets of the early part of the 17th cent., recording domestic events.

Relativity, a theory of the physical universe evolved by Prof. Einstein (q.v.).

Religio Laici, a poem by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1682.

The poet argues for the credibility of the Christian religion and against Deism, and (perhaps with less conviction) for the Anglican Church against that of Rome. See Hind and the Panther (The).

Religio Medici, a work by Sir T. Browne (q.v.), first printed without his sanction in 1642, reissued with his approval in 1643. It was written about 1635, at Shipden Hall, near Halifax, before the author settled at Norwich. He states, in the 1643 edition, that it was not intended for publication but was 'composed at leisurable hours for his private exercise and satisfaction', but, having been printed without his knowledge and consent, he felt bound to issue a 'full and intended copy'.

It is a confession of Christian faith (qualified by an eclectic and generally sceptical attitude), and a collection of opinions on a vast number of subjects more or less connected with religion, expressed with a wealth of fancy and wide erudition. The headings of a few of the sections will suggest the variety of matters dealt with: 'Nature doeth nothing in vain', 'of miracles', 'of witchcraft', 'of guardian and attendant spirits', 'of marriage and harmony', 'of sleep', 'avarice a ridiculous vice'. The work contains two beautiful prayers in verse.

REMARQUE, ERICH MARIA (1898–), German novelist, author of 'Im Westen nichts Neues' ('All Quiet on the Western Front', 1929) and 'Der Weg zurück' ('The Road Back', 1931).

Rembrandt Harmenszoon van Rijn (Rembrandt the son of Harmen, of the Rhine) (1607–69), born at Leyden, the son of a wealthy miller, was the greatest painter of the Dutch school, and also a great etcher. He has been called the 'King of Shadows', from his practice of painting pictures illuminated by a clear but limited light, emerging in the midst of masses of shadow. He also delighted in portraying the wrinkled faces of old people, while his landscapes show a profound feeling for nature.

Remora, the sucking-fish (Echeneis remora), believed by the ancients to have the power of staying the course of any ship to which it attached itself. It attaches itself to the belly of the shark or other large fish.

Remorse, a blank verse tragedy by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), produced at Drury Lane in 1813.

Renaissance, THE, the great revival of art and letters, under the influence of classical models, which began in Italy in the 14th cent. and continued during the 15th and 16th. Among English writers who have dealt with the subject may be mentioned Symonds, Ruskin, and Pater (qq.v.).

RENAN, ERNEST (1823–92), a Breton by birth, and a learned French writer, philologist, and historian. The result of his studies of Christianity is embodied in the famous 'Origines du Christianisme', in which he applied the method of the historian to the Biblical narrative: 'Vie de Jésus' (1863), 'Les Apôtres' (1866), 'St. Paul' (1869), 'L'Antéchrist' (1873), 'Les Évangiles' (1877), 'L'Eglise chrétienne' (1879), 'Marc Aurèle' (1881). His other best-known works, all of them remarkable for the beauty of their style, were his 'Histoire du Peuple d'Israël' (1887–93), 'Drame philosophiques' (1878–86), and the autobiographical 'Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse' (1883). Renan also wrote an important 'Histoire des langues sémitiques' (1855), a life of Averroës (1852), and studies of the 'Book of Job' (1838) and the 'Song of Solomon' (1860).

RENASCENCE OF WONDER

Renascence of Wonder, The, see Watts-Dunton (W. T.).

Renaud, in the chansons de geste (q.v.) a rebel against Charlemagne, better known under the Italian name of Rinaldo (q.v.).

Renault, a character in Otway's 'Venice Preserved' (q.v.).

René, a romance by Châteaubriand (q.v.).

René of Provence (1408-80), known as 'le bon Roi René', son of Louis II, duke of Anjou, was titular king of Naples, the two Sicilies, and Jerusalem, 'whose large style agrees not with the leanness of his purse' (Shakespeare, '2 Henry VI', i. i). His daughter, Margaret of Anjou, was wife of Henry VI. As Count of Provence, he gave free play to his love of music and poetry, tilting and hunting, minstrels and knight-errants, and showed indifference to political affairs. There is a picture of his court in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.). He figures in Shakespeare's 'Henry VI' as 'Reignier'. He left some prose and verse romances, pastorals, and allegories.

Renée de Croisnel, afterwards Marquise de Rouaillout, a character in Meredith's 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v.).

Repressor of over much Blaming of the Clergy, see Pecock.

Republic, The, one of the dialogues of Plato (q.v.), in which Socrates is represented as eliciting, in the course of a discussion on justice, the ideal type of state. In this the perfect forms of goodness, truth, and beauty are cultivated, and everything repugnant to them excluded. The famous apologue of the men who live bound in a cavern, so that they can see only the shadows of real objects projected by a bright fire on its inner wall, occurs in Bk. vii.

Representative Men, by Emerson (q.v.), a series of studies of Plato, Swedenborg, Montaigne, Napoleon, Goethe (1850).

Republic of Letters, The, the collective body of those engaged in literary pursuits. The expression occurs first in Addison's 'Dialogues upon Ancient Medals', i. 19.

RESERBY, SIR JOHN (1634-89), travelled during the Commonwealth in France, Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands. His interesting 'Memoirs' were published in 1734, and his 'Travels and Memoirs' in 1813.

Restoration, The, the re-establishment of monarchy in England with the return of Charles II (1660); also the period marked by this event, of which the chief literary figures are Dryden, Etherege, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, Farquhar, Rochester, Bunyan, Pepys, and Locke (q.v.).

Resurrection man, or RESURRECTIONIST, one who made a trade of exhuming bodies in order to sell them to anatomists (as Jerry Cruncher did in Dickens's 'Tale of Two Cities', q.v.). The term came into use towards the end of the 18th cent.

Retaliation, an unfinished poem by Goldsmith (q.v.), published in 1774, consisting of a string of humorous and critical epitaphs on David Garrick, Reynolds, Burke, and other friends, in reply to their similar efforts directed against himself. Of the latter Garrick's is the best known:

Here lies Nolly Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel, but talked like poor Poll.

Retort courteous, The, the first of Touchstone's seven causes of quarrel (Shakespeare's 'As You Like It', v. iv); followed by the 'quip modest', the 'reply churlish', the 'reproof valiant', the 'countercheck quarrelsome', the 'lie circumstantial', and the 'lie direct'.

Returne from Pernassus, The, see Parnassus Plays.

Return of the Druses, The, a tragedy in blank verse by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1843.

The Druses (q.v.) are living in exile on a small island in the Aegean, the victims of the tyranny of the prefect of the Knights of Rhodes. Djabal, the son of the last Emir, who has taken refuge in Europe, plans to return and murder the oppressor. On his return he falls in love with Anael, a Druse girl, who will marry none but the deliverer of her race. He now determines to assume the character of an incarnation of the Hakeem, the divine founder of the religion. But presently conscience is too strong for him, and he resolves on flight after he shall have killed the tyrant. In this assassination Anael anticipates him; whereupon Djabal confesses his imposture. Anael falls dead, and Djabal kills himself on her body.

Return of the Native, The, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1878.

The scene is the sombre Egdon Heath, typical of the country near Wareham and Poole in Dorset. Damon Wildeve, engineer turned publican, after playing fast and loose with two women by whom he is loved—the gentle, unselfish Thomasin Yeobright and the selfish, capricious Eustacia Vye—marries the former to spite the latter; while Thomasin rejects her humble adorer, the reddleman, Digory Venn. Her cousin, Clym Yeobright, a diamond merchant in Paris, disgusted with the vanity and uselessness of his occupation, returns to Egdon with the intention of becoming a schoolmaster in his native county. He falls in love with Eustacia, and she in a brief infatuation marries him, in the hope of inducing him to return to Paris. His sight fails and he becomes a furze-cutter on the heath, to Eustacia's despair. She is the cause of estrangement between Clym and his mother, and unintentionally of his death. This, and the discovery that Eustacia's relations with Wildeve have not ceased, lead to a violent scene between Clym and his wife, and ultimately to Eustacia's flight with Wildeve, in the course of which both are drowned. Clym, attributing to himself some responsibility for the death of his mother and his wife, becomes an itinerant preacher. Thomasin marries Diggory Venn.

REUCHLIN, JOHANN (1455-1522), born at Pforzheim, a celebrated humanist and the foremost oriental scholar of his day. Braving the powerful Dominicans, he published in 1494 his 'De Verbo Mirifico', defending Jewish literature and philosophy, and became the centre of an acute controversy in which he was opposed by Pfefferkorn (q.v.) and which was the occasion of the publication of the 'Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum' (q.v.). Reuchlin was author of the first Hebrew grammar.

Revels, MASTER OF, an officer appointed to superintend masques and other entertainments at court. He is first mentioned in the reign of Henry VII. The first permanent Master of the Revels was Sir Thomas Cawarden, appointed in 1543.

Revenge, The, (1) the name of Sir R. Grenville's (q.v.) ship; (2) the title and subject of a ballad by A. Tennyson (q.v.); (3) a tragedy by E. Young (q.v.), of which the plot is akin to that of Shakespeare's 'Othello'. Zanga, the captive of Don Alonzo, devises a revenge on the conqueror who has humiliated him. He throws suspicion on Leonora, Alonzo's wife, and Don Carlos, Alonzo's friend, and succeeds in bringing all three to an untimely end.

Revere, PAUL (1735-1818), American engraver and patriot; remembered for his famous midnight ride from Charlestown to Lexington (18-19 April 1775) to give warning of the approach of British troops from Boston.

Revesby Play, THE, a folk-drama acted by morris-dancers at Revesby in Lincolnshire at the end of the 18th cent. The characters are the Fool and his sons—Pickle Herring, Blue Breeches, Pepper Breeches, Ginger Breeches—and Mr. Allspice and Cicely. The Fool fights with a hobby-horse and a dragon. The sons decide to kill the Fool; he kneels down, the swords of the dancers are locked around his neck, and he is slain. He revives when Pickle Herring stamps his foot. Sword-dances and the wooing of Cicely by the Fool and his sons conclude the play. The central incident no doubt symbolizes the death of the year and its resuscitation in the spring. The text is given by T. F. Ordish in the 'Folk-Lore Journal', vii. 338. See also E. K. Chambers, 'The Mediaeval Stage'.

Review, The, a periodical started by Defoe (q.v.) in 1704, under the title, originally, of 'A Review of the Affairs of France: and of all

REVOLUTION IN FRANCE

Europe'. It continued until 1713, as a non-partisan paper, an organ of the commercial interests of the nation. It appeared thrice a week and was written, practically in its entirety, by Defoe himself, who expressed in it his opinions on all current political topics, thus initiating the political leading article. It contains much valuable information on home and foreign affairs of the period.

Review of English Studies, The, a quarterly journal devoted to English scholarship.

Revised Version, THE, see Bible (The English).

Revival of Letters, THE, the Renaissance (q.v.) in its literary aspect.

Revolt of Islam, The, originally entitled Laon and Cythna, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.) in Spenserian stanzas, published in 1818.

This poem was written in 1817, at a time when the reaction that followed the fall of Napoleon had brought much misery among the poorer classes, and had stirred Shelley's revolutionary instincts. It is a symbolic tale, in some respects obscure, 'illustrating', in Shelley's own words, 'the growth and progress of individual mind aspiring after excellence and devoted to the love of mankind', and 'its impatience at all the oppressions that are done under the sun'. Cythna, a heroic maiden devoted to the liberation of her sex, united with Laon in a common ideal, rouses the spirit of revolt among the people of Islam against their tyrants. The revolt is temporarily successful, but the tyrants return with increased forces, and in revenge lay the land desolate. Famine and plague descend upon it. To avert these Laon and Cythna are burnt at the stake, at the instigation of a priest. But the poem closes with an indication of the 'transient nature of error' and of 'the eternity of genius and virtue'.

Revolution in France, Reflections on the, by Burke (q.v.), published in 1790.

This treatise was provoked by a sermon preached by Dr. Richard Price, a nonconformist minister, in Nov. 1789, in which he exulted in the French Revolution and asserted that the king of England owes his throne to the choice of the people, who are at liberty to cashier him for misconduct. Burke repudiates this constitutional doctrine, showing that under the Declaration of Right the system of hereditary succession was carefully asserted, and that nothing done at the Revolution of 1689 gives countenance to Price's doctrine. He contrasts the inherited rights of which the English are tenacious with the 'rights of man' of the French revolutionaries, based on 'extravagant and presumptuous speculations', inconsistent with an ordered society and leading to poverty and chaos. He examines the character of the men who made the French Revolution, and the proceedings of their National Assembly, a 'profane burlesque of that sacred institute'. The well-known eloquent passage on the downfall of Marie Antoinette leads to the lament that 'the age of chivalry is gone. . . . All the decent drapery of life is to be rudely torn off' in deference to 'the new conquering empire of light and reason'. His general conclusion is that the defective institutions of the old régime should have been reformed, not destroyed. No doubt the work led to the breach between Burke and Fox and the splitting of the Whig party.

Reynard the Fox, the hero of various popular satirical fables or 'bestiaries' (q.v.) which were collected in France under the title of 'Roman de Renart'. The first part of this was written about 1200 and was followed by other parts during the 13th cent. There is a Latin text ('Isengrimus') of the 12th cent., and German texts of somewhat later date, and a version of about 1250 by a Fleming named Willem. It is probable that the development of the legend is due to many unknown authors. A Flemish version no longer extant was translated and printed by Caxton in 1481. Goethe wrote a free translation, called 'Reinecke Fuchs' in 1794. The fox in these fables is used to symbolize the man who, under various characters, preys upon and deludes society, is brought to judgement, but escapes by his cunning. We have an example of this type of fable in Chaucer's 'Nun's Priest's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales, 21). But it was principally developed in France. The popularity of this group of works gave 'renard' to the French language as the ordinary word for a fox, in place of the older 'goupil'. 'Renard' is from OHG. 'reġin-hart', strong in counsel.

The principal characters in Caxton's version are, besides Reynard, King Noble the lion, Isengrim the wolf, Courtoys the hound, Bruin the bear, Tybert the cat, Grymbert the badger, Coart or Cuwaert the hare, Belynn the ram, Martin and Dame Rukenawe the apes, Chanticleer the cock, and Partlet the hen. Hermeline is Reynard's wife, and Malperdy (Malpertuis) his castle.

REYNOLDS, SIR JOSHUA (1723-92), the great portrait-painter, the first president of the Royal Academy of Arts, and the friend of Johnson, Burke, and Goldsmith, was the author of 'Discourses' delivered to the students of the Royal Academy between 1769 and 1790, on the principles of art. He was one of the founders of 'The Club' (see Johnson, Samuel). The 'Discourses' were re-edited by J. Burnet in 1842. 'The Life and Times of Sir J. Reynolds', by C. R. Leslie and Tom Taylor, appeared in 1865.

Rhadamanthus, a son of Zeus and Europa, and brother of Minos, king of Crete. He showed so much justice and wisdom in his lifetime that he became after death one of the judges in the infernal regions.

Rhampsinitus, Rameses III, king of Egypt. Herodotus tells a romantic story (II. 121) of two brothers, whose father, architect of this king's treasury, left a movable stone in the wall thereof. The sons, by means of this, were able to purloin a great quantity of treasure. The king, finding the seals unbroken but the treasure diminished, set a man-trap, in which one of the brothers was caught. He immediately called to his brother and bade him cut off his head, to avoid detection, which was done. A similar story is told of Agamenes and Trophonius (q.v.).

Rhapsody, originally an epic poem or part of one, sung by a 'rhapsode' or 'rhapsodist' (meaning a stitcher together of song). It is applied also to an exalted or exaggeratedly enthusiastic expression of sentiment, or a speech, letter, or poem marked by extravagance of idea and expression. [OED.]

RHASIS or RHAZES (ABU BAKR MUHAMMAD IBN ZAKARIA EL RAZI), a Persian physician of the 10th cent., who practised at Bagdad and wrote encyclopaedic treatises on medicine.

Rhea, an ancient Greek nature-goddess, commonly identified with the Asiatic CYBĒLĒ (q.v.), the wife of Cronos (Saturn) and the mother of Zeus, Poseidon (Neptune), Pluto, Demeter (Ceres), Hera, &c.

Rhiannon, in British mythology, the wife of Pwyll (q.v.), and subsequently of Manawyddan. (See Mabinogion.) She had three birds, who could sing the dead to life, and the living to death.

Rhine Gold, THE, the hoard of the Nibelungs (see under Nibelungenlied) of which Siegfried got possession and which, after Siegfried's death, the brothers of Kriemhild concealed by sinking it in the Rhine. It is the subject, though the story is differently dealt with, of Wagner's opera, 'Das Rheingold' in the 'Ring' series. In this opera Alberich, the king of the Nibelungs, steals the gold of the Rhine Maidens and forges from it the magic ring that is to make him master of the world. This ring Wotan, with the help of Loge, takes from him by force; but Alberich sets his curse upon it. Wotan is in turn forced to surrender it to the giant Fafner as a ransom for Freia, whom he has promised to give to the giants as a reward for the building of Walhalla. For the continuation see Valkyrie.

Rhoda Fleming, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1865.

Rhoda and Dahlia Fleming are daughters of a Kentish yeoman farmer. Robert Eccles, his assistant, ex-soldier, reformed drunkard, a strong, determined, good-hearted fellow, is also of the yeoman class. The gentle Dahlia is seduced by Edward Blancove, the cynical bookish son of a rich banker. After a few months Edward shabbily deserts her; and Robert, who loves the proud and untamed Rhoda, tries out to see her sister righted. At first he sets violence, but in this he is worsted by Edward, who hires a scoundrel, Sedgett, to waylay Robert and knock him on the head. Robert at last succeeds in discovering Dahlia's hiding-place. But Edward has meanwhile been base enough to bribe Sedgett to marry her, and the sick and broken-hearted Dahlia has consented, for her family's sake, to be made in this way 'an honest woman'. Robert is too late to prevent the ceremony, but Dahlia is carried off from her husband at the church door, and Robert succeeds in keeping him away by main force long enough to permit of the discovery that Sedgett is already married to another wife. Edward has by now repented and seeks to atone for his crime. But Dahlia, terrified at the thought of falling into Sedgett's hands, has taken poison, and, though her life is saved, she is changed by the trial through which she has passed, and marriage with Edward is now for her impossible. Rhoda, tamed at last by trouble, marries Robert.

Rhodes, CECIL JOHN (1853-1902), was educated at Bishop Stortford Grammar School, and, owing to failure of health, went to S. Africa and worked a moderately prosperous claim in the newly discovered diamond fields of the Orange Free State. Meanwhile he matriculated at Oriel College, Oxford (1873), and revisited Oxford at intervals until he succeeded in graduating as a passman B.A. in 1881. During this period he increased his holdings in the Kimberley diamond fields, and subsequently succeeded in amalgamating these under his own control. He formed the aspiration of federating South Africa under British rule with the assent of the Cape Dutch; and towards this end he worked in the Cape legislature, to which he was elected in 1880. He helped to secure a great part of Bechuanaland for the Cape government. The British South Africa Company was incorporated by royal charter in 1889 to administer the territory north of Bechuanaland, and this territory was named Rhodesia after the projector of the scheme. Rhodes directed the war with the Matabeles in 1893-4, whereby he greatly extended the territory of Rhodesia, of which Dr. L. S. Jameson had become administrator in 1890. From 1890 to 1896 Rhodes was also prime minister at the Cape. In 1895 he secretly encouraged the Uitlander population of the Transvaal to look to an armed insurrection for the redress of their grievances, and, after the catastrophe of the Jameson Raid (q.v.), he was pronounced (as the result of inquiries by the Cape parliament and British House of Commons) guilty of grave breaches of duty. Thereupon he resigned the office of premier and devoted himself to the development of Rhodesia. During the S. African War he was besieged in Kimberley. He died after long suffering from heart disease and was buried in the Matoppos Hills. By his will he left about £6,000,000 to the public service, endowing some 170 scholarships at Oxford for students from various parts of the Empire, from the

Rhodolinda, the heroine of D'Avenant's tragedy 'Albovine' (q.v.).

Rhodopē or RHODŌPIS, a Greek courtesan, said to have been a fellow-slave of Aesop (q.v.) and to have been taken to Naucratis in Egypt. Aelian relates that one day, while Rhodope was bathing, an eagle carried off her sandal and dropped it near Psammetichus, king of Egypt. The king was struck with the beauty of the sandal, had search made for the owner, and, when discovered, married her—a curious parallel to the story of Cinderella. There was a story (rejected by Herodotus) that she built the third Pyramid; to this Tennyson alludes in 'The Princess', ii:

The Rhodope that built the pyramid.

Rhopalic verse (from the Greek ρόπαλον, a cudgel thicker towards one end), verse of which each word contains one more syllable than the last, e.g. (Ausonius):

Rhyme: MALE or MASCULINE rhymes or endings are those having a final accented syllable, as distinguished from FEMALE or FEMININE rhymes or endings in which the last syllable is unaccented.

Rhyme-royal, the seven-lined decasyllabic stanza, rhymed a b a b b c c. Its first appearance in English is in Chaucer's 'Complaint unto Pity'. Its name derives probably from the French chant royal, not from its adoption by James I in 'The Kingis Quair' (q.v.). It was used by Shakespeare in 'Lucrece'.

Rhymer, THOMAS THE, see Erceldoune.

Rhyming Poem, The, included in the 'Exeter Book' (q.v.) and therefore of not later date than the 10th cent., is important as being arranged in rhymed couplets, with rhymes in the verses. It is a disquisition on the vicissitudes of life, contrasting the misfortunes of a fallen king with the days of his past glory. It has been suggested that it is a paraphrase of Job xxix and xxx.

Riah, the Jew in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

Rialto, THE (the 'Ponte di Rivo Alto' or 'bridge of the deep stream', on which Venice was founded), a beautiful single-span marble bridge across the Grand Canal in Venice, built at the end of the 16th cent. It was in the centre of the mercantile quarter of old Venice, and it is to this that Shylock refers as the Rialto in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice', I. iii.

Ribbon Society, a Roman Catholic secret society formed in the north and north-west of Ireland early in the 19th cent. to counteract the Protestant influence, and associated with agrarian disorders. The doings of the Ribbonmen figure in some of the 'Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry' by William Carleton (q.v.), and in his 'Fardorougha the Miser' (q.v.).

RICARDO, DAVID (1772-1823), the son of a Dutch Jew, who made a fortune on the London Stock Exchange, and then devoted himself to the study of economics. Encouraged by James Mill (q.v.), he published in 1817 his chief work, 'Principles of Political Economy and Taxation', which is mainly occupied with the causes determining the distribution of wealth. In this his famous theory of rent played an important part.

Riccabocca, DR., a character in Bulwer Lytton's 'My Novel' (q.v.).

RICE, ELMER, American dramatist, born in New York in 1892. His chief works are: 'The Adding Machine' (1923), 'Street Scene' (1929), 'See Naples and Die' (1929). He has also written a prose satire on the American 'movies' entitled 'A Voyage to Purilia' (1930).

RICE, JAMES (1843-82), educated at Queens' College, Cambridge, is remembered for his collaboration in a number of novels with Besant (q.v.).

RICH, BARNABE (1540?-1617), fought in Queen Mary's war with France (1557-8) and in the Low Countries, rose to the rank of Captain, and from 1574 onwards devoted himself to the production of romances in the style of Lyly's 'Euphues' (q.v.), pamphlets, and reminiscences. Notable among these are his 'Farewell to the Military Profession' (1581, which includes 'Apolonius and Silla', the source of the plot of Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night') and 'The Honesty of this Age'.

RICH, JOHN (1682?-1761), theatrical producer. He opened the New Theatre at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1714, and the theatre at Covent Garden in 1732. In 1728 he produced Gay's 'Beggar's Opera' with such success that the play was said popularly to have 'made Rich gay and Gay rich'. See also Beef Steaks.

Rich, PENELOPE (1562?-1607), daughter of Walter Devereux, the first earl of Essex. Her charms were celebrated by Sir P. Sidney (q.v.) in his 'Astrophel and Stella' sonnets. She married Lord Rich, was divorced by him, and married Lord Mountjoy, with whom she had lived, and who had now become earl of Devonshire.

Richard I, 'Cœur de Lion', king of England, 1189-99. He is introduced in two of Scott's novels, 'The Talisman' and 'Ivanhoe' (qq.v.); and is also the hero of Hewlett's (q.v.) 'Richard Yea-and-Nay'.

Richard Cœur de Lion, a spirited verse romance of the 14th cent. The author is unknown. It is a patriotic tale exalting the haughty valorous Richard, and pouring contempt on Philip and the French. The course of the crusade is related, with the discomfiture of the Saracens, until a truce is arranged for three years, at which point the poem ends. Quotations from it are to be found in the notes to Sir W. Scott's 'Talisman', referring to the cooking and eating of the Saracen's head, and of the heads served to the Paynim ambassadors.

Richard II, king of England, 1377-99.

Richard II, King, a historical tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), produced probably about 1595, printed in 1597, and based on Holinshed. The play shows the influence of Marlowe, and is comparable with the latter's 'Edward II' (q.v.).

It deals with the arbitrary exile of Henry Bolingbroke and the duke of Norfolk by King Richard; the death of John of Gaunt and the confiscation of his property by the king; the invasion of England by Bolingbroke during the king's absence in Ireland; the king's return and withdrawal to Flint Castle; his surrender to Bolingbroke; the latter's triumphal progress through London with Richard in his train; Richard's removal to Pomfret and his murder. The contrast of the characters of Richard and Bolingbroke is a notable feature. The play contains practically no comic element.

Richard III, king of England, 1483-5.

Richard III, a historical tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), produced probably in 1594, printed in 1597, and based on Holinshed. Shakespeare perhaps had before him an earlier play, 'The True Tragedie of Richard III'.

The play centres in the character of Richard of Gloucester, afterwards King Richard III, ambitious and sanguinary, bold and subtle, treacherous, yet brave in battle, a murderer and usurper of the crown. The principal incidents of the play are the imprisonment and murder of Clarence procured by his brother Richard; the wooing of Anne, widow of Edward, Prince of Wales, by Richard as she accompanies the bier of her dead father-in-law; the death of Edward IV and the machinations of Richard to get the crown; the execution of Hastings, Rivers, and Grey; the accession of Richard; the murder of the princes in the Tower; Richard's project of marrying his niece, Elizabeth of York; Buckingham's rebellion in support of the earl of Richmond, his capture and execution; Richmond's invasion, and the defeat and death of Richard at Bosworth (1485).

Richard the Thirde, The History of, a work first printed in 1534 and questionably attributed to Sir T. More and to Cardinal Morton. It is distinguished from earlier English chronicles by its unity of scheme and dramatic effectiveness.

RICHARDSON, SAMUEL (1689–1761), the son of a joiner, received little education, and was apprenticed to a printer. He set up a printing business, first in Fleet Street, London, then in Salisbury Court, London, where he lived for the rest of his life. He was employed as printer to the House of Commons. At the request of two other printers he prepared 'a little volume of letters, in a common style, on such subjects as might be of use to country readers who are unable to indite for themselves'. This appeared in 1741 and provided, in addition, directions 'how to think and act justly and prudently in the common Concerns of Human Life'. Out of this arose Richardson's first novel, 'Pamela' (q.v.), of which two volumes appeared in 1740 and two in 1741. This was followed by 'Clarissa Harlowe' (q.v., 1747–8), which surpassed the success of 'Pamela', and won Richardson European fame. His 'Sir Charles Grandison' (q.v., 1753–4), though it never held so high a position as 'Clarissa', was received also with enthusiasm. The three works had a marked influence on subsequent writers of fiction, both in England and abroad.

Richembourg, see Burgundy.

Richelieu, ARMAND JEAN DU PLESSIS, Cardinal and Duc de (1585–1642), one of the greatest of French statesmen, first came into prominence as bishop of Luçon, and became prime minister of Louis XIII in 1624. He reduced the nobles to discipline by a series of executions, destroyed the political importance of the Protestants by the siege and capture of La Rochelle (1628), and intervened successfully in the Thirty Years War. He was the founder of the French Academy, and built the Palais-Royal in Paris (originally called Palais-Cardinal). He figures in 'The Three Musketeers' of Dumas (q.v.).

Richelieu, or The Conspiracy, a historical play in blank verse by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), produced in 1839.

The play deals with the attempts made in France during the period 1630–42 by the Duc d'Orléans, the Duc de Bouillon, Cinq-Mars, and others, to overthrow Cardinal Richelieu, the events being adapted to dramatic purposes. The cardinal, by his adroitness, courage, and skilful use of spies, defeats the attempts to assassinate him and to effect an alliance with Spain, and triumphs over the conspirators. A love element is introduced in the person of Julie de Mortemar, the cardinal's ward, who is honourably loved by the Chevalier de Mauprat, and dishonourably pursued by the king.

RICHTER, JOHANN PAUL FRIEDRICH (1763–1825), German romantic novelist, who wrote under the name 'Jean Paul'. Reared in humble village surroundings, he was at his best in idyllic representations of the life he knew. He had also a certain gift of humour, which earned the enthusiastic praise of Carlyle. His best-known works are: 'Hesperus' (1792–4), 'Quintus Fixlein' (1796), 'Siebenkäs' (1796), 'Titan' (1800–3), 'Flegeljahre' (1802–5), and 'Die Vorschule der Ästhetik' (1804).

Riderhood, ROGUE, a character in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

RIDLEY, NICHOLAS (1500?–55), successively bishop of Rochester and London, was a fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He became one of Cranmer's chaplains and began gradually to reject many Roman doctrines. If any hand beside that of Cranmer can be detected in the two Prayer Books of Edward VI, it is believed to be Ridley's. As bishop of London he exerted himself to propagate reformed opinions. On Edward VI's death he denounced Queen Mary and Elizabeth as illegitimate at St. Paul's Cross, London. He was sent to the Tower in June 1553 and deprived of his bishopric. In September 1555 he was condemned on the charge of heresy and burnt alive with Latimer (q.v.) at Oxford, 16 Oct. He wrote several theological treatises, which appeared after his death. In 1841 the 'Works of Nicholas Ridley' were edited for the Parker Society by Henry Christmas.

Ridolfi or RIDOLFO, ROBERTO DI (1531–1612), a Florentine banker who settled in London in Mary's reign. In Elizabeth's reign he intrigued with the French and Spanish ambassadors, was privy to the Northern rebellion of 1569, and was arrested but not proved guilty. In 1570 he engaged in a fresh conspiracy, in which Norfolk was implicated, to overthrow the government of Elizabeth with the aid of a Spanish army. His confederates were arrested, and Ridolfi himself, who was absent at Brussels, retired to Italy. This latter was the real 'Ridolfi Plot'.

Ridotto, an Italian word, meant originally, like the French réduit, a retreat or withdrawing-place. Florio defines it as 'a home or retiring place. Also a gaming house, an ordinary or tabling house or other place where good company doth meet.' It was used in English to mean an entertainment or social assembly consisting of music and dancing; introduced into England 'in the year 1722, at the Opera House in the Hay-market' (Busby, 'Dictionary of Music') and a marked feature of London social life during the 18th cent. [OED.]

Rienco, see Ryencs.

Rienzi, or The Last of the Tribunes, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1835.

The story is based on the career of Cola di Rienzi, tribune of the people at Rome, who in 1347 established a republic, and after seven months was excommunicated and obliged to abdicate. For seven years he was in exile, then returned in 1354, was made a senator, but was assassinated a few months later. The novel follows closely the historical facts, and depicts not only the political situation and the mode of living of the times, but also the consummate ability of Rienzi himself, marred by arrogance and love of display. The other chief characters are his gentle sister Irene, loved by the enlightened Adrian Colonna; his ambitious wife Nina; the unscrupulous but heroic condottiere Walter de Montreal; and the stout smith Cecco del Vecchio.

Rigadoon, a lively and somewhat complicated dance for two persons, formerly in vogue. The word is adapted from the French rigaudon, of doubtful origin. Rousseau states ('Dict. de la Musique') that he had heard a dancing-master attribute it to the name of its inventor Rigaud; and Mistral says that Rigaud was a celebrated dancing-master at Marseilles.

Rights, BILL OF, a measure adopted by the Convention Parliament of 1689 condemning the interference by the Crown with civil liberty and the execution of the law, and restoring the monarchy to its constitutional position.

Rights of Man, The, a political treatise by Paine (q.v.), in two parts, published in 1791 and 1792.

Pt. I is in the main a reply to Burke's 'Reflections on the Revolution in France' (q.v.). Condemning its unhistorical and unbalanced violence, Paine repudiates Burke's doctrine of prescription and denies that one generation can bind another as regards the form of government. The constitution of a country is an act of the people constituting the government, and in the absence of such a written constitution, government is tyranny.

RINALDO

Thus Paine justifies the French Revolution, of which he traces the incidents to the adoption of the Declaration of the Rights of Man by the National Assembly.

In Pt. II Paine touches on Burke's 'Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs', but soon passes to a comparison of the principles of the new French and American constitutions with those of British institutions, to the disadvantage of the latter. The most interesting part of the work, however, consists in Paine's constructive proposals for 'improving the condition of Europe' and particularly of England. Notable among these are: a large reduction of administrative expenditure and taxation; provision for the aged poor; family allowances; allowances for the education of the poor; maternity grants; funeral grants; a graduated income tax; and limitation of armaments by treaty.

Rinaldo or RENAUD first figures under the latter name in the Charlemagne cycle of legends, as the eldest of the four sons of Aymon, count of Dordogne, against whom the emperor makes war for their insubordination. They are beleaguered in Montfort, and when driven thence, in Montauban, a fortress that they build near the confluence of the Dordogne and Gironde. They carry on the war until Charlemagne is prevailed on by his paladins to make terms, under which the sons of Aymon are pardoned on condition that Renaud goes to Palestine to fight against the Saracens and surrenders his famous steed Bayard. Bayard, however, refuses to allow any one to mount him, and, when thrown by the emperor's orders into the river, weighted with stones, disengages himself and escapes. Renaud goes to Palestine, where he performs further exploits and becomes a hermit.

As Rinaldo, the hero figures in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.). There he is the cousin of Orlando, the lord of Montalban, and one of the suitors for the hand of Angelica. But, drinking of the fountain of hate, his love for her is turned to aversion, while she, drinking of the fountain of love, becomes enamoured of him. Later their dispositions to one another are reversed, again by the magic fountains. He is the brother of Bradamante (q.v.).

In the 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v.), Rinaldo is the Prince of Este and the lover of Armida, and in the final battle for Jerusalem his prowess decides the day.

Ring and the Book, The, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1868-9.

The poem is based on the story of a Roman murder-case related in an old parchment-covered volume that Browning picked up one day in a Florentine market stall. This is the 'Book' of the title. As the goldsmith, to make a ring from pure gold, mixes alloy with it, moulds the ring, then disengages the alloy; so the author, to the pure gold of this old volume, has added something of himself, and so arrived at the absolute elusive truth. Hence the 'Ring' of the title. The book contained the pleadings and depositions of the case, the 'Definitive Verdict' and some manuscript letters. These provided the raw material of the story, which is briefly as follows.

Count Guido Franceschini, an impoverished nobleman of Arezzo, marries Pompilia Comparini, a young girl of obscure family, but possessed of some slight wealth, of which he has received an exaggerated estimate. Disaster follows. Violante Comparini, Pompilia's supposed mother, confesses that Pompilia is not really her daughter, but a supposititious child procured to defraud the Comparinis' rightful heirs. Guido thereupon determines to get rid of his base-born wife, accuses her of infidelity with a certain Canon Giuseppe Caponsacchi, and so harasses her that she persuades the Canon to carry her off from her husband's house at Arezzo to her old home. Guido pursues them and has them arrested. Pompilia is tried for adultery, which she denies, and is sent to a convent; Caponsacchi is banished for three years. Pompilia, being about to become a mother, is moved from the convent to her old home, where, after giving birth to a son, she is one night murdered, together with her putative parents, by her husband, assisted by four ruffians. Guido is arrested, tried, and on the Pope's final decision executed.

The poem, after the preface, is occupied first with the opinion on the case of 'Half-Rome', then with the opinion of 'The Other Half-Rome', and then of 'Tertium Quid', who takes an impartial attitude. Count Guido next tells his story, which is followed by that of Caponsacchi; then come the pleadings of the advocates on the question of the justifiability of Guido's crime. After these we have the Pope's reflections as he considers his sentence, and Guido's scornful and ferocious defiance, collapsing into abject cowardice when he finally knows his fate. The last section of the poem completes the story with an account of the execution, the attempt of the convent to appropriate Pompilia's property, and its defeat by the Pope's 'Instrument' pronouncing her innocence.

Ring des Nibelungen, Der, the series of four musical dramas by Richard Wagner (q.v.), 'Das Rheingold', 'Die Walküre', 'Siegfried', and 'Götterdämmerung', based on the Norse legends of the Nibelungs (see Nibelungenlied), and composed in 1853-70 (produced 1869-76).

Rip Van Winkle, a story by W. Irving (q.v.) attributed to 'Diedrich Knickerbocker' (q.v.) and included in 'The Sketch Book' (1820).

Rip Van Winkle, taking refuge from a termagant wife in a solitary ramble in the Kaatskill mountains, falls asleep, and awakens after twenty years, to find his wife dead, his house in ruins, and the world completely changed.

Riquet with the Tuft, one of the fairy tales of Perrault (q.v.), 'Riquet à la houppe'. He was an ugly prince who had the power of conferring wit on the person he loved best. He married a beautiful but stupid princess, who had the corresponding power of conferring beauty.

Rise of Silas Lapham, The, the best known of W. D. Howells's (q.v.) novels, published in 1885. Lapham, who has risen from a Vermont farm to fortune, is typical of the self-made New Englander; and the story is mainly occupied with his, and his family's, adjustments to the Boston society in which they find themselves.

Risingham, BERTRAM, a character in Scott's 'Rokeby' (q.v.).

Risorgimento, an Italian word meaning 'resurrection', a name given to the movement for the union and liberation of Italy which took place in the middle of the 19th cent. The principal names associated with it are those of Mazzini, Cavour, Victor Emmanuel (king of Sardinia), and Garibaldi. In 1847 Cavour founded a newspaper called 'Risorgimento'. An insurrection in Lombardy and Venice, in 1848, supported by the king of Sardinia (Charles Albert, Victor Emmanuel's father), was suppressed by Austria in 1849, the king being defeated at Novara and abdicating in favour of his son. The movement gathered way in 1859, in which year Napoleon III in alliance with the Italians defeated the Austrians at Magenta. Victor Emmanuel was declared king of Italy in 1860, and the kingdom of Italy, with Florence as its first capital, was recognized by foreign States in 1861. Venetia was ceded to Victor Emmanuel in 1866, and the union of Italy was completed when Italian troops entered Rome in 1870 and the temporal power of the papacy came to an end. In 1783 he published a 'Select Collection of English Songs' containing strictures on Percy's 'Reliques'. He detected the forgeries in Pinkerton's 'Select Scottish Ballads' (1784), and the Ireland (q.v.) forgeries in 1795. He produced in 1802 a useful 'Bibliographia Poetica', a catalogue of English poets from the 12th to the 16th cents.

Rival Queens, The a tragedy by N. Lee (q.v.), produced in 1677, and founded on the 'Cassandre' of La Calprenède (q.v.).

Statira, daughter of Darius and married to Alexander the Great, learning that Alexander in the course of his campaign has again fallen a victim to the charms of Roxana, daughter of Oxyartes, his first wife, whom he had promised Statira to discard, vows never to see him more. Alexander, returning, and passionately loving Statira, is deeply disturbed by her decision. Roxana, meeting Statira, taunts her and goads her to fury, so that Statira revokes her vow and pardons Alexander, who banishes Roxana. Roxana obtains admission to Statira's chamber and stabs her to death. Alexander is poisoned by the conspirator Cassander.

Rivals, The, a comedy by R. B. Sheridan (q.v.), produced in 1775. This was the first of Sheridan's plays, and he was only twenty-two when he wrote it. The play was not a success on the first night, owing to the indifferent performance of the part of Sir Lucius O'Trigger.

Captain Absolute, son of Sir Anthony Absolute, a warm-hearted but choleric old gentleman who requires absolute docility from his son, is in love with Lydia Languish, the niece of Mrs. Malaprop (q.v.). As the romantic Lydia prefers a half-pay lieutenant to the heir of a baronet of three thousand a year, he has assumed at Bath (the scene of the play) the character of Ensign Beverley, in order to pay his court, which has been favourably received. But Lydia loses half her fortune if she marries without her aunt's consent, and Mrs. Malaprop will have nothing to say to a beggarly ensign.

Sir Anthony arrives at Bath, ignorant of his son's proceedings, to propose a match between the said son and Lydia Languish, a proposal welcomed by Mrs. Malaprop. An amusing situation results, for Capt. Absolute is afraid of revealing his deception to Lydia; while he has a rival in Bob Acres, who has heard of Ensign Beverley's courtship, and at the instigation of the fire-eating Sir Lucius O'Trigger asks Capt. Absolute to carry a challenge to Beverley. Sir Lucius himself, who has been deluded into thinking that some amatory letters received by him from Mrs. Malaprop are from Lydia, likewise finds Capt. Absolute in his way and challenges him. But when Acres finds that Beverley is his friend Absolute (his courage had already been 'oozing out at the palms of his hands') he declines to fight and resigns all claim to Lydia. Sir Lucius is disabused by the arrival of Mrs. Malaprop, and Lydia, after a pretty quarrel with her lover for shattering her hopes of an elopement, finally forgives him. A subsidiary element in the play is the love-affair of the perverse and jealous Faulkland and Lydia's friend, Julia Melville.

Rizpah, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), included in 'Ballads and other Poems' (1880).

The poem, which is founded on fact, is the monologue of the mother of a lad who had been hanged for mail-robbery. Night after night she visits the gallows and collects his bones as they fall, to bury them in consecrated ground. The title is an allusion to 2 Sam. xxi. 8-10.

Roaring Girl, The, or Moll Cut-Purse, a comedy by T. Middleton and Dekker (qq.v.), produced in 1611.

In this play Moll Cutpurse (q.v.), a notorious thief in real life, takes on for the nonce the character of an honest girl, who helps lovers in distress and defends her virtue with her sword. Sebastian Wentgrave is in love with and betrothed to Mary Fitz-allard, but his covetous father forbids the match. To bring him to terms, Sebastian now pretends to have fallen desperately in love with Moll Cutpurse, and to be about to marry her; and Moll good-naturedly lends herself to the deception. Old Wentgrave, distracted at the prospect, is only too glad to give his blessing when the real bride turns out to be Mary Fitz-allard. There are some pleasant bustling scenes in which the life of the London streets is vividly presented, shopkeepers selling tobacco and feathers, their wives intriguing with gallants, and Moll talking thieves' cant and discomfiting overbold admirers.

Rob Roy, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1817.

The period of the story is that immediately preceding the Jacobite rising of 1715. Francis Osbaldistone, the son of a rich London merchant, on refusing to adopt his father's profession, is banished by the latter to Osbaldistone Hall in the north of England, the home of his fox-hunting, hard-drinking uncle, Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone. Here he is brought into contact with Sir Hildebrand's five boorish sons, a sixth son, Rashleigh (a malignant plotter who has been selected to occupy the place of Francis in the London counting-house), and Sir Hildebrand's niece, the high-spirited Diana Vernon. Rashleigh is deeply involved in Jacobite intrigues, has evil designs on Diana, and becomes the bitter enemy of Francis, who falls in love with Diana and is received by her with favour. The story is occupied with the attempts of Rashleigh to destroy Francis, and to rob and ruin Francis's father, attempts that are defeated partly by Diana, and partly by the singular Scotsman, Rob Roy Macgregor, from whom the novel takes its title. This historical character, a member of a proscribed clan, was once an honest drover; but misfortune and injustice have embittered him and he is now a powerful and dangerous outlaw, the ruthless and cunning opponent of the government's agents, but capable of acts of justice and even generosity. At the instance of Diana, he supports the cause of Francis against Rashleigh. To avert the ruin which threatens his father as a result of Rashleigh's machinations, Francis, accompanied by a delightful character, Bailie Nicol Jarvie of Glasgow, goes to seek Rob Roy in the Highlands, and is the unwilling witness of an encounter between the clansmen and the royal troops, and of the extraordinary escape of Rob Roy himself from their hands. In the outcome, Rashleigh is forced to surrender the funds that he has misappropriated, and is ultimately killed by Rob Roy after having betrayed his Jacobite associates to the government. Francis is restored to his father's favour, becomes the owner of Osbaldistone Hall, and marries Diana. His rascally servant, Andrew Fairservice (q.v.), is one of Scott's great characters.

ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER (fl. 1260-1300), the reputed author of a metrical chronicle from earliest times down to 1272, illustrated in the later years by personal reminiscences, and written in long lines, running to fourteen syllables and more. It is not the work of a single hand, though probably the whole was composed in the abbey of Gloucester. It contains among passages of special interest the account of a town and gown riot at Oxford in 1263, and a famous description of the death of Simon de Montfort at the battle of Evesham.

Robert the Devil, sixth duke of Normandy, and father of William the Conqueror, a personage about whom many legends gathered, in consequence of his violence and cruelty. In the verse-tale of 'The Life of Robert the Devil', Robert is represented as having been devoted soul and body to Satan by his mother, who had long been childless and prayed to the Devil to give her a son; but as finally repenting of his misdeeds and marrying the emperor's daughter (and, in fact, he died on a pilgrimage to Palestine). This verse-tale is a translation from the French of 1496 and was printed by Wynkyn de Worde. Thomas Lodge (q.v.) wrote a drama on the same subject.

ROBERTSON, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1816-53), educated at Edinburgh University and Balliol College, Oxford. He became incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, in 1847, and died six years later. He acquired during his short life great influence among all ecclesiastical parties, and his sermons (five series), published at various dates, posthumously, have had a wide circle of readers. His 'Life and Letters' by A. Stopford Brooke appeared in 1865.

ROBERTSON, THOMAS WILLIAM (1829-71), began life as an actor, but retired from the stage and became a dramatist. His plays, 'Society' (1865), 'Ours' (1866), 'Caste' (1867), 'Play' (1868), 'School' (1869), and 'M.P.' (1870), introduced a new and more natural type of comedy to the English stage than had been seen during the first half of the century. His earlier drama, 'David Garrick' (1864), was also well received and is still popular. Marie Wilton (Lady Bancroft) was the great exponent of Robertson's best female characters.

ROBERTSON, WILLIAM (1721-93), born in Midlothian and educated at Edinburgh University, a Presbyterian minister, came into fame by the publication in 1759 of his 'History of Scotland during the Reigns of Queen Mary and of James VI'. This was followed in 1769 by his 'History of Charles V', which brought him the large sum of £4,500 and European reputation, and was translated into French. His 'History of America' was published in 1777 (the third volume, uncompleted, in 1796), and his 'Disquisition concerning the Knowledge which the Ancients had of India' in 1791. Robertson was appointed principal of Edinburgh University in 1762, moderator of the General Assembly and historiographer of Scotland in 1763. His work, in style and method, shows a resemblance to that of Hume (q.v.), but is somewhat more animated and popular, and is based on more careful investigation.

Robespierre, ISIDORE MAXIMILIEN DE (1758-94), one of the most prominent figures in the French Revolution, a leader of the 'Mountain' or extreme party. He was among the promoters of the reign of Terror and finally exercised a kind of dictatorship, but was overthrown in July 1794 and executed. See also Sea-green Incorruptible.

Robin and Makyne, an old Scottish pastoral by Henryson (q.v.), included in Percy's 'Reliques'. Robin is a shepherd, and Makyne (a form of 'Malkin') loves him, but Robin rejects her advances, and Makyne goes sadly home. Then Robin's heart is touched, and he in turn pleads with her. But her reply is

Robin, thou hast heard sung and say,
In gests and storys auld,
The man that will not when he may,
Sall have nocht when he wald.

Robin Goodfellow, a 'shrewd and knavish sprite' (Shakespeare, 'A Midsummer Night's Dream', II. i), a Puck or hobgoblin, at times a domestic spirit who renders services to the family (as in Milton's 'L'Allegro', ll. 105-10), at others a mischievous elf.

Robin Gray, AULD, see Lindsay (Lady A.).

Robin Hood, a legendary outlaw. The name is part of the designation of places and plants in every part of England. The facts behind the legend are uncertain. In the portion of the Pipe Roll of 1230 relating to Yorkshire there is mention of a 'Robertus Hood fugitivus'. Robin Hood is referred to in 'Piers Plowman' (q.v.). As an historical character he appears in Wyntoun's 'Chronicle of Scotland' (c. 1420), and is referred to as a ballad hero by Bower, Major, and Stow. The first detailed history, 'Lytell Geste of Robyn Hooode' (printed, c. 1495), locates him in south-west Yorkshire; later writers place him in Sherwood and Plumpton Park (Cumberland), and finally make him earl of Huntingdon. Ritson, who collected all the ancient songs and ballads about Robin Hood, says definitely that he was born at Locksley in Nottinghamshire about 1160, that his true name was Robert Fitz-Ooth, and that he was commonly reputed to have been earl of Huntingdon. There is a pleasant account of the activities of his band in Drayton's 'Polyolbion', song 26. According to Stow, there were about the year 1190 many robbers and outlaws, among whom were Robin Hood and Little John, who abode in the woods, robbing the rich, but killing none but such as would invade them, suffering no woman to be molested, and sparing poor men's goods. A date for his death (18 Nov. 1247) was given by Martin Parker ('True Tale', c. 1632) and by Thoresby, and his pedigree was supplied by Stukeley. Legend says that he was bled to death by a treacherous nun at Kirklees in Yorkshire. According to Joseph Hunter (antiquary, 1783-1861), with support from the court rolls of the manor of Wakefield in Yorkshire, he was a contemporary of Edward II (1307-27) and adherent of Thomas of Lancaster. He is the centre of a whole cycle of ballads, one of the best of which is 'Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne' (q.v.), printed in Percy's 'Reliques', and his legend shows affinity with Chaucer's 'Cook's Tale of Gamelyn' (see Canterbury Tales) and with the tales of other legendary outlaws such as Clym of the Clough and Adam Bell (q.v.). Popular plays embodying the legend appear to have been developed out of the village May game, the king and queen of the May giving place to Robin and Maid Marian. Plays dealing with the same theme were written by Munday, Chettle, Tennyson, and others. The 'True Tale of Robin Hood' (verse) was published in 1632, 'Robin Hood's Garland' in 1670, and a prose narrative in 1678. He figures in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.) as Locksley.

Robin Hood, A Tale of, sub-title of Jonson's 'The Sad Shepherd' (q.v.).

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne, one of the best known of the ballads of the Robin Hood cycle. Robin Hood and Little John having gone on their separate ways in the forest, the latter is arrested by the sheriff of Nottingham and tied to a tree. Meanwhile Robin Hood meets with Guy of Gisborne, who has sworn to take Robin; they fight and Guy is slain. Robin puts on the horse-hide with which Guy was clad, takes his arms, and blows a blast on his horn. The Sheriff mistakes him for Guy, thinks he has killed Robin, and gives him permission, as a reward, to kill Little John. Robin releases Little John, gives him Guy's bow, and the sheriff and his company take to their heels.

Robin Oig McCombich, the Highland drover in Scott's 'The Two Drovers' (q.v.).

ROBINSON, EDWIN ARLINGTON (1869-1935), American poet, born at Head Tide, Maine. The following are among his works: 'The Torrent and the Night Before' (1896), 'The Children of the Night' (1897), 'Captain Craig' (1902), 'The Town Down the River' (1910), 'The Man Against the Sky' (1916), 'Merlin' (1917), 'The Three Taverns' (1920), 'Lancelot' (1920), 'Avon's Harvest' (1921), 'Collected Poems' (1921), 'Roman Bartholow' (1923), 'The Man Who Died Twice' (1924), 'Tristram' (1927), 'Cavender's House' (1929), 'The Glory of the Nightingales' (1930), 'Matthias at the Door' (1931). Traditional in spirit, and content to find expression in conventional forms, Robinson was three times awarded the Pulitzer prize for poetry (1922, 1925, 1928), and by many competent critics is considered the most important of recent American poets.

ROBINSON, HENRY CRABB (1775-1867), after spending some years in a solicitor's office in London, travelled in Germany, where he met Goethe and Schiller, and studied at Jena University. He became a foreign correspondent (in 1807, one of the first of the class), and subsequently foreign editor of 'The Times', and its special correspondent in the Peninsula in 1808-9. He was afterwards a barrister. He was acquainted with many notable people of his day and was one of the founders of the Athenaeum Club and of University College, London. Part of his famous diary and correspondence, throwing light on many literary characters, such as Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, and Hazlitt, was published in 1869; more, and a more accurate text of part of the correspondence, were issued in 1927.

Robinson Crusoe, The Life and strange surprising Adventures of, a romance by Defoe (q.v.), published in 1719.

In 1704, Alexander Selkirk (q.v.), son of a shoemaker of Largo, who had run away to sea and joined a privateering expedition under Capt. William Dampier, was, at his own request, put ashore on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez. He was rescued in 1709 by Woodes Rogers (q.v.). Defoe embellished the narrative of his residence on the island with many incidents of his imagination and presented it as a true story. The extraordinarily convincing account of the shipwrecked Crusoe's successful efforts to make himself a tolerable existence in his solitude first revealed Defoe's genius for vivid fiction. Defoe was nearly sixty when he wrote it.

The author tells in minute detail the methods by which, with the help of a few stores and utensils saved from the wreck and the exercise of infinite ingenuity, Crusoe built himself a house, domesticated goats, and made himself a boat. He describes the perturbation of his mind caused by the visit of cannibal savages to his island, and his rescue of the poor savage Friday from death; and finally the coming of an English ship, whose crew are in a state of mutiny, the subduing of the mutineers, and Crusoe's rescue.

The book had immediate and permanent success, was translated into many languages, and inspired many imitations. It was followed, also in 1719, by Defoe's 'The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe', in which, with Friday, he revisits his island, is attacked by a fleet of canoes on his departure, and loses Friday in the encounter. 'The Serious Reflections . . . of Robinson Crusoe', 'with his vision of the Angelick World', appeared in 1720.

Robot, derived from a Slav word meaning 'work', well known in 18th-cent. Austria-Hungary, where it was applied to servile labour. Both Maria Theresa and Joseph II granted robot-patente, limiting the amount of work that the feudal lords might exact from their serfs. It was adopted about 1923 to designate certain mechanical contrivances so ingenious as to resemble human beings in their ability to perform particular actions, reply to questions, &c. It was popularized by a play 'R.U.R.' (Rossum's Universal Robots) written by the Czech dramatist, Karel Capek, in which society is represented as dependent on these mechanical men. The latter revolt against their employers and destroy them.

Roc, a mythical bird of Eastern legend, imagined as being of enormous size and strength. In the 'Arabian Nights' story of Sindbad the Sailor, the Roc carries Sindbad out of the valley of diamonds.

Roche, SIR BOYLE (1743-1807), a baronet and Irish M.P., celebrated as a perpetrator of 'bulls'. That attributed to him about being in two places at once 'like a bird' is said by J. H. Burton (q.v., in 'The Book-hunter') to occur, much earlier, in the letters of the Jacobite, Robertson of Struan.

ROCHESTER, JOHN WILMOT, second earl of (1648-80), born at Ditchley, near Woodstock, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford, a poet of genius and a notorious libertine. He fought at sea in the Dutch War, and showed conspicuous gallantry. Rochester was attractive in person and manners and a favourite of Charles II, who frequently banished him from the court and as frequently pardoned him. He was a patron of Elizabeth Barry (q.v.) and temporarily of several poets, including Dryden, whom, however, he caused to be waylaid and beaten on account of a passage in Mulgrave's anonymous 'Essay on Satire', which he attributed to Dryden. His repentant deathbed scene was described by G. Burnet (q.v.) in a pamphlet which became extremely popular. His best literary work was satirical, notably in 'A Satire against Mankind' (1675), and among his amorous lyrics there are some marked with sincerity and feeling, as well as wit and finish.

Rochester, MR., the hero of Charlotte Brontë's 'Jane Eyre' (q.v.).

Rock day, the day after Twelfth Day, so called because on that day women resumed their spinning (cf. Plough Monday). 'Rock' here means a distaff.

Rockefeller, JOHN DAVISON (1839-1937), started life as an accountant, and, having saved a little capital, went into partnership in an oil-refining business. He organized the Standard Oil Co. in 1870, substituting combination for the previous competition among the American oil companies, and became immensely rich. From 1890 he undertook the philanthropic distribution of his fortune, and by the end of 1927 is said to have bestowed some £100,000,000 on such purposes. The principal institutions that he set up were the 'Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research'; the 'Rockefeller Foundation' for medical education and the control of certain diseases; and the 'General Education Board' and 'International Education Board' for the development of teaching and research in the U.S.A. and the rest of the world respectively. His son (b. 1874), who bears the same names, has continued to give large sums for education, research, and kindred purposes, including $2,000,000 for an Archaeological Museum in Palestine. [E.B.]

Rococo, apparently a fanciful formation on the stem of rocaille, shell- or pebble-work, is applied to a style of furniture or architecture having the characteristics of Louis Quatorze or Louis Quinze workmanship, such as conventional shell- and scroll-work and meaningless decoration; excessively or tastelessly florid or ornate. [OED.] The style originated in France and reached its culmination in Germany; it flourished about the middle of the 18th cent. Its essential feature is freedom both from classical restraint and from utilitarian purpose.

Roderick, the last of the Goths, a poem by Southey (q.v.), published in 1814.

Roderick, the last king of the Visigoths, has dishonoured Florinda, daughter of Count Julian. The latter, in revenge, calls the Moors into Spain, and Roderick is driven from his throne. In penitence for his crime, Roderick consecrates his life to God and assumes the garb of a monk. A spark of revolt against the Moors is kindled in the devastated country, and Roderick, under the name of Father Maccabee, goes to the Moorish camp, where Pelayo, his cousin, is held as a hostage. He persuades Pelayo to escape and place himself at the head of the Christian forces. Pelayo is acclaimed king, and leads his army against the Moors at the battle of Covadonga. In the heat of the battle, Roderick, who, unrecognized as a monk, has received the confession of Florinda (which partly absolves him) and has made his peace with his mother and Count Julian, leaps on his old war-horse, reveals himself to the Christian army, and leads it to victory. He then disappears, and it is only generations later that, in a hermitage, a tomb bearing his name is discovered. Pelayo becomes the founder of the Spanish royal line.

The subject is also treated by W. S. Landor in his 'Count Julian'.

Roderick, Vision of Don, a poem by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1811.

Roderick, the last Gothic king of Spain, in order to learn the future, has the temerity to enter a magic vault which has been denounced as fatal to the Spanish monarchy. He there sees a vision of his own defeat by the Moors and their occupation of the country; next, of the peninsula when Spanish and Portuguese conquests have raised it to the height of its power, sullied, however, by superstition; lastly, of the usurpation of the Spanish crown by Buonaparte, and the arrival of British succour.

Roderick Dhu, a character in Sir W. Scott's 'Lady of the Lake' (q.v.).

RODOMONT

Roderick Hudson, the first novel of H. James (q.v.), published in book form in 1876. It is the story of a young man transplanted from a lawyer's office in a Massachusetts town to a sculptor's studio in Rome. Incapable of adjustment to his environment, he fails both in art and love, and meets a tragic end in Switzerland.

Roderick Random, The Adventures of, a picaresque novel by Smollett (q.v.), published in 1748.

This was the first important work by Smollett. It is modelled on Le Sage's 'Gil Blas', and is a series of episodes, told with infinite vigour and vividness, strung together on the life of the selfish and unprincipled hero, who relates them. Its chief interest is in the picture that it gives, drawn from personal experience, of the British navy and the British sailor of the day. But much of the story is repulsive.

Roderick, left penniless by his grandfather (his father has been disinherited and has left the country), is befriended by his uncle, Lieut. Tom Bowling of the navy. Accompanied by an old schoolfellow, Strap, he goes to London, meets with many adventures at the hands of rogues of various kinds, and qualifies as a surgeon's mate in the navy. He is pressed as a common sailor on board the man-of-war 'Thunder', becomes mate to the Welsh surgeon, Morgan, is present at the siege of Cartagena (1741), and after suffering much misery and ill-treatment returns to England. Here he meets with further adventures, falls in love with Narcissa, and is carried by smugglers to France, where he finds and relieves his uncle Tom Bowling. He joins the French army and fights at Dettingen. His fortunes are rehabilitated by his generous friend Strap, who even undertakes to serve Roderick as his valet, and he sets out to marry a lady of fortune. He makes love to Miss Melinda Goosetrap, but does not impose upon her mother; and other matrimonial enterprises are not more successful. Having lost all his money at play, he embarks as surgeon on a ship commanded by Tom Bowling, and in the course of the voyage meets Don Roderigo, a wealthy trader, who turns out to be Roderick's father. They return to England, Roderick is married to Narcissa, and Strap to her maid, Miss Williams.

Sarza, arrogant and valiant, the doughtiest of the followers of Agramant (q.v.). His boastfulness gave rise to the word rodomontade. He leads the first Saracen invasion into France. Doralis, princess of Granada, is betrothed to him, but falls into the power of Mandricardo (q.v.). After an indecisive duel between the two Saracen heroes, the conflict is referred to the princess herself, who, to Rodomont's surprise, expresses her preference for Mandricardo. Rodomont retires in disgust to the south of France. Here Isabella (q.v.) falls into his power and, preferring death, by guile causes him to slay her. In remorse, in order to commemorate her, he builds a bridge and takes toll of all who pass that way. Orlando, coming in his madness to the bridge, throws Rodomont into the river. Rodomont is also defeated by Bradamant (q.v.). Thus humiliated he temporarily retires from arms, emerges once more, and is finally killed by Rogero (q.v.).

Rogero or RUGGIERO, the legendary ancestor of the house of Este, extolled in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.). He is the son of a Christian knight and a Saracen lady of royal birth, brought up in Africa, and taken by Agramant (q.v.) on the expedition against Charlemagne, where he falls in love with the warrior maiden Bradamant (q.v.) and she with him. He falls into the power of Alcina (q.v.) and is released by Melissa (q.v.). He then, mounted on the hippogriff, rescues Angelica from the Orc. Bradamant has also an active rival in Marfisa, a lady fighting on the Moorish side, who is smitten with love for Rogero, but eventually turns out to be his sister. Finally, after the retreat of Agramant, Rogero joins Charlemagne and is baptized. He now hopes to marry Bradamant, but her ambitious parents vigorously oppose the match. Bradamant, to secure her lover without openly opposing her parents, declares, with Charlemagne's approval, that she will marry no one who has not withstood her in battle for a whole day. This Rogero alone does, and after many vicissitudes the lovers are united. In a final duel Rogero slays Rodomont (q.v.).

Rogers, BRUCE (1870–), born in the United States, an eminent designer of books, printing adviser to the Cambridge University Press, 1918–19, and subsequently to the Harvard University Press.

ROGERS, JAMES EDWIN THOROLD (1823–90), educated at King's College, London, and Magdalen Hall, Oxford, was professor of political economy at Oxford in 1862–7 and again in 1888. He had been a strong Tractarian till about 1860, but put off his orders and swung right round, being the first clergyman to take advantage of the Clerical Disabilities Relief Act of 1870. He was Radical M.P. for Southwark, 1880–6. His best-known works are the 'History of Agriculture and Prices in England from 1250 to 1793' (1866–87) and 'Six Centuries of Work and Wages' (1884 and 1886). He wrote a number of other treatises of political and economic history, including 'A Complete Collection of the Protests of the Lords' (1875), and edited Adam Smith's 'Wealth of Nations' (1869).

ROKEBY

ROGERS, SAMUEL (1763–1855), born at Stoke Newington, the son of a banker and a man of wealth, published in 1792 his 'Pleasures of Memory', a piece of agreeable verse, which achieved popularity. He attained a high position among men of letters, at a time when the poetical standard was not high, and in 1810 published a fragmentary epic, 'Columbus', in 1814 'Jacqueline', and in 1822–8 'Italy', a collection of verse tales, which also obtained a certain degree of fame. He was offered, but declined, the laureateship in 1850. His 'Recollections', dealing with a long life and a wide acquaintance, were published in 1859. 'Recollections of the Table Talk of Samuel Rogers' (ed. Dyce) was issued in 1856.

ROGERS, WOODS (d. 1732), commander of a privateering expedition (1708–11) in which William Dampier (q.v.) was pilot, and in the course of which Alexander Selkirk was discovered on the island of Juan Fernandez and rescued, the town of Guayaquil was taken and held to ransom, and a Manila ship captured. These incidents are described in Rogers's entertaining journal, 'A Cruizing Voyage round the World' (1712). He was twice (1718–21 and 1729–32) governor of the Bahamas, and most successful in putting down piracy.

Roi d'Yvetot, LG, the subject and title of a song by Béranger (q.v.), the type of easy-going, pleasure-loving monarch, the ruler of a very small but peaceful and contented territory. The song appeared in 1813 when France was wearying of the sacrifices entailed by Napoleon's campaigns. There is an excellent rendering by Thackeray.

Rois Fainéants, Lss, the 'do-nothing kings', a name given to the later Merovingian kings of France, who were mere figureheads, under the domination of the Mayors of the Palace (q.v.).

ROJAS, FERNANDO DE (15th cent.), a Spanish author of whom little is known, but who is believed to have been a bachelor of laws of Montalban in the province of Toledo, Spain. He is remembered for his masterpiece, 'Celestina' (q.v.).

Rokeby, a poem in six cantos by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1813.

ROKEBY

The scene is laid chiefly at Rokeby near Greta Bridge in Yorkshire, and the time is immediately after the battle of Marston Moor (1644). The complicated plot is concerned with the conspiracy of Oswald Wycliffe, lord of Barnard Castle, with the sturdy ruffian, Bertram Risingham, to murder the latter's patron, Philip of Mortham, in order to obtain his lands and the treasure which had been obtained by him on the Spanish main. Mortham is shot and left for dead, but recovers. An attack on Rokeby Castle to secure the treasure is defeated, largely by the prowess of young Redmond O'Neale, Lord Rokeby's page. Meanwhile Oswald, to whom Lord Rokeby has been entrusted as a prisoner after Marston Moor, threatens to execute his prisoner unless Rokeby's daughter, Matilda, consents to marry Oswald's son, Wilfrid, a gentle poetic youth, who refuses to avail himself of Matilda's reluctant consent. Just as Lord Rokeby is about to be executed, Bertram, struck with remorse, rides in and kills Oswald, and is himself slain. Redmond O'Neale is discovered to be the lost son of Mortham, and marries Matilda.

The poem includes the beautiful songs, 'A weary lot is thine, fair maid', and 'Brignall Banks'. It is interesting for the fact that Scott (in spite of the good first reception of the poem) recognized his own comparative failure as a poet, and thereupon turned to his true vocation as a romantic novelist.

Rokesmith, JOHN, in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.), the name assumed by John Harmon.

Roland, the most famous of the paladins (q.v.) of Charlemagne. According to the chronicler Eginhard, his legend has the following basis of fact. In August 778 the rear-guard of the French army of Charlemagne was returning through the Pyrenees from a successful expedition in the north of Spain, when it was surprised in the valley of Roncevaux by the Basque inhabitants of the mountains; the baggage was looted and all the rear-guard killed, including Hrodland, count of the Breton marches. The story of this disaster was developed by the imagination of numerous poets. For the Basques were substituted the Saracens. Roland becomes the commander of the rear-guard, appointed to the post at the instance of the traitor Ganelon, who is in league with the Saracen king, Marsile. Oliver is introduced, Roland's companion in arms, the brother of Aude, Roland's betrothed. Oliver thrice urges Roland to summon aid by sounding his horn, but Roland from excess of pride defers doing so till too late. Charlemagne returns and destroys the pagan army. Ganelon is tried and executed.

The legend has been handed down in three principal forms: in the fabricated Latin chronicle of the 12th cent. erroneously attributed to Archbishop Turpin (d. c. 800) in the 'Carmen de proditiōne Guenonis' of the same epoch; and in the 'Chanson de Roland', in medieval French, also of the early 12th cent. It is a well-known tradition that Taillefer, a jongleur in the army of William the Conqueror, sang a poem on Roncevaux at the battle of Hastings (1066), possibly an earlier version of the extant 'Chanson'.

Roland, as Orlando, is the hero of Boiardo's 'Orlando Innamorato' and Ariosto's 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.). Roland's sword was called 'Durandal' or 'Durindana', and his horn 'Olivant'. See also Oliver.

Roland for an Oliver, A, tit for tat, with reference to the evenly matched combat between Roland and Oliver. See Oliver.

Roland, Childe, see Childe Roland.

Roland, MME JEANNE (1754-93), the daughter of Gattien Philpon, an engraver, and wife of Jean Marie Roland de la Platière, French economist and politician, was the Egeria (and a most unfortunate and dangerous one) of the Girondists (q.v.) in the French Revolution and was executed in 1793. When mounting the scaffold she uttered the famous words, 'O liberté! que de crimes on commet en ton nom.' Her husband killed himself on learning her fate.

Roland de Vaux, (1) the baron of Triermain, in Scott's 'Bridal of Triermain' (q.v.); (2) also in Coleridge's 'Christabel' (q.v.), the name of the estranged friend of Christabel's father.

Roll, RAGMAN, a set of rolls in the Public Record Office, in which are recorded the instruments of homage made to Edward I by the Scottish king (Balliol), nobles, &c., at the Parliament of Berwick in 1296; so called apparently from the pendent seals attached.

ROLLAND, ROMAIN (1866-1944), French historian and critic of music, novelist, biographer, and dramatist; author of 'Jean Christophe' (1905-12, a series of novels in ten volumes), 'Beethoven' (1903, biography), 'Michel Ange' (1907, biography), and works on Indian religious thought.

ROLLE OF HAMPOLE, RICHARD (c. 1300-49), born at Thornton in the North Riding of Yorkshire, is said to have left Oxford in his 19th year and to have become a hermit. He lived at various places in Yorkshire, finally at Hampole, where he died, near a Cistercian nunnery in which he had disciples. Among these was Margaret Kirkeby, who became an anchoress and was enclosed in his neighbourhood. Rolle wrote a number of scriptural commentaries, meditations, and other religious works, in Latin and English. Their bibliography and the materials relating to the life of Rolle are discussed by H. E. Allen in 'Writings ascribed to Richard Rolle' (1927).

Rolliad, Criticisms on the, a collection of Whig political satires directed against William Pitt and his followers after their success at the election of 1784, first published in the 'Morning Herald' and 'Daily Advertiser' during that year. The authors, members of the 'Esto Perpetua' club (q.v.), are not known with certainty, but among them were Dr. French Laurence, who became Regius professor of civil law at Oxford; George Ellis, the antiquary; General Richard Fitzpatrick; and Lord John Townshend. The satires originally took the form of reviews of an imaginary epic, 'The Rolliad', which took its name from John Rolle, M.P., one of Pitt's supporters, and dealt with the adventures of a mythical Norman duke, Rollo, his ancestor. These were followed by 'Political Eclogues', 'Probationary Odes' for the vacant laureateship, and 'Political Miscellanies', all directed to the same purpose, the ridicule of the Tories. A complete collection was published in 1791.

Rollright Stones, THE, a circle of stones perhaps of pre-Celtic origin, near Chipping Norton, on the confines of Oxfordshire and Warwickshire. Drayton ('Polyolbion', xiii. 414) alludes to a legend that they are a witness of a victory over Rollo and the Danes.

Rolls, CLOSE, the rolls in which close-writes (grants given to private persons under the great seal), private indentures, and recognizances are recorded.

Rolls, PIPE, the Great Rolls of the Exchequer, comprising the various 'pipes', or enrolled accounts, of sheriffs and others for a financial year. The origin of this use of 'pipe' is doubtful; some would explain it from the pipe-like form of a thin roll or (?) from its being transmitted in a cylindrical case. Bacon saw in it a metaphor, 'because the whole receipt is finally conveyed into it [the Exchequer] by means of divers small pipes or quills'. The complete series of Pipe Rolls dates from the reign of Henry II, but there is an isolated one (of the highest importance) of the year 1130.

Rolls House in Chancery Lane, formerly a house of maintenance for converted Jews, founded by Henry III, was annexed by Edward III to the office of the Master of the Rolls, who had his official residence there. The rolls and records of the Court of Chancery were kept there until the erection of the Record Office in Fetter Lane. The chapel, greatly altered and disfigured, survived (Wheatley and Cunningham).

Rolls Series, otherwise 'Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland from the Invasion of the Romans to the Reign of Henry VIII'. Their publication was authorized by government in 1857 on the suggestion of Joseph Stevenson, the archivist, and the recommendation of Sir John Romilly, master of the rolls. Before 1914, ninety-nine chronicles, &c., had appeared in the series, most of them edited by the greatest historical scholars of the time.

Rolls-Royce, an expensive and luxurious make of motor-car, a symbol of superlative excellence, and usually associated in fiction with abundant wealth in the owner.

ROMANCE LANGUAGES

Romanc, the modern Greek language.

Roman Actor, THE, a tragedy by Massinger (q.v.), printed in 1629. The play is based on the life of the Emperor Domitian as told by Suetonius and Dio Cassius.

The cruel and licentious emperor forcibly takes from Aelius Lamia, a Roman senator, his wife Domitia, makes her empress, and dotes on her. Domitia falls in love with Paris the actor. So well does he act before her a scene in which, as Iphis scorned by Anaxarete, he threatens to take his life, that she betrays herself. The emperor, his suspicions inflamed by enemies of Domitia, finds her and Paris together, kills Paris with his own hand (making him act the part of a false servant and himself taking the part of the injured lord), but cannot find heart to punish Domitia. She, incensed at the death of Paris and presuming on her power over the emperor, rails at and taunts him. Unable to kill her with his own hand, he writes down her name in the list of those condemned to death. This list Domitia finds while he sleeps. Hastily conspiring with others whose names are in the list, they lure him away from his guards and kill him.

Roman de la Rose, a French verse romance, of which the first 4,000 lines were written about the middle of the 13th cent. by Guillaume de Lorris, and the remainder (some 18,000 lines) about forty years later by Jean de Meung. The first part is an allegorical love poem, of which the contents are substantially as in the version attributed to Chaucer (see Romaunt of the Rose). In the second part, which is more in the nature of a satire (against women, the magistrates, the nobility, the friars, &c.), after long digressions and much display of the author's learning, the lover obtains his Rose, with the intervention of Venus herself.

Romanes Lectures, lectures founded at Oxford in 1891 by George John Romanes (1848–94), a scientist born at Kingston, Canada, author of 'Darwin and after Darwin' (1892). He was educated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, was a friend of Darwin and a professor at Edinburgh and at the Royal Institution, and was noted for his studies in physiology and zoology. The lectures are on subjects approved by the vice-chancellor, relating to science, art, or literature.

Romanesque, the style of architecture distinctive of the buildings erected in Romanized Europe between the close of the classical period and the rise of Gothic architecture (very roughly A.D. 600–1200). Norman (q.v.) is the form of Romanesque that prevailed in England.

Romantic, a word for which, in connexion with literature, there is no generally accepted definition. The OED. says 'Characterized . . . by, invested . . . with, romance or imaginative appeal', where romance appears to mean 'redolence or suggestion of, association with, the adventurous and chivalrous', something remote from the scenes and incidents of ordinary life.

Romantic Revival, THE, a name given to a movement in European literature which marked the last quarter of the 18th cent. The old narrow intellectual attitude gave place to a wider outlook, which recognized the claims of passion and emotion and the sense of mystery in life, and in which the critical was replaced by the creative spirit, and wit by humour and pathos.

Romany or ROMMANY, a gipsy (q.v.) word meaning a gipsy, or the gipsy language.

Romany Rye, The, a novel by Borrow (q.v.), published in 1857. 'Romany Rye', in gipsy (q.v.) language, means 'Gipsy Gentleman', a name applied to Borrow in his youth by Ambrose Smith, the Norfolk gipsy. This book is a sequel to 'Lavengro' (q.v.), and continues in the same style the story of the author's wanderings and adventures.

Romaunt of the Rose, The, a poem of 7,700 lines in short couplets, attributed to Chaucer, but of which part only was probably written by him. It is a translation, with amplifications, of so much of the French 'Roman de la Rose' (q.v.) as was written by Guillaume de Lorris, and of parts of the continuation by Jean de Meung. The story is put into the form of a dream in which the poet visits the Garden of Mirth, being invited to enter by Idleness. Here he sees various allegorical personages, the God of Love, Gladness, Courtesy, and so on, disporting themselves. In the water of the fountain of Narcissus he sees mirrored a rose-tree and falls in love with a rose-bud. His attempts to cull this are aided or obstructed by various allegorical personages, Bialacoil (Bel-Accueil, Welcome), Danger, False-Semblant, Reason, Shame, Jealousy. The God of Love shoots arrows at the poet and makes him yield himself his servant. He lays his commands upon him, and instructs him in the means by which the lover achieves his ends (not omitting largesse to the maid). Finally Jealousy builds a castle about the rose. The latter part of the poem, which is fragmentary, contains a version of about one-sixth of Jean de Meung's continuation; it is a vigorous satire on religion, women, and the social order.

ROMEO AND JULIET

Rome, KING OF, the title given to the son of Napoleon Buonaparte and the Empress Marie Louise, at his birth in 1811. The title was a deliberate parallel to, or imitation of, the medieval title of 'King of the Romans', which was commonly given to the destined successor of the 'Holy Roman Emperor'.

Romeo and Juliet, the first romantic tragedy of Shakespeare (q.v.), based on an Italian romance by Bandello frequently translated into English. Shakespeare's play was probably written in 1595, first printed in corrupt form in 1597 (authentic second quarto, 1599).

The Montagues and the Capulets, the two chief families of Verona, are at bitter enmity. Romeo, son of old Lord Montague, attends, disguised by a mask, a feast given by old Lord Capulet. He sees and falls in love with Juliet, daughter of Capulet, and she with him. After the feast he overhears, under her window, Juliet's confession of her love for him, and wins her consent to a secret marriage. With the help of Friar Laurence, they are wedded next day. Mercutio, a friend of Romeo, meets Tybalt, of the Capulet family, who is infuriated by his discovery of Romeo's presence at the feast, and they quarrel. Romeo comes on the scene, and attempts to reason with Tybalt, but Tybalt and Mercutio fight, and Mercutio falls. Then Romeo draws and Tybalt is killed. The duke with Montague and Capulet come up, and Romeo is sentenced to banishment. Early next day, after passing the night with Juliet, he leaves Verona for Mantua, counselled by the friar, who intends to publish Romeo's marriage at an opportune moment. Capulet proposes to marry Juliet to Count Paris, and when she seeks excuses to avoid this, peremptorily insists. Juliet consults the friar, who bids her consent to the match, but on the night before the wedding drink a potion which will render her apparently lifeless for 40 hours. He will warn Romeo, who will rescue her from the vault on her awakening and carry her to Mantua. Juliet does his bidding. The friar's message to Romeo miscarries, and Romeo hears that Juliet is dead. Buying poison, he comes to the vault to have a last sight of Juliet. He chances upon Count Paris outside the vault; they fight and Paris is killed. Then Romeo, after a last kiss on Juliet's lips, drinks the poison and dies. Juliet awakes and finds Romeo dead by her side, and the cup still in his hand. Guessing what has happened, she stabs herself and dies. The story is unfolded by the friar and Count Paris's page, and Montague and Capulet, faced by the tragic results of their enmity, are reconciled.

ROMEO AND JULIET

Romford, MR. FACEY, see Surtees (R. S.).

Romfrey, THE HON. EVERARD, afterwards earl of, a character in Meredith's 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v.).

Romney, GEORGE (1734-1802), one of the great British portrait-painters, was the son of a builder and cabinet-maker of Dalton-in-Furness. His numerous portraits of Emma Hart, afterwards Lady Hamilton, are well known. Romney is the subject of Tennyson's poem 'Romney's Remorse'.

Romola, a novel by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1863.

The background of the novel is Florence at the end of the 15th cent., the troubled period, following the expulsion of the Medici, of the expedition of Charles VIII, of distracted counsels in the city, of the excitement caused by the preaching of Savonarola, and of acute division between the popular party and the supporters of the Medici. The various historical figures, including Charles VIII, Machiavelli, and Savonarola himself, are drawn with great care, as well as the whole picturesque complexion of the city. The story is that of the purification by trials of the noble-natured Romola, devoted daughter of an old blind scholar. Into their lives comes the clever, adaptable young Greek, Tito Melema, whose self-indulgence develops into utter perfidy. He robs, and abandons in imprisonment, the benefactor of his childhood, Baldassare. He cruelly goes through a mock marriage ceremony with the innocent little contadina Tessa. After marrying Romola he wounds her deepest feelings by betraying her father's solemn trust. He plays a double game in the political intrigues of the day. Nemesis pursues and at last overtakes him in the person of old Baldassare, who escapes from imprisonment crazed with sorrow and suffering. Romola, with her love for her husband turned to contempt, and her trust in Savonarola destroyed by his falling away from his high prophetic mission, is left in utter isolation, from which she is rescued by the discovery of her duty in self-sacrifice. Concurrently with this termination the author relates the undermining of Savonarola's influence over the city, his trial, condemnation, and execution.

Romulus, the legendary founder of Rome, a son of Mars and Ilia, the daughter of Numitor, king of Alba. Remus was his twin-brother. These two children were thrown into the Tiber, by order of Amulius, who had usurped the throne of his brother Numitor. But they were preserved and suckled by a she-wolf. In due course they put Amulius to death and restored Numitor to the throne. They afterwards undertook to build a city, the future Rome, and the omens having given the preference to Romulus, he began to lay the foundations. But Remus, in ridicule, leapt over them. This angered Romulus, who slew his brother. He gathered fugitives and criminals in his city, and conquered the Sabines, who then came to live in Rome; and their king, Tatius, shared the sovereignty with Romulus. The latter was deified and identified with Quirinus (q.v.).

Roncesvalles or RONCEVAUX, a valley in the western Pyrenees, celebrated as the scene of the defeat of the rear-guard of Charlemagne's army and the death of Roland (q.v.) in 778 (see also Fontarabia).

Rondeau, a poem consisting of ten (or, in stricter sense, of thirteen) lines, having only two rhymes throughout, and with the opening words used twice as a refrain.

Rondel, a RONDEAU (q.v.), or a special form of this.

Rondibills, in Rabelais, III. xxxi et seq., the physician whom Panurge consults on the subject of his marriage.

RONSARD, PIERRE-DE (1524-85), French lyric poet, the principal figure in the 'Pléiade' (q.v.). A page at the court of France, he was transferred to that of James V of Scotland, where he remained till the latter's marriage with Marie de Guise, the mother of Queen Mary Stuart, to whom he later addressed some of his poems. He was subsequently in the service of Charles IX of France. As a poet he was regarded by his contemporaries with intense admiration. He contributed powerfully to the reform of French literature, creating a new poetic language, and exercised considerable influence on the English sonnet-writers of the 16th cent. He is seen at his best and most original in his lighter verse.

Röntgen Rays or X-RAYS, electro-magnetic waves of shorter length than the ultra-violet, possessing the power of passing through certain opaque substances. They were discovered by Prof. Wilhelm Konrad Röntgen (1845-1923), a German physicist, in the course of experiments in electric discharge through rarefied gas. Being uncertain as to their nature, he called them X-rays.

Roosevelt, FRANKLIN DELANO (1882-1945), President of the United States, a distant cousin of President Theodore Roosevelt, and a man of remarkable vision, keen feeling for suffering humanity, democratic principles, and vigour in action. After service in the administration of President Wilson, and two terms as Governor of New York, he was elected President in 1932. He took office at a moment of profound economic depression in America, and averted a panic only by the confidence and vigour with which he applied himself to reform (see New Deal). In 1938-9, during his second term of office, he strove for the maintenance of peace in Europe, but when it proved impossible to curb the aggressive policy of Hitler, he gave unstinted support to Britain, adopting the generous and far-sighted measure known as Lend-lease (q.v.), and stimulating to the utmost the production of war supplies in America. It was during his third term of office that the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour (q.v., 1941) led to declarations of war by the United States against the three Axis countries. Overcoming the handicap of physical infirmity (due to an attack of poliomyelitis in 1921) Roosevelt was the first President to leave national territory in war time, visiting Canada, Casablanca, Cairo, Teheran, and the Crimea to confer with the heads of allied governments. He died on 12 April 1945, a few months after entering on his fourth term of office, and only a few weeks before the surrender of Germany which he had so powerfully contributed to bring about.

Root-and-Branch, the name given to a bill supported by a majority of the House of Commons in 1641 for the abolition of episcopacy and the transfer of the bishops' powers to committees of laymen in each diocese. It was rejected by the Lords, and not reintroduced until the summer of 1643.

Roper, MARGARET (1505-44), daughter of Sir T. More (q.v.). According to Stapleton (1535-98) she purchased the head of her dead father a month after it had been exposed on London Bridge and preserved it in spices till her death. It is believed that it was buried with her. Tennyson alludes to this:

Her, who clasped in her last trance
Her murdered father's head.

Rosa Dartle, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Rosalind, (1) in Spenser's 'Shepherds Calender' and 'Colin Clouts come home again' (qq.v.), an unknown lady celebrated by the poet as his love; (2) a character in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

Rosaline, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), a lady attendant on the Princess of France; (2) in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.), a Capulet, with whom Romeo was in love before he first saw Juliet.

Rosalynde. Euphues Golden Legacie, a pastoral romance in the style of Lyly's 'Euphues' (q.v.), diversified with sonnets and eclogues, written by Lodge (q.v.) during his voyage to the Canaries ('every line wet with a surge'), and published in 1590. The story is borrowed in part from 'The Tale of Gamelyn' (q.v.) and was dramatized with little alteration by Shakespeare in his 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

ROSCOE

Lodge's Rosader is Shakespeare's Orlando; Saladyne is Oliver; Alinda, Celia; and Rosalind is common to both. The ill-treatment of Rosader (Orlando) by his elder brother is more developed by Lodge, and the restoration of the rightful duke to his dukedom is effected by arms instead of persuasion. The characters of Jaques and Touchstone, and the humour that enriches 'As You Like It', are found only in Shakespeare's work. Lodge's romance includes the pleasant and well-known madrigal,

Love in my bosome like a Bee
Doth suck his sweet.

Rosamond, FAIR, Rosamond Clifford (d. 1176?), daughter of Walter de Clifford, probably acknowledged as mistress of Henry II in 1174. She was buried in the choir of Godstow Abbey, but her remains were removed to the Chapter House, c. 1191.

These are the known facts on which the popular legend was based. As told by Stow (q.v.) following Higden (q.v.) the legend related that 'Rosamond the fayre daughter of Walter Lord Clifford, concubine to Henry II (poisoned by Queen Elianor as some thought) dyed at Woodstocke where King Henry had made for her a house of wonderful working, so that no man or woman might come to her but he that was instructed by the King. This house after some was named Labyrinthus, or Dedalus worke, wrought like unto a knot in a garden, called a maze; but it was commonly said that lastly the queene came to her by a clue of thridde or silke, and so dealt with her that she lived not long after: but when she was dead, she was buried at Godstow in an house of nunes, beside Oxford, with these verses upon her tombe:

Hic jacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non rosa munda:
Non redolet, sed olet, quae redolere solet.'

The story is told in a ballad by Deloney (q.v.) included in Percy's 'Reliques'; and S. Daniel (q.v.) published in 1592 'The Complaint of Rosamond', a poem in rhyme-royal; Addison wrote an opera 'Rosamond' (1707).

Rosamond Vincy, a character in G. Eliot's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

Rose and the Ring, The, a humorous fairy-tale by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 1855.

It turns on the possession of a magic rose and a magic ring, which have the property of making their owners appear beautiful, and deals with the adventures of Prince Giglio, who has been ousted from the throne by his uncle; his rivalry for the hand, first of the princess Angelica, then of her maid Betsinda (who turns out to be the princess Rosalba), with the ridiculous Prince Bulbo, and the misfortunes of the latter; and his entanglement with Countess Gruffanuff, Angelica's ugly governess. Gruffanuff's husband has been head footman at the palace, and for his rudeness has been turned into a door-knocker by the fairy Blackstick. He is restored to life by the fairy just in time to prevent Giglio from having to marry his supposed widow. Giglio marries Rosalba, and Bulbo marries Angelica.

Rose Aylmer, an elegy by W. S. Landor (q.v.) on the daughter of Lord Aylmer. She was an early love of Landor's, but on her mother's second marriage was sent out to her aunt at Calcutta, where she died, aged twenty.

Rose Fleming, a character in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

Rose Jocelyn, a character in Meredith's 'Evan Harrington' (q.v.).

Rose Mackenzie, a character in Thackeray's 'The Newcomes' (q.v.).

Rose Mary, a poem by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), included in 'Ballads and Sonnets', published in 1881.

Rose Mary, looking into a magic beryl, in which only the pure can see the truth, sees, as she thinks, the peril to which her lover is exposed, and he is warned. But Rose Mary has sinned and her sin has admitted into the beryl evil spirits, who have concealed the truth from her. Her lover is faithless and is killed. She takes her father's sword and breaks the beryl, thus releasing her soul from destruction.

Rose Tavern, THE, in Russell Street, Covent Garden, was a favourite place of resort in the latter part of the 17th and early 18th cents. It is frequently referred to in the literature of the period, e.g. by Pepys (18 May 1668), and by Farquhar ('The Recruiting Officer').

Rose Theatre, THE, on Bankside, Southwark, opened in 1592, was managed by P. Henslowe (q.v.) and Shakespeare acted there.

ROSEBURY, ARCHIBALD PHILIP PRIMROSE, fifth earl of (1847-1929), foreign secretary in the Gladstone governments of 1886 and 1892, prime minister in 1894-5, an eloquent and witty speaker. He was author of works on 'Pitt' (1891), 'Sir Robert Peel' (1899), 'Napoleon—the Last Phase' (1900), 'Cromwell' (1900). He three times won the Derby, with Ladas in 1894, Sir Visto in 1895, and Cicero in 1905.

'Rose-red city—half as old as time', in Dean J. W. Burgon's poem, 'Petra', the ancient capital of Arabia Petraea, now in ruins, discovered by Burckhardt in 1812.

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, characters in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.).

Rosetta Stone, a piece of black basalt found by Napoleon's soldiers near the Rosetta mouth of the Nile, bearing an inscription in Egyptian hieroglyphics, demotic characters, and Greek, which proved the key to the interpretation of hieroglyphics. It is now in the British Museum.

Rosicrucian, a member of a supposed society or order, reputedly founded by one Christian Rosenkreuz in 1484, but first mentioned in 1614, whose members were said to claim various forms of secret and magic knowledge, such as the transmutation of metals, the prolongation of life, and power over the elements and elemental spirits. [OED.] No Rosicrucian society appears to have actually existed. The Rosicrucians of the early 17th cent. seem to have been moral and religious reformers, who covered their views under a cloak of mysticism and alchemy. There is a good deal on the subject in Shorthouse's 'John Inglesant' (q.v.).

Rosinante or ROZINANTE, the horse of Don Quixote (q.v.).

ROSS, ALEXANDER (1699-1784), educated at Aberdeen University, and a Forfarshire schoolmaster, was the author of the long pastoral narrative 'Helenore, or the Fortunate Shepherdess', and of a number of witty and spirited songs, including 'Woo'd and Married and a' '.

ROSS, SIR JAMES CLARK (1800-62), Arctic and Antarctic explorer, was author of 'A Voyage in the Southern and Antarctic Regions (1839-43)', published in 1847. Ross commanded the first expedition for the relief of Sir J. Franklin (q.v.) in 1848-9.

ROSS, SIR JOHN (1777-1856), uncle of the above, Arctic explorer, was author of two narratives of voyages in search of the North-West Passage, published in 1819 and 1835.

ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA GEORGINA (1830-94), the sister of D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), contributed to 'The Germ' (q.v.) under the pseudonym 'Ellen Alleyne', and published her first work in book form, 'Goblin Market' [q.v.] and other Poems', in 1862. 'The Prince's Progress' (q.v.) appeared in 1866, 'Sing-Song' in 1872, and 'A Pageant and other Poems' in 1881. Notable among her contributions to 'The Germ' is the lyric entitled 'The Dream'. A volume of 'New Poems' appeared in 1896 after her death. 'Time Flies, a Reading Diary', with some poem or thought for each day, was published in 1883. Her work ranged from poems of fantasy and verses for the young to religious poetry, which constituted the greater part of her writings. They are in general pervaded by a spiritual and melancholy cast, and marked by a high degree of technical perfection. Her 'Monna Innominata' is a series of sonnets of unhappy love.

ROSSETTI, DANTE GABRIEL (1828-82), whose full Christian name was Gabriel Charles Dante (but the form which he gave it has become inveterate), the son of Gabriele Rossetti, an Italian patriot who came to England in 1824, was educated at King's College, London, and soon devoted himself to art. He formed, with Holman Hunt, John Everett Millais, and others, part of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (q.v.). For many years he was known only as a painter, though he began to write poetry very early (from 1847). 'The Blessed Damozel' (q.v.), one of his earliest works, subsequently more than once revised, appeared in 'The Germ' (q.v.). In 1860 he married Miss Eleanor Siddal, and in 1861 he published his first volume, 'The Early Italian Poets', a collection of scrupulous translations from Dante (including the 'Vita Nuova' and the sonnets) and his predecessors and contemporaries. His wife died in 1862 and a manuscript containing a number of his poems was buried with her. These were subsequently disinterred and published in 'Poems by D. G. Rossetti' in 1870. They include 'Sister Helen', 'Eden Bower' (q.v.), 'The Stream's Secret', and 'Love's Nocturn'. 'Ballads and Sonnets' appeared in 1881, completing the sequence of love-sonnets called 'The House of Life', of which part had appeared in the earlier volume, and including such notable poems as 'Rose Mary' (q.v.), 'The White Ship' (q.v.), and 'The King's Tragedy' (q.v.). Mention should be made of Rossetti's translations, not only from the Italian, but also from the French and German, and particularly from Villon. Many of his poems were written as commentaries on his pictures.

In 1871 Rossetti was attacked by Robert Buchanan under the pseudonym 'Thomas Maitland' in an article entitled 'The Fleshly

ROTTEN ROW

School', to which Rossetti published a convincing reply.

ROSSETTI, WILLIAM MICHAEL (1829-1919), brother of D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), educated at King's College School, London, was a man of letters and art-critic, and an official in the Inland Revenue Department. He was one of the seven Pre-Raphaelite 'brothers', edited 'The Germ' (q.v.), and wrote the sonnet that was printed on its cover. He wrote art-criticisms for the 'Spectator', republished under the title 'Fine Art, chiefly contemporary' (1867). His other works include a blank-verse translation of Dante's 'Inferno' (1865), 'Lives of some famous Poets' (1878), a 'Life of Keats' (1887), a 'Memoir, with Family Letters' of his brother (1895), a 'Memoir' (1904) and 'Family Letters' (1904) of his sister Christina, and a study of 'Dante and his Convito' (1910).

ROSSINI, GIOACHINO ANTONIO (1792-1868), Italian operatic composer. He visited London in 1823 and then Paris, where he was for a time director of the Théâtre Italien. His best-known operas are 'The Barber of Seville' (1816) and 'William Tell' (his greatest work, 1829).

Rossville, LORD, a character in Miss Ferrier's 'The Inheritance' (q.v.).

ROSTAND, EDMOND (1868-1918), French dramatist, whose best-known works are 'Cyrano de Bergerac' (1898, see Bergerac), 'L'Aiglon' (1900), and 'Chantecler' (1910).

Roswitha, see Hrotsvitha.

Rothomagus, in imprints, Rouen.

Rothsay, DUKE OF, eldest son of Robert III of Scotland, figures in Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

Rothschild, the name of a famous Jewish banking-house founded at Frankfort-on-the-Main towards the end of the 18th cent. by Mayer Anselm Rothschild. It is said to be derived from the sign of the house, 'zum rothen Schilde', 'at the red shield'. It is also said that the fortune of the house was in part founded on the securing of early news about the battle of Waterloo.

Rotten Row, a road in Hyde Park, extending from Apsley Gate to Kensington Gardens, a fashionable resort for riders. The name was formerly applied to various streets in different towns, and its origin is obscure. The OED. does not recognize the popular derivation from route du roi, and remarks that the older form in the north of England and Scotland, ratton raw, is apparently of different origin. The obvious derivation is probably the right one, a row or road of rotten earth, suitable material for a riding-track.

Rouge Croix, Rouge Dragon, two of the pursuivants of the English College of Arms, so called from their badges (see Heralds' College).

ROUGEMONT, LOUIS DE, the name assumed by an adventurer, Grin, a Swiss by birth, and at one time servant to Fanny Kemble, who, after spending many years in Australia, contributed in 1898 to the 'Wide World Magazine' articles relating a number of fantastic adventures, mostly imaginary, among the Australian aborigines (see Sitwell and Barton, 'Sober Truth'). He is said to have betrayed himself by writing of a 'flight of wombats'.

ROUGET DE L'ISLE, CLAUDE JOSEPH (1760-1836), an engineer officer in the French army, who in 1792 composed the 'Marseillaise' (words and music), the French national hymn. M. Loth in 'Le Chant de la Marseillaise' (Paris, 1886) suggests that Rouget got the air from a march in an oratorio called 'Esther' by one Grisons, choirmaster at Saint-Omer, 1787.

Round Table, THE, in the Arthurian legend, was made (according to one version by Merlin) for Uther Pendragon and given by him to King Leodegrance of Camelard. The latter gave it as a wedding gift, with 100 knights, to Arthur when he married Guinevere, his daughter. It would seat 150 knights, and all places round it were equal. The 'Siege Perilous' was reserved for the knight who should achieve the quest of the Grail (q.v.). In Layamon's 'Brut', however, the table was made for Arthur by a crafty workman. It is first mentioned by Wace (q.v.).

Round Table, The, a quarterly magazine founded in 1910 and, until 1916, under the editorship of the late Lord Lothian. It is published by Macmillan.

Roundabout Papers, The, a series of discursive essays by W. M. Thackeray (q.v.), published in the 'Cornhill Magazine', 1860-3.

Roundheads, members or adherents of the parliamentary party in the Civil War of the 17th cent., so called from the Puritan custom of wearing the hair cut close, while the Cavaliers usually wore theirs in long locks. The name appears to have arisen towards the end of the year 1641. [OED.] There is a pamphlet called 'The unloveliness of love-locks' somewhat earlier than this.

ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES (1712-78), was born at Geneva, son of a watchmaker. Lacking in stability of character and moral principle, he led a wretched erratic life, sometimes taken up and protected by benefactors whose kindness he ill repaid, sometimes occupying humble situations, as footman or music-master, living for twenty-five years with a kitchen-maid, Thérèse Le Vasseur, and depositing their five babies at the Foundling Hospital. This life he has described in his masterpiece, the 'Confessions' (published after his death).

ROWE

He came early into notice by the works in which he expounded his revolt against the existing social order. The first of these was a 'Discourse on the Influence of Learning and Art' (1750), followed by a 'Discourse on the Origin of Inequality' (1754). 'La Nouvelle Héloïse', a novel in which the question of the return to nature was discussed in its relation to the sexes and the family, appeared in 1761. 'Du Contrat social', setting forth his political philosophy, was published in 1762, and 'Émile', his views on education, in the same year. The 'Contrat Social' had a profound influence on French thought, especially after 1789. After the appearance of 'Émile' Rousseau was the object of persecution, and went into exile, first to Geneva and then to England (under the protection of Hume), until 1767.

Rousseau attributed evil, not to sin, but to society, as a departure from the natural state, in which man is both good and happy. To revert to these desirable conditions, we must banish from life its artificial elements. Instead of attending to the doctrines of the philosophers, we should listen to our own intuitions, which tell us that there is a benevolent divine spirit, who rewards virtue and punishes crime, and that the human soul is free and immortal. In political philosophy Rousseau held the view that society is founded on a contract, and that the head of the State is the people's mandatary, not their master. In education he developed the useful theory that instruction should proceed by an appeal to the child's curiosity, by stimulating his intelligence, rather than by imposing cut-and-dried notions upon it.

ROUTH, MARTIN JOSEPH (1755-1854), president of Magdalen College, Oxford, for sixty-three years, edited the 'Gorgias' and 'Euthydemus' of Plato, and 'Reliquiae Sacrae' (1814-43), a collection of writings of ecclesiastical authors of the 2nd and 3rd cents. Routh was a man of immense learning, and a strong, old-fashioned 'High Churchman'. He was also, perhaps, the last man in England who always wore a wig. His long life (he died in his hundredth year) and literary experience lend weight to his famous utterance: 'I think, Sir, you will find it a very good practice always to verify your references.' A life of Routh by R. D. Middleton was published in 1938.

ROWE, NICHOLAS (1674-1718), was educated at Westminster School, and became a barrister of the Middle Temple; but abandoned the legal profession for that of playwright, and made the acquaintance of Pope and Addison. He produced at Lincoln's Inn Fields his tragedies, 'The Ambitious Step-mother' (1700), 'Tamerlane' (q.v., 1702), and 'The Fair Penitent' (q.v., adapted from Massinger's 'Fatal Dowry', 1703). His 'Ulysses' was staged in 1706, his 'Royal Convert' at the Haymarket in 1707, and 'Jane Shore' and 'Lady Jane Grey' in 1714 and 1715 respectively, at Drury Lane. He produced an unsuccessful comedy, 'The Biter', at Lincoln's Inn Fields, in 1704. The moral tone of his plays is in strong contrast to the licentiousness of the drama of the preceding fifty years. His 'Fair Penitent' and 'Jane Shore' provided two of Mrs. Siddons's most successful parts. Rowe became poet laureate in 1715, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His portrait was twice painted by Kneller. His poetical works include a famous translation of Lucan (1718), 'one of the greatest productions of English poetry', said Johnson. His collected works appeared in 1727. Rowe did some useful work as editor of Shakespeare's plays (1709), dividing them into acts and scenes, supplying stage directions, and generally making the text more intelligible.

Rowena, (1) the legendary daughter of Hengist, who married the British chief Vortigern (see Vortigern and Rowena); (2) a character in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.; see also Rebecca and Rowena).

Rowland, Childe, see Childe Roland.

ROWLANDS, SAMUEL (1570?-1630?), a writer mainly of satirical tracts in prose and verse. He began his literary career with a religious poem, 'The Betraying of Christ' (1598), followed by a satire on the manners of Londoners, 'The Letting of Humours Blood in the Head-Vaine' (1600). In 1602 appeared his 'Tis Merrie when Gossips meete', a vivid and dramatic character-sketch of a widow, a wife, and a maid who meet in a tavern and converse. His 'Greene's Ghost', on the subject of 'coney-catchers' (cheats, swindlers), belongs to the same year. He published 'Hell's Broke Loose' (1605), 'Democritus, or Doctor Merryman his Medicines against Melancholy Humors' (1607), 'Humors Looking Glasse' (1608), 'Martin Mark-all' (an account of the habits and language of thieves, 1610), and 'The Melancholie Knight' (1615).

Rowlandson, THOMAS (1756-1827), artist and caricaturist, is especially remembered, in a literary connexion, for the plates that he supplied for the adventures of 'Dr. Syntax' (see Combe). He also drew the plates for 'The Military Adventures of Johnny Newcome' (1815) and 'The Adventures of Johnny Newcome in the Navy' (1818), and some of those included in Ackermann's publications, 'The World in Miniature' (1821-6) and 'The Microcosm of London' (1808). Only of recent years has Rowlandson been recognized as a great artist, and not only as a caricaturist. His sense of design was highly developed, and his best work stands comparison with that of any water-colourist.

ROXANA

Rowley, in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.), the old servant of the Surfaces.

Rowley, OLD, a nickname of Charles II, derived from the name of a horse in the royal stud, renowned for the number and beauty of its offspring (notes in John Hayward's edition of the works of Rochester).

ROWLEY, SAMUEL (d. 1633?), an actor in the Admiral's company and a playwright employed by Henslowe (q.v.). His principal extant play is, 'When you see me, You know me. Or the famous Chronicle Historie of King Henry VIII', acted in 1603.

ROWLEY, WILLIAM (1585?-1642?), dramatist and actor. He played in Queen Anne's company before 1610, and under Henslowe's management at the 'Hope'. His best dramatic work was done in collaboration with T. Middleton (q.v.). He wrote, unassisted, 'A New Wonder' (1632), 'All's Lost by Lust' (q.v., 1633), 'A Match at Midnight' (1633), and 'A Shoemaker a Gentleman' (1638). He collaborated in 'A Fair Quarrel' (q.v., 1617), 'The Changeling' (q.v., performed 1621), and other plays, with Middleton; in 'Fortune by Land and Sea' (printed 1655) with Heywood; in 'The Thracian Wonder' (printed 1661) with Webster; and in other pieces with Ford, Massinger, and Dekker. He was probably author or reviser of 'The Birth of Merlin' (printed 1662).

Rowley Poems, see Chatterton.

Rowley Powley, THE REV., in Byron's 'Don Juan', xi. 57, was Croly (q.v.).

Rowton Houses, named after Montague William Lowry-Corry, Baron Rowton (1838-1903), who studied working-class conditions and designed a 'poor man's hotel' with better conditions than those offered by the common lodging-houses. The first Rowton House was opened in Vauxhall in 1892. It proved very successful, and a company was formed in 1894 to extend their use.

Roxana, the daughter of a Persian satrap, who was taken captive by Alexander the Great, and became his wife. Later, Alexander took a second wife, Barsine, daughter of Darius and Statira. On this has been based the story of the jealousy of Roxana and her vengeance on her rival. It forms the basis of Nathaniel Lee's tragedy, 'The Rival Queens' (q.v.), where the second wife is called Statira.

Roxana, or the Fortunate Mistress, a romance by Defoe (q.v.), published in 1724.

This purports to be the autobiography of Mlle Bealeu, the beautiful daughter of French Protestant refugees, brought up in England, and married to a London brewer, who, having wasted his property, deserts her and her five children. She enters upon a career of prosperous wickedness, passing from one protector to another in England, France, and Holland, amassing much wealth, and receiving the name Roxana by accident, in consequence of a dance that she performs.

ROXANA

She is accompanied in her adventures by a faithful maid, Amy, a very human figure. She finally marries a Dutch merchant and lives as a person of consequence in Holland, until he discovers the deceit that has been put upon him. He shortly afterwards dies, leaving her only a small sum of money. She is imprisoned for debt, and dies in a state of penitence.

Roxburghe, JOHN KER, third duke of (1740–1804), an ardent bibliophile, who secured an unrivalled collection of books from Caxton's press. His splendid library, housed in St. James's Square, was dispersed in 1812. Valdarfer's edition of Boccaccio (1471), for which the second duke of Roxburghe had paid one hundred guineas, was then sold to the marquis of Blandford for £2,260. To celebrate this event the chief bibliophiles of the day dined together at St. Alban's Tavern, St. Alban's Street, under the presidency of Lord Spencer, and there inaugurated the ROXBURGHE CLUB, the first of the book-clubs, consisting of twenty-four members, with T. F. Dibdin as its first Secretary. The Club, at first rather convivial in character, began its valuable literary work with the printing of the metrical romance of Havelok the Dane (1828). Each member is expected once in his career to present (and pay for a limited edition of) a volume of some rarity. In 1926 there were thirty-eight members.

Royal Society, THE, originated in the Philosophical Society, which was founded in 1645. The operations of the latter were in great measure interrupted by the Civil War. Its meetings in London were resumed at the Restoration, and it received its charter as the Royal Society in 1662. Among its principal projectors were Abraham Cowley (q.v.) and Robert Boyle the chemist (see under Boyle Lectures). Its 'Philosophical Transactions' were first issued in 1665. The remarkable feature of the Royal Society among scientific academies was that it took the whole field of knowledge for its province and included among its early members such men of letters as Dryden, Waller, Evelyn, and Aubrey. Its first historian was Bishop Sprat (q.v.), who describes its aims. Among these was the improvement of English prose. It exacted from all its members 'a close, naked, natural way of speaking; positive expressions; clear senses; a native easiness'.

Rubáiydt of Omar Khayyám, The, see Omar Khayyám.

Rubens, PETER PAUL (1577–1640), a great painter of the Flemish school, whose works include historical paintings, landscapes, and genre pictures. He was the son of a physician, who on suspicion of Protestant views was obliged to flee from Antwerp to Cologne, where Rubens spent the early part of his life. Rubens was an enormously prolific and vital painter, robust and rich (some think coarse and soulless), who brought into Flemish parts some of the hot colour of the late Venetians. He visited Italy and Spain, and then settled in Antwerp, where he was appointed court painter to the archduke. Later he was invited to Paris to decorate galleries in the Luxembourg for Marie de' Medici. He came to England in 1629 on a mission to Charles I, by whom he was knighted. He had spent part of the previous year at Madrid, where a close friendship sprang up between him and Velasquez (q.v.). He married first Isabella Brandt, and after her death Hélène Fourment; portraits of both are among his finest works.

Rubicon, a small river rising in the Apennines and flowing into the Adriatic; it separated Italy from Cisalpine Gaul. By crossing it with an army and thus overstepping the boundaries of his province, Julius Caesar committed himself to war against the Senate and Pompey (49 B.C.).

Rudabah, in the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.), the wife of Zāl and mother of Rustem (q.v.). The story of the love of Zāl for Rudabah is one of the most romantic portions of the work.

Rüdiger, a character in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.). He is a follower of Etzel, who, when Gunther and his brothers visit Etzel's court after the death of Siegfried and Kriemhild's marriage to Etzel, entertains them hospitably. In the affray between the Huns and the Burgundians, Rüdiger and Gernot, Gunther's brother, slay one another.

Rudiger, a ballad by R. Southey (q.v.), of a stranger knight borne to Waldhurst on the Rhine in a boat drawn by a swan. Later the boat returns and carries away Rudiger, his wife Margaret, and their child. They come to a cavern where two giant arms emerge, seize Rudiger, and draw him into the earth.

Rudolphine Tables, a series of astronomical calculations published by Kepler in 1627, and named after his patron, the emperor Rudolph II.

Rudra, in Vedic mythology, the storm-god. His arrows carry destruction, but he is also the giver of remedial herbs.

Ruff's Guide to the Turf, an annual publication devoted to horse-racing; originated in 1842 by William Ruff (1801–56).

Rugby, JACK, in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.), servant to Dr. Caius.

RUGBY CHAPEL

Rugby Chapel, a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.).

Rugby School, founded by Laurence Sheriff in 1567. T. Arnold (q.v.) was its headmaster from 1828 to 1842. A vivid picture of school-life at Rugby in his days is given in 'Tom Brown's Schooldays' by Hughes (q.v.). Here originated the game of Rugby football; a tablet in Rugby School close commemorates William Webb Ellis 'who, with a fine disregard of the rules of football as played in his time, first took the ball in his arms and ran with it' in 1823.

Ruggiero, see Rogero.

Ruggle, GEORGE, see Ignoramus.

Ruin, The, an Old English poem of some thirty-five lines included in the 'Exeter Book' (q.v.), describing the result of the devastation by the Saxons of a Roman settlement (perhaps Bath), and showing, with deep feeling, the contrast of past splendour with present desolation.

Ruined Cottage, The, or The Story of Margaret, a poem by Wordsworth (q.v.), written in 1797, and subsequently embodied in Bk. I of 'The Excursion' (q.v.).

It is a harrowing tale of misfortune befalling a cottager and his wife. The husband leaves his home and joins a troop of soldiers going to a distant land. The wife stays on, pining for his return, in increasing wretchedness, till she dies and the cottage falls into ruin.

Ruines of Time, The, a poem by Spenser (q.v.), included in the 'Complaints' published in 1591. It is an allegorical elegy on the death of Sir P. Sidney (q.v.), which had also been the occasion of his earlier elegy 'Astrophel' (q.v.). The poet passes to a lament on the neglect of letters, with allusion to his own case. The poem is dedicated to the countess of Pembroke, Sidney's sister.

Rukenaw, DAME, the ape's wife in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.).

Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, a comedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), produced in 1624.

Margarita, a rich heiress of Seville, desires to marry, but only to obtain liberty for her amorous proclivities; she must therefore marry a fool. Altea, her companion, plots to win her for her brother Leon, who assumes a character of utter simplicity, promises subservience, and is accepted by Margarita. After the marriage, Margarita prepares to receive her admirers; Leon now reveals himself in his true colours, and asserts his authority over his wife in presence of her guests, notably the Duke of Medina. The duke and Margarita attempt various stratagems, but Leon defeats them, and Margarita is finally won over to his side, and joins him in fooling the duke, who at last is reconciled to Leon.

In the under-plot, Estefania, Margarita's servant, beguiles the conceited copper-captain, Michael Perez, into marrying her by posing as the owner of the absent Margarita's house. On Margarita's return, Estefania pretends that Margarita wants to borrow the house in order to play the same trick that Estefania has played on Perez. When her deceit is finally discovered, she braves it out, and wins Perez's forgiveness by cheating the vile Cacafoغو out of a thousand ducats.

Rule, Britannia: for the words see Thomson (James, 1700-48); the air was composed by Thomas Augustine Arne (1710-78) for Thomson and Mallet's mask, 'Alfred'.

Rules, see King's Bench Prison. There were Rules also outside the Fleet prison.

Rumpelstilzkin, the subject of one of Grimm's fairy tales, a little manikin who taught the miller's daughter how to spin straw into gold, so that she became the king's wife. She was required to guess the goblin's name, and overheard him say it. When he found that she had discovered it, in a fury he stamped his foot into the ground up to his waist, and then tore himself in two.

Rumwold, Sr. (c. 650), the son of one of the kings of Northumbria (perhaps Alchfrid, son of Oswy), honoured as a saint on account of the following prodigy. It is related that immediately after his baptism in infancy he began to speak and professed the Christian faith by a recital of the creed. He is commemorated on 28 August.

Rune, a letter or character of the earliest Teutonic alphabet, which was most extensively used (in various forms) by the Scandinavians and Anglo-Saxons (cf. the story by M. R. James, 'The Passing of the Runes'). Also a similar character or mark having magical or mysterious powers attributed to it. The earliest runic alphabet dates from at least the 2nd or 3rd cent., and was formed by modifying the letters of the Roman or Greek alphabet so as to facilitate cutting them upon wood or stone. The name is also applied to a Finnish poem or division of a poem, especially to one of the separate songs of the 'Kalevala' (q.v.). The word runic is used of such poetry as might be written in runes; belonging to the people or the age which made use of runes; also of ancient Scottish poetry. Also of ornament of the interlacing type, characteristic of rune-bearing monuments. [OED.]

Runnymede, on the right bank of the Thames in Surrey, where on 15 June 1215 the barons forced John to confirm Magna Carta (q.v.).

Rupert of debate, THE, Edward Stanley, fourteenth earl of Derby (1799-1869), statesman and brilliant parliamentary speaker, so named by Lord Lytton in the 'New Timon', in allusion to Prince Rupert, the celebrated cavalry leader in the Civil War. In Monypenny and Buckle's Life of Lord Beaconsfield (ii. 237) the nickname is mentioned as having been given by Disraeli in 1844 with these words, 'in his charge he is resistless, but when he returns from the pursuit he always finds his camp in the possession of the enemy'.

Rupert's drops, PRINCE, pear-shaped pieces of glass, made by dropping molten glass into water, which burst into fragments if the slender tail is broken. They were introduced into England from Germany by Prince Rupert.

Rupert of Hentzau, a novel by Anthony Hope, a sequel to his 'The Prisoner of Zenda' (q.v.).

Rural Rides, by Cobbett (q.v.), collected in 1830, descriptive of various parts of England, with agricultural and political comments. A committee in 1821 had proposed certain remedies for the agricultural distress that followed the war. Cobbett disapproved of these and 'made up his mind to see for himself, and to enforce by actual observation of rural conditions, the statements he had made in answer to the arguments of the landlords before the Agricultural Committee'. There is a new edition by Pitt Cobbett (2 vols., 1908).

Ruritania, an imaginary kingdom in central Europe, the scene of Anthony Hope's 'Prisoner of Zenda' (q.v.) and its sequel, 'Rupert of Hentzau'. The name connotes, more generally, make-believe romance, chivalry, intrigue, at a royal court in a modern European setting.

Rush, FRIAR, see Friar Rush.

RUSKIN, JOHN (1819-1900), the son of John James Ruskin, a partner in a wine business, who while sending his son to no school gave him plentiful opportunities of early travel. John Ruskin went to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1836, won the Newdigate prize in 1839, and in 1843 published anonymously the first volume of the famous 'Modern Painters' (q.v.), of which five volumes in all were issued over a period of seventeen years (his name first appeared on the title-page of the edition of 1851). His first published writings, however, were articles in Loudon's 'Magazine of Natural History' (1834) and verses contributed to 'Friendship's Offering'. The early prose pieces were reprinted in 1892 under the title 'The Poetry of Architecture', and embody principles subsequently developed in Ruskin's later works. He made the acquaintance of Turner in 1840 and of Millais in 1851. In 1849 he published his 'Seven Lamps of Architecture' (q.v.), and 'Stones of Venice' (q.v.) in 1851-3. As 'Modern Painters' was begun in defence of Turner, so in 1851 he wrote letters to 'The Times' and pamphlets conscientiously defending the Pre-Raphaelites (q.v.). From 1855 to 1859 he issued annual 'Notes on the Royal Academy', and treatises on drawing and perspective. His lectures 'On Architecture and Painting' were delivered at Edinburgh in 1853, those on 'The Political Economy of Art' at Manchester in 1857. His

RUSSELL

'Two Paths', lectures on the part that organic nature should play as a guide to art, appeared in 1859. His mind was now turning to economics, and some essays which he published on this subject in the 'Cornhill Magazine' in 1860 and in 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1862-3 aroused strong opposition by their heterodoxy. They were subsequently republished as 'Unto this Last' (q.v., 1862) and 'Munera Pulveris' (q.v., 1872). These and other treatises and pamphlets advocated a system of national education, the organization of labour, and other social reforms. He attacked the policy of non-interference by the State, and the validity of a science of political economy based on the conception of the 'economic man', actuated by no motive other than profit. Wealth, in the ordinary sense of the term, he never ceased to insist, is not the only thing worth having. His interest in social reform is again shown in his most popular work 'Sesame and Lilies' (q.v., 1865), and in 'The Crown of Wild Olive' (q.v., 1866). 'The Ethics of the Dust' (elementary lectures on crystallography) appeared in 1866, and further letters on social subjects in 'Time and Tide, by Wear and Tyne' (q.v.) in 1867. In 1871 he settled at Coniston, and in that year began his monthly letters in 'Fors Clavigera' (q.v.), 'to the workmen and labourers of Great Britain'. In the same year he founded the guild of St. George on the principles that 'food can only be got out of the ground and happiness out of honesty', and that 'the highest wisdom and the highest treasure need not be costly or exclusive'. The members of the guild were to give a tithe of their fortunes to philanthropic purposes, and to these Ruskin contributed generously from his own purse. He also engaged in several industrial experiments, including the revival of the hand-made linen industry in Langdale. He was Slade professor of art at Oxford in 1870-9 and 1883-4, and published eight volumes of lectures. His 'Praeterita' (q.v.), an autobiography which was never completed, was published at intervals during 1885-9. Ruskin was buried at Coniston. He inherited from his father a large fortune, all of which was dispersed, chiefly on philanthropic objects, before his death. There is a life of Ruskin by Alice Meynell in the 'Modern English Writers' series, on which the notices herein of his separate works are in part based.

RUSSELL, GEORGE WILLIAM (1867-1935), an Irish poet and artist, widely known under his pseudonym 'Æ', 'AE', or 'A.E.' (Russell had once signed an article 'Æon', and the compositor's difficulty in making out the word had suggested the use of the diphthong alone, for which the other more convenient forms were generally substituted). He was educated at Rathmines School and about 1899 was appointed organizer to Sir Horace Plunkett's 'Agricultural Association'. His poems, the work of a mystic, are 'the most delicate and subtle that any Irishman of our time has written' (W. B. Yeats). The production of his drama 'Deirdre' by an amateur company in 1902 was one of the early steps towards the formation of the Irish National Theatre. Russell was editor of 'The Irish Statesman' from 1923 to 1930. His other works include: 'The Divine Vision' (1904), 'New Poems' (1904), 'By Still Waters' (1906), 'The Hero in Man' (1909), 'The Renewal of Youth' (1911), 'Gods of War' (1915), 'Imaginations and Reveries' (1915), 'The Candle of Vision' (1919), 'The Interpreters' (1922), 'Midsummer Eve' (1928), 'Enchantment, and other poems' (1930).

RUSSELL, LORD JOHN, first Earl Russell (1792-1878), third son of the sixth duke of Bedford, was educated at Westminster and Edinburgh University. He entered parliament in 1813, and was a strenuous advocate of parliamentary reform until the adoption in 1832 of the Reform Bill introduced by him. He supported the repeal of the Corn Laws by Peel in 1845 and was prime minister 1846-52. He was foreign secretary in Aberdeen's ministry in 1852-3, and again under Palmerston, 1859-65, and in that capacity advocated 'Italy for the Italians'. On the death of Palmerston, Russell once more became prime minister, 1865-6. He published a 'Life of William, Lord Russell' (1819), 'Memoirs of Affairs of Europe' (1824-9), 'Memoirs of Thomas Moore' (1853-6), 'Life and Times of Charles James Fox' (1859-60), and other works. He was a very small and somewhat quaint figure, which made him a godsend to the cartoonists of 'Punch'.

RUSSELL, WILLIAM CLARK (1844-1911), was in the British merchant service from 1858 to 1866. He wrote some sixty tales of nautical adventure, of which the chief are 'John Holdsworth, Chief Mate' (1875) and 'The Wreck of the Grosvenor' (1877). Some of his contributions to the 'Daily Telegraph' on sea topics were republished in 'My Watch Below' (1882) and 'Round the Galley Fire' (1883). His writings led to improved conditions in the merchant service. Russell also wrote lives of Dampier (1889), Nelson (1890), and Collingwood (1891).

RUSSELL, SIR WILLIAM HOWARD (1820-1907), the distinguished war correspondent, served in that capacity in the Crimea (where he applied the famous phrase 'the thin red line' to the British Infantry at Balaclava, called attention to the sufferings of the troops, and inspired the work of Florence Nightingale); in the Indian Mutiny, 1858; in the American Civil War, 1861-2; at the battle of Königgrätz in 1866; in the Franco-German War of 1870; and in the Zulu War of 1879. Russell also published accounts of his travels in Canada (1863-5) and the United States (1882).

Russell, Lady, a character in Jane Austen's 'Persuasion' (q.v.).

RUY LOPEZ DE SEGURA

Russell Square, London, was built in the early 19th cent. on land of the dukes of Bedford. It figures as the residence of wealthy citizens in the novels of Thackeray, e.g. of the Osbornes in 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Rustem or RUSTUM, the principal figure in the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.), is the great Persian national hero, the son of Zal. He is represented as living during several centuries, a constant conqueror until killed by treachery in the reign of Gushtasp. A celebrated incident is his fight with Isfendiyar (q.v.), the son of Gushtasp, which lasts for two days, and ends in the death of Isfendiyar. He also fights with and defeats Afrasiab, the Turanian hero, overcomes dragons and demons, and unwittingly fights with and kills his son Sohrab. This last episode is the subject of M. Arnold's 'Sohrab and Rustum' (q.v.).

Ruth, the principal character of the Book of Ruth of the O.T. Ruth was a Moabitess, the widowed daughter-in-law of Naomi of Bethlehem, who gleaned in the fields of the wealthy Boaz, and became his wife and the ancestress of King David.

Ruth, a novel by Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in 1853.

Ruth Hilton, an orphan and a dress-maker's assistant, is seduced and heartlessly deserted by Henry Bellingham. In her distress she is taken by Thurston Benson, a dissenting minister, and his sister, into their home. The story sets forth the redemption of Ruth by her love for her child, and the gradual elevation of her character, until she succumbs to a fever caught while nursing her worthless lover. Their story is complicated by the treatment of another ethical problem. Benson, at his sister's instance, and in order to lighten Ruth's burden, advises her to pass as a widow, and in that character obtains for her employment as a governess in the house of the pharisaical and tyrannical Mr. Bradshaw. The deceit brings grievous punishment. For when Bradshaw learns Ruth's past history he brutally dismisses her, publishes the facts abroad, and renders miserable the lives of Ruth and her son.

RUTHERFORD, MARK, see White (W. H.).

Ruthwell Cross, a stone monument in Dumfriesshire, dating perhaps from the 8th cent., on which are inscribed, in runes, extracts from 'The Dream of the Rood' (q.v.). It was thrown down by the Presbyterians in 1642 and the inscriptions partly effaced. It is now safely housed in the parish church of Dalton, near Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire.

Ruy Diaz, see Cid.

RUY LOPEZ DE SEGURA, a Spanish writer on chess (1561), at the time when the game took its final development by the introduction of castling.

RYE HOUSE PLOT

Rye House Plot, THE, a conspiracy in 1683 among some of the more violent followers of Shaftesbury to seize Charles II and his brother on their return from Newmarket at the Rye House in Hertfordshire. The plot failed, but its discovery brought to light a combination of parliamentary Whigs, who, while perhaps intending no personal violence against the king, contemplated compelling him to summon a parliament. Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney were implicated in this, and were executed.

Ryecroft Papers, see Gissing.

Ryence, RIENCE, or RYONS, KING, in Malory's 'Morte Darthur', a king of north Wales, who sent a message to King Arthur that he had overcome eleven kings and trimmed his mantle with their beards, and that he lacked one beard and demanded that of King Arthur; to which Arthur made a suitable reply. Ryence was overcome and taken prisoner by Balin and Balan. The story is the subject of a ballad in Percy's 'Reliques', which was sung before Queen Elizabeth at the great entertainment at Kenilworth in 1575. Ryence is perhaps to be identified with Urien, a British god of the underworld (Rhys, 'Arthurian Legend').

SABELLIANISM

Geoffrey of Monmouth (x. 3) has a story of the giant Ritho, upon Mount Aravius, who challenged Arthur to fight, and demanded the king's beard to trim his mantle.

Rymenhild, see King Horn.

RYMER, THOMAS (1641-1713), educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, is chiefly remembered for his valuable collection of historical records, 'Foedera' (q.v., 1704-35). He wrote a play in rhymed verse, 'Edgar, or the English Monarch' (1678), but is better known for his 'Tragedies of the last age considered' (1678), in which he discussed some of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays, and for his 'Short View of Tragedy' (1692), in which he condemned 'Othello'.

Ryswick, THE TREATY OF, brought to an end in 1697 the war between the Grand Alliance (England, Holland, Austria, and Spain) and France, which had lasted since 1689. Louis XIV abandoned the Stuart cause, recognized William III as king of England, and restored his conquests, except in Alsace. It was no more than a truce, for the question of the Spanish succession loomed very near, and both sides were aware of the danger involved therein; both therefore had to take breath.

S

S.P.C.K., the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, was founded in 1698. One of its primary objects was the setting up of charitable schools for the instruction of poor children in reading, writing, and the catechism, with the addition of arithmetic for boys and sewing for girls. The Society was also a publishing agency for the dissemination of works of a Christian character.

S.P.E., the Society for Pure English (q.v.).

S.P.Q.R., initial letters of Senatus Populus-Que Romanus, 'the Senate and People of Rome'.

SS, COLLAR OF, an ornamental chain consisting of a series of S's, originally worn as a badge by adherents of the House of Lancaster. It still forms part of the official dress of certain officers. It is mentioned in the Order of the Coronation in Shakespeare's 'Henry VIII' (iv. i). OED. quotes (1407), 'A collar of gold worked with the motto Soveignez [Remember] and the letter S.'

Sabaeans, the ancient name of the people of Yemen, in south-western Arabia; from L. Sabaei for Hebrew Sheba, used in Job i. 15 of Arabian marauders.

Sabaoth, A Hebrew word meaning 'armies', 'hosts', left untranslated in the English N.T. in the phrase 'the Lord of Sabaoth', which means 'Lord of Hosts'.

Sabbath, from the Hebrew Shabbath, to rest; in the original use the seventh day of the week (Saturday) considered as the day of religious rest enjoined on the Israelites by the 4th commandment. Since the Reformation it is often applied to 'the Lord's day', i.e. the first day of the week (Sunday), observed by Christians in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ.

Sabbath, WITCHES', a midnight meeting of demons, sorcerers, and witches, presided over by the Devil, supposed in medieval times to have been held annually as an orgy or festival.

Sabbath day's journey, the distance (2,000 ammuth = 1,125 yards) which (according to Rabbinical prescription in the time of Christ) was the utmost limit of permitted travel on the Sabbath.

Sabbatical river, THE, an imaginary river, celebrated in Jewish legend, which was said to observe the Sabbath, resting (or, according to another version, flowing only) on that day.

Sabbatical Year, the seventh year, which according to Mosaic law was to be observed as a 'Sabbath' (q.v.), the land remaining untilled, and all debtors and Israelitish slaves being released.

Sabellianism, the doctrine concerning the coequality and consubstantiality of the Trinity held by the followers of Sabellius, a heresiarch of Ptolemais who lived in the 3rd cent. His chief tenet was that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one person, in three manifestations. Sabellianism came to be used as a term covering such of the unitarian doctrines as recognize the divinity of Christ.

Sablans, see Mandaeans.

Sabines, THE, an ancient people of Italy, whose lands were in the neighbourhood of Rome. They are celebrated in legend as having taken up arms against the Romans, to avenge the carrying off of their women by the latter at a spectacle to which they had been invited. Subsequently they are said to have made peace and migrated to Rome, where they settled with their new allies.

Sabra, in Richard Johnson's 'The Seven Champions of Christendom' (q.v.), the daughter of a king of Egypt, whom St. George rescued from the dragon and married.

Sabreur, LE BEAU, Joachim Murat (1767-1815), the son of an inn-keeper and a great cavalry commander, who became one of Napoleon's marshals and king of Naples, and married Napoleon's sister, Caroline. He was captured in 1815 in an attempt to recover his throne and was executed.

Sabrina, a poetic name for the river Severn (see under Estrildis). In Milton's 'Comus' (q.v.), which was presented at Ludlow Castle, Sabrina is the nymph of the Severn.

MISS SABRINA is the new schoolmistress in Galt's 'Annals of the Parish' (q.v.). 'Old Mr. Hookie, her father, had, from the time he read his Virgil, maintained a sort of introduction with the Nine Muses, by which he was led to baptize her Sabrina, after a name mentioned by John Milton in one of his works.'

Sacharissa, see Waller.

SACHS, HANS (1494-1576), shoemaker of Nuremberg, and author of a vast quantity of verse, including meistersongs and some 200 plays. He figures in Wagner's opera 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg'.

Sack, adapted from the French vin sec, 'dry wine', i.e. wine 'free from sweetness and fruity flavour'. This derivation, however, involves some difficulty, for sack was often described as a sweet wine. 'It is possible that before the recorded history of the name begins it had already been extended from the "dry" wines of a certain class to the whole class.' [OED.] The word was used as a general name for a class of white wines imported from Spain and the Canaries. It is sometimes coupled with a name indicating the place of production, e.g. Sherry-sack, (or Sherris-sack), Canary-sack. Sack was the favourite drink of Falstaff (Shakespeare, '2 Henry IV', iv. iii).

Sackerson, a famous bear kept at Paris Garden (q.v.) in Shakespeare's time. Slender tells Anne Page that he has seen him loose twenty times, and taken him by the chain ('Merry Wives', I. i).

SAD SHEPHERD

SACKVILLE, CHARLES, Lord Buckhurst, and later sixth earl of Dorset (1638-1706), a man dissipated in his youth but successful in public affairs in his maturity, was a friend and patron of poets, and was himself eulogized as a poet by Dryden and Prior. His poems include some pleasant songs (the best known is the ballad 'To all you Ladies now at Land') and mordant satires. They appeared with Sedley's (q.v.) in 1701.

SACKVILLE, THOMAS, first earl of Dorset and Baron Buckhurst (1536-1608), was son of Sir Richard Sackville. He was perhaps educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, and St. John's College, Cambridge. He was a barrister of the Inner Temple. He entered parliament in 1558, was raised to the peerage in 1567, and held a number of high official positions, including those of lord treasurer and chancellor of Oxford University. He wrote the 'Induction' and the 'Complaint of Buckingham' for the 'Mirror for Magistrates' (q.v.), and collaborated (probably writing only the last two acts) with Thomas Norton in the 'Tragedy of Gorboduc' (q.v.). His poetical works were collected in 1859.

Sacred Band, THE, a force of 300 young Theban nobles, formed to fight against Sparta in the wars that followed the rising of 379 B.C. It was specially prominent at the victories of Leuctra (371) and Mantinea (362), and was destroyed by Philip at Chaeronea (338).

Sacred College, the college of Cardinals, who form the pope's council, and elect to the papacy from their own number.

Sacred Nine, THE, the Muses (q.v.).

Sacred Wars, THE, in Greek history wars conducted by the Amphictionic Council (q.v.). The first was waged early in the 6th cent. B.C. to release Delphi from the inhabitants of the neighbouring Crisa, who levied dues on pilgrims; another, in the middle of the 4th cent. B.C., to oust Phocis from the control it had obtained over Delphi.

Sacripant, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and the 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), the king of Circassia and a lover of Angelica. He catches Rinaldo's horse, Baiardo, and rides away on it, and Rinaldo calls him a horse-thief. In Tasso's 'Secchia Rapita' ('The Rape of the Bucket'), he is a hectoring braggart. SACRIPANT figures as a magician in Peele's 'The Old Wives' Tale' (q.v.). In modern French sacripant is a rascal or blackguard.

Sad Shepherd, The, or, A Tale of Robin Hood, the last and unfinished play of Jonson (q.v.), a pastoral drama, first published in the folio of 1641.

Robin Hood invites the shepherds and shepherdesses of the Vale of Belvoir to a feast in the forest of Sherwood, but the feast is marred by the arts of the witch Maudlin. Æglamour, the Sad Shepherd, relates the loss of his beloved Earine, whom he believes drowned in the Trent. In reality Maudlin has stripped her of her garments to adorn her daughter, and shut her up in a tree as a prey for her son, the uncouth swineherd Lorel. The witch assumes the form of Maid Marian, sends away the venison prepared for the feast, abuses Robin Hood, and throws the guests into confusion. Lorel tries to win Earine but fails. The wiles of Maudlin are detected, and the huntsmen pursue her.

Saddletree, BARTOLINE, a character in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.).

Sadducees, one of the three sects (the others being the Pharisees and the Essenes, qq.v.) into which the Jews were divided in the time of Christ. According to the N.T. and Josephus, they denied the resurrection of the dead, the existence of angels, and the obligation of the traditional unwritten law. The name is apparently derived from Zadok, the high-priest of David's time.

SADE, DONATIEN ALPHONSE, Count (generally known as Marquis de) (1740-1814), a French author whose licentious writings have given his name to SADISM, a form of sexual perversion marked by a love of cruelty.

SADI, a celebrated Persian poet, born at Shiraz, said to have lived c. 1200, whose real name was Muslihu-'d-Din. He was a devout Moslem and is honoured as a saint. His principal works were the collections of verse known as the Gulistan or 'Rose-Garden', and the Bustan or 'Tree-Garden'.

Sadler's Wells, in north London, originally a hydropathic establishment at a mineral spring, developed by a Mr. Sadler in 1683. A place of entertainment was added, and in 1765 a theatre was opened. Here the pantomimist, Joseph Grimaldi (q.v.), gave his earliest performances. From 1844 to 1859 it was under the management of Mrs. Warner and Mrs. Phelps, whose Shakespeare productions are historic. The theatre was rebuilt, to a large extent by means of a grant from the Carnegie Trust, and reopened in 1931, to be for North London what the 'Old Vic' (q.v.) is for South London—a theatre where good plays can be seen at 'popular prices'.

Sæhrimnir, in Scandinavian mythology, the boar that is eaten every night by the gods in Valhalla and is every night miraculously renewed.

Saemund (11th cent.), an Icelandic scholar, erroneously supposed at one time to be the compiler of the 'Elder' or 'Poetic Edda' (see Edda).

Saga, an old Norse word meaning 'story', applied to the narrative compositions in prose that were written in Iceland or Norway during the Middle Ages. In English use it is often applied specially to those which embody the traditional history of the Icelandic families or of the kings of Norway. The Icelandic sagas are highly national and insular, in respect of the physical character of the country, the types of men and women, the conditions of life, law, and morality, which they depict. They divide themselves into two groups, the more historical, of which the 'Heimskringla' (q.v.) of Snorri and the 'Sturlunga Saga' of Sturla (q.v.) are the principal examples; and the less historical, of which the chief are: the 'Laxdaela', the story of the fascinating Gudrun and her lovers (of which we have a version in W. Morris's 'Earthly Paradise', q.v.); the 'Eyrbyggja', legends, without central plot, relating to an entire district; the 'Egla', dealing with the exploits (at Brunanburh among other places) of Egil, son of Skallagrim, the friend of Æthelstan and enemy of Eric Bloodaxe; the 'Njala', the story of the calamities brought about by the wickedness of Hallgerd, wife of Gunnar, culminating in the burning of Njal, the lawyer, and most of his family; and the 'Grettla', or the story of Grettir the Strong, a generous scapegrace, marred by a quarrelsome and unamiable temper, whose slayings and blood-feuds make him an outcast. He overcomes the ghost of the shepherd Glam, but as a result of the ghost's curse becomes haunted and unlucky, lives for many years a hunted life in remote corners of the island, still known as 'Grettir's lairs', and finally dies a miserable death. The 'Grettla' saga has been translated by William Morris and Eiríkr Magnússon, the 'Njala' by Sir George Dasent.

Sagebrush State: Nevada, see United States.

Sagittarius, the zodiacal constellation of the Archer, according to myth the centaur Cheiron (q.v.); the ninth sign of the zodiac, which the sun enters about 22 November.

Sagittary, the centaur who, according to medieval romance, fought in the Trojan army against the Greeks. In Shakespeare's 'Othello', i. i, 'Lead to the Sagittary the raised search', the name is probably that of an inn. (Cf. 'Centaur' as the name of an imaginary inn at Ephesus in 'The Comedy of Errors', i. ii.) [OED.]

Sailor William, William IV, who served in the navy from 1779 (when he was 14) to 1790.

Saint: for names with this prefix see, with the following exceptions, the names themselves.

St. Aldegonde, LORD, a character in Disraeli's 'Lothair' (q.v.).

St. Clair, MRS., a character in Miss Ferrier's 'The Inheritance' (q.v.), of which her supposed daughter, Gertrude, is the heroine.

Saint-Cyr, a village near Versailles, France, where Louis XIV, at the instigation of Mme de Maintenon, founded a convent school for young ladies of the French nobility. This in 1806 was transformed into a military school, the French Sandhurst.

St. Dunstan's, an institution for the care of British soldiers, sailors, and airmen blinded in the war of 1914-18 (or subsequent operations), founded in 1915 by Sir Arthur Pearson (himself blind). It had its commencement in St. Dunstan's Lodge, a house in Regent's Park, lent for the period of the War by the American financier, Otto Kahn.

SAINT-ÉVREMOND, CHARLES DE SAINT-DENIS DE (1616-1703), a French author, who was exiled from his own country for political reasons, and came to England, where he spent the years 1662-5 and from 1670 to his death. He was on intimate terms with the wits and courtiers of the day, and wrote essays on a variety of literary, philosophic, and other subjects, including one on English comedy (1685). Some of these were translated into English from time to time (with a character of St.-Évremond by Dryden in a collection of 1692). His Works, with a Life by Des Maizeaux, appeared in an English translation in 1714.

Saint-Germain-en-Laye, a town on the Seine, a few miles north-west of Paris, at the château of which James II held his court after his deposition.

St. Irvyne, or the Rosicrucian, see Shelley (P. B.).

St. James's Palace was built by Henry VIII on the site of an ancient hospital of St. James for leprous women. The lepers were pensioned off, and the site surrendered to Henry VIII, who built there 'a goodly manor'. Here slept Charles I on the night before his execution. After Stuart times it superseded Whitehall as the principal royal residence in London, and gave the official title to the 'Court of St. James'.

St. James's Park is mentioned by Stow as serving the two palaces of St. James's and Whitehall. From fields it was developed by Charles II in the fashion of the Dutch gardens he had seen in exile, but was remodelled on its present lines by John Nash for George IV. It is much referred to by Pepys, Evelyn, and Goldsmith. The piece of water in the Park is a relic of the course of the Tyburn stream which flowed into the Thames at Westminster.

St. James's Square was constructed soon after the restoration of Charles II on fields that were the leasehold property of the earl of St. Albans. It at once became a fashionable centre. It was at first called the Piazza, and had a large pond in the centre (Loftie).

ST. JOHN, HENRY, first Viscount Bolingbroke, see Bolingbroke (Visc.).

St. Leger, THE, an annual horse-race for three-year-old colts and fillies, held in September at Doncaster, instituted by Lt.-Gen. St. Leger in 1776.

St. Martin's-le-Grand, a street in the east central district of London, where the General Post Office long stood. It formerly enjoyed rights of sanctuary, originating from the exclusive jurisdiction granted by charter of William I to the dean and secular canons of

ST. RONAN'S WELL

St. Martin within the precincts of their college, one of the oldest monasteries in the kingdom. The premises were demolished in the 16th cent., but the sanctuary survived until the reign of James I. The bell of St. Martin's, by ordinance of Edward I, tolled the curfew in London. The parish was formerly noted as the resort of dealers in imitation jewellery.

SAINT-PIERRE, JACQUES HENRI BERNARDIN DE (1737-1814), a French writer and follower of Rousseau (q.v.), chiefly known as the author of 'Paul et Virginie' (q.v., 1787), a poetic romance of naïve and virtuous love, which obtained immense popularity. But the principal work of Bernardin was his 'Études de la Nature' (1784), the work of a poetical moralist who seeks to trace in the various phenomena of nature the hand of a beneficent Providence.

Saint-Preux, the lover of Julie in the 'Nouvelle Héloïse' of Rousseau (q.v.).

St. Ronan's Well, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1824.

In this work the author for once chose a scene of contemporary life, in the Scottish spa of St. Ronan's Well, whose idle fashionable society is satirically described: Lady Penelope Penfeather, Sir Bingo Binks, Capt. Hector Mac Turk, and so on. Against this background we have the story of two half-brothers, sons of the late earl of Etherington, who had married, first secretly abroad, and then publicly at home. The younger son bears the title, though not entitled to it, and is at bitter enmity with his elder half-brother, Francis Tyrrel. For he has basely intervened in a love-affair between Francis and Clara Mowbray, the sister of the laird of St. Ronan's, and has actually personated his brother at a midnight marriage with Clara, so that Clara finds herself wedded to a man whom she fears and detests. (Scott had intended that Francis should seduce Clara, but altered the plot in deference to James Ballantyne.) The brothers make a compact to leave Clara undisturbed and still bearing her maiden name, both undertaking never to return to Scotland; and the whole affair remains a secret. But Etherington, menaced with dispossession of the earldom by Francis, and finding that an unexpected accession of fortune will accrue to him if his marriage with Clara is acknowledged, breaks the compact and comes to St. Ronan's to demand the hand of Clara in more regular fashion. For this purpose he cunningly avails himself of the gambling vice of Clara's brother, the laird, and puts such pressure on him that Mowbray actually menaces his sister with death if she does not accept Etherington's suit. Meanwhile Francis has been active to defend Clara, and the plotter has been counterplotted and is finally exposed by the intrigue-loving old nabob, Mr. Touchwood, but too late. For the unfortunate Clara, whose mind has already been unhinged by her misfortunes, succumbs to her fresh terrors before these can be dissipated.

ST. RONAN'S WELL

One of the best characters in the book is Meg Dods, the sturdy refractory landlady of the old inn at St. Ronan's.

SAINT-SIMON, CLAUDE HENRI, Comte de (1760-1825), a distant relation of the Duc de Saint-Simon (q.v. below), and the true founder of the positivist philosophy subsequently expounded by Auguste Comte (q.v.). He put forward various projects for social and political reform and wrote many books and articles on the subject. He sought to promote international peace by creating a sort of League of Nations of Europe, and to reorganize society on a socialistic basis and by a better organization of industry and labour.

SAINT-SIMON, LOUIS DEROUVROY, Duc de (1675-1755), author of 'Mémoires' (twenty-one volumes, 1829-30, and a recent more correct edition in the 'Collection des Grands Écrivains de France'), famous for the vivid picture they give of the courts of Louis XIV and the Régent d'Orléans, and the series of character-sketches they contain.

Saint's Tragedy, The, see Kingsley (C.).

St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, was originally erected by King Stephen, and rebuilt by Edward III. In the reign of Edward VI it was assigned to the use of parliament, and the House of Commons continued to sit there until the building was destroyed by fire in 1834.

SAINTE-BEUVE, CHARLES AUGUSTIN (1804-69), French critic and poet, is famous chiefly for his critical writings in various periodicals, extending from the 'Portraits littéraires' begun in 1829, through the series of 'Causeries du lundi' (from 1850), to the 'Nouveaux lundis' of 1863-70. Sainte-Beuve was the first great French critic to break away from the dogmas of the classical school, and did much to promote the Romantic movement in France by the attention he drew to the poetry of the 16th cent. Besides some volumes of poems, Sainte-Beuve also published an important history of 'Port-Royal' (q.v.) in 1840-8, and a study of Chateaubriand (q.v.) and his circle in 1861.

SAINTE-MAURE, BENOÎT DE, see Benott.

SAINTSBURY, GEORGE EDWARD BATEMAN (1845-1933), educated at King's College School, London, and Merton College, Oxford, was a distinguished literary critic and historian, and professor of rhetoric and English literature at Edinburgh University, 1895-1915. He was the author of a large number of works on English and European literature, including a 'Short History of English Literature' (1898), 'Elizabethan Literature' (1887), 'Nineteenth-Century Literature' (1896), a 'History of Criticism' (1900-4), a 'History of English Prosody' (1906-10), a 'Short History of French Literature' (1882), and lives of Dryden, Sir Walter Scott, and Matthew Arnold. He was general editor of 'Periods of European Literature' (1897-1907), to which he contributed the sections on 'The Earlier Renaissance', 'The Flourishing of Romance', and 'The Later Nineteenth Century'. He also wrote interesting and entertaining 'Notes on a Cellar Book' (1920), 'A Letter Book' and 'A Scrap Book' (1922), &c.

SAKI, see Munro (H. H.).

Sakuntala, a celebrated Sanskrit drama by Kalidasa (q.v.).

King Dushyanta while hunting in the forest sees the maiden Sakuntala and contracts with her a summary marriage, giving her a royal ring as pledge when he leaves her. Later she sets forth to join him, but loses the ring while bathing in a pool. This has the unfortunate effect that the king does not recognize her, and she returns to the forest, where she gives birth to Bharata, the founder of a glorious race. Presently a fisherman catches a fish which has swallowed the royal ring. This is taken to the king, the spell from which he suffered is removed, and he now remembers Sakuntala, and goes to seek her.

The drama was translated by Sir W. Jones (q.v.).

Sakyamuni, one of the names of Gautama Buddha, who belonged to the Sakhya tribe.

SALA, GEORGE AUGUSTUS (1828-96), journalist, began his literary career as editor of 'Chat' in 1848, and after writing regularly for 'Household Words' (1851-6), joined the staff of the 'Daily Telegraph' in 1857. He was special correspondent of the 'Telegraph' in the American Civil War (1863) and afterwards in various countries. He published novels and books of travel.

Saladin (SALA-ED-DIN YUSUF IBN AYUB), Joseph the son of Jacob, Honour of the Faith (1137-1193), a Kurd by birth, became Sultan of Egypt about 1174, invaded Palestine, defeated the Christians, and captured Jerusalem. He was attacked by the Crusaders under Richard Cœur-de-Lion and Philip II of France and forced to conclude a truce. He appears to have been chivalrous, loyal, and magnanimous, no fanatic Moslem, nor a man of deep piety. He figures prominently in Scott's 'The Talisman' (q.v.).

The metrical 'Regimen Sanitatis Salerni', dedicated to Robert of Normandy as 'King of the English' (he had gone there to be cured of a wound after the crusade of 1099), was edited by Sir A. Croke in 1830.

Salic Law, originally a code of law of the Salian Franks, written in Latin, and extant in five recensions of Merovingian and Carolingian (qq.v.) date. It contains a passage to the effect that a woman can have no portion of the inheritance of 'Salic land', a term the meaning of which is disputed. In early use, and still in popular language, the Salic Law is the alleged fundamental law of the French monarchy by which females were excluded from succession to the crown. The claim of Edward III to the French throne was opposed on the ground of this law and the above-mentioned ancient text adduced. [OED.] Cf. Shakespeare, 'Henry V', I. i.

Sallee-man or SALLEE ROVER, a Moorish pirate-ship, from Salee, the name of a Moroccan port formerly of piratical repute.

SALLUST (GAIUS SALLUSTIUS CRISPUS) (86–35 B.C.), a Roman historian and an adherent of Caesar in the Civil war. The latter made him quaestor, and after the African war governor of Numidia, where Sallust acquired great riches. He wrote a history of the conspiracy of Catiline; 'Bellum Jugurthinum', a history of the Roman war against Jugurtha (111–106 B.C.); and 'Histories' covering the period 78–67 B.C. Of the last very little survives.

Salley in our Alley, a ballad by Carey (q.v.).

Sally Lunn, a kind of tea-cake. According to Hone ('Every-Day Book') the cakes were so called from a young woman of that name who used to cry them at Bath, at the end of the 18th cent. Dalmer, a respectable baker and musician, bought her business and made a song about her.

Salmacis, see Hermaphroditus.

Salmagundy, a dish of chopped meat, anchovies, eggs, onions, &c. The word is from the French salmigondis, of obscure origin (Rabelais has salmiguondin). 'Salmagundi' was the title of a periodical edited by W. Irving (q.v.) early in his career.

Salmantica, in imprints, Salamanca.

SALMASIUS (CLAUDE DE SAUMAISE) (1588–1653), an eminent French scholar, professor at Leyden University in 1649, when Charles II was living at The Hague. He was commissioned by Charles to draw up a defence of his father and an indictment of the regicide government. This took the form of the Latin 'Defensio Regia', which reached England at the end of 1649. Milton (q.v.) was ordered by the Council in 1650 to prepare a reply to it, and in 1651 issued his 'Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio', also in Latin. In this, instead of defending the people of England, as he purports to do, he merely heaps invective on his adversary. To this Salmasius rejoined in his

SAMIAN LETTER

'Responsio', which is similarly composed mainly of personal abuse. See also Anthology (The Greek).

Salmōnēus, a son of Aeolus and brother of Sisyphus (qq.v.). His arrogance was such that he caused sacrifices to be offered to himself and imitated the thunder of Zeus, who killed him with a thunderbolt and placed him in Tartarus.

Salmonia, see Davy (Sir H.).

Salō'mē, the daughter of Herodias (q.v.) by her first husband Herod Philip. Herod Antipas, her stepfather, enchanted by her dancing, offered her a reward 'unto the half of my kingdom'. Instructed by Herodias, Salome asked for the head of John the Baptist in a charger (see Matt. xiv). The story is the subject of a drama by Wilde (q.v.), 'Salomé' (1893), written in French, a marvel of mimetic power. The licenser of plays in the summer of 1893 refused to sanction the performance of this. It was translated into English by Wilde's friend, Lord Alfred Douglas, in 1893 (with ten pictures by Aubrey Beardsley), and afterwards formed the libretto of an opera by Richard Strauss. The original version was produced in Paris in 1896. The ban on the public performance in England was removed in 1931, and the play was produced at the Savoy Theatre, London, on 5 Oct. 1931.

Salvation Army, THE, was started as the 'Christian Mission' in Whitechapel in 1865 by William Booth (q.v.). It was converted into the 'Salvation Army' in 1878, as a consequence of Booth's accidental use of a metaphor, and reorganized on a quasi-military basis. It became a world-wide engine of revivalism, addressing itself mainly to the depressed and outcasts and setting up numerous centres for the relief of the unfortunate, not only in Great Britain, but notably in the United States, Canada, Australia, India, and Japan.

Samian letter, another name for the Pythagorean letter (see Pythagoras), so called from Samos (q.v.), the birthplace of Pythagoras.

SAMIAN WARE

Samian ware, originally pottery made of Samian earth; extended to a fine kind of pottery found extensively on Roman sites.

Samiasa, in Byron's 'Heaven and Earth' (q.v.), the seraph-lover of Aholibamah.

Samiel, the Turkish name for the Simoom, a hot, dry, suffocating wind that blows across the African and Asiatic deserts at times in spring and summer.

Samient, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. viii, the lady sent by Queen Mercilla to Adicia, the wife of the Souldan, received by her with contumely, and rescued by Sir Artegall.

Samos, a large island in the Aegean, a strong naval power under Polycrates (q.v.) in the 6th cent. B.C.; the birthplace of Pythagoras.

Samosata, an ancient town in Syria, the birthplace of Lucian (q.v.).

Samothrace, WINGED VICTORY OF, a famous statue, now in the Louvre, found in the island of Samothrace, representing a winged figure of victory as the beak or figure-head of a war-ship. It was set up in 306 B.C. to celebrate a naval victory.

Samoyed, the name of a Mongolian race inhabiting Siberia. Milton ('Paradise Lost', x. 696) refers to 'Norumbega and the Samoed-shore'.

Sampo, THE, in the 'Kalevala' (q.v.), the magic mill made by Ilmarinen (q.v.), which grinds out flour, salt, and money, and is the object of contention between the Finns and the Lapps.

Sampson, DOMINIE, a character in Scott's 'Guy Mannering' (q.v.). His favourite expression of astonishment is 'Prodigious'!

Samson Agonistes, a tragedy by Milton (q.v.), published in 1671 in the same volume as 'Paradise Regained' (q.v.). In form it is modelled on Greek tragedies. 'Samson Agonistes' (i.e. Samson the Athlete or Wrestler) deals with the last phase of the life of the Samson of the Book of Judges (xvi), when he is a prisoner of the Philistines and blind, a phase which presents a certain pathetic similarity to the circumstances of the poet himself when he wrote the play.

Samson, in the prison at Gaza, is visited by friends of his tribe, who form the Chorus, and seek to comfort him; then by his old father Manoah, who holds out hope of securing his release; then by his wife Dalila, who seeks pardon and reconciliation, but being repudiated shows herself 'a manifest serpent in the end'; then by Harapha, a strong man of Gath, who taunts Samson. He is finally summoned to provide amusement by feats of strength for the Philistine lords, who are celebrating a feast to Dagon. He goes, and presently a messenger brings news of their destruction and the death of Samson, by his pulling down of the pillars supporting the roof of the place wherein they were.

SANDALPHON

Samuel, a Hebrew prophet, the son of Elkanah, a Levite, and Hannah, brought up to the priesthood under Eli at Shiloh. After the defeat of the Israelites by the Philistines, he rallied the people, and became their ruler. But, in his old age, owing to the misgovernment of his sons, whom he had made judges, the Israelites demanded a king, and Samuel reluctantly anointed Saul. The two books of the O.T. called after him were not written by him, but cover the history of Israel from his birth to the end of the reign of David.

Sanbenito or SAMBENITE, under the Spanish Inquisition, a penitential garment of yellow cloth, resembling a scapular in shape, ornamented with a red St. Andrew's cross before and behind, worn by a confessed and penitent heretic. Also a similar garment of a black colour ornamented with flames, demons, and other devices, worn by an impenitent confessed heretic at an auto-da-fé (also called a Samarra). So called from its resemblance in shape to the scapular introduced by St. Benedict. [OED.]

Sancho Panza, the squire of Don Quixote (q.v.), who accompanies him in his adventures and shares some of their unpleasant consequences. The duke who entertains the pair, in the second part of the work, appoints Sancho Panza for a few days governor of Barataria. Sancho Panza's conversation is full of common sense and pithy proverbs.

SANCHONIATHON, an ancient Phoenician writer upon whom Philo of Byblos (in the Lebanon, fl. c. A.D. 100) claimed to have drawn for the purpose of his Phoenician history, of which there are extracts in Eusebius. It is probable that no such person as Sanchoniathon ever existed, but that he was invented by Philo.

SAND, GEORGE, the pseudonym of ARMANDINE AURORE LUCILE DUPIN, Baronne Dudevant (1804-76), French novelist. She was married young, and after some years separated from her husband. She subsequently had relations with Alfred de Musset (1833-5, see her 'Elle et Lui', 1859, and 'Lui et Elle', 1860, by Paul de Musset) and the composer Chopin, which influenced her work. Her novels divide themselves into three periods: the first (1831-4) includes 'Indiana', 'Lélia', 'Jacques', marked by freshness and a spirit of revolt against the institution of marriage; the second (1837-44) includes some of her greatest work, 'Spiridion', 'Consuelo', 'La Comtesse de Rudolstadt', 'Les Sept Cordes de la Lyre', &c., the product of her study of philosophy and politics and intercourse with great minds; and third, the period of her retirement in the country, includes her charming rustic idylls, 'La Petite Fadette', 'La Mare au Diable', &c., and her 'Histoire de ma Vie' (1854-5).

Sandabar, see Syntipas.

Sandalphon, in Jewish legend, one of the three angels who receive the prayers of the

SANDALPHON

Jews and weave them into garlands; the subject of a poem by Longfellow.

SANDBURG, CARL (1878–), American poet, born in Illinois. Sandburg is representative of what is most modern and 'free' in American verse. His chief books are: 'Chicago Poems' (1916), 'Smoke and Steel' (1920), 'The American Songbag' (1927), 'Good Morning, America' (1928).

Sandford and Merton, The History of, a children's tale by Thomas Day (q.v.), of which vol. i appeared in 1783, vol. ii in 1787, and vol. iii in 1789.

It consists of a succession of episodes in which the rich and objectionable Tommy Merton is contrasted with the virtuous Harry Sandford, a farmer's son, and the moral is drawn by the Rev. Mr. Earlow, their tutor. Its most human incident is the fight between Harry Sandford and Master Mash. It is written, without the least sense of humour, to illustrate the author's doctrine that virtue pays and that man may be made good by instruction and by appeal to his humanity and reason—the system advocated by Miss Edgeworth's father. It was translated into French before the end of the 18th cent.

A parody, 'The New History of Sandford and Merton', by F. C. Burnand, illustrated by Linley Sambourne, was published in 1872.

Sandhurst, in Berkshire, often used to signify the Royal Military College at that place, where cadets are trained for the army.

Sandra Belloni, originally entitled Emilia in England, a novel by Meredith (q.v.), published in 1864.

Emilia Sandra Belloni, a simple ardent nature, daughter of a disreputable Italian musician, and the possessor of a fine but untrained voice, leaves her wretched home and becomes the protégée of the Pole family—a city merchant, his three aspiring daughters, and his son Wilfrid, a young man of weak character inclined to 'diplomacy' in conduct of his affairs. Mr. Pericles, a rich Greek, the business ally and fellow speculator of old Pole, has a mania for discovering and developing beautiful voices, and tries to lure and bully Emilia into accepting musical training in Italy under his direction. But Emilia falls desperately in love with Wilfrid, and he with her. Old Pole, deeply involved by Pericles in speculation, is brought by him to the verge of ruin, and tries to save himself by various expedients. His daughters are to make successful matches. His son is to marry Lady Charlotte Chillingworth. He himself tampers with the money of Mrs. Chump, a rich vulgar Irish widow, whose trustee he is, and with whom he becomes moreover entangled in a project of marriage. Wilfrid, torn between his passion for Emilia and his attraction to Lady Charlotte with her worldly position and 'victorious aplomb', cuts a sorry figure, is exposed by Lady Charlotte to Emilia, and nearly breaks the latter's heart. Emilia temporarily loses her voice and is befriended by Merthyr Powys and his sister. To save the Poles from ruin, she extracts a large sum from Pericles by consenting to go to the conservatorio at Milan for training. Finally awakened to the inconstancy of Wilfrid, she holds out to Powys hopes that she will marry him after her training. The sequel of the story is in the author's 'Vittoria' (q.v.).

Sandringham, in Norfolk, near the Wash, a country seat of the king of England, on an estate purchased by Edward VII when Prince of Wales.

SANDYS, GEORGE (1578–1644), educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford, a traveller in Italy, Turkey, Egypt, and Palestine. In 1621 he went to America as treasurer of the Virginia Company and remained there till about 1626. His chief works were a verse translation of Ovid's 'Metamorphoses' (1621–6), a verse 'Paraphrase upon the Psalms' (1636), and 'Christ's Passion, a Tragedy', a verse translation from the Latin of Grotius (1640). He is of some importance in the history of English verse.

Sanger, JOHN (1816–89), the celebrated circus proprietor, began with his brother George conjuring exhibitions at Birmingham in 1845. They then started a circus entertainment at Lynn, and afterwards acquired the Agricultural Hall at Islington and in 1871 Astley's Amphitheatre in London. The brothers subsequently dissolved their partnership, each continuing independently. In his later years John Sanger was known as Lord John Sanger.

Sanglier, Sir, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. i, the wicked knight who has cut off his lady's head, and is forced by Sir Artegall to bear the head before him, in token of his shame. He is thought to represent Shane O'Neill, second earl of Tyrone (1530?–67), a leader of the Irish, who invaded the Pale in 1566. Sanglier in French means 'wild boar'.

Sangrado, Dr., a quack physician in 'Gil Blas' (q.v.), the whole of whose science consisted in bleeding his patients and making them drink hot water.

Sangreal, SANGREAL, the Holy Grail, see Grail.

Sanhedrim, more correctly SANHEDRIN, a late Hebrew word adapted from the Greek συνδριον, 'sitting together': 'the name applied to the highest court of justice and supreme council at Jerusalem, and in a wider sense also to lower courts of justice' (Hastings's 'Dictionary of the Bible'). The Great Sanhedrin is said to have consisted of seventy-one members.

SANNAZAR (JACOPO SANNAZZARO) (1458–1530), Neapolitan author and rediscoverer of the charms of nature and the rustic life, was author of a pastoral, in prose and verse, the 'Arcadia' (q.v.), and of Latin eclogues and other poems.

SANSCULOTTE

Sansculotte, in the French Revolution, a republican of the poorer classes in Paris. Usually explained as one who wore trousers (pantalon) instead of knee-breeches (culotte), but the origin is disputed.

Sansculottide, derived from the preceding word, one of the five (in leap-years six) complementary days added at the end of the month Fructidor in the Republican Calendar. These with the twelve months, each of thirty days made up the 365 (or 366) days of the year.

Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy, three brothers in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', i. ii. 25 et seq. Sansfoy ('faithless') is slain by the Red Cross Knight, who also defeats Sansjoy ('joyless'), but the latter is saved from death by Duessa. Sansloy ('lawless') carries off Una and kills her lion (i. iii). This incident is supposed to refer to the suppression of the Protestant religion in the reign of Queen Mary.

Sans Gêne, MADAME, a nickname of the wife of Marshal Lefebvre, duke of Dantzig, one of Napoleon's marshals who rose from the ranks. She was originally a washerwoman and followed her husband to the wars. She owed her nickname to her ignorance of court manners, but was shrewd and kind-hearted. Sardou (q.v.) made her the subject of a play of that name.

Sanskrit, the ancient and sacred language of India, the oldest member of the Indo-European family of languages. The extensive Hindu literature from the Vedas downward is composed in it.

Sanson, CHARLES (1740-93), executioner of the city of Paris, who put to death Louis XVI. His son and successor Henri (1767-1840) was the executioner of Marie Antoinette. Fabricated memoirs of the family were published in 1862.

Santa Casa, see Loretto.

Santa Claus, a contraction of St. Nicholas, who is supposed to come, on the night before Christmas Day, to bring presents for children. St. Nicholas was the patron saint of children, and authorities quoted by Brand ('Popular Antiquities') state that it was in many places the custom for parents on the eve of his festival (6 Dec.) to convey secretly presents to their children and pretend that they were brought by St. Nicholas. The transference of this custom to Christmas was perhaps due to a spirit of economy.

SANTAYANA, GEORGE (1863-1952), a Spaniard naturalized as an American and an eminent speculative philosopher, of a naturalist tendency and opposed to German idealism, whose views are embodied in his 'Life of Reason' (1905-6). He holds that the human mind is an effect of physical growth and organization; but that our ideas, though of bodily origin, stand on a higher and non-material plane; that the true function of reason is not in idealistic dreams but in a logical activity that takes account of facts. He analyses our religious and other institutions, distinguishing the ideal element from its material embodiment. Thus the wisdom embodied in the ritual and dogmas of religion is not truth about existence, but about the ideals on which mental strength and serenity are founded. Santayana published 'The Last Puritan', a novel, in 1935.

SAPPHO, a Greek lyric poetess, born in Lesbos probably about the middle of the 7th cent. B.C. Like her fellow-countryman and contemporary Alcaeus (q.v.), she appears to have left Lesbos in consequence of political troubles, to have gone to Sicily, and to have died there. The story of her throwing herself into the sea in despair at her unrequited love for Phaon (q.v.) is mere romance. Only fragments of her work survive, including one complete ode and four stanzas of a second. The principal subject of her poems was love, expressed always with natural simplicity, sometimes with tenderness, sometimes with passionate fire. The SAPPHIC STANZA (used by Horace with some modification of its rules) is only one of the many metres that Sappho employed. It consists of - u - u - u - u - u - u thrice repeated, and followed by - u - u - u. Such fragments of her poems as survive have been edited by E. Lobel (Oxford, 1925).

Sapsea, MR., in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.), an auctioneer and mayor of Cloisterham.

Saracen, a name whose ultimate etymology is obscure. The derivation from the Arabic sharqi, 'eastern', is not well founded. In medieval times the name was often associated with Sarah, the wife of Abraham. St. Jerome identifies the Saracens with the Hagarenes, descendants of Hagar. Among the later Greeks and Romans the name was applied to the nomadic tribes of the Syro-Arabian desert. Hence it was used for an Arab, and by extension a Mohammedan, especially with reference to the Crusades. [OED.] In the 9th and 10th cents. it was always used for Mohammedan pirates who ravaged the coasts of Italy and southern France.

Saragossa or SARAGOZA, THE MAID OF, see Maid of Saragosa.

Saratoga, near the Hudson River, the scene of the decisive victory of the American army under Gates over the British army under Burgoyne in 1777, in the American War of Independence, and of the surrender of Burgoyne and his army.

A SARATOGA is a trunk of large dimensions 'much used by ladies'. [OED.]

Sarcastic, MR. SIMON, a character in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

Sardānāpālus, the last king of Assyria, notorious according to legend for his luxury and effeminacy. Arbaces the Mede and Belesis the Chaldean conspired against him and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus thereupon quitted his effeminate pursuits, appeared at the head of his army, and defeated the rebels in three successive battles. He was at last overcome and besieged for two years in the city of Ninus. Despairing of success, he burnt himself in his palace with his concubines, eunuchs, and treasures, and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators. The real Sardanapalus was Assur-bani-pal (probably the Asnapper of Ezra iv. 10), who about the years 670-650 B.C. made two successful expeditions against Egypt, but subsequently lost his empire and perished in Nineveh, which was destroyed.

Sardanapalus, a tragedy by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1821.

It was written at Ravenna and the materials were taken from the 'Bibliotheca Historica' of Diodorus Siculus, but freely treated. Sardanapalus (see above) is represented as a luxurious but courageous monarch, cynically humorous and amiable, if not estimable. When Beleses, a Chaldaean soothsayer, and Arbaces, governor of Media, lead a revolt against him, he shakes off his sloth, and, stimulated by Myrrha, his favourite Greek slave, fights bravely in the van of his troops. Defeated, he makes provision for the safe withdrawal of his queen, Zarina, and his supporters, prepares a funeral pyre round his throne, and perishes in it with Myrrha.

SARDOU, VICTORIEN (1831-1908), French dramatist, author of 'Les Pattes de Mouche', 'La Famille Benoiton', 'Madame Sans-Gêne', 'La Tosca', &c.

Sargasso Sea, a region in the N. Atlantic, south of the 35th parallel, so named from the prevalence in it of the weed Sargassum bacciferum (from the Portuguese sargaço).

Sarmatia, used occasionally by English poets to signify Poland, though in ancient geography it extended from the Vistula to the Volga.

Sarpēdon, a Lycian prince, son, according to one story, of Zeus and Laodamia, an ally of the Trojans in the Trojan War, who was slain by Patroclus.

Sarpego, a comical pedant in Brome's 'The City Witt' (q.v.), a character modelled on Clove in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.).

Sarra, the city of Tyre in Phoenicia, celebrated for its purple dye, referred to by Milton, 'Paradise Lost', xi. 240.

Sarras, in the legend of the Grail (q.v.), the country to which Joseph of Arimathea fled from Jerusalem.

Sartor Resartus: The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh, by T. Carlyle (q.v.), originally published in 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1833-4, and as a separate volume, at Boston, Mass., in 1836; first English edition, 1838.

SATIRE MÉNIPPÉE

This work was written under the influence of the German romantic school and particularly of Jean Paul Richter (q.v.). It consists of two parts: a discourse on the philosophy of clothes (sartor resartus means 'the tailor re-patched') based on the speculations of an imaginary Professor Teufelsdröckh, and leading to the conclusion that all symbols, forms, and human institutions are properly clothes, and as such temporary; and a biography of Teufelsdröckh himself, which is in some measure the author's autobiography, particularly in the description of the village of Entepfuhl and of the German university (suggested by Ecclefechan and Edinburgh), and still more in the notable chapters on 'The Everlasting No', 'Centre of Indifference', and 'The Everlasting Yea', which depict a spiritual crisis such as Carlyle himself had experienced.

Sarum Use, the order of divine service used in the diocese of Salisbury, especially from the 13th cent. until the Reformation. The 'Sarum Missal' is a 13th-cent. compilation.

Sasanian, the name of the dynasty that ruled the Persian Empire from A.D. 226 to 651, so named from Sasan, grandson of Ardashir Babagan (q.v.), who founded the dynasty.

Sassenach, representing the Gaelic sasunnach, the name given by the Gaelic inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland to their 'Saxon' or English neighbours.

Sastri, TINA, a character in George Eliot's 'Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story' (see Scenes of Clerical Life).

Satan, from a Hebrew word śāṭān, meaning adversary, one who plots against another. In the O.T. the Hebrew word ordinarily denotes a human adversary, but in certain passages it designates an angelic being who torments, belittles, or provokes man, sometimes with the cognizance or direct authority of Jehovah (see e.g. Job i. 6-12; ii. 1-6). It is commonly used as the proper name of the supreme evil spirit, the Devil.

Satanic School, THE, Southey's designation (in the Preface to the 'Vision of Judgment', q.v.) of Byron, Shelley, and their imitators.

Satire, from the Latin satira, a later form of satura, which means 'medley', being elliptical for lanx satura, 'a full dish, a hotch-potch'. The word has no connexion with satyr, as was formerly often supposed. A satire is a poem, or in modern use sometimes a prose composition, in which prevailing vices or follies are held up to ridicule. [OED.]

Satire Ménippée, a bold and original French satire, published in 1594, directed against the Catholic League (headed by the Guises and having as its object the overthrow of the heretical Henry IV). It was written by seven men, otherwise undistinguished, Leroy, Gillot, Passerat, Rapin, Chrestien, Pithou, and Durant; and takes the form of a burlesque account of the opening of the assembly of the estates at Paris, referring sarcastically to private and public actions of the leaders of the league. The title is taken from the name of Menippus, the cynic philosopher, author of satires, celebrated by Lucian.

Sattromastix, or The Untrussing of the Humorous Poet, a comedy by Dekker (q.v.), printed in 1602.

Jonson in his 'Poetaster' (q.v.) had satirized Dekker and Marston, under the names of Crispinus and Demetrius, while he himself figured as Horace. Dekker here retorts, bringing the same Horace, Crispinus, and Demetrius on the stage once more. Horace is discovered sitting in a study laboriously composing an Epithalamium, and at a loss for a rhyme. Crispinus and Demetrius enter and reprove him gravely for his querulousness. Presently Capt. Tuca (of the 'Poetaster') enters, and turns effectively on Horace the flow of his profanity. Horace's peculiarities of dress and appearance, his vanity and bitterness, are ridiculed; and he is finally untrussed and crowned with nettles.

The satirical part of the play is set in a somewhat inappropriate romantic setting—the wedding of Sir Walter Terill at the court of William Rufus, and the drinking of poison (as she thinks) by his wife, Caelestina, but really of a sleeping-potion, to escape the king's attentions.

Saturday Review, The, a weekly periodical started in the Liberal interest in 1855. Among the many brilliant contributors of its early days were Sir H. Maine, Sir J. F. Stephen, J. R. Green, Freeman, and later Hardy, G. B. Shaw, and Max Beerbohm (qq.v.).

Saturn, an ancient Italian god of agriculture, subsequently identified with the Cronos (q.v.) of Greek mythology. He was thought to have been an early king of Rome, where he civilized the people and taught them agriculture. His reign was so mild and beneficent that it was regarded as the Golden Age.

Saturnalia, an ancient Roman festival held in December in honour of Saturn and (originally) to celebrate the sowing of the crops. It was a period of general festivity, licence for slaves, giving of presents, lighting of candles, the prototype, if not the origin, of our Christmas festivities.

Saturnian Age, the Golden Age, the Saturnia regna of the Roman poets. See Saturn.

Saturnian metre, the metre used in early Roman poetry, before the introduction of the Greek metres. It depended on the arrangement of accented syllables, but what this arrangement was is still disputed, though a considerable number of Saturnian lines have been preserved.

Satyr, in Greek mythology, one of a class of woodland spirits, in form partly human, partly bestial, supposed to be the companions of Dionysus (q.v.). In Greek art of the pre-Roman period the satyr was represented with the tail and ears of a horse. Roman sculptors assimilated it in some degree to the faun of their native mythology, giving it the ears, tail, and legs of a goat, and budding horns. Cf. the two mentions of satyrs in Isaiah, 'owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there' (xiii. 21), and 'the satyr shall cry to his fellow' (xxxiv. 14). The Hebrew word in these passages means a 'he-goat', perhaps some demon of popular superstition believed to have goat-like form.

The chorus of the Greek satyric drama (q.v.) was composed of satyrs. The confusion between satyric and satiric (see Satire) occasioned in the 16th–17th cents. the frequent attribution to the satyrs of censoriousness as a characteristic quality. [OED.]

Satyrane, SIR, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (i. vi), a knight, 'plain, faithful, true, and enemy of shame', son of a satyr and the nymph Thyamis. He rescues Una from the satyrs, perhaps symbolizing the liberation of the true religion by Luther.

Satyric Drama, the fourth play in the tetralogy of the ancient Greeks, a semi-serious, semi-mocking presentation of a legendary theme. The 'Cyclops' of Euripides (q.v.) is the only complete extant satyric drama.

Satyricon, see Petronius.

Saul, (1) the first king of Israel (1 Samuel x, in verse 11 of which occurs the question, 'Is Saul also among the prophets?'); (2) Saul of Tarsus, afterwards St. Paul (Acts vii. 58 and the following chapters).

Saul, DEAD MARCH IN, the celebrated Dead March included in Handel's oratorio, 'Saul', produced in London in 1739.

Saunderson, MRS., see Betterton (Mrs.).

Sauterne, a white wine of the Bordeaux region.

Savage, CAPTAIN, a character in Marryat's 'Peter Simple' (q.v.), the first captain under whom the hero serves.

SAVAGE, RICHARD (d. 1743), probably of humble birth, claimed to be the illegitimate son of the fourth Earl Rivers and of the wife of the second earl of Macclesfield. The romantic story of his birth and ill-treatment as given in Samuel Johnson's long and interesting life of him is now generally disbelieved. He wrote several second-rate comedies and poems, including 'The Wanderer' (q.v., 1729) and 'The Bastard' (1728), a censure on his supposed mother, the first part of which, at any rate, is vigorous and effective, and contains the often-quoted line, 'No tenth transmitter of a foolish face'. He applied unsuccessfully for the post of poet laureate, but obtained a pension from Queen Caroline on condition of celebrating her birthday annually in an ode. He was condemned to death in 1727 for killing a gentleman in a tavern brawl, but was pardoned. He died in great poverty.

SAVIGNY, FRIEDRICH KARL VON (1779-1861), professor of Roman law at Berlin, was author of the great 'Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter' (1815-31), a work that has had an important influence on the study of the history of law, and among others on F. W. Maitland (q.v.), who began, but did not complete, a translation of it.

SAVILLE, GEORGE, marquess of Halifax (1633-95), one of the first writers of political pamphlets, is chiefly remembered for his 'Character of a Trimmer' (1688), a brilliant piece of writing, in which he urged Charles II to free himself from the influence of his brother. His political tracts (which include his subtle piece of argument, 'The Anatomy of an Equivalent', 1688) were reprinted in 1898. He also wrote some pleasant essays under the title of 'A Lady's Gift, or Advice to a Daughter' (1688). His other works include 'A Letter to a Dissenter upon Occasion of His Majesties late Gracious Declaration of Indulgence' (1686), and 'A Character of King Charles II' (printed with 'Political, Moral, and Miscellaneous Reflexions' in 1750). He saved the throne in 1679-81 by his resolute opposition to the Exclusion Bill. He is the 'Jotham' of Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.).

SAVILLE, SIR HENRY (1549-1622), educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, and a fellow and subsequently warden of Merton College and provost of Eton. He was secretary of the Latin tongue to Queen Elizabeth, and one of the scholars commissioned to prepare the authorized translation of the Bible. He translated the 'Histories' of Tacitus (1591) and published an edition of St. Chrysostom (1610-13) and of Xenophon's 'Cyropaedia' (1613). Savile assisted Bodley in founding his library and established the SAVILIAN PROFESSORSHIPS of geometry and astronomy at Oxford. He left a collection of manuscripts, now in the Bodleian Library.

Saviour's Church, St., Southwark, originally the church of the priory of St Mary Overy, is interesting in a literary connexion as containing the effigy of Gower and the burial-places of Fletcher and Massinger (qq.v.). The Harvard chapel commemorates John Harvard (q.v.), from whom Harvard University takes its name. The church is now the cathedral of the diocese of Southwark.

Savonarola, FRA GIROLAMO (1452-98), Dominican monk, an eloquent preacher whose sermons at Florence gave expression to the religious reaction against the artistic licence and social corruption of the Renaissance. Savonarola was leader of the democratic party in Florence after the expulsion of the Medici, and aroused the hostility of Pope Alexander VI by his political attitude in favour of Charles VIII of France. His influence was gradually undermined, and he was tried, condemned, and executed as a heretic. There is a careful study of his character in G. Eliot's 'Romola' (q.v.).

Savoy, THE, a precinct between the Strand, London, and the river, so called from having been given by Henry III in 1246 to Peter of Savoy, his wife's uncle, who built a palace there. Here King John of France resided when a prisoner in England (1357). The palace was destroyed by fire in Wat Tyler's insurrection, and was restored as a hospital of St. John the Baptist in Henry VII's reign. The manor, after passing through various hands, reverted to the Crown. The hospital was dissolved in 1702, and a military prison installed in its place. The buildings (with the exception of the ancient chapel) were finally demolished early in the 19th cent., when Waterloo Bridge was constructed.

Savoy Operas, see Gilbert and Sullivan.

Savoyard, (1) a native or inhabitant of Savoy (Savoyards were formerly well known in other countries as musicians itinerating with hurdy-gurdy and monkey); (2) a member of the D'Oyly Carte Company which originally performed the Gilbert and Sullivan operas at the Savoy Theatre.

Sawney, a Scottish local variant of Sandy, short for Alexander, a derisive nickname for a Scotsman.

Sawyer, Bob, a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

SAXE, JOHN GODFREY (1816-87), American poet, born in Vermont, remembered for his connexion with the Knickerbocker group of writers (see Knickerbocker Magazine), and for his once popular 'New Rape of the Lock' (1847).

SAXO GRAMMATICUS, a Danish historian (13th cent.), author of 'Gesta Danorum', a history of the Danes in Latin, partly mythical. This contains the legend of Hamlet.

Saxon, the name of a Germanic people which in the early centuries of the Christian era dwelt in a region near the mouth of the Elbe, and of which one portion, distinguished as ANGLO-SAXONS, conquered and occupied certain parts of south Britain in the 5th and 6th cents., while the other, the OLD SAXONS, remained in Germany. It has been conjectured that the name may have been derived from saxo, the name of the weapon used by the Saxons. The name Anglo-Saxon (q.v.) was extended to the entire Old English people and language before the Norman Conquest. [OED.]

Saxon shore, THE, the eastern and southern coasts of England from the Wash to Shoreham (or, according to some, only to the South Foreland) which in the 4th cent. were exposed to the attacks of Saxon raiders and were governed by a military officer known as the Comes or Count of the Saxon shore.

SAYERS

SAYERS, DOROTHY LEIGH (1893-), author of 'The Nine Tailors' (1934) and other detective stories.

Sayers, Tom (1826-65), the pugilist, was a bricklayer by profession. He began his pugilistic career in 1849, when he beat Crouch at Greenhithe. He won the champion's belt in 1857. His last fight was with the American, John C. Heenan (the Benicia Boy, q.v.), at Farnborough in 1860, declared a draw.

Scævōla, GAIUS MUCIUS, a legendary Roman famous for his courage and firmness. When Porsenna was besieging Rome, Scævola introduced himself into the enemy's camp with a view to assassinating the king. Being seized and threatened with death, he laid his hand on an altar of burning coal to prove his fortitude, and told the king that there were 300 Roman youths prepared to take his life. Porsenna, amazed at Scævola's courage, released him, and in fear for his own life withdrew his army and made proposals of peace.

Scala, CANE GRANDE DELLA, usually known as CAN GRANDE (1291-1329), prince of Verona, famous as the patron of Dante (q.v.).

Scald, see Skald.

Scales, GERALD, a character in Bennett's 'The Old Wives' Tale' (q.v.).

SCALIGER, JOSEPH JUSTUS (1540-1609), the son of Julius Caesar Scaliger (q.v.), was the greatest scholar of the Renaissance; he has been described as 'the founder of historical criticism'. His edition of Manilius (1579) and his 'De Emendatione Temporum' revolutionized ancient chronology by insisting on the recognition of the historical material relating to the Jews, the Persians, the Babylonians, and the Egyptians. He reconstructed the lost chronicle of Eusebius in his 'Thesaurus Temporum'. He also issued critical editions of many classical authors. He incurred the enmity of the Jesuits and retired from France to Lausanne in 1572, and subsequently to Leyden. He was attacked in his old age by Gaspar Scioppius on behalf of the Jesuits, who contested the claim of the Scaligers to belong to the Della Scala family.

SCALIGER, JULIUS CAESAR (1484-1558), born at Riva on the Lago di Garda, settled at Agen in France as a physician. Besides polemical works directed against Erasmus (1531), he wrote a long Latin treatise on poetics, scientific commentaries on botanical works, and a philosophical treatise ('Exercitationes' on the 'De Subtilitate' of Cardan). These show encyclopaedic knowledge and acute observation, marred by arrogance and vanity. He claimed to belong to the princely family of Della Scala.

Scallop-shell, the badge of the pilgrim. Pilgrims returning from the shrine of St. James at Compostella were accustomed to wear a scallop-shell found on the Galician shore; hence this shell (in ecclesiastical symbolism used as the emblem of the apostle) is often referred to as the distinctive badge of the pilgrim.

Scamander, a river of Asia Minor, flowing into the sea near Troy. Homer calls it Xanthos (yellow), and in the 'Iliad' (xxi) describes the great fight of Achilles with the river, in which the hero would have been overcome had not Hephaestus sent fire and driven the river back.

Scandalum magnatum, medieval Latin, meaning 'Scandal of magnates'; the utterance of a malicious report against any person holding a position of dignity. The term was suggested by the wording of the statute of 2 Richard II (repealed in 1887) which provided penalties for the offence.

Scanderbeg, the Turkish appellation of George Castriot (1403-67), the son of the hereditary prince of a district in Albania. He was brought up as a hostage at the court of the Sultan Amurath (Murad II), and became the successful champion of Albanian independence, and for many years resisted the forces of the Ottoman Empire.

Scandinavia, a geographical term including Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The name, which appears in the existing text of Pliny, is a mistake for Scadinavia, an adaptation of the Teutonic Skadinauja, the name of the southern extremity of Sweden. The terminal element is auja, island.

Scapagoat, a word apparently invented by Tindale (1530) to express what he believed to be the literal meaning of the Hebrew 'azāzēl in Lev. xvi. 8, 10, 26, an interpretation now regarded as inadmissible. The word does not appear in the Revised Version of 1884, which has 'Azazel' as a proper name and 'dismissal' in the margin as an alternative reading. The word is used for that one of two goats which, in the Mosaic ritual of the Day of Atonement, was chosen by lot to be sent alive into the wilderness, the sins of the people having been symbolically laid upon it, while the other was appointed to be sacrificed. [OED.]

Scapin, in the 'Fourberies de Scapin' of Molière (q.v.), the type of rascally resourceful servant who gets out of difficulties by his audacious lies. One of these gives the occasion for a much quoted phrase. In order to extract a sum of money needed by his young master from his avaricious father, he tells the latter a cock-and-bull story of the son's having gone on board a Turkish galley, been carried to sea, and held to ransom. The father, gradually convinced by Scapin's eloquence that he will have to produce the ransom, constantly reverts to the question, 'Mais que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?' The phrase and the scene were taken by Molière from 'Le Pédant Joué' (ii. iv) of Cyrano de Bergerac (q.v.).

Scaramouch, adaptation of the Italian scaramuccia meaning 'skirmish', a stock character in Italian farce, a cowardly and foolish boaster, who is constantly cudgelled by Harlequin. The character was intended in ridicule of the Spanish don, and was dressed in Spanish costume, usually black. The clever impersonation of the part by Tiberio Fiorelli, who brought his company of Italian players to London in 1673, rendered the word very popular in England during the last quarter of the 17th cent. [OED.] A comedy entitled 'Scaramouch', by Edward Ravenscroft, was produced in 1677.

Scarborough warning, very short notice, or no notice at all. The origin of the phrase is unknown. The statement of Fuller, that it is an allusion to the surprise of Scarborough by Thomas Stafford in 1557, is disproved by its occurrence in John Heywood's 'Proverbs' (1546).

Scarlet, or SCADLOCK, or SCATHELOCKE, WILL, one of the companions of Robin Hood (q.v.).

Scarlet Letter, The, a novel by Hawthorne (q.v.), published in 1850.

The scene of the story is Boston, in the Puritan New England of the 17th cent. To this place an aged and learned Englishman has sent his young wife, intending to follow her, but captivity among the Indians has delayed him for two years. He arrives to find her, Hester Prynne, in the pillory, with a babe in her arms. She has refused to name her lover, and has been sentenced to this ordeal and to wear for the remainder of her life the red letter A, signifying adulteress, upon her bosom. The husband assumes the name of Roger Chillingworth and obtains from Hester an oath that she will conceal his identity. Hester takes up her abode on the outskirts of the town, an object of contempt and insult, with her child, Pearl. Her ostracism opens for her a broader view of life, she devotes herself to works of mercy, and gradually wins the respect of the townsfolk. Roger Chillingworth, in the character of a physician, applies himself to the discovery of her paramour. Hester's lover is, in fact, the Rev. Arthur Dimmesdale, a young and highly revered minister whose lack of courage has prevented him from declaring his guilt and sharing Hester's punishment. The author traces the steps by which Chillingworth discovers him, the cruelty with which he fastens on and tortures him, and at the same time the moral degradation that this process involves for Chillingworth himself. When Dimmesdale at the end of seven years is reduced to the verge of lunacy and death, Hester, emancipated by her experience, proposes to him that they shall flee to Europe, and for a moment he dallies with the idea. But he puts it from him as a temptation of the Evil One, makes public confession on the pillory which had been the scene of Hester's shame, and dies in her arms.

Scarlet Woman, THE, an abusive term applied to the Roman Catholic Church in allusion to Rev. xvii. 1-5.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE

SCARRON, PAUL (1610-60), a French burlesque dramatist and novelist, deformed and paralysed in his lower limbs, who in 1652 married Françoise d'Aubigné, later the celebrated Mme de Maintenon (q.v.).

Scatcherd, ROGER, LOUIS, and MARY, characters in Trollope's 'Dr. Thorne' (q.v.).

Scavenger's Daughter, see Sheffington's Daughter.

Scazon, from a Greek word which means limping, halting, a modification of the iambic trimeter in which a spondee or trochee is substituted for the final iambus. It is also called Choliamb.

Scenario, a sketch or outline of the plot of a play or film, giving particulars of the scenes, situations, &c.

Scenes of Clerical Life, a series of three tales by George Eliot (q.v.), published in two volumes in 1858, after having appeared in 'Blackwood' in the previous year.

The first of these is 'The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton', the sketch of a commonplace clergyman, the curate of Shepperton, without learning, tact, or charm, underpaid, unpopular with his parishioners, who earn their affection by his misfortune—the loss from overwork and general wretchedness of his beautiful gentle wife, Milly.

The second is 'Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story', the tale of a man whose nature has been warped by a tragic love experience. Maynard Gilfil was parson at Shepperton before the days of Amos Barton. He had been the ward of Sir Christopher Cheverel and his domestic chaplain, and had fallen deeply in love with Caterina Sastri (Tina), the daughter of an unlucky Italian singer, whom the Cheverels had adopted. But Capt. Anthony Wybrow, the heir of Sir Christopher, a shallow selfish fellow, had made love to Tina and won her heart. On his part it was little more than a flirtation, and at his uncle's bidding he had thrown her over for the rich Miss Assher. The strain of this and various aggravating circumstances brought Tina's passionate nature to the verge of lunacy. All this Gilfil had watched with sorrow and unabated love. Tina rallied for a time under his devoted care and finally married him, but died in a few months, leaving Gilfil like a tree lopped of its best branches.

The third tale is 'Janet's Repentance', the story of a conflict between religion and irreligion, and of the influence of a sympathetic human soul. The Rev. Edgar Tryan, an earnest evangelical clergyman, comes to the neighbourhood of Milby, an industrial town sunk in religious apathy, which the scanty ministrations of the avaricious old curate, Mr. Crewe, do nothing to stir. His endeavour to remedy this condition is opposed with the utmost vigour and bitterness by a group of inhabitants led by Dampster, a hectoring drunken brute of a lawyer, who beats and bullies his long-suffering wife, Janet, until he drives her to seek solace in drink. She shares her husband's prejudices against the methodistical innovator, until she discovers in him a sympathetic fellow sufferer. Her husband's ill-treatment, which culminates in an act of gross brutality, causes her to appeal to Tryan for help, and under his guidance her struggle against the craving for drink begins. Dempster dies of delirium tremens, and Janet gradually achieves self-conquest. The death of Tryan from consumption leaves her bereaved, but strengthened for a life of service.

Sceptic, in philosophy, originally a follower of the school of Pyrrho (q.v.); popularly applied to one who maintains a doubting attitude with reference to some particular question or to assertions of apparent fact.

Schamir, in Rabbinical and medieval myth, the impersonation of a mysterious force which enabled Solomon to build his temple without the use of iron. It is sometimes represented as a worm. It can shatter stones, paralyse, or restore to life. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') thinks that in its various forms it represents the lightning.

Scheherazade or SHAHRAZAD, in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), the daughter of the vizir of King Shahriyar, who married the king, and escaped the death that was the usual fate of his wives by telling him the tales which compose that work, interrupting them at an interesting point, and postponing the continuation till the next night.

SCHELLING, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH VON (1775-1854), German philosopher, a professor of philosophy at Jena (1798), afterwards secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts at Munich, and finally teacher of philosophy at Berlin. He was a disciple at first of Fichte (q.v.), but soon departed from his doctrine. Unlike Fichte, Schelling makes the universe rather than the ego the element of reality. Nature, obedient to the laws of human intelligence, is a single living organism working towards self-consciousness, a faculty dormant in inanimate objects and fully awake only in man, whose being consists in 'intellectual intuition' of the world he creates. Schelling's numerous works include 'Vom Ich als Prinzip der Philosophie' (1795), 'Von der Weltseele' (1798), and 'System des transcendentalen Idealismus' (1800). In his later writings his philosophy took a more religious tinge.

SCHILLER, JOHANN CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH VON (1759-1805), German dramatist and lyric poet, the son of an army surgeon, and the chief figure of the 'Sturm und Drang' (q.v.) period of German literature. Schiller first came into prominence and struck the note of revolt in his prose drama, 'Die Räuber' ('The Robbers', 1781), in which Karl von Moor the heroic robber, who takes to the woods to redress the evils of his father's court, is contrasted with the stage villain, his wicked brother, in a series of extravagant incidents. The crudities which marred this play disappear in great measure in Schiller's next great dramatic work, the blank-verse 'Don Carlos' (1787); but he reached the summit of his dramatic power in the long historical tragedy 'Wallenstein' (1799), composed of three parts: 'Wallenstein's Camp', 'The Piccolomini', and 'Wallenstein's Death' (translated into English verse by S. T. Coleridge in 1800). This treatise of the treasonable attempt of Wallenstein (the Emperor's great general and opponent of Gustavus Adolphus) to overthrow the Emperor, an attempt that is defeated by the murder of the traitor. 'Wallenstein' was followed by 'Maria Stuart' in 1800, 'Die Jungfrau von Orléans' (Joan of Arc) in 1801, 'Die Braut von Messina' (on the theme of the passion of two brothers for the same woman) in 1803, and 'Wilhelm Tell' in 1804.

Schiller was no less great as a writer of reflective and lyrical poems and of ballads, and his best work of this kind belongs to the period of his intimacy with Goethe, dating from 1794. Among the more notable of these poems are 'Das Ideal und das Leben', 'Der Taucher', 'Die Klage der Ceres', and 'Die Glocke', a work immensely popular in Germany, in which the process of casting a bell forms the symbolic centre in the presentation of the chequered life of man. Mention should also be made of the earlier 'Die Künstler', a poem on the humanizing influence of art.

Schiller was also author of philosophical and historical works, of which the most important are the 'Philosophische Briefe' (1786), and histories of the Revolt in the Netherlands (1788) and the Thirty Years War (1789-93). Schiller was appointed professor of history at Jena in 1789.

Schism, THE GREAT, the state of divided allegiance in the Western Church due to the election of rival Italian and French popes (Urban VI and Clement VII) in 1378. It was ended in 1417 by the Council of Constance, but other schisms followed till 1448.

SCHLEGEL, AUGUST WILHELM VON (1767-1845), a German Romanticist, chiefly known in England for his translation into the German language, with the assistance of his wife and others, of the plays of Shakespeare.

SCHLEGEL, FRIEDRICH VON (1772-1829), younger brother of August Wilhelm von Schlegel (q.v.), notable for his studies of the history of literature ('Geschichte der griechischen Poesie' and 'Geschichte der alten und neuen Litteratur'), and especially for his recognition of the importance of the ancient Hindoo poetry ('Sprache und Weisheit der Indier', 1808).

Schlemihl, PETER, in the story or allegory by Chamisso (q.v.), the impecunious young man who surrendered his shadow to the devil, a thin elderly gentleman in a grey coat, in exchange for a purse of Fortunatus. The lack of shadow exposes Peter to disagreeable remark, and in spite of his wealth he finds himself an outcast from human society.

Schleemann, HEINRICH (1822-90), born in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, the celebrated German archaeologist who excavated Troy, Tiryns, and Mycenae. He was engaged during the early part of his life in commerce, mainly in Russia, and did not begin archaeological work until nearly fifty years of age. His excavation of Troy was carried out in the years 1870-82.

Scholar-Gipsy, The, a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.), published in 1853.

The poem, pastoral in setting, is based on an old legend, narrated by Glanvill (q.v.) in his 'Vanity of Dogmatising', of an 'Oxford scholar poor' who, tired of seeking preferment, joined the gipsies to learn their lore, roamed the world with them, and still haunts the Oxford countryside. With this is woven a wonderful evocation of that landscape, and reflections on the contrast between the concentration and faith of the scholar-gipsy and this strange disease of modern life,

With its sick hurry, and divided aims.

Scholasticism, or the doctrines of the Schoolmen (q.v.), the predominant theological and philosophical teaching of the period 1100-1500, in the main an attempt to reconcile Aristotle with the Scriptures, reason with faith. In the 14th cent., after Ockham, scholasticism, as an intellectual movement, had exhausted itself. It degenerated into an endless discussion of logical futilities, completely divorced from the realities of life. The term is also used of a narrow and unenlightened insistence on traditional doctrines and forms of exposition.

Scholemaster, The, see Ascham.

School for Scandal, The, a comedy by R. B. Sheridan (q.v.), produced in 1777.

In this play, his masterpiece, the author contrasts two brothers, Joseph Surface the hypocrite, and Charles Surface the good-natured reckless spendthrift. Charles is in love with Maria, Sir Peter Teazle's ward, and his affection is returned; and Joseph is courting her for her fortune, while at the same time making love to Lady Teazle. Sir Peter, an old man who has married a young wife six months before, is made miserable by her frivolity. The scandal-mongers, Sir Benjamin Backbite, Lady Sneerwell, and Mrs. Candour, who 'strike a character dead at every word', provide the background and give occasion for Sir Peter's classic remark, on leaving their company, 'Your ladyship must excuse me. . . . But I leave my character behind me.' Sir Oliver Surface, the rich uncle of Joseph and Charles, returns unexpectedly from India and decides to test the characters of his nephews before revealing himself. He visits Charles in the character of a moneylender, and Charles light-heartedly sells him the family pictures, but refuses to sell at any price the portrait of 'the ill-looking little fellow over the settee', who is Sir Oliver himself, and thus wins the old man's heart. Meanwhile Joseph receives a visit from Lady Teazle in his library and insidiously attempts to seduce her. The sudden arrival of Sir Peter obliges Lady Teazle to hide behind a screen, where she is put to shame by hearing proof of Sir Peter's generosity to her, though he suspects an attachment between her and Charles. The arrival of Charles sends Sir Peter in turn to cover. Sir Peter detects the presence of a woman behind the screen, but is told by Joseph that it is a little French milliner, and takes refuge in a cupboard. The conversation between Joseph and Charles proves to Sir Peter that his suspicion of Charles was unfounded, and the throwing down of the screen reveals Lady Teazle. Scarcely is this revelation of Joseph's hypocrisy accomplished than Sir Oliver visits him in the character of a needy but deserving relative applying for assistance, which Joseph refuses on the plea of the stinginess of his uncle. This completes the exposure of Joseph. Charles is united to Maria, and Sir Peter is reconciled to Lady Teazle.

Schools of Abuse, see Gosson.

Schoolmen, the succession of writers, from about the 11th to the 15th cent., who treat of logic, metaphysics, and theology, as taught in the 'schools' or universities of Italy, France, Germany, and England, that is to say on the basis of Aristotle and the Christian Fathers, whom the schoolmen endeavoured to harmonize. Among the great Schoolmen were Peter Lombard, Abélard, Albertus Magnus, Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and Ockham (qq.v.).

Schoolmistress, The, see Shenstone.

SCHOPENHAUER, ARTHUR (1788-1860), whose father died a lunatic and who himself suffered from the mania of persecution, was the author of a pessimistic philosophy embodied in his 'Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung' (1819, 'The World as Will and Representation'). According to this, Will, of which we have direct intuition, is the 'thing-in-itself', the only reality. Will, which is self-conscious in man, finds its equivalent in the unconscious forces of nature. Will, then, it is that creates the world; and the world is not only an illusion but a malignant thing, which inveigles us into reproducing and perpetuating life. Asceticism, and primarily chastity, are the duty of man, with a view to terminating the evil. Egoism, which manifests itself principally in the 'will to live', must be overcome. Its opposite is compassion, the moral law, based on the intuition of the essential identity of all beings. God, free-will, and the immortality of the soul, are illusions.

SCHREINER, OLIVE EMILIE ALBERTINA (1855-1920), born in Cape

SCHREINER

Colony, came to England in 1881 and published under the pseudonym 'Ralph Iron' in 1883 the most successful of her works, 'The Story of an African Farm'. Her 'Women and Labour' appeared in 1911, and an uncompleted novel 'From Man to Man' posthumously in 1926. She married in 1894 a South African politician, Samuel Cron Cronwright, who wrote an introduction to this last work.

Schubert, FRANZ PETER (1797-1828), the Austrian composer, who in his short life produced several operas, ten symphonies, and much other music. He was one of the greatest of song-writers and composed more than 500 songs ('Erlkönig', 'The Trout', 'The Wanderer', &c.).

Scipio Africanus Major, PUBLIUS CORNELIUS (236/5-c. 183 B.C.), the conqueror of Spain, and of Hannibal at the battle of Zama (202 B.C.), and one of the greatest of the Romans. When accused of peculation and brought to trial in 185 he proudly reminded the people that it was the anniversary of the battle of Zama and triumphantly brushed aside the charge. It is recorded of him that he refused to see a beautiful Spanish princess who had fallen into his hands after the taking of Carthago Nova, and not only restored her to her parents but added presents for the person to whom she was betrothed.

How he surmised of Africa dismissed,

In his prime youth, the fair Iberian maid.
(Milton, 'Paradise Regained', II. 199.)

Sciron, a legendary robber in Attica, who waylaid travellers, compelled them to wash his feet, robbed them, and finally threw them down from the 'Scironian rocks' (near Megara) into the sea. He was destroyed by Theseus.

SCOGAN, HENRY (1361?-1407), a poet and a correspondent of Chaucer, to whom the latter addressed an 'envoy' or verse epistle. He was tutor to four sons of Henry IV. He is referred to by Leland as a man given to all sorts of jocoseness and wit, by Shakespeare in '2 Henry IV', III. ii, and by Jonson in 'The Fortunate Isles'.

Scogan, JOHN, a celebrated jester of Edward IV, whose exploits, real or imagined, are recorded in 'The Geystes of Skoggan' (1565-6).

Scone stone, a stone supposed to have been brought to Scone in Scotland from Tara in Ireland, and used as the coronation stone of the Scottish kings. Edward I had it removed to Westminster Abbey, where it was placed under the coronation chair, and still remains. In Irish legend the stone of Tara was said to be that on which Jacob rested his head at Bethel.

Scott, MICHAEL and REGINALD, see Scott.

Scotist, a follower or disciple of Duns Scotus (q.v.), whose system was in many respects opposed to that of Thomas Aquinas. The followers of the latter were known as 'Thomists'.

SCOTT

Scotland Yard, in Whitehall, near Charing Cross, London, where formerly stood 'great buildings for receipt of the kings of Scotland and other estates of that country', and where Margaret queen of Scots, sister of Henry VIII, 'had her abiding' (Stow) when she paid a visit to London before her marriage with the earl of Angus. It was the headquarters of the Metropolitan Police c. 1842-90; since 1890 these have been New Scotland Yard, near Westminster Bridge.

Scots Musical Museum, a collection of Scots songs published by James Johnson (d. 1811) in five volumes, 1787-1803. Burns (q.v.) took an important part in the editing, and contributed two songs to vol. i. Lady Anne Lindsay's 'Auld Robin Gray' appeared in it; also songs by Joanna Baillie, Dr. Blacklock, James Tytler, and Sir Alexander Boswell.

SCOTT or SCOT, MICHAEL (1175?-1234?), a scholar of Scottish birth, who studied at Oxford and on the Continent, and was attached to the court of the Emperor Frederick II, probably in the capacity of official astrologer. He was sent by Frederick II, about 1230, to the universities of Europe to communicate to them versions of Aristotle made by Michael and others. Legends of his magical power have served as a theme to many great writers from Dante ('Inferno', c. xx, 116) to Sir W. Scott ('Lay of the Last Minstrel'). His printed works include 'Liber Physiognomiae' (1477), a translation of Aristotle's 'De Animalibus' (1496), and 'Quaestio Curiosa de Natura Solis et Lunae' (1622). Works of his on astronomy and alchemy, and various translations, still remain in manuscript.

SCOTT, MICHAEL (1789-1835), author of 'Tom Cringle's Log', which was published in 'Blackwood's Magazine' in 1829-33. It gives vivid and amusing pictures of life in Jamaica and the islands of the Caribbean Sea in the early days of the 19th cent. Scott contributed 'The Cruise of the Midge' to the same periodical in 1834-5. Both works were republished in 1836.

SCOTT or SCOT, REGINALD (1538?-99), educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, and M.P. for New Romney, 1588-9, was author of 'The Discoverie of Witchcraft' (1584). This was written with the aim of preventing the persecution of poor, aged, and simple persons who were popularly believed to be witches, by exposing the impostures on the one hand, and the credulity on the other, that supported the belief in sorcery.

SCOTT, ROBERT FALCON (1868-1912), captain R.N., Antarctic explorer, was author of 'The Voyage of the Discovery' (1905), a record of the first National Antarctic Expedition (1901-4); and of the notable journal, published as 'Scott's Last Expedition', in 1913, kept during the second Antarctic expedition (1910-12), the last entry in which was made as the writer was dying, storm-bound by a blizzard on his return from the South Pole.

SCOTT, SIR WALTER (1771-1832), son of Walter Scott, a writer to the signet, was born in College Wynd, Edinburgh, was educated at Edinburgh High School and University, and was apprenticed to his father. He was called to the bar in 1792. His interest in the old Border tales and ballads had early been awakened, and was stimulated by Percy's 'Reliques', and by the study of the old romantic poetry of France and Italy and of the modern German poets. He devoted much of his leisure to the exploration of the Border country. In 1796 he published, anonymously, a translation of Bürger's 'Lenore' and 'Der Wilde Jäger', and in 1799 a translation of Goethe's 'Goetz von Berlichingen'. In 1797 he married Charlotte Mary Carpenter (daughter of a French royalist refugee), and was appointed sheriff-depute of Selkirkshire in 1799. In that year Scott's schoolfellow, James Ballantyne, printed a few copies of the Bürger translations and some original ballads under the title 'Apology for Tales of Terror'. In 1802-3 appeared the three volumes of Scott's 'Border Minstrelsy' (a collection of ballads, historical, traditional, and romantic, with imitations in a separate section); and in 1805 his first considerable original work, the romantic poem, 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel' (q.v.). He then became a partner in James Ballantyne's printing business, published 'Marmion' (q.v.) in 1808, and in the same year his edition of Dryden's works, with a 'Life' of the poet. This was followed by 'The Lady of the Lake' (q.v.) in 1810, 'Rokeby' and 'The Bridal of Triermain' (qq.v.) in 1813, 'The Lord of the Isles' (q.v.) in 1815, and 'Harold the Dauntless', his last long poem, in 1817. In 1809 he had entered into partnership with John Ballantyne in the bookselling business known as 'John Ballantyne & Co.', and in 1812 he had purchased Abbotsford on the Tweed, where he built himself a residence. Scott promoted the foundation in 1809 of the Tory 'Quarterly Review' (q.v.), having previously been a contributor to the 'Edinburgh Review' (q.v.), but seceded from it owing to its Whig attitude. In 1813 he refused the offer of the laureateship, and recommended Southey for the honour. In 1814 he issued his edition of Swift. Eclipsed in a measure by Byron as a poet, in spite of the great popularity of his verse romances, he now turned his attention to the novel as a means of giving play to his wide erudition, his humour, and his sympathies. His novels appeared anonymously in the following order: 'Waverley' (q.v.), 1814; 'Guy Mannering' (q.v.), 1815; 'The Antiquary' (q.v.) in 1816; 'The Black Dwarf' and 'Old Mortality' (qq.v.) together in 1816 as the first series of 'Tales of My Landlord'; 'Rob Roy' (q.v.) in 1817; 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.), second series of 'Tales of My Landlord', in 1818; 'The Bride of Lammermoor' and 'The Legend of Montrose' (qq.v.), the third series of 'Tales of My Landlord', in 1819; 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.), 1819; 'The Monastery' (q.v.), 1820; 'The Abbot' (q.v.), 1820; 'Kenilworth' (q.v.), 1821; 'The Pirate' (q.v.), 1821; 'The Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.), 1822; 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.), 1823; 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.), 1823; 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.), 1823; 'Redgauntlet' (q.v.), 1824; 'Tales of the Crusaders', 'The Betrothed', and 'The Talisman' (q.v.) in 1825; 'Woodstock' (q.v.), 1826; 'Chronicles of the Canongate: Two Drovers, The Highland Widow, The Surgeon's Daughter' (qq.v.), 1827; 'Chronicles of the Canongate (second series): St. Valentine's Day, or The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.), 1828; 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.), 1829; 'Tales of My Landlord' (fourth series): 'Count Robert of Paris' (q.v.) and 'Castle Dangerous' (q.v.), in 1832. Scott was created a baronet in 1820, and avowed the authorship of the novels in 1827. In 1826, as the result partly of improvident borrowings, partly of the mismanagement of James Ballantyne, his partner, he found himself involved in the ruin of the latter and of his publisher, Constable, and liable for some £130,000. Thenceforth he worked heroically, shortening his own life by his strenuous efforts, in order to meet his creditors, who were finally paid off at his death with the sums realized on the sale of his copyrights.

Scott's dramatic work, in which he did not excel, includes 'Halidon Hill' (1822), 'Macduff's Cross' (1822), 'The Doom of Devorgoil' (1830), and 'Auchindrane, or the Ayrshire Tragedy' (1830). Of these the last is the best. It is founded on the case of Mure of Auchindrane in Pitcairn's 'Ancient Criminal Trials'. Mention must also be made of the important historical, literary, and antiquarian works written by Scott or issued under his editorship: 'The Works of Dryden' with a life (1808); 'The Works of Swift' with a life (1814); 'Border Antiquities of England and Scotland' (1814-17); 'Provincial Antiquities of Scotland' (1819-26); an abstract of the 'Eyrbiggia Saga' in Weber's 'Northern Antiquities' (1814); 'Description of the Regalia of Scotland' (1819); 'Lives of the Novelists' prefixed to Ballantyne's 'Novelists' Library' (1821-4); 'Essays on Chivalry and the Drama' (1814) and on Romance (1822) contributed to the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica'; 'The Life of Napoleon Buonaparte' (1827); 'Tales of a Grandfather' (q.v., 1828-30); 'History of Scotland' (1829-30); 'Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft' (1830); 'Original Memoirs written during the Great Civil War' of Sir H. Slingsby and Captain Hodgson (1806); the 'Memoirs of Captain George Carleton' (1808); the 'State Papers of Sir Ralph Sadler' (1809); the 'Secret History of James I' (1811); and 'Memorie of the Somervilles' (1815). 'Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk' (q.v.) appeared in 1816. Scott founded the Bannatyne Club (q.v.) in 1823. In 1826 he addressed to the

'Edinburgh Weekly Journal' three letters 'from Malachi Malagrowther', 'Thoughts on the proposed Change of Currency', defending the rights of Scotland.

Scott's 'Life' by John Gibson Lockhart (q.v.), published in 1837-8, is one of the great biographies of English literature. A short Life of Scott was published in 1932 by John Buchan (q.v.). Scott's 'Journal' was published in 1890. An edition of his letters by H. J. C. Grierson began to appear in 1932.

SCOTT, WILLIAM BELL (1811-90), poet and artist, a friend of Swinburne and Rossetti. He published five volumes of verse, the best of which is of a mystical and metaphysical character.

Scottish Chiefs, The, a historical novel by Jane Porter (q.v.), published in 1810. It was extremely successful and was translated into German and Russian.

The story is a romance based on the historical events in the life of William Wallace, and opens with the murder of Wallace's wife in 1296 by Heselrigge, the English governor of Lanark, for refusing to divulge her husband's hiding-place. The vicissitudes of Wallace's career are followed to his execution, and the story closes with the battle of Bannockburn.

Scottish Text Society, THE, founded in 1882 for the purpose of printing and editing texts illustrative of the Scottish language and literature, has issued editions of many works of general literary interest, such as 'The Kingis Quair', Barbour's 'Bruce', and the 'Basilikon Doron', and the poems of W. Dunbar, R. Henryson, Drummond of Hawthornden, and Sir D. Lyndsay (q.v.).

SCOTUS or ERIGENA, JOHN (fl. 850), of Irish origin, was employed as teacher at the court of King Charles the Bald, afterwards emperor, c. 847. He is often confused with one John who came to England with Grimbold (q.v.) at Alfred's request and was established at Malmesbury. All the known works of Scotus, which include a series of commentaries on Dionysius the Areopagite, and translations, were collected by H. J. Floss in Migne's 'Patrologia Latina', cxxii (1853); two other works claiming his authorship have since come to light. The leading principle of his philosophy, as expounded in his great work, 'De Divisione Naturae', is that of the unity of nature, proceeding from (1) God, the first and only real being; through (2) the creative ideas to (3) the sensible universe, which ultimately is resolved into (4) its first Cause. He was thus one of the originators of the mystical thought of the Middle Ages, and he prepared the way for the scholastic philosophy.

SCOTUS, JOHN DUNS, see Duns.

Scourers or SCOWRERS, in the 17th-18th cents., a set of men who made a practice of roistering through the streets at night, beating the watch, breaking windows, &c. They are frequently referred to in the literature of the period (Wycherley, Gay, 'The Spectator', &c.).

Scourge of God, see Attila.

Scriblerus Club, an association of which Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, Gay, Parnell, Congreve, Lord Oxford, and Atterbury were members, formed about 1713. They undertook the production of the 'Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus' (see Martinus Scriblerus), designed to ridicule 'all the false tastes in learning, under the character of a man of capacity enough, that had dipped into every art and science, but injudiciously in each'.

Scrooge, a character in Dickens's 'A Christmas Carol' (q.v.).

Scrub, man-of-all-work to Lady Bountiful's household in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.).

Scudamour, SIR, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', Bk. IV, the lover of Amoret, who is reft from him on his wedding-day by the enchanter Busyrane.

SCUDÉRY, MADELEINE DE (1607-1701), one of the most voluminous writers of French heroic romances. Her principal work was 'Artamène, ou le Grand Cyrus' (ten volumes, 1649-53), which deals with the love of the youthful Cyrus, grandson of the king of Media, travelling incognito under the name of Artamenes, for Mandane, daughter of Cyaxares, his uncle, and the rivalry of the kings of Pontus and Assyria for her hand, resulting in sieges, abductions, pursuits, incredible adventures, and the final union of hero and heroine. The characters are portraits of notable persons of the author's day. A play founded on the romance was brought out by John Banks in 1696. Madeleine de Scudéry also wrote 'Clélie' (1656-60), on the subject of the Clelia who escaped from the power of Porsenna by swimming the Tiber; and 'Almahide' (1660), a story of the Moors in Spain, from which Dryden took the name of the heroine of his 'Conquest of Granada'. All these romances were translated into English and enjoyed for a time great popularity; Pepys had to check his wife for her long stories out of the 'Grand Cyrus' ('Diary', 12 May 1666). The brother of Madeleine de Scudéry, George, a dramatic poet, gave some assistance in the composition of her earlier romances. They were vigorously satirized by Boileau (q.v.).

Scylla, a nymph loved by Poseidon, or according to Ovid by Glaucus, one of the deities of the sea. Amphitrite (or Circe) from jealousy of Scylla placed magic herbs in the fountain whereshe bathed. By these Scylla was changed into a monster, which thenceforth became a terror to mariners, seizing and devouring them as they sailed past its cave, situated according to tradition in the Straits of Messina, opposite the whirlpool of Charybdis (q.v.). The passage of the straits is the theme of part of the twelfth book of the 'Odyssey', and the story of Scylla is referred to by Keats in 'Endymion' (iii).

Scythrop, a character in Peacock's 'Nightmare Abbey' (q.v.).

Seafarer, The, an Old English poem of some 100 lines, discussing the miseries and the attractions of life at sea. (It has been suggested that it represents a dialogue between an old seaman and a young man who wishes to follow the sea.) The poem passes to a comparison of earthly pleasures and heavenly rewards.

Sea-green Incorruptible, a name applied to Robespierre (q.v.) by T. Carlyle in his 'French Revolution'. According to H. Belloc's introduction to this work in Everyman's Library, 1906, "'Sea Green'" is based on one phrase of Mme de Staël's misread. What Mme de Staël said was that the prominent veins in Robespierre's forehead showed greenish-blue against his fair and somewhat pale skin. But his complexion was healthy and his expression, if anything, winning.

Seagrim, MOLLY, a character in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.).

Seasons, The, a poem in blank verse, in four books, one for each season, and a final 'Hymn', by James Thomson (1700-48, q.v.), published in 1726-30.

'Winter' was the first of the four 'Seasons' written and published (1726). It describes the rain, wind, and snow; the visit of the red-breast; a man perishing in the snowdrift while his family anxiously await him; wolves descending from the mountains; a winter evening as spent by a student, or in a village, or a city; frost and skating; and the Arctic circle.

Next came 'Summer' (1727), which sets forth the progress of a summer's day, with such scenes as haymaking, sheep-shearing, and bathing, followed by a panegyric of Great Britain. It also includes a picture of the torrid zone and two narrative episodes (of the lover Celadon whose Amelia is struck by lightning, and of Damon who beholds Musidora bathing).

'Spring' appeared in 1728. The poet describes the influence of the season on inanimate objects, on vegetables, brute beasts, and lastly man, with a final panegyric on nuptial love. In the charming picture of the angler, the poet returns to the earlier manner exemplified in 'Winter'.

'Autumn' followed in 1730. The poet gives a vivid picture of shooting and hunting, and condemns these sports for their barbarity. He describes the reaping of the fruits of the earth, the coming of fogs, the migration of birds, and the mirth of the country after the harvest is gathered in. This part includes the episode of Palemon who falls in love with Lavinia, a gleaner in his fields (the story of Boaz and Ruth).

SEELEY

The poem is completed by the 'Hymn' to Nature (1730).

Seaton, THOMAS (1684-1741), fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, founded by legacy the SEATONIAN PRIZE at Cambridge for sacred poetry. This is referred to in Byron's 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers'.

Sebastian (1554-78), king of Portugal, killed at the battle of Alcazar in the course of an expedition against Morocco. There was a widespread popular belief that he was not dead but would reappear, and various impostors came forward who claimed the crown in his name. Dryden's play, 'Don Sebastian' (q.v.), relates to this monarch.

Sebastian, (1) in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest' (q.v.), brother to the king of Naples; (2) in his 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.), brother to Viola.

Sebastian, ST., a Roman soldier and Christian martyr. He was born at Narbonne, and shot to death with arrows in Rome, about A.D. 288, under Diocletian. He is commemorated on 20 January.

Second Nun's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Sedan, the scene of the defeat of the army of Napoleon III by the Germans on 2 Sept. 1870, and of the French emperor's surrender; the central incident of Zola's 'La Débâcle'.

Sedgemoor, in Somerset, the scene of the battle of 6 July 1685 in which Monmouth, who had landed at Lyme Regis as the champion of the Protestant party, was defeated by the Royal troops.

Sedley, MR., MRS., JOSEPH, and AMELIA, characters in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

SEDLEY, SIR CHARLES (1639?-1701), educated at Wadham College, Oxford, famous for his wit and urbanity and notorious as a fashionable profligate, was the author of two indifferent tragedies and three comedies. Of these the best are 'Bellamira' (q.v.), produced in 1687, and 'The Mulberry Garden', partly based on Molière's 'L'École des Maris', produced in 1668. Sedley also wrote some pleasant songs: 'Phillis is my only joy', 'Hears not my Phillis how the birds', &c. He figures in Dryden's 'Essay on Dramatic Poesy' (q.v.) as Lisideus, who defends the imitation of French comedy in English.

SEELEY, SIR JOHN ROBERT (1834-95), educated at the City of London School and Christ's College, Cambridge, was professor of Latin at University College, London, from 1863, and of modern history at Cambridge from 1869 until his death. In 1865 he published anonymously his 'Ecce Homo', a survey of the life of Christ as one of the great religious reformers, and a defence of Christian ethics. His historical works, designed to promote a practical object, the training of statesmen, include: 'The Expansion of England in the Eighteenth Century'

SEELEY

(1883), which reviews the growth of the Empire as an inevitable process, and infers the imperial mission of Britain from the lessons of the past, a work which met with great success; 'The Life and Times of Stein, or Germany and Prussia in the Napoleonic Age' (1878); and 'The Growth of British Policy' (1895), tracing the development of British foreign policy from the time of Elizabeth.

Selcento, THE, the 17th cent., considered as a period of Italian art or literature, a period of degenerate taste.

Sejan horse, THE, equus Sejanus, the horse of a certain Gnaeus Sejus, which brought misfortune to him (put to death by Mark Antony) and all subsequent possessors.

Sejanus, his Fall, a Roman tragedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1603, Shakespeare and Burbage having parts in the cast.

The play deals with the rise of the historical Sejanus, the confidant of the emperor Tiberius, his machinations with a view to securing the imperial throne, his fall and execution.

Selborne, Natural History and Antiquities of, see White (G.).

SELDEN, JOHN (1584-1654), the son of a Sussex yeoman, was educated at Chichester and Hart Hall, Oxford, and became an eminent lawyer and bencher of the Inner Temple. He was keeper of the records in 1643. His 'History of Tythes', published in 1618, which gave offence to the clergy, was suppressed by public authority. In parliament he took an active part against the Crown until 1649, after which he withdrew from public affairs. He won fame as an orientalist by his treatise 'De Diis Syris' (1617), and subsequently made a valuable collection of oriental manuscripts, most of which passed at his death into the Bodleian Library. His work in this direction consisted chiefly in the exposition of rabbinical law. His 'Table Talk', containing reports of his utterances from time to time during the last twenty years of his life, composed by his secretary, Richard Milward, appeared in 1689. His works include 'Titles of Honour' (1614), an edition of Eadmer (1623), 'Marmora Arundelliana' (1624), 'De Successionibus' (1631), 'Mare Clausum' (in which he maintained against Grotius that the sea is capable of sovereignty, 1635), 'De Jure Naturali' (1640), 'Judicature in Parliament' (1640), 'Privileges of Baronage' (1642), 'Fleta' (1647), and 'On the Nativity of Christ' (1661). He wrote 'Illustrations' to the first eighteen 'songs' of Drayton's 'Polyolbion' (q.v.). His works were collected by Dr. David Wilkins (1726).

Selden Society, THE, was founded in 1887 by Maitland (q.v.), for the publication of ancient legal records.

Select Society, THE, an association of educated Scotsmen formed in 1754, whose members met in Edinburgh to discuss philosophical questions. Hume and Robertson were among its prominent members.

Selēnē, in Greek mythology, the goddess of the moon, the Luna of the Romans, the sister of Helios (Sol, the sun) and of Eos (Aurora, the dawn). In later myths she is identified with Artemis (Diana).

Seleucids, THE, the dynasty founded by Seleucus Nicator (one of the generals of Alexander the Great), which reigned over Syria from 312 to 65 B.C. and subjected a great part of western Asia.

Self-Help, a work by Smiles (q.v.), published in 1864, which enjoyed great popularity and was translated into many other languages. It inculcates, by examples of the lives and characters of authors, artists, inventors, missionaries, &c., the doctrine that the spirit of self-help is the root of all genuine growth in the individual.

Sellm, the hero of Byron's 'Bride of Abydos' (q.v.).

Selima, Horace Walpole's cat, whose death by drowning in a bowl of goldfish was lamented in a poem by Gray.

Seljuk, the name of certain Turkish dynasties that ruled over large parts of Asia from the 11th to the 13th cents., so called from the name of their reputed ancestor. Hence used to designate that branch of the Turkish people to whom these dynasties belonged, in contradistinction to the Osmanli or Ottoman Turks. The dynasties began with Togrul Beg, grandson of Seljuk, who made himself a sort of mayor of the palace to the caliph of Bagdad (c. 1060). The Seljuk 'Turks' were the men whom the Crusaders of the 11th and 12th cents. had to fight; they had recently burst the frontier of the Eastern Empire and smashed the Greek army at Manzikert (1071), and all Asia Minor was in their hands in 1090.

Selkirk, ALEXANDER (1676-1721), the son of John Selcraig, shoemaker of Largo, ran away to sea, and joined the privateering expedition of Capt. William Dampier (q.v.), in 1703. Having quarrelled with his captain, Thomas Stradling, he was, at his own request, put ashore on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez in 1704, and remained there until 1709, when he was rescued by Capt. W. Rogers (q.v.). His experiences there formed the basis of Defoe's 'Robinson Crusoe' (q.v.).

Sēmēlē, a daughter of Cadmus (q.v.) and Harmonia, was beloved by Zeus. At the instigation of the jealous Hera she prayed Zeus to visit her in all the splendour of a god. This rash request was acceded to by Zeus, who came accordingly attended by lightning and thunderbolts, by which Semele was instantly consumed. Her child, however, was saved from the flames, and was known as Dionysus (q.v.).

Semirāmis, a mythical queen of Assyria, supposed to be the daughter of the fish-goddess Derceto. She married Onnes, an Assyrian general, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactra, where her prudent advice hastened the fall of the city. She subsequently married Ninus, king of Assyria, the reputed founder of Nineveh, and succeeded him on the throne (having according to one form of the story contrived his death). She built many cities, and some of the great works of the East are by tradition ascribed to her.

Semiramis of the North, a term sometimes applied to (1) Margaret (1353–1412), daughter of Valdemar IV of Denmark and wife of Haakon VI of Norway, who became in 1381 regent of Norway and Denmark, and in 1388 ruler of Sweden; and (2) Catharine II of Russia (1729–96), originally a princess of Anhalt-Zerbst, and empress of Russia from 1762 (in which year her husband, Peter III, was deposed) until her death.

Semitic, meaning originally 'of or pertaining to the Semites', the descendants of Shem the son of Noah (in recent use, often specifically equivalent to Jewish), is used in a linguistic sense to designate that family of languages of which Hebrew, Aramaean, Arabic, Ethiopic, and ancient Assyrian are the principal members. [OED.]

Sempronius, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Timon of Athens' (q.v.), one of the false friends of Timon; (2) a character in Addison's 'Cato' (q.v.).

Senae, in imprints, Sienna.

SENECA, LUCIUS ANNAEUS (d. A.D. 65), the philosopher, was born at Corduba in Spain a few years before the Christian era. He was tutor to the young Nero, and when the latter became emperor was one of his chief advisers, and exerted himself to check his vices. But he condoned Nero's crimes and grew wealthy at his court. He was accused of participating in the conspiracy of Piso and was ordered to take his own life, which he did with stoic courage. His writings include works on moral philosophy (he was an illustrious representative of the Stoic school) and nine tragedies in a rhetorical style; whence 'Senecan' tragedy.

Senhouse, JOHN MAXWELL, see Hewlett.

SENIOR, NASSAU WILLIAM (1790–1864), educated at Eton and Magdalen College, Oxford, was professor of political economy at Oxford, 1825–30 and 1847–52. Besides important political articles contributed to the 'Edinburgh Review' after 1840, he wrote 'An Outline of the Science of Political Economy' (1836), 'Conversations with M. Thiers, M. Guizot, and other distinguished persons during the Second Empire' (1878), 'Correspondence and Conversations of A. de Tocqueville' (1872), 'Biographical Sketches' (1863), and 'Journals'—'Kept in Turkey and Greece' (1859), 'Relating to Ireland' (1868), and 'Kept in France and Italy' (1871). He also wrote a notable series of reviews of the Waverley Novels: 'Essays on Fiction' (1864).

SENSE AND SENSIBILITY

Sennacherib, the subject of Byron's poem, 'The Destruction of Sennacherib', was king of Assyria 705–681 B.C. He invaded Palestine in the reign of Hezekiah, and was obliged to retire by a pestilence that broke out in his army. The poem is based on the narrative of his discomfiture in 2 Chron. xxxii.

Sense and Sensibility, a novel by Jane Austen (q.v.), begun in 1797 and published in 1811. A first sketch of the story, read by the author to her family in 1795, was entitled 'Elinor and Marianne'.

Mrs. Henry Dashwood and her daughters, Elinor and Marianne, and the still younger Margaret, are left in straitened circumstances, for the estate of which her husband had the life interest has passed to her stepson, John Dashwood. Henry Dashwood, before his death, has urgently recommended to John the interest of his step-mother and sisters. But John's selfishness, encouraged (in a discussion which is one of Jane Austen's most perfect pieces of satire) by his wife, the daughter of the arrogant Mrs. Ferrars, defeats his father's wish. Mrs. Henry Dashwood and her daughters accordingly retire to a cottage in Devonshire, but not before Elinor and Edward Ferrars, brother of Mrs. John Dashwood, have become mutually attracted, though Edward shows uneasiness in his relations with Elinor. In Devonshire Marianne is thrown into the company of John Willoughby, an attractive but impecunious and unprincipled young man, with whom she falls desperately in love, Willoughby likewise showing signs of strong affection for her. Willoughby suddenly departs for London, leaving Marianne in acute distress at the separation. Presently Elinor and Marianne also go to London, on the invitation of their friend, Mrs. Jennings. Here Willoughby shows complete indifference to Marianne, and finally, in an insolent letter, informs her of his approaching marriage to a rich heiress. Marianne, whose sensibility is extreme, makes no effort to control the outward symptoms of her grief. Meanwhile Elinor has learnt under pledge of secrecy from Lucy Steele, a sly, self-seeking young woman, niece of a former tutor of Edward Ferrars, that she and Edward have been secretly engaged for four years. Elinor, whose sense and self-control are in strong contrast to Marianne's weakness, conceals her distress. Edward's engagement, which was kept secret owing to his dependence on his mother, now becomes known to the latter. In her fury at Edward's refusal to give up Lucy, she dismisses him from her sight, and settles on his younger brother, Robert, the property that would otherwise have gone to Edward. At this conjuncture a small living is offered to Edward, and the way seems open for his early marriage with Lucy. But now Robert, his brother, a foolish young fop, falls in love with Lucy, who, finding her interest in a marriage with the more wealthy brother, throws over Edward and marries Robert. Edward, delighted to be released from an engagement that he has long regretted, at once proposes to Elinor and is accepted. Marianne, gradually recovering from the despair that had followed her abandonment by Willoughby, is finally won by her old admirer, Colonel Brandon, a quiet serious man of five-and-thirty, whose modest attractions had been completely eclipsed by his brilliant rival.

The cheerful, vulgar Mrs. Jennings, her silly daughter, and Mr. Palmer, her ill-mannered son-in-law, are among the amusing characters in the story.

Sensitive Plant, The, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.) written in 1820.

The poet's spirit is represented as a 'sensitive plant', or mimosa, in the midst of a lovely garden tended by a lady, the ideal of beauty. The lady dies, and death and corruption settle on the garden. This awakens in the author the question whether, seeing that beauty is permanent, it is not life that is unreal.

Sentences, MASTER OF THE, Peter Lombard (q.v.).

Sentimental Comedy, a type of sentimental drama introduced by Steele (q.v.), a reaction from the comedy of the Restoration.

Sentimental Journey through France and Italy, A, by Mr. Yorick, a narrative by Sterne (q.v.) of his adventures in France in 1765-6, published in 1768. It has been translated into many languages.

The work was to consist of four volumes, of which only two were finished. In it, the humour of 'Tristram Shandy' gives place to sentiment as the predominant element. The author travels to Calais, Rouen, Paris, through the Bourbonnais (where he finds the Maria of vol. vii of 'Tristram Shandy'), and nearly to Lyons, where the book abruptly ends. At every turn he meets with a sentimental adventure, and finds pleasure in everything, in contrast to Selfungus (Smollett) who saw every object distorted by his spleen, and Mundungus (Dr. S. Sharp) who travelled across Europe 'without one generous connection or pleasurable anecdote to tell of'.

Sentry, CAPTAIN, see Spectator.

Sephardim, the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, so called from Sepharad, the name of a country mentioned in Obad. xx, and identified by the Rabbins with Spain. The Sephardim regard themselves as the aristocracy of the race, as opposed to the Ashkenazim, the Jews of Central and Eastern Europe (Ashchenaz is mentioned as a descendant of Japhet in 1 Chron. i. 6).

Sepher Yezirah, see Cabbala.

Sephiroth, in the philosophy of the Cabbala (q.v.) the attributes or emanations by which the infinite enters into relation with the finite.

September Massacre, THE, the massacre of political prisoners, including the Princesse de Lamballe, in Paris on 2-3 Sept. 1792. The massacre dwindled in number after the 5th, but went on occasionally to the 9th.

Septuagint, The (commonly designated LXX), the Greek version of the O.T. which derives its name from the story that it was made by seventy-two Palestinian Jews at the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus (284-247 B.C.) and completed by them in seclusion on the island of Pharos, in seventy-two days [OED.]; or it may have been so called because it was authorized by the seventy members of the Jewish sanhedrin (Jebb).

Seraph, a word perhaps identical with the Hebrew saraph meaning a 'fiery serpent', is, in Biblical use (Isa. vi. 2), the name of the creatures with six wings seen in Isaiah's vision as hovering over the throne of God. By Christian interpreters the Seraphim were from an early period supposed to be a class of angels, and the name associated with that of the Cherubim was introduced into the Eucharistic preface and the 'Te Deum'. In the system of the Pseudo-Dionysius, the chief source of later angelology, the Seraphim are the highest, and the Cherubim the second, of the nine orders of angels (q.v.). [OED.]

Serāpis, a god invented and introduced into Egypt by Ptolemy I to unite Greeks and Egyptians in a common worship, combining the Egyptian Osiris (q.v.) with attributes of Zeus, Hades, and Aesculapius.

Serbonian Bog or LAKE, a great morass near the coast of Lower Egypt,

'Betwixt Damiata and Mount Casius old,
Where armies whole have sunk'.

(Milton, 'Paradise Lost', ii. 593.)

Serendipity, from Serendip, a former name for Ceylon, a word coined by Horace Walpole, who says (letter to Mann, 28 Jan. 1754) that he had formed it on the title of the fairy-tale 'The Three Princes of Serendip', to signify the faculty of making happy discoveries by accident, which these princes possessed.

Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, see under Law (W.).

Serpentine verse, a metrical line beginning and ending with the same word, in allusion to the representation of a serpent with its tail in its mouth.

SERVĒTUS, MICHAEL (MIGUEL SERVETO) (1511-53), a Spanish physician and theologian, who graduated in medicine in Paris and lectured there on geometry and astrology, and subsequently practised medicine at various places in France. He published in 1531 'De trinitatis erroribus' directed against the doctrine of the Trinity, and in 1553 'Christianismi restitutio', in consequence of which he was arrested at Lyons by the Inquisition. He escaped to Geneva, but was arrested and burnt by order of Calvin.

Sesame, see Ali Baba.

Sesame and Lilies, two lectures by Ruskin (q.v.), published in 1865, to which a third was added in the revised edition.

SESAME AND LILIES

The first lecture, 'Sesame: of Kings' Treasuries', deals principally with the questions what to read and how to read, passing to the necessity for the diffusion of literature as 'conferring the purest kingship that can exist among men'. The second, 'Lilies: of Queen's Gardens', treats of the sphere, education, and duties of women of the privileged classes. The third lecture, delivered in 1868, is on 'The Mystery of Life and its Arts', the mystery that 'the most splendid genius in the arts might be permitted to labour and perish uselessly', and the mystery of man's indifference to religion and the purpose of life.

Of the first two lectures Ruskin wrote in 1882 that 'if read in connection with "Unto this Last", [they contain] the chief truths I have endeavoured through all my past life to display'.

Sesha, in Hindu mythology, the king of the serpents, who supports the world on his head.

Sesostris, the name given by the Greeks to Rameses II, the great king of the 19th Egyptian dynasty, who overran Syria and defeated the Hittites.

Session of the Poets, see Suckling.

Sestos, on the European shore of the Hellespont, at its narrowest part, famous as the residence of Hero (q.v.). Here Xerxes built a bridge of boats when he invaded Europe.

Set, in Egyptian mythology, the god of evil, the brother, or the son, of Osiris, and his constant enemy. He is identified with the Typhon (q.v.) of the Greeks.

Setebos, a god of the Patagonians, worshipped by Caliban's mother, Sycorax (in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest'). His purpose in creating the world is worked out by Caliban in R. Browning's 'Caliban upon Setebos' (q.v.).

Pigafetta's description of Patagonia had been translated, and Drake and Cavendish had visited the country, when Shakespeare wrote 'The Tempest'.

SETTLE, ELKANAH (1648-1724), educated at Trinity College, Oxford, was the author of a series of bombastic dramas which endangered at court Dryden's popularity as a dramatist. Settle's heroic play, 'The Empress of Morocco', in particular, had considerable vogue, and Dryden, with Crowne and Shadwell, wrote a pamphlet of criticism on the play. Settle retorted with an attack on Dryden's 'Almanzor and Almahide' (q.v.). Dryden vented his resentment by satirizing Settle as Doeg in the second part of 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.). Settle published 'Absalom Senior, or Achitophel Transposed' in 1682, and 'Reflections on several of Mr. Dryden's Plays' in 1687. He was appointed city poet in 1691, and found employment after the revolution in writing drolls for Bartholomew Fair. He died in the Charterhouse.

SEVEN LAMPS OF ARCHITECTURE

Seven against Thebes, The, a tragedy by Aeschylus (q.v.); see Eteocles.

Seven Bishops, THE: Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, and six other bishops (Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Lloyd of St. Asaph's, Trelawny of Bristol, Lake of Chichester, and Turner of Ely), who in 1688 signed a petition asking that the clergy should be excused from reading in their churches James II's second 'Declaration of Indulgence' (q.v.). James regarded this as an act of rebellion; the bishops were tried for seditious libel and found not guilty, to the intense joy of the nation.

Seven Champions of Christendom, The Famous Historie of the, a romance by R. Johnson (q.v.), printed about 1597. It relates legends of St. George of England, who releases from enchantment the other six knights, St. Denis of France, St. James of Spain, St. Anthony of Italy, St. Andrew of Scotland, St. Patrick of Ireland, and St. David of Wales; and adds legends concerning these. The book, the contents of which are inspired by the old romances of chivalry, was widely read, and influenced Spenser.

Seven Cities, THE ISLAND OF THE, or ANTILIA, a fabulous island believed in the 14th and 15th cents. to exist in the Atlantic. It was said that seven bishops and their followers, driven from Spain in the 8th cent. by the Moors, had founded seven cities on it. It appears in some 15th-cent. maps. It is uncertain whether it represents some actual discovery (e.g. of the Azores) or a form of the legend of the Fortunate Isles (q.v.), or Atlantis (q.v.), or perhaps even Brazil, which is occasionally called 'The Island of Brasilia'.

Seven Deadly Sins, THE, usually given as Pride, Lechery, Envy, Anger, Covetousness, Gluttony, Sloth; frequently personified in medieval literature, e.g. in 'Piers Plowman' Passus V (B), Chaucer's 'Parson's Tale', and Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', I. iv.

Seven Dials, an open space in the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London, from which seven streets radiated. It was designed by Thomas Neale, master of the royal mint and a great 'projector' in the 17th cent., whose name is preserved in Neal Street. In the centre stood a column, on the summit of which were, it is said, seven sun-dials facing the several streets. The column, which was in fact hexagonal, was taken down in 1773 and removed to Addlestone, and thence to Weybridge (Wheatley and Cunningham). The district, which was formerly one of narrow and squalid streets, has been much improved by the opening up of Charing Cross Road and Shaftesbury Avenue.

Seven Lamps of Architecture, The, a treatise by Ruskin (q.v.), published in 1849.

This was an incidental work, composed while 'Modern Painters' (q.v.) was being written. It deals, as its title indicates, with the leading principles of architecture. The

SEVEN LAMPS OF ARCHITECTURE

'Seven Lamps' are those of Sacrifice, Truth, Power, Beauty, Life, Memory, and Obedience. In the 'Lamp of Sacrifice' the author suggests the distinction between sacrifice (work that carries on visible ornament into partial concealment) and useless work. The 'Lamp of Power' deals largely with shadow and its uses; 'The Lamp of Life', with 'the expression of vital energy in organic things' and the 'subjection to such energy of things naturally passive and powerless'; the 'Lamp of Memory', with the application of architectural features to appropriate or inappropriate circumstances; the 'Lamp of Obedience', with the choice of a style of architecture. The other two 'Lamps' explain themselves. As a whole, the work is a defence of Gothic, as the noblest style of architecture.

Seven Names of God, THE, El, Elohim (q.v.), Adonai, Yahweh (see Jehovah), Ehyeh-Asher-Ehyeh, Shaddai, and Zaba'ot ('Jewish Encyclopaedia').

Seven Psalms, the seven Penitential Psalms, vi, xxxii, xxxviii, li, cii, cxxx, cxliii.

Seven Sages of Greece, THE. The list of these commonly given is: Thales (q.v.) of Miletus, Solon (q.v.) of Athens, Bias of Priene (the reputed author of the saying Φιλέιν ὡς μοῖσσορας), Chilo of Sparta, Cleobulus of Lindus in Rhodes, Periander (q.v.) of Corinth, and Pittacus (q.v.) of Mitylene.

Seven Sages of Rome, THE, a metrical romance of the early 14th cent. It is an English version (through Latin and French) of short Eastern tales, interesting as one of the earliest instances in English of the form of short verse-story subsequently adopted by Chaucer in the 'Canterbury Tales'. Diocletian has his son educated by seven sages. His stepmother, jealous of him, accuses him to the emperor of attempting to seduce her. The boy is silent for seven days (under the influence of his stepmother's magic) and is ordered to execution. Then follow seven tales by the queen on each of seven nights, designed to show the emperor the danger of the heir's supplanting him, and seven tales by the sages, on each of the following mornings, designed to show the danger of trusting women. The emperor is alternately convinced by the queen and the sages. The seven days being passed, the youth speaks, the queen's malice is exposed, and she is burnt at the stake. See Syntipas.

Seven Seas, THE, the Arctic, Antarctic, North and South Pacific, North and South Atlantic, and Indian Oceans. 'The Seven Seas' is the title of a collection of poems by Kipling (q.v.) published in 1896.

Seven Sisters, or SEVEN STARS, THE, the Pleiades (q.v.).

Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, THE, seven noble Christian youths of Ephesus who, fleeing from the persecution of Decius (A.D. 250), concealed themselves in a cavern in a neighbouring mountain. They were ordered by the emperor to be walled up therein, and fell into a deep slumber, which was miraculously prolonged for 187 years. At the end of that time the slaves of one Adolius, to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed for some purpose the stones with which the cavern had been walled up, and the seven sleepers were permitted to awake. Under the impression that they had slept a few hours, one of them proceeded to the city for food, but was unable to recognize the once familiar aspect of the place. His singular dress and obsolete speech (or, in some versions, the fact that he tried to buy food with obsolete money) caused him to be brought before a magistrate, whereupon the miracle that had occurred was brought to light. The people, headed by the bishop, hastened to visit the cavern of the sleepers, 'who bestowed their benediction, related their story, and at the same instant expired' (Gibbon, 'Decline and Fall', xxxiii). The legend was translated from the Syriac by Gregory of Tours, and is also given by other authors. It is included in the Koran, c. xviii, among Mohammed's revelations. See also Katmer.

Seven Weeks War, the war of 1866 between Austria and Prussia, as a result of which Prussia became the predominant power in Germany.

Seven Wise Masters, THE, see Syntipas.

Seven Wonders of the World, THE, the seven structures regarded as the most remarkable monuments of antiquity, viz. the Egyptian Pyramids (q.v.), the Mausoleum (q.v.) at Halicarnassus, the Hanging Gardens (q.v.) of Babylon, the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, the statue of Zeus by Pheidias (q.v.) at Olympia, the Colossus (q.v.) at Rhodes, and the Pharos (q.v.) at Alexandria, or, according to another list, the walls of Babylon.

Seven Years War, THE, or Third Silesian War, the war waged by France, Austria, and Russia against Frederick the Great (q.v.) of Prussia, who was assisted by Hanoverian troops and subsidies from England. It lasted from 1756 to 1763 and was terminated by the treaty of Hubertusburg, by which Frederick, though he had been hard pressed, retained all his dominions. Simultaneous and closely connected with this war was the struggle between the English and French which ended in the Peace of Paris of 1763, leaving England predominant in America and India.

Seventh Heaven, THE, see Heaven.

Severn, JOSEPH (1793-1879), painter, a friend of Keats (q.v.); he accompanied Keats to Italy in 1820 and attended him at his death.

Severus, WALL OF, a reconstruction in stone by the emperor Septimius Severus, about the year 208, of the Wall of Hadrian (q.v.).

SÉVIGNÉ

SÉVIGNÉ, MARIE DE RABUTIN-CHANTAL, Marquise de (1626–96), was left a widow at 25 years of age with two children. Of these, Françoise, Mme de Grignan, became the principal recipient of the letters for which her mother is famous. Written with wit and charm, they give a vivid picture of the life of the nobility in the time of Louis XIV. See also under Fitzgerald.

Sèvres, a town adjacent to Paris on the south-west, famous for its manufacture of costly porcelain, removed from Vincennes to Sèvres in 1756 and subsequently acquired by the State.

SEWARD, ANNA (1747–1809), the 'Swan of Lichfield', bequeathed her poetical works to Sir W. Scott, who published them with a memoir in 1810. Six volumes of her letters appeared in 1811. She frequently met Dr. Johnson and supplied Boswell with particulars concerning him.

SEWELL, ANNA (1820–78), remembered as the author of 'Black Beauty', the 'autobiography' of a horse, published in 1877.

Seyton, CATHERINE, a character in Scott's 'The Abbot' (q.v.).

Sforza, FRANCESCO I, FRANCESCO II, and LUDOVICO, dukes of Milan in the 15th and 16th cents. The first of them was a condottiere in the service of the older line of dukes, the Visconti, ousted them, and took the duchy. Ludovico was the foolish duke who called Charles VIII of France into Italy; he is the hero of Massinger's tragedy, 'The Duke of Milan' (q.v.).

Sganarelle, the name of characters in several of Molière's comedies, notably of Don Juan's pusillanimous servant in 'Le Festin de Pierre', and of the hero of 'Le Médecin malgré lui'. It is this last who, in the character of the pseudo-doctor, declares that 'Nous avons changé tout cela', when some one suggests that the heart is usually on the left side of the body, and not on the right as Sganarelle supposes.

Shabby Genteel Story, A, see Philip (The Adventures of).

Shades, THE, a name for wine or beer vaults with a drinking-bar, either underground or sheltered by an arcade. The name, now rare, is said to have originated at Brighton.

Shadow, SIMON, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', III. ii, one of Falstaff's recruits.

SHADWELL, THOMAS (1642?–92), dramatist and poet, was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, and entered the Middle Temple. He produced the 'Sullen Lovers', based on Molière's 'Les Fâcheux', at Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, in 1668. His dramatic pieces include an opera, the 'Enchanted Island' (from Shakespeare's 'Tempest', 1673), 'Timon of Athens' (1678), the 'Squire of Alsatia' (1688), 'Epsom Wells' (1673), and 'Bury Fair' (1689). The last two give interesting pictures of contemporary manners, watering-places, and amusements; and Scott and Macaulay drew on the 'Squire of Alsatia' for information regarding the locality. Shadwell was at open feud with Dryden from 1682; the quarrel arising out of some qualified praise bestowed by the latter on Ben Jonson, of whom Shadwell claimed to be the special votary. The two poets repeatedly attacked one another in satires, among which were Dryden's 'Medal' and 'Mac Flecknoe' (qq.v.), and Shadwell's 'The Medal of John Bayes' (1682) and a translation of the 'Tenth Satire of Juvenal' (1687). Shadwell superseded Dryden as poet laureate and historiographer at the revolution, but his claims to the position were not high. Lord Dorset, to whom the appointment was due, remarked, 'I do not pretend to say how great a poet Shadwell may be, but I am sure he is an honest man.'

Shaftesbury, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, first Baron Ashley and first earl of Shaftesbury (1621–83), a statesman prominent on the king's side in the Parliamentary War, as leader of the parliamentary opposition to Cromwell, after the Restoration as a member of the Cabal and chancellor. After his dismissal he was leader of the opposition, a fomenter of the belief in the 'Popish Plot', a promoter of the Exclusion Bill, and a supporter of Monmouth. He was satirized as Achitophel in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.).

SHAFTESBURY, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, third earl of (1671–1713), excluded by ill-health from active politics, devoted himself to intellectual pursuits, and in particular to moral philosophy. His principal writings are embodied in his 'Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times', published in 1711 (revised in 1713), which included various treatises previously published (notably his 'Enquiry concerning Virtue' of 1699). Shaftesbury was influenced by Deism; he was at once a Platonist and a churchman, an opponent of the selfish theory of conduct advocated by Hobbes (q.v.). Man has 'affections', Shaftesbury held, not only for himself but for the creatures about him. 'To have one's affections right and entire, not only in respect of oneself, but of society and the public: this is rectitude, integrity, or virtue.' And there is no conflict between the self-regarding and social affections; for the individual's own good is included in the good of society. Moreover, man has a capacity for distinguishing right and wrong, the beauty or ugliness of actions and affections, and this he calls the 'moral sense'. To be truly virtuous, a man must have a disinterested affection for what he perceives to be right.

Shaftesbury, ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, seventh earl of Shaftesbury (1801–85), philanthropist, active in many movements for the protection of the working classes and the benefit of the poor. He is commemorated by the 'Eros' (q.v.) statue in Piccadilly Circus.

Shakers, an American religious sect (calling itself "The Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing"), which exists in the form of mixed communities of men and women living in celibacy. The first of these communities was founded by Ann Lee (1736-84), a factory hand and afterwards a cook in Manchester, who in 1758 joined a band of seceders from the Society of Friends, nicknamed the 'Shaking Quakers' or 'Shakers'. She discovered celibacy to be the holy state, and was in time acknowledged by the Shakers as their spiritual head. In 1774 she emigrated to America, where she founded the first American Shaker Society in 1776. The name, according to Dickens, 'American Notes', xv, was given to the sect from their peculiar form of adoration, consisting of a dance by men and women arranged in opposite parties. Artemus Ward (see Browne, C. F.) made fun of them.

SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM (1564-1616), eldest son and third child of John Shakespeare and Mary, daughter of Robert Arden (a well-to-do farmer of Wilmcote), was born at Stratford-on-Avon, and baptized on 26 Apr. 1564. Shakespeare's father was a husbandman (also variously described as a yeoman, a glover, a butcher, and a wool-dealer) at Stratford and held various municipal offices. Though in financial straits, he applied in 1596 (perhaps at his son's instance) for a grant of arms, which was authorized in the same year. We have very little direct and positive knowledge concerning the facts of Shakespeare's life, and are dependent on inferences of more or less probability, ranging from practical certainty to conjecture. The poet was educated at the free grammar school at Stratford. He married in 1582 Anne, probably daughter of Richard Hathaway of Shottery. He left Stratford about 1585 to avoid, it has been suggested, prosecution for poaching at Charlecote, the property of Sir Thomas Lucy (later caricatured in 'Shallow'), and after spending some time, perhaps as a schoolmaster, in a neighbouring village, arrived in London about 1586, where perhaps he became acquainted with Lord Southampton. He was probably engaged in some subordinate capacity at one of the two theatres (The Theatre or The Curtain) then existing in London, and afterwards became a member of the Lord Chamberlain's (after the accession of James I, the King's) company of players, which acted at the Theatre, the Curtain, the Globe (qq.v.), and from c. 1609 at the Blackfriars Theatre

SHAKESPEARE

(q.v.). It is established that by September 1592 Shakespeare was both an actor and a playwright. He took part in the original performances of Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (1598) and 'Sejanus' (1603), after which he drops out of the actor-lists and may have acted little. His earliest work as a dramatist probably dates from 1591, and is to be found in the three parts of 'Henry VI'. This, and Shakespeare's other plays and poems, are the subject of separate articles in the present book. The order and dates assigned to them below are those which Sir E. K. Chambers thinks most probable, though there is, he states, much conjecture about the dates, and even about the order. 'Henry VI' was followed by 'Richard III' and 'The Comedy of Errors' in the theatrical season of 1592-3, and by 'Titus Andronicus' and 'The Taming of the Shrew' in 1593-4. The attribution of 'Titus Andronicus' to Shakespeare has been much questioned, and the share that he had in its authorship remains uncertain. Shakespeare published the poems 'Venus and Adonis' and 'Lucrece' respectively in 1593 and 1594, each with a dedication to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton, with whom, in the latter year, he was, it seems, on terms of intimate friendship. The 'Sonnets' (q.v.) were printed in 1609, but the bulk of them appear to have been written between 1593 and 1596, and the remainder at intervals down to 1600. 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona', 'Love's Labour's Lost', and 'Romeo and Juliet' (Shakespeare's first tragedy) are assigned to 1594-5; 'Richard II' and 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' to 1595-6. About 1596 Shakespeare may have visited Stratford, and relieved his family from growing financial embarrassments. He purchased 'New Place', the largest house in the town, in 1597, but does not appear to have settled permanently there till 1610, by which year he had by further purchases built up an estate at Stratford. 'King John' and 'The Merchant of Venice' are assigned to 1596-7, the two parts of 'Henry IV' to 1597-8. Shakespeare's most perfect essays in comedy, 'Much Ado about Nothing', 'As You Like It', and 'Twelfth Night', belong to the years 1598-1600, together with 'Henry V' and 'Julius Caesar'. 'Hamlet' and 'The Merry Wives of Windsor' (the latter, according to tradition, written by order of the Queen) are assigned to 1600-1, 'Troilus and Cressida' and 'All's Well that Ends Well' to the next two theatrical seasons. Then came the accession of James I, who (according to Ben Jonson), no less than Elizabeth, held Shakespeare in high esteem. A period of gloom in the author's life appears to have occurred about this time, manifested in the great tragedies, and succeeded, about 1608, by a new outlook in the final romances. The probable order and dates of the plays of the reign of James are given as follows by Sir E. Chambers: 'Measure for Measure' and 'Othello', 1604-5; 'King Lear' and 'Macbeth',

SHAKESPEARE

1605-6; 'Antony and Cleopatra', 1606-7; 'Coriolanus' and 'Timon of Athens', 1607-8. 'Pericles', 'Cymbeline', and 'The Winter's Tale' are assigned to the next three seasons; and 'The Tempest', probably the last drama that Shakespeare completed, to 1611-12. 'Henry VIII', of which only some half-dozen scenes are thought to be by Shakespeare, was produced in 1613.

Meanwhile his name was applied by unprincipled publishers to such writings of obscure men as 'The Tragedie of Locrine' (q.v., 1595), 'The Puritaine, or the Widdow of Watling-streete' (q.v., 1607), 'The True Chronicle Historie of Thomas, Lord Cromwell' (1602), 'The Life of Oldcastle' (1600), 'The London Prodigall' (q.v., 1605), 'A Yorkshire Tragedy' (1608), and an old play on the subject of King John (1611). Only two sonnets and three poems from 'Love's Labour's Lost' appeared in 'The Passionate Pilgrim, by W. Shakespeare' (1599), the bulk of the volume being by others. Shakespeare's name was also appended to 'a poetical essaye on the Turtle and the Phoenix', which was published in Robert Chester's 'Love's Martyr', a collection of poems by Marston, Chapman, Jonson, and others, 1601. Shakespeare may have had some part in the authorship of the historical play 'Edward III' (q.v.), published in 1596, and 'Sir Thomas More'.

Shakespeare now abandoned dramatic composition, but he may have left with the manager of his company unfinished drafts of more than one play, which Fletcher (q.v.) and others completed, such as 'The Two Noble Kinsmen' (q.v.) and, possibly, 'The History of Cardenio' (licensed for publication, 1653, and perhaps identical with the lost play 'Cardenio' acted in 1613). He spent the concluding years of his life (1611-16) mainly at Stratford, but paid frequent visits to London till 1614, and continued his relations with actors and poets till the end. He purchased a house in Blackfriars in 1613. He drafted his will in January 1616, and completed it in March. He died 23 Apr. (O.S., i.e. 3 May), after entertaining Jonson and Drayton at New Place, and was buried in Stratford Church, where before 1623 a monument, with a bust by a London sculptor, Gerard Johnson, was erected. His wife died in 1623, and Elizabeth (d. 1670), daughter of Susannah, his elder daughter, and of John Hall, was his last surviving descendant. His younger daughter Judith (Quiney) had children, but the last died in 1639. His only son, Hamnet, Judith's twin, died in 1596.

Two portraits of Shakespeare may be regarded as authenticated, the bust in Stratford Church, and the frontispiece to the folio of 1623, engraved by Martin Droeshout. The bust was by Gerard, one of the brothers Johnson (Janssen, their father, was an immigrant from Holland), of Southwark. But Droeshout is unlikely to have had personal knowledge of the poet. Shakespeare appears to have written his name usually 'Shakspeare', sometimes in abbreviated form, but the main signature to the poet's will is 'Shakspeare'. The form generally accepted is 'Shakespeare', being that in which the name appears in most of the contemporary editions of his plays and in the dedicatory epistles to the authorized editions of 'Venus and Adonis' and 'Lucrece'.

Shakespeare's plays were first collected in 1623, when a folio edition was published containing all the completed plays excepting 'Pericles'. Further folio editions appeared in 1632, 1663, 1664, and 1685. The first attempt to produce a critical edition of Shakespeare was that of Rowe (q.v., 1709), who provided lists of dramatic personae and a systematic division into acts and scenes. Pope's edition followed (1725) and the valuable emendations of Theobald (q.v.). Johnson's edition appeared in 1765. Capell, Malone, and Steevens were other important 18th-cent. students of Shakespeare. Dyce's edition appeared in 1857, and the Cambridge Shakespeare in 1863-6 (2nd ed. by Dr. Aldis Wright in 1891-3). The Variorum edition, edited by H. H. Furness and others from 1871, is an important source of information. The edition of separate plays by Quiller-Couch and J. D. Wilson (Cambridge, 1921-) deals fully with textual problems; and Sir E. K. Chambers's 'William Shakespeare, a Study of Facts and Problems' (1930) is the standard life.

Shallow, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', a foolish country justice. He appears again in 'The Merry Wives of Windsor', upbraiding Falstaff for beating his men and killing his deer. Shallow perhaps represents Sir Thomas Lucy of Charlecote (he is identified by his coat of arms bearing 'lucres', 'Merry Wives', 1. i), and the mention of the killing of his deer perhaps has reference to a poaching incident in Shakespeare's early days. But much doubt has been thrown on the story and its application to the Lucys of Charlecote.

Shandean, having the characteristics of 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.) or of the Shandy family there portrayed. Sterne himself describes 'Tristram Shandy' as a 'civil, non-sensical, good-humoured Shandean book, which will do all your hearts good'.

Shapira, M. W. (1830-84), of Jerusalem, noted forger. His frauds included alleged pottery objects from Moab (1872) and a manuscript of part of the Old Testament (Deuteronomy) of very ancient date. The manuscript was actually written on treated sheepskin some 300 years old. On the exposure of this latter fraud Shapira shot himself in 1884.

Sharp, REBECCA ('BECKY'), the principal character in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Sharp, JAMES (1618-79), was appointed archbishop of St. Andrews in 1661 as a reward for his assistance in restoring episcopacy in Scotland. His treachery to the Presbyterian cause made him obnoxious to the Covenanters, a party of whom murdered him on Magus Muir in 1679. Oliver Cromwell had already nicknamed him 'Sharp of that ilk'. The incident of his murder figures in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

SHARP, WILLIAM ('FIONA MACLEOD'), (1855-1905), educated at Glasgow Academy and University, wrote under his own name lives of D. G. Rossetti (1882), Shelley (1887), Heine (1888), and Browning (1890); volumes of poems, including 'Romantic Ballads and Poems of Phantasy' (1888); and romances, 'The Children of To-morrow' (1889), 'Sospiri di Roma' (1891), 'The Gypsy Christ' (1895), and 'Wives in Exile' (1896). He began to write mystical prose and verse under the pseudonym 'Fiona Macleod' in 1893: 'Pharais' (1894), 'The Mountain Lovers' (1895), 'The Sin Eater' (Celtic tales, 1895), and plays including 'The House of Usna' (1900), 'The Immortal Hour' (1900). Sharp's identity with 'Fiona Macleod' was not known till his death.

Shavian, having the characteristic humour of Mr. G. B. Shaw (q.v.), a word coined from his name.

Shaving of Shagpat, The, an Arabian Entertainment, a story by Meredith (q.v.), published in 1856.

The author adopts the form and style of the oriental story-tellers. Shagpat is an enchanter and holds the whole of a city and the king thereof in enchantment by means of one hair of his head, 'The Identical'. It is ordained that Shibli Bagarag, nephew to the renowned Baba Mustapha, chief barber to the court of Persia, shall shave Shagpat and break the spell. And this by the help of his betrothed, Noorna bin Noorka, and much magic, and in spite of thwackings and counter-magic, he at last succeeds in doing.

SHAW, CAPTAIN (afterwards SIR EYRE MASSEY), the chief of the London Fire Brigade, mentioned in the Queen's song, 'Oh, foolish fay', in Gilbert's 'Iolanthe' (see Gilbert and Sullivan). He was present at the opening performance.

SHAW, GEORGE BERNARD (1856-1950), born in Dublin, came to London in 1876 and became a member of the Fabian Society (q.v.), for which he wrote political and economic tracts. He also applied himself to public speaking, and in 1885 took to journalism, writing for the 'Pall Mall Gazette', 'The World', musical criticism for the 'Star' (1888), and dramatic criticism for the 'Saturday Review' (1895). He had meanwhile begun to write for the stage, and at once showed his unorthodox turn of mind and distrust of conventions and accepted institutions. 'Widowers' Houses' (begun in collaboration with William Archer) was produced in 1892, and subsequently included in the collection of 'Plays: Pleasant and Unpleasant' (1898). These were followed by 'Three Plays for Puritans' (1901) and 'Man and Superman' (1903). The latter, described as 'A Comedy and a Philosophy', introduces Shaw's conception of the 'Life Force', a power that seeks to raise mankind, with their co-operation, to a higher and better existence. The same doctrine appears in 'Heartbreak House' (1917) and in 'Back to Methuselah' (1921), in which the causes of the failure of our civilization, as demonstrated by the Great War, are examined. The best known of Shaw's other plays are the following: the powerful and effective historical drama 'Saint Joan' (1924); 'Candida', 'Mrs. Warren's Profession', and 'You Never Can Tell' (in 'Plays: Pleasant and Unpleasant'); 'John Bull's other Island' and 'Major Barbara' (1907); 'Fanny's First Play' (1911); 'Pygmalion' (1912); and 'The Apple Cart' (1929). Among his other writings should be mentioned the important Prefaces to the plays, the novel 'Cashel Byron's Profession' (1886), 'The Quintessence of Ibsenism' (1891), 'The Perfect Wagnerite' (1898), and 'The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism' (1928).

SHAW, HENRY WHEELER (1818-85), who wrote under the pseudonym 'Josh Billings', an American comic essayist and witty philosopher, who ridiculed humbug of all kinds. He first popularized his work by adopting a special phonetic spelling of his own.

She Stoops to Conquer, or The Mistakes of a Night, a comedy by Goldsmith (q.v.), produced in 1773.

The principal characters are Hardcastle, who loves 'everything that's old; old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine'; Mrs. Hardcastle, and Miss Hardcastle their daughter; Mrs. Hardcastle's son by a former marriage, Tony Lumpkin, a frequenter of the 'Three Jolly Pigeons', idle and ignorant, but cunning and mischievous, and doted on by his mother; and young Marlow, 'one of the most bashful and reserved young fellows in the world', except with barmaids and servant-girls. His father, Sir Charles Marlow, has proposed a match between young Marlow and Miss Hardcastle, and the young man and his friend, Hastings, accordingly travel down to pay the Hardcastles a visit. Losing their way they arrive at night at the 'Three Jolly Pigeons', where Tony Lumpkin directs them to a neighbouring inn, which is in reality the Hardcastles' house. The fun of the play arises largely from the resulting misunderstanding, Marlow treating Hardcastle as the landlord of the supposed inn, and making violent love to Miss Hardcastle, whom he takes for one of the servants. This contrasts with his bashful attitude when presented to her in her real character. The arrival of Sir Charles Marlow clears up the misconception and all ends well, including a subsidiary love-affair between Hastings and Miss Hardcastle's cousin, Miss Neville, whom Mrs. Hardcastle destines for Tony Lumpkin.

The mistaking of a private residence for an inn is said to have been founded on an actual incident in Goldsmith's boyhood.

She Would if She Could, the second of the comedies by Etherege (q.v.), produced in 1668.

Sir Oliver Cockwood and his wife, Sir Joslin Jolley and his young kinswomen, Ariana and Gatty, come up from the country to London to divert themselves. Sir Oliver and Sir Joslin with dissipation, Lady Cockwood, in spite of her virtuous professions, with a discreditable intrigue, and the two sprightly young ladies with innocent flirtations. They take lodgings at the 'Black Posts' in St. James Street. Lady Cockwood pursues Mr. Courtal, a gentleman of the town, with her unwelcome attentions. Mr. Courtal and his friend, Mr. Freeman, strike up acquaintance with the young ladies, and take them and Lady Cockwood to the Bear in Drury Lane for a dance, where Sir Joslin and Sir Oliver arrive, bent on less innocent pleasures. Sir Oliver gets drunk, dances with his wife, supposing her to be some one quite different, and confusion ensues. The ladies go home. Freeman arrives to console Lady Cockwood. Courtal arrives, and Freeman is concealed in a cupboard. Sir Oliver arrives, and Courtal is hidden under the table. Sir Oliver drops a 'China orange', which rolls under the table. The two men are discovered, the young ladies are awarded to them, and Lady Cockwood resolves to

Sheer Thursday, the Thursday in Holy Week, Maundy Thursday, so named with allusion to the purification of the soul by confession (cf. Shrove Thursday, another name for this day), and perhaps also to the practice of washing the altars on that day. (Sheer is related to a Scandinavian word meaning 'to purify'.) [OED.]

SHEFFIELD, JOHN, third earl of Mulgrave, and afterwards first duke of Buckingham and Normanby (1648-1721), a patron of Dryden and friend of Pope, and a statesman who held high offices but was 'neither esteemed nor beloved'. He is remembered as the author of the 'Essay on Satire', published anonymously, which cost Dryden (q.v.) a beating by Rochester's bravo. He also wrote an 'Essay upon Poetry', of no great value, and some fluent verses. He erected the monument to Dryden in Westminster Abbey.

Shekinah, the visible manifestation of the Divine Majesty, especially when resting between the Cherubim over the mercy-seat (Exod. xxvi. 17) or in the temple of Solomon. In the Targums the word is used as a periphrasis to designate God. [OED.]

Sheldon, GILBERT (1598-1677), educated at Trinity College, Oxford, was warden of All Souls College, Oxford, 1626-48, and archbishop of Canterbury from 1663 till his death. As chancellor of Oxford he built and endowed, at his own expense, in 1669, the Sheldonian Theatre, where, in accordance with his intention, much of the printing work of the University was conducted until the Clarendon Building was erected in 1713.

SHELLEY, MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT (1797-1851), the daughter of W. Godwin (q.v.) and second wife of P. B. Shelley (q.v.). She was author of 'Frankenstein, or the Modern Prometheus' (q.v., 1818), 'The Last Man' (1826, the story of the gradual destruction of the human race, with the exception of one man, by an epidemic), 'Valperga' (1823, a romance of Italy in the Middle Ages), and the autobiographical 'Lodore' (1835).

SHELLEY, PERCY BYSSHE (1792-1822), born at Field Place, Sussex, was educated at Eton and University College, Oxford, publishing, while at the former, 'Zastrozzi', and in 1810 'St. Irvyne', romances in the style of 'Monk' Lewis. In 1810 also appeared 'Original Poetry' 'by Victor and Cazire', P. B. and Elizabeth Shelley. From Oxford he was sent down in 1811 after circulating a pamphlet on 'The Necessity of Atheism'. In the same year he married Harriet Westbrook, who was aged sixteen, and from whom he separated after three years of a wandering life, during which he wrote 'Queen Mab' (q.v., piratically published in 1821). Some portions of this were subsequently remodelled as 'The Daemon of the World'. He left England in July 1814 with Mary Godwin (see preceding entry), to whom he was married after the unhappy Harriet had, in 1816, drowned herself in the Serpentine; and Jane Clairmont, Mary's step-sister, accompanied them. Shelley's 'Alastor' (q.v.) was written near Windsor and published in 1816. In the same year began his friendship with Byron, with whom Shelley and Mary spent the summer in Switzerland. To this period belong the 'Hymn to Intellectual Beauty' and 'Mont Blanc'. In March 1817 he removed to Marlow and there wrote, among other poems, 'Laon and Cythna', subsequently renamed 'The Revolt of Islam' (q.v., 1818), and the fragment, 'Prince Athanasia'. In 1818 Shelley left England for Italy, translated Plato's 'Symposium', finished 'Rosalind and Helen' at Lucca, and in the summer, at Byron's villa near Este, composed the 'Lines written in the Euganean Hills'. He visited Byron at Venice, where he wrote 'Julian and Maddalo' (q.v.), and at the end of the same year the 'Stanzas written in dejection, near Naples'. In the spring of 1819 he was in Rome. Stirred to indignation by the political events at home, and in particular by the Peterloo affair, he wrote the 'Masque of Anarchy', an indictment of Castlereagh's administration. He also published 'Peter Bell the Third', a satire on Wordsworth. The same year, 1819, saw the publication of 'The Cenci' (q.v.) and the composition of his great lyrical drama, 'Prometheus Unbound' (q.v.), published in 1820. In January 1820 the Shelleys moved to Pisa, and it was now that he wrote some of his finest lyrics, including the 'Ode to the West Wind', 'To a Skylark', and 'The Cloud'. His 'Oedipus Tyrannus, or Swellfoot the Tyrant', a dramatic satire on George IV's matrimonial affairs, appeared in 1820. To this period also belong the apologue of 'The Sensitive Plant' (q.v.); the 'Letter to Maria Gisborne' (the outcome of an intellectual friendship); the Odes 'to Naples' and 'to Liberty'; the notable 'Defence of Poetry' (1821), a vindication of the elements of imagination and love in poetry against the strictures of his great friend, T. L. Peacock, in 'The Four Ages of Poetry'; 'Adonais' (q.v., 1821); and 'Epipsychidion' (q.v., 1821).

Shelley removed in April 1822 to Lerici on the shores of the bay of Spezzia, after completing his lyrical drama, 'Hellas', inspired by the struggle of Greece for freedom. He had also been at work on the drama, 'Charles I', which remained unfinished. On 8 July 1822 he was drowned, in his 30th year, while sailing near Spezzia. He was at the time engaged on his uncompleted poem, 'The Triumph of Life' (q.v.). The last period also saw the production of some of his most beautiful lyrics, 'O, world! O, life! O, time', 'When the lamp is shattered', and the love poems inspired by Jane Williams. Shelley's ashes were buried in the Protestant cemetery at Rome. His 'Posthumous Poems', including 'Julian and Maddalo' and 'The Witch of Atlas', were published in 1824. But no perfect collection of his works was issued till that of Mrs. Shelley (1840). His prose works, besides those mentioned above, include: a 'Letter to Lord Ellenborough' (1812); 'A Vindication of Natural Diet' (1813); 'A Refutation of Deism' (1814); a series of unfinished philosophical essays of the year 1815 'On Life', 'On a Future State', &c.; and a 'History of a Six Weeks' Tour' (written with Mrs. Shelley, 1817). T. L. Peacock's 'Memoirs of Shelley' are in Peacock's 'Works' (1875); also edited by H. F. B. Brett-Smith (1909). E. J. Trelawny's 'Recollections of the Last Days of Shelley and Byron' appeared in 1858, his 'Records of Shelley, Byron, and the Author' in 1878.

Shelta, a cryptic language used by tinkers, composed partly of Irish or Gaelic words, mostly disguised by inversion or alteration of initial consonants.

SHENSTONE, WILLIAM (1714-63), a contemporary of S. Johnson (q.v.) at Pembroke College, Oxford. As a poet much of his work is criticized for an artificial prettiness similar to that which he pursued in adorning his estate at the Leasowes, near Halesowen. Of this, his 'Pastoral Ballad' (1755) is an example. His best-known work is 'The Schoolmistress' (1742). He wrote miscellaneous verse (including 'I have found out a gift for my fair'), elegies, odes, songs, and ballads (including 'Jemmy Dawson', q.v.); and prose, 'Essays on Men and Manners'. The correspondence of Shenstone and a circle of friends (see C.H.E.L. X. xi, 'The Warwickshire Coterie') was much valued at the time and is still of interest.

There is a sketch of Shenstone and the Leasowes in Graves's 'The Spiritual Quixote' (q.v., ix. vii).

Sheol, a word frequently occurring in the Revised Version of the O.T., where in the Authorized Version it was translated hell, grave, or pit; the abode of the dead, conceived by the Hebrews as a subterranean region clothed in thick darkness. [OED.]

Shepherd, LORD CLIFFORD, THE, Henry de Clifford, fourteenth Baron Clifford (1455?-1523), celebrated in Wordsworth's 'Brougham Castle' and 'The White Doe of Rylstone'. His father was attainted and his estates forfeited in 1461. Henry de Clifford was brought up as a shepherd, and restored to his estates and title on the accession of Henry VII.

Shepherds Calender, The, was the earliest important work of Spenser (q.v.), published in 1579. It consists of twelve eclogues, one for each month of the year, written in different metres, and modelled on the eclogues of

SHEPHERDS CALENDER

Theocritus, Virgil, and more modern writers, such as Baptist Mantuan and Marot. They take the form of dialogues among shepherds, except the first and last, which are complaints by 'Colin Cloute', the author himself. Four of them deal with love, one is in praise of Elysa (Queen Elizabeth), one a lament for a 'mayden of greate bloud', four deal allegorically with matters of religion or conduct, one describes a singing-match, and one laments the contempt in which poetry is held.

Shepherd's Calendar, The, a volume of verse by J. Clare (q.v.).

Shepherd's Hunting, The, pastorals written by Wither (q.v.) in the Marshalsea.

Shepherd's Week, The, a series of six pastorals by J. Gay (q.v.), published in 1714.

They are eclogues in the mock-classical style, presenting shepherds and milkmaids, not of the golden age, but of the poet's day, in their grotesque reality. They were designed to parody those of Ambrose ('Namby-Pamby') Philips, but they have survived on their own merits, for their drollery and humour.

Sheppard, JOHN (1702-24): 'Jack Sheppard', the son of a carpenter, and brought up in Bishopsgate workhouse, became a thief and highwayman, and after repeated escapes from prison, was hanged at Tyburn. He was the subject of tracts by Defoe, of many plays and ballads, and of a novel by W. H. Ainsworth.

SHERATON, THOMAS (1751-1806), the famous furniture maker and designer, published his 'Cabinet-maker and Upholsterer's Drawing Book' in 1791, and 'Cabinet Dictionary' in 1803. He advocated a severe style and adhered to it except in his later designs.

SHERIDAN, Mrs. FRANCES (1724-66), the mother of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, was author of the 'Memoirs of Miss Sidney Bidulph' (1761-7, a novel after the manner of 'Pamela'), of the 'History of Nourjahad' (1767), and of 'The Discovery', a comedy successfully produced by Garrick in 1763.

SHERIDAN, RICHARD BRINSLEY (1751-1816), the son of Thomas Sheridan (an actor and author), was educated at Harrow. He married Elizabeth Ann Linley in 1773, after escorting her from Bath to France and fighting two duels with Major Mathews, her persecutor. His comedy, 'The Rivals' (q.v., written when the author was only 24), was acted at Covent Garden in 1775. 'St. Patrick's Day' and 'The Duenna' (q.v.) were played in the same year. He acquired Garrick's share in Drury Lane Theatre in 1776, and in 1777 produced there 'A Trip to Scarborough' (q.v.) and 'The School for Scandal' (q.v.). His famous farce, 'The Critic' (q.v.), was given in 1779, and 'Pizarro' (adapted from Kotzebue's 'The Spaniards in Peru' and showing a great decline in style) in 1799. His new theatre was opened in 1794, but destroyed by fire in 1809. He was returned to parliament in 1780 as a supporter of Fox, and thereafter devoted himself to public affairs. In 1787 he made his great speech of nearly six hours in moving the adoption of the Oude charge against Warren Hastings, and again made a celebrated speech in 1788 as manager of the impeachment. He was treasurer of the navy in the ministry 'of all the talents', 1806-7. He was arrested for debt in 1813, and in his last years suffered from brain disease. He received a great public funeral. There are several portraits of him by Reynolds.

SHERLOCK, THOMAS (1678-1761), son of W. Sherlock (q.v.), educated at Eton, became a fellow and subsequently master of St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge. As master of the Temple (1704-53) he obtained reputation as a preacher, and rose successively to the sees of Bangor, Salisbury, and London (1748-61). He took part in the Bangorian controversy (q.v.), and published, among other works, 'A Tryal of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus' (1729), a defence of the historical occurrence of miracles in the singular form of the trial and acquittal of the Apostles in the Inns of Court on the charge of giving false evidence.

SHERLOCK, WILLIAM (1641?-1707), educated at Eton and Peterhouse, Cambridge, became master of the Temple and dean of St. Paul's. He was author of 'A Practical Discourse concerning Death' (1689) and 'A Practical Discourse concerning a Future Judgment' (1692), besides numerous controversial treatises; and was regarded in his time as a great preacher. Macaulay says of him ('History of England') that though there were more brilliant men among the contemporary clergy, none spoke more precisely the sense of the Anglican priesthood, without taint of Latitudinarianism, Puritanism, or Popery. He was a non-juror and was suspended, but was converted and took the oaths in 1691. This created an uproar and made him the object of attacks, vindications, and pasquinades.

Sherry, originally the white wine made near Xeres (now Jerez de la Frontera, near Cadiz in Spain); in modern use extended to Spanish wines of similar character. Falstaff refers to it ('sherris-sack', '2 Henry IV', iv. iii), and allusions are frequent in the 17th cent. See Manzanilla, Amontillado, Paxarete.

SHERWOOD, Mrs. MARY MARTHA (1775-1851), née Butt, was author of numerous popular books for children and young people, including 'Susan Gray' (1802), 'Little Henry and his Bearer' (1815, the outcome of a period spent in India), and, best known of all, 'The History of the Fairchild Family' (3 parts, 1818-47), which has frequently been reprinted. Mrs. Sherwood's 'Life, chiefly SHI'a or SH'ITES, the Moslem sect that regards Ali (q.v.) and his descendants as the rightful Caliphs. The Persians are the chief representatives of the Shi'ites.

Shibboleth, the Hebrew word used by Jephthah as a test-word by which to distinguish the fleeing Ephraimites (who could not pronounce the sh) from his own men, the Gileadites (Judges xii. 4-6). Hence a word or formula used as a test by which the adherents of a party, &c., may be distinguished from others. In the above passage the word probably means 'stream in flood'. [OED.]

Shillbeer, GEORGE (1797-1866), the pioneer in London of omnibuses, which were familiarly known by his name.

Shimei, in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), Slingsby Bethel, the sheriff of London and Middlesex, whose taking of the oaths in order to qualify for office was the subject of several pamphlets. The reference in the name is to 1 Kings ii. 37 et seq.

Shinto, the native religious system of Japan, the central belief of which is that the Mikado (q.v.) is the descendant of the sun-goddess, and that implicit obedience is due to him.

Ship of Fools, The, an adaptation of the famous 'Narrenschiff' of Sebastian Brandt. The 'Narrenschiff' was written in the dialect of Swabia and first published in 1494. It became extremely popular and was translated into many languages. Its theme is the shipping off of fools of all kinds from their native land to the Land of Fools. The fools are introduced by classes and reproved for their folly. The popularity of the book was largely due to the spirited illustrations, which show a sense of humour that the text lacks.

It was translated into English 'out of Latin, French, and Doche' by Alexander Barclay (q.v.), and published in England in 1509; the translation is not literal but is an adaptation to English conditions, and gives a picture of contemporary English life. It starts with the fool who has great plenty of books,

But fewe I rede and fewer understande, and the fool 'that new garments loves and devises', and passes to a condemnation of the various evils of the time, notably the misdeeds of officials and the corruption of the courts. The work is interesting as an early collection of satirical types. Its influence is seen in 'Cocke Lorell's Bote' (q.v.).

Shipman's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Ship-money, an ancient tax levied in time of war on the ports and maritime towns and counties of England to provide ships for the king's service. It was revived by Charles I (with an extended application to inland counties); his first two writs of ship-money provoked grumbling, the third led to Hampden's case in the Exchequer Chamber; it was finally declared illegal by statute of 1641. The imposition was one of the causes that led to the Civil War. But ship-money was spent on the navy; one of the finest ships ever built, 'The Sovereign of the Seas', Pett's masterpiece, was built with ship-money. The real danger was that, if acquiesced in, it might lead to 'soldier-money' too.

Shipton, MOTHER, according to tradition, a witch and prophetess who lived near Knaresborough in Yorkshire at the end of the 15th cent. (her maiden name being Ursula Southill or Southiel), and married one Tobias Shipton, a builder of York. She is said to have produced prophecies relating to persons of importance at the court of Henry VIII, and to have foretold the Great Fire of London, and other notable events. Her history is not supported by serious authority.

Shipwreck, The, see Falconer (W.).

Shirburne Ballads, The, edited in 1907 by Andrew Clark from a manuscript of 1600-16 (a few pieces are later) at Shirburne Castle, Oxfordshire, belonging to the earl of Macclesfield. The collection contains ballads not found elsewhere, dealing with political events, with legends and fairy tales, or with stories of domestic life. Some of them are homilies.

Shirley, a novel by C. Brontë (q.v.), published in 1849.

The scene of the story is Yorkshire and the period the latter part of the Napoleonic wars, the time of the Luddite riots, when the wool industry of the country was suffering from the almost complete cessation of exports. In spite of these conditions Robert Gérard Moore, half English, half Belgian by birth, a mill-owner of determined character, persists in introducing the latest labour-saving machinery, undeterred by the opposition of the workers, which culminates in an attempt first to destroy his mill, and finally to take his life. To overcome the financial difficulties that hamper his plans he proposes to Shirley Keeldar, a young lady of wealth and high spirit, though he loves, not her, but the gentle and retiring Caroline Helstone, who is pining away for love of him in the oppressive atmosphere of her uncle's rectory. Robert is contemptuously rejected by Shirley, and, when the end of the war releases him from his embarrassments, marries the faithful Caroline. Meanwhile Shirley and Robert's brother, Louis, another strong, proud character, occupying the humble position of tutor in her family, successfully overcome the difficulties in the way of their mutual love. In Shirley Keeldar, Charlotte Brontë depicted the character of her sister Emily, as she saw it.

SHIRLEY

SHIRLEY, JAMES (1596-1666), was born in London and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, St. John's College, Oxford, and St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge. He took orders, but was presently converted to the Church of Rome and became a schoolmaster. He followed the earl of Newcastle in the Civil Wars, after which he returned to the profession of schoolmaster. His graceful poem, 'Narcissus', on the efforts of an enamoured maiden to awaken love in a cold youth (after the manner of Shakespeare's 'Venus and Adonis'), was published as 'Eccho' in 1618. He made an attack on Prynne (q.v.), then in prison, for his condemnation of the stage, in the dedication of 'A Bird in a Cage', printed in 1633. He was in Dublin from 1636 to 1640. He died as a result of terror and exposure on the occasion of the Great Fire of London.

Shirley wrote some forty dramas, of which the greater number are extant. The tragedies include: 'The Maid's Revenge' (1626, printed 1639), 'The Traitor' (q.v., 1631, printed 1635), 'Love's Cruelty' (q.v., 1631, printed 1640), and 'The Cardinall' (q.v., 1641, printed 1653). He also wrote comedies of manners and romantic comedies, including: 'Changes, or Love in a Maze' (1632, the interchanges of affection between three pairs of lovers), 'Hyde Park' (q.v., 1632, printed 1637), 'The Gamester' (q.v., 1633, adapted by Garrick and others), 'The Coronation' (1635, printed 1640, the transference of a crown, owing to the discovery, successively, of two brothers of a queen), 'The Lady of Pleasure' (1635, the cure of a wife's desire for a life of fashionable folly by her husband's feigning to engage in gambling and intrigue), 'The Imposture' (q.v., 1640, printed 1652), 'The Sisters' (q.v., 1642, printed 1652). Shirley also wrote 'The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses' (1659) for the armour of the dead Achilles, a dramatic entertainment ending with the famous dirge

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things,

'the fine song which old Bowman used to sing to King Charles' and which is said to have terrified Oliver Cromwell. He was disparaged by Dryden ('Mac Flecknoe'), but his reputation was revived by Charles Lamb. Shirley's works were edited by Alexander Dyce in 1833.

SHIRLEY, JOHN (1366?-1456), said to have been a traveller in various lands, and described by Skeat as an amateur rather than a professional scribe. He was buried in St. Bartholomew's the Less. He translated from the French and Latin and transcribed the works of Chaucer, Lydgate, and others. His collections of their poems are extant, and it is on his authority that various poems are attributed to Chaucer.

Shoemaker's Holiday, The, or A pleasant comedy of the Gentle Craft, a comedy by Dekker (q.v.), published in 1600.

Rowland Lacy, a kinsman of the earl of Lincoln, loves Rose, the daughter of the lord mayor of London. To prevent the match, the earl sends him to France in command of a company of men. Lacy resigns his place to a friend, and, disguised as a Dutch shoemaker, takes service with Simon Eyre, who supplies the family of the lord mayor with shoes. Here he successfully pursues his suit, is married in spite of the efforts of the earl and the lord mayor to prevent it, and is pardoned by the king. The most entertaining character in the play is that of Simon Eyre, the cheery, eccentric master-shoemaker, who becomes lord mayor of London.

Shogun, THE, the hereditary commander-in-chief of the Japanese army, also called Tycoon. By successive usurpations of power the Shogun became the real ruler of Japan, though nominally the subject of the Mikado and acting in his name. In 1867, with the abolition of the feudal system, the Mikado assumed the actual sovereignty, and the reign of the Shoguns came to an end.

Shore, JANE (d. 1527?), mistress of Edward IV. She was the daughter of a Cheapside mercer and wife of a Lombard Street goldsmith, and exercised great influence over Edward IV by her beauty and wit. She was afterwards mistress of Thomas Grey, first marquess of Dorset. She was accused by Richard III of sorcery, imprisoned, and made to do public penance in 1483, and died in poverty. There are two portraits of her at Eton, which foundation she is said to have saved from confiscation at the hands of the Yorkist king, her lover.

She is the subject of a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', of a remarkable passage in Sir Thomas More's history of Richard III, and of a descriptive note by Drayton ('England's Heroical Epistles'). The last two passages are quoted in Percy's 'Reliques'. Her adversities are the subject of a tragedy by Rowe (q.v.).

Shoreditch, a district in London named, according to legend, from Jane Shore (q.v.), the mistress of Edward IV, who is supposed to have died there in a ditch. But the name dates from before her time. Stow calls it Soersditch or Soerditch, and says that it had borne the name for 400 years.

Short Parliament, THE, the first of the two parliaments summoned by Charles I in 1640. It resolved to ask for a redress of the nation's grievances before granting supply, and prepared to demand the abandonment of the war with Scotland. In fact it was disposed to go as far as the Long Parliament did. It was dissolved after it had sat for three weeks.

Sibylline Leaves, a volume of poems by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.).

Sibyls, THE, certain inspired women said to have lived in various parts of the ancient world, at Cumae, Delphi, Erythrae in Ionia, &c. The best known is the Cumaean (sometimes identified with the Erythraean) sibyl, Herophilê by name, who was beloved by Apollo. He offered to give her whatever she wished. She asked to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but omitted to demand health and youth as well. She had already lived 700 years when Aeneas came to Italy. It was usual for the sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and those who consulted her had to be careful to take these up before the wind dispersed them. She instructed Aeneas how to find his father in the infernal regions. According to another legend, she came to the palace of Tarquin II with nine volumes (the Sibylline Books), which she offered at a high price. The monarch refused them. The sibyl burnt three, and offered the remainder at the same price; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, burnt three more and again offered the remainder at the same price. Whereupon Tarquin bought the last three books. These were probably written in Greek, and were kept, under the custody of special officers, in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. They were consulted in times of national calamity in order to discover how to avert the anger of the gods. When the temple of Jupiter was burnt down in 83 B.C., the books were destroyed. Thereupon a fresh collection of sibylline prophecies was made in Asia Minor and the Greek cities of Italy and Sicily. These were re-copied in the time of Augustus, and, it is said, other fabricated prophecies added to them. They continued to be consulted occasionally for several centuries.

Siddons, MRS. SARAH (1755-1831), the sister of J. Kemble (q.v.), the actor, probably the one great tragedy queen that Britain ever produced. She first attracted attention in the part of Belvidera in Otway's 'Venice Preserv'd' (q.v.), and was subsequently famous in her impersonation of Lady Macbeth and other Shakespearian characters. One of her most effective parts was that of the heroine in Rowe's 'Jane Shore'. She married William Siddons, an actor. A picture of her by Reynolds as 'The Tragic Muse' is at Dulwich, and her portrait by Gainsborough is in the National Portrait Gallery.

SIDGWICK, HENRY (1838-1900), educated at Rugby and Trinity College, Cambridge, was from 1883 professor of moral philosophy at that university. A follower in economics and politics of John Stuart Mill, his attitude on the question of our knowledge of the external world resembles that of Reid (q.v.). But his most important work as a philosophical writer relates to ethics, and his reputation rests on his 'Methods of Ethics', published in 1874. Here his doctrine combines an intuitional notion of duty, certain 'axioms of the practical reason' (prudence, benevolence, and justice), with an empirical discovery of the nature of goodness. The ultimate conflict between prudence and benevolence remains unresolved, and in this duality Sidgwick finds the argument for a divine government of the world. But Sidgwick was seen at his best in analysis and criticism, rather than in construction. His other works include: 'Ethics of Conformity and Subscription' (1871), 'Principles of Political Economy' (1883), 'The Scope and Method of Economic Science' (1885), 'Outlines of the History of Ethics' (1886), and 'Elements of Politics' (1891).

Sídhé (pron. 'shé') or ÁES SÍDHÉ, the 'People of the Hills', the name used by the Irish peasantry for the fairies.

SIDNEY, ALGERNON (1622-83), the grand-nephew of Sir Philip Sidney, and younger brother of Waller's 'Sacharissa' (see Waller), took up arms against Charles I and was wounded at Marston Moor. He was employed on government service until the Restoration, but his firm republicanism was the source of hostility to Cromwell. At the Restoration he refused to give pledges to Charles II, and lived abroad in poverty and exile until 1677. He was sent to the Tower of London after the discovery of the Rye House Plot, tried before Jeffreys, and condemned without adequate evidence, though there was little doubt of his guilt. He was executed on Tower Hill. He wrote 'Discourses concerning Government', first printed in 1698, and a treatise on 'Love', published in 1884.

SIDNEY, SIR PHILIP (1554-86), son of Sir Henry Sidney (who was thrice lord-deputy of Ireland) and of Leicester's sister, was educated at Shrewsbury and Christ Church, Oxford. He became intimate with Sir F. Greville (q.v., Lord Brooke) and Camden (q.v.), and was favoured by Sir William Cecil (Lord Burghley). He visited France, Austria, Venice (meeting Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese), Genoa, and Padua, between 1572 and 1575. In 1583 he married Frances, daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham. In 1576 he became acquainted with Walter Devereux, first earl of Essex, and his daughter Penelope, to whom he addressed the famous series of sonnets known as 'Astrophel and Stella' (q.v.), written during 1580-4. He saw much of Spenser at Leicester House, and received the dedication of his 'Shepheards Calender'. He became a member of the Areopagus (a club formed chiefly for the purpose of naturalizing the classical metres in English verse, which included Spenser, Fulke Greville, Harvey, Dyer, and others). In 1584 he was appointed governor of Flushing; with Prince Maurice he surprised Axel in 1586, and in the same year joined as a volunteer the attack on a Spanish convoy for the relief of Zutphen. Here, on 22 Sept., he received a fatal wound in the thigh. As he lay dying, he passed a cup of water to another wounded man, saying, 'Thy necessity is greater than mine'. He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, and his death evoked elegies by Spenser ('Astrophel'), Matthew Roydon (included after 'Astrophel' in Spenser's Works), James VI, Breton, Drayton, and others. There are portraits of him at Penshurst and elsewhere. He is the subject of a poem by Swinburne.

Sidney exercised an extraordinary influence on the poets of his own and the following generations, heightened, perhaps, by the romantic character of his personal history. None of his works appeared in his lifetime; the 'Arcadia' (q.v.) was first published in 1590; the 3rd edition (1598) included his 'Apologie for Poetrie' (q.v.) and 'Astrophel and Stella' (q.v.), of which an unauthorized edition had appeared in 1591. Sidney's version of the Psalms was published in 1823 and reprinted as 'Rock Honeycomb' in Ruskin's 'Bibliotheca Pastorum'. His collective poetical works were edited by Dr. Grossart in 1873.

Sidrophel, the astrologer in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v., II. iii). He is supposed to represent Sir Paul Neal, a conceited member of the Royal Society, who thought he had discovered an elephant in the moon, in fact a mouse in his telescope.

Siege of Corinth, The, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1816.

It is founded on the story of the siege by the Turks, in 1715, of Corinth, then held by the Venetians. The Turks, guided by the renegade Alp, who loves the daughter of the Venetian governor, Minotti, make their way into the fortress. Minotti fires the magazine, and destroys victors and defenders, including himself.

Siege of Rhodes, The, the first attempt at English opera, by D'Avenant, performed in 1656.

Dramatic performances having been suppressed by the Commonwealth government, D'Avenant obtained authority in 1656 to produce at Rutland House an 'Entertainment after the manner of the ancients', in which Diogenes and Aristophanes argue against and for public amusements, and a Londoner and Parisian compare the merits of their two cities; this was accompanied by vocal and instrumental music, composed by Henry Lawes. Immediately after this prologue was given the 'Siege of Rhodes' (at first in one, but in 1662 in two parts), a heroic play, the 'story sung in recitative music', which was composed by Dr. Charles Coleman and George Hudson. The play deals with the siege of Rhodes by Solymán the Magnificent, and the devotion by which Ianthe, wife of the Sicilian Duke Alphonso, saves her husband and the defenders of the island.

Siegfried, the hero of the first part of the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.).

In Wagner's opera, 'Siegfried', the hero, son of Siegmund and Sieglinde (see Valkyrie), brought up by the Nibelung smith, Mime, forges the Nothung sword from the fragments of the sword of his father. With this he slays Fafner, the giant snake who guards the stolen Rhine-gold, and obtains the magic ring and the 'tarn-helm' which enables him to assume any shape he pleases. He passes through the flames that surround Brynhilde and awakens her, and they plight their troth. For the end of the story see Götterdämmerung.

Siegfrind, in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.), the mother of Siegfried.

Siegmund, in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.), the father of Siegfried.

Sigismonda (Ghismonda), in Boccaccio's 'Decameron' (iv. i), daughter of Tancred, prince of Salerno. Her father, having discovered her love for his squire Guiscardo, slew the latter and sent his heart in a golden cup to Sigismonda, who took poison and died. The father, repenting his cruelty, caused the pair to be buried in the same tomb. The story is the subject of Dryden's 'Sigismunda and Guiscardo', and of Robert Wilmot's 'Tancred and Gismund' (q.v.). James Thomson's 'Tancred and Sigismunda' (1745) deals with a different story (see Tancred and Sigismunda).

Sigmund, in the 'Volsunga Saga' (q.v.) and in W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), the son of King Volsung and the father of Sigurd.

Signy, in the 'Volsunga Saga' and in W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), the daughter of King Volsung and the sister of Sigmund.

Siguna, in Norse mythology, the wife of Loki (q.v.).

Sigurd the Volsung and the Fall of the Niblungs, The Story of, an epic in four books, in anapaestic couplets, by W. Morris (q.v.), founded upon the 'Volsunga Saga', and published in 1876.

The first book of this, Morris's most important work, recounts the grim tale of Sigmund, the father of Sigurd, and the three other books deal with the story of Sigurd himself. Signy, daughter of King Volsung, is married to Siggeir, the dastardly king of the Goths. Hatred springs up between Siggeir and Sigmund, son of Volsung and brother of Signy. Siggeir treacherously causes the death of Volsung and of all his sons except Sigmund, whose great strength enables him to escape. He and Signy devise revenge, and this is effected by the help of Sinfiotli, a son born to Signy of Sigmund. Siggeir is burnt in his palace, Signy voluntarily sharing his fate. Sigmund recovers his kingdom; Sinfiotli is poisoned, and Sigmund is killed in battle.

Sigurd, the son of Sigmund by Hiordis, having learnt the lore of Regin, the dwarf-smith, and acquired Greyfell, the brave horse of Gripir, and the sword that was the gift of Odin, slays Fafnir, the serpent enemy of the gods that guards the elf-gold, and takes the treasure. He finds the beautiful and all-wise Brynhild sleeping in the midst of the wild-fire, awakes her, and is betrothed to her. He then joins the Niblungs, and as the result of a magic draught given him by Grimhild, their queen, forgets Brynhild, and is married to Gudrun, the Niblung king's daughter. He woos Brynhild for Gunnar, Gudrun's brother, assuming his semblance, and wins her, but lays his sword between himself and her as they lie together. Brynhild is wedded to Gunnar. Strife arises between her and Gudrun, and Brynhild learns the trick that has been played upon her. Deeply incensed, she provokes Gunnar to have Sigurd slain, and kills herself that she may join her beloved. Gudrun, in her exceeding grief for Sigurd, withdraws into the wilds.

The last book narrates the fall of the Niblungs. Atli (Attila), 'a king of the outlands', false and avaricious, attracted by the Niblung treasure, seeks the hand of Gudrun, and obtains it, for Gudrun meditates vengeance for the death of Sigurd. Then Atli lures Gunnar and his kinsfolk to his city, and causes them to be slain. Gudrun kills Atli and takes her own life. There is some historical basis for the legend from the point where Attila comes into the story.

Sikes, BILL, a character in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

Silas Lapham, see Rise of Silas Lapham.

Silas Marner, a novel by George Eliot (q.v.), published in 1861.

Silas Marner, a linen-weaver, has been driven out of the small religious community to which he belongs by a false charge of theft, and has taken refuge in the agricultural village of Raveloe. His only consolation in his loneliness is his growing pile of gold. This is stolen from his cottage by the squire's reprobate son, Dunstan Cass, who disappears. Dunstan's elder brother, Godfrey, is in love with Nancy Lammeter, but is secretly and unhappily married to a woman of low class in a neighbouring town. Meditating revenge for Godfrey's refusal to acknowledge her, this woman carries her child one New Year's Eve to Raveloe, intending to force her way into the Casses' house; but dies in the snow. Her child, Eppie, finds her way into Silas's cottage, is adopted by him, and restores to him the happiness which he has lost with his gold. After many years, the draining of a pond near Silas's door reveals the body of Dunstan with the gold. Moved by this revelation, Godfrey, now married to Nancy, acknowledges himself the father of Eppie and claims her, but she refuses to leave Silas. The solemnity of the story is relieved by the humour of the rustic revellers at the Rainbow Inn, and the genial motherliness of Dolly Winthrop, who befriends Silas.

Silence, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV' (q.v.), a country justice.

Silĕni, a name given of old to apothecaries' boxes ornamented with grotesque figures of, amongst others, Silenus (q.v.), and containing perfumes and spices. Alcibiades, in Plato's 'Symposium', compares Socrates to one of these. They figure in the prologue to Rabelais's 'Gargantua'.

Silent Woman, The, see Epicæne.

SILÉNUS, in Greek mythology a Satyr (q.v.), the foster-father and attendant of Dionysus (q.v.). He is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass, intoxicated, and crowned with flowers. He once lost his way in Phrygia and was brought by peasants to King Midas, who entertained him kindly. In reward for this, Midas gave the power of turning to gold whatever he touched (see Midas). He is the subject of a poem by Thomas Woolner (1825-92).

Silhouette, a portrait obtained by tracing the outline of a profile, head, or figure, by means of its shadow, and filling in the whole outline with black; or cut out of black paper. The word is derived from Étienne de Silhouette (1709-67), controller-general of finances in France for eight months in 1759. According to the usual account it was intended to ridicule the petty economies introduced by Silhouette while holding the appointment; but Hatzfeldt and Darmsteter take the expression 'à la silhouette' to refer to his brief tenure of office, 'appliqué plaisamment à tout ce qui paraissait éphémère'. Littré, however, also quotes a statement that Silhouette himself decorated the walls of his château at Bry-sur-Marne with outline portraits.

SILIUS ITALICUS, TIBERIUS CATIUS (A.D. 25-101), Roman poet, author of a long epic, the 'Punica', on the wars with Hannibal.

Sillery, a high-class wine from the commune of Sillery in Champagne. The name usually denotes a still wine known as Sillery sec, originally the produce of the Sillery vineyards, but now mainly obtained from the neighbouring ones of Verzenay and Mailly.

Silurians, an ancient British tribe that inhabited the south-east part of Wales.

SILVA, FELICIANO DA, a 16th-cent. Spanish romance writer, who composed sequels to 'Amadis of Gaul' and to 'Celestina' (qq.v.), and was ridiculed in 'Don Quixote'.

Silver-fork, a term used to designate a school of novelists about 1830, distinguished by an affectation of gentility.

Silvia, a character in Shakespeare's 'Two Gentlemen of Verona' (q.v.). See also Sylvia.

Simile, an object, scene, or action, introduced by way of comparison for explanatory, illustrative, or merely ornamental purpose.

SIMMS, WILLIAM GILMORE (1806-70), prolific American writer, author of some fifty volumes in prose and verse, born in Charleston, South Carolina. His poetry was highly esteemed by contemporary critics, and among romantic novelists he was Cooper's closest rival. His works include:

SIMPLE STORY

'Atlantis, A Story of the Sea' (1832), 'Martin Faber' (1833), 'Guy Rivers' (1834), 'The Yemassee' (1835), 'The Partisan' (1835), 'Mellichampe' (1836), 'The Kinsman' (1841), 'Donna Florida' (1843), 'Katherine Walton' (1851), 'The Sword and the Distaff' (1853), 'The Cassique of Kiawah' (1859). His literary labours also include biographies of Chevalier Bayard, Captain John Smith, Nathaniel Greene, and Francis Marion, popular histories of South Carolina, an edition of Shakespeare's apocryphal plays, and three tragedies in verse.

Simmel, LAMBERT (fl. 1475-1525), of humble parentage, was educated by Richard Simon, a priest, taken by him to Ireland, and persuaded to give himself out as Edward, earl of Warwick, son of the duke of Clarence (there seems to have been some hesitation whether he should personate Warwick or Richard, duke of York). He was joined by Lord Lovel and the earl of Lincoln, was crowned at Dublin as Edward VI (1487), and crossed to England, where the force that he brought with him from Ireland was utterly defeated by Henry VII at Stoke-on-Trent. Simmel was pardoned and employed as a turnspit in the royal kitchen. Long afterwards Henry VII invited some reconciled Irish peers to dine with him and made Simmel wait on them. They did not appreciate the joke.

Simon Eyre (d. 1459), according to Stow, a draper who became mayor of London, was a generous benefactor of the city, and built Leadenhall as a public granary and market. He figures in Dekker's 'The Shoemaker's Holiday' (q.v.).

Simon Magus, the sorcerer of Samaria referred to in Acts viii. 9-13 as converted by Philip. His attempts to purchase miraculous powers by offering the Apostles money (Acts viii. 18-19) is alluded to in our word Simony. According to other accounts, he claimed divine attributes and was the founder of an early Christian sect known as the Simonians, regarded as heretical.

Simon Pure, a character in Mrs. Centlivre's 'A Bold Stroke for a Wife' (q.v.).

SIMONIDES (c. 556-c. 468 B.C.), of the Ionian island of Ceos, the first great lyric poet of Greece as a whole (Jebb). His most distinctive work was in his epigrams, notable for their simplicity and power, especially a famous epitaph on the Three Hundred who fell at Thermopylae. Some fragments of his poetry survive, as also of the iambic poet SIMONIDES (or SEMONIDES) OF AMORGOS (c. 640 B.C.).

Simorg, see Simurgh.

Simple Simon, the subject of various nursery rhymes, used generally to indicate a silly gullible person.

Simple Story, A, a romance by Mrs. Inchbald (q.v.), published in 1791.

Miss Milner, a gay flirt, falls in love with her guardian, Dorriforth, who is a priest, and he with her, but both conceal their feelings. Dorriforth becomes Lord Elmwood, and is dispensed by Rome from his vows, and the pair marry. In the second part of the story, Lady Elmwood, led astray by Sir Frederick Lawnley, a former suitor, has been banished with her daughter from her husband's house, and it is only after her death, when her daughter, Matilda, has been carried off by a brutal ravisher, that Lord Elmwood relents and rescues Matilda, and restores her to her proper position. A second priest, the arrogant Sandford, plays an important part in directing the course of events. The author's purpose, she states at the end, is to show the value of 'a proper education'.

Simplicissimus, the name of a well-known German comic paper.

Simplicissimus, The Adventurous, the English title of 'Der Abentheurliche Simplicissimus Teutsch' (1669), by Hans Jacob Christoph von Grimmelshausen: a description of the life of a strange vagabond named Melchior Sternfels von Fuchshaim. The work was first translated into English (with an account of the author) in 1912; its chief interest lies in the fact that it is one of the few existing contemporary records of the life of the people during the Thirty Years War.

Simurgh or SIMORG, a monstrous bird of Persian legend, imagined as rational, having the power of speech, and of great age. [OED.] In the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.) a Simurgh nourishes the infant Zâl (q.v.) and afterwards befriends him. One of the feats of Isfendiyar (q.v.) is the slaying of a Simurgh.

Sinbad, see Sindbad.

SINCLAIR, CATHERINE (1800-64), author of 'Holiday House' (1839), a popular book for children, and other books of the same kind, besides many novels.

SINCLAIR, UPTON (1878-), American novelist and journalist, born in Baltimore. Sinclair is a novelist with a strong sociological bias, and most of his books have been written definitely in protest against abuses due (according to Sinclair) to the industrial system. Latterly he has become more violent and communistic in his views. His chief works are: 'King Midas' (1901), 'The Jungle' (1906), 'The Metropolis' (1908), 'King Coal' (1917), 'They Call me Carpenter' (1922), 'Oil' (1927), 'Boston' (1928), 'The Wet Parade' (1931).

Sindabar or SANDABAR, see Syntipas.

Sindbad of the Sea, or Sindbad the Sailor, one of the tales in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.).

Sindbad, a rich young man of Bagdad, having wasted much of his wealth in prodigal living, undertakes a number of sea-voyages as a merchant and meets with various marvellous adventures. The best known are those of the Roc, a huge bird that could lift elephants in its claws, and of the Old Man of the Sea. The latter persuades Sindbad to carry him on his shoulders, whereupon he twines his legs round Sindbad, so that Sindbad cannot dislodge him and remains his captive, until at last he intoxicates the Old Man with wine, succeeds in dislodging him, and kills him.

Sindibad, see Syntipas.

Sinfjotli, in W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), the son of Sigmund and Signy. He appears in 'Beowulf' (q.v.) as Fitela.

Single-speech Hamilton: William Gerard Hamilton (1729-96), who as M.P. for Petersfield made a celebrated maiden speech. He was chief secretary for Ireland (1761-4) and chancellor of the Irish exchequer (1763-84). He spoke ably in the Irish parliament and his conversational powers were praised by Dr. Johnson. The 'Letters of Junius' were attributed to him by some of his contemporaries. His works were published after his death by Malone under the title of 'Parliamentary Logick'.

Singleton, Adventures of Captain, a romance of adventure by Defoe (q.v.), published in 1720. Singleton, who is the narrator of his own story, having been kidnapped in his infancy is sent to sea. Having 'no sense of virtue or religion', he takes part in a mutiny and is put ashore in Madagascar with his comrades; reaches the continent of Africa and crosses it from east to west, encountering many adventures and obtaining much gold, which he dissipates on his return to England. He takes once more to the sea, becomes a pirate, carrying on his depredations in the West Indies, Indian Ocean, and China Seas, acquires great wealth, which he brings home, and finally marries the sister of a shipmate.

Sinls, a legendary robber who haunted the isthmus of Corinth and killed his victims by tying them to the tops of two pine-trees, which he bent down and then allowed to fly up. He was destroyed by Theseus.

Sinn Fein (pron. Shin Fane), 'ourselves', the policy of the Irish Republican party, formulated in 1902; also used for the party itself.

Sinon, see Horse (The Trojan).

Sion College, London, on the site of the ancient Elysng Spital (a hospital founded in the 14th cent. by William Elysng, a mercer, and converted by him into an Augustinian priory), was established by Dr. Thomas White in 1623 as a guild of the clergy of London and its suburbs, with an almshouse for twenty persons. It contains a valuable library of theological works.

Sir Charles Grandison, The History of, a novel by Richardson (q.v.), published in 1754.

As in Richardson's previous novels, the story is told by means of letters. The beautiful and accomplished Harriet Byron comes to London, where she attracts many admirers. Among these, Sir Hargrave Pollexfen, rich, arrogant, and unscrupulous, presses his court and offers marriage with insolent persistence. Infuriated by Harriet's refusal, he has her carried off from a masquerade, attempts by outrageous pressure to carry through a secret marriage ceremony, and being foiled, forcibly removes her in a coach to the country. The coach is fortunately stopped by that of Sir Charles Grandison, a gentleman of high character and fine appearance, by whom Harriet is rescued. Sir Charles and Harriet fall in love, but the former is precluded from offering marriage by certain obligations. When living in Italy, he has rendered great services to the noble family of the Porrettas, and a quasi-engagement has been formed between him and Clementina Porretta, in which her heart is more engaged than his. The difference of their religion has hitherto made it impossible to arrive at an agreement with the parents, and Clementina's mind becomes deranged by her unhappiness. Grandison is summoned to Italy, the parents being now prepared to accept any conditions which will ensure their daughter's recovery. As she gets better, however, she decides that she cannot marry a heretic. Sir Charles is released, and is united to Harriet Byron.

Sir Courtly Nice, or It cannot be, a comedy by Crowne (q.v.), produced in 1685.

This is the best of Crowne's plays and is founded on a comedy by the Spanish dramatist, Moreto. Leonora is in love with Farewel, a young man of quality. But her brother Lord Bellguard, owing to a feud between the families, is determined she shall not marry him. Bellguard keeps Leonora under watch by her aunt, 'an old amorous envious maid', and a pair of spies, Hothead and Fanatick, who hold violently opposed views on religious matters and quarrel amusingly in consequence. Thanks to the resourcefulness of Crack, who introduces himself in an assumed character into Lord Bellguard's house, Farewel is enabled to carry off and marry Leonora; while her rival suitor, favoured by Lord Bellguard, Sir Courtly Nice, a fop whose 'linen is all made in Holland by neat women that dip their fingers in rosewater', is fobbed off with the aunt; and Surly, the rough ill-mannered cynic, gets no wife at all.

Sir Launcelot Greaves, The Adventures of, a novel by Smollett (q.v.).

Sirat, see Al Sirat.

Sirens, THE, fabulous creatures, two (or three) in number, who had the power of luring men to destruction by their song. Their names (variously given) were, according to one version, Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, and they lived in an island off the SW. coast of Italy. Odysseus, informed of the power of their voices by Circe, when passing by this point stopped the ears of his companions with wax and caused himself to be tied to the mast of the ship, and so passed them in safety ('Odyssey', xii). They also attempted to beguile the Argonauts, but

SISTINE MADONNA

Orpheus surpassed them in song. In Plato's 'Republic' (followed by Milton in 'Blest pair of Sirens') they have a good character and supply the music of the spheres. According to later legend the Sirens drowned themselves from annoyance at the escape of Odysseus, and the body of Parthenope was washed ashore at the site of the future Naples (see Parthenopean Republic).

Sirlus, see Dog-star.

Sirmio, a promontory on the southern shore of the Lago di Garda (Lacus Benacus), on which Catullus (q.v.) had a villa.

Sirvente, a form of poem or lay, usually satirical, employed by the troubadours. Apparently from Fr. servir, to serve, but the connexion is not clear. [OED.]

SISMONDI, LÉONARD (1773-1842), French historian of Italian descent, author of a famous 'History of the Italian Republics in the Middle Ages' (1809-18), and of a 'History of the French', 'New Principles of Political Economy', &c.

Sister Anne, see Blue Beard.

Sister Helen, a poem by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), published in 1870.

The poem presents in semi-dramatic form the story of a woman who destroys her unfaithful lover by melting his waxen image, and thereby loses her own soul.

Sisters, The, a comedy by James Shirley (q.v.), produced in 1642.

The theme is the contrast of two sisters, Paulina and Angellina, the one arrogant, the other modest. Paulina is fooled by Frapolo, a chief of bandits, masquerading first as a fortune-teller who prophesies her marriage with a prince; then as Prince of Parma, in which character she marries him. The true prince supervenes and falls in love with Angellina. Frapolo's fraud is exposed, and moreover Paulina is discovered to be a peasant's daughter and a changeling.

Sisters, The, a tragedy in prose by Swinburne (q.v.).

Sistine Chapel, THE, a chapel in the Vatican at Rome, built by Sixtus IV, from whom it takes its name. He was pope 1471-84, and a great builder and improver of the city. The chapel is uninteresting architecturally, but Sixtus employed Perugino, Botticelli, Signorelli, and other great artists to decorate the walls. Michelangelo's famous painted ceiling was added in the pontificate of Julius II, and his fresco of the Last Judgement under Paul III.

Sistine Madonna, a famous painting by Raphael (1518) now in the museum at Dresden. It is so named from the figure of Pope Sixtus II, who kneels in adoration of the Virgin.

SISYPHUS

Sisyphus, a legendary king of Corinth, famous for his cunning, who outwitted Autolykus (q.v.). When the latter stole his neighbours' cattle, Sisyphus, who mistrusted him, was able to pick out his own, having marked them under the feet. After his death, Sisyphus, on account of misdeeds variously related, was condemned in hell to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which when it reached the summit rolled back to the plain, so that his punishment was eternal.

Sita, in the 'Rāmāyana' (q.v.), the wife of Rama.

SITWELL, EDITH (1887-), and her two brothers (see below), have been three of the most discussed writers of the present time. The attack and popularity which they have known arose from their interest and concern for poetry, and largely from the technical tricks they (especially Miss Sitwell) played with it. Briefly Miss Sitwell, in her work, 'is strikingly different from the average poetic poet: (a) in seeking to communicate sensation, more than to describe; (b) in avoidance of worn-out traditional imagery and metaphor; (c) in adapting poetry to modern musical (mainly dance) rhythms; (d) in (her own words) studying "the effect that texture has on rhythm, and the effect that varying and elaborate patterns of rhymes and of assonances and dissonances have upon rhythm".' (A. C. Ward, 'The Nineteen-Twenties'.) Her 'Collected Poems' were issued in 1930.

The poetic work of OSBERT SITWELL (1892-) has been largely satirical. But 'England Reclaimed' (1927) is a presentation of the housekeeper at the Great House, the servants, and the persons of the village. Even in this presentation there is a faint suggestion of the superior intellect observing the inferior.

The poetry of SACHEVERELL SITWELL (1897-) is more definitely intellectual and in a sense more technically traditional than Miss Sitwell's. Besides his poems ('Hortus Conclusus', 'The People's Palace', 'The Hundred and One Harlequins', 'The Thirteenth Caesar', and 'The Cyder Feast') he has written three volumes containing his own personal reflections on European art and history, entitled 'The Gothick North': (i) 'The Visit of the Gypsies', (ii) 'These Sad Ruins', (iii) 'The Fair-haired Victory' (1929-30).

Siva or SHIVA, the third god of the great Hindu triad, of which Brahma and Vishnu are the other two members. He is regarded as a development of the Vedic Rudra. He is the god of destruction, and of the regeneration which follows it, and is generally worshipped under a phallic symbol. He shares with Vishnu the principal worship of the Hindus. He is represented with three eyes, a necklace of skulls, and a serpent wound about him. His wife is Durga (who has also other names, Devi, Uma, &c.). He is especially worshipped at Benares.

SKEFFINGTON

Six Articles, THE, a statute passed in 1539 declaring in favour of the 'real presence' in the Lord's Supper, clerical celibacy, auricular confession, &c. Whoever spoke against the first was to be burnt; whoever spoke against the others was to suffer loss of goods and imprisonment, and to be hanged for a repetition of the offence. The Act marked the return of Henry VIII, after Cromwell's loss of influence, to 'Catholicism without the Pope'. The Protestants called it the 'Whip with six strings'. It was repealed in 1547.

Six Nations, THE, see Five Nations.

Sixteen-string Jack, a noted highwayman, John Rann, hanged in 1774, remarkable for his foppery and for wearing a bunch of sixteen strings at the knees of his breeches. He is referred to in Boswell's 'Johnson' (11 Apr. 1776).

Skadi or SKADHI, in Scandinavian mythology, the wife of the sea-god Njörd. The gods, having killed her father, allowed her to choose a husband from among them, but by seeing only their feet.

Skald, an ancient Scandinavian poet, a term usually applied to the poets of the Viking period. The Skaldic verse is extraordinarily elaborate in metre and alliteration.

Skanda, in Hindu mythology, a son of Siva, commander of the armies of the gods against the evil demons, the god of war. He is also called KARTTIKEYA.

Skanderbeg, see Scanderbeg.

SKEat, WALTER WILLIAM (1835-1912), educated at King's College School, Highgate School, and Christ's College, Cambridge, was appointed to a mathematical lectureship at his college in 1864, and devoted his leisure to the study of Early English, with the result that in 1878 he was appointed professor of Anglo-Saxon at Cambridge. He edited 'Lancelot of the Laik' for the Early English Text Society in 1864, and began his great edition of 'Piers Plowman' in 1866. The first part of his edition of John Barbour's 'The Bruce' appeared in 1870, and his two standard works in Early English, the 'Anglo-Saxon Gospels', in 1871-87, and Aelfric's 'Lives of the Saints', in 1881-1900. His seven-volume edition of Chaucer appeared in 1894-7. Skeat founded the English Dialect Society in 1873, which prepared the way for the 'English Dialect Dictionary' (edited by Joseph Wright, 1896-1905). Skeat's 'Etymological Dictionary' (1879-82, revised and enlarged, 1910) was begun with the object of collecting and sifting material for the New English Dictionary. In addition to these major works, he wrote many text-books for schools and universities, and did much to popularize philology and old authors. He also, in his later years, led the way in the systematic study of place-names. In 1871 he edited Chatterton.

SKEFFINGTON, Sir LUMLEY ST.

SKEFFINGTON

GEORGE (1771-1850), a fop and playwright who belonged to the Carlton House circle. He was caricatured by Gillray and satirized by Byron ('English Bards and Scotch Reviewers', 599) and Moore. His 'The Word of Honour', 'The High Road to Marriage', and 'The Sleeping Beauty' were produced 1802-5.

Skeffington's Daughter, or SKEVINGTON's, or SCAVENGER's DAUGHTER, an instrument of torture in which the body was doubled up until the head and feet were drawn together, reputed to have been devised by Leonard Skeffington, associated with his father, Sir William Skeffington, in the Lieutenancy of the Tower in the 16th cent.

Skeggs, CAROLINA WILHELMINA AMELIA, in Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.), one of the fine ladies introduced to the Primroses by Squire Thornhill.

SKELTON, JOHN (1460?-1529), was created 'poet-laureate' by both universities of Oxford and Cambridge, an academical distinction. He became tutor to Prince Henry (Henry VIII), and enjoyed court favour despite his outspokenness. He was admitted to holy orders in 1498 and became parson of Diss in Norfolk. His principal works include: 'The Bowge of Court' (q.v., a satire on the court of Henry VII), printed by Wynkyn de Worde; the 'Garlande of Laurell' (a self-laudatory allegorical poem, describing the crowning of the author among the great poets of the world); 'Phylip Sparowe' (a lamentation put into the mouth of Jane Scroupe, a young lady whose sparrow has been killed by a cat, followed by a eulogy of her by Skelton, and a defence of himself and the poem); 'Colyn Cloute' (a complaint by a vagabond of the misdeeds of ecclesiastics), which gave suggestions to Spenser. Not only this last poem, but also his satires 'Speke, Parrot', and 'Why come ye nat to courte', contained attacks on Cardinal Wolsey, setting forth the evil consequences of his dominating position. As a result Skelton was obliged to take sanctuary at Westminster, where he died. His most vigorous poem was 'The Tunning of Elynour Rumming' (q.v.). His play of 'Magnyfycence' is an example of the Morality (q.v.). In this allegory, Magnificence, symbolizing a generous prince, is ruined by mistaken liberality and bad counsellors, but restored by Goodhope, Perseverance, and other similar figures. Skelton's 'Ballade of the Scottyshe Kynge' is a spirited celebration of the victory of Flodden. A number of Skelton's poems were printed and reprinted in the sixteenth century, most of the extant copies being, though undated, evidently later than the poet's death; in 1568 appeared a fairly full collected edition in one volume. The standard modern edition is by Dyce, 1843. Anecdotes of Skelton appeared in the popular 'Merie Tales' (1566) and similar collections.

His favourite metre was a 'headlong voluble breathless doggerel, which, rattling and clashing on through quick recurring rhymes', 'has taken from its author the title of Skeltonical verse' (Churton Collins). As he himself said ('Colyn Cloute', ii. 53-8):

For though my ryme be ragged,
Tattered and iagged,
Rudely rayne beaten,
Rusty and mothe eaten;
If ye take well therewith,
It hath in it some pyth.

Skepsey, DANIEL, a character in Meredith's 'One of our Conquerors' (q.v.).

Sketches by Box, a collection of sketches of life and manners, by Dickens (q.v.), first published in various periodicals, and in book form in 1836-7 (in one volume, 1839). These are some of Dickens's earliest literary work.

Skevington's Daughter, see Skeffington's Daughter.

Skewton, THE HON. MRS., in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.), the mother of Edith, Dombey's second wife. See also Cleopatra.

Skidbladnir, in Scandinavian mythology, the magic ship of Freyr, made by the Dwarfs. It was large enough to carry all the gods, but could be folded up and carried in the pocket.

Skimmington. It was an ancient custom in the rural parts of England and Scotland to expose and ridicule marital quarrels, and particularly nagging, bullying, and infidelity, by forming a ludicrous procession, with figures carried on a pole, symbolical of the circumstances. This was called 'riding Skimmington' or 'riding the stang'. The origin of the word 'Skimmington' is unknown. It is perhaps from 'skimming', for a frontispiece to 'Divers Crabtree Lectures' (1639) entitled 'Skimmington and her Husband' represents a woman beating her husband with a skimming-ladle. There is a description of a 'Skimmington' in Hardy's 'The Mayor of Casterbridge' (q.v.).

Skimpole, HAROLD, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Skinfaxi (shining-mane), in Scandinavian mythology, the horse of the sun.

SKINNER, JOHN (1721-1807), an Aberdeenshire minister, and the author of 'Tullochgorum', pronounced by Burns 'the best Scotch song Scotland ever saw'. 'Ewie wi' the Crockit Horn', 'Tune your Fiddle', and 'Old Age' are among other favourite songs written by Skinner.

Skinnners, marauders who committed depredations on the neutral ground between the British and American lines during the War of Independence.

Skionar, MR., a character in Peacock's 'Crotchet Castle' (q.v.), perhaps a caricature of Coleridge.

Skogan, see Scoga

SLAWKENBERGIUS

Slawkenbergius, HAFEN, in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.), the German author of a Latin treatise on noses, one of whose Rabelaisian tales is given at the beginning of vol. iv.

Slay-good, in Pt. II of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), a giant whom Mr. Great-heart killed, rescuing Mr. Feeble-mind from his clutches.

Sleary, the circus proprietor in Dickens's 'Hard Times' (q.v.).

Sleeping Beauty, The, a fairy tale, translated from the French of Perrault (q.v.) by Robert Samber (1729?).

Seven fairies are invited to attend the baptism of the daughter of a king and are received with great honour. An old fairy has been overlooked and comes unbidden. Six of the first fairies bestow on the child every imaginable perfection. The old fairy spitefully pronounces that she shall wound herself with a spindle and die. The seventh fairy, who has purposely kept in the background, amends this fate, converting the death into a sleep of a hundred years, from which the princess will be awakened by a king's son. And so it falls out, and the fairy puts every one in the castle also to sleep so that the princess may not wake up all alone, and makes an impenetrable hedge of trees and briars to grow up round the castle. In due course the prince comes and wakens the sleepers.

For analogous legends see Andrew Lang, 'Perrault's Popular Tales'. It is suggested that the Sleeping Beauty represents the earth awakened from her winter sleep by the kiss of the sun.

Sleepy Hollow, The Legend of, a story by W. Irving (q.v.), included in 'The Sketch Book'. Ichabod Crane is a schoolmaster and suitor for the hand of Katrina van Tassel. He meets his death, or, according to another report, leaves the neighbourhood, in consequence of being pursued at night by a headless horseman, an incident for which his rival Brom Bones is suspected to have been responsible.

Sleipnir, the horse of Odin (q.v.).

Slender, a character in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.).

Slick, SAM, see Haliburton.

Slidell and Mason, see Trent Case.

Slimsby, a youthful character in one of the nonsense tales of E. Lear (q.v.).

Slipslop, Mrs., a character in Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

SLOANE, SIR HANS (1660-1753), a physician, secretary to the Royal Society, 1693-1712, and president of the Royal College of Physicians, 1719-35. He purchased the manor of Chelsea and founded there the Botanic Garden. He published (1696) a Latin catalogue of the plants of Jamaica (where he had been physician to the governor, 1687-9) and a 'Voyage' to the West

SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON

Indies (1707-25). His collections (including a large number of books and manuscripts) were purchased by the nation and placed in Montague House (afterwards the British Museum). Sloane Square and Hans Place are named after him.

Slop, DR., in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.), a bigoted and clumsy physician, 'a little, squat, uncourtly figure'. The name was scurrilously applied to Sir John Stoddart (1773-1856) during his editorship of 'The New Times'. Stoddart had been a leader-writer on 'The Times', but, in consequence of a difference with it in 1817, started 'The New Times' as a rival. This paper survived until 1828.

Slope, THE REV. OBADIAH, a character in Trollope's 'Barchester Towers' (q.v.).

Slough of Despond, THE, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), a miry place on the way from the City of Destruction to the wicket-gate. 'As the sinner is awakened about his lost condition, there arise in his soul many fears and doubts, and discouraging apprehensions, which all of them get together, and settle in this place.'

Slowboy, TILLY, a character in Dickens's 'The Cricket on the Hearth' (q.v.).

Sludge, DICKY, or 'Flibbertigibbet', a character in Scott's 'Kenilworth' (q.v.).

Sludge, 'the Medium', see Mr. Sludge.

Slumkey, THE HONOURABLE SAMUEL, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), the Blue candidate in the Eatanswill election.

Sly, CHRISTOPHER, see Taming of the Shrew.

Small House at Allington, The, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1864.

This, though not in the Barchester series of novels as named by Trollope, deals with some of the same characters. Squire Dale, an embittered old bachelor, lives at the 'Great House'; his sister-in-law, with her two daughters, Bell and Lily Dale, at the adjacent 'Small House'. Adolphus Crosbie, a rising government official, well-looking but mean and selfish, wins the love of the warm-hearted but penniless Lily, and becomes engaged to her. Learning that the squire will not provide her with a fortune, his determination to marry her wavers. This reluctance is increased by the aristocratic atmosphere of Courcy Castle, where he goes on a visit, and he yields to the temptation to propose to Lady Alexandrina de Courcy, who accepts him. The jilting of Lily, which nearly breaks her heart, brings condign punishment on his head; he receives a thrashing from Johnny Eames, a humble government clerk, the lifelong adorer of Lily, and is thoroughly unhappy in his married life with Lady Alexandrina, which is soon terminated by their separation. Johnny Eames, who obtains the friendship and support of Earl De Guest, now proposes to Lily, who, though fond of Johnny, still loves Crosbie and considers herself bound for life to him, and consequently refuses Eames. Meanwhile Bell, by refusing Bernard, her cousin, defeats a cherished scheme of their uncle, Squire Dale, and brings about temporary estrangement between the 'Small House' and the 'Great House'. But reconciliation follows, Bell marries the honest Dr. Crofts, and both daughters receive fortunes from the Squire.

We hear a good deal of the heartless and astute Lady Dumbello (the Griselda Grantly of the earlier novels), and of Sir Raffle Buffle, the bullying head of a government department.

Smalls, at Oxford, the colloquial term for the examination officially called Responsions. The name is perhaps connected (through association with L. in parvis) with in parvisio, in the parvise, an academic conference or disputation, so called from being originally held in the portico of a church. The testamur issued by the examiners at Responsions stated (down to 1893) that a successful candidate had answered to the questions of the Masters of the Schools 'in parvisio'. [OED.]

SMART, CHRISTOPHER (1722–71), educated at Durham School and Cambridge, was author of two volumes of 'Poems' (1752 and 1763); the 'Hilliad' (1753), a satire on John Hill, the quack doctor; a paraphrase of the Psalms; and translations of Phaedrus and Horace. But he is chiefly remembered for his 'Song to David' (1763), a song of praise of King David as the great poet and author of the Psalms, containing splendid imagery. Smart declined into insanity and debt, and died within the rules of the King's Bench.

Smec, LEGION, see Smectymnuus.

Smectymnuus, the name under which five Presbyterian divines, Stephen Marshal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow, published a pamphlet attacking episcopacy. The name is a combination of the initials of the five authors. It was answered by Bishop Hall, and defended by Milton (who was already engaged in the controversy) in his 'Animadversions upon the Remonstrant's Defence against Smectymnuus' (1641), and his 'Apology against a Pamphlet . . . against Smectymnuus' (1642), which contains an interesting account of Milton's early studies. From 'Smectymnuus' is derived 'Legion Smec' in Hudibras, II. ii, signifying the Presbyterians:

New modell'd the Army and cashier'd
All that to Legion Smec adher'd.

SMEDLEY, FRANCIS EDWARD (1818–64), a cripple from childhood, was author of some pleasant novels, blending romance with sport and adventure. The most popular of these, 'Frank Fairleigh' (1850), was originally contributed anonymously to the 'London Magazine'. 'Lewis Arundel' appeared in 1852, and 'Harry Coverdale's Courtship' in 1855.

SMITH

Smee, a character in Barrie's 'Peter Pan' (q.v.).

Smelfungus, see Sentimental Journey.

Smerdis, according to Herodotus (iii. 30, 61, &c.) a son of Cyrus, king of Persia. He was murdered by order of his brother, Cambyases, and the murder was kept secret. A magian, Patizithes, who knew the fact, and was weary of the mad tyranny of Cambyases, had a brother who resembled Smerdis in person. He proclaimed this man king, as the younger son of Cyrus, and the false Smerdis reigned for seven months, until the imposture was discovered by one of his wives. The name of the false Smerdis, according to the Behistun inscription, was Gomata.

Smike, a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

SMILES, SAMUEL (1812–1904), educated at Haddington Grammar School and Edinburgh University, devoted the leisure of a varied career to the advocacy of political and social reform on the lines of the Manchester School, and to the biography of industrial leaders and humble self-taught students. He published the 'Life of George Stephenson' in 1857, 'Lives of the Engineers' in 1861–2, and many similar works. He achieved great popular success with 'Self-help' in 1859, 'Character' (1871), 'Thrift' (1875), 'Duty' (1880), and 'Life and Labour' (1887).

SMITH, ADAM (1723–90), born at Kirkcaldy, studied at Glasgow University and as a Snell exhibitioner at Balliol College, Oxford. He was appointed professor of logic at Glasgow in 1751, and in 1752 of moral philosophy. He became the friend of Hume. In 1759 he published his 'Theory of the Moral Sentiments' (q.v.), which brought him into prominence. In 1764 he resigned his professorship and accompanied the young duke of Buccleuch as tutor on a visit to France, where he saw Voltaire, and was admitted into the society of the 'physiocrats' (q.v.). After his return he settled down at Kirkcaldy and devoted himself to the preparation of his great work, 'An Enquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations' (q.v.), published in 1776. This revolutionized the economic theories of the day. Its appearance at the actual date of the 'Declaration of Independence' of the American rebels was of importance if only for the prophecy in Bk. IV, 'They will be one of the foremost nations of the world'. To obviate the danger he proposed the representation of the colonies in the British parliament. Smith edited the autobiography of Hume (q.v.) in 1777, and was elected rector of Glasgow University in 1787. He was a member of the Literary Club (see Johnson, S.).

SMITH, ALEXANDER (1830–67), by occupation a lace-pattern designer in Glasgow, published in 1853 'A Life Drama' and other poems, which were received at first with enthusiasm, and were satirized by

SMITH

Aytoun (q.v.) in 'Firmilian'. He published sonnets on the Crimean War in 1855 jointly with S. T. Dobell (q.v.); 'City Poems' in 1857, containing 'Glasgow', his finest work in verse, giving a sombre picture of the city; and some pleasant prose essays under the title of 'Dreamthorp' in 1863. But his best prose is to be seen in 'A Summer in Skye' (1865), a charming description of the country and its inhabitants. 'Last Leaves', another group of essays, appeared posthumously.

Smith, GEORGE (1824-1901), joined in 1838 the firm of Smith & Elder, publishers and East India agents, of 65 Cornhill, London, which his father had founded in partnership with Alexander Elder in 1816, soon after coming in youth to London from his native town of Elgin. In 1843 Smith took charge of some of the firm's publishing operations, and on his father's death in 1846 became sole head of the firm. Under his control the business quickly grew in both the India agency and publishing directions. The chief authors whose works he published in his early career were John Ruskin, Charlotte Brontë, whose 'Jane Eyre' he issued in 1848, and W. M. Thackeray, whose 'Esmond' he brought out in 1851. In 1853 he took a partner, H. S. King, and, after weathering the storm of the Indian Mutiny, started in 1859 'The Cornhill Magazine', with Thackeray as editor, and numerous leading authors and artists as contributors. In 1865 Smith (with Frederick Greenwood) founded the 'Pall Mall Gazette', a London evening newspaper of independent character and literary quality, which remained his property till 1880. In 1868 he dissolved partnership with King, leaving him to carry on the India agency branch of the old firm's business, and himself taking over the publishing branch, which he thenceforth conducted at 15 Waterloo Place, London. His chief authors now included Robert Browning, Matthew Arnold, (Sir) Leslie Stephen, and Miss Thackeray (Lady Ritchie), all of whom were intimate personal friends. He was founder (1882) and proprietor of the 'Dictionary of National Biography' (q.v.).

SMITH, GOLDWIN (1823-1910), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, was Regius professor of modern history at Oxford, 1858-66, and subsequently professor of history at Cornell University in America, finally settling at Toronto in 1871. He was an active journalist and vigorous controversialist, supporting the cause of the North in the American Civil War, and the sentiment of national independence in Canada. His published works include: 'The Empire' (1863), indicating his distrust of imperialism; 'Irish History and Irish Character' (1862); lectures on 'Three English Statesmen' (Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt, 1867); 'Lectures and Essays' (1881); 'Essays on Questions of the Day' (1893); 'The United States: an Outline of Political History' (1893); 'The United Kingdom: a Political History' (1899); and 'Irish

SMITH

History and the Irish Question' (1906), which showed him faithful to the Unionist policy.

Smith or Gow, HENRY, the hero of Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

SMITH, HORATIO (HORACE) (1779-1849), brother of James Smith (q.v.), became famous as the joint-author, with him, of 'Rejected Addresses' (1812, q.v.) and of 'Horace in London' (1813). He subsequently wrote novels, of which the best is 'Bramletye House' (1826), an imitation of Sir Walter Scott, the story of a young Cavalier in the days of Cromwell and Charles II.

SMITH, JAMES (1775-1839), elder brother of H. Smith (q.v.), was solicitor to the Board of Ordnance, and produced with his brother 'Rejected Addresses' (q.v., 1812) and 'Horace in London' (1813).

SMITH, CAPTAIN JOHN (1580-1631), set out with the Virginia colonists in 1606 and is said to have been rescued by Pocahontas (q.v.) when taken prisoner by the Indians. He became head of the colony and explored the coasts of the Chesapeake. He was author of 'The General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles' (1624), and of a 'Sea Grammar' for young seamen (1626-7).

SMITH, JOHN (1618-52), educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was one of the Cambridge Platonists (q.v.). His 'Select Discourses' were published in 1660.

SMITH, JOHN THOMAS (1766-1833), keeper of drawings and prints at the British Museum, was author of a life of the sculptor Nollekens ('Nollekens and his Times', 1828) remarkable for its singular candour, and of 'A Book for a Rainy Day or Recollections of the Events of the Years 1766-1833', an entertaining picture of the artistic and literary life of the period, published in 1845.

SMITH, LOGAN PEARSALL (1865-1946), born in Philadelphia, spent most of his life in England, devoting himself chiefly to the study of the English language. His works include 'Words and Idioms' (1925), three volumes of 'Trivia' (1918, 1921, 1933), 'Reperusals and Re-collections' (1936), 'Unforgotten Years' (autobiography, 1938).

Smith, MARY, the narrator of the story in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.).

SMITH, ROBERT PERCY, 'Bobus Smith' (1770-1845), elder brother of Sydney Smith (q.v.), of Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He was advocate-general of Bengal and returned home rich in 1810. He was M.P. for Grantham and later for Lincoln. Famous for his wit and his Latin verses.

SMITH, SYDNEY (1771-1845), educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, resided for a time, as tutor of Michael Hicks Beach, at Edinburgh, where he was intimate with Jeffrey, Brougham, and Horner, and with the first two of these founded the 'Edinburgh Review' in 1802. He came to London in 1803, lectured on moral philosophy at the Royal Institution, and shone among the Whigs at Holland House. In 1807 he published the 'Letters of Peter Plymley' (q.v.) in defence of Catholic emancipation. He held the livings, first of Foston in Yorkshire, then of Combe-Florey in Somerset, and in 1831 was made a canon of St. Paul's. He was noted for his exuberant drollery and wit, which were principally displayed in his conversation, but are also seen in his numerous reviews and letters.

SMITH, THOMAS (b. 1790), master of the Hambledon Hounds in 1825, of the Craven in 1829, and subsequently of the Pytchley, was author of 'The Life of a Fox, written by himself' (1843), and of 'The Diary of a Huntsman' (1838). He had an extraordinary knowledge of the habits of foxes and understanding of their nature. He is not to be confused with THOMAS ASSHETON SMITH (1776-1858), master of the Quorn (1806-16) and of other packs, who was acclaimed the first fox-hunter of the day.

Smith, WAYLAND, see Wayland the Smith.

SMITH, SIR WILLIAM (1813-93), educated at University College, London, is remembered as the editor and part author of the 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities' (1842), of a 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology' (1844-9), of a 'Dictionary of the Bible' (1860-3), of dictionaries of Christian antiquities (1875-80) and Christian biography (1877-87), and of other educational works. He was editor of the 'Quarterly Review', 1867-93.

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1846-94), theologian and Semitic scholar, was educated at Aberdeen, Edinburgh (New College), and Bonn. He became professor of Old Testament exegesis at the Free Church College, Aberdeen, but was dismissed (1881, perhaps the last victim of a 'heresy-hunt' in Britain) from his chair for the advanced character of his biblical articles in the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica' (9th ed.), of which work he became co-editor in 1881. He was professor of Arabic at Cambridge from 1883. His published works include: 'The Old Testament in the Jewish Church' (1881) and 'The Prophets of Israel' (1882).

Smithfield, WEST, i.e. 'smooth field', was an open space outside the north-west walls of the City of London. Stow writes of the encroachments 'whereby remaineth but a small portion for the old uses, to wit, for markets of horses and cattle, neither for military exercises, as Justings, Turnings, and great triumphes which have been there performed before the princes and nobility both of this Realm and forraigne countries', of which he gives many curious instances. Here Richard II met Wat Tyler, and here the latter was killed. Here also, in the 16th cent., heretics were burnt.

Smith's Prizes, at Cambridge, for mathematics and natural philosophy, were founded by Robert Smith (1689-1768), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, who became Plumian professor of astronomy and master of Trinity College, Cambridge. He left large sums for university and college purposes, besides pictures and sculptures.

Smithsonian Institution, THE, in Washington, was founded by James Smithson, known in early life as James Lewis Macie (1765-1829), an illegitimate son of Hugh Smithson Percy, duke of Northumberland. He was a distinguished mineralogist and chemist, and spent much time abroad, among his correspondents being many eminent men of science. His politics appear to have been republican, and by his will he left over £100,000 to the United States of America to found the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge. The institution was inaugurated in 1846, and the buildings now comprise a national museum (mainly zoological and ethnological) and an astrophysical observatory. His own scientific papers nearly all perished in a fire at the institution in 1865.

SMOLLETT, TOBIAS GEORGE (1721-71), born in Dumbartonshire, the grandson of Sir James Smollett. He was educated at Glasgow University, but left without means of support. He sailed as surgeon's mate on the 'Chichester' in Ogle's West India squadron (1741), was present at the attack on Cartagena, and remained some time in Jamaica, where he married. In 1744 he returned to London, practised as a surgeon, and wrote his novels, which appeared as follows: 'Roderick Random' (q.v.) in 1748, 'Peregrine Pickle' (q.v.) in 1751 (revised edition, 1758), 'Ferdinand Count Fathom' (q.v.) in 1753, 'Sir Launcelot Greaves' (the story of an 18th-cent. Don Quixote) in 1760-2, and 'Humphry Clinker' (q.v.) in 1771. In 1746 Culloden drew from him the poem 'The Tears of Scotland'. In 1753 he had settled at Chelsea, translating 'Don Quixote' in 1755, editing the new 'Critical Review' in 1756, and bringing out a large 'History of England' and also a farce, 'The Reprisal', in 1757. For a libel in the 'Critical Review' he was fined and imprisoned in 1759. In 1762 he conducted, with little success, 'The Briton', a weekly periodical supporting Lord Bute. Ill health sent him abroad in 1763, and in 1766 he published his entertaining but ill-tempered 'Travels in France and Italy', which procured for him, from Sterne, the nickname of 'Smelfungus'. In 1769 appeared his coarse and vigorous satire on public affairs entitled the 'Adventures of an Atom' (q.v.). He revisited Scotland and Bath in 1766, but finally left England in 1769 and died at Monte Nero near Leghorn. See also Covent Garden Journal.

Smorltork, COUNT, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), 'the famous foreigner' at Mrs. Leo Hunter's party, 'a well-whiskered individual in a foreign uniform', who is 'gathering materials for his great work on England'.

SMUTS, FIELD MARSHAL THE RT. HON. JAN CHRISTIAN (1870-1950), educated in S. Africa and at Christ's College, Cambridge, practised as a lawyer in Cape Colony and became State Attorney of the S. African Republic. He served in the Boer War, having supreme command of the republican troops in Cape Colony from 1901. In the war of 1914-18 he was in command of the imperial forces in E. Africa and subsequently S. African representative in the Imperial War Cabinet in 1917-18 and at the Peace Conference in 1919. He was prime minister of S. Africa in 1919-24 and from 1939. He is author of 'Holism and Evolution' (1926), 'Africa and some World Problems' (1930). He was Rhodes Memorial Lecturer at Oxford, 1929-30.

Snagsby, Mr. and Mrs., characters in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Snailsfoot, Bryce, the pedlar in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Snake, a character in Sheridan's 'The School for Scandal' (q.v.).

Snark, The, see Hunting of the Snark.

Sneak, Jerry, a henpecked husband in Foote's 'The Mayor of Garret'. See Garratt.

Sneerwell, Lady, one of the scandal-mongers in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.).

Snell, Hannah (1723-92), a female soldier, stated in a chap-book history of her adventures, issued in 1750, to have enlisted in 1745, to have served in the fleet, and to have received a pension for wounds received at Pondicherry. The facts were much embellished, but there was probably a kernel of truth as in the cases of Phoebe Hessel, Christian Davies, and Mary Anne Talbot (qq.v.). Hannah, who was thrice married, died in Bedlam.

Snevellicci, Mr., Mrs., and Miss, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), actors in Crummles's company.

Snobs of England, The, by one of themselves, a collection of papers by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 'Punch' in 1846-7, descriptions of the various types of English snobs. The papers were republished as 'The Book of Snobs' (1848).

Snodgrass, Augustus, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), one of the members of the Corresponding Society of the Pickwick Club.

SNORRI STURLASON (1178-1241), an Icelandic historian, author of the 'Heimskringla' (q.v.) or history of the kings of Norway, and of the prose 'Edda' (q.v.). He was also an active and ambitious politician who played a questionable role in his country's relations with Norway, and was finally assassinated by the order of King Hakon. Snorri was uncle of Sturla Thordsson, author of the Sturlunga Saga.

Snout, Tom, in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), a tinker. He is cast for the part of Pyramus's father in the play of 'Pyramus and Thisbe', which gives him nothing to say.

Snubbin, Mr. Serjeant, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), counsel for the defendant in Bardell v. Pickwick.

Snuffy Davie, or DAVIE WILSON, in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.), the hero of a favourite story of Monkbarns, the bibliomaniac who bought Caxton's 'The Game at Chess', 1474, for two groschen at a stall in Holland.

Snug, in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), a joiner, who takes the part of the lion in 'Pyramus and Thisbe'.

Soane, Sir John (1753-1837), architect, the son of a mason named Swan. He was architect of the Bank of England, rebuilt the whole structure, and gained great reputation. He collected paintings, sculpture, &c., in his house in Lincoln's Inn Fields, which in 1833 he presented with its contents to the nation.

Soapy Sam, a nickname of Samuel Wilberforce (1805-73), successively bishop of Oxford and of Winchester, in allusion to his unctuous and ingratiating manners.

Social Contract, The, the English title of 'Du Contrat Social', by J. J. Rousseau (q.v.).

Socialism, a theory or policy of social organization that aims at the control of the means of production, capital, land, property, &c., by the community as a whole, and their administration or distribution in the interests of all. The early history of the word is obscure. It is said [E.B.] to have originated in 1835 in the discussions of a society founded by Richard Owen. It is found in 1833 in the sense of Owenism. G. B. Shaw (q.v.) published in 1928 'The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism'.

Society for Pure English, The, or S.P.E., was founded in 1913, the original committee consisting of H. Bradley, R. Bridges, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Logan Pearsall Smith (qq.v.). Its proceedings were suspended during the war of 1914-18, and its first Tract, containing a reprint of the original prospectus, is dated October 1919. The object of the promoters was to guide popular taste and the educational authorities in matters connected with the use and development of the English language. The S.P.E. has issued many Tracts, on questions of grammar, pronunciation, etymology, handwriting, &c.

Socinianism, the doctrine of Lelio Sozzini (Socinus) and his nephew Fausto Sozzini (1539-1604) that Jesus was not God but a divine prophet of God's word, and that the sacraments had no supernatural quality. The doctrine was set forth in the Confession of Rakow (1605).

SOCRATES (469–399 B.C.), the great Greek philosopher, born near Athens, was the son of Sophroniscus, a sculptor. He was a man of uncouth appearance. He served with credit in the army, saving the life of Alcibiades at Potidaea (432 B.C.). Late in life he held public office and showed great moral courage in resisting illegalities. He was married to Xanthippē, who had the reputation of a scold. He conceived himself as having a religious mission, receiving guidance from a supernatural voice (his 'daemon'). He occupied his life with oral instruction, frequenting public places and conversing with all and sundry, seeking the truth, and the exposure of pride and error. In consequence he incurred the malevolence of those who pretended to wisdom, was attacked by Aristophanes in the 'Clouds', and finally accused of impiety by one Meletus, a leather-seller, condemned by a narrow majority of the judges, and sentenced to death (by drinking hemlock). Socrates wrote nothing, but the general method and tendency of his teaching are preserved in the Dialogues of Plato (q.v.); though precisely what contribution to the history of thought is to be attributed to Socrates has been a subject of discussion. A more homely account of him is to be found in Xenophon's 'Memorabilia'. The following appear to have been prominent features in his teaching: (1) the view that it is the duty of philosophy to investigate not physical phenomena, but ethical questions, how men should live and act; (2) the view that virtue is knowledge: no one is willingly wicked, for happiness lies in virtue; if a man is wicked, it is from ignorance. Socrates' concern was therefore to discover what the good is. The question of moral intention was with him secondary. He inclined to the view that the soul is immortal and will meet with judgement and retribution hereafter.

The SOCRATIC METHOD of instruction was by questions aptly proposed so as to arrive at the conclusion he wished to convey.

Sodom and Gomorrah, the 'cities of the plain' of Jordan (now covered by the Dead Sea), destroyed, on account of their wickedness, in the days of Lot and Abraham (Gen. xiii, xviii, and xix).

Sofa, The, the name of Bk. I of Cowper's 'The Task' (q.v.). Also the name of a licentious oriental romance by Cr  billon the younger (published in 1740): a courtier of the Sultan Shahbahan relates the experiences of a sofa into which his soul has passed in the course of its transmigrations. In the early days of its use in the West the word was always spelt 'sopha'. It is from the Arabic suffah, a bench.

Sofronia or SOPHRONIA, a character in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v.).

Soho, a district of London, the centre of an Italian and French colony. The origin of the name is unknown. The traditional derivations are recorded in E. Walford, 'Old and New London' (1891, iii. 174). It was once a fashionable quarter. James, duke of Monmouth, had a house there, and gave 'Soho' as the watchword on the night before Sedgemoor. Dryden, Evelyn, Burnet, and alderman Beckford resided there.

Sohrab and Rustum, a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.), published in 1853.

Sohrab was a son of the Persian hero, Rustum (see Rustem). Unknown to his father (who had been told that his child was a girl), Sohrab has joined the Tartar forces of Afrasiab, and gained great renown for his prowess. The Tartar host is attacking the Persians, and Sohrab challenges the bravest of the Persian lords to meet him in single combat. Rustum, now an old man, but still their greatest warrior, answers the challenge, but he does not know that Sohrab is his son, nor does Sohrab know that he is fighting with his father, until the old man, at a crisis of the struggle, shouts 'Rustum'. His son recoils at the name, and is struck down. Before dying, he reveals to Rustum that he has killed his son.

Soldan, THE, from the Arabic sul  n, the supreme ruler of one of the great Mohammedan powers or countries of the Middle Ages, especially the Sultan of Egypt. The name Sultan first appears in the sense of 'Captain of the Bodyguard' of the caliph of Bagdad about 1050.

The Soldan or Souldan in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. viii, represents Philip II of Spain. He is encountered by Prince Arthur and Sir Artegall with a bold defiance from Queen Mercilla (Elizabeth), and the combat is undecided until the prince unveils his shield and terrifies the Soldan's horses, so that they overturn his chariot and the Soldan is torn 'all to rags'. The unveiling of the shield signifies divine interposition.

Solecism, an impropriety or irregularity in speech, diction, or manners; from a Greek word meaning barbarous, stated by ancient writers to refer to the corruption of the Attic dialect among the Athenian colonists of Soloi in Cilicia.

Solemn League and Covenant, see Covenant.

Solidfidian, one who holds that faith alone, without works, is sufficient for justification.

Solomon, a great and wealthy king of Israel (10th cent. B.C.), son of David and Bathsheba, famous as the builder of the Temple and for his wisdom, illustrated by his judgement in the dispute about the child (1 Kings iii. 16–28). He is credited in oriental legend with power over the jinn.

Solomon Dalsey, in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), the parish clerk and bell-ringer at Chigwell.

Solomon Eagle, a crazy fanatic in Ainsworth's 'Old St. Paul's'.

SOLOMON PELL

Solomon Pell, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), an attorney occupied with affairs of the Insolvent Court.

Solomon's carpet, see Carpet.

Solomon's House, see New Atlantis.

SOLOMONS, IKEY, the pseudonym under which Thackeray wrote 'Catherine' (q.v.).

Solon (c. 638–558 B.C.), the great Athenian legislator, celebrated for his wisdom. He was appointed archon in 594 B.C., and relieved the prevalent distress by his famous ordinance cancelling outstanding debts (σεισάχθεια). He reformed the constitution, introducing some democratic features. The constitution that he set up was overthrown by Peisistratus. Solon was also a successful poet, who used elegy to stir the Athenians to war and also to convey moral instruction. See also Croesus.

Solvejg, in Ibsen's 'Peer Gynt' (q.v.), the hero's good angel.

Solyman and Perseda, The Tragedye of, see Kyd.

Solymean, of or belonging to Jerusalem. 'Solymean rout' is used in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.) for the London mob.

Soma, in Vedic mythology, the intoxicating juice of a plant, supposed to be Asclepias Acida, and the god who dwells in it, the Hindu Bacchus.

Somerset House, London, takes its name from the palace built on the same site by the duke of Somerset, the lord protector (1506?–52). This reverted to the Crown when Somerset was beheaded, and, after being enlarged and improved by Inigo Jones, became the palace of a succession of queens. It was demolished at the end of the 18th cent. and replaced by the present building (designed by Sir William Chambers, 1726–96), in which are housed the offices of the Revenue Department, the principal Probate Registry, and the registrar-general of Births, Marriages, and Deaths.

SOMERVILLE, EDITH CENONE, contemporary Irish novelist, who collaborated with her cousin Violet Martin ('Martin Ross') (1862–1915) in a series of admirable tales of Irish life, some humorous, some tragic, beginning with 'Some Experiences of an Irish R.M.' (1890), followed by 'Further Experiences' (1908), 'Some Irish Yesterdays' (1906), &c.

SOMERVILLE, WILLIAM (1675–1742), educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow, was author of 'The Chase' (1735), a poem consisting of four books of Miltonic blank verse, which treats of hounds and kennels, hare-hunting, fox-hunting, and otter-hunting, with literary digressions on oriental methods of the chase. In 1742 appeared his 'Field Sports', a short poem on hawking; and in 1740 'Hobbinol', a mock-heroic account of rural games in Gloucestershire.

SONNETS FROM THE PORTUGUESE

Somnium Scipionis, from Bk. vi of Cicero's 'de Republica', preserved for us in the commentary of Macrobius (Cicero's text is lost), is a narrative placed in the mouth of the younger Scipio Africanus. He relates a visit to the court of Masinissa, on which occasion there was much talk of the first great Scipio. When the younger Scipio retired to rest, the shade of the elder appeared to him in a dream, foretold the future of his life, and exhorted him to virtue, patriotism, and the disregard of human fame, as the path leading to reward in a future life, the nature of which is indicated.

The 'Somnium Scipionis' is largely based on the fable of Er, the son of Arminius, in Plato's 'Republic'. A poetical summary of it occurs in Chaucer's 'Parliament of Fowls', and it is referred to by him in other passages.

Sompnour's or Summoner's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Song of Solomon, The, otherwise 'The Song of Songs', one of the poetical books of the O.T., at one time attributed to the authorship of King Solomon, now considered, on linguistic grounds, to be of later date, perhaps of the 4th or 3rd cent. B.C.

The allegorical interpretation of the poem is now generally abandoned, and it is regarded as a love drama, in which three characters are presented, the woman constant to her beloved, the beloved, and the king.

Song of the Shirt, The, a poem by T. Hood (q.v.), published in the Christmas number of 'Punch' for the year 1843; one of Hood's best-known poems, presenting a picture of the overworked and underpaid sempstress.

Song of the Three Holy Children, The, a portion of the Book of Daniel regarded as apocryphal, purporting to be the prayer and song sung by the three Jews in Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace. The latter part figures as the 'Benedicite' in the order for Morning Prayer of the Anglican Church.

Song to David, see Smart.

Songs before Sunrise, see Swinburne.

Songs of Experience, and of Innocence, see Blake.

Sonnet, a poem consisting of fourteen lines (of eleven syllables in Italian, generally twelve in French, and ten in English), with rhymes arranged according to one or other of certain definite schemes, of which the Petrarchan and the Elizabethan are the principal, viz.: (1) a b b a a b b a, followed by two, or three, other rhymes in the remaining six lines, with a pause in the thought after the octave (not always observed by English imitators, of whom Milton and Wordsworth are prominent examples); (2) a b a b c d c d e f e f g g. The sonnets of Shakespeare are in the latter form.

Sonnets from the Portuguese, a series of sonnets by E. B. Browning (q.v.), published in 1850, inspired by passionate devotion to her husband. The Portuguese prototypes were probably Camoens' sonnets to Catarina, one of which is alluded to in Mrs. Browning's poem 'Catarina to Camoens'. The so-called Reading edition, 1847, has been shown (Carter and Pollard, An Enquiry into the Nature of certain Nineteenth Century Pamphlets, 1934) to be spurious.

Sonnets of Shakespeare, The, were printed in 1609, but were probably written, the bulk of them between 1593 and 1596, the remainder before 1600. Most of them trace the course of the writer's affection for a young patron of rank and beauty, and may be addressed to William Lord Herbert, afterwards earl of Pembroke, or Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. The publisher, Thomas Thorpe, issued the 'Sonnets' in 1609 with a dedication to 'Mr. W. H., the onlie begetter of these ensuing sonnets' (who, if he was not one of the persons above-named, was perhaps some friend of Thorpe, through whose good offices the manuscript had reached his hands, 'begetter' being used in the sense of 'getter' or 'procurer'). Other characters are alluded to who evidently played a real part in Shakespeare's life, a stolen mistress (40-2), a rival poet (83-6), a dark beauty loved by the author (127 et seq.).

For the form of these poems see Sonnet.

Sooner State: Oklahoma, see United States.

Sophia, Str., the name of the principal church of Constantinople, built by the Emperor Justinian (532-7), in place of an earlier church built by Constantine and destroyed by fire. The architect was Anthemius of Tralles. Justinian worked at it in a mason's apron with his own hands, and when it was finished in five years exclaimed, 'I have beaten Solomon!' It was dedicated to HAGIA SOPHIA, the Divine Wisdom. On the capture of Constantinople by the Turks (1453) it was converted into a mosque.

Sophia Western, the heroine of Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.).

Sophism, a specious but fallacious argument, used either deliberately to mislead or to display ingenuity in reasoning.

Sophist, in ancient Greece, one who undertook to give instruction in intellectual and ethical matters in return for payment; contrasted with 'philosopher', and frequently used as a term of disparagement.

SOPHOCLES (496-406 B.C.), one of the three great Attic tragedians, was born at Colonus near Athens. His first victory as a tragic poet was in 468 B.C., when he won the prize against Aeschylus. After this he was the favourite poet of the Athenians. He was the first to increase the number of actors from two to three. His tragedies are more human, less heroic, than those of Aeschylus. He is 'pre-eminently the dramatist of human character' (Jebb); but he differed from Euripides, to use his own words, in representing men as they ought to be, while Euripides exhibited them as they are. He is the most effective of the three poets as a dramatist, both by his use of tragic contrast in his situations and by his gift of depicting character. His extant plays are: 'Oedipus the King', 'Oedipus at Colonus', 'Antigone', 'Electra', 'Trachiniae' (on the death of Hercules), 'Ajax', and 'Philoctetes'. M. Arnold describes him as one 'who saw life steadily and saw it whole'. Shelley had a volume of Sophocles in his pocket when he was drowned.

Sophonisba, daughter of Hasdrubal, a Carthaginian general. She was betrothed in early life to Masinissa, the Nubian prince; but her father, in order to gain the alliance of Syphax, married her to the latter. Masinissa, fighting in alliance with the Romans under Scipio, defeated Syphax and captured his capital, Cirta, with Sophonisba. Masinissa decided now to marry Sophonisba, but was ordered by Scipio (who dreaded her pro-Carthaginian influence on Masinissa) to surrender her. Masinissa, to save her from captivity, sent her a bowl of poison, which she voluntarily drank, and died.

The story has been made the subject of various plays, notably by Marston (q.v.) in his 'Sophonisba' (printed in 1606), where, however, considerable liberties are taken with the facts; also by Lee (1676) and Thomson (1730), and by Corneille.

Sophonisba. The line 'Oh! Sophonisba, Sophonisba, Oh!' is from 'The Tragedy of Sophonisba', 1730 (III. ii), by James Thomson (q.v., 1700-48). The line, 'Oh, Sophonisba, I am wholly thine', was substituted some time after 1738. The earlier text was parodied by Fielding in his 'Tom Thumb'—'O Hunca-munca, Hunca-munca O!' Johnson ('Lives of the Poets') quotes the burlesque 'O Jemmy Thomson! Jemmy Thomson, O!'

Sophronia, see Safronia.

Sophy, THE, a former title of the supreme ruler of Persia. It was the surname of the ruling dynasty from c. 1500 to 1736, derived from an Arabic epithet meaning 'purity of religion'.

Sophy Crewler, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), 'the dearest girl in the world', whom Traddles marries.

Soracte, a mountain of Etruria, visible from Rome, sacred to Apollo. 'Vides ut alta stet nive candidum Soracte'. Horace, 'Odes', I. ix.

Sorbonne, THE, a theological college in Paris founded by Robert de Sorbon about 1257. The name was applied later to the faculty of theology in the old University of Paris, of great importance down to the 17th cent. The Sorbonne is now the seat of the University of Paris and of the faculties of science, literature, and the hautes études.

SORDELLO, a Provençal poet, born near Mantua about 1180, who became in popular tradition a hero of romance. Dante mentions him repeatedly in his 'Purgatorio'.

Sordello, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1840.

The action takes place at the time of conflicts of the Guelphs and Ghibellines (c. 1200). Eccelino, lord of Vicenza, has been exiled from his city. In the affray on this occasion his wife, Adelaide, has been saved with her infant son by the archer, Elcorte. Retrude, wife of Eccelino's ally, Salinguerra, is also saved, but dies after giving birth to Sordello. Adelaide, to prevent his future rivalry with her son, passes Sordello off as the son of Elcorte and brings him up as her page, in the castle of Goito. He is gifted with an imaginative nature and devotes himself to a poetic, unreal life. His mental powers display themselves in his triumph as a poet over the troubadour, Eglamor. At a crisis in the political struggle, his identity as the son of Salinguerra is revealed, and power and eminence come within his grasp. But he has a higher spiritual ideal and cannot bring himself, in spite of the love of the beautiful Palma, Eccelino's daughter, and the urging of Salinguerra, to accept the lower, practical course of action. In the struggle of decision, he dies.

But while the outline of the narrative is simple enough, 'Sordello', the story of the 'development of a soul', is in its details and allusions one of the most difficult of Browning's works to interpret.

SOREL, ALBERT (1842-1906), French historian, author of a number of remarkable works including 'L'Europe et la Révolution française' (1885-1911), 'Histoire diplomatique de la guerre franco-allemande' (1875), 'Montesquieu' (1887), 'Madame de Staël' (1890), 'Bonaparte et Hoche en 1797' (1896), 'Essais d'histoire et de critique' (1894, 1898).

Sorrows of Werther, see Goeths.

Sortes Virgilianae, the attempt to foretell the future by opening a volume of Virgil at hazard and reading the first passage lit on.

Dr. Edward Lake's Diary (Camden Miscellany, vol. i) under date 29 Jan. 1677-8, records an instance of Charles I's having recourse to the Sortes Virgilianae and lighting on Dido's curse on Aeneas when he left her. The Sortes were also resorted to by Panurge (Rabelais, III. x) to decide whether he should marry or not. Many instances are there quoted of Sortes Virgilianae and Homericae. Vambéry mentions that the Persians use Hafiz (q.v.) for the same purpose; as do uneducated Christians the Bible.

Sosia, a character in Dryden's 'Amphitryon' (q.v.).

Sotadic, a satire after the manner of Sotades, an ancient Greek poet noted for the coarseness and scurrility of his writings. The word is also used of a line capable of being read in the reverse order, like a palindrome (q.v.).

Sotheby's, in New Bond Street, a chief centre of book sales in London.

Sothic cycle or CANICULAR PERIOD, a period of 1,460 full years, containing 1,461 of the ancient Egyptian years of 365 days, which were computed from one heliacal rising of Sirius to the next. The term Sothic is derived from Sothis, an Egyptian name of Sirius, the Dog-star.

Soul's Tragedy, A, a drama by R. Browning (q.v.), in two parts, published in 1846; the first part in verse, the second in prose.

The drama treats humorously the 'tragedy' of the degradation of the soul of Chiappino, a citizen of Faenza in the 16th cent. He has been agitating against the tyrannical provost of the town and is sentenced to exile and confiscation of his property. His generous friend, Luitolfo, has struck the provost and thinks that he has killed him, and that he is pursued by the provost's forces. Chiappino, who has been ungenerously courting the woman that Luitolfo is to marry, shamed by his friend's devotion, seizes the latter's bloody cloak and goes out to face the pursuers and claim the deed as his own, only to find that the throng consists of the citizens of Faenza who acclaim him as their saviour. Here the tragedy of his soul begins, for he fails to undeceive the populace. It continues in the second part, when the pope's legate, arriving at Faenza, lures Chiappino on with the hope that he will be made provost, and finally exposes him.

South Sea Company, THE, was formed in 1711 by Harley (later earl of Oxford) to trade with Spanish America under the expected treaty with Spain. An exaggerated idea prevailed of the wealth to be acquired from the trading privileges granted by the Treaty of Utrecht and the Asiento Treaty, and money was readily invested in the Company. A bill was passed in 1720 by which persons to whom the nation owed money were enabled to convert their claims into shares in the Company, and the shares rose in value from £100 to £1,000. The Company shortly afterwards failed. But the scheme meanwhile had given rise to a fever of speculation, of which many unprincipled persons took advantage to obtain subscriptions from the public for the most impossible projects. The collapse of these and of the South Sea scheme caused widespread ruin. The whole affair was known as the SOUTH SEA BUBBLE. But the original idea of the South Sea Company was a sound one for perfectly honest trade.

The SOUTH-SEA HOUSE, where the Company had its offices, is the subject of one of Lamb's 'Essays of Elia' (q.v.).

Southcott, JOANNA (1750-1814), a religious fanatic, was a Devonshire farmer's daughter, who was for many years in domestic service. In 1792 she began to write doggerel prophecies and to claim supernatural gifts, and in time attracted a very large number of followers. In 1802 she affirmed that she would be delivered of a spiritual being, called Shiloh. She died of brain disease, leaving a sealed box with directions that it should be opened at a time of national crisis in the presence of the assembled bishops. It was opened in 1927, one bishop being present, and was found to contain nothing of interest.

Southdown, COUNTESS OF, a character in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

SOUTHERNE or SOUTHERN, THOMAS (1659-1746), of Irish parentage, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, but spent his life in London, where he was the friend of Dryden, for several of whose plays he wrote prologues and epilogues. He wrote several comedies, but is chiefly remembered for his two tragedies, 'The Fatal Marriage' (q.v., 1694) and 'Oroonoko' (q.v., 1695), both founded on novels by Mrs. Behn (q.v.).

SOUTHEY, ROBERT (1774-1843), was the son of a Bristol linen-draper, of a respectable Somerset family. He was expelled from Westminster School for a precocious essay against flogging, and proceeded to Balliol College, Oxford. He made the acquaintance of S. T. Coleridge and joined in his scheme for a 'pantisocratic' settlement. He married Edith Fricker (d. 1837), whose sister became the wife of Coleridge, in 1795. He went to Portugal in the same year, and to Spain in 1800. He published 'Thalaba' (q.v.) in 1801, 'Madoc' (q.v.) in 1805, the 'Curse of Kehama' (q.v.) in 1810, 'Roderick, the Last of the Goths' (q.v.) in 1814, 'A Tale of Paraguay' in 1825, and 'All for Love' (q.v.) in 1829. He settled at Keswick, with the help of an annuity given him by his friend, Charles Wynn, which he relinquished on receiving in 1807 a government pension of about the same amount. He worked at translations from the Spanish, and in 1808 became a regular contributor to the 'Quarterly Review'. His 'Life of Nelson' was expanded from an article in 1813. In the same year he accepted the laureateship, which had been offered to Scott. His 'Wat Tyler', a short drama 'written in three days at Oxford' in 1794, was surreptitiously published in 1817, and in consequence of its crude political sentiments, Southey was attacked as 'a renegade' in the House of Commons. Southey's 'Life of Wesley' appeared in 1820 and his 'A Vision of Judgment' (q.v., parodied by Byron) in 1821. His miscellanies, 'Omnia' and 'The Doctor' (q.v.), were published in 1812 and 1834-47, and his standard 'Life' and edition of Cowper in 1833-7. In 1839 he contracted a second marriage with Caroline Bowles. From 1835 he enjoyed a pension of £300, granted by Peel.

Southey wrote an immense amount both of verse and prose. His longer poems are little read now, but were praised by contemporaries so diverse as Scott, Fox, and Macaulay, and admired even by Byron, who hated the author. He is now best known by some of his shorter pieces, such as 'My days among the dead are past', 'The Battle of Blenheim', 'The Holly Tree', and 'The Inchcape Rock'. He was successful in the lighter, comic, or supernatural grotesque style, e.g. in 'St. Michael's Chair', 'The Well of St. Keyne', and 'The Devil's Thoughts' (q.v.). Of his prose works, besides those above mentioned, the principal are his 'Lives of the British Admirals' (1833-40); the long and valuable 'History of Brazil' (1810-19), and the 'History of the Peninsular War' (1823-32), which proved less successful than that of Napier; his ecclesiastical writings, 'The Book of the Church' (1824) and 'Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae' (1826); his 'Sir Thomas More, Colloquies on the progress and prospects of Society' (1829), in which the author converses with the ghost of More; and 'Essays Moral and Political' (1832). The 'Letters of Espriella', a book of a lighter character, purporting to be the letters written from England by a young Spaniard at the beginning of the 19th cent. and giving a good picture of the times, was published in 1807. Southey did valuable work in revising the old translations of Armads of Gaul (1803) and 'Palmerin of England' (1807), in translating the 'Chronicle of the Cid' (1808), and in editing Malory (1817). Excessive mental work, as well as domestic misfortunes, at last affected Southey's intellect, and he died of softening of the brain. He was an excellent letter-writer, and three editions of his voluminous correspondence, none of them complete, have been published, by his son in 1849-50, by his son-in-law in 1856, and by E. Dowden in 1881.

Southwark, the 'south work' or bridge-head at the south end of London Bridge, was at one time a royal 'burh' or citadel for the defence of London (hence Southwark is known as 'The Borough'). It certainly existed in Æthelred's time, and probably much earlier. It attracted traders by its privileges and became the great 'cheaping town' mentioned in the 'Heimskringla' (q.v., Lethaby). It is specially famous in literary history on account of its ancient inns and theatres. The Tabard and the White Hart (qq.v.) inns were there, Burbage's 'Globe' theatre, Alleyn's

'The Hope', and Henslowe's 'The Rose' (qq.v.). Gower lived within the precincts of the priory of Southwark and is buried in its church (see Saviour's Church, St.). In 1550 Edward VI granted the borough to the commonalty of London, and Southwark became a 'ward without' of the City.

SOUTHWELL, ROBERT (1561?-95), a member of an old Catholic family, was educated at Douai and Rome. He took Roman orders and came to England in 1586 with Henry Garnett (who was subsequently executed for complicity in the Gunpowder Plot). He became in 1589 domestic chaplain to the countess of Arundel, was captured when going to celebrate mass in 1592, repeatedly tortured, and executed after three years' imprisonment. His poems were mainly written in prison. Of these it was his object to make spiritual love, instead of 'unworthy affections', the subject. His chief work was 'St. Peter's Complaint', published in 1595, a long narrative of the closing events of the life of Christ in the mouth of the repentant Peter, in which the spiritual is contrasted with the material by numerous comparisons and antitheses. He also wrote a 'Fourefoold Meditation of the foure last things' (1606), and many shorter devotional poems (some of them collected under the title 'Maconiae', 1595) of a high order, notably 'The Burning Babe', praised by Ben Jonson.

Sowdone of Babylon, see Ferumbras.

Sowerberry, in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.), an undertaker, to whom Oliver is apprenticed when he leaves the workhouse.

Sowerby, Mr., a character in A. Trollope's 'Framley Parsonage' (q.v.).

Sowerby, THE HON. DUDLEY, a character in Meredith's 'One of our Conquerors' (q.v.).

Spagyric, a term used and probably invented by Paracelsus (q.v.), the science of alchemy or chemistry; also, an alchemist.

SPALDING, JOHN (fl. 1650), of Aberdeen, a Scottish historian, author of the valuable 'Memorials of the Troubles in Scotland and England' from 1624 to 1645 (first published in 1792). He is commemorated in the Spalding Club, devoted to the historical literature of northern Scotland.

Spanish Curate, The, a comedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.) and probably Massinger (q.v.), composed and produced in 1622.

The main plot deals with the intrigues of Don Henrique's mistress, Violante, the failure of which leads to the reconciliation of Don Henrique with his divorced wife, Jacinta, and his brother, Don Jamie; while Violante is consigned to a nunnery. In the underplot, from which the play takes its name, Leandro, a rich young gentleman, plays on the cupidity of a priest and his sexton, and, with their help, on that of the lawyer Bartolus, the jealous husband of a beautiful wife, Amaranta, to get facilities for an intrigue with the latter.

SPANISH TRAGEDY

Spanish Fryar, The, a comedy by Dryden (q.v.).

Spanish Gypsy, The, a romantic comedy by T. Middleton and W. Rowley (qq.v.), acted in 1623 and printed in 1653. It is based on two novels by Cervantes.

Of the two interwoven plots, that from which the play takes its name presents the romance of Pretiosa, daughter of the corregidor of Madrid, who has been carried away as a child by Alvarez, a fugitive from justice and brother-in-law of the corregidor, to live with his friends a gipsy life. The gipsies come to Madrid, where the beauty of Pretiosa attracts admiration. Her lover joins the gipsies, and these act a play at the house of the corregidor. Their identity is discovered, and Pretiosa is restored to her father and married to her lover. Longfellow, in one of his dramas, 'The Spanish Student', adapted much of this, including the name Pretiosa.

Spanish Gypsy, The, a dramatic poem by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1868.

Spanish Main, THE, the mainland of America adjacent to the Caribbean Sea, especially that portion of the coast stretching from the Isthmus of Panama to the mouth of the Orinoco. In later use, also, the sea contiguous to this, or the route traversed by the Spanish register ships (i.e. Spanish ships licensed to trade with the Spanish possessions in America).

Spanish Tragedy, The, a tragedy in blank verse by Kyd (q.v.), acted 1592, printed 1594.

The political background of the play is the victory of Spain over Portugal in 1580. Lorenzo and Bel-imperia are son and daughter of Don Cyprian, Duke of Castile (brother of the king of Spain); Hieronimo is marshal of Spain, and Horatio his son. Balthazar is son of the viceroy of Portugal and has been taken prisoner by Lorenzo and Horatio in the war. He courts Bel-imperia, and his suit is favoured by Lorenzo, and by the king of Spain for political reasons. Lorenzo and Balthazar discover that Bel-imperia loves Horatio, and come upon them at night in Hieronimo's harbour, where they kill Horatio and hang him to a tree. Hieronimo coming out and finding his son dead is frantic with grief. He discovers who the murderers are and plots with Bel-imperia their destruction. For this purpose he engages them to act with Bel-imperia and him, before the court, a play that suits his revengeful purpose. In the course of this Lorenzo and Balthazar are killed, Bel-imperia stabs herself, and Hieronimo takes his own life.

Interpolations were made in the play as originally written, probably by Ben Jonson, and the play as revised was very popular, though ridiculed by writers of the time. Charles Lamb declared that certain of these interpolations were the 'very salt of the old play'. He thought that nothing written by Jonson warranted us in attributing them to him; 'I should suspect the agency of some more potent spirit. Webster might have furnished them.' The interpolations in question are given in Lamb's 'Specimens of English Dramatic Writers'.

Sparkish, a character in Wycherley's 'The Country Wife' (q.v.).

Sparkler, EDMUND, a character in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), who marries Fanny, Little Dorrit's sister.

Sparsit, Mrs., a character in Dickens's 'Hard Times' (q.v.), Bounderby's intriguing housekeeper.

Spartan, an inhabitant of Sparta, the capital of the ancient Doric state of Laconia in the Peloponnesus. The Spartan characteristics, to which the adjective in modern use refers, were simplicity, frugality, fortitude, discipline, and brevity of speech. Cf. 'Laconic'.

SPARTAN DOG, a kind of bloodhound (cf. Shakespeare, 'Midsummer Night's Dream', IV. i. 116).

Spasmodic School, a term applied by Aytoun (q.v.) to a group of poets chiefly represented by P. J. Bailey, Dobell, and Alexander Smith (qq.v.).

Spectator, The, a periodical conducted by R. Steele (q.v.) and Addison (q.v.) from 1 Mar. 1711 to 6 Dec. 1712. It was revived by Addison in 1714, when eighty numbers were issued. The 'Spectator' was the successor of the 'Tatler' (q.v.). It appeared daily. Addison and Steele were the principal contributors, in about equal proportions. Other contributors were Pope, Tickell, Eustace Budgell, Ambrose Philips, and Eusden (qq.v.).

It purported to be conducted (see the first two numbers) by a small club, including Sir Roger de Coverley, who represents the country gentry; Sir Andrew Freeport, Capt. Sentry, and Will Honeycomb, representing respectively commerce, the army, and the town. Mr. Spectator himself, who writes the papers, is a man of travel and learning, who frequents London as an observer, but keeps clear of political strife. The papers are mainly concerned with manners, morals, and literature. Their object is 'to enliven morality with wit, and to temper wit with morality'. Among their pleasantest features are the character sketches, notably in the Coverley papers, and the short stories or episodes, which frequently take the form of letters purporting to be addressed to the editor. Readers of 'Esmond' will remember the faked 'Spectator' which appeared on Beatrix's breakfast-table.

Spectator, The, a weekly periodical started in 1828 by Robert Stephen Rintoul, with funds provided by Joseph Hume and others, as an organ of 'educated radicalism'. It supported Lord John Russell's reform bill of 1831 with a demand for 'the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill'. R. H. Hutton (q.v.) was joint-editor, 1861-97.

SPEENHAMLAND SYSTEM

Speculum Meditantis or Mirour de l'Omme, a didactic poem of 30,000 lines in French by Gower (q.v.).

It relates the contest for the possession of man between the seven vices (with their offspring, such as arrogance and hypocrisy) and the seven virtues, all described at great length. To ascertain who has gained the victory, the author reviews every estate of man, and all are found corrupt. Man must therefore have recourse to the mercy of the Virgin, who will intercede for him. The poem concludes with the Gospel narrative. The description of the estates of man presents a valuable picture of contemporary society.

SPEDDING, JAMES (1808-81), educated at Bury St. Edmunds and Trinity College, Cambridge, published an edition of Bacon's 'Works' in 1857-9, followed by his 'Life and Letters' (1861-74). His 'Evenings with a Reviewer, or Macaulay and Bacon' (1848) was a refutation, subsequently developed in the greater work, of Macaulay's 'Essay' on Bacon.

SPEED, JOHN (1552?-1629), historian and cartographer, was brought up as a tailor by his father. He settled in Moorfields, London, and obtained a post in the custom-house in 1598. He made various maps of English counties, and was encouraged by Camden, Cotton, and others to write his 'Historie of Great Britaine' (1611). The maps were far more valuable than the history; they began about 1607 and an atlas of them appeared in 1611. There were several later editions of this (called 'The Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain') and the maps are now constantly detached and sold separately.

Speed the Plough, a play by T. Morton (q.v.), produced in 1798.

Sir Philip Blandford, finding that his brother has supplanted him in the affections of the woman he was about to marry, stabs the brother, leaves him for dead, quits the country, and ruins himself by gambling. The brother's child, Henry, the hero of the play, brought up in ignorance of his parentage by a neighbouring farmer, Ashfield, is the object of Sir Philip's hatred. But on the latter's return home, twenty years later, his daughter Emma falls in love with this Henry, who moreover saves her life when the house is burnt down. And Henry's father, who has in fact survived full of remorse, now reveals himself as the restorer of his brother's fortunes. So reconciliation follows and all ends well.

Sir Abel Handy with his shrewish wife and breezy son, and the Ashfield couple, provide some amusement. Mrs. Grundy, who has since become the symbol of the British idea of propriety, is a neighbour and obsession of Dame Ashfield, who constantly refers to her, wondering what Mrs. Grundy will think or say. But Mrs. Grundy herself, a sort of Mrs. Harris, never appears.

Speenhamland System, a system of poor relief adopted by the magistrates of Berkshire at a meeting held on 6 May 1795 at Speenhamland (now part of Newbury), to improve the miserable condition of labourers, the result of the insufficiency of agricultural wages. By this system, which was widely adopted by other counties, an allowance was granted 'for the relief of all poor and industrious men and their families' who endeavoured to the satisfaction of the Justices of their parish to support themselves, this allowance being calculated according to the price of flour, so that the man should have, from his wages and the allowance, the equivalent of three gallon loaves a week, and his wife and each child the equivalent of one and a half. The effect was to pauperize the labouring population, and to relieve the employer at the expense of the rates (see J. L. and Barbara Hammond, 'The Village Labourer').

SPEKE, JOHN HANNING (1827-64), explorer, set out under (Sir) Richard Burton (q.v.) in 1856 to investigate Lake Nyasa, and discovered Lake Tanganyika and Victoria Nyanza. He published in 1863 his 'Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile'. He furnished information to (Sir) Samuel Baker (q.v.), which enabled him to discover the third lake, Albert Nyanza.

Spence's Anecdotes, the reminiscences of Joseph Spence (1699-1768), Pope's friend, which although not published until 1820 were well known and widely quoted during the 18th cent.

SPENCER, HERBERT (1820-1903), trained as an engineer, gave up this profession early and devoted himself to philosophical study and writing. He published 'Social Statics' in 1851, 'Principles of Psychology' in 1855, and in 1860 his 'Programme of a System of Synthetic Philosophy', to the elaboration of which he consecrated the remainder of his life. 'First Principles' appeared in 1862, 'Principles of Biology' (1864-7), 'Principles of Psychology' (a recast of the earlier work, 1870-2), 'Principles of Sociology' (1876-96), and 'Principles of Ethics' (1879-93). Among his other works were 'Education' (1861, see below), 'The Classification of the Sciences' (1864), 'The Study of Sociology' (1873), 'The Man versus The State' (1884), and 'Factors of Organic Evolution' (1887). His 'Autobiography' was published in 1904.

Spencer was the founder of evolutionary philosophy, pursuing the unification of all knowledge on the basis of a single all-pervading principle, that of evolution. All our notions are derived from experiences of Force, a persistent inscrutable power behind phenomena. From the persistence of force are deducible various principles, such as the transformation and equivalence of all forces whether physical or mental, and finally the Law of Evolution, which can also be obtained inductively from phenomena, and to which all phenomena are subject. This law he defines as follows: 'an integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of emotion; during which matter passes from an indefinite incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity; and during which the retained motion undergoes a parallel transformation'. The process continues until equilibrium is reached, after which the action of the environment will in time bring about disintegration. The law holds good of the visible universe as well as of smaller aggregates, suggesting the conception of past and future evolutions, such as that which is now proceeding. But Spencer recognized the insolubility of the ultimate riddle of the universe.

This theory of a physical system leads up to Spencer's ethical system, to which in his mind all else was subordinated. But here he is less successful in producing a self-consistent whole. For Spencer was essentially an individualist, and his first ethical principle is the equal right of every individual to act as he likes, so long as he does not interfere with the similar liberty of other individuals. His effort is to reconcile utilitarian with evolutionary ethics, and in his 'Data of Ethics' (the first part of his 'Sociology') we have morality treated in its biological and evolutionary aspect, and the conciliation of altruism with egoism explained. But Spencer had to confess that for the purpose of deducing ethical principles 'the Doctrine of Evolution has not furnished guidance to the extent I had hoped'.

Special reference must be made to his 'Education, Intellectual, Moral, and Physical' (1861), a collection of articles previously published in magazines, in which Spencer showed a frank contempt for the humanities, and urged that science should be made the principal instrument of education. Parts of the work proved valuable and have influenced subsequent practice. It had a wide vogue and was translated into many languages.

Spencer has been diversely judged. Carlyle called him 'the most immeasurable ass in Christendom'.

Spenslow and Jorkins, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), a firm of proctors in Doctors' Commons, to whom Copperfield is articulated. Jorkins is a gentle, retiring man who seldom appears, but Spenslow makes his supposed intractable character the ground for refusing any inconvenient request.

Spenslow, DORA, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the hero's 'child-wife'.

Spens, Sir Patrick, the title of an old Scottish ballad, on the subject of the dispatch of Sir Patrick to sea, on a mission for the king, in winter; of his foreboding of disaster; and of his destruction with his ship's company. The ballad is in Percy's 'Reliques'. Scott, in his version, makes the object of the mission the bringing to Scotland of the Maid of Norway (q.v.).

SPENSER, EDMUND (1552?-99), was the elder son of John Spenser, who was probably related to the Spencers of Althorp, and was described as a gentleman and journeyman in the art of cloth-making. Edmund Spenser was born probably in East Smithfield, London, and was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. While still at Cambridge, he contributed in 1569 a number of 'Visions' and sonnets (from Petrarch and Du Bellay) to an edifying 'Theatre for Worldlings'. To his 'green youth' also belong the 'Hymnes in honour of Love and Beautie' (not published till 1596), which reflect the Platonic influence, being the adaptation of ideas drawn from the 'Symposium'. Spenser obtained in 1578, through his college friend, G. Harvey (q.v.), a place in Leicester's household, and became, through Leicester, acquainted with Sir Philip Sidney (q.v.). With Sidney, Dyer, and others, he formed a literary club styled the 'Areopagus'. In 1579 he began 'The Faerie Queene' (q.v.) and published his 'Shepheards Calender' (q.v.), which was enthusiastically received. In 1580 he was appointed secretary to Lord Grey de Wilton, then going to Ireland as lord deputy. In 1586 he became one of the 'undertakers' for the settlement of Munster, and acquired Kilcolman Castle in county Cork. Here he settled and occupied himself with literary work, writing his elegy 'Astrophel' (q.v.) on Sir Philip Sidney, and preparing 'The Faerie Queene' for the press, three books of this work being entrusted to the printer on the poet's visit to London in 1589. He reluctantly returned to Kilcolman, which he regarded as a place of exile, in 1591, and penned 'Colin Clouts come home againe' (q.v., printed 1595). The reputation of 'The Faerie Queene' led the printer, Ponsonby, to issue in 1591 his minor verse and juvenilia, in part re-written, as 'Complaints, containing sundrie small poems of the worlds vanitie'. This includes 'The Ruines of Time', which is in fact a further elegy on Sir Philip Sidney, dedicated to his sister, the countess of Pembroke. In 1591 appeared his 'Daphnaida', an elegy on Lady Douglas, the daughter of Lord Byndon. In 1594 Spenser married Elizabeth Boyle, whom he had wooed in his 'Amoretti', and possibly celebrated the marriage in his splendid 'Epithalamion' (the two were printed together in 1595). He published the second instalment of three books of 'The Faerie Queene' and 'Foure Hymnes' in 1596, being in London for the purpose at the house of his friend, the earl of Essex, where he wrote his 'Prothalamion' (q.v.), and also his well-informed, though one-sided, prose 'View of the Present State of Ireland'. He returned to Kilcolman, depressed both in mind and health, in 1597. His castle of Kilcolman was burnt, October 1598, in a sudden insurrection of the natives, chiefly O'Neills, under the earl of Desmond; on which, with his wife and four children, he was compelled to flee for refuge to Cork. Lost books of 'The Faerie Queene' were probably burnt in the castle.

SPINOZA

He died in London in distress, if not actual destitution, at a lodging in King Street, Westminster, and was buried near his favourite Chaucer in Westminster Abbey, the expenses of the funeral being borne by the earl of Essex.

Spenserian stanza, the stanza invented by Edmund Spenser (q.v.), in which he wrote 'The Faerie Queene'. It consists of eight five-foot iambic lines, followed by an iambic line of six feet, rhyming a b a b b c b c c.

Sphinx, THE, in Greek legend, a monster represented generally with a woman's bust on a lion's body. It frequented the neighbourhood of Thebes, propounded enigmas and devoured the inhabitants if these were unable to explain them. The Thebans were told by an oracle that the Sphinx would destroy herself as soon as one of her riddles was explained. The Sphinx now asked what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Creon, regent of Thebes, promised the kingdom and his sister Jocasta in marriage to whoever should solve the riddle. This was done by Oedipus (q.v.), who observed that man walked on all fours when a child, erect in the noon of life, and supported by a stick in old age. The Sphinx on hearing this answer killed herself in disgust.

The legend appears to have come from Egypt, where, however, the Sphinx is a male creature, representing the god Horus. The most famous figure of the Sphinx is near the Great Pyramid at Ghizeh, Egypt.

Spider, BRUCE AND THE, see Bruce and the Spider.

SPINOZA, BENEDICT (BARUCH) DE (1632-77), a Jew of Portuguese origin, born at Amsterdam, who lived there and at The Hague. He was expelled from the Jewish community on account of his criticism of the Scriptures. The principal source of his philosophy was the doctrine of Descartes, transformed by a mind steeped in the Jewish Scriptures. Spinoza rejected the Cartesian dualism of spirit and matter, and saw only 'one infinite substance, of which finite existences are modes or limitations'. The universe must be viewed 'sub specie aeternitatis', and the errors of sense and the illusions of the finite eliminated. God for him is the immanent cause of the universe, not a ruler outside it. 'By the government of God, I understand the fixed and unalterable order of nature and the interconnection of natural things.' His system is thus in a sense pantheistic. Among his conclusions are determinism, a denial of the transcendent distinction between good and evil, and a denial of personal immortality.

Spinoza's famous 'Ethics', finished about 1665, was not published until 1677, after his death. His morality is founded on the 'intellectual love' of God. Man is moved by his instinct to develop and perfect himself, and to seek this development in the knowledge and love of God. And the love of God involves the love of our fellow creatures. It is by goodness and piety that man reaches perfect happiness: virtue is its own reward.

Spinoza founds his political doctrine on man's natural rights. Man, in order to obtain security, has surrendered part of his rights to the State. But the State exists to give liberty, not to hold in slavery. The sovereign in his own interest must rule with justice and wisdom, nor must the State interfere with freedom of thought. Spinoza's 'Tractatus Theologico-politicus' was published in 1670; his unfinished 'Tractatus Politicus' in 1677.

Spirit of Patriotism, A Letter on the, a political treatise by Visc. Bolingbroke (q.v.), written in 1736 and addressed to Lord Lyttelton. It was published in 1749.

Written in retirement at Chanteloup, it represents Bolingbroke's final attitude in political affairs. The author attributes the misfortunes of the country to the servility of the opposition, which has made possible the spread of corruption and the tyranny of the Whig ministry. The opposition should address itself to the reform of the State, not merely to the reform of the administration, so as to secure that government shall not become absolute.

Spiritual Exercises, see Loyola.

Spiritual Quixote, The, or the Summer's Ramble of Mr. Geoffrey Wildgoose, a novel by R. Graves (q.v.), published in 1772.

Geoffrey Wildgoose, a young man of good position in the Cotswold country, having imbibed the doctrines of the Methodists, sets forth, accompanied by his Sancho Panza, Jerry Tugwell, the village cobbler, to preach those doctrines about the Midlands. Their undertaking involves them in ludicrous incidents and gives occasion for episodic tales, and for much satire of Whitefield, and in a milder degree of the Methodists in general. The book throws light on the life of the roads and inns in the 18th cent. And there is a pleasant sketch of Shenstone (q.v.) and the Leasowes.

Spital sermon or SPITTLE SERMON, one of the sermons formerly preached on Easter Monday and Tuesday from a special pulpit at St. Mary Spital outside Bishopsgate (afterwards at other churches).

Spitalfields, London, a district that takes its name from having been the property of the Priory and Hospital of St. Mary, founded by Walter Brune and Rosia his wife for Canons regular in 1197. This hospital, when surrendered to Henry VIII, contained 180 beds, well furnished; 'for it was an Hospitall of great relief' (Stow). French Protestant silk-weavers settled in this district after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and really founded our silk industry, which has now lost much of its importance. Among the ironies of religious history is that the white silk cassock of the popes continued to be woven by these Protestants till the last quarter of the 19th cent.

Spleen, The, see Green (Matthew).

Splendid Shilling, The, a burlesque poem by J. Philips (q.v.), published in 1705.

The poet sings in Miltonic verse, with much show of classical learning, the contrast between the happy possessor of the splendid shilling, who nor hears with pain

New oysters cry'd, nor sighs for chearful ale, and the penurious poet in his garret, hungry and thirsty, smoking 'Mundungus, ill-perfuming scent', inditing mournful verse of desp'rate lady near a purling stream

Or lover pendent on a willow tree, and threatened by creditors and catchpoles.

Spofforth, FREDERICK ROBERT (1853-1926), the famous Australian cricketer, known as 'The Demon Bowler'. He came to England on a number of tours, achieving his greatest feats in 1882 and 1884. In 1882 England required 84 runs in the last innings to win, and lost by 7. Spofforth taking 14 wickets for 90 runs in the match. His success was due to disguised change of pace and an occasional very fast ball.

Spondee, a metrical foot composed of two long syllables.

Sponge, Mr., the hero of 'Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour' by R. S. Surtees (q.v.), published in 1853, with pictures by Leech, one of the best of the author's hunting novels.

Spoonerism, see Metathesis.

Sports, THE BOOK or DECLARATION OF, an order issued by James I in 1617 defining for the use of Lancashire the recreations that were permissible on Sunday. These included archery and dancing, but not bear and bull-baiting, nor bowls. An attempt to extend the order to the whole kingdom in 1618 proved ineffectual. Charles I directed, in 1633, that it should be read in all pulpits, and this was a gratuitous insult to the Puritans. Many clergy, whose austerity was opposed to any games on Sunday, were deprived in consequence.

Sporus, the name under which Pope (q.v.) satirizes Lord Hervey (q.v.) in his 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot' (ll. 305 et seq.). The original Sporus was an effeminate favourite of the Emperor Nero.

Sprat, JACK, see Jack Sprat.

SPRAT, THOMAS (1635-1713), educated at Wadham College, Oxford, was bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster. He sat on James II's objectionable Ecclesiastical Commission in 1686 and allowed the Declaration of Indulgence to be read (amid deep murmurs of disapproval) in the abbey—in short, he was inclined to be a 'Vicar of

SPRAT

Bray'. He is remembered for his history of the Royal Society (q.v.), of which he was one of the first fellows. He wrote well, and is thought to have had a share in Buckingham's 'Rehearsal' (q.v.).

Spring Gardens, at the NE. corner of St. James's Park, adjoining what is now Trafalgar Square, was a fashionable place of amusement in the days of the Stuarts. Spring Gardens were gradually replaced by the New Spring Gardens at Vauxhall (q.v.) in the middle of the 17th cent., though Pepys still refers to them as a popular promenade.

SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON (1834-92), a Baptist preacher so popular that Exeter Hall could not contain all his would-be hearers. The Metropolitan Tabernacle in Newington, London, having been opened in 1861, to hold 6,000 people, he ministered there until his death. He was a convinced Calvinist, and his resentment at the trend of modern biblical criticism led to his leaving the Baptist Union in 1887. His sermons, of which a large number were published, are marked by a strong vein of homely humour.

Spurs, BATTLE OF THE, see Battle of the Spurs.

Spy, The, a novel of the American Revolution by J. F. Cooper (q.v.), published in 1821. The action of the tale revolves around the mysterious pedlar, Harvey Birch, who serves Washington as a spy, and shows extraordinary ubiquity, elusiveness, and foreknowledge of military operations. Washington himself figures in the novel under the name of Mr. Harper.

Square, in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.), an inmate of Mr. Allworthy's household, deeply read in the ancients, who in morals was a professed Platonist and in religion inclined to be an Aristotelian; but in fact a hypocrite.

Squeers, WACKFORD, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), the headmaster of Dotheboys Hall. He has a heartless wife, who joins him in bullying his miserable pupils, a spiteful daughter in MISS FANNY SQUEERS, and a spoilt son in MASTER WACKFORD SQUEERS.

Squantum, DR., the character under which Foote (q.v.) ridiculed George Whitefield in 'The Minor'.

Squire Meldrum, The History of, see Lindsay (Sir D.).

Squire of Alsatia, The, a play by Shadwell (q.v.).

Squire of Dames, a humorous character in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', III. vii. He had been ordered by his lady to 'do service unto gentle dames' and at the end of twelve months to report progress. At the end of the year he was able to bring pledges of three hundred conquests. Thereupon his lady ordered him not to return to her till he had found an equal number of dames who rejected his advances. After three years he had only found three, a courtesan because he would not pay her enough, a nun because she could not trust his discretion, and a Damzell of low degree 'in a country cottage found by chance'.

Squire of Low Degree, a metrical romance of the early 14th cent., opening with the distich

It was a squire of low degree

That loved the King's daughter of Hungary.

The squire tells his love to the princess, who consents to wed him when he becomes a distinguished knight. But the meeting is seen by an interfering steward, who reports to the king and gets killed by the squire for his pains. The squire is imprisoned by the king and is mourned as dead by the princess for seven years, in spite of the king's offer of a variety of delights. The king is at length forced to relent, the squire is released, goes forth on a knightly quest, and finally marries the princess.

Squire of Low Degree, THE, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', is Amyas. See Poiana.

Squire's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Stabat Mater, a sequence composed by Jacobus de Benedictis (Jacopone da Todi) in the 13th cent., in commemoration of the sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary, so called from its opening words, Stabat mater dolorosa, 'Stood the mother, full of grief'. There are various musical settings of the sequence.

STAËL, ANNE LOUISE GERMAINE DE (1766-1817), the daughter of Jacques Necker, the French minister of finance famous in the days of the Revolution, and of Suzanne Curchod, the 'first and only love' of Gibbon. She married the Baron de Staël, Swedish ambassador in Paris. A woman of remarkable intellectual gifts and openness of mind, she received in her Paris salon, on the eve of the Revolution, the most progressive elements in French society. Her most important writings were, in the political sphere, her 'Considérations sur la Révolution française' (published posthumously, 1818), and in the sphere of literary criticism, 'De la Littérature dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales' (1800), in which she developed the theory of the progress of the human reason in conformity with the progress of the national organism. She rendered her greatest service to literature in 'De l'Allemagne' (1810-13), in which she introduced to the French the great literary and philosophic movement that had been proceeding in Germany during the previous half-century. The work proved distasteful to Napoleon: the first impression (1810) was destroyed, the author was exiled, and the work was ultimately published in England (1813). Mme de Staël also wrote two novels, 'Delphine' (1802) and 'Corinne' (1807), which reflect her passionate relation with Benjamin Constant (q.v.).

STAFFORD BLUE

Stafford blue, 'to clothe in Stafford blue' is to beat black and blue, with a play on 'staff'.

Stagirite or STAGYRITE, THE, Aristotle, born at Stagira in Macedonia.

Stagirius, a young monk to whom St. Chrysostom addressed three books. M. Arnold (q.v.), in the poem 'Stagirius', places in his mouth a litany.

Stalky & Co., tales of schoolboy life, by Kipling (q.v.), published in 1899.

Stamboul, the Turkish name for Constantinople, derived from the Greek, εἰς τὴν πόλιν, 'at the city'.

Standard, BATTLE OF THE, the battle of Luton Moor, near Northallerton, in 1138 between the English and the Scottish armies. Richard of Hexham, a contemporary writer, describes the 'standard' there used as the mast of a ship, with banners at the top (of the three great churches of St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfrid of Ripon), mounted in the middle of a machine which was brought into the field. This sort of standard was also used (and called the carroccio) in the wars of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa with the Lombard League.

Standard in Cheap, Standard in Cornhill, THE, a lofty erection of timber or stone, containing a vertical conduit pipe with taps, for the supply of water to the public, frequently referred to in the 16th-17th cents. The 'Standard in Cornhill' continued as the name of a point from which distances were measured, long after the 'standard' had disappeared.

Standish, MILES, see Miles Standish.

Stanhope, LADY HESTER LUCY (1776-1839), was the niece of William Pitt and kept house for him from 1803 till his death in 1806, gaining a reputation as a brilliant political hostess. In 1810 she withdrew from Europe for good, and in 1814 established herself for the rest of her life in a ruined convent at Djoun in the Lebanon. Here she lived with a semi-oriental retinue which she ruled despotically; for several years her high rank and imperious character made her a real political power in Syria and the neighbouring desert. In later years her debts accumulated, her eccentricity increased, and she sought to replace her waning political prestige by an undefined spiritual authority based on claims to be an inspired prophetess and mistress of occult sciences. She became a legendary figure in her lifetime and was visited by many distinguished European travellers. Celebrated accounts of their visits to her were written by Lamartine in 'Voyages en Orient' and Kinglake in 'Eothen'.

STANHOPE, PHILIP HENRY, fifth earl (1805-75), nephew of Pitt's niece, Lady Hester Stanhope (q.v.), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, rendered important services by procuring the passage of the Copyright Act of 1842, and the foundation of the National Portrait Gallery (1856) and of the Historical MSS. Commission (1869). He was author of the following historical works: 'The History of the War of the Succession in Spain' (1832), 'The History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles' (1836-63), 'The Life of William Pitt' (1861-2), 'The History of England comprising the reign of Anne until the Peace of Utrecht' (1870); also of two series of 'Miscellanies' (1863-72), and other essays.

Stanhope Press, an iron printing-press invented by Charles, third earl Stanhope (1753-1816), the husband of Lady Hester, sister of the younger William Pitt. He also devised a stereotyping process, and a microscopic lens which bears his name.

STANLEY, ARTHUR PENRHYN (1815-81), son of Edward Stanley (who became bishop of Norwich), was educated at Rugby under Arnold (by whom he was much influenced) and at Balliol College, Oxford, and became professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford in 1856, and dean of Westminster, 1864-81. He applied himself to the history of the Eastern Church and the geography of Palestine, publishing his 'Sinai and Palestine' in 1856, 'Lectures on the History of the Eastern Church' in 1861, and 'Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church' in 1863, 1865, and 1876. His 'Life of Dr. Arnold' appeared in 1844, 'Memorials of Canterbury' in 1854, 'Memorials of Westminster Abbey' in 1868, 'Lectures on the Church of Scotland' in 1872, and 'Essays, chiefly on Questions of Church and State' in 1870. He was a leader of the Broad Church Movement and a courageous champion of religious toleration. His wife, Lady Augusta (a Bruce of the Elgin family), was a great friend of Queen Victoria.

STANLEY, SIR HENRY MORTON (1841-1904), was sent in 1869 by Gordon Bennett, proprietor of 'The New York Herald', to find David Livingstone (q.v.), who was believed to be lost in Central Africa. Stanley found him at Ujiji, and published his adventures in 'How I found Livingstone' (1872). 'Through the Dark Continent' (1878) relates his experiences while crossing equatorial Africa in 1874-7, when he opened up for the first time the heart of the continent. In 1890 he married Dorothy Tennant, who edited his 'Autobiography' (1909).

Stanley, SIR HUBERT, Approbation from, is praise indeed: from 'A Cure for the Heart-ache', v. ii, by T. Morton (q.v.).

STANLEY, THOMAS (1625-78), a descendant of Edward Stanley, third earl of Derby, educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, was author of a 'History of Philosophy' (1655-62), of an edition of Aeschylus (1663), and of translations from Theocritus, Bion, Moschus, Marino, Gongora, and others, besides original poems.

Staple Inn, Holborn, one of the old Inns

STAPLE INN

(q.v.) of Chancery. It was originally called the 'Stapled hall', and this may have meant no more than a wholesale warehouse (Kingsford's notes on Stow), or it was perhaps originally the property of a guild in some way connected with the wool trade (G. R. Stirling Taylor).

Staple of News, The, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1625, in which on the one hand he satirizes the credulity of the age, and on the other illustrates the use and abuse of riches. The 'Staple of News' is a new office set up for the collection, sorting, and dissemination of news and gossip, 'authentic and apocryphal'. The scanty plot is concerned with the relations of the Lady Pecunia, an allegorical personage representing riches, with Pennyboy, a young spendthrift; her uncle the usurer; and the master of the Staple.

Star-chamber, THE, an apartment in the royal palace of Westminster in which during the 14th and 15th cents. the chancellor, treasurer, justices, and other members of the king's council sat to exercise jurisdiction, so called according to Stow 'because the roof thereof is decked with the likeness of Stars gilt'.

THE COURT OF STAR-CHAMBER, whose procedure in the reigns of James I and Charles I made it a proverbial type of an arbitrary and oppressive tribunal, was developed from the above judicial sittings in the 15th cent. It was abolished in 1641. In its original (Tudor) capacity, it was essentially the 'poor man's court', to do justice against great lords. See on its history J. F. Baldwin, 'The King's Council in the Middle Ages' (1913).

Stareleigh, Mr. Justice, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), the judge in the case of Bardell v. Pickwick.

Stars and Stripes, THE, the popular name of the flag of the United States. In the early stages of the American Revolution each State had its own flag. The 'Stars and Stripes' was introduced after the Declaration of Independence, and was based on the arms of the Washington family. When adopted by Congress (1777), it contained 13 stripes (alternately red and white) and 13 stars, representing the 13 States of the Union. But it was not at first stated whether there should be seven red and six white stripes or vice versa. Finally seven red and six white stripes were decided on. The flag now contains 13 stripes and 48 stars (there are 48 States in the Union).

Star-spangled Banner, The, an American patriotic song, is said to have its origin partly in the air of 'To Anacreon in Heaven', a convivial song of the Anacreontic Society of London, published in 1771. To this tune Francis Scott Key, an American, set the words of a patriotic hymn on the occasion of the British attack on Fort McHenry in 1814. The words and air, which at first had no great popularity, became an American national song at the time of the Civil War, and have recently been made officially the national anthem of the United States [C.H.A.L., vol. iv].

Starveling, in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), a tailor, who is cast for the part of 'Thisby's mother' in the play of 'Pyramus and Thisbe'. He has nothing to do or say.

State Trials, a collection of reports of trials relating to offences against the state or otherwise illustrative of the law relating to state officers of high rank. The first collection was made by Thomas Salmon (1679-1767) and published in 1719, and was repeatedly enlarged. 'Cobbett's Complete Collection of State Trials', edited by T. B. Howell and subsequently by his son T. J. Howell, and published by William Cobbett, appeared in 1809-26. A new series, superintended by a committee appointed by the Lord Chancellor, was begun in 1888.

Statesman, The, by Sir Henry Taylor (q.v., 1836), an ironical exposition of the arts of succeeding as a civil servant.

Stationers' Company, THE, was incorporated by royal charter in 1557. No one, not a member of the Company, might print anything for sale in the kingdom unless authorized by special privilege or patent. Moreover, by the rules of the Company, every member was required to enter in the register of the Company the name of any book that he desired to print, so that these registers furnish valuable information regarding printed matter during the latter part of the 16th cent. The Company's control of the printing trade waned during the 17th cent., to be revived, in a modified form, under the Copyright Act of 1709. See Appendix II.

Statira, see Roxana.

STATIUS, PUBLIUS PAPINIUS (c. A.D. 40-c. 96), a Roman poet born at Neapolis, author of a 'Thebaid' in twelve books (on the expedition of the 'Seven against Thebes') and of a collection of poems called 'Silvae'. Dante ('Purgatorio', xxii. 89) refers to his alleged conversion to Christianity. Pope and Gray translated portions of the 'Thebaid'.

Statue and the Bust, The, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1855.

In the Piazza dell' Annunziata in Florence stands an equestrian statue of Ferdinando dei Medici, looking in the direction of the Palazzo Riccardi. According to tradition, he loved a lady whose husband from jealousy kept her a prisoner in that palace, and whom he could see only at her window. The duke placed his statue where its eyes could always rest upon her.

Browning makes the love mutual. The lovers decide to fly together, but circumstances cause them to postpone their flight. Every day as the duke passes on his horse they exchange glances, and every day their love grows cooler, till they realize that it was a dream. He places his statue and she her bust where they can look on each other—an ironical conclusion designed as a criticism of infirmity of purpose.

Staunton, Sir George, alias GEORGE ROBERTSON, in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.), the lover, and subsequently husband, of Effie Deans.

STEAD, WILLIAM THOMAS (1849–1912), was assistant editor (John Morley being editor) of the 'Pall Mall Gazette', 1880–3, and editor, 1883–8, in which capacity he initiated many social and political movements. He founded the 'Review of Reviews' in 1890, and from 1893 to 1897 edited 'Borderland', a periodical devoted to psychical matters. Stead was drowned in the disaster of the 'Titanic'.

STEEL, FLORA ANNIE (1847–1929), an inspectress of schools in India, published in 1896 a successful study of the Indian Mutiny, 'On the Face of the Waters'. She wrote a number of other novels, most of them about India.

STEELE, SIR RICHARD (1672–1729), was born at Dublin, in the same year as Addison, and was educated with him at the Charterhouse. He was subsequently at Merton College, Oxford, whence he entered the army as a cadet in the Life Guards. As a result of a poem on Queen Mary's funeral dedicated to Lord Cutts, colonel of the Coldstream Guards, he became his secretary and obtained the rank of captain. He published 'The Christian Hero' (q.v.) in 1701, in which he first displayed his missionary and reforming spirit. In the same year he produced his first comedy, 'The Funeral' (q.v.), in which, breaking away from the conventions of the Restoration drama, he tried to present virtue and vice in their true aspects. Neither this nor his two next comedies, 'The Lying Lover' (1703) and 'The Tender Husband' (1705), proved very successful. In 1706 he was appointed gentleman waiter to Prince George of Denmark, and in 1707 gazetteer; and in the same year was married to Mary Scurlock ('dear Prue'), his second wife. In 1709 he started the 'Tatler' (q.v.), which he carried on with the help of Addison (q.v.) till January 1711. He was made a commissioner of stamps in 1710, but lost the gazetteership after the accession of the Tories. In conjunction with Addison he carried on the 'Spectator' (q.v.) during 1711–12. This was followed by the 'Guardian', to which Addison, Berkeley, and Pope contributed, and which was attacked by the Tory 'Examiner' (q.v.). Steele next conducted 'The Englishman' (1713–14), a more political paper. In 1713 he was elected M.P. for Stockbridge. In 1714 he published 'The Crisis', a pamphlet in favour of the Hanoverian succession, which was answered by Swift (q.v.), and led to Steele's expulsion from the House on 18 Mar. 1714. In October of that year he issued his 'Apology for Himself and his Writings', and during the same year conducted the 'Lover', a paper in the manner of the 'Spectator'. The tide turned in his favour with the accession of George I. He was appointed supervisor of Drury Lane Theatre, and to other posts, and was knighted in 1715. In 1718 he denounced in the 'Plebeian' Lord Sunderland's Peerage Bill, and was answered by Addison in the 'Old Whig'. This incident led to the revocation of Steele's Drury Lane patent, and to an estrangement from Addison. He established the 'Theatre', a bi-weekly paper, which continued until 1720, in which year he issued pamphlets against the South Sea mania. His last comedy, 'The Conscious Lovers' (q.v.), based on the 'Andria' of Terence and embodying some of his views on social questions, was produced in 1722. Money difficulties forced him to leave London in 1724, and he died at Carmarthen. His letters to his wife, Mary Scurlock, were printed in 1787.

Steele Glas, The, a satire in verse by Gascoigne (q.v.), published in 1576.

The poet's 'steele glas' reveals abuses and how things should be, whereas the common looking-glass only 'shewes a seemely shew', i.e. shows the thing much better than it is. Looking into his 'steele glas' the author sees himself with his faults, and then successively the faults of kings; covetous lords and knights; greedy, braggart, and drunken soldiers; false judges; merchants; and lastly priests. Finally the plowman is held up as a model:

Behold him (priests) and though he stink of sweat,

Disdaine him not, for shall I tel you what,
Such clime to heaven before the shaven crowns.

Steelyard, THE, the place on the north bank of the Thames above London Bridge where the merchants of the Hanse (q.v.) had their establishment. The name is a mistranslation of the MLG. stålhof, from stål, sample, and hof, courtyard. [OED.]

Steenie, James I's nickname for his favourite, George Villiers, 1st duke of Buckingham, in allusion to the words regarding St. Stephen in Acts vi. 15.

Steenkirk cravats, fashionable after the battle of Steenkirk (1692), where the Allies under William III were defeated by the French. They were arranged to imitate the hasty carelessness with which the French officers had dressed themselves to rush into battle.

Stenson, WILLIE, 'Wandering Willie', the blind fiddler in Scott's 'Redgauntlet' (q.v.).

Steerforth, JAMES, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

STEEVENS, GEORGE (1736–1800), a well-known Shakespeare commentator. In 1766 he issued, in four volumes, 'Twenty of the Plays of Shakespeare, being the whole number printed in quarto during his lifetime, or before the Restoration', and in 1773 a complete annotated edition (including notes by Dr. Johnson) in ten volumes, to which a supplementary volume of the Poems, together with seven plays ascribed to Shakespeare, was added in 1780. He assisted Dr. Johnson in his 'Lives of the Poets', and was a member of 'The Club'. He constantly quarrelled with his literary associates and was called by Gifford 'the Puck of commentators'. He assisted Tyrwhitt (q.v.) in his edition of the Rowley poems, but declared his disbelief in them. He attacked W. H. Ireland (q.v.), and satirized literary crazes. He forged a letter of George Peele describing a meeting with Shakespeare. See also Upas.

Stella, the name under which Sir P. Sidney (q.v.) celebrated Penelope Devereux in his sonnets. She was daughter of the first earl of Essex, and when a girl was destined by her father to be Sidney's wife. The project was abandoned and she married Robert, the second Lord Rich, and after being divorced by him Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, afterwards earl of Devonshire.

Stella, in Waller's (q.v.) poems, is Lady Dorothy Sidney, daughter of Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester.

Stella, Swift's name for Esther Johnson, see Swift, and in particular the account there of the 'Journal to Stella'.

STENDHAL, pseudonym of HENRI BEYLE (1783-1842), one of the greatest of French novelists. As a young man Beyle served in Napoleon's armies, and was present at the burning of Moscow. After the Restoration he lived much of his life in Italy, though he returned later to France and died in Paris. His two great novels are 'Le Rouge et le Noir' (1830) and 'La Chartreuse de Parme' (1839), and on the strength of these he has been accorded by modern critics a place in French fiction equal in importance to that of Balzac. His definite gift to fiction, as seen in these works, is the objective, dispassionate analysis of complicated states of conscience. He also wrote much occasional journalism, some short stories, sketches of travel, and one critical pamphlet which survives with his fiction, 'Racine et Shakespeare'. Some volumes of autobiography were published at various times after his death, 'La Vie d'Henri Brûlard' (1890); 'Souvenirs d'Égotisme' (1892); 'Lucien Leuwen' (1894), 'Journal d'Italie' (1911), as well as collections of his letters.

Stentor, the name of a Greek warrior in the Trojan War ('Iliad', v. 785) 'whose voice was as powerful as fifty voices of other men'.

Stepan Arcadievlitch, in Tolstoy's 'Anna Karenina', the husband of Anna.

Stephano, a drunken butler in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest' (q.v.).

Stephanus, see Estienne.

STEPHEN, JAMES KENNETH (1859-

STEPHEN

1892), known as 'J.K.S.', educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, was the author of some brilliant light verse, collected in 'Lapsus Calami' and 'Quo Musa Tendis' (1891) and republished in 1896.

Stephen of Blois, king of England, 1135-54.

Stephen, Sr., the first Christian martyr, one of the 'seven men of honest report' chosen as a deacon at Jerusalem, accused of blasphemy, and stoned to death (Acts vi and vii).

Stephen, Sr., Stephen I, king and patron saint of Hungary, previously the heathen king Waik, who took the name of Stephen at his baptism, A.D. 1000. He died in 1038, having during his reign promoted the spread of Christianity. The CROWN OF ST. STEPHEN is the crown of Hungary.

STEPHEN, SIR JAMES (1789-1859), the father of Sir J. F. Stephen and Sir L. Stephen (qq.v.), and himself under-secretary for the colonies (1836-47), professor of modern history at Cambridge (1849-59), and author of 'Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography' (1849) and 'Lectures on the History of France' (1852).

STEPHEN, SIR JAMES FITZJAMES (1829-94), son of Sir J. Stephen and brother of Sir L. Stephen (qq.v.), educated at Eton, King's College, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge, was a barrister of the Inner Temple and counsel for Rowland Williams in the 'Essays and Reviews' (q.v.) case. He rose to be legal member of the Governor-General's council in India (1869-72) and a judge of the high court (1879-91). He contributed to 'Fraser's' and the 'Cornhill' magazines and to the 'Pall Mall Gazette', and many of these contributions are collected in 'Essays by a Barrister' (1862) and the three series of 'Horae Sabbaticae' (1862, &c.). His chief works were a 'General View of the Criminal Law of England' (1863, 1890), a 'History of the Criminal Law' (1883), and 'The Story of Nuncomar and Sir Elijah Impey' (1885). In his 'Liberty, Equality, Fraternity' (1873) he severely criticized Mill's utilitarian position in the latter's essay 'On Liberty'.

STEPHEN, SIR LESLIE (1832-1904), son of Sir J. Stephen and brother of Sir J. F. Stephen (qq.v.), was educated at Eton, King's College, London, and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he became tutor, having taken orders. He was a noted athlete and mountaineer, and in 1868-71 edited the 'Alpine Journal'. His accounts of Alpine ascents were collected in 1871 as 'The Playground of Europe'.

Stephen's reading of Mill, Combe, and Kant inclined him to scepticism and he relinquished orders after the Act of 1870. In 1864 he came to London for a literary career and contributed critical studies to various periodicals, which were collected in 'Hours in a Library' (1874-6-9). In 1873 he published his 'Essays on Free Thinking and Plain Speaking', defining his agnostic position, and his 'Agnostic's Apology' appeared in the 'Fortnightly' for June 1876. In the latter year there appeared also his 'History of English Thought in the 18th century', reviewing the position of the chief writers in the great deist controversy of that age, and of the institutional and utilitarian schools of philosophy, followed in 1900 by a further instalment on the same subject in 'The English Utilitarians'. His 'Science of Ethics' appeared in 1882. He contributed a number of biographies to the two series of 'English Men of Letters', Johnson (1878), Pope (1880), Swift (1882), George Eliot (1902), Hobbes (1904), and also wrote lives of Henry Fawcett (1885) and of his brother, Sir James Fitzjames Stephen (1895). After having been from 1871 to 1882 editor of the 'Cornhill Magazine', he accepted in the latter year the editorship of the 'Dictionary of National Biography' (q.v.), himself contributing many of the most important notices, especially of the 18th- and 19th-cent. worthies. As editor he saw completed the first twenty-six volumes of the work, and continued to contribute to it subsequently. His 'Social Rights and Duties' appeared in 1896, 'Studies of a Biographer' in 1899-1902, and 'English Literature and Society in the 18th century' in 1904.

Leslie Stephen was the model from which Meredith drew Vernon Whitford, 'a Phoebus Apollo turned fasting friar', in his 'The Egoist' (q.v.). His first wife was Harriet Marian, Thackeray's younger daughter. Virginia Woolf (q.v.) was his daughter.

Stephen Guest, a character in G. Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

STEPHENS, JAMES (1882-), Irish poet and story-writer, whose best-known work is the prose fantasy, 'The Crock of Gold'.

STERLING, JOHN (1806-44), educated at Trinity College and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, contributed to various periodicals, but is chiefly remembered as the centre of a literary group known after him as the STERLING CLUB (founded 1838), which included such men as Carlyle, Tennyson, John Stuart Mill, Lord Houghton, and Sir Francis Palgrave, together with many others more or less eminent in literature. His Life by Carlyle was published in 1851.

STERNE, LAURENCE (1713-68), the son of a subaltern in the army, was born at Clonmel, and after some years of wandering from garrison to garrison spent eight years at school at Halifax. He was left penniless and was sent by his cousin as a sizar to Jesus College, Cambridge. He took orders and became vicar of Sutton-in-the-Forest in 1738, where he remained till 1759, marrying Miss Elizabeth Lumley in 1741. His 'small, quiet attentions' to various ladies disturbed his conjugal life, and his wife became insane in 1758. He began 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.) in 1759, volumes i and ii being published in 1760. He carried on a sentimental correspondence with Miss Catherine de Fourmantelle

STERNHOLD AND HOPKINS

(a young French lady, living at York with her mother), the 'dear, dear Jenny' referred to in 'Tristram Shandy'. He came to London and was well received in society, and in 1760 published the first volumes of his 'Sermons of Mr. Yorick'. But 'Tristram Shandy', of which four more volumes appeared in 1761, was denounced by Dr. Johnson, Richardson, Horace Walpole, Goldsmith, and others, on moral and literary grounds. In 1760 he received the perpetual curacy of Coxwold, and called his house there 'Shandy Hall'. Ill-health sent him abroad in 1762 and he lived at Toulouse with his wife and daughter until 1764. Volumes vii and viii of 'Tristram Shandy' appeared in 1765, in which year began his seven months' tour in France and Italy, of which the French part is described in his 'Sentimental Journey' (q.v., published in 1768). Volume ix of 'Tristram Shandy' appeared in 1767, also volumes iii and iv of his 'Sermons'. He met in London Mrs. Eliza Draper, for whom he kept the journal addressed to her ('The Brame's Journal') from April to August 1767, after her departure for India. A permanent separation from his wife was arranged in that year, but Sterne parted reluctantly from his daughter. He died of pleurisy in his Old Bond Street lodgings, insolvent, and his wife and daughter were relieved through subscriptions collected by his friend John Hall-Stevenson and by Mrs. Draper, and by the publication (1769) of three more volumes of sermons. The publication of the 'Letters of Yorick to Eliza' was authorized by Mrs. Draper in 1775. The 'Letters from Eliza to Yorick' (1775) and 'Letters supposed to have been written by Yorick and Eliza' (1779) are forgeries.

Among fraudulent imitations of Sterne's writings were John Carr's third volume of 'Tristram Shandy' (1760), J. Hall-Stevenson's continuation of the 'Sentimental Journey' (1761), and Richard Griffith's 'Posthumous Works of a late celebrated Genius' (1770, included in the first collected edition, which appeared, without letters, in 1779). The best early edition of the collected works (with letters and Hogarth's plates) appeared in 1780.

Sternhold and Hopkins, THOMAS STERNHOLD (d. 1549) and JOHN HOPKINS (d. 1570), joint versifiers of the Psalms. A collection of forty-four of these versified psalms appeared in 1549. In 1562 'The Whole Book of Psalms', by Sternhold, Hopkins, Norton, and others, was added to the Prayer Book. This version is ridiculed by Dryden in 'Absalom and Achitophel', II. 403, and it drew the following epigram from Rochester:

Sternhold and Hopkins had great qualms
When they translated David's psalms,
To make the heart right glad:
But had it been King David's fate
To hear thee sing and them translate,
By God 'twould set him mad

(quoted in R. E. Prothero's 'The Psalms in Human Life').

STEUART

STEUART, SIR JAMES, who assumed the surname of DENHAM (1712-80), a member of the Faculty of Advocates, was author of an 'Inquiry into the Principles of Political Economy' (1767), written from the standpoint of the mercantile system.

STEVENSON, JOHN HALL- (1718-85), the friend of Sterne (q.v.) and the original of the Eugenius of 'Tristram Shandy'. He was author of 'Crazy Tales' (1762), adaptations or imitations of coarse French fabliaux, and some indifferent political pamphlets in verse. He wrote a continuation of 'The Sentimental Journey' (q.v.), published in 1769.

STEVENSON, ROBERT LOUIS (1850-94), son of Thomas Stevenson, joint-engineer to the Board of Northern Lighthouses, was born in Edinburgh. He entered Edinburgh University in 1867 and studied engineering, but soon abandoned this for the law and was admitted advocate in 1875. He composed an essay on the 'Pentland Rising of 1666' in his sixteenth year (printed 1866) and contributed to the 'Edinburgh University Magazine' in 1871 and the 'Portfolio' in 1873. An affection of the lungs led to his frequent journeys in search of health. His 'Inland Voyage', describing a canoe tour in Belgium and France, was published in 1878, and his 'Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes', the description of a tour taken in 1878, in the following year. In 1879 he travelled to California by emigrant ship and train, and married Mrs. Osbourne in America in 1880. After a stay at Calistoga (recorded in 'The Silverado Squatters', 1883) he returned to England. Meanwhile, though very ill with tuberculosis, he contributed to various periodicals and wrote a number of essays, short stories, and fragments of travel and autobiography, collected in 'Virginibus Puerisque' (1881), 'Familiar Studies of Men and Books' (1882), and 'The New Arabian Nights' (1882), including 'The Pavilion on the Links'. To the same categories belong 'Prince Otto' (1885), 'The Merry Men' (1887, including 'Markheim' and 'Thrawn Janet'), 'Memories and Portraits' (1887), 'Across the Plains' (1892), 'Island Nights' Entertainments' (1893), 'In the South Seas' (1896), and 'The Amateur Emigrant' (included in vol. iii of the Edinburgh edition of his collected works). Long before this Stevenson had become famous by the publication in book form in 1883 of 'Treasure Island' (q.v.). This was followed by 'The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde' (q.v., 1886) and a series of romances: 'Kidnapped' (q.v., 1886) and 'Catriona' its sequel (1893), 'The Black Arrow' (1888), 'The Master of Ballantrae' (q.v., 1889), the unfinished masterpiece, 'Weir of Hermiston' (q.v., 1896), and 'St. Ives' (1897), also unfinished, but completed by Sir A. T. Quiller-Couch. In collaboration with Lloyd Osbourne, Stevenson wrote 'The Wrong Box' (1889), 'The Wrecker' (1892), and 'The Ebb-Tide' (1894). In 1888 Stevenson had set out for the South Seas and settled in Samoa, where he bought the 'Vailima' property and temporarily recovered his health. There he died suddenly from rupture of a blood-vessel in the brain, and there he was buried. He had interested himself greatly in the affairs of the Pacific Islands, and on them wrote 'A Foot-note to History' in 1892.

Stevenson wrote some remarkable poetry, collected in 'A Child's Garden of Verses' (1885) and 'Underwoods' (1887). He collaborated with W. E. Henley in a few dramas: 'Deacon Brodie' (1880), 'Beau Austin' (1892), and 'Admiral Guinea' (1897). He was a delightful letter-writer, and his 'Vailima Letters' were published in 1895, followed in 1911 by 'The Letters of R. L. S.', edited by Sir Sidney Colvin. The Edinburgh edition of his collected works (edited by Colvin) appeared in 1894-8, the Pentland edition in 1906-7, and the Swanston edition in 1911-12. A 'Life' of Stevenson by Graham Balfour was published in 1901, and there have been several later biographies and studies of his work.

Stewart, ALEXANDER, earl of Buchan and lord of Badenoch, called the 'Wolf of Badenoch' (1343?-1405?), fourth son of King Robert II of Scotland. His quarrels with the bishop of Moray probably led him to burn the town of Forres, and to destroy the hospital, houses of the clergy, and the cathedral of Elgin. These excesses earned for him the above popular designation.

STEWART, DUGALD (1753-1828), educated at Edinburgh High School and at Edinburgh and Glasgow Universities, was professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh from 1785 to 1810, in which post he exercised a powerful influence on Scottish thought. He was a disciple of Thomas Reid (q.v.). His works, collected by Sir William Hamilton, 1854-60 (11 vols.), include: 'Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind' (1792, 1814, 1827), 'Outlines of Moral Philosophy' (1793), 'Lectures on Political Economy' (delivered, 1800), and an 'Account of the Life and Writings of Thomas Reid' (1802).

Stewart, FRANCIS, alias SERGEANT BOTHWELL, a character in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

STEWART, JOHN (1749-1822), 'Walking Stewart', described as 'refractory' at Harrow and Charterhouse Schools, went to India in 1763, was a general under Hyder Ali, and prime minister to the Nabob of Arcot. He travelled in Persia, Ethiopia, and Abyssinia, and came to Europe through the Arabian desert, walking through France and Spain in 1783. He also walked from Calais to Vienna in 1784 and in the United States. He made the acquaintance of De Quincey, who, in his 'London Reminiscences', speaks of him as a most interesting man, but 'crazy beyond all reach of hellebore'. He wrote many discursive philosophical works.

STEWART OF THE GLENS

Stewart of the Glens, JAMES, a character in R. L. Stevenson's 'Kidnapped' (q.v.) and 'Catriona'; a real character too, who was executed for a murder which he did not commit, after trial by a jury of Campbells (the foes of his clan).

Steyne, MARQUIS OF, a character in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.), said to have been suggested by the second and third marquises of Hertford.

Stichomythia, in the classical Greek drama, dialogue in alternate lines of verse, employed in sharp disputation. The form is sometimes imitated in modern drama, e.g. in the dialogue between Richard III and Elizabeth in Shakespeare's 'Richard III', iv. iv.

Stiggins, MR., a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

STILL, JOHN (1543-1608), bishop of Bath and Wells; fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, c. 1562, and master of St. John's, 1574. He is supposed to be the author of 'Gammer Gurton's Needle' (q.v.).

STILLINGFLEET, EDWARD (1635-99), fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, and bishop of Worcester from 1689, was a popular preacher and author of 'The Irenicum' (1659), suggesting a compromise with the Presbyterians. His erudition was displayed in 'Origines Sacrae' (1662) and 'Origines Britannicae' (1685).

Stinkomalee, the name under which Theodore Hook ridiculed London University at the time of its foundation (1828).

STIRLING, EARL OF, see Alexander (Sir W.).

STIRLING, JAMES HUTCHISON (1820-1909), educated at Glasgow University to be a physician, abandoned medicine for philosophy, which he studied in Germany and France. He published in 1865 'The Secret of Hegel', containing a translation and commentary, which was his greatest work. His 'Analysis of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy' appeared in the same year, and a 'Text Book of Kant' in 1881.

Stiver, a small coin (originally silver) of the Low Countries; in present use applied to the nickel piece of 5 cents of the Netherlands, equivalent to about a penny English.

Stock Exchange, THE, see Exchange.

STOCKTON, FRANK R. (1834-1902), American writer of humorous fiction, remembered as the author of 'Rudder Grange' (1879), 'The Lady or the Tiger' (1882), 'The Casting away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Ale-shine' (1886), and many other short stories.

Stoddart, SIR JOHN, see Slop.

Stoics, a school of Greek philosophers, founded by Zeno (q.v.) of Citium about 310 B.C., which derives its name from the fact that Zeno taught under the 'Stoa Poikile' or 'Painted Portico' of Athens. Though the stoic doctrine embraced a complete philosophical system, its chief importance lies on the moral side. It held that happiness consists in liberation from the bondage of the passions and appetites, and in approximation to God by obeying his will; that virtue is thus the highest good, and suffering a matter of indifference. Among the illustrious Stoics of antiquity were Epictetus, Seneca, and Marcus Aurelius (qq.v.).

Stonehenge, a great prehistoric stone circle on Salisbury Plain. 'It is a reconstruction, with larger stones, of an earlier circle, the stones of which, re-dressed and somewhat reduced in size, were placed within the larger circle. The older stones, unlike the others which are sarsen stone or grey wethers (such as are found in great numbers on Salisbury Plain), are of non-local origin, and it has recently been shown that they must have been brought from the Preseli Hills in Pembrokeshire. . . . It is possible that the custom of erecting circles was introduced into this country by the beaker-folk (? 21st cent. B.C.), and translated into stone when they came into contact with the megalith culture' (Peake and Fleure, 'The Way of the Sea').

Stones of Venice, The, a treatise in three volumes by Ruskin (q.v.), published in 1851-3.

It was written while the production of 'Modern Painters' (q.v.) was still proceeding. Its purpose is to glorify Gothic and expose 'the pestilent art of the Renaissance' by attacking it in its central stronghold, Venice. 'Destroy its claims to admiration there, and it can assert them nowhere else.' The author also traces the relation of the rise and fall of Gothic art to the moral temper of the State. He places the division between the 900 years of the rise of Venice and the 500 years of her decline at about the year 1310, the date of the 'Serrar del Consiglio', the establishment of the Council of Ten, 'the final and absolute distinction of the nobles from the commonalty'. He explains the principles of Byzantine architecture exemplified in St. Mark's, and the union of Gothic and Renaissance in the Ducal Palace, 'the central building of the world'. He passes to the minor corruptions of early Renaissance, redeemed by its noble use of inlaid marbles, the more serious faults of the central Renaissance, and the final degradation of grotesque Renaissance.

Stonewall Jackson, a nickname of General Thomas Jonathan Jackson (1824-63), a brilliant general on the Confederate side in the American Civil War. At a critical moment of the battle of Bull Run (1861), another officer remarked of him, 'See, there is Jackson standing like a stone wall.' He was killed at the battle of Chancellorsville, and Lee said, 'I have lost my right arm.'

Story of an African Farm, The, a novel by Olive Schreiner (q.v.).

STORY OF RIMINI

Story of Thebes, The, see Lydgate.

STOW, JOHN (1525?–1605), chronicler and antiquary, followed at first the trade of a tailor and was admitted a freeman of the Merchant Taylors' Company in 1547. He occupied himself from 1560 in collecting and transcribing manuscripts, and in producing original historical works. Becoming suspected of partiality for the old faith, he was charged in 1568, 1569, and 1570 with being in possession of popish and dangerous writings, was examined before the ecclesiastical commission, but escaped without punishment. He spent all his fortune on his literary pursuits, and existed for some time upon charitable contributions. A fine effigy of Stow, erected by his wife, still exists in the church of St. Andrew Undershaft, Leadenhall Street, London. He was the most accurate and businesslike of the historians of his century. His chief productions are: 'The Woorkes of Geoffrey Chaucer', 1561 (his further notes on Chaucer being subsequently printed by Thomas Speght, 1598); 'Summarie of Englyshe Chronicles', 1565 (an original historical work); Matthew of Westminster's 'Flores Historiarum', 1567; Matthew Paris's 'Chronicle', 1571; Thomas Walsingham's 'Chronicle', 1574; 'The Chronicles of England', 1580 (in subsequent editions styled 'The Annales of England'); the second edition of Holinshed's 'Chronicle', 1585–7; and lastly 'A Survey of London', 1598 and 1603, a book invaluable for the detailed information it gives about the ancient city and its customs. It was brought down to his day by J. Strype (q.v.) in 1720, and modernized and annotated editions have since been published (C. L. Kingsford, 1908).

STOWE, MRS. HARRIET ELIZABETH BEECHER (1811–96), born at Litchfield, Connecticut, sister of Henry Ward Beecher (1813–87, divine and religious author and journalist), was a school-teacher before her marriage. Her famous anti-slavery novel, 'Uncle Tom's Cabin', appeared in the 'National Era' in 1851–2, and in book form in 1852. She wrote a number of other less well-known works, 'Dred' (1856), 'The Minister's Wooing' (1859), &c. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin', by its presentment of the sufferings entailed on the negroes by the system of slavery, the separation of husbands from wives, and mothers from their children, and the brutality of some of the slave-owners, did much to hasten the American Civil War. It was in Mrs. Stowe's own words 'a collection and arrangement of real incidents . . . grouped together with reference to a general result'. It was translated into twenty-three languages.

STRABO (b. c. 63 B.C.), a native of Amasia in Pontus, author of a history, continuing that of Polybius, which is lost, and of an important historical geography of the Roman Empire in seventeen books, which is extant almost in its entirety.

STRAFFORD

STRACHEY, GILES LYTTON (1880–1932), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, the author of a work of literary criticism, 'Landmarks in French Literature' (1912), became widely known in 1918 by his 'Eminent Victorians', biographies of Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale, Dr. Arnold, and General Gordon. The preface to 'Eminent Victorians' expounded Strachey's method, avoiding 'scrupulous narration' and attacking 'his subject in unexpected places', shooting 'a sudden revealing searchlight into obscure recesses, hitherto undivined'. This book was followed by a life of Queen Victoria in 1921, 'Books and Characters' in 1922, 'Elizabeth and Essex' in 1928, and 'Portraits in Miniature' in 1931.

Stradivarius, the latinized form of the name of Antonio Stradivari (1644?–1737), a famous maker of stringed musical instruments, born at Cremona, a pupil of Nicolo Amati. The name is also applied to violins of his making. Stradivarius is the subject of a poem by G. Eliot (q.v.).

Strafford, SIR THOMAS WENTWORTH, first earl of (1593–1641), educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, at first showed himself in parliament a moderate but firm opponent of the policy of Charles I. He was taken into court favour and made president of the council of the north in 1628, and lord-deputy of Ireland in 1632, where he set himself vigorously to restoring the king's authority. He became informally Charles's chief adviser in 1638, and urged the invasion of Scotland, promising in 1639, it was reported, the assistance of Irish troops against both Scottish and English rebels. He took command in 1640 of Charles I's force in Yorkshire against the invading Scots army. Strafford attended the Long Parliament on the king's personal guarantee of his safety, and urged that the parliamentary leaders should be sent to the Tower. He was impeached by the Commons in 1640, but as it was manifestly impossible to convict him of high treason, a bill of attainder was substituted in 1641, and assented to by Charles in fear of mob violence. He was executed on Tower Hill in May 1641. He was nicknamed 'Black Tom Tyrant'.

Strafford, a tragedy by R. Browning (q.v.), produced in 1837 at Covent Garden, with Macready in the title-role and Helen Faucit as Lady Carlisle. The play was not successful on the stage and ran for only a few nights.

The tragedy deals with the close of Strafford's career. Pym, who loves Strafford, relentlessly pursues his death from patriotic motives; Strafford, whose unshakable devotion to Charles has caused his downfall, is abandoned by the weak and irresolute king; Lady Carlisle (the theme of many poems by Herrick, Carew, and other Cavalier lyrics), after in vain warning Strafford of his danger, devises a plan for his escape from the Tower, which fails; Strafford, after appealing to Pym to save him, and foreseeing the king's own fate, suffers on the scaffold, thanking God that he dies first.

STRANGFORD, PERCY CLINTON SYDNEY SMYTHE, sixth visc. (1780–1855), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, a diplomatist, published 'Poems from the Portuguese of Camoëns' in 1803. He is referred to as 'Hibernian Strangford' in Byron's 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers' (q.v.).

Strap, HUGH, a character in Smollett's 'Roderick Random' (q.v.).

STRAPAROLA, GIOVAN FRANCESCO (fl. end of 15th cent.), Italian author of novelle entitled 'Piacevoli Notti' ('Pleasant Nights'), which enjoyed much popularity. Painter, in his 'Palace of Pleasure' (q.v.), drew on Straparola among others.

Straw, JACK, see Jack Straw.

Strawberry Hill, near Twickenham, about ten miles W. of the centre of London. Horace Walpole (q.v.) settled there in 1747, making it into 'a little Gothic castle', housing in it his collection of articles of vertu, and establishing a private printing-press. 'Strawberry Hill Gothic' is a common term for any example of romantic gothicized architecture of the period.

Strephon, the shepherd whose lament for his lost Urania forms the opening of Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.). 'Strephon' has been adopted as a conventional name for a rustic lover.

Strether, LEWIS LAMBERT, a character in H. James's 'The Ambassadors' (q.v.).

STRICKLAND, AGNES (1796–1874), was author (in collaboration with her elder sister, Elizabeth) of the successful 'Lives of the Queens of England' (1840–8), and 'Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses' (1850–9). She wrote other historical biographies, and a novel, 'How Will it End?' (1865).

STRINDBERG, AUGUST (1849–1912), Swedish dramatist and novelist, a misogynist, and a disciple of Nietzsche; author, among other works, of the three plays, 'The Father', 'Miss Julia', and 'The Creditors', and of the novels 'Tschandala' and 'By the Open Sea'.

Strode, RALPH (fl. 1350–1400), scholastic philosopher and logician, fellow of Merton College, Oxford, where John Wycliffe was his colleague. He entered into controversy with Wycliffe, and Chaucer dedicated to him and to Gower his 'Troylus and Cryseyde'.

Strong, CAPTAIN of CHEVALIER, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

Strong, DR., in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), an amiable old schoolmaster, who dotes on his young wife, Annie, and supports her worthless cousin, Jack Maldon.

Stro'phe, from the Greek word meaning 'turn', part of a Greek choral ode sung as the chorus proceeded in one direction, followed by the anti'strophe, when they turned and proceeded in the opposite direction (see Alcman).

Struldrugs, see Gulliver's Travels.

STRUTT, JOSEPH (1749–1802), author, artist, engraver, and antiquary, was author of many works valuable for their research and engravings, including a 'Chronicle of England' (1777–8), 'Dresses and Habits of the English People' (1796–9), and 'Sports and Pastimes of the People of England' (1801). An unfinished novel by Strutt was completed by Sir W. Scott ('Queenhoo Hall'), and suggested to him the publication of his own 'Waverley'.

Struwelpeter, see Hoffmann (H.).

STRYPE, JOHN (1643–1737), ecclesiastical historian, educated at St. Paul's School, Jesus College and St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, formed a magnificent collection of original documents, mostly of the Tudor period, now in the Harleian and Lansdowne MSS. He published lives of Cranmer (1694), Sir John Cheke (1705), Grindal (1710), Matthew Parker (1711), and Whitgift (1718). He corrected and enlarged Stow's 'Survey of London' (1720).

STUART, DANIEL (1766–1846), journalist, is remembered as having purchased the 'Morning Post' in 1795 and the 'Courier' in 1796, and raised both papers to importance by his management. There is a pleasant sketch of him as 'one of the finest of editors . . . frank, plain, and English all over' in C. Lamb's 'Newspapers Thirty-five Years Ago'.

STUBBES or STUBBS, PHILIP (fl. 1583–91), a Puritan pamphleteer, author of 'The Anatomie of Abuses' (1583), a denunciation of evil customs of the time which, in the author's opinion, needed abolition. It contains a section on stage plays and is one of the principal sources of information on the social and economic conditions of the period. It was answered by Nashe in the 'Anatomie of Absurditie'.

STUBBS, WILLIAM (1825–1901), educated at Ripon Grammar School and (as a servitor) at Christ Church, Oxford. He became a fellow of Trinity College and was for seventeen years rector of Navestock in Essex (where for a short time he had Swinburne as a pupil). He was much interested in the publication of the Rolls series, to which, in 1857, he contributed his 'Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum', exhibiting by tables the course of ecclesiastical succession in England. He succeeded Goldwin Smith as Regius professor of history at Oxford in 1866. He now published a large number of volumes of the Rolls series, beginning with the 'Chronicles and Memorials of Richard I' in 1864–5, and ending with the 'Historia Novella' of William of Malmesbury in 1885. In 1871–8 he edited, jointly with A. W. Haddan, 'The Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents of Great Britain'. But the works by which he is most widely known are his contributions to English constitutional history: the edition of the 'Select Charters and other Illustrations of English Constitutional History', published in 1870, and 'The Constitutional History of England in its Origin and Development', published in 1874-8, in which the author traces the development of our political institutions from Saxon times to the period of the Tudors. His shorter works, besides lectures, include a book on 'The Early Plantagenets' (1876). Stubbs was appointed bishop of Chester in 1884, and of Oxford in 1888.

Study and Use of History, Letters on the, see under Bolingbroke.

Stukeley, a character in George Peele's 'Battle of Alcazar' (q.v.). The real Thomas Stucley or Stukeley (1525?-78) was said to be a natural son of Henry VIII. He was an adventurer, who entered the service of the French king, was sent on a spying expedition to England, and betrayed his employer to Cecil. He next entered the service of Charles V; then embarked on a privateering expedition, for which Queen Elizabeth provided one of his ships, till the remonstrances of foreign powers led to his arrest. He proceeded to Ireland, where his ambitious schemes were distrusted and discountenanced by Elizabeth. He escaped to Spain, having been in treasonable correspondence with Philip II. He joined the king of Portugal's expedition against Morocco and was killed at the battle of Alcazar. Fuller in his 'Worthies' gives an amusing account of a conversation between him and Queen Elizabeth: 'So confident was his ambition that he blushed not to tell Queen Elizabeth that he preferred rather to be sovereign of a mole-hill than the highest subject to the greatest King in Christendome; adding moreover that he was assured he should be a prince before his death. I hope (said Queen Elizabeth) I shall hear from you, when you are stated in your principality. I will write unto you (quoth Stukeley). In what language? (said the Queen). He returned, In the stile of Princes: To our dear Sister.'

STUKELEY, WILLIAM (1687-1765), antiquary, educated at Bennet (Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge, was secretary of the Society of Antiquaries, which he shared in founding (1718). He published, among other writings, 'Itinerarium Curiosum' (1724) and 'Stonehenge' (1740), and was specially interested in Druidism. He published in 1757 as a genuine work of Richard of Cirencester, Charles Bertram's forgery, 'De Situ Britanniae'.

Stupor Mundi et immutator mirabilis, a term applied to the Emperor Frederick II (q.v., d. 1250), expressing contemporary opinion of his versatility. He was highly cultured, and his interests extended to mathematics, natural history, medicine, and other branches of intellectual activity. Frederick's tolerance of Mohammedans in his service led the papal party to accuse him of being the author of (an imaginary work) 'De Tribus Impostoribus'—Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed.

STURLA THORDSSON (c. 1214-84), nephew of Snorri (q.v.), Icelandic historian, author of the 'Sturlunga Saga' or contemporary history of the house of Sturla, a vivid picture of old Icelandic life.

Sturm und Drang (storm and stress), the name (taken from the title of an absurd romantic drama of the American War of Independence by the German, Klinger, 1775) given to a period of literary ferment which prevailed in Germany during the latter part of the 18th cent., inspired by Rousseau's fervent idealism, revolt against conventional trammels, and recall to nature. The principal figures of the movement were Schiller, Goethe, and Herder (qq.v.).

Stutly, WILL, one of the legendary companions of Robin Hood (q.v.).

Styllite or STYLITES, an ascetic who lived on the top of a pillar. The best known of these ascetics was Simeon, a Syrian, who is said to have spent thirty years on a pillar near Antioch before his death in A.D. 459. He had several imitators, and is celebrated in Tennyson's poem, 'St. Simeon Stylites'.

Styx, connected with the Greek στυγίη to hate, στυγνός hateful, gloomy, a river of Hades or the lower world, over which the shades of the departed were ferried by Charon, and by which the gods swore their most solemn oaths. In the 'Odyssey' (x. 515) the Acheron is the principal river of Hades, of which the Pyriphlegethon, and the Cocytus, a branch of the Styx, are tributaries:

four infernal rivers that disgorge
Into the burning lake their baleful streams—
Abhorred Styx, the flood of deadly hate;
Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep;
Cocytus named of lamentation loud
Heard on the rueful stream; fierce Phleg-eton
Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.

(Milton, 'Paradise Lost', ii. 575-81.)

Sublapsarian or INFRALAPSARIAN, a Calvinist holding the view that God's election of some to everlasting life was made after He had permitted or foreseen the fall of Adam. Cf. Supralapsarian.

Sublime and Beautiful, A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the, a philosophical treatise by E. Burke (q.v.), published in 1756.

This is one of the earliest of Burke's publications. He finds that anything capable of exciting the idea of pain and danger is a source of the sublime; that beauty is the property which causes love (as distinct from desire); and that it consists in relative smallness, smoothness, absence of angularity, and brightness of colour (thus very much narrowing the sense of the word). The treatise contains interesting sections on the effect upon us of the distresses of others as the source of pleasure in terrible sights such as a conflagration, or in tragedies; and on the pleasurable effects of words and poetry.

SUCKLING, SIR JOHN (1609-42), of an old Norfolk family, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He inherited large estates, travelled in France and Italy, and was knighted on his return in 1630. He is said to have fought under Gustavus Adolphus and to have taken part in the defeat of Tilly before Breitenfeld (1631). He returned to London in 1632 and lived at court in a style of great profusion. He became a leader of the Royalist party in the early troubles; then fled to France and is said by Aubrey to have committed suicide in Paris. His chief works are included in 'Fragmenta Aurea' (1646), and consist of poems, plays, letters, and tracts, among them the famous 'Ballad upon a Wedding'. His 'Session of the Poets', in which the various writers of the day, including Ben Jonson, Carew, and D'Avenant, contend for the laurel, appeared in 1637; it is interesting as an expression of contemporary opinion on these writers. Suckling's play, 'Aglaura' (with two fifth acts, one tragic, the other not), appeared in the same year. It contains the famous lyric, 'Why so pale and wan, fond lover?' 'The Goblins', his best play, was acted in 1638. The goblins are thieves who disguise themselves as devils and behave somewhat after the manner of Robin Hood and his men. His 'Brennoralt' (1646), an expansion of the 'Discontented Colonell' (1640), a tragedy, reflecting on the disloyalty of the Scots (in the guise of Lithuanians), is interesting for the light which the melancholy colonel throws on the character of the author himself. The plays, however, are chiefly valuable for their good lyrics. D'Avenant speaks of Suckling's sparkling wit, describing him further as the greatest gallant and gamester of his day. He invented the game of cribbage.

Suddlechop, BENJAMIN and DAME URSULA, characters in Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

SUMMONER'S TALE

SUDERMANN, HERMANN (1857-1928), born in East Prussia, dramatist and novelist, chiefly famous for his dramas, of which the best known are 'Magda' ('Heimat', 1892), in which the chief part has been played by Bernhardt, Duse, and Mrs. Patrick Campbell; and 'Die Ehre' (1880).

Sudra, the lowest of the four great Hindu castes, the artisans and labourers.

SUE, EUGÈNE (1804-57), French novelist, a prolific writer of romances, of which the best known are 'Les Mystères de Paris' (1842-3) and 'Le Juif errant' (1844-5).

SUESS, EDUARD (1831-1914), born in London and educated at Prague and Vienna, became professor of geology at Vienna and one of the greatest of recent geologists. His principal work is 'Das Antlitz der Erde' (1885-1909), which was translated as 'The Face of the Earth' (1904-25) by H. B. C. Sollas.

SUETONIUS (GAIUS SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS) (c. A.D. 70-c. 160), Roman historian, friend of the younger Pliny, author of 'Lives of the Caesars' (from Julius Caesar to Domitian) and of 'De Viris Illustribus' (including lives of Terence, Horace, and Lucan). But much of his writing is lost. An English version of what survives was made by Philemon Holland (q.v.).

Sufi, the name of a sect of Mohammedan ascetic mystics. There are references to them in the 'Rubáiyát' of Omar Khayyám.

Sullen, SQUIRE and MRS., characters in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.).

SULLIVAN, SIR ARTHUR SEYMOUR (1842-1900), the son of a bandmaster at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, studied at the Royal Academy of Music and at the Conservatorium, Leipzig, and from 1861 was organist at St. Michael's, Chester Square, and subsequently at St. Peter's, Cranley Gardens, London. He composed in 1866 the comic opera, 'Cox and Box', and in 1871 'Thespis', the libretto of which was by W. S. Gilbert (q.v.), the beginning of a collaboration which produced the famous Gilbert and Sullivan operas (q.v.). He composed a setting for Longfellow's 'Golden Legend' (1886) and a serious opera, 'Ivanhoe' (1891); also cantatas, oratorios, and a great deal of sacred music.

Sumer is Icumen in, the first line of what is believed to be the earliest extant English lyric. It was probably written in the first half of the 13th cent.; the author is unknown. The music to which it was sung still survives.

Sunium, the ancient name of Cape Colonna, at the south-eastern extremity of Attica, in Greece. It was crowned by a marble temple to Athene, of which some columns still remain. It is celebrated in the last stanza of Byron's 'The Isles of Greece' ('Don Juan', III), 'Place me on Sunium's marbled steep'.

Sunna, the body of traditional sayings and customs attributed to Mohammed and supplementing the Koran.

Sunnites, as opposed to the Shi'ites (see Shi'a), the orthodox Moslems, who admit the caliphate of Abu Bakr and his immediate successors, but reject the claims of Ali's descendants.

Supernaculum, a modern Latin rendering of the German auf den Nagel, on the nail, in the phrase auf den Nagel trinken, to drink off liquor to the last drop; used as an adverb in reference to the practice of turning up the emptied cup or glass on one's left thumb-nail, to show that all the liquor has been drunk. Hence, as a substantive, a liquor to be drunk to the last drop, a wine of the highest quality. Hence, anything excellent of its kind. [OED.]

Supralapsarian, a name applied to those Calvinists who held the view that, in the divine decrees, the predestination of some to eternal life and of others to eternal death was antecedent to the Creation and the Fall. [OED.] Cf. Sublapsarian.

Supremacy, Act of: the first Act of Supremacy was passed in Henry VIII's reign (1534); it declared the King to be the Supreme Head on earth of the Church of England, and made it treasonable to deny this. By the second Act of Supremacy (1559), in Elizabeth's reign, the above title was abandoned, but an oath was imposed on persons holding office or taking a university degree acknowledging the Queen to be supreme governor of the realm in spiritual and ecclesiastical matters.

and brought up in his home, where he and the surgeon's daughter Janet fall in love. On coming of age, Richard, being of an ambitious as well as violent and ill-balanced disposition, leaves the doctor's home to push his fortunes in India. Here he falls under the influence of an adventuress, the Begum Mootee Mahal, otherwise Mme Montreville, and has the unspeakable baseness to fall in with her plan to lure Janet out to India with a view to handing her over to Tippoo Sahib. The plot is defeated by Adam Hartley, Richard's fellow pupil at Dr. Gray's, an unsuccessful suitor for Janet's hand. He secures the interposition of Hyder Ali, who orders the release of Janet. By his order also Richard Middlemas is crushed to death by an elephant.

Surly, a character in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

Surrealism, the name given to a recent movement among certain writers and painters. The former attempt expression by means of words set down without logical sequence; while the latter, led by the Spanish painter, Juan Miró, give weird distorted forms to ordinary objects.

SURREY, HENRY HOWARD, (by courtesy) earl of (1517?-47), the poet, was son of Thomas Howard (afterwards third duke of Norfolk). He married Frances Vere in 1532. He was with the army during the war with France (1544-6), being wounded before Montreuil, and was commander of Boulogne, 1545-6. He was condemned and executed on a frivolous charge of treasonably quartering the royal arms and advising his sister to become the king's mistress. He was then barely 30 years old.

His works consist of sonnets and miscellaneous poems in various metres, notable for their grace and finish. Like Wyatt (q.v.) he studied Italian models, especially Petrarch, and shared with Wyatt the merit of bringing the sonnet from Italy into England. He had the perhaps even greater merit of introducing, in his translation of the Aeneid (Bks. II and III), the use of blank verse. The subject of many of his love-poems was 'The fair Geraldine', Elizabeth, daughter of the ninth earl of Kildare. Forty of his poems were printed in Tottel's 'Miscellany', 1557 (reprinted 1867 and 1870). The poems, with those of Wyatt, were edited by Dr. G. F. Nott, 1815-16, and others, and for the Aldine poets by James Yeowell, 1866.

SURTEES, ROBERT (1779-1834), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, an antiquary and topographer. He spent his life in collecting materials for his 'History of Durham' county (1816-40). He is commemorated in the Surtees Society, a book-club dealing with the literature of the region constituting the old kingdom of Northumberland. Scott included in his 'Border Minstrelsy' a spurious and spirited ballad by him, 'The Death of Featherstonhaugh'. 'Barthram's Dirge' in the same collection is suspected of being also by Surtees (Burton, 'The Book-hunter').

SURTEES, ROBERT SMITH (1805-64), author of a number of humorous sporting novels. With Rudolph Ackermann the younger, he started in 1831 'The New Sporting Magazine', to which he contributed the sketches of Mr. Jorrocks, the sporting grocer, subsequently republished as 'Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities' (1838). This was followed by 'Handley Cross' (1843), 'Hillingdon Hall' (1845, about Jorrocks in his old age), 'Hawbuck Grange' (1847), 'Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour' (1853), 'Ask Mamma' (1858), 'Plain or Ringlets' (1860), 'Mr. Facey Romford's Hounds' (1865). John Leech's illustrations to most of these books add greatly to their interest. Surtees also wrote in 'Bell's Life in London' a series of papers, some of which were reprinted, with illustrations by Alken, as 'The Analysis of the Hunting Field' (1846).

Surya, in Vedic theology, the sun-god, invoked by every devout Brahman when he rises.

Susanna, THE HISTORY OF, one of the apocryphal books of the O.T., detached from the beginning of the book of Daniel. Susanna was the wife of Joakim, a rich man dwelling in Babylon. She was accused of unchastity by two elders, because she had repelled their advances. Daniel exposed the plot by examining the elders separately; their evidence conflicted and they were put to death.

Suspicious Husband, The, a comedy by Dr. Benjamin Hoadly (q.v.) and his brother, produced in 1747 at Covent Garden, Garrick taking the part of Ranger.

Strickland, the suspicious husband of a young wife, is guardian of the wealthy Jacintha. She and Bellamy are in love with one another, but Strickland will not hear of the match. So Jacintha, a young lady of spirit, determines to run away with her lover, who provides a rope ladder for the purpose. Clarinda, a sprightly young friend of Mrs. Strickland, is staying in her house. Frankly, a friend of Bellamy, who has fallen in love with her at Bath, pursues her to London. Frankly and Bellamy meet outside the house at night, just when Jacintha is about to escape and when Clarinda, after a late whist party, is coming home. A general imbroglio ensues. Bellamy suspects Frankly of an intrigue with Jacintha; Strickland, discovering the latter's attempted flight, goes off in pursuit. Meanwhile Ranger, a frolicsome rattlepate, and friend of Bellamy and Frankly, happening to pass and seeing a rope-ladder hanging from the window, climbs up in search of adventure, and makes his way to the bedroom of Mrs. Strickland, whom he has never seen before. The return of Strickland with the captured Jacintha puts him to flight, but he drops his hat in Mrs. Strickland's room, where it is discovered by her husband, who is now convinced that his suspicions were well-founded, and sentences his wife to banishment to the country. While this is going on, Ranger, who has taken refuge in another room, discovers Jacintha, and enables her to escape, this time successfully. On the morrow there is a general confrontation and explanation, and all ends happily.

Swaddler, a nickname originally for a Methodist, especially a Methodist preacher, in Ireland; later for Protestants in general. The explanation commonly accepted (but challenged) is that indicated by C. Wesley in his journal (10 Sept. 1747): 'It seems we are beholden to Mr. Cennick for it, who abounds in such-like expressions as "I curse and blaspheme all the gods in heaven, but the babe that lay in the manger, the babe that lay in Mary's lap, the babe that lay in swaddling clouts"'. Hence they nicknamed him "Swaddler". And the name sticks to us all, not excepting the clergy.'

Swallow, the mare of Hereward the Wake (q.v.); according to the chronicles the ugliest as well as the swiftest of her time.

Swan, THE MANTUAN, Virgil (q.v.).

Swan of Avon, THE, Shakespeare, so called by Jonson.

Swan of Lichfield, see Seward.

Swanhild, according to the Volsunga Saga (q.v.), the daughter of Sigurd. King Jormunrek desires to marry her and sends Randver, his son, to sue for her hand. On his return with Swanhild, Randver is falsely accused to the king of having seduced her. He is ordered to execution, and on the way plucks the feathers from his hawk, and sends it to the king, as a symbol that his honour is taken from him. The king repents, but it is too late, for Randver has been put to death. Swanhild, as the cause of the king's grief, is bound in the gate, and is trodden to death under horses' feet.

Swaran, in the Ossianic poem 'Fingal' (q.v.), the Scandinavian king of Lochlin, who invades Ireland.

Swastika, from Sanskrit svasti, meaning 'good fortune', a primitive symbol or ornament consisting of a cross with equal arms having a limb of the same length projecting at right angles from the extremity of each arm, all in the same direction (usually clockwise); adopted by the Nazis as the symbol of Germany (referred to in a speech by Hitler as early as 13 April 1923).

Sweating sickness, the name given to a febrile disease of which highly and rapidly fatal epidemics occurred in the 15th and 16th cents. The principal epidemic in London occurred in 1517.

SWEDENBORG (SWEDBERG), EMANUEL (1688–1772), Swedish philosopher, scientist, and mystic, was the son of a professor of theology at Upsala. He devoted the earlier part of his life to scientific study and engineering, and was ahead of his contemporaries in many branches of scientific discovery. He was gradually led to seek a scientific explanation of the universe, publishing in 1734 his 'Opera philosophica et mineralia', and in the same year his 'Prodromus Philosophiae ratiocinantis de infinito' on the relation of the soul to the body and the finite to the infinite.

After middle age he applied himself to psychical and spiritual subjects. He enjoyed visions culminating in 1745 in a revelation, and thereafter devoted his life to the interpretation of the Scriptures. According to his theosophic system, God, as Divine Man, is infinite love and infinite wisdom, from whom emanate the two worlds of nature and spirit, distinct but closely related. The end of creation is the approximation of man to God. This end having been endangered by evil spirits, Jehovah descended into nature, restored the connexion between God and man, and left the Scriptures as His testimony, of which Swedenborg was the appointed interpreter. The Swedenborgians or followers of Swedenborg were organized in London in 1778 as the 'New Church'.

Sweedlepipe, PAUL or POLL, in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), bird-fancier and barber, Mrs. Gamp's landlord.

SWEET, HENRY (1845–1912), philologist, educated at King's College School, London, Heidelberg university, and Balliol College, Oxford, did much foundational work in Anglo-Saxon, phonetics, &c. His publications included the 'History of English Sounds' (1874, 1888), the 'Anglo-Saxon Reader' (1876), 'A New English Grammar' (1892, 1898), 'The History of Language' (1900), 'The Sounds of English: an Introduction to Phonetics' (1908).

Swidger, PHILIP, WILLIAM, and MILLY, characters in Dickens's 'The Haunted Man' (q.v.).

SWIFT, JONATHAN (1667–1745), was born at Dublin after his father's death. He was son of Jonathan Swift by Abigail (Erick) of Leicester, and grandson of Thomas Swift, the well-known Royalist vicar of Goodrich, descended from a Yorkshire family. He was a cousin of Dryden. He was educated at Kilkenny Grammar School, having Congreve (q.v.) for schoolfellow. Thence he went to Trinity College, Dublin, where he was censured for offences against discipline, obtaining his degree only by 'special grace'. He was admitted (1689) to the household of Sir W. Temple (q.v.), and there acted as secretary. He was sent by Temple to William III to convince him of the necessity of triennial parliaments, but his mission was not successful. He wrote pindarics, one of which, printed in the 'Athenian Mercury' (1692), provoked, according to Dr. Johnson, Dryden's remark, 'Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet.' Chafing at his position of dependence, and indignant at Temple's delay in getting him preferment, he returned to Ireland, was ordained (1694), and received the small prebend of Kilroot. He returned to Temple at Moor Park in 1696, where he edited Temple's correspondence, and in 1697 wrote 'The Battle of the Books' (q.v.), which was published in 1704, together with 'A Tale of a Tub' (q.v.), his celebrated satire on 'corruptions in religion and learning'. At Moor Park he first met Esther Johnson ('Stella'), the daughter of a servant or companion of Temple's sister, of whom more presently. On the death of Temple in 1699, Swift went again to Ireland, was given a prebend in St. Patrick's, Dublin, and the living of Laracor. He wrote his 'Discourse of the Contests and Dissensions in Athens and Rome' with reference to the impeachment of the Whig lords, in 1701. In the course of numerous visits to London he became acquainted with Addison, Steele, Congreve, and Halifax. He was entrusted in 1707 with a mission to obtain the grant of Queen Anne's Bounty for Ireland, and in 1708 began a series of pamphlets on church questions with his ironical 'Argument against abolishing Christianity', followed in the same year by his 'Letter concerning the Sacramental Test', an attack on the Irish Presbyterians, which injured him with the Whigs. Amid these serious occupations, he diverted himself with the series of squibs upon the astrologer John Partridge (1708–9, see under Bickerstaff), which have become famous, and his 'Description of a City Shower' and 'Description of the Morning', poems depicting scenes of London life, which were published in the 'Tatler' (1709). Disgusted at the Whig alliance with dissent, he went over to the Tories in 1710, joined the 'Brothers' Club' (q.v.), attacked the Whig ministers in the 'Examiner' (q.v.), which he edited, and in 1711 wrote 'The Conduct of the Allies' and 'Some Remarks on the Barrier Treaty', pamphlets written to dispose the mind of the nation to peace. He became dean of St. Patrick's in 1713. He had already begun his 'Journal to Stella' (letters 1 and 41–65 published in Hawkesworth's edition of Swift's works in 1766; letters 2–40 in Deane Swift's edition, 1768; a modern annotated edition is that of G. A. Aitken, 1901). It is a series of intimate letters (1710–13) to Esther Johnson and her companion Rebecca Dingley, for the most part written in baby-language, recounting the details of his daily life while in London, where he was in close touch with the Tory ministers. Swift's relations with Stella have remained somewhat obscure; she was his worshipper, and he respected her and returned her affection. Whether he ultimately married her is uncertain. Stella died in 1728. Another woman, Esther Vanhomrigh (pron. 'Vanummery'), entered into his life in 1708; she fell deeply in love with him, received some measure of encouragement, and his final rupture with her about 1723 led to her death. The story of their love-affair is related in Swift's poem, 'Cadenus and Vanessa' (q.v.), 'Cadenus' being an anagram of 'Dechanus', and 'Vanessa' being the pet name by which Swift knew her.

Swift wrote various political pamphlets, notably 'The Importance of the Guardian considered' (1713) and 'The Public Spirit of the Whigs' (1714), in reply to Steele's 'Crisis'; and about the time of the queen's death in 1714 and the fall of the Tory ministry, several papers (published much later) in defence of the latter. In the same year he joined Pope, Arbuthnot, Gay, and others in the celebrated Scriblerus Club (q.v.). He returned to Ireland in August 1714 and occupied himself with Irish affairs, being led by his resentment of the policy of the Whigs to acquire a sense of their unfair treatment of Ireland. By his famous 'Drapier's Letters' (q.v., 1724) he prevented the introduction of 'Wood's Half-pence' into Ireland. He came to England in 1726, visited Pope and Gay, and dined with Sir Robert Walpole, to whom he addressed a letter of remonstrance on Irish affairs with no result. He published 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.) in the same year, and paid a last visit to England in 1727, when the death of George I created for a moment hopes of dislodging Walpole. He wrote some of his most famous tracts and characteristic poems during his last years in Ireland, 'The Grand Question Debated' (q.v., 1729); 'Verses on his own Death' (1731), in which with mingled pathos and humour he posthumously reviews his own life and work; 'A Complete Collection of Polite and Ingenious Conversation' (?1738, q.v. under Conversation); and the ironical 'Directions to Servants' (written about 1731 and published after his death). He kept up his correspondence with Bolingbroke, Pope, Gay, and Arbuthnot, attracted to himself a small circle of friends, and was adored by the people. He set up a monument to Schomberg (William III's general, killed at the Boyne) in the cathedral at his own expense, spent a third of his income on charities, and saved up another third to found a charitable institution at his death, St. Patrick's Hospital for Imbeciles (opened 1757). The symptoms of the illness from which he appears to have suffered all his life (a form of vertigo) became very marked c. 1738, and for a time before his death he was insane. He was buried by the side of Stella, in St. Patrick's, Dublin, his own famous epitaph, 'ubi aeva indignatio ulterius cor lacerare nequit', being inscribed on his tomb. Dr. Johnson, Macaulay, and Thackeray, among many other writers, were alienated by his ferocity, which was, however, the result of noble qualities soured by hard experience. His indignation at oppression and unfairness was genuine. His writing was sometimes coarse, but never lewd. His political works are founded on common sense, pure and simple, and he had no party bias. Nearly all his works were published anonymously, and for only one, 'Gulliver's Travels', did he receive any payment (£200).

Among earlier biographies of Swift may be mentioned the earl of Orrery's (1752, followed by P. Delany's 'Observations upon Lord Orrery's Remarks', 1754), Deane Swift's (1755), and T. Sheridan's (1784). There is a memoir by Sir W. Scott prefixed to his edition of Swift's works (1814), and Lives by John Forster (1875), by Henry Craik (1882), and by Leslie Stephen in the English Men of Letters series (1882). Johnson's criticisms in his 'Lives of the Poets' show an underlying antipathy.

Swift published a great number of works. Besides the more important, referred to above, mention may be made of the following:

Political writings: 'The Virtues of Sid Hamet the Magician's Rod' (1710), an attack on Godolphin; 'The W—ds—r Prophecy' (1711), attacking the duchess of Somerset; 'A Short Character of T[homas] E[arl] of W[harton]' (1711); 'The Fable of Midas' (1711); 'Some Advice humbly offered to the Members of the October Club', the extreme Tories (1712); 'Some Free Thoughts upon the present state of affairs' (1714); 'Traulus' (1730), attacking Lord Allen; and the 'History of the Four Last Years of the Queen' [Anne] (1758).

Pamphlets relating to Ireland: 'A Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufacture' (1720); 'The Swearer's-Bank' (1720); 'The Story of the Injured Lady' (?1746); 'A Short View of the State of Ireland' (1728); 'A Modest Proposal for preventing the Children of Poor People from being a Burden to their Parents or the Country'—by using them as food for the rich (1729); 'An Examination of certain Abuses, Corruptions and Enormities in the City of Dublin' (1732); 'The Legion Club' (the Irish parliament, 1736).

Pamphlets on Church questions: 'The Sentiments of a Church of England Man with respect to Religion and Government' (1708); 'A Project for the Advancement of Religion and the Reformation of Manners' (1709); 'A Preface to the B—p of S—r—m's Introduction', an attack on Bishop Burnet (1713); 'Mr. C—ns's Discourse on Free Thinking', a satire on Collins, the deist (1713); 'A Letter to a Young Gentleman, lately entered into Holy Orders' (1721). Mention may here be made of Swift's 'Sermons' (of which four were published in 1744), marked by the author's usual characteristics of vigour and common sense.

SWIFT

Miscellaneous verses and other writings: the 'Petition of Mrs. Frances Harris', a servant who has lost her purse, an amusing burlesque (1709); 'Baucis and Philemon' (1709); 'On Mrs. Biddy Floyd' (1709); 'A Meditation upon a Broom-Stick' (1710); 'A Proposal for Correcting, Improving and Ascertaining the English Tongue' (1712); imitations of the Seventh Epistle of the First Book of Horace, of the First Ode of the Second Book of Horace (1713), and of the Sixth Satire of the Second Book of Horace (1738); 'A Letter of Advice to a Young Poet' (1721); a 'Letter to a very young Lady on her Marriage' (1727); the 'Journal of a Modern Lady' (1729); 'The Lady's Dressing-Room' (1732); 'The Beasts Confession to the Priest' (1732), a satire on 'the universal folly of mankind in mistaking their talents'; 'A serious and useful scheme to make an Hospital for Incurables'—whether the incurable disease were knavery, folly, lying, or infidelity (1733); 'On Poetry, a Rhapsody' (1733), satirical advice to a poet; 'A Beautiful Young Nymph Going to Bed'; and 'Strephon and Chloe' (1734).

The principal editions of Swift's works are: John Hawkesworth's (1766), Deane Swift's (1768), Thomas Sheridan's (1784), J. Nichols's (1801–3–8), Sir W. Scott's (1814 and 1824), and Temple Scott's (1897–1908).

Swinburne, the quartermaster in Marryat's 'Peter Simple' (q.v.).

SWINBURNE, ALGERNON CHARLES (1837–1909), was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, and was early united by ties of friendship with Rossetti and his circle. His first published volume 'The Queen Mother. Rosamond. Two Plays' (1860) attracted no attention, but 'Atalanta in Calydon' (1865), a drama in the classical Greek form, with choruses (notably the hymn to Artemis) that revealed Swinburne's unsurpassed mastery of melodious verse, brought him celebrity. In the same year appeared 'Chastelard', the first of his three romantic dramas on the subject of Mary Queen of Scots. In 1866 followed the first series of 'Poems and Ballads' (containing 'Laus Veneris', 'Dolores', and 'A Litany', among other notable poems), which, by its outspoken repudiation of conventions and its pagan spirit, incurred no little censure. 'A Song of Italy' (1867) and 'Songs before Sunrise' (1871), written during the struggle for Italian independence, show Swinburne's detestation of kings and priests. 'Bothwell, a Tragedy', the second drama in the trilogy of Mary Queen of Scots, appeared in 1874, and 'Erechtheus', a second drama in the Greek form, in 1876. The second series of 'Poems and Ballads', more subdued in tone and subject than the first, was published in 1878. It contains 'A Forsaken Garden', the laments for Baudelaire and Théophile Gautier, and translations of the 'Ballades' of Villon. 'Songs of the Springtides' and 'Studies in Song' (1880) are marked by the author's passion for the sea. 'Mary Stuart', the third drama of the trilogy, appeared in 1881, and 'Tristram of Lyonesse', a romantic poem in rhymed couplets, considered by many Swinburne's most perfect work, in 1882. The volume containing the latter also included 'Athens, an Ode' (comparing the victory of Salamis with the defeat of the Armada), and other poems, among them a notable series of sonnets on the Elizabethan dramatists. The tragedy of 'Marino Faliero' (q.v.), in which he rehandled a theme previously treated by Byron, was published in 1885, and 'Locrine', another drama, in 1887, followed by a third series of 'Poems and Ballads' in 1889. His last volumes of poems, 'Astrophel' (1894), 'A Tale of Balen' (1896), and 'A Channel Passage' (1904), and his last plays, 'The Sisters', in prose (1892), and 'Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards' (1899), show some decline of power. 'The Duke of Gandia' (1908) was his last work.

Of Swinburne's prose works of literary criticism, the most notable were his 'Essays and Studies' (1875), 'Miscellanies' (1886), and his monographs on Shakespeare (1880), Victor Hugo (1886), Ben Jonson (1889), George Chapman (1875), and other Elizabethan dramatists. He also wrote acute and interesting criticisms of many more modern writers, from Blake to the Brontës and Charles Dickens; and produced the articles on Mary Stuart, Congreve, Keats, Landor, and Hugo for the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica'. See also Watts-Dunton.

Swing, CAPTAIN, an imaginary person to whom about 1830–3 were attributed a number of outrages against farmers who had adopted the use of agricultural machinery.

Swiss Family Robinson, The, the romance of a family wrecked on a desert island, published in 1813 by Johann Rudolf Wyss (1781–1830), a Swiss author, professor of philosophy at Bern.

Swithin or SWITHUN, St. (d. 863), a priest of the church of Winchester, who was appointed by King Egbert tutor of his son Ethelwulf. On the latter's accession Swithin was consecrated bishop of Winchester, and was one of the king's chief counsellors in ecclesiastical matters. His body was buried by his own wish outside the north wall of Winchester Minster, 'where the rains of heaven might fall on him and he be trodden under foot by those who entered the church' (Stanton, 'Menology'). His remains were translated within the cathedral in 970, when numerous miracles occurred, and Swithin was canonized in popular tradition. His shrine is said to have been destroyed by Henry VIII. He is commemorated on 15 July. There is a legend that if it rains on this day there will be rain for the next forty days.

Swiveller, DICK, a character in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.).

Sword-dance, a medieval folk custom, of ritual origin, probably symbolizing the death and resurrection of the year. The stock characters were the fool, dressed in the skin of an animal, and the 'Bessy', a man dressed in woman's clothes. In many of the extant dances one of the characters is surrounded with the swords of the other dancers or slain. The characters were introduced in rhymed speeches. The sword-dance is one of the origins of the Mummers' play (q.v.) and so of English drama. See also Revesby Play.

Sybaris, an ancient Greek town in southern Italy, an Achaean colony and perhaps the earliest colony in Magna Graecia. Its inhabitants were so notorious for their luxury and love of pleasure, that the name Sybarite became proverbial for a voluptuary.

Sybil, or The Two Nations, a historical novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1845.

Having in 'Coningsby' (q.v.) 'called attention to the state of our political parties; their origin, their history, their present position', the author proceeds in this work to 'draw public thought to the state of the People whom those parties for two centuries have governed'. He depicts the conditions prevailing among the working classes in the early years of Queen Victoria's reign, the overcrowding in miserable tenements, the inadequate wages, the 'truck' system, and the selfishness of many of the landlords and employers; and relates the agitation against them that led up to the Chartist riots. The 'Two Nations' of the title are the rich and the poor. With this exposition is woven the story of the love of the generous and enlightened Charles Egremont, younger brother of Lord Marney, one of the meanest of the landlord class, for Sybil, the daughter of Gerard, one of the Chartist leaders. The dramatic force of the situation is heightened by making Sybil belong to the family of the last abbot of Marney, whose lands had been plundered under Henry VIII.

Sybil Warner, a character in Lytton's 'The Last of the Barons' (q.v.).

Sycorax, in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest' (q.v.), a witch, the mother of Caliban.

Syllepsis, a figure of speech by which a word, or a particular form or inflexion of a word, is made to refer to two or more other words in the same sentence, while properly applying to or agreeing with only one of them, or applying to them in different senses; e.g. 'Miss Bolo went home in a flood of tears and a sedan chair'. Cf. Zeugma.

Sylph, one of a race of beings or spirits supposed to inhabit the air, originally in the system of Paracelsus (q.v.), who similarly imagined gnomes inhabiting the earth, nymphs the water, and salamanders fire.

Sylva, a book on arboriculture by Evelyn (q.v.).

Sylvander, the name under which Burns corresponded with Clarinda (q.v.), Mrs. Macle hose.

Sylvester II, POPE, see Gerbert.

Sylvia, a character in Farquhar's 'The Recruiting Officer' (q.v.). See also Silvia and below.

Sylvia, or the May Queen, a poetic fantasy by G. Darley (q.v.).

Sylvia's Lovers, a novel by Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in 1863.

Sylvia is the daughter of Daniel Robson, a farmer near Monkshaven (Whitby) on the Yorkshire coast, at the end of the 18th cent., a man who has been sailor and smuggler. He has his grudge against the press-gang, of whose terrors in the days of the naval wars a graphic description opens the story. Sylvia is deeply loved by her plain, pedantic, Quaker cousin, Philip Hepburn, whose honesty and diligence as assistant in the big draper's shop of Monkshaven win him a partnership at 23. But Sylvia falls passionately in love with the gallant sailor, Charley Kinraid, and they plight their troth, to Philip's distress, who knows Charley's reputation as a light-of-love. Philip is sent on a mission to London, and as he walks along a lonely part of the coast, he sees his hated rival (who is simultaneously starting for his whaling-ship) seized by the press-gang. As Charley lies overpowered in their boat, he shouts to Philip a farewell message to Sylvia, which the latter has no opportunity of immediately delivering. On his return from London two months later, he finds Sylvia mourning the missing Charley, whose hat has been found by the shore and who is believed drowned. The temptation is too strong for Philip, and he conceals what he knows. Some time later Farmer Robson takes a leading part in a riotous attack on the press-gang, and is hanged in consequence, and Sylvia and her mother are thrown upon the world. Philip presses the advantage that their distress gives him and persuades Sylvia, still mourning for Charley, to enter into a loveless marriage with him. Then after a year Charley returns, Philip's treachery is revealed, and under the fierce denunciation of his wife he flees from the town and enlists, while Charley also disappears. The two men meet again at the siege of Acre, where Philip saves Charley's life and is himself grievously wounded. A beggar and disfigured, he returns to Monkshaven, drawn by his love for Sylvia and his child. Meanwhile her heart has softened towards him, and she has learnt that Charley, within a few weeks of leaving her, had married another woman. Philip and she are at last brought together, but he is now on his death-bed, and they have time only for mutual forgiveness before he dies. Among the many fine characters in the book may be mentioned the sturdy old servant, Kester, and Hester Rose, the Quakeress, whose self-denying love for Philip remains steadfast and unrequited to the end.

SYMBOLISTS

Symbolists, the name of a recent school of French poets who aimed at representing ideas and emotions by indirect suggestion rather than by direct expression, and attached symbolic meaning to particular objects, words, sounds, &c. [OED.] Symbolism is a revolt against the photographic methods of naturalism and realism.

Symkyn, SYMOND, the miller of Trumpington in Chaucer's 'The Reeve's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales).

SYMONDS, JOHN ADDINGTON (1840-93), educated at Harrow and Balliol College, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate prize and became a fellow of Magdalen. Symonds suffered long from ill-health and spent much of his life in Italy, writing under difficulties. His largest work, a 'History of the Renaissance in Italy' (1875-86), containing much valuable information, is a series of picturesque sketches rather than a continuous treatise. He published his translation of the 'Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini' in 1888. His other works include 'Studies of the Greek Poets' (1873), 'Sketches in Italy and Greece' (1874), short volumes on Ben Jonson, Sidney, and Shelley, and several volumes of verse (among others, 'Many Moods', 1878; 'New and Old', 1880; 'Animi Figura', 1882). Symonds excelled as a translator, and his versions from the Greek poets, and of the sonnets of Michelangelo and Campanella (1878), are especially praised.

Symplegædes, see Cyanean Rocks.

Symposium, The, or The Banquet, the title of a dialogue by Plato in which Socrates, Aristophanes, Alcibiades, and others, at the house of the poet Agathon, discuss the nature of love. It is also the title of a dialogue by Xenophon, in which Socrates and others are the speakers.

Synaeresis, the sounding of two separate vowels as a diphthong, as when aerial is pron. airial; the opposite of diaeresis.

Syndicalism, from the French chambre syndicale, a trade union, a movement among industrial workers having as its object the transfer of the means of production and distribution from their present owners to unions of workers for the benefit of the workers. [OED.] The word apparently first occurs in 1907.

Synecdoche (pron. 'sinekdoki'), a figure of speech by which a more comprehensive term is used for a less comprehensive or vice versa, as whole for part or part for whole, e.g. 'There were six guns out on the moor' where 'guns' stands for shooters; and 'Oxford won the match', where 'Oxford' stands for 'the Oxford eleven'.

SYNGE, JOHN MILLINGTON (1871-1909), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, spent his early manhood in Paris. There in 1899 he met W. B. Yeats, who persuaded him to apply his talents to the description of Irish peasant life. He visited the Aran Isles annually from 1898 to 1902 and published 'The Aran Islands' in 1907. His remarkable dramas followed in quick succession: 'The Shadow of the Glen' was performed in 1903, 'Riders to the Sea' in 1904, 'The Well of the Saints', 1905, 'The Playboy of the Western World' (q.v.), 1907, and 'The Tinker's Wedding', 1907. 'The Shadow of the Glen' was at first unfavourably received owing to the episode contained in it of the infidelity of an Irish wife to her husband. The suggestion contained in 'The Playboy' that an Irish peasant would condone a murder and harbour the murderer gave rise to much fiercer resentment. But the play is now recognized as one of Synge's best. The unfinished prose drama, 'Deirdre of the Sorrows', was written when Synge was dying, and published in 1910. His 'Works', which also include the descriptive essays 'In Wicklow' and 'In West Kerry' (contributed to the 'Manchester Guardian'), were published in 1910.

Synonym, strictly a word having the same meaning as another; but more usually one of two or more words having the same general sense, but possessing each of them meanings or shades of meaning or implications not shared by the other or others; e.g. kill, slay, slaughter.

Synoptic Gospels, THE, those of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, so called as giving an account of the events from the same point of view, or under the same general aspect.

Syntax, DR., see Combe.

Syntipas, the Greek form of the name Sindabar, Sandabar, or Sindibad, an Indian philosopher, said to have lived about 100 B.C., the supposed author of a collection of tales generally known as 'The Seven Wise Masters'. Their main outline is the same as that of 'The Seven Sages of Rome' (q.v.), though details of the several stories vary. 'Syntipas' was translated from Greek into Latin (under the title 'Dolopathos') in the 12th cent., and thence into French. The names Syntipas, Sindabar, &c., are probably corruptions of the original Sanskrit word from which Bidpai (q.v.) and Pilpay are derived.

Syphax, see Sophonisba. Also a character in Addison's 'Cato' (q.v.).

Syrinx, in Greek mythology, an Arcadian damsel, who, being pursued by Pan, threw herself into the river Ladon, where she was changed into a reed. Of this Pan made his pipe. In Spenser's 'Shepherds' Calendar' (April), Syrinx represents Anne Boleyn.

T

T. P., the Rt. Hon. T. P. O'CONNOR (q.v.).
Tabard Inn, THE, in Southwark, the scene of the assembling of the pilgrims in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.). The inn survived until 1875.

A tabard was a short surcoat open at the sides and having short sleeves or none, worn by a knight over his armour, and emblazoned with his armorial bearings; or by a herald, and emblazoned with the royal arms.

Tabaret, PÈRE, the amateur detective in Gaboriau's novels of crime (see also Lecoq).

Tabley, BARON DE, see Warren (J. B. L.).

TACITUS, GAIUS (?) CORNELIUS (c. A.D. 55-c. 117), the Roman historian, of whose works the following survive in whole or in part: (1) 'Dialogus de Oratoribus'; (2) 'Vita Agricola', especially interesting for its account of the Roman conquest of Britain; (3) 'Germania', a description of the Germanic peoples and their institutions; (4) 'Historiae', comprising the period A.D. 68-96, of which we have only a portion; and (5) 'Annales', comprising the period from the death of Augustus to the death of Nero in A.D. 68, of which again the extant portion is incomplete. Tacitus was the son-in-law of Agricola and the intimate friend of the younger Pliny (q.v.), some of whose extant letters are addressed to him. 'Tacitean' prose is incisive, polished, and epigrammatic; it contrasts with the ample periods of the Ciceronian style.

Tackleton, a character in Dickens's 'The Cricket on the Hearth' (q.v.).

Tadmor, see Palmyra.

Tadpole and Taper, in Disraeli's 'Coningsby' and 'Sybil' (qq.v.), typical party wire-pullers. 'Tadpole worshipped registration; Taper adored a Cry.'

Taë-ping, see Tai-ping.

Taglioni, MARIA (1804-84), the celebrated ballet-dancer, daughter of Filippo Taglioni, an Italian ballet-master. She appeared in London in 1829, retired from the stage in 1847, and died in straitened circumstances at Marseilles. Thackeray's Pendennis was one of her admirers.

A kind of overcoat in use in the early part of the 19th cent. (mentioned by Scott, Thackeray, and in the 'Ingoldsby Legends') was called a tagliom.

TAGORE, SIR RABINDRA NATH (1861-1941), Indian poet, was born at Calcutta. Of his works, which are marked by deep religious feeling, a strong sense of the beauty of earth and sky in his native land, and love of childhood (especially in 'The Crescent Moon'), many have been translated into English. These include 'Gitanjali', 'The Crescent Moon', and 'The Gardener', published in 1913; the three plays, 'Chitra', 'The King of the Dark Chamber', and 'The Post Office' (the last two of which have been performed in London); 'Sadhana' (addresses on life and its realization, 1913), 'Fruit-gathering' (1916), 'My Reminiscences' (1917), an introductory essay to the 'Sakuntala' (1920), and 'Red Oleanders' (a play, 1925). Tagore has also written many short stories, of which only a few have been translated ('Hungry Stones', 1916; 'Broken Ties', 1925). Tagore wrote mainly in Bengali, but he also wrote in English and translated into English some of his Indian writings.

Tallefer, a minstrel in the army of William the Conqueror, who, at the battle of Hastings, is said to have encouraged the Normans by singing of the deeds of Roland.

Tall-rhyme stanza, a stanza with a tail, tag, or additional short line, unrhymed or rhyming with another tag farther on.

Tallors of Tooley Street, THE, three tailors of Tooley Street, Southwark, who are said to have begun a petition to the House of Commons with the words: 'We, the people of England'. Canning and also O'Connell are said to have alluded to them, but an inquiry in 'N. & Q.' (10th Ser., ii. 168) failed to elicit a precise reference. A contributor in 'N. & Q.', 7th Ser., v. 55, gave the names of the supposed originals, local politicians and busybodies, who, according to him, prepared a petition at the time of the Catholic Emancipation movement. But this was challenged in 7th Ser., v. 114.

Tain-Bo-Cualligne, the chief epic of the Ulster cycle of Irish mythology, the story of the raid of Queen Maeve of Connaught to secure the Brown Bull of Cualligne (pron. 'Cooley'), and the defeat of the raid by Cuchulain (q.v.).

TAINÉ, HIPPOLYTE (1828-93), French historian and critic, author of 'Origines de la France contemporaine', including 'L'Ancien Régime' (1875-85), 'La Révolution' (1878-85), and 'L'Empire' (1891-4). Taine also wrote, among other works, a 'History of English Literature' (1856-9, tr. into English by Van Laun, 1873).

Tai-ping or TAE-PING, the name given to the adherents of a great rebellion that arose in southern China in 1850, under the leadership of Hung-sin-taue, styled Tai-ping-wang, Prince of Great Peace, who claimed a divine commission to overthrow the Manchu dynasty and establish one of native origin. The rebellion was quelled in 1864 with the help of General Gordon (q.v.).

Taj Mahal, the tomb at Agra, built (1630-50) by Shah Jehan for his wife Mumtaz Mahal; the most beautiful example of Mogul architecture.

TALBOT

Talbot, a variety of hound, formerly used for tracking and hunting, now merely a heraldic animal. The name is understood to be derived from the ancient English family name of Talbot [OED.], and this is referred to in Scott's 'Waverley', lxxi.

Talbot, MARYANNE (1778-1808), the 'British Amazon', served as a drummer-boy in Flanders, 1792, and as cabin-boy in the 'Le Sage', and afterwards in the 'Brunswick'. She was wounded on board of the latter ship in the great battle of 1 June 1794. After subsequent adventures she became a servant and received a small pension. Her history was embodied by her employer, Robert S. Kirby, in his 'Wonderful Museum', second volume, 1804.

Tale of a Tub, A, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), licensed in 1633, the last play that the author put on the stage.

It deals with the attempts, in the course of a St. Valentine's Day, of various suitors to marry Awdrey, the daughter of Tobie Turfe, high constable of Kentish Town. Her father wishes to marry her to John Clay, tile-maker, and he and the wedding-party set off for the church. But his intention is defeated by Squire Tub and Canon Hugh the vicar, by means of a bogus story of a highway robbery, of which John Clay is accused. Squire Tub's desire to marry Awdrey is in turn frustrated by Justice Preamble, who conspires with Hugh the vicar to get her for himself. Tub warns Tobie Turfe, who recovers his daughter. But she is presently lured away from him again (together with £100) by the Justice, is intercepted by Tub, and finally carried off and married out of hand by Pol Martin, usher to Tub's mother, 'a groom was never dreamt of'.

Tale of a Tub, A, a satire in prose by Swift (q.v.), written, according to his own statement, about 1696, but not published until 1704.

The author explains in a preface that it is the practice of seamen when they meet a whale to throw him out an empty tub to divert him from attacking the ship. Hence the title of the satire, which is intended to divert Hobbes's 'Leviathan' and the wits of the age from picking holes in the weak sides of religion and government. The author proceeds to tell the story of a father who leaves as a legacy to his three sons, Peter, Martin, and Jack, a coat apiece, with directions that on no account are the coats to be altered. Peter symbolizes the Roman Church, Martin (from Martin Luther) the Anglican, Jack (from John Calvin) the dissenters. The sons gradually disobey the injunction, finding excuses for adding shoulder-knots or gold lace according to the prevailing fashion. Finally Martin and Jack quarrel with the arrogant Peter, and then with each other, and separate. The satire is directed with especial vigour against Peter, his bulls and dispensations, and the doctrine of transubstantiation. But Jack is also treated with contempt. Martin, as representing the church to which Swift himself belonged, is spared, though not very reverently dealt with. The narrative is freely interspersed with digressions, on critics, on the prevailing dispute as to ancient and modern learning, and on madness—this last an early example of Swift's love of paradox and of his misanthropy.

TALE OF TWO CITIES

Tale of Chloe, The, a short novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1879.

This tragic little tale is described by the author as an episode in the history of 'Beau Beamish', the king of Bath. Chloe is a young lady, the soul of generosity, who has stripped herself of her fortune to redeem from prison an unprincipled fellow, Caseldy, whom she loves. But he deserts her and leaves Bath, where she lives uncorrupted, enjoying the favour and esteem of Beau Beamish, and faithful to Caseldy. An old duke who has married a beautiful young dairymaid, Susan Barley, entrusts her for a month to the care of Beamish and he, in turn, to the care of Chloe. Caseldy now returns, not to Chloe, but for the sake of Susan, the 'Duchess of Dewlap', as Beamish christens her. He seduces her from her allegiance, and Chloe, heartbroken, watches the process, determined to save the duchess even at the cost of her own life. And this she finally does by hanging herself on the door through which the duchess is about to make a midnight elopement with Caseldy.

Tale of Two Cities, A, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1859.

The 'two cities' are Paris, in the time of the French Revolution, and London. Dr. Manette, a French physician, having been called in to attend a young peasant and his sister in circumstances that made him aware that the girl had been outrageously treated and the boy mortally wounded by the Marquis de St. Evremonde and his brother, has been confined for eighteen years in the Bastille to secure his silence. He has just been released, demented, when the story opens; he is brought to England, where he gradually recovers his sanity. Charles Darnay, who conceals under that name the fact that he is a nephew of the marquis, has left France and renounced his heritage from detestation of the cruel practices of the old French nobility; he falls in love with Lucie, Dr. Manette's daughter, and they are happily married. During the Terror he goes to Paris to try to save a faithful servant, who is accused of having served the emigrant nobility. He is himself arrested, condemned to death, and is saved only at the last moment by Sydney Carton, a reckless wastrel of an English barrister, whose character is redeemed by his generous devotion to Lucie. Carton, who strikingly resembles Darnay in appearance, smuggles the latter out of prison, and takes his place on the scaffold.

The book gives a vivid picture (modelled on Carlyle's 'The French Revolution') of Paris at this period, and the opening scene of the coach-drive to Dover is one of the finest things in Dickens. Among the typical English characters is Jerry Cruncher, an odd-job man by day, who carries on the trade of body-snatcher by night. The novel has been dramatized under the title 'The Only Way' (q.v.).

Tales in Verse, a collection of poems by Crabbe (q.v.), published in 1812.

Tales of a Grandfather, The, a history of Scotland to the close of the Rebellion of 1745-6, by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1827-9. A later series (1831) deals with the history of France.

The 'Tales' were designed in the first instance for the author's grandson, John Hugh Lockhart ('Hugh Littlejohn'). After a prefatory chapter on the period of the Roman occupation, the tales proceed to the period of Macbeth, and thence through Wallace and Bruce right through the history of Scotland down to the '45.

Tales of My Landlord, four series of novels by Sir W. Scott (q.v.): 'The Black Dwarf', 'Old Mortality' (1st Series); 'The Heart of Midlothian' (2nd Series); 'The Bride of Lammermoor', 'The Legend of Montrose' (3rd Series); 'Count Robert of Paris', 'Castle Dangerous' (4th Series). See also Cleishbotham.

Tales of Soldiers and Civilians, a collection of short stories by Ambrose Bierce (q.v.), subsequently entitled 'In the Midst of Life'.

Tales of the Crusaders, two novels by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), 'The Betrothed' and 'The Talisman' (qq.v.).

Tales of the Hall, a collection of poems by Crabbe (q.v.), published in 1819.

TALFOURD, SIR THOMAS NOON (1795-1854), judge and author, is principally remembered as the friend of C. Lamb, whose 'Letters' and 'Memorials' he published in 1837 and 1848 respectively, and for his 'Ion' (1835), a tragedy conceived in the Greek spirit.

Talgol, in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.), one of the characters in the bear-baiting episode; according to Sir Roger L'Estrange a butcher in Newgate Market.

Taliesin (fl. 550), a British bard, perhaps a mythic personage, first mentioned in the 'Saxon Genealogies' appended to the 'Historia Britonum' c. 690. A mass of poetry, probably of later date, has been ascribed to him, and the 'Book of Taliesin' (14th cent.) is a collection of poems by different authors and of different dates. The village of Taliesin in Cardiganshire has sprung up near the supposed site of his grave. Taliesin figures prominently in Peacock's 'The Misfortunes of Elphin' (q.v.), and he is mentioned in

TALMUD

Talisman, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1825, forming part of the 'Tales of the Crusaders'.

The story presents the forces of the Crusaders, led by Richard I of England, encamped in the Holy Land, and torn by the dissensions and jealousies of the leaders, including, besides Cœur de Lion himself, Philip of France, the duke of Austria, the marquis of Montferrat, and the Grand Master of the Templars. The consequent impotence of the army is accentuated by the illness of Richard. A poor but doughty Scottish crusader, known as Sir Kenneth or the Knight of the Leopard, on a mission far from the camp encounters a Saracen emir, with whom, after an inconclusive combat, he enters into prolonged conversation, and mutual esteem springs up between them. This emir proves subsequently to be Saladin himself, and he presently appears in the Christian camp in the disguise of a physician sent by the Soldan to Richard, whom he quickly cures. Meanwhile the Knight of the Leopard, set to guard during the night the banner of England, is lured from his post by Queen Berengaria, Richard's wife, who in a frolic sends him an urgent message purporting to come from Edith Plantagenet, between whom and the knight there exists a romantic attachment. During his brief absence, his faithful hound is wounded, and the English flag torn down. Sir Kenneth, thus dishonoured, narrowly escapes execution at Richard's order by the intervention of the Moorish physician, who receives him as his slave. Kindly and honourably treated by Saladin, he is sent, in the disguise of a black mute attendant, to Richard, whom he saves from assassination. Richard pierces through Sir Kenneth's disguise and gives him the opportunity he desires of discovering the hand that wounded the hound and tore down the standard. As the Christian princes and their forces defile past the re-erected standard, the hound springs on Conrade of Montferrat and tears him from his horse. A trial by combat is arranged, in which Sir Kenneth defeats and wounds Montferrat, and is revealed to be Prince David of Scotland. The obstacle which his supposed lowly birth presented to his union with Edith Plantagenet is thus removed.

The Talisman from which the novel takes its title is the amulet by which Saladin effects the cure of Richard and which he presents to the Scottish knight. The incident has some historical basis in the amulet, known as the Lee-penny, obtained by Sir Simon Lockhart in a crusade, and long preserved (perhaps still) in the ancient family of the Lockharts of the Lee in Lanarkshire.

Talmud, THE, in the wide sense, the body of Jewish civil and ceremonial traditionary law, consisting of the Mishnah or binding precepts of the elders, additional to and developed from the Pentateuch, and the later Gemara or commentary upon these. The term was originally applied to the Gemara, of which two recensions exist, known respectively as the Jerusalem (Palestinian) and the Babylonian Talmud. The precepts of the Mishnah were codified about A.D. 200; the redaction of the Jerusalem Talmud had reached almost its present form by A.D. 408, that of the Babylonian Talmud extended from A.D. 400 to 500. [OED.]

Talus, in Greek mythology, a man of brass, made by Hephaestus. He was given to Minos, king of Crete, and protected the island by making himself red-hot and embracing any strangers that landed. He figures in the story of the Argonauts (q.v.) as having received them with a shower of rocks.

Another Talus, a nephew of Daedalus (q.v.), was a mythical person to whom was attributed the invention of the saw, the compasses, and other industrial devices. Daedalus, jealous of his skill, threw him down from the Acropolis of Athens.

Talus, a character in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene'. When Astraea left the world and returned to heaven, she

An yron man, which did on her attend
Always to execute her steadfast doome.

(Bk. V. i. 12.)

He thus represents the executive power of government. He attends on Artegall (q.v.), wielding an iron flail, with which he dispatches criminals.

Tam Lin, the subject of an old ballad. Janet wins back to mortal life her elfin lover, Tam Lin, from the queen of the fairies, who has captured him.

Tam o' Shanter, a poem by Burns (q.v.).

Tam o' Shanter, a farmer, returning from Ayr late one night, well primed with liquor, passes the Kirk of Alloway. Seeing it lighted up, he stops and looks in and sees warlocks and witches dancing to the sound of the bagpipes played by Old Nick. Impelled by the sight of one 'winsome wench' among the beldams, Tam shouts, 'Weel done, Cutty Sark!' At once the lights go out, and the witches make for Tam like so many bees. Tam spurs his grey mare Meg, and just reaches the middle of the bridge over the Doon before the 'Cutty Sark' reaches him. There he is out of her power, but the mare's tail is still within the witches' jurisdiction, and this the 'Cutty Sark' pulls off. (A 'sark' is a chemise:

Her cutty sark, o' Paisley harn . . .
In longitude tho' sorely scanty.)

Tamberlane, see Timur.

Tamburlaine the Great, a drama in blank verse by Marlowe (q.v.), written not later than 1587 and published in 1590. It showed an immense advance on the blank verse of

TAMING OF THE SHREW

'Gorbodue' (q.v.) and was received with much popular approval. The material for it was taken by the author from Pedro Maxia's Spanish life of Timur, of which an English translation had appeared in 1571.

Pt. I of the drama deals with the first rise to power of the Scythian shepherd-robber Tamburlaine; he allies himself with Cosroe in the latter's rebellion against his brother, the king of Persia, and then challenges him for the crown and defeats him. Tamburlaine's unbounded ambition and ruthless cruelty carry all before him. He conquers the Turkish emperor, Bajazet, and leads him about prisoner in a cage, goading him and his empress, Zabina, with cruel taunts till they dash out their brains against the bars of the cage. His ferocity is softened only by his love for his captive, Zenocrate, the daughter of the Soldan of Egypt, whose life he spares in deference to the pleadings of Zenocrate when he captures Damascus.

Pt. II deals with the continuation of his conquests, which extend to Babylon, whither he is dragged in a chariot drawn by the kings of Trebizond and Soria, with the kings of Anatolia and Jerusalem as relay, 'pampered jades of Asia' (a phrase quoted by Pistol in Shakespeare, '2 Henry IV', II. iv); it ends with the death of Zenocrate, and of Tamburlaine himself. See Timurlane.

Tamerlane, a tragedy by Rowe (q.v.) produced in 1702, of some historical interest because under the name of Tamerlane the author intended to characterize William III, while under that of Bajazet he held up Louis XIV to detestation. The play was, for more than a hundred years, annually revived on 5 Nov., the date of William III's landing. See Timurlane.

Taming of the Shrew. The, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.) with perhaps a collaborator, was probably written about 1594, partly adapted from a play, 'The Taming of a Shrew', which had appeared in 1594, and partly based on the 'Supposes' of Gascoigne (q.v.). It was first printed in the folio of 1623.

The play is introduced by an 'induction' in which Christopher Sly, a drunken tinker picked up by a lord and his huntsmen on a heath, is brought to the castle, sumptuously treated, and in spite of his protestations that he is only 'old Sly's son of Burton-heath . . . Ask Marian Hackett the fat ale-wife of Wincot', is assured that he is a lord who has been out of his mind, and is set down to hear the following play, performed for his sole benefit by strolling players.

Petruchio, a gentleman of Verona, of shrewd wit and imperturbable temper, determines to marry Katharina, the notorious termagant elder daughter of Baptista, a rich gentleman of Padua. He carries his courtship through with a high hand, undeterred by her rude rebuffs, but affecting to find her courteous and gentle. Then the taming begins. He humiliates Katharina by keeping her waiting on the wedding-day, and at last appearing clad like a scarecrow. He cuffs the priest, refuses to attend the bridal feast, and hurries his wife off, on a sorry horse, to his home. On arrival, he refuses to let her eat or sleep, on the pretext that the food and bed prepared are not good enough for her, and distresses her by other mad pranks. Finally he takes her back to her father's house, which she reaches completely tamed. Meanwhile Bianca, Katharina's younger sister, has been won by Lucentio, who has made love to her while masquerading as a schoolmaster. Hortensio, the disappointed suitor of Bianca, has married a widow. At the feast which follows there is a wager among the bridegrooms which wife shall prove the most docile; Petruchio wins triumphantly.

Tammany, the name of a Delaware Indian from whom William Penn obtained grants of land. It means 'the Affable'. The name was adopted by a society founded for benevolent purposes in New York in 1789, which before long took an active part in politics and built the original Tammany Hall in New York. This, and the building which replaced it in 1867, became the head-quarters of a local political (democratic) party, which by its highly developed organization (and, it is said, by the use of corruption) has from time to time exercised a complete control over the municipal administration of the city.

Tamora, a character in Shakespeare's 'Titus Andronicus' (q.v.).

Tanagra, an ancient town of Boeotia, Greece. In its necropolis were discovered in the last quarter of the 19th cent. the beautiful terra-cotta figurines with which the name of Tanagra is now principally connected. Tanagra was the birthplace of Corinna (q.v.). Landor in 'Pericles and Aspasia', xlv, includes a poem which purports to be an ode of this poetess to her birthplace.

Tanaquil, in Roman legend, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus, the first of the Tarquin (Etruscan) kings of Rome. Spenser uses the name to signify Queen Elizabeth in the introduction to Book I of 'The Faerie Queene'.

Tancred, one of the Norman heroes of the first Crusade, figures in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v.) as one of the principal knights serving under Godfrey de Bouillon.

Tancred, or The New Crusade, a novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1847.

This was a companion work to Disraeli's two principal political novels, 'Coningsby' and 'Sybil', and in it he breaks new ground. It combines an earnest vindication of the claims and destinies of the Jewish race with a humorous presentment of the aspirations of a visionary young English nobleman to regenerate the world.

Tancred, Lord Montacute, is the son of the highly respectable, and in every way orthodox, duke and duchess of Bellamont. On coming of age, having meditated much on the social and religious conditions of the day, he horrifies his parents by refusing a seat in parliament and announcing his intention of going to the Holy Land to elucidate the great 'Asian Mystery' and to seek a direct communication from God as to His purpose. All attempts to dissuade him having failed, Tancred goes to Jerusalem and thence to Sinai, where, in a trance, he receives the desired communication, directing him to promote the doctrine of 'theocratic equality'. Meanwhile, however, he has become involved in the intrigues of the Druses and Maronites of the Lebanon, and has become a pawn in the game of the amiable arch-intriguer Fakreddeen. Some stirring adventures result, which leave Tancred disillusioned but violently in love with a beautiful Jewess, to whom he offers his hand and heart. At the moment that he does this, the arrival of the duke and duchess at Jerusalem is announced.

Tancred and Gismund, or Gismund of Salerno, a play by R. Wilmot (q.v.) and others, published in 1591. Act II is by Henry Noel, Act IV by Hatton (q.v.). The play is founded on a tale by Boccaccio (see Sigismonda).

Tancred and Sigismonda: for Dryden's poem on these, see Sigismonda.

Tancred and Sigismunda, a tragedy by J. Thomson (1700-48, q.v.), published in 1745, produced (with Garrick as Tancred) in 1752.

It is based on the story inserted in 'Gil Blas', iv. iv, in which Tancred, the heir to the kingdom of Sicily, is lured by the cunning Siffredi into accepting with the throne a bride, Constantia, whom he does not love, and abandoning Siffredi's daughter, Sigismunda, whom he does. The latter, in despair at her desertion, consents to marry Osmond, her father's choice. But Tancred does not give up his lady-love so easily. He kills Osmond, but not before the latter has fatally stabbed Sigismunda.

Tanglewood Tales, see Hawthorne.

Tanner of Tamworth, THE, the hero of an old ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', who meeting King Edward IV out riding, takes him for a thief, changes horses with him, is thrown, disabused of his mistake, and instead of being hanged, as he expects, receives Plumpton-park as a gift from the good-humoured king.

Tannhäuser (pron. 'Tanhoizer'), a German minnesinger (q.v.) of the 13th cent., the subject of a legend embodied in a 16th-cent. ballad. According to this, as he rode by the Hørselberg in Thuringia, he was attracted by the figure of a beautiful woman, in whom he recognized Venus. She beckoned him into a cave, where he spent seven years in revelry. Smitten by his conscience he then left the 'Venusberg' and went to Rome to seek absolution from the pope. His Holiness replied that it was as impossible for Tann-häuser to be forgiven as for his dry staff to burgeon, and Tannhäuser departed in despair. But after three days the staff broke into blossom. The pope sent hurriedly for Tannhäuser, but he was nowhere to be found. He had returned to Venus.

The story is the subject of an opera by Wagner and of Swinburne's 'Laus Veneris'.

Tanqueray, The Second Mrs., a successful play by Pinero (q.v.).

Tantálus, in Greek mythology, the father of Pelops and Niobe (qq.v.). He is represented as punished in hell with an intense thirst and placed up to the chin in a pool of water which recedes when he attempts to drink it, while a bough laden with fruit hangs above his head but withdraws from his hand. The reason for this punishment is variously related. Some say that he revealed the secrets of the gods, or stole their nectar and ambrosia and gave these to mortals; others that he killed his son Pelops and offered his flesh to the gods to try them.

Tantivy, a nickname given to the post-Restoration high-churchmen and Tories, especially in the reigns of Charles II and James II. It arose in 1680-1, when a caricature was published in which a number of high-church clergymen were represented as mounted upon the Church of England and 'riding tantivy' to Rome, behind the duke of York. To 'ride tantivy' is to ride at a rapid gallop. The origin of the word 'tantivy' is obscure; perhaps echoic, representing the sound of a horse's feet. [OED.]

Tantony, a shortened form of St. Anthony, chiefly used in reference to the attributes with which the saint was represented, as TANTONY POUCH, TANTONY BELL (a small church bell), TANTONY PIG (the smallest pig of the litter, St. Anthony being the patron saint of swineherds, and represented as accompanied by a pig).

Tara, THE HILL OF, in county Meath, Ireland, celebrated in Irish tradition as the capital of the Fir Bolgs and of the Tuatha Dé Danann (qq.v.). It was in early times the residence of the high kings of Ireland and the meeting-place of the national legislative assembly. Relics of its importance, in the form of earthworks, still remain.

TARQUINS

'The harp that once through Tara's halls
The soul of music shed' are the first lines of one of Moore's best-known 'Irish Melodies'.

Targum, a word meaning 'interpretation', the name given to several Aramaic translations, interpretations, or paraphrases of the various divisions of the O.T., made after the Babylonian captivity, at first preserved by oral transmission, and committed to writing from about A.D. 100 onwards. [OED.]

Tarkington, [NEWTON] BOOTH (1869-1946), American novelist and dramatist, chiefly remembered for his novels 'The Gentleman from Indiana' (1899) and 'Monsieur Beaucaire' (1900, dramatized 1901).

Tarlton, RICHARD (d. 1588), actor, a man of humble origin and imperfect education, who attracted attention by his 'happy unhappy answers' and was introduced to Queen Elizabeth through the earl of Leicester. He became one of the Queen's players in 1583, and attained an immense popularity by his jests, comic acting, and improvisations of doggerel verse. He led a dissipated life and died in poverty. He is perhaps to be identified with Spenser's 'Pleasant Willy' (see Tears of the Muses) and Shakespeare's Yorick. Many fictitious anecdotes connected with him were published, notably 'Tarlton's Jest' (1592?-1611?) in three parts.

Tarot Cards, a set of playing-cards first used in Italy in the 14th cent.; from tarocchi, a word of unknown origin. 'Play at Ombre and Taroc, a game with seventy-two cards all painted with suns and moons, devils and monks' (Gray, letter to R. West, 1739).

Tarpa, SPURIUS MARCIUS, a literary critic who was employed by Pompey, and also by Augustus, as censor of plays and poems for public reading or performance.

Tarpeia, in Roman legend, the daughter of Tarpeius, governor of the citadel of Rome. She promised to open the gates of the city to the Sabines if they would give her their bracelets, or as she expressed it, what they carried on their left arms. Tatius, the king of the Sabines, consented, and as he entered the city, to punish her perfidy, threw not only his bracelet but his shield upon Tarpeia; and, his followers imitating his example, Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of their bucklers. The place was called the Tarpeian rock in consequence, and criminals were thrown from it. There are variants of the legend.

Tarquins, THE, Tarquinius Priscus and Tarquinius Superbus (6th cent. B.C.), the fifth and seventh legendary kings of Rome, of Etruscan origin. The former reigned with moderation and popularity, increased the military power of Rome, and drained the city. The second, his son, was noted for his tyranny and arrogance, and the Romans, provoked by his oppression, when they saw the virtuous Lucretia (q.v.) stab herself after her ravishment by Sextus, son of their king, rose in rebellion and expelled the Tarquins from Rome. It was Tarquinius Superbus who bought the books of the Sibyl (q.v.). And it was he who, when his son Sextus, to whom the people of Gabii had entrusted the command of their armies, sent to consult his father as to his conduct, returned no answer to the messenger, but cut off with a stick the tallest poppies in his garden. His son, taking the hint, put to death the most powerful citizens of Gabii (cf. the story of Periander, q.v.).

Tartar, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.).

Tartarin, in certain novels of A. Daudet (q.v.), a Frenchman of fervid southern temperament, who combines the power of self-deception and enthusiasm for adventure of Don Quixote with the timidity of Sancho Panza. He goes lion-hunting, &c., with absurd results.

Tartars, more properly TATARS, a Mongol tribe that overran eastern Europe in the 13th cent., and called forth the joke of St. Louis, 'Either they will send us to Heaven, or we will send them to Tartarus.'

Tartarus, one of the regions of Hades where the most impious and guilty among mankind were supposed to be punished. According to Virgil it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls and the burning waters of the river Phlegethon.

Tartuffe,¹ Lz, in Molière's comedy of that name, an odious hypocrite, who, under an assumption of piety, introduces himself into the household of the credulous Orgon, attempts to seduce his wife, and, being repulsed, endeavours to ruin the family.

Task, The, a poem in six books by Cowper (q.v.), published in 1785.

Cowper's friend, Lady Austen, having suggested to him the sofa in his room as the subject of a poem in blank verse, the poet set about the task. Its six books are entitled, 'The Sofa', 'The Time-piece', 'The Garden', 'The Winter Evening', 'The Winter Morning Walk', and 'The Winter Walk at Noon'. Starting with a mock-Miltonic narrative of the evolution of the sofa, Cowper soon turns to himself and his delight in rural scenes and sounds, which he describes minutely and exactly. Similarly the later books give a detailed account of the pleasures of gardening and the joys of domestic life in the country, with vignettes of the postman, the wagoner in the snow, the woodman and his dog, and many others. There are interspersed many long didactic passages, condemning the evils of the day, the failings of the clergy, the mischiefs of profusion, the cruelty of certain sports, and the disadvantages of town life in general

Tasman, ABEL JANZON (1602-59), a Dutch navigator, who commanded in 1642 an exploring expedition sent to the South Seas by Van Diemen, governor of the Dutch East Indies. He discovered Tasmania (which he named Van Diemen's Land), New Zealand, and some of the Friendly Islands.

TASSO, TORQUATO (1544-95), son of Bernardo Tasso (author of an epic on Amadis of Gaul), was born at Sorrento, and spent many years at the court of Ferrara. He was from early life in constant terror of imaginary plots against him, and his conduct at Ferrara was such as to make it necessary for the duke, Alphonso II of Este, to lock him up as mad from 1579 to 1586. (The legend of his passion for Leonora d'Este, the duke's discovery of it, and his consequent imprisonment, is now declared untrue.) He was released on condition of his leaving Ferrara; and after wandering from court to court, he died at Rome. His chief works were the 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v.), published in authorized form in 1581 and 1593; an epic, 'Rinaldo'; a pastoral, 'Aminta'; and a tragedy, 'Torrismondo'.

Byron's 'The Lament of Tasso' is founded on the above-mentioned legend of Tasso's love for Leonora, and Goethe wrote his 'Torquato Tasso' in 1790.

TATE, NAHUM (1652-1715), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, wrote an adaptation of 'King Lear' (in which Cordelia survives and marries Edgar), which held the stage for many years; and with Dryden's assistance the second part of 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.); also the libretto of Purcell's opera 'Dido and Aeneas'. With Nicholas Brady he published in 1696 the well-known metrical version of the Psalms that bears their name. He was appointed poet laureate in 1692. His chief original poem was 'Panacea—a Poem on Tea' (1700). He was pilloried in the 'Dunciad' (q.v.).

Tate Gallery, THE, Millbank, London, a gallery of modern art, commemorates the name of Sir Henry Tate (1819-99), a successful sugar-merchant and a collector of pictures. He gave £80,000 to the nation for the construction of the gallery, which was opened in 1897, and contains sixty-five pictures also given by him, besides many other examples of modern art.

Tatler, The, a periodical started by R. Steele (q.v.) in Apr. 1709. It appeared thrice a week until Jan. 1711.

According to No. 1, it was to include 'Accounts of Gallantry, Pleasure, and Entertainment . . . under the article of White's Chocolate House'; poetry under that of Will's Coffee-house; foreign and domestic news from St. James's coffee-house; and so on. Gradually it adopted a higher mission. The evils of duelling and gambling are denounced in some of the earlier numbers, and presently all questions of good manners are discussed from the standpoint of a humaner civilization, and a new standard of good taste is set up. The ideal of a gentleman is examined and its essence is found to lie in forbearance. The author assumes the character of Bickerstaff (q.v.), the marriage of whose sister, Jenny Distaff, with Tranquillus gives occasion for treating of happy married life. The rake and the coquette are shown in their true light, and virtue is held up to admiration in the person of Lady Elizabeth Hastings—'to love her is a liberal education'. Episodes and short stories illustrate the principles advanced.

From an early stage in the history of the 'Tatler' Steele had the collaboration of Addison, who besides notes and suggestions contributed a number of complete papers.

Tattersall's, an auction-room for horses founded near Hyde Park Corner in 1766 by Richard Tattersall (1724-95), stud-groom to the second duke of Kingston. His honesty and businesslike precision brought him the highest patronage, and the establishment became famous, and survives in premises at Brompton.

Tattle, a character in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Tattycoram, in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), a foundling brought up in the Meagles household.

Tauchnitz, CHRISTIAN BERNHARD VON (1816-95), the founder of a publishing house at Leipzig which in 1841 (there being at that time no international agreement on copyright) began the issue of a 'Collection of British and American Authors' for sale on the Continent, followed by a collection of English translations of German authors.

TAYLOR, BAYARD (1825-78), American traveller and author, published a large number of books of travel, novels, poems, and a translation of Goethe's 'Faust'.

TAYLOR, SIR HENRY (1800-86), held an appointment in the Colonial Office from 1824 to 1872, during which time he published a number of plays in verse, 'Isaac Comnenus' (1827), 'Philip van Artevelde' (1834), 'Edwin the Fair' (1842), 'A Sicilian Summer' and 'St. Clement's Eve' (1862). 'The Eve of Conquest' and other poems appeared in 1847, 'The Statesman' (q.v.) in 1836. 'Philip van Artevelde' (q.v.), his masterpiece, is remarkable as a study of character, and also displays his lyrical faculty. There is an interesting critical introduction to the play. His 'Autobiography' appeared in 1885.

TAYLOR, JANE (1783-1824) and ANN (1782-1866), authors of books for the young, published 'Original Poems for Infant Minds' (including contributions by Adelaide O'Keeffe, 1766-1855?) in 1804, which attained immense popularity, and 'Rhymes for the Nursery' (1806), which included 'Twinkle, twinkle, little star'; also 'Hymns for Infant Minds' (1810). Jane Taylor also wrote 'Display, a Tale for Young People' (1815) and 'Contributions of Q.Q.' (1824).

TAYLOR, JEREMY (1613-67), was born at Cambridge, and was the son of a barber. He was educated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Having attracted Laud's attention as a preacher, he was sent by him to Oxford and became a fellow of All Souls College. He was chaplain to Laud and Charles I, and was appointed rector of Uppingham in 1638. He was taken prisoner in the Royalist defeat before Cardigan Castle in 1645, and retired to Golden Grove, Carmarthenshire, where he wrote most of his greater works. After the Restoration he was made bishop of Down and Connor, and subsequently of Dromore. He died at Lisburn and was buried in his cathedral of Dromore. His fame rests on the combined simplicity and splendour of his style, of which his 'Holy Living' and 'Holy Dying' (1650-1) are perhaps the best examples. Among his other works, the 'Liberty of Prophesying', an argument for toleration, appeared in 1646; his 'Eniautos' or series of sermons for the Christian Year, in 1653; 'The Golden Grove', a manual of daily prayers, in 1655; the 'Ductor Dubitantium', 'a general instrument of moral theology' for determining cases of conscience, in 1660; and his 'The Worthy Communicant' in the same year.

TAYLOR, JOHN (1580-1653), the 'water-poet', born of humble parentage at Gloucester, was sent to Gloucester Grammar School; but becoming 'mired' in his Latin accident was apprenticed to a waterman, pressed for the navy, and was present at the siege of Cadiz. He then became a Thames waterman, and collector of the Lieutenant of the Tower's perquisite of wine. He increased his earnings by rhyming, and showed a marked talent for expressing himself in rollicking verse and prose. He obtained the patronage of Jonson and other men of genius, and diverted both court and city. He went on foot from London to Braemar, visited the Continent, and the queen of Bohemia at Prague, started from London to Queenborough in a brown-paper boat and narrowly escaped drowning, and accomplished other journeys, each one resulting in a booklet with an odd title. He was lodged in Oriel College, Oxford, during the plague of 1625. He finally took the 'Crown' public-house in Hanover Court, Long Acre. He published in 1630 a collective edition of his works, 'All the Workes of John Taylor, the Water Poet' (reprinted with other pieces by the Spenser Society, 1868-78).

TAYLOR, JOHN (1703-72), commonly known as the 'Chevalier', an itinerant oculist, who possessed much skill as an operator, but advertised himself like a charlatan. He was the author of treatises on the eye and of a bombastic autobiography, and was the subject of many satires.

TAYLOR, PHILIP MEADOWS (1808-76), an Indian officer and 'Times' correspondent in India from 1840 to 1853, was author of 'The Confessions of a Thug' (1839), a very successful book. After his retirement in 1860 Taylor wrote a number of brilliant stories delineating epochs of Indian history, notably the trilogy, 'Tara: a Mahratta Tale' (1863), 'Ralph Darnell' (1865), and 'Seeta' (1873). 'The Story of my Life', edited by his daughter, appeared in 1877.

TAYLOR, THOMAS (1768-1835), mathematician and Platonist. He was the first to embark on a systematic translation and exposition of Orphic, Platonic, and other ancient literatures. He also devoted himself to the attempt to discover a metaphysic of mathematics.

TAYLOR, TOM (1817-80), educated at Glasgow University and Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, wrote for various newspapers and was editor of 'Punch' from 1874 to 1880. He produced a number of successful plays (some in collaboration with Charles Reade and others), taking the plots as a rule from previous writers. The plays include 'To Parents and Guardians' (1845), 'Still Waters Run Deep' (1855), 'Our American Cousin' (1858). He edited Haydon's autobiography in 1853, and C. R. Leslie's 'Autobiographical Recollections' after the author's death (1860).

Taylorian Institute, THE, at Oxford, built in 1841-5, is named after Sir Robert Taylor (1714-88), sculptor and architect, who left some £180,000, mostly to Oxford University. The Taylorian is an institute for teaching modern languages and has an important modern language library. See Sir C. H. Firth's 'Modern Languages at Oxford, 1729-1929' (1929).

Tchaikovsky, PETER ILITCH (1840-93), an eminent Russian composer, whose works are marked by the national spirit and the power of portraying every variety of emotion. They include several operas, six symphonies (of which the last three are the best known), pianoforte concertos, &c.

TCHEHOV, ANTON PAVLOVICH, see Chekhov.

Te Deum, an ancient Latin psalm of praise, so called from its opening words. The authorship is traditionally ascribed to St. Ambrose (c. 340-97, bishop of Milan), and is connected with the conversion by him of St.

Augustine; but modern scholars are inclined to attribute the authorship to Ambrose's younger contemporary, Niceta of Remesiana.

Te igitur, the first prayer in the canon of the mass in the Roman liturgy; hence extended to the liturgical book itself, so called from the opening words of the prayer.

Teague, a nickname for an Irishman, the anglicized spelling of the Irish name Tadhg.

Tears of the Muses, The, a poem by Spenser (q.v.), included in the 'Complaints' published in 1590. In this the poet deplores, through the mouth of the several Muses, the decay of literature and learning. It contains, in the lament of Thalia, an interesting passage ('Our pleasant Willy, ah! is dead of late') which has been thought by some to refer to Shakespeare ('dead' being used in the sense of silent) or Tarlton (q.v.), but probably refers to Lyly.

Tearsheet, DOLL, a character in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV' (q.v.).

Teazle, SIR PETER and LADY, characters in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.).

Telan Muse, THE, Anacreon (q.v.).

Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, a series of clay tablets with cuneiform inscriptions found in 1887 in the ruins of the palace of Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton) at Tel-el-Amarna in Middle Egypt. They contain the diplomatic correspondence of the kings of Babylonia and Assyria with the king of Egypt.

Telēmāchus, a son of Ulysses and Penelope (qq.v.), who was still a child when his father went to the Trojan War. At the end of the war, when his father did not return, Telemachus went to seek him, accompanied by Athens in the guise of Mentor, and visited Nestor and Menelaus to obtain information. On his return to Ithaca, where the suitors of his mother had conspired to slay him, his father, who had just returned, was revealed to him by Athens. Together they concerted, with the help of Eumaeus (q.v.), the destruction of the suitors.

the latter, writing an account of it in the form of a journal.

Tell, WILLIAM, a legendary hero of the liberation of Switzerland from Austrian oppression. The stories concerning him differ in details, but in its generally accepted form the legend represents him as a skilled Swiss marksman who refused to do honour to the hat of Gessler, the Austrian bailiff of Uri, placed on a pole, and was in consequence arrested and required to hit with an arrow an apple placed on the head of his little son. This he successfully did, and with a second arrow shot Gessler, subsequently stirring up a rebellion against the oppressors. Another version relates how Tell, being carried a prisoner across the lake to Gessler's castle, was given the rudder, on account of his strength, when a storm arose. He steered the boat on to a ledge of rock, subsequently called Tell's Platte, sprang ashore, and shot the bailiff. These events are placed in the 14th cent. But Swiss historians have shown that there is no evidence for the existence of a real William Tell. The story is first found in writings of the 15th century. William Tell is the subject of a play by Schiller (q.v.).

Similar legends of marksmen shooting at an object placed on the head of a man or child are of widespread occurrence, e.g. in Norway and England (Egil, Clym of the Clough, William of Cloudesley).

TELLEZ, GABRIEL (1570-1648), who wrote under the pseudonym TIRSO DA MOLINA, a Spanish dramatist, famous outside Spain principally as the creator of the prototype of Don Juan in his play 'El Burlador de Sevilla' ('The Seville Deceiver' or 'Jester'). Tellus, the name under which the Earth was worshipped at Rome, corresponding to the Greek Gê.

Temora, one of the chief epics among the Ossianic poems of Macpherson (q.v.). 'Temora' is the name of the palace of the kings of Ulster. Cormac, the young king, has been murdered by Cairbar of Connaught, who has usurped the throne (as told in 'The Death of Cuthullin'). Fingal comes over to Ireland to re-establish the ousted dynasty. In the battle that ensues Cairbar and Oscan (the son of Ossian and grandson of Fingal) fall by each other's hand; Fillan, a son of Fingal, is also slain; and finally Fingal kills Cathmor, the brother of Cairbar and leader of the rebel host.

Tempê, a valley in Thessaly, between Mt. Olympus on the north and Mt. Ossa on the south, through which the river Pénêus flows to the sea. It was celebrated for its beauty, cool shades, and warbling birds: 'Zephyris agitata Tempe' (Horace, 'Odes', III. i).

Tempest, The, a romantic drama by Shakespeare (q.v.), was probably written in 1611 and the latest of his completed works. It was not printed till the folio of 1623. The story of the exiled magician and his daughter had figured in a recent German play, and other literary sources have been suggested. Shakespeare has worked into the play details of the shipwreck on Bermuda of Sir G. Somers's ship the 'Sea-Venture' in 1609. He may have got the name of the god Setebos from Richard Eden's 'History of Travaile' (1577).

Prospero, duke of Milan, ousted from his throne by his brother Antonio, and turned adrift on the sea with his child Miranda, has been cast upon a lonely island. This had been the place of banishment of the witch Sycorax. Prospero, by his knowledge of magic, has released various spirits (including Ariel) formerly imprisoned by the witch, and these now obey his orders. He also keeps in service the witch's son Caliban, a misshapen monster, the sole inhabitant of the island. After Prospero and Miranda have lived thus for twelve years, a ship carrying the usurper, his confederate, the king of Naples, and the latter's son Ferdinand is by the art of Prospero wrecked on the island. The passengers are saved, but Ferdinand is thought by the rest to be drowned, and Ferdinand thinks the rest are drowned. Ferdinand and Miranda are thrown together, fall in love, and plight their troth. Ariel, by Prospero's order, subjects Antonio and the king of Naples to various terrors. Antonio is cowed; the king repents his cruelty, is reconciled with Prospero, and his son Ferdinand is restored to him. All ends happily, for the ship is magically restored and Prospero and the others prepare to leave the island, after Prospero has renounced his magical faculties. Caliban, whose intercourse with Stephano, a drunken butler, and Trinculo the jester has provided some excellent fooling, is left, as before, the island's sole inhabitant.

Templars, KNIGHTS, an order founded about 1118, consisting originally of nine knights whose profession was to safeguard pilgrims to Jerusalem, and who were granted by Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, a dwelling-place in his palace near the temple. Many noblemen from all parts of Christendom joined the order, and it acquired great wealth and influence in France, England, and other countries. Active always in the field, they were really a source of weakness to the Christian king of Jerusalem from their direct dependence on the pope and their constant violation of treaties with the Moslem powers. After the battle of 1187 Saladin made an example of the Templars and the (much less guilty) Hospitallers who became his prisoners, and beheaded them all, about 200 in number, while sparing nearly all his other prisoners. The knights were organized in commanderies, under a preceptor in each province, and a grand master at the head of the order. From a state of poverty and humility (their seal represents two of them riding on the same horse) they became so insolent that the order was suppressed. They were accused of blasphemy, sorcery, and other crimes. The order was crushed by the kings of Europe in their various dominions with circumstances, especially in France, of great cruelty. It was also officially suppressed by the pope and the Council of Vienne (1312). Browning's poem, 'The Heretic's Tragedy', alludes to the burning of Jacques du Bourg-Molay, the grand master, in 1314. See also under Temple (The, of London).

Temple, Miss, in Charlotte Brontë's 'Jane Eyre' (q.v.), the kindly manager of the Lowood Asylum.

Temple, THE, of the Jews at Jerusalem, was first built by Solomon, on the summit of Mt. Moriah, 'the threshing-floor of Ornan' (2 Chron. iii). It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C.; rebuilt under Ezra and Nehemiah; partly destroyed by Antiochus Epiphanes, 167 B.C.; splendidly restored by Herod the Great; and finally destroyed by Titus in A.D. 70. The site is now occupied by the Mosque of Omar (q.v.).

Temple, THE, a district of London lying between Fleet Street and the Thames, took its name from the Knights Templars (q.v.), who owned it from about 1160 until their suppression. Their church, built on the model of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem and known as the Round Church, was consecrated in 1185, and forms part of the present TEMPLE CHURCH. The Temple was leased to law students and converted into Inns of Court (the Inner and Middle Temple) in the 14th cent.

The TEMPLE GARDEN is the scene, in Shakespeare's '1 Henry VI' (II. iv), of the plucking of the white and red roses of York and Lancaster; and in '1 Henry IV', III. iii, the prince makes an appointment with Falstaff in the Temple Hall (an anachronism, Loftie points out).

TEMPLE, SIR WILLIAM (1628-99), educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was envoy at Brussels in 1666, and visited The Hague, where he effected the triple alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, aiming at the protection of Spain from French ambition (1668). He went again to The Hague in 1674, where he brought about the marriage between William of Orange and Mary. He married in 1655 Dorothy Osborne, whose letters to him were published in 1888, and again in a better edition in 1928. He settled first at Sheen and later at Moor Park, near Farnham, where he was much occupied with gardening, and where Swift (q.v.) was an inmate of his household. His principal works are an 'Essay upon the Present State of Ireland' (1668), 'Observations upon . . . the Netherlands' (1672), an essay upon 'The Advancement of Trade in Ireland' (1673), and three volumes of 'Miscellanea' (1680, 1690, and 1701). The second of these contains his best-known essay, 'Of Ancient and Modern Learning', which, by its uncritical praise of the spurious epistles of Phalaris (q.v.), exposed the author to the censure of Bentley (q.v.) and led to a vigorous controversy. The 'Miscellanea' also include the essays 'Upon the Original and Nature of Government' (written about 1671), 'Upon the Gardens of Epicurus', 'Upon Health and Long Life', 'Of Heroic Virtue', and 'Of Poetry'. Temple's Letters were published by Swift in 1701, after Temple's death. His 'Memoirs', relating to the period 1672-9, published in 1692, are an agreeable blend of public affairs with a record of private life.

TENNIS COURT OATH

Temple Bar, like Holborn Bar and other bars on the chief roads leading out of London, marked the limit of the common lands or 'liberties' that surrounded the medieval city. It was rebuilt by Sir C. Wren (1672-3) and removed in 1878. It is now at Theobalds Park, Cheshunt.

Tenant of Wildfell Hall, The, see Wildfell.

Teniers, DAVID, the younger (1610-90), the third great master of the Flemish school (following, that is, Rubens and Van Dyck), was born at Antwerp, and became court painter to the archduke Leopold William, the governor of the Spanish Netherlands, and to his successor, Don Juan of Austria. This appointment secured the artist's prosperity and enabled him to live in grand style at his chateau of the 'Drij Toren' ('Three Towers') at Perck. Queen Christina of Sweden and Philip IV of Spain were among his patrons. He was a very versatile painter, taking for his subjects landscapes, guard-rooms, tavern drinking-scenes, village revels, and also sacred themes. He was at his best in genre pictures, which he painted with the utmost realism.

TENNANT, WILLIAM (1784-1848), educated at St. Andrews University, a parish schoolmaster (at Anstruther in Fife) learned in oriental languages, of which he became professor at St. Andrews. He is remembered in a literary connexion for his poem in six cantos, 'Anster Fair', published in 1812, a mock-heroic description of the humours of the fair (in James V's reign) and of the courting, with fairy interposition, of Maggie Lauder by Rob the Ranter.

Tenniel, SIR JOHN (1820-1914), first came to notice by his illustrations of the Rev. Thomas James's version of 'Aesop's Fables' (1848). He was invited to join the staff of 'Punch' in 1850. In 1864 he succeeded Leech as its chief cartoonist, and during fifty years' service drew over two thousand cartoons. Among the best known of these was 'Dropping the Pilot' (1890), referring to Bismarck's resignation, and 'Who said "Atrocities"?' (1895), showing Gladstone as a terrier, alert at the mention of Armenian massacres. Tenniel also illustrated 'Alice's Adventures in Wonderland' and 'Through the Looking-Glass'.

Tennis Court Oath: on 29 June 1789 the

TENNIS COURT OATH

Third Estate of France (self-styled 'National Assembly') met in the Tennis Court (Jeu de Paume) at Versailles, in defiance of the royal orders, and its members took an oath not to separate until they had made a constitution.

TENNYSON, ALFRED, first Baron Tennyson (1809-92), was born at Somersby, of which place his father was rector, and educated by his father and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became acquainted with A. H. Hallam (q.v.). He won the chancellor's medal for English verse in 1829 with a poem, 'Timbuctoo'. 'Poems, by Two Brothers' (1827) contains some of his earlier and unimportant verse. In 1830 he published 'Poems, chiefly Lyrical' (including 'Claribel' and 'Mariana'), which were unfavourably reviewed by Lockhart and Wilson, and in 1832 travelled with Hallam on the Continent. Hallam died in 1833, and in that year Tennyson began his 'In Memoriam' (q.v.) expressive of his grief for his lost friend. He became engaged to Emily Sellwood, to whom, however, he was not married until 1850. In 1833 he published a further volume of 'Poems', containing 'The Two Voices', 'Ænone' (q.v.), 'The Lotos-Eaters' (q.v.), 'A Dream of Fair Women' ('Tithonus', q.v., published in 1860, belongs also to this period); and in 1842 an edition of his poems in two volumes, which included some of his finest work: the 'Morte d'Arthur' (the germ of the 'Idylls'), 'Locksley Hall' (q.v.), 'Ulysses' (q.v.), 'St. Simeon Stylites', &c. He received from Peel a pension of £200. In 1847 he published 'The Princess' (q.v.) and in 1850 'In Memoriam', and was appointed poet laureate in succession to Wordsworth in the latter year. He wrote the 'Ode' on the death of Wellington and 'The Charge of the Light Brigade' in 1854, having at this date taken up his residence at Farringford, in the Isle of Wight. He published 'Maud' (q.v.) in 1855, and in 1859 four 'Idylls of the King' (q.v., Enid, Vivien, Elaine, Guinevere), which finally established his fame and popularity. 'Enoch Arden' (q.v.) appeared in 1864 (the volume included his popular dialect poem, 'The Northern Farmer: Old Style'); 'Lucretius' (q.v.), privately printed in 1868; 'The Holy Grail' (q.v.) in 1869; 'The Last Tournament' (q.v.), privately printed in 1871, and 'Gareth and Lynette' (q.v.) in 1872. Tennyson began building his second residence, Aldworth, near Haslemere, in 1868. His dramas, 'Queen Mary' (q.v.) and 'Harold' (q.v.), appeared in 1875 and 1876, 'The Falcon' (privately printed) in 1879, 'The Cup' (privately printed) in 1881, 'The Promise of May' in 1882, and 'Becket' (q.v.) in 1884, in which year he was made a peer. In 1880 appeared 'Ballads and other poems', which includes, besides 'The Voyage of Maeldune' and 'Rizpah' (qq.v.), the fine war ballads 'The Revenge' (q.v.) and 'The Defence of Lucknow'. Tennyson published 'Tiresias, and other poems' in 1886, 'Locksley Hall, sixty years after' in 1886, and 'Deme er, and other poems' (including 'Merlin and the Glean', the lines 'To Virgil', and 'Crossing the Bar') in 1889. The 'Death of Ænone, and other poems' and 'The Foresters' appeared in 1892. Tennyson was buried in Westminster Abbey. A life of him by his son was published in 1897.

TENNYSON, FREDERICK (1807-98), elder brother of A. Tennyson (q.v.), contributed to the 'Poems by Two Brothers' (1827), and published 'Days and Hours' (1854), 'The Isles of Greece' (1890), and other volumes of verse.

TENNYSON TURNER, CHARLES (1808-79), elder brother of A. Tennyson (q.v.), contributed to 'Poems by Two Brothers' (1827) and published from time to time volumes of sonnets (1830-80), simple and restrained in manner, some of them depicting the rustic aspects of the wolds.

Tensons or TENÇONS, dialogues in verse sung in contest between two troubadours.

Teraphim, a kind of idols or images, apparently household gods, an object of reverence and means of divination among the ancient Hebrews and kindred peoples, mentioned, e.g., in Judges xvii. 5; perhaps something like the Tanagra figurines of Greece, or the Lares and Penates of Rome (if statues were made, as they probably were, of these family godlets).

Terburg or TERBORCH, GERARD (c. 1617-81), a famous genre painter of the Dutch school.

TERENCE, (PUBLIUS TERENTIUS AFER) (c. 190-159 B.C.), the Roman comic poet, was born at Carthage and came when young to Rome, as the slave of P. Terentius Lucanus, by whom he was freed. He visited Greece late in his short life and never returned. He wrote six plays, most of them based on comedies by Menander: 'Andria', 'Hecyra' ('The Mother-in-Law'), 'Heautontimorumenos' ('The Self-punisher'), 'Eunuchus', 'Phormio', 'Adelphoe'.

Termagant, the name of an imaginary deity held in medieval Christendom to be worshipped by the Mohammedans: in the mystery plays represented as a violent overbearing personage; hence 'a bully', and later 'a virago'. From Old French Tervagant, Italian Trivigante, probably for Trivagante, the moon, wandering under three names, Selene (or Luna) in heaven, Artemis (or Diana) on earth, Persephone (Proserpina) in the lower world.

Terpander, the father of Greek music, a native of Lesbos, who probably flourished in the first half of the 7th cent. B.C. He is said to have made of the lyre (which previously had only four strings) a seven-stringed instrument, and to have founded at Sparta the first Greek school of music.

Terpsichôrê, the Muse (q.v.) who presided over dancing.

Terra sigillata, 'sealed earth', a medicinal earth from the island of Lemnos, so called because cakes of it were sealed or stamped, in antiquity, with the head of Artemis, in later times with the seal of the Grand Signior. It was esteemed an antidote against poisons and was famous during the Renaissance.

Terrae filius, Latin, a 'son of the earth', a man of unknown origin; formerly, at Oxford University, an orator privileged to make humorous and satirical strictures in a speech at the public 'act'. [OED.]

Terrible Temptation, A, a novel by Reade, published in 1871.

It is the story of the persistent warfare waged on Sir Charles Bassett by his unscrupulous cousin Richard Bassett, who considers himself defrauded of his inheritance. This inheritance he is determined to recover either for himself or his children. In pursuit of this purpose he tries by a base device to frustrate his cousin's marriage, and finally gets him locked up in a madhouse—a part of the story designed to show the unsatisfactory state of the law with regard to the certification of lunatics (cf. Reade's Hard Cash). His schemes are frustrated by the devotion of Sir Charles's wife, and a reconciliation is in the end effected. The novel possesses a special interest in the description of the methods by which the author (in the character of the lawyer Rolfe) accumulated the documents which served as the basis of his narratives.

Terror, THE, see Reign of Terror.

Tertium quid, 'some third thing', something indefinite, related in some way to two definite or known things, but distinct from both. In Browning's 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.), after the two halves of Rome have given their opinions on the story of Pompilia, comes the impartial opinion of 'Tertium Quid'.

TERTULLIAN (b. c. A.D. 150), one of the greatest of the early Christian writers in Latin; author of 'Apologeticus' (197), an eloquent appeal to Roman governors on behalf of the Christians, and of many treatises on the Christian mode of life.

Terza rima, the measure adopted by Dante in the 'Divina Commedia', consisting of lines of five iambic feet with an extra syllable, in sets of three lines, the middle line of each rhyming with the first and third lines of the next set (a b a, b c b, c d c, &c.).

Tess of the D'Urbervilles, A Pure Woman, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1891.

Tess Durbeyfield is the daughter of a poor, foolish villager of Blackmoor Vale, whose head is turned by learning that he is a descendant of the ancient family of the D'Urbervilles. Tess is seduced by Alec, a young man of means whose parents bear the surname D'Urberville with doubtful right to it. Tess gives birth to a child, which dies in infancy, after an improvised midnight baptism by its mother. Some time later, while working as a dairymaid on a large farm, Tess becomes engaged to Angel Clare, a clergyman's son. On their wedding-night she confesses to him the affair of Alec; and Angel, himself a sinner while Tess has been a victim, abandons her. Misfortune and hardship come upon her and her family, and accident throws her once more in the path of Alec D'Urberville. He has become a preacher, but his temporary religious mania does not prevent him from pressing his attentions upon her. After some pathetic appeals to her husband, she is driven to accept the protection of Alec. Clare, returning from Brazil repentant of his harshness, finds her in this situation. Maddened by this second wrong that has been done her by Alec, she murders him to liberate herself. After a brief period of concealment with Clare in the New Forest, Tess is arrested, tried, and hanged. "Justice" was done, and the President of the Immortals (in Aeschylean phrase) had ended his sport with Tess.

Tessa, a character in George Eliot's 'Romola' (q.v.).

Tester, apparently a corruption or perversion of teston, a name for the teston or testoon (shilling) of Henry VIII, especially as debased and depreciated; subsequently a colloquial or slang term for sixpence. Hence also perhaps the slang 'tizzy'.

TESTON was originally the French name of a silver coin struck at Milan by Galeazzo Maria Sforza (1468–76), bearing a portrait or head of the duke. In England the name was first applied to the shilling of Henry VII, the first English coin with a true portrait; also to those of Henry VIII and early pieces of Edward VI. It was declared in 1543 to be equal to 12 pence, but was debased in 1545, no less than half of copper being put into it, and sank to 10d., 9d., and 6d.; it was recalled in 1548.

Tethys, in Greek mythology, one of the deities of the sea, daughter of Uranus and Gê, and wife of Oceanus. She was regarded as the mother of the chief rivers of the earth, and her daughters were known as the Oceanids.

TETHYS

Tethys, in geology, a S. European ocean, so named by Suess (q.v.), at some time connected with the Atlantic, of which the Mediterranean is a much reduced remnant.

Tetrachordon, the third of Milton's pamphlets on divorce, dealing (whence its name) with four sets of passages from Genesis, Deuteronomy, the Gospel of St. Matthew, and the First Epistle to the Corinthians. Milton also wrote two sonnets on the subject of this pamphlet.

Tetragrammaton, from the Greek, 'the word of four letters', referring specifically to the Hebrew word written YHWH or JHVH (vocalized as Yahweh or Jehovah). 'Tetragrammaton' is often substituted for that word (regarded as ineffable) and treated as a mysterious symbol of the name of God. The pronunciation of the original word was supposed to be kept hidden, for fear of blasphemy.

Tetterbys, THE, characters in Dickens's 'The Haunted Man' (q.v.).

Teubner, BENEDICT GOTTHELF (1784-1856), the founder of a publishing and book-selling business in Leipzig, famous for the 'Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana', begun in 1849, which attained high renown as containing the best available texts of the ancient classics.

Teucer, a son of Telamon and half-brother of Ajax (q.v.), and the best archer in the Greek army before Troy. On his return to Salamis after the war, Telamon refused to receive him, because he had failed to avenge on Ulysses the death of Ajax. Teucer thereupon sailed to Cyprus, where he established himself.

Thackeray, ANNE ISABELLA, see Ritchie.

THACKERAY, WILLIAM MAKEPEACE (1811-63), of a Yorkshire yeoman family, was born in India, where his father held office as collector. He was sent to England in 1817, and educated at Walpole House, Chiswick, at Charterhouse, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. Here he studied little, and left in June 1830 without a degree, after making friends with Edward FitzGerald, Tennyson, and others. He then travelled abroad and met Goethe at Weimar. In 1831 he entered the Middle Temple, sharing rooms in Crown Office Row with Tom Taylor, but soon gave up the legal profession. In 1833 he became proprietor of 'The National Standard', for which he wrote and drew. It had a short existence, and Thackeray settled in Paris to study drawing. In 1836 he published eight caricatures of ballet-dancers entitled 'Flore et Zéphyr' under the pseudonym 'Théophile Wagstaff', and became Paris correspondent of 'The Constitutional', which failed. In the same year he married Isabella Shave. He returned to England in 1837 and contributed to 'Fraser's Magazine' 'The Yellowplush

THACKERAY

Correspondence' (in which Mr. Yellowplush (q.v.), an illiterate footman, relates his social experiences) and wrote reviews for 'The Times' and other papers. The 'Tremendous Adventures of Major Gahagan' (q.v.) appeared in 'The New Monthly Magazine' in 1838-9, and 'Catherine' (q.v.), narrated by 'Ikey Solomons, junior' in 'Fraser' in 1839-40, the latter being an attempt to ridicule the exaltation of crime in fiction. In 1840 Thackeray was parted from his wife owing to her insanity, a calamity that had a marked effect upon his writing, in which the element of pathos becomes more pronounced. 'A Shabby Genteel Story' (q.v.) appeared in 'Fraser' in 1840, 'The Paris Sketch-Book, by Mr. Titmarsh' in the same year, and 'The Great Hoggarty Diamond' (q.v.) in 1841. In these last two works Thackeray assumed the pseudonym of Michael Angelo Titmarsh. In the character of George Savage Fitz-Boodle he contributed to 'Fraser' in 1842-3 the 'Fitz-Boodle Papers', the confessions of an elderly clubman of the flames inspired in his susceptible heart by various German maidens. Fitz-Boodle reappears in 'Men's Wives', a series printed in 'Fraser' in 1843, which contains the diverting portraits of the adventurer Captain Howard Walker and the composer Sir George Thrum. 'Bluebeard's Ghost' and 'The Irish Sketch-Book' by M. A. Titmarsh were published in the same year; and in 1844 Thackeray, in the character again of Fitz-Boodle as editor, contributed to 'Fraser' 'The Luck of Barry Lyndon' (q.v.). 'Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo by Mr. M. A. Titmarsh', a long 'sketch-book', appeared in 1846. Thackeray began his contributions to 'Punch' in 1842; of these the best known are 'Jeames's Diary' (1845), 'Mr. Punch's Prize Novelists' (q.v., 1847) and 'The Snobs of England' (1847, afterwards published as 'The Book of Snobs'), a denunciation of social pretentiousness. Even before the 'Snobs' were completed, the serial numbers of 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.) had begun to appear, followed by those of 'Pendennis' (q.v.) in November 1848, 'Esmond' (q.v.) in 1852, and 'The Newcomes' (q.v.) in 1853-5. Meanwhile Thackeray had begun to publish the tales ('Mrs. Perkins's Ball', 'Our Street', 'The Rose and the Ring', q.v., &c.) reprinted in 'Christmas Books' (1857). In these, and in the burlesque 'Legend of the Rhine' (1845), 'The Kickleburys on the Rhine', and 'Rebecca and Rowena' (1850), Michael Angelo Titmarsh reappears as author. Thackeray lectured on 'The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century' in 1851 (published in 1853) and on 'The Four Georges' in 1855-6 (published in 1860). In 1852 he went on a lecturing tour to America, and the result was the sequel to 'Esmond', 'The Virginians' (q.v.), published in serial numbers in 1857-9. In 1857 Thackeray had unsuccessfully stood for parliament at Oxford. He had retired from 'Punch' in 1854 and became editor of the 'Cornhill' in 1860. He contributed to it 'Lovel the Widower' (1860), 'The Adventures of Philip' (1861-2, in which the characters of 'The Shabby Genteel Story' reappear), the unfinished 'Denis Duval' (q.v.), and 'The Roundabout Papers'. Mention should be made of Thackeray's ballads and other rhymes, written at various periods of his life, and in various moods. The best known perhaps are the 'Ballad of Bouillabaisse' (q.v.), 'The Mahogany Tree', and the two on Catherine Hayes, the murderess, and Catherine Hayes, the Irish singer.

There is a biography of Thackeray by A. Trollope (1879), and another by Lewis Melville in two volumes (1910). Sir William Wilson Hunter's 'The Thackerays in India' (1897) contains an interesting account of Thackeray's ancestors in that country. Anne Thackeray Ritchie, Thackeray's daughter, published 'Chapters from Some Memoirs' in 1894, and C. N. Ray the letters and private papers, in four volumes, in 1946-7.

Thaddeus of Warsaw, a historical novel by J. Porter (q.v.), published in 1803.

Thaddeus, a young nobleman of the family of the famous John Sobieski, king of Poland, accompanies his grandfather, the count palatine, to join the army of King Stanislaus, which Prince Poniatowski and General Kosciuszko are leading against the invading Russians. The old count is killed, the Polish forces defeated, the Sobieski castle burnt, and Thaddeus driven into exile. He comes to England, where, after suffering hardships, he is discovered to be the son of an English gentleman, and happily married.

The work is of some interest as an early example of the historical novel.

Thais, an Athenian courtesan who, according to legend, accompanied Alexander on his Asiatic conquests and caused him to burn the royal palace of Persepolis. The incident is treated in Dryden's ode, 'Alexander's Feast'. Thais (an Egyptian courtesan) is the subject of a romance by A. France (q.v.).

Thaisa, in Shakespeare's 'Pericles' (q.v.), the wife of Pericles.

Thalaba the Destroyer, a poem by Southey, published in 1801.

The young Thalaba, a Moslem, is the appointed one to destroy the race of magicians who have their seminary in Domdaniel (q.v.), a palace 'under the roots of the sea'. Abdaldar, one of the magicians, seeks to kill him, but is blasted by the simoom. Thalaba, taking Abdaldar's magic ring from his finger, learns through it that his father, Hodeirah, was slain by Okba, the magician, and vows vengeance. He sets out on his quest, learns that the talisman by which he shall accomplish it is faith, and, protected by the ring from the attacks of the magicians, finally makes his way to Domdaniel and destroys it and the sorcerers. He sacrifices his life in doing so, and is reunited in Paradise to his beloved Oneiza, the wife whom death had taken from him on their bridal night.

Thalassa!, 'The sea!', in Xenophon's 'Anabasis', iv. 7, the cry of the Ten Thousand when from the summit of Mt. Tcheches they first saw the Euxine after their wanderings in Asia Minor.

Thaler, see Dollar.

Thalès (b. c. 624 B.C.), of Miletus in Ionia, one of the seven wise men of Greece. It is said that he travelled in quest of knowledge, and from the priests of Memphis learnt geometry, astronomy, and philosophy, and predicted a solar eclipse. He may be considered the founder of Greek philosophy, being the first to seek in science, instead of mythology, the interpretation of the world. He held that all things had their origin in water.

Thalestris, a queen of the Amazons, who is said to have been attracted by the fame of Alexander the Great, and travelled from her country to see him.

Thalia, the Muse (q.v.) of comedy and pastoral poetry.

Thames, Old English Temese, Latin Tamesis or Tamesa, the name of the river on which London stands. It is called the Isis from its source to its junction with the Thame, below Oxford, owing to a false etymology of Tamesis or Tamisis as Tam + Isis (Henry Bradley). The meaning of the word, which is perhaps Celtic in origin, is uncertain (cf. the river names Tame, Tamar).

To set the Thames on fire, to do something marvellous, to work wonders, a phrase always used negatively, 'he will never set the Thames on fire'. It has its parallel in other countries in respect of their rivers, e.g. the Rhine. The conjecture that Thames here was originally temse, a sieve, which might be set on fire by force of friction, has no basis of fact. [OED.]

Thamuz or THAMMUZ, a Syrian god. See under Adonis and Pan. The relation of Thammuz to Adonis is referred to in Milton, 'Paradise Lost', i. 446-52.

Thamÿris, a Thracian musician, mentioned by Homer ('Iliad', ii. 594). He challenged the Muses to a contest of skill, and, being defeated by them, was deprived of his eyesight and his melodious voice, and his lyre was broken. 'Blind Thamyras and blind Mæonides', Milton, 'Paradise Lost', iii. 35.

Thatched House Club, THE, at the lower end of St. James's Street, London, was originally a tavern much frequented by politicians and men of fashion. The tavern was demolished in 1814.

Thaumas, in Rabelais, II. xix, an English philosopher who carried on a learned discussion with Panurge solely by signs.

Theagēs, THE BRIDLE OF: ill-health. Theages was a follower of Socrates. In the sixth book of Plato's 'Republic' Socrates is considering who rare are the worthy disciples of philosophy, a gifted few condemned to exile or who despise politics or the arts; 'Moreover, the bridle which curbs our friend Theages may be equally efficacious in other instances. For Theages is kept in check by ill-health, which excludes him from a public life, though in all other respects he has every inducement to desert philosophy' (tr. Davies and Vaughan).

Thebes, the capital of Boeotia in Greece, supposed to have been founded by Cadmus (q.v.), and the scene of the legend of Oedipus (q.v.). It was the birthplace of Pindar. For the war of THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES, see under Eteocles. This war was the subject of a long epic poem, 'The Thebaid', by the Roman poet Statius (q.v.).

Thebes, the Greek name for an ancient Egyptian city (Tapé), situated on the right bank of the Nile where Luxor now stands. It rose to great importance as the capital of Egypt during the reigns of the kings of the XVIII-XXth dynasties, except for the brief period of Akhnaton's migration to Tel-el-Amarna.

Theism, which in its general sense means belief in a deity, or deities, as opposed to atheism, or in one deity as opposed to polytheism or pantheism, is especially used in the sense of belief in one God as Creator and Ruler of the universe, without denial of revelation. In this use it is distinguished from deism, which is belief in the existence of a Supreme Being as the source of finite existence, with rejection of revelation and the supernatural doctrines of Christianity. [OED.]

Thelema, ABBEY OF, in Rabelais, i. lii et seq., was built and endowed by Gargantua (q.v.) to reward the bold Friar John (Jean des Entommeures) for his prowess in the war with Picrochole. It was to be in every way the opposite of ordinary monasteries and convents. Only men and women favourably endowed by nature were to be admitted to it; it was not to be walled in; it was to contain a magnificent library filled with the works of the humanists. The only rule was to be 'Fay ce que voudras' ('Do what you like'); because persons who are free, well-born, well-educated, and associate with honourable companions, are naturally virtuous and averse from vice. See Medmenham.

Thellusson Act, the Accumulations Act of 1800, passed in consequence of the eccentric will of Peter Thellusson (1737-97), a rich merchant, by which, after leaving £100,000 to his wife and children, he directed that the remainder of his fortune, valued at £600,000 or £800,000, should accumulate during the lives of his sons, of his sons' sons, and of their issue existing at the time of his death. As it was calculated that the accumulation might reach 140 millions and might be a source of danger, the Accumulations Act prohibited such schemes of bequest.

Themis, in Greek mythology, a Titaness and the mother of Prometheus (q.v.); later the personification of justice.

Thenot, a shepherd in Spenser's 'Shepherds Calender' (q.v.). Also a character in Fletcher's 'The Faithful Shepherdess' (q.v.).

THEOBALD, LEWIS (1688-1744), author of poems, essays, and dramatic works, published in 1726 his 'Shakespeare Restored', exposing the incapacity as a critic shown by Pope in his edition of Shakespeare. Pope, infuriated, made Theobald the hero of his 'Dunciad' (q.v.). But we owe to Theobald's edition of Shakespeare (1734) many valuable restorations and conjectural emendations of the text, among others the admirable touch in the death of Falstaff, 'a' babbled of green fields' ('Henry V', II. iii).

THEOCRITUS, a great Greek pastoral poet, a native of Syracuse, lived in the 3rd cent. B.C. He visited Cos and Alexandria, where he appears to have known Callimachus and to have attracted the attention of Ptolemy Philadelphus. His 'Idylls', short dramatic poems of great charm, in some of which he depicts the rustic life of Sicily, were the first examples of pastoral poetry in the literature of Greece, and were imitated by Virgil in Roman literature. His 'Lament for Daphnis' ('Id.' i) is the prototype of such elegies as Milton's 'Lycidas'.

Theodora Campian, a character in Disraeli's 'Lothair' (q.v.).

THEODORE (602?-90), archbishop of Canterbury, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, studied at Athens, and was well versed in Greek and Latin literature. He was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalius in 668. He imposed the Roman order and was the first archbishop to whom (according to Bede) the whole English church agreed in submitting. He founded a school of learning at Canterbury, and created many new bishoprics. Theodore was a great organizer, the effects of his work surviving to the present day; and was author, at least in part, of the 'Penitential', of considerable ecclesiastical and historical interest.

Theodore and Honoria, one of the 'Fables' of Dryden (q.v.). Theodore, a young gentleman of Ravenna, loves the haughty Honoria, but is disdained by her and meditates taking his own life. In a vision he sees a woman pursued and torn by two mastiffs whom a horseman on a coal-black steed urges on. He interposes to save her, and learns that the horseman is Guido Cavalcanti, who took his own life for hopeless love of a proud maid.

THEODORE AND HONORIA

Both were in consequence doomed to hell and she to die daily at the hands of her lover. Theodore contrives that Honoria shall also see the vision, by which she is cured of her haughtiness.

The story is from the 'Decameron' (v. viii), where it is told of one Nastagio degli Onesti.

Theodoric, see Dietrich of Bern.

THEOGNIS, a Greek elegiac poet, a noble of Megara, who lived about 540 B.C. A long fragment of a poem by him survives, reflecting the political strife of his times.

Theon's tooth, in Horace ('Ep.' i. xviii. 82), the sting of satire.

THEOPHRASTUS (d. c. 287 B.C.), a Greek philosopher, native of Lesbos, and pupil of Aristotle. He was the author of two botanical works, but his interest in connexion with English literature lies in his 'Characters', brief but graphic descriptions of various types of human failings, illustrated by typical actions. They served as a model to J. Hall (q.v.), to Overbury (q.v.), to Earle in his 'Microcosmographie' (q.v.), and others, and contributed in some degree towards the evolution of the English essay.

Theophrastus Such, The Impressions of, see Eliot (G.).

Theory of Moral Sentiments, a philosophical work by Adam Smith (q.v.), published in 1759, and originally delivered in the form of lectures at Glasgow.

The author advances the view that all moral sentiments arise from sympathy, the principle which 'leads us to enter into the situations of other men and to partake with them in the passions which those situations have a tendency to excite', this sympathy giving rise to our notions of the merit or demerit of the agent. Sympathy is thus the basis of the fabric of society, and morality has an essentially social character.

Theosophy, from a Greek word meaning wisdom concerning God or things divine, a term applied in the 17th cent. to a kind of speculation, such as is found in the Jewish Cabbala (q.v.), which sought to derive from the knowledge of God contained in secret books, or traditions mystically interpreted, a profounder knowledge and control of nature than could be obtained by the current philosophical methods. It was often applied specifically to the system of Jacob Boehme (q.v.).

In more recent times it has been adopted by the THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, an association founded at New York in 1875 by Col. H. S. Olcott, Madame Blavatsky, and W. Q. Judge, its professed objects being: (1) to form the nucleus of a universal brotherhood; (2) to promote the study of Aryan and other Eastern literature, religions, and sciences; (3) to investigate the unfamiliar laws of nature and the faculties latent in man. [OED.]

the oligarchy of the Four Hundred at Athens (411 B.C.), who was chosen one of the Thirty Tyrants, but endeavoured to check their tyrannical proceedings. He was accused as a traitor and put to death. He appears to have been in favour of a moderate oligarchy, and being placed between two extreme factions acquired the reputation of a trimmer and was nicknamed COTHURNUS (a stage boot which could be worn on either foot).

THERESA or TERESA, ST. (1515-82), a Spanish saint and author, who entered the Carmelite sisterhood and became famous for her mystic visions. Her works include 'El Camino de la Perfección' and 'El Castillo interior'. She was great not only as a mystic, but as an energetic reformer of the Carmelite Order and a foundress of new convents. Her 'Book of the Foundations' narrates her ceaseless journeys for this purpose and the continually growing labour of organization.

Thermidor, the eleventh month of the French republican calendar (see Calendar) running from 19 July to 18 Aug. On 9 Thermidor of the second republican year (27 July 1794) occurred the events which brought about the fall of Robespierre and the end of the Terror.

Thermopylae, a narrow pass between mountain and sea leading from Thessaly into Locris and Phocis, celebrated for the battle fought there in 480 B.C., when 6,000 Greeks including 300 Spartans under Leonidas, for three successive days, resisted the vast army of the Persians under Xerxes.

Theron, the faithful dog of Roderick, in Southey's poem of that name (q.v.).

Thersites, the most querulous and ill-favoured of the Greek host in the Trojan War. He was killed by Achilles (q.v.) for laughing at the latter's grief over the death of Penthesilea, the queen of the Amazons. He figures in Shakespeare's 'Troilus and Cressida' (q.v.).

Thersites, see Interludes.

Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, the great German dictionary of the Latin language, begun in 1900 and still in course of publication.

Theseūs, a son of Poseidon, or, according to a later legend, of Aegeus, king of Athens, by Aethra, daughter of Pittheus, king of Troezen, in whose house he was brought up. When he reached years of maturity he travelled to Athens to make himself known to his father, destroying many robbers and monsters on the way. At Athens, Medea (q.v.), who had taken refuge with Aegeus, attempted to destroy him by poison before he was recognized by Aegeus, but failed. Aegeus knew him to be his son by a sword that he bore. Theseus now achieved many great feats, among others the destruction of the Minotaur (q.v.) with the help of Ariadne, daughter of Minos, whom he carried off and subsequently deserted in Naxos. His return to Athens occasioned the death of Aegeus, who threw himself into the sea when he saw his son's ship approaching, with black sails, hoisted in error, the signal of ill-success. Theseus then ascended the throne of Athens, overcame the Amazons, and carried off their queen, Antiope. He became the close friend of Peirithous, king of the Lapithae, and at the nuptials of the latter with Hippodamia helped to defend her and her attendants against the Centaurs (q.v.). With Peirithous he descended to the infernal regions to carry away Proserpine, but Pluto defeated their attempt. Peirithous was placed on the wheel of Ixion (q.v.), his father, and Theseus suffered a long imprisonment in Hades, until released by Hercules. Theseus was also husband of Phaedra (q.v.) and father of Hippolytus (q.v.).

Theseus, the duke of Athens in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

Thespian, an epithet applied to tragedy or the dramatic art, from Thespis (q.v.).

THESPIA, a Greek poet of Attica, who lived in the 6th cent. B.C. He is important in the history of tragedy, for he gave it a dramatic character by introducing an actor, who replied to the leader of the chorus (or coryphaeus). Horace ('Ars Poetica', 276) records a tradition that Thespis was a strolling player who travelled about with a wagon as temporary stage.

Thetis, one of the sea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, who became the wife of Peleus (q.v.). It was foretold that her child would be greater than his father, a prophecy that was fulfilled by the birth of her son Achilles (q.v.).

THIBAUT, FRANÇOIS ANATOLE, see France (A.).

Thierry and Theodoret, a tragedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), with perhaps the collaboration of Beaumont and Massinger, published in 1621.

Theodoret, king of Austrasia, reproves his mother, Brunhild, for her licentious mode of life. To revenge herself, she attempts to sow enmity between him and his younger brother Thierry, king of Burgundy, but fails. With the assistance of her paramour and a physician, specialist in poisons, she first contrives to destroy the happiness of Thierry and his young bride Ordella, then has Theodoret assassinated, then attempts to procure the death of Ordella, and finally poisons Thierry. There is a touching scene in which Thierry on his death-bed is reunited to Ordella, whom he believed dead. Vengeance falls upon Brunhild and her accomplices.

The play has a historical basis in the tragic story of Brunehaut, the imperious queen of Austrasia, and her grandsons Theodebert and Thierry. There are incidents in it which may be allusions to the queen-regent of France,

THOMAS

Marie de Médicis, and her favourite, Concini (murdered in 1617).

Third Estate, THE, the third of the orders or classes of the community regarded as parts of the body politic and participating in the government. The number of 'Estates' in the nations of Christendom has usually been three (exceptionally four, as in Sweden and Aragon), but their enumeration has varied. In England the 'Estates' as represented in parliament were originally: (1) Clergy; (2) Barons and Knights; (3) Commons. After various fluctuations the final arrangement was: (1) Lords Spiritual; (2) Lords Temporal; (3) Commons. In France the three estates were: (1) Clergy; (2) Nobles; (3) Commoners (called 'Tiers État').

THIRLWALL, CONNOP (1797-1875), educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, became bishop of St. David's. He published in 1828, with Julius Hare, a translation of Niebuhr's 'Roman History', a vindication of Niebuhr in 1829, and in 1835-47 his principal work, the 'History of Greece', which is generally thought more dispassionate, if less vivid, than Grote's (the two works appeared at about the same time). Thirlwall was buried in Westminster Abbey in the same grave with Grote.

Thirty Tyrants, THE, an Athenian oligarchy of thirty magistrates imposed by Sparta upon the Athenians at the close of the Peloponnesian War (403 B.C.).

Thirty Years War, THE, the religious wars of 1618-48, fought chiefly on German soil, between Catholics and Protestants. It is celebrated for the campaigns of Wallenstein and Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden. It was concluded by the Peace of Westphalia, and left Germany a desert.

Thistlewood, ARTHUR (1770-1820), the promoter of the Cato Street Conspiracy (q.v., 1820). He had developed revolutionary sympathies as a result of reading Paine's works and of visits to France and America. He organized a mutiny in 1816, and was imprisoned in 1818 for sending a challenge to Lord Sidmouth. After the Cato Street Conspiracy he was convicted of high treason and hanged.

death still stands near Madras. The ancient churches of Southern India are often known as 'Christians of St. Thomas'.

Thomas à Becket, St. (1118?-70), son of Gilbert Becket, of a Norman family of knights, was educated in London and Paris and subsequently studied canon law at Bologna and Auxerre. Henry II appointed him Chancellor, and made him his intimate friend and companion. In 1162 Thomas reluctantly became archbishop of Canterbury, and thereafter opposed the king's measures against the excessive privileges of the Church. As a result of a prolonged and bitter struggle, he was driven into exile and resided on the Continent for seven years. He then returned to England, a reconciliation with the king having been effected. But the peace between them was of short duration, and the king in a passion made use of hasty words which led four knights to start for Canterbury and slay the prelate, who met his death with splendid courage in his own cathedral on 29 Dec. 1170. His shrine became the most famous in Christendom and Henry II did penance at his tomb. Thomas à Becket was canonized in 1173 and his festival is observed on 7 July. He is the subject of dramas by G. Darley, A. Tennyson, and T. S. Eliot (q.v.).

THOMAS A KEMPIS (THOMAS HAMMERLEIN or HAMMERKEN) (1380-1471), born of humble parents at Kempen near Cologne. He became an Augustinian monk and wrote Christian mystical works, among which is probably to be included the famous 'De Imitatione Christi', which has been translated from the Latin into many languages (into English in the middle of the 15th cent.). This work was at one time attributed to Jean Charlier de Gerson, a French theologian. It traces in four books the gradual progress of the soul to Christian perfection, its detachment from the world and its union with God; and obtained wide popularity by its simplicity and sincerity and the universal quality of its religious teaching.

Thomas the Rhymer, see Erceldoune.

Thomist (pron. 'Tomist'), a follower of the scholastic philosopher, Aquinas (q.v.). Cf. Scotist.

THOMPSON, FRANCIS (1859-1907), educated at Ushaw College, studied medicine without success at Owens College, Manchester, and lived a life of ill-health and, for a time, of extreme poverty, from which he was rescued by Alice Meynell (q.v.) and her husband. His first volume of 'Poems' (1893) included his famous 'Hound of Heaven' (describing the poet's flight from God, the pursuit, and the overtaking), which shows the influence of Crashaw (q.v.). This was followed by 'Sister Songs' in 1895, and 'New Poems' in 1897. He contributed literary criticism to the 'Academy' and 'Athenaeum'. His prose work includes 'Health and Holiness' (1905) and an 'Essay on Shelley' (1909).

THOMSON

THOMS, WILLIAM JOHN (1803-85), author and editor of a number of works of antiquarian interest including 'The Book of the Court' (1838) and an edition of 'Reynard the Fox' (1844). He was secretary to the Camden Society, 1838-73, and clerk, and subsequently deputy-librarian, to the House of Lords. He started 'Notes and Queries' (q.v.) in 1849.

THOMSON, JAMES (1700-48), born at Ednam on the Scottish border, the son of a minister, was educated at Edinburgh University. He began early to write verse that showed his fondness for rustic scenes. He came to London in 1725 and under stress of poverty wrote 'Winter', the first of his 'Seasons' (q.v.), which appeared successively in 1726-30. He made the acquaintance of Arbuthnot, Gay, and Pope, found patrons, and eventually, through the influence of Lord Lyttelton, received a sinecure. He travelled in France and Italy as tutor to Charles Richard Talbot, son of the solicitor-general, and in 1734-6 published his long poem 'Liberty', in which Liberty herself narrates the vicissitudes of her progress through the ages in Greece, Rome, and Britain. He produced a series of tragedies, 'Sophonisba' (q.v., 1730), 'Agamemnon' (1738), 'Edward and Eleanor' (1739, of which the plot has some points of resemblance to that of Scott's 'The Talisman'); 'Tancred and Sigismunda' (q.v., published in 1745), and 'Coriolanus', (1749) were produced after his death. In 1740 was performed the masque of 'Alfred' by Thomson and David Mallet (q.v.) containing 'Rule, Britannia', which was probably written by the former. Thomson published in 1748 'The Castle of Indolence' (q.v.). This contains a portrait of himself as an inmate of the castle ('A bard here dwelt'), contributed by Lord Lyttelton (the first line by Armstrong). Thomson was buried in Richmond church. His 'Seasons' first challenged the artificiality of English poetry, and inaugurated a new era by their sentiment for nature.

THOMSON, JAMES (1834-82), the child of poor parents, was educated at the Royal Caledonian Asylum, and became an army schoolmaster, but was discharged for a breach of discipline in 1862. He made friends with Charles Bradlaugh (q.v.), wrote for the 'National Reformer', and took an active part in the propaganda of free thought. He lived a sad and isolated life in London, aggravated by insomnia and addiction to drink, and died in University College Hospital. His chief poem, 'The City of Dreadful Night', a powerful and sincere expression of an atheistic and despairing creed, was contributed to the 'National Reformer' in 1874. It was republished with other poems in 1880. 'Vane's Story and other Poems' appeared in 1881. These collections show that Thomson could also write in other and happier moods, though he reverts to gloom and terror in 'Insomnia' (1882). His prose papers are collected in 'Satires and Profanities', posthumously published (1884). He wrote under the initials B. V. (for Bysshe Vanolis).

THOMSON, SIR WILLIAM, first Baron Kelvin (1824-1907), was educated at Glasgow University, where he became professor of natural philosophy, and at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he was second wrangler and a famous sculler. He advanced the science of thermodynamics and electricity, and evolved the theory of electric oscillations, which forms the basis of wireless telegraphy. He succeeded in laying a transatlantic cable in 1866, improved the system of electrical units, and invented much useful scientific apparatus. His 'Mathematical and Physical Papers' were published in 1882-1911, and his Life by Prof. Silvanus P. Thompson in 1910.

Thor, in northern mythology, the god of thunder, son of Odin (q.v.), and one of the three great gods (Odin, Thor, and Frigga) of the Scandinavians. He was the god of the home, and presided over the weather and crops. He married Sif, a peasant woman, typifying the earth; his hammer was called 'Mjölnir', typifying thunder. His name is perpetuated in our 'Thursday'.

THOREAU, HENRY DAVID (1817-62), born at Concord, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, devoted himself to a literary life, supporting himself by surveying, carpentering, and engineering. He was a friend of Emerson (q.v.) and an ascetic, a revolutionary, and something of a wild man. He rebelled against the Puritanism of New England, and against the State in the matter of slavery, refusing to pay his poll-tax, and going to prison in consequence. He also rebelled against society, and built himself a solitary hut on the shore of the Walden pond, where he lived on an expenditure of a few dollars for two and a half years. He was an ardent lover and observer of nature, and his 'Walden, or Life in the Woods' (1854), his best-known work, is admirable chiefly for his descriptions of natural phenomena. His other works include 'A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers' (1849), 'Excursions in Field and Forest' (with a memoir by Emerson, 1863), 'The Maine Woods' (1864), and 'Cape Cod' (1865).

Thornberry, JOB, in 'John Bull' by Colman (q.v.) the younger, an honest, kindly English tradesman, supposed to typify the national character.

Thorndyke, DR., in the detective stories of Richard Austin Freeman (1862-1943), 'a barrister and doctor of medicine', 'probably the greatest criminal lawyer of our time' and 'the leading authority on poisons and crimes connected with them' ('As a Thief in the Night'). His companion and foil is Dr. Jervis; his laboratory assistant, Polton.

Thorpe, JOHN and ISABELLA, characters in Jane Austen's 'Northanger Abbey' (q.v.).

Thoth, an ancient Egyptian god, identified by the Greeks with their Hermes. He was the god of wisdom and science, the inventor of speech and letters, represented as a human figure with the head of an ibis.

Thousand and One Nights, The, the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.).

THRALE, HESTER LYNCH, MRS. (1741-1821), the friend of Dr. Johnson, was the only child of John Salusbury of Bachycraig, Flintshire, and was married against her inclinations to Henry Thrale, the son of a wealthy brewer. Her intimacy with Dr. Johnson became famous, Johnson at one time being almost domesticated at Thrale's house at Streatham Park. After Thrale's death she married Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian Roman Catholic musician. In 1786 she published her 'Anecdotes of the late Samuel Johnson', which give a lively picture of the Doctor, and in 1788 her correspondence with him.

Thraso, a braggart soldier in Terence's 'Eunuchus'.

Threadneedle Street, THE OLD LADY OF, a familiar expression, dating from the 18th cent., for the Bank of England, which stands in that street. The name of the street appears in Stow's 'Survey' (1598) as 'Three needle Street' ('beginning at the Well with two buckets'). Its origin is uncertain. Loftie ('History of London') says that the guild of the tailors seems 'to have had a hall in Cordwainers ward, and then to have bought the ground on which Merchant Taylors'

Three Clerks, The, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.) published in 1858, which gives some glimpses of the author's youth.

The story is concerned with the careers of three government clerks: Harry Norman, a steady, hard-working fellow, the cleverer but unprincipled Alaric Tudor, and the latter's cousin, Charley, a weak but good-hearted youth; and the three daughters, Gertrude, Linda, and Katie, of Mrs. Woodward, a cousin of Norman. The latter falls in love with Gertrude, but she marries Alaric Tudor, whom Norman has introduced to the Woodward family. Not only does Alaric thus defeat Norman's hopes, but he rapidly out-distances him in the public service. Presently, however, Alaric falls into the hands of the Hon. Undecimus Scott, an unscrupulous adventurer, who induces him first to accept a bribe offered him in virtue of his official political position, then to speculate in shares, and finally to appropriate funds of which he is trustee. The inevitable catastrophe follows. Alaric is tried and found guilty of misappropriation and sentenced to imprisonment. Norman consoles himself with Linda, and unexpectedly comes into the family property. Charley, the course of whose love has been impeded by his debts and general unsatisfactoriness as a suitor, reforms, becomes a steady official and a successful author, and marries the gentle Katie. Mr. Chaffanbrass, Alaric's counsel in his trial, is a well-drawn type of bullying cross-examiner.

Three Men in a Boat, see Jerome (Jerome K.).

Three Musketeers, The ('Les Trois Mousquetaires'), one of the most popular of the romances of Dumas (q.v.) the elder, published in 1844.

With its sequels 'Twenty Years After' and 'The Vicomte de Bragelonne' it deals with the life of a poor Gascon gentleman, d'Artagnan, who comes to Paris in the reign of Louis XIII to join the king's musketeers, gets involved in duels with three valiant members of that force, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, and thereafter becomes their friend and shares their fortunes and their many heroic adventures. 'The Three Musketeers' is more particularly concerned with the love of Anne of Austria and Buckingham, and the life of Miladi at whose instigation Felton stabs the Duke.

The original d'Artagnan was a Gascon gentleman born c. 1611 and killed at the siege of Maestricht as captain of the king's musketeers.

Three Weeks after Marriage, a comedy by Murphy (q.v.), produced in 1764. The subject is the disillusionment of Mr. Drugget, a rich retired tradesman, who has married his eldest daughter to Sir Charles Rackett, and proposes to marry his second daughter, Nancy, to another penniless man of fashion, Lovelace, in spite of the fact that she is in love with Woodley, a rival suitor. The result of his experience with the recently wedded couple is to make him abjure all dealings with men of fashion.

Thresher, A, a member of an Irish political organization instituted in 1806 and directed against the Orangemen (q.v.), which issued manifestoes signed 'Captain Thresher'.

Through the Looking-Glass, a book for children by Lewis Carroll (see Dodgson), published in 1872.

Alice (see Alice's Adventures in Wonderland) walks in a dream through the looking-glass into Looking-Glass House, where she finds that the chessmen, particularly the red and white queens, are alive; meets with Tweedledum and Tweedledee and Humpty-Dumpty; and so forth. The story ends with Alice, who has the red queen in her arms, 'shaking her into a kitten' (for she had gone to sleep playing with the black and white kittens). The well-known verses about the Jabberwock, and the Walrus and the Carpenter, occur in the course of the story.

THUCYDIDES, the great Athenian historian, was born about 460 B.C. and died in about the end of the 5th cent. Owing to failure as a naval commander in 424, he went into exile for twenty years and spent much time in the Peloponnese. His history, which deals with the great war between Athens and Sparta down to the year 411 B.C., is concise sometimes to the point of obscurity, but is marked by scrupulous accuracy and also by a gift for expressing the sadness of a tragic story. It is noteworthy, moreover, as the first work of the kind in which events are traced to their cause and their political lessons brought out. Jowett's translation of it was published in 1881.

Thulë, an island in the northern seas, first mentioned by Pytheas, a Greek navigator of the 4th cent. B.C., where the day and night each lasted for six months, and the sea was thick and impenetrable to rowers. It may have been Iceland, or Norway, or the Shetlands. ULTIMA THULE, 'farthest Thule', is used figuratively for the uttermost point attainable.

Thumb, Tom, see Tom Thumb.

Thunderer, The, a nickname given to 'The Times' newspaper in the middle of the 19th cent., in allusion to the style of writing of Edward Sterling (1773-1847), a member of its staff, and father of John Sterling (q.v.). Trollope similarly alludes in some of his novels to 'The Times' as 'The Jupiter' (from Jupiter Tonans).

Thurio, a character in Shakespeare's 'Two Gentlemen of Verona' (q.v.).

Thus spake Zarathustra, see Nietzsche.

Thwackum, in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.), the tutor of Tom and Blifil, a divine with a reputation for learning, religion, and sobriety of manners, but in fact a narrow-minded pedant.

Thyestes, see Atreus. Thyestes was the subject of a play by Crowne (q.v.).

Thyrsis, A Monody, to commemorate the author's friend, Arthur Hugh Clough, who died at Florence 1861, by M. Arnold (q.v.), published in 1867.

The poem, pastoral in form, and containing frequent reference to 'The Scholar-Gipsy' (q.v.), combines a lament for the dead friend with an exquisite description of the Oxford country, similar to that found in the earlier poem.

Thyrus, a staff or spear tipped with a pinecone, and sometimes wreathed with ivy or vine branches, carried by Dionysus (Bacchus) and his votaries.

Tib's Eve, ST., a remote date, perhaps never (cf. 'Greek calends'). 'Saint Tibb's evening, the evening of the last day or day of judgement; he will pay you on St. Tibb's eve (Irish)', Grose, 'Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue' (1785). Tib is perhaps a shortened form of Isabel. A St. Tibba is mentioned in the late Peterborough recension of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, under the year 963.

Tibbs, BEAU, see Beau Tibbs.

Tibert, the cat in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.). The name is the same as Tybalt (see the dialogue between Mercutio and Tybalt in Shakespeare, 'Romeo and Juliet', III. i).

TIBULLUS, ALBIUS (c. 60–19 B.C.), a Roman poet, a contemporary of Virgil and Horace. Of the three books of elegies that bear his name, only two were published in his lifetime. The third, published posthumously, includes pieces by other hands. His poems are marked by quiet charm and tenderness, and their theme is love, peace, and rural simplicity.

Tichborne Case, THE: Roger Charles Tichborne (1829–54), heir presumptive to the Tichborne estates, sailed from Rio de Janeiro in 1854 in a ship that was lost at sea. Arthur Orton's claim to be Roger Tichborne gave rise to a famous trial, which was decided against the claimant in 1872. Orton was tried for perjury and sentenced to imprisonment.

TICKELL, THOMAS (1686–1740), educated at Queen's College, Oxford, contributed verse to the 'Guardian', 'Spectator', and other publications, and was author of a poem 'On the Prospect of Peace' (1712). He enjoyed the patronage of Addison and is chiefly remembered as having occasioned the quarrel between Pope and Addison by publishing a translation of the first book of the 'Iliad' at the same time as Pope, at Addison's instigation as Pope supposed. He edited Addison's works, publishing in the first volume his celebrated elegy on Addison's death. Tickell was also author of a ballad, 'Colin and Lucy', which was declared by Gray and Goldsmith to be one of the best in the language.

Tickler, TIMOTHY, see Timothy Tickler.

TICKNOR, GEORGE (1791–1871), professor of Belles Lettres and French and Spanish at Harvard University from 1819 to 1835. He travelled extensively in Europe and is remembered for his 'History of Spanish Literature' (1849).

Tiger, THE, a nickname of Georges Clemenceau (1841–1929), the French Prime Minister during the latter part of the war of 1914–18 and the peace negotiations that followed it.

Tiger! Tiger! burning bright, see Blake.

Tigg, MONTAGUE, a character in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.).

Tilburina, the heroine of Mr. Puff's tragedy 'The Spanish Armada' in Sheridan's 'The Critic' (q.v.). It is she who observes that even an oyster may be crossed in love.

Tilde, the diacritic mark ~ placed in Spanish above the letter n to indicate the palatalized sound (nʲ), as in señor (senʲor).

Till Eulenspiegel, see Eulenspiegel.

Tillietudlem, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), the castle of Lady Margaret Bellenden.

Tillotson, JOHN (1630–94), educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, a 'latitudinarian' who became archbishop of Canterbury. His sermons, marked by lucidity of style, were very popular, and earned the approval of Dryden.

Tilney, GENERAL, and his sons and daughter, characters in Jane Austen's 'Northanger Abbey' (q.v.).

Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matters, by Jonson (q.v.), printed in the folio of 1640, a collection of notes, extracts, and reflections on miscellaneous subjects, made in the course of the author's wide reading, varying in length from a single sentence to short essays. They are, for the greater part, adapted from Latin writers.

Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne, twenty-five letters by Ruskin (q.v.) on the laws of work, addressed to a working man of Sunderland, published in 1867. They are in effect essays on social reconstruction, expressions of Ruskin's aspirations for a happier world and the disappearance of luxury and poverty, greed and suffering.

Times, The, was founded under the name of 'The Daily Universal Register' on 1 Jan. 1785 by John Walter, the name being changed to 'The Times' in 1788. The founder and his son, also named John Walter, introduced great improvements both in the mechanism of newspaper printing and in the collection of intelligence. Among the famous editors of 'The Times' have been Thomas Barnes (1817-41) and John Thaddeus Delane (1841-77). The latter was followed by Thomas Chinnery, and in 1884 by G. E. Buckle. 'The Times' was one of the first papers to employ special foreign correspondents (Henry Crabb Robinson, q.v., was sent out to North Germany in this capacity in 1807) and war correspondents (W. H. Russell, q.v., in the Crimea). Among notable men of letters who contributed to 'The Times' in early days were George Borrow (from Spain), Leigh Hunt, and Disraeli ('Runnymede Letters').

Times Literary Supplement, The, was first published on 17 Jan. 1902 under the editorship of Mr. (now Sir) Bruce Richmond, and has since then appeared weekly. It is important among English literary periodicals by reason of its articles and reviews, of the correspondence on bibliographical and other subjects that appears in its columns, and of its record of current literary publications.

Timias, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', Prince Arthur's squire, represents Sir Walter Raleigh. When wounded (III. v), he is healed by Belpheobe (q.v.). The incident of Timias and Amoret (q.v.), in IV. vii. 35 and 36, refers to Raleigh's relations with Elizabeth Throgmorton (see Raleigh).

Timmins, FITZROY, in Thackeray's 'A Little Dinner at Timmins's' (1848), an easy-going barrister, induced by his wife, Rosa, to give a dinner-party beyond their means.

Timoleon (d. 336 B.C.), a Corinthian noble who liberated Syracuse and the other Sicilian cities from their tyrants. It is said that when his brother Timophanes aspired to become tyrant of his own city, Timoleon endeavoured to dissuade him, and, failing in this, stood by while two of his friends stabbed him to death; an incident referred to by Thomson in his 'Seasons' ('Winter'). Timoleon is also the subject of a tragedy (1730) by Benjamin Martyn, 'not to be despised' (Prof. Elton).

Timon, a misanthropical citizen of Athens who lived about the time of the Peloponnesian War, the subject (1) of one of Lucian's finest Dialogues; (2) of Shakespeare's 'Timon of Athens' (q.v.).

Pope's Timon, in 'Moral Epistles', iv. 98 et seq., an example of ostentatious wealth without sense or taste, was perhaps drawn from the duke of Chandos.

Timon of Athens, a drama by Shakespeare (q.v.) written probably about 1607, perhaps left unfinished or written in collaboration with another dramatist; not printed until the first folio.

The material of the play is in Plutarch's 'Antony', Lucian's 'Misanthropos', and an anonymous play 'Timon' in the Dyce MS. Timon, a rich and noble Athenian of good and gracious nature, having ruined himself by his prodigal liberality to friends, flatterers, and parasites, turns to the richest of his friends for assistance in his difficulties, and is denied it and deserted by all who had previously frequented him. He surprises these by inviting them once more to a banquet; but when the covers are removed from the dishes (Timon crying, 'Uncover, dogs, and lap!'), they are found to contain warm water, which with imprecations he throws in his guests' faces. Cursing the city, he betakes himself to a cave, where he lives solitary and misanthropical. While digging for roots he finds a hoard of gold, which has now no value for him. His embittered spirit is manifested in his talk with the exiled Alcibiades, the churlish philosopher Apemantus, the thieves and flatterers attracted by the gold, and his faithful steward Flavius. When the senators of Athens, hard pressed by the attack of Alcibiades, come to entreat him to return to the city and help them, he offers them his fig-tree, on which to hang themselves as a refuge from affliction. Soon his tomb is found by the sea-shore, with an epitaph expressing his hatred of mankind.

TIMOTHEUS (447-357 B.C.), of Miletus, a celebrated musician and poet, mentioned by Dryden in his 'Alexander's Feast'.

Timothy, the tortoise of Gilbert White (q.v.). See in particular his letter to Hester Mulso (afterwards Mrs. Chapone), 31 Aug. 1784, besides various references in his 'Selborne'.

Timothy and Titus, companions of the apostle Paul, to whom the Pastoral Epistles in the N.T. are addressed. It is held by some that these epistles were by an author who, 'believing himself to be in accord with St. Paul's teaching and possessing some remains of his correspondence, expanded such into these letters in order to combat erroneous speculations in the church. . . . He probably lived at a time when ecclesiastical organization was growing in importance. Timothy and Titus are thus representative figures, standing for those whom the writer wished to admonish and instruct' (G. W. Wade, 'New Testament History').

Timothy Tickler, in the 'Noctes Ambrosianae' (q.v.), was Robert Sym (1750-1844), writer to the signet, uncle to John Wilson (1785-1854, q.v.).

Timur or Timur-Leng ('Timur the Lame'), corrupted to Tamerlane or Tamberlane (d. 1405), said to have been a descendant in the female line from Genghis Khan (q.v.), established himself in Samarkand and extended his rule by terror and desolation over parts of Turkestan, Siberia, Persia, and India, assuming the title of the Great Khan. He captured Delhi and founded the Mogul dynasty in India.

Tina Sastri, a character in George Eliot's 'Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story' (see Scenes of Clerical Life).

TINDAL, WILLIAM (d. 1536), see Tyn-dale.

TINTA'GEL

Tinta'gel, a castle on the north coast of Cornwall, of which ruins remain. It figures in Malory's 'Morte Darthur' as the castle where Uther Pendragon (q.v.) was wedded to Igraine, and subsequently as the home of King Mark of Cornwall.

Tinto, Dick, in Scott's 'Bride of Lammermoor' and 'St. Ronan's Well' (qq.v.), a poor artist and sign-painter.

Tintoretto, JACOPO ROBUSTI (1518-94), called Tintoretto because his father was a dyer, the celebrated Venetian painter, whose art is glorified by Ruskin in vol. ii of 'Modern Painters' (q.v.). Some of his chief work is in the decoration of the Doge's Palace at Venice.

Tiphys, the pilot of the ship of the Argonauts (q.v.).

Alter erit tum Tiphys et altera quae vchat
Argo
Delectos heroas.

(Virgil, 'Ecl.' iv. 34.)

Tippoo Sahib (1749-99), son of Hyder Ali, and Sultan of Mysore, who was engaged in repeated wars with the British. He figures in Scott's 'The Surgeon's Daughter' (q.v.). He was killed in the gate of his own city, Seringapatam, when it was stormed by General Harris in 1799.

Tiresias or TEIRESIAS, a Theban soothsayer, who was struck with blindness in his youth for reasons variously given, one that he had seen Athene bathing. As some compensation, he was given the power of prophecy, and a staff which guided his footsteps. He advised the Thebans in the wars of the Seven against Thebes and the Epigoni. He lived to a great age. His daughter Manto was also a prophetess. She was captured by the victorious Argives and sent to Delphi as a priestess of Apollo.

The legend of Tiresias is the subject of a poem by T. Woolner (q.v.), and of a dramatic monologue by Lord Tennyson, in which the seer recounts his blinding by Athene:

Henceforth be blind, for thou hast seen too much,
And speak the truth that no man may believe, and laments his impotence for good and the approaching fall of Thebes. Swinburne has a poem on the same subject.

Tironian notes, a system of shorthand in use in ancient Rome, said to have been invented by Tiro, Cicero's freedman.

Tirynthian, an epithet sometimes applied to Hercules, because legend associates him with Tiryns, a city of Argolis, in Greece; though he is also claimed by Thebes.

'Tis Pity She's a Whore, a tragedy by J. Ford (q.v.), published in 1633.

The play deals with the guilty passion of Giovanni and his sister Annabella for each other. Being with child, Annabella marries one of her suitors, Soranzo, who discovers her condition. She refuses to name her lover, though threatened with death by Soranzo. On the advice of Varques, his faithful servant, Soranzo feigns forgiveness, Varques undertaking to discover the truth, which he does. Soranzo invites Annabella's father and the magnificoes of the city, with Giovanni, to a sumptuous feast, intending to execute his vengeance. Although warned of Soranzo's intentions, Giovanni boldly comes. He has a last meeting with Annabella just before the feast, and to forestall Soranzo's vengeance stabs her himself. He then enters the banqueting-room, defiantly tells what he has done, fights with and kills Soranzo, and is himself killed by Varques.

Tisiphōnē, one of the Furies (q.v.).

Titania, in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), the queen of the fairies, and wife of Oberon.

The name is given by Ovid in the 'Metamorphoses' to Latona, Pyrrha, Diana, and Circe, as descendants of the Titans.

Titanic, The, a passenger steamer of the White Star line, the largest ship of her day, sunk on 15 Apr. 1912, on her maiden voyage from Southampton to New York, owing to collision with an iceberg, with the loss of over 1,500 lives.

Titans, THE, sons and daughters of Uranus and Gē (qq.v.). They included Cronos (Saturn), Rhea, Oceanus, Tethys, and Hyperion. The legend says that Uranus had thrown his elder sons (Briareus, Cottys, and Gyes, the hundred-handed ones, and the Cyclopes) into Tartarus, and that Gē incited the Titans to rise against him. This they did, deposed Uranus, and raised Cronos to the throne. Subsequently Zeus (q.v.) revolted in turn against Cronos and the other Titans, and with the help of thunder and lightning hurled them from heaven. (This contest is sometimes confused by the poets with the rising of the Giants (q.v.) against Zeus and the later gods.)

Tithōnus, a son of Laomedon, king of Troy. He was so beautiful that Aurora (q.v.) became enamoured of him. The goddess granted him immortality at his request; but he omitted to ask at the same time for perpetual youth, and soon became old and decrepit. ('Longa Tithonum minuit senectus', Horace, 'Od.', II. xvi). As life became insupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from this world, and she changed him into a grasshopper.

Tennyson presents him, in a dramatic monologue, lamenting his unhappy fate.

Titian, the name by which Tiziano Vecelli (1477-1576), the great painter, is usually known. He was born at Pieve di Cadore in Northern Italy, and was a pupil of Giorgione, the Venetian master. He excelled as a painter of portraits, and of sacred and mythological subjects. Among his masterpieces is the 'Bacchus and Ariadne' of the National Gallery.

Titivil or TUTTIVILLUS, a medieval word of unknown origin, the name of a devil said to collect fragments of words dropped, skipped, or mumbled in the recitation of divine service, and to carry them to hell to be registered against the offender. Hence it became a name for a devil in the mystery plays, and hence again it passed into popular speech as a term of reprobation, a scoundrel, villain. 'Tilley-valley, Mr. Lovel—which, by the way, one commentator derives from tittivilium, and another from talley-ho' (Scott, 'The Antiquary', ch. vi).

Titivil was evidently in origin a creation of monastic wit. The earliest mention of the name and function occurs apparently in a Latin sermon attributed to the Dominican Petrus de Palude, a Burgundian student at Paris, who became patriarch of Jerusalem and died in 1343. [OED.]

Titmarsh, MICHAEL ANGELO, see Michael Angelo Titmarsh.

Titmarsh, SAMUEL, the hero of 'Thackeray's 'The Great Hoggarty Diamond' (q.v.).

Tito Melema, a character in G. Eliot's 'Romola' (q.v.).

Titurel, a German romance of the Holy Grail (q.v.) of the 13th cent., of which Wolfram von Eschenbach wrote fragments. According to one version of the Grail legend, the Grail was preserved in heaven until the coming on earth of a race of heroes fitted to be its guardians. The chief of this race was Perillus or Parille of Cappadocia. Titurel is the son of Titurison and Eligabel, and grandson of Parille. Angels announce that he is to be the defender of the Grail, and he is conducted to Mount Salvagge (Montsalvatsch), where he builds a chapel and organizes a band of defenders for the holy vessel. He marries Richonde of Spain, and is great-grandfather of Parzival.

Titus Andronicus, a tragedy attributed to Shakespeare (q.v.), acted and printed in 1594. The extent of Shakespeare's share in the authorship is uncertain.

It deals with the revenge exacted by Titus Andronicus, a Roman general under the Empire, for the revolting atrocities committed against Lavinia his daughter, his sons, and himself, and for the murder of his daughter's lover, by Tamora the captive queen of the Goths, her sons, and her paramour, Aaron the Moor. ('Andronicus' in the play is accentuated on the second syllable; in Latin it is 'Andronicus'.)

TITUS LIVIUS FOROJULIENSIS, an Italian in the service of Duke Humphrey of Gloucester, who wrote, about 1440, a chronicle of the reign of Henry V.

For TITUS LIVIUS, the Roman historian, see Livy.

Tityre-tu or TITTYRY, one of an association of well-to-do roughs who infested the London streets in the 17th cent. The name is taken from the first words of Virgil's first Eclogue, 'Tityre, tu patulae recubans sub tegmine fagi.'

Tityus, a giant of Greek mythology, who attempted to do violence to Leto (Latona), but was killed by the arrows of Apollo and Artemis, her children. He was placed in Hades, where a serpent (or vultures) continually devoured his liver.

Tiu, Trw, TYR, an ancient Teutonic deity, a war-god identified with the Roman Mars. In Norse legend Tyr is the son of the giant Hymir, and helps the gods to fetter the Fenris-wolf (q.v.), losing his hand in doing so. Tiu is commemorated in our 'Tuesday'.

Tobit, The Book of, a romance of the Jewish captivity, forming part of the Apocrypha. Tobit, a Jew who has been carried captive to Nineveh, is deprived of his property by Sennacherib, and in his distress bethinks him of ten talents of silver he has left in deposit at Rages in Media. He sends his son Tobias to fetch them. The angel Raphael, in the guise of a fellow countryman, accompanies the young man. They catch a fish in the Tigris, and by burning its heart and liver drive off the evil spirit Asmodeus, who has destroyed the seven successive bridegrooms of Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, Tobit's kinsman. Tobias marries Sarah and acquires half Raguel's goods. The gall of the fish serves to remove the blindness with which Tobit is afflicted. The angel also recovers Tobit's deposit. He then reveals himself and exhorts Tobit and Tobias to bless God for his mercies. The dog in Tobit, which accompanies Raphael and Tobias, is probably the eponym of 'Dog Toby' of 'Punch and Judy'.

Toboso, DULCINEA DEL, see Dulcinea del Toboso.

Toby, the dog in the puppet-show drama of 'Punch and Judy' (q.v.). See also Tobit.

Toby, MY UNCLE, Captain Shandy, uncle of the nominal hero of Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.).

Toby ('Trotty') Veck, a character in Dickens's 'The Chimes' (q.v.).

TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE (1805-59), French writer on political history, was author of the famous 'La Démocratie en Amérique' (1835-9) and of 'L'Ancien Régime et la Révolution' (1850).

Todgers, MRS., in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), mistress of a boarding-house.

Toffana or TOFANA, AQUA, see Aqua Toffana.

Toga, in Roman antiquity, the white outer garment of a Roman citizen in time of peace. The toga praetexta, with a broad purple border, was worn by children, magistrates, persons engaged in sacred rites, and later by emperors. The toga virilis was the toga of manhood, as opposed to the preceding, and was white throughout; the term is hence used figuratively: 'During this period Mr. Clive assumed the toga virilis' (Thackeray, 'The Newcomes', xvii).

Tokay, a rich sweet aromatic wine made near Tokay in northern Hungary (not a real wine, 'a prince of liqueurs', Saintsbury calls it). The best was from a vineyard belonging to the Austrian emperors ('Imperial Tokay'). Swift, dining in 1710 at Stratford's in the City, 'had Burgundy and Tokay' ('Journal to Stella'). It is said to have unrivalled properties as a tonic.

Tolbooth, originally a booth or stall where customs were collected, came to mean a town hall or town prison (formerly consisting of cells under the town hall). The Tolbooth at Edinburgh figures prominently in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.).

Toledo, a city in Spain, long famous for its manufacture of finely tempered sword-blades. Hence a sword made at Toledo.

Toletan Tables, see Alphonsine Tables.

TOLLER, ERNST (1893-), German revolutionary poet and dramatist, author of (according to their English titles) 'The Machine Wreckers' (1923), 'Masses and Man' (1923), 'The Swallow Book' (1924).

Tolōsa, GOLD OF, gold plundered by the Roman consul, Quintus Servilius Caepio, in 105 B.C. from sacred deposits at Tolosa (now Toulouse), a town which had revolted to the Cimbri. Shortly afterwards Quintus Servilius was defeated by the Cimbri and lost, it is said, 80,000 men, a disaster that was regarded as a punishment for his sacrilege. The phrase is used to signify ill-gotten gains.

TOLPUDDLE MARTYRS. The outburst of trade-unionism which occurred in 1833-4, in great measure under the inspiration of the reformer Robert Owen (1771-1858), was met by the Government with a series of prosecutions. These culminated in the trial of six Dorsetshire labourers, natives of Tolpuddle, who had sought to obtain by combination an increase of their wages (then seven shillings a week). They were charged with the offence of taking an oath to their trade union and sentenced to seven years' transportation in 1834. In spite of widespread protests, it was not till 1836 that the men were pardoned and brought back from Australia.

TOLSTOY, COUNT LEO NIKOLAEVICH (1828-1910), Russian writer. He was of noble birth and heir to large estates, but his intense sincerity of thought gradually led him to abandon his normal career. He arrived eventually at intellectual conclusions which involved non-resistance to evil, the abolition of governments and nationality, of churches and dogmas, but involved also belief in God and love of men. He made attempts, more or less successful, to renounce his own property. His chief importance rose from his amazing power, which entered into his books, whether they were discussions, novels, plays, or exhortations. This power raised him to a point of reputation and greatness in his own lifetime such that the Imperial Government did not dare to interfere with him, though his writings were, of course, censored. It spread his influence far beyond Russia, and made him something like a prophet to many minds in the West. His chief novels are: 'War and Peace' (1865-72, an epic tale of the Napoleonic invasion), 'Anna Karenina' (1875-6), 'The Death of Ivan Ilyitch' (1884), 'The Kreutzer Sonata' (1890), 'Resurrection' (1899).

Of his other books, 'What is Art?' (1898) is a profound analysis of the nature of art, 'in which', Bernard Shaw has said, 'we hear the voice of the master'; 'Confession' (1882) is an autobiographical description of the great spiritual crisis of his life; 'What then must we do?' (1886) is a study of economic conditions. Besides these, there are essays and short stories, all full of the same power and intensity, and the plays, of which 'The Power of Darkness' (1886) is the greatest.

The union of a great moral conviction and realistic details, and an immense imaginative vision, combine to make him one of the great European writers.

Tom's, a coffee-house famous in the 18th cent., named from Thomas West, its landlord. It was situated in Russell Street, Covent Garden, and was frequented by the best company after the play.

There was another 'Tom's Coffee-house' in Birch Lane, Cornhill.

Tom and Jerry, names of the two chief characters in Egan's 'Life in London' (see Egan); hence used in various allusive senses, e.g. of riotous behaviour.

Tom a Lincoln, a romance by R. Johnson (q.v.), the author of 'The Seven Champions of Christendom'. Tom a Lincoln is the son of King Arthur and Angelica, daughter of the earl of London, and is born in a monastery at Lincoln. He becomes a knight of the Round Table, conquers the Portingales, visits Fairyland, marries Anglitora, the daughter of Prester John, but is overtaken by misfortune and murdered.

Tom Brown's Schooldays, see Hughes.

Tom Cringle's Log, see Scott (M., 1739-1835).

Tom Follo, see Rawlinson (T.).

Tom Fool, a quasi-proper name applied to a man mentally deficient, or to one who acts the part of a fool in a drama, a buffoon. 'More know Tom Fool than Tom Fool knows' (proverb).

Tom Hickathrift or HICKIFRIC, according to an old popular romance, was the son of a labourer in the Isle of Ely before the Norman Conquest. He was endowed with such prodigious strength that he was able to kill a giant with the axle-tree and wheel of a wagon, and, with the help of Henry Nonsuch, an equally stout tinker, to suppress an insurrection in the Isle of Ely; for which exploit he was knighted by the king.

Tom Jones, a Foundling, a novel by H. Fielding (q.v.), published in 1749, consisting of eighteen 'books', each preceded by an introductory chapter in the nature of an essay on some theme more or less connected with the story, in the manner subsequently adopted by Thackeray and George Eliot. These essays contain some of Fielding's best prose.

The plot of this, which is generally regarded as Fielding's greatest work, is briefly as follows. Tom Jones is a foundling, mysteriously discovered one night in the bed of the wealthy, virtuous, and benevolent Mr. Allworthy, who gives him a home and educates him, but presently repudiates him. The causes which lead to Tom's dismissal are several. In the first place Tom, a generous and manly, but too human, youth, has incurred his benefactor's displeasure by his amour with Molly Seagrim, the keeper's daughter. Then he has fallen in love with the beautiful Sophia (daughter of the bluff irascible foxhunter, Squire Western), who is destined for another. He has incurred the enmity of his tutor, the pedantic divine, Thwackum, and, in a less degree, of his colleague, the hypocritical philosopher, Square. And lastly he is the victim of the cunning misrepresentations of young Blifil, a mean sneak, who expects to marry Sophia himself, and hates Tom. Tom sets out on his travels, accompanied by the schoolmaster, Partridge, a simple lovable creature, and meets with many adventures, some of them of an amorous description, notably that with Lady Bellaston, which has been much criticized. Lady Bellaston falls in love with Tom, who does not show himself recalcitrant, and supports him in London out of her liberality. Meanwhile Sophia, who is in love with Tom and determined to escape from the marriage with Blifil to which her despotic father has condemned her, runs away from home, with Mrs. Honour, her maid, to a relative in London. Here she escapes a wicked design of Lady Bellaston to place her in the power of Lord Fellamar, thanks to the opportune arrival of Squire Western in pursuit of her. Finally Tom is discovered to be the son of Allworthy's sister, the machinations of Blifil are exposed, Sophia forgives Tom his infidelities, and all ends happily.

Tom-noddy, a foolish or stupid person. Noddy, of obscure origin, means a simpleton.

Tom o' Bedlam, a wandering beggar. After the dissolution of the religious houses, where the poor used to be relieved, there was for long no settled provision for them. In consequence they wandered over the country, many assuming disguises calculated to obtain them charity. Among other disguises some affected madness, and were called Bedlam Beggars (so in 'Gammer Gurton's Needle', 'Diccon the Bedlam'). Edgar, in 'King Lear', II. iii, adopts this disguise:

Of Bedlam beggars, who, with roaring voices,

Strike in their numb'd and mortified bare arms

Pins, wooden pricks, nails, sprigs of rosemary.

In Dekker's 'Bellman of London' (1616) 'Tom of Bedlam's band of mad caps' are enumerated among the species of beggars. Some of these Bedlam beggars sang mad songs, examples of which are given in Percy's 'Reliques'. They were also called 'Abraham-men', from the name, it is said (Brewer), of one of the wards in Bedlam.

Tom of Lincoln, 'an extraordinary great bell, hanging in one of the towers of Lincoln Minster' (Ray, quoted by W. C. Hazlitt). See also Tom a Lincoln.

Tom of Oxford, GREAT, the great bell of Christ Church, Oxford; it hangs in TOM TOWER (q.v.), and the great quadrangle of the college, TOM QUAD, is called after it.

Tom Sawyer, a novel by Mark Twain, see Clemens.

Tom Thumb, an old nursery tale, of which there are several Northern versions.

According to the English tale, Tom was the son of a ploughman in the days of King Arthur, and he was as tall as the ploughman's thumb. His diminutive size was the occasion of many absurd adventures, as when he was swallowed by a cow, was carried off by a raven, and was swallowed by Giant Grumbo.

GENERAL TOM THUMB was the name given to Charles Sherwood Stratton (1838-83), an American dwarf exhibited in England by Barnum in 1844 and 1857. Stratton married Lavinia Warren, also a dwarf, in 1863.

Tom Thumb, a Tragedy, a burlesque of contemporary playwrights by H. Fielding (q.v.), first acted in 1730; reissued, enlarged, in 1731 as 'The Tragedy of Tragedies; or the Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great'.

Tom Tiddler's Ground or TOM TITTLER'S GROUND, the name of a children's game, in which one of the players is Tom Tiddler, his territory being marked by a line drawn across the ground; over this the other players run, crying, 'Here we're on Tom Tiddler's ground, picking up gold and silver.' They are chased by Tom Tiddler, and the player caught takes his place. 'Tom Tiddler's Ground' is used for a 'debatable territory, a no man's land between two states' (Slang Dictionary).

Tom Tiler or TYLER, a hen-pecked husband (the ἀνεπηγμένος of a line in an epigram by the Rev. W. W. Merry, Τὴν ἀνεπηγμένον καὶ τὸν ἀνεπηγμένον).

Tom Tower, over the gate of Christ Church quad, in Oxford, was built by Wren.

TOMKIS

TOMKIS, THOMAS (fl. 1604–15), fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, author of 'Albumazar' (q.v.), a comedy acted before James I, and probably of another comedy, 'Lingua, or the Combat of the Tongue and the five Senses for Superiority' (1607).

Tomkyns, MRS. PONSONBY DE, a type of vulgar parvenue caricatured by Du Maurier (q.v.) in 'Punch'.

TOMLINSON, HENRY MAJOR (1873–), novelist, journalist, and traveller, among whose best-known works are 'The Sea and the Jungle' (1912), 'Old Junk' (1918), 'London River' (1921).

Tommy and Grizel, a novel by Barrie (q.v.), a sequel to his 'Sentimental Tommy', published in 1900, the tragic story of an erratic, inconstant, fascinating genius, and a patient constant woman whose life is blighted by her love for him.

Tommy Atkins, a familiar name for the typical private soldier in the British Army; arising out of the casual use of this name in the specimen forms given in the official Army regulations from 1815 onwards, to show how such forms should be filled up, with the name of the soldier concerned, &c.

TOMPSON, BENJAMIN (1642–1714), American poet, born at Braintree, Massachusetts, author of 'New England's Crisis', written during King Philip's War (q.v.); it denounced the decadence of colonial manners and the degeneration of colonial spirit.

Tōmŷris, queen of the Massāgētae (a tribe which dwelt south of the Jaxartes), by whom Cyrus, who had invaded her territory, was slain in battle in 529 B.C.

Tono-Bungay, see Wells.

Tonson, JACOB (1656–1736), publisher. He purchased the copyright of 'Paradise Lost', and published many works by Dryden and Addison, besides Rowe's 'Shakespeare' and an edition of Beaumont and Fletcher. The six parts of his 'Miscellany', edited by Dryden, and including poems by Pope, Swift, and Ambrose Philips, appeared from 1684 to 1708. He was secretary to the Kit-Cat Club (q.v.). His publishing business was continued by his nephew and great-nephew, who bore the same name as he. Pope (adapting Dryden) mentions Tonson in the 'Dunciad' as 'left-legged Jacob', but his other references to him are more kindly.

Tontine, a financial scheme by which the subscribers to a fund receive each an annuity, which increases as their number is diminished by death, until the last survivor enjoys the whole income; so named from Lorenzo Tonti, a Neapolitan banker who initiated the system in France c. 1653. [OED.]

A tontine forms the basis of R. L. Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne's 'The Wrong Box' (1889), in which the prize comes to lie between two brothers, Joseph and Masterman Finsbury.

TORQUEMADA

Tony Lumpkin, a character in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.).

Toodle, POLLY and ROBIN ('Rob the Grinder'), her son, characters in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.). Polly was Paul Dombey's foster-mother.

TOOKE, JOHN HORNE (1736–1812), the son of a poulterer named Horne, who added the name of his friend William Tooke to his own in 1782. He vigorously supported Wilkes (q.v.) in connexion with the Middlesex election, but subsequently quarrelled with him, the dispute being conducted in the columns of the 'Public Advertiser' (q.v.). He published in 1786 and 1798 'Ensa πρὸς ἑρμηνείαν, or the Diversions of Purley', a philological work emphasizing the necessity of studying Gothic and Anglo-Saxon, which established his reputation as a philologist. He was more than once in conflict with the authorities, was fined and imprisoned for sedition, and was tried for high treason and acquitted.

Tooley Street, see Olaf (St.). See also Tailors of Tooley Street.

Toots, MR., a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.).

Tophet or TOPHETH, a place near Gehenna or the Valley of Hinnom, to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews, according to 2 Kings xxiii. 10 and Jer. xix. 4, made human sacrifices to strange gods. Later it was used as a place for the deposit of rubbish, where bonfires were kept burning, and became symbolic of the torments of hell.

TOPLADY, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE (1740–78), educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Dublin, incumbent of Broad Hembury, is remembered as the author of the hymn 'Rock of Ages', published in the 'Gospel Magazine' in 1775. He engaged in violent controversy with John Wesley.

Topsy, in Mrs. Beecher Stowe's 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' (see under Stowe, Mrs. H. B.), a little slave girl who asserted that she had neither father nor mother, and being asked who made her, replied 'I spect I grow'd'.

Tor, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', the son of King Pellinore and the milkmaid, a knight of the Round Table. See also Torre.

Torah, THE, the teaching or instruction, and judicial decisions, given by the ancient Hebrew priests as a revelation of the divine will; the Mosaic or Jewish law; hence a name for the first five books of the law, the Pentateuch. [OED.]

Torfrida, in C. Kingsley's novel, 'Hereward the Wake' (q.v.), the wife of Hereward.

Torquatus, T. MANLIUS, see Manlius Torquatus.

Torquemada, TOMÁS DE (1420–98), a Spanish Dominican monk, appointed in 1483 the first inquisitor-general by Ferdinand and Isabella. He was famous for the untiring energy with which the work of the Inquisition in Spain was carried on under his direction. Hence his name became a synonym for a cruel persecutor. But Torquemada's code of instructions for the application of torture was relatively moderate. It was twisted and extended by his successors.

Torquill of the Oak, a character in Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

Torre, Sir, in Tennyson's 'Lancelot and Elaine' (q.v.), is son of the Lord of Astolat and one of Elaine's two brothers, the other being Lavaine.

Torregiano or TORRICIANI, PIERO (1472-1522), the Florentine sculptor who, as he himself recounted to Benvenuto Cellini, broke Michelangelo's nose. He came to England about 1503, where, besides other works, he made the tomb of Henry VII in Westminster Abbey. He is said to have ended his life in a prison at Seville, having starved himself to death. He had, according to the story, smashed to pieces a statue of the Madonna for which he had not received the stipulated payment, and had been imprisoned by the Inquisition for sacrilege.

TORRENS, WILLIAM McCULLAGH (1813-94), a successful barrister, M.P. for several constituencies (first in 1847), was author of a good life of Melbourne (1878), and lives of R. L. Sheil (1855), Sir James Graham (1863), and Lord Wellesley (1880), besides some notable works on political subjects ('Industrial History of Free Nations', 1846; 'Twenty Years in Parliament', 1893).

Torres Vedras, LINES OF, three lines of earthworks constructed by Wellington across the peninsula that lies between the Tagus and the sea. They were defended by him against Masséna in 1810-11 with English and Portuguese troops, leaving the French armies to exist in a country that had been entirely stripped of food.

Torricelli (1608-47), an Italian physicist, who by the Torricellian Experiment proved in 1643 that the column of mercury in an inverted closed tube is supported by the pressure of the atmosphere. TORRICELLIAN TUBE was an early name for the mercurial barometer.

Tory, from an Irish word meaning 'pursuer', was a name applied in the 17th cent. to the dispossessed Irish, who became outlaws, subsisting by killing and plundering the English settlers and soldiers. In 1679-80 it was applied as a nickname by the Exclusionists to those who opposed the exclusion of the Roman Catholic James, duke of York, from the succession to the Crown. Hence, from 1689, it became the name of one of the two great political parties in England, that which sprang from the 17th-cent. Royalists or Cavaliers, whose members were more or less identical with the Anti-Exclusionists mentioned above. For some years after 1689 the Tories leant more or less decidedly towards the dethroned House of Stuart. But from the accession of George III they abandoned this attitude, retaining the principle of strenuously upholding the constituted authority and order in Church and State, and of opposing concessions in the direction of greater religious liberty. Opposition to the growing demands of Liberalism, a consistent antagonism to measures for widening the basis of parliamentary representation, &c., became their most marked characteristic. But this has in course of time undergone many modifications. As a formal name 'Tory' was superseded by 'Conservative' about 1830, a term introduced by Croker. [OED.]

Toscar, in the Ossianic poems, the father of Malvina, betrothed to Oscar the son of Ossian.

TOTTEL, RICHARD (d. 1594), a publisher who carried on business at 'The Hand and Star' within Temple Bar from 1553 to 1594, is chiefly known as the compiler (with Grimald, q.v.) of 'Songs and Sonnets', known as 'Tottel's Miscellany' (1557), comprising the chief works of Wyatt and Surrey (q.v.). He also published, besides law-books, More's 'Dialogue of Comfort' (1553), Lydgate's 'Fall of Princes' (1554), and Surrey's 'Aeneid' (1557).

Slender, in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.), had 'rather than forty shillings' he had Tottel's 'Book of Songs and Sonnets' with him when courting Anne Page; and the grave-digger in 'Hamlet' mumbles a song from the same collection.

Touchett, Mr., Mrs., and RALPH, characters in H. James's 'Portrait of a Lady' (q.v.).

Touchstone, a clown in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.).

Touchwood, LORD, a character in Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.).

Touchwood, Mr. SCROGIE, a character in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.).

Touchwood, SIR GEORGE and LADY FRANCES, characters in Mrs. Cowley's 'The Belle's Stratagem' (q.v.).

TOURGUENIEF, see Turgenev.

TOURNEUR, TURNOUR, or TURNER, CYRIL (1575?-1626), dramatist. Practically nothing is known of his life. Of his two plays (assuming that they are both his, which is contested), 'The Revenger's Tragedy', was published in 1607. It deals with the revenge of Vendice for the murder of his mistress by the licentious duke, and for the attempt of the duke's son, Lussorioso, to seduce Vendice's sister, the chaste Castiza. It is a gloomy work, relieved by the poetic beauty of several passages and the tragic intensity of the plot. 'The Atheist's Tragedy' (q.v.) appeared in 1611. (The dates and order of the two plays, however, are disputed.) 'The Transformed Metamorphosis', published in 1600, is a lament, in allegorical form, on the political conditions of the day, the corruption of the

TOURNEUR

Roman Church, and the dangerous state of Ireland, ending with hope for happier times. Tourneur's 'Plays and Poems' were edited by John Churton Collins in 1878, and by Prof. A. Nicoll in 1930.

Toussaint L'Ouverture (1743-1803), to whom Wordsworth addressed a sonnet, was a negro revolutionist who made himself master of the French colony of San Domingo (Haiti) during the period of the French Revolution. He was overcome by the forces of Buonaparte and transported to France, where he died.

Tower Hill, adjacent to the Tower of London, was probably a site of military importance from pre-Conquest days, and traces of Roman buildings have been found there (Lethaby). According to Stow (1598) a scaffold was erected there for the execution of traitors, and Sir Thomas More, the earl of Surrey (the poet), Strafford, Laud, Algernon Sidney, and many others, perished on Tower Hill.

Tower of London, THE, the ancient fortress-palace of London, an irregular agglomeration of buildings surrounded by wall and moat, standing on the bank of the Thames at the SE. angle of the old walled city. It was constructed by William the Conqueror (who built what is now called the White Tower) and his successors, principally Henry III. The foundation of the White Tower (rebuilt in 1638) overlies that of a 'great and solid bastion' (Lofie) perhaps of Roman construction. The Tower of London has been used as a prison for kings and queens and other eminent persons, captive foreign sovereigns (e.g. John Balliol, nominal king of Scotland), prisoners awaiting trial (e.g. Sir W. Raleigh), and others swiftly destined to the scaffold (e.g. Anne Boleyn). Of the church of St. Peter in the Tower (Ad Vincula), Macaulay wrote: "Thither have been carried through successive ages, by the rude hands of gaolers, without one mourner following, the bleeding relics of men who had been captains of armies, the leaders of parties, the oracles of senates, and the ornaments of courts" ('History of England', ch. v).

For the 'Lions in the Tower' see under Zoological Garden.

Town and Gown, at Oxford and Cambridge, the body of citizens or townsmen on the one hand, and the members of the university on the other. Frequent riots took place between these 'factions' from the 13th to the 19th cents.—in the last period generally on the fifth of November. One of the most considerable of these riots was the 'Great Slaughter' of St. Scholastica's Day (10 Feb.) 1354 at Oxford, for which the mayor and citizens long did annual penance.

Town Mouse and Country Mouse, a fable told by Horace ('Sat.' II. vi) and by La Fontaine (though the latter substitutes rats for mice). The city mouse, contemptuous of the country mouse's cave and humble fare, invites it to a sumptuous supper in its palace. But the feast is disturbed by an alarm, and the mice scurry away. The country mouse concludes that it prefers its wood and cave free from surprises, and its homely tares.

M. Prior (q.v.) was at least part-author of 'The Hind and Panther transvers'd to the tale of the Town Mouse and the Country Mouse'.

Towneley, a character in Sheridan's 'A Trip to Scarborough' (q.v.).

Towneley Mysteries, see Mysteries.

Townly, LORD, 'The Provok'd Husband' in Vanbrugh and Cibber's play of that name (q.v.).

Townshend, CHARLES, second Viscount Townshend (1674-1738), a distinguished statesman of the reign of George I. He carried on at Rainham agricultural experiments which earned him his nickname of 'Turnip Townshend'. Pope ('Imitations of Horace', Ep. II. ii. 273) refers to Townshend's turnips, and in a footnote states that 'that kind of rural improvement which arises from turnips' was 'the favourite subject of Townshend's conversation'.

Tow-wouse, MR. and MRS., characters in H. Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

Toxophilus, see Ascham.

Tractarian Movement, see Oxford Movement.

Tracts for the Times, a series of tracts on religious subjects, of which the principal authors were Newman, Keble, R. H. Froude, and Pusey (qq.v.), published from 1833 to 1841.

They were issued 'with the object of contributing something towards the revival of doctrines which, although held by the great divines of our Church, at present have become obsolete with the majority of her members. . . . The Apostolic succession and the Holy Catholic Church were principles of action in the minds of our predecessors of the 17th century. . . . Nothing but these neglected doctrines faithfully preached . . . will repress the extension of Popery'. The first tract was by Newman, 'Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission, respectfully addressed to the Clergy', and the most famous, 'Tract XC', was also by him. See Oxford Movement.

Traddles, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Tradescant, JOHN (d. 1637?) traveller, naturalist, and gardener, probably author of 'A voiage of ambasad' (1618) describing a voyage under Sir Dudley Digges to Archangel, containing the earliest account extant of Russian plants. From the expedition (1620) against the Algerine pirates he brought back the 'Algier apricot'. He established a physic garden at Lambeth. His son, JOHN TRADESCANT (1608-62), was likewise a traveller and gardener. He published

TRADESCANT

'Museum Tradescantianum' in 1656, and gave his collection to Elias Ashmole, who presented it to the University of Oxford. Both this Tradescant and his father held the appointment of gardener to Charles I.

Trafalgar (Trafalgär', usually pron. Trafal'gar), BATTLE OF, fought on 21 Oct. 1805. Nelson had 27 ships of the line and 4 frigates; the French and Spanish fleets, under Villeneuve, numbered 33 ships of the line and 5 frigates. The British fleet attacked in two lines towards the centre of the enemy so as to break his line in two. The enemy fleet was almost entirely captured or destroyed, but, owing to the stormy weather that followed, only four of their ships were brought into harbour. Nelson was killed in the course of the battle. Villeneuve was taken prisoner, was soon exchanged and repatriated, but committed suicide at Rennes shortly after his landing in France.

Trafalgar Square, London, where formerly were the Royal Mews (q.v.) and 'The Bermudas' (q.v.), was laid out in 1829 and the following years, and finished according to plans prepared by Sir Charles Barry. It is named after the last victory of Nelson, whose statue stands on a lofty column in the square.

Tragedy, a word derived from the Greek τραγῳδία, apparently meaning 'goat-song'. As to the reason of the name many theories have been advanced, some even disputing the connexion with goat. It is applied to a play or other literary work of a serious or sorrowful character with a fatal or disastrous conclusion; also to that branch of dramatic art which treats of sorrowful or terrible events in a serious and dignified style. [OED.]

Tragedy of Tragedies, see Tom Thumb, a Tragedy.

Tragic Comedians, The, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1880.

It is based on the account given by Helene von Dönniges of her tragic love-affair with Ferdinand Lassalle, the German Socialist. Helene figures in the novel as Clotilde, the daughter of a noble house, who falls in love with Alvan (Lassalle) and is prepared to defy her family and marry him. But he insists that she shall go back to them and obtain their free consent to the match. So Clotilde returns, and is bullied and deceived into accepting another suitor in her own world, Marko. Alvan, infuriated, writes an insulting letter to Clotilde's father. Marko fights with him and kills him, and marries Clotilde.

TRAHERNE, THOMAS (1637?-1674), a writer of religious works, both in prose and verse, 'Christian Ethics' (1675), 'Poems' (1903), and 'Centuries of Meditation' (1908), marked by originality of thought, and the prose by a remarkably musical quality.

TRAILL, HENRY DUFF (1842-1900), by profession a journalist, wrote two volumes of light satiric verse, 'Recaptured Rhymes'

TRANSCENDENTAL

(1882) and 'Saturday Songs' (1890), and other poems; 'The New Lucian' (new dialogues of the dead, 1884), 'Number Twenty, fables and fantasies' (1892). He was the first editor of 'Literature' (1897 till his death), and wrote a life of Sir John Franklin (1896). He also edited in six vols. (1893-7) 'Social England', a history by various contributors, and wrote for the 'Twelve English Statesmen' series a good life of William III.

Traitor, The, a tragedy by James Shirley (q.v.), produced in 1631 and printed in 1635. It has some historical foundation in the assassination of Duke Alessandro de' Medici.

Lorenzo plots against his kinsman, the duke of Florence, and for this purpose furthers the duke's desire to seduce Amidea, sister of Sciarrha, a Florentine noble. At the same time he inflames Sciarrha against the Duke's tyranny, so that Sciarrha determines to kill him. Finally Sciarrha kills Amidea to save her from dishonour, and lays her corpse on a bed, where the duke finds her. In his amazement he calls for Lorenzo, who enters and stabs him to death, and is in turn killed by Sciarrha. The latter is himself wounded in the affray and dies.

Traitor's Gate, the river gate of the Tower of London, by which traitors, and state prisoners generally, were committed to the Tower.

Trajan (MARCUS ULPIUS TRAIANUS), Roman emperor, A.D. 98-117, of Spanish birth, a great soldier, simple and unassuming. His victories are commemorated on TRAJAN'S COLUMN in Rome, a circular marble column bearing reliefs ascending in a spiral and representing the emperor's campaigns, set up in the Forum which bears his name in A.D. 113. The inscription on the column has been used as a model for lettering; 'Trajan' or 'architects' lettering' is a regular term for a modern style of roman capitals. There is a specimen from Trajan's Column in Pl. I of 'The Art of Lettering and its Use in Divers Crafts and Trades', the report of a Special Committee of the British Institute of Industrial Art, 1931.

Trajan's name is borne also by the FORUM OF TRAJAN, lying below the north-eastern slope of the Capitol Hill at Rome; and by two marble ARCHES OF TRAJAN, one at Benevento over the Appian Way, and one at Ancona.

Transcendental, a word that signifies, in the philosophy of Kant (q.v.), not derived from experience but concerned with the pre-suppositions of experience; pertaining to the general theory of the nature of experience or knowledge. The term is also used of any philosophy which resembles Kant's in being based upon the recognition of an a priori element in experience. [OED.]

For American Transcendentalism see Transcendental Club and Emerson.

TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB

Transcendental Club, a group of American intellectuals who met informally for philosophical discussion at Emerson's (q.v.) house and elsewhere during some years from 1836, the embodiment of a movement of thought, philosophical, religious, social, and economic, produced in New England between 1830 and 1850 by the spirit of revolutionary Europe and German philosophy. The philosophical views of this Transcendentalism may be gathered from Emerson's short treatise, 'Nature' (1836). Its extreme and mystical aspects were manifested in Amos Bronson Alcott (1799-1888), thus described by Carlyle: 'A Yankee Don Quixote, who guesses that he will bring back the Saturnian Kingdom to this forlorn earth by a life of simplicity and a diet of vegetables . . . a long lean man, very like the Don even in figure' (letter to J. Sterling, 23 July 1842). Its literary organ was 'The Dial' (q.v.).

Its social and economic aspects took form in the 'Brook Farm Institute' of George Ripley, founded in 1841, a self-supporting group of men and women, who shared in manual labour and intellectual pursuits; this met with considerable success for a few years.

Transformation, see Marble Faun.

Transformed Metamorphosis, The, see Tourneur.

Transmontane, dwelling or situated beyond the mountains; from the Italian point of view, north of the Alps. Cf. Ultramontane. The word 'Tramontana' signifies a cold north wind.

Transome, HAROLD, a character in George Eliot's 'Felix Holt' (q.v.).

Trapbois, and his daughter MARTHA, characters in Scott's 'The Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

Trappist, a monk of the Cistercian order observing the reformed rule established in 1664 by De Rancé, abbot of La Trappe in Normandy. The observance of almost constant silence is a special feature of the rule, which is in other respects also extremely austere.

TRAUBE, LUDWIG (1861-1907), classical scholar and medievalist, distinguished by the originality and artistry of his methods. He made his first important contribution to learning at the age of 16. Soon after, he began to co-operate in the editing of the 'Monumenta Germaniae Historica', to which his chief contribution was the third volume of 'Poetae Latini Aevi Carolini' (1896). As professor at Munich, he founded the modern school of Latin palaeography. In this field his best-known monograph is 'Nomina Sacra' (1907).

Traveller, The, a poem by Goldsmith (q.v.), published in 1764, his earliest production under his own name. It is dedicated and addressed to his brother, a country clergyman. The author, in the character of a traveller, places himself on the summit of the Alps, and compares social and political conditions in the countries that he sees, noting the inconveniences of each, and endeavouring to show that there may be equal happiness in other States though differently governed from our own. Johnson contributed nine lines to the poem, ll. 420, 429-34, 437-8.

Travels in France, a record of travel in that country during the years 1787-90, by A. Young (q.v.), published in 1792. The first journey takes him through the south-west (Berri, Poitou, Languedoc), the second through Brittany and Anjou, the third through Alsace-Lorraine, the Jura, Burgundy, and Provence. Visiting France shortly before and during the Revolution, Young draws attention to the defective social and economic conditions of the ancien régime. The work was translated into various languages and has always been highly valued in France. It contains the famous phrase, 'The magic of property turns sand into gold'. There is a good modern edition by Miss Betham-Edwards, with a Memoir (1 vol., 1892).

Travels with a Donkey, see Stevenson (R. L.).

Treasure Island, a romance by R. L. Stevenson (q.v.) published in book form in 1883. It had previously appeared as a serial in 'Young Folks' from late in 1881 under the title 'The Sea Cook or Treasure Island'.

The narrator is the lad, Jim Hawkins, whose mother keeps the 'Admiral Benbow' somewhere on the coast in the west of England, in the 18th cent. An old buccaneer takes up his quarters at the inn. He has in his chest information, in the shape of a manuscript map, as to the whereabouts of Capt. Flint's treasure. Of this his former confederates are determined to obtain possession, and a body of them, led by the sinister blind pirate, Pew, make a descent on the inn. But Jim Hawkins outwits them, secures the map, and delivers it to Squire Trelawney. The Squire and his friend Dr. Livesey set off for Treasure Island in the 'Hispaniola' schooner, taking Jim with them. Some of the crew are the squire's faithful dependants, but the majority are old buccaneers recruited by the plausible one-legged villain, Long John Silver. Their design to seize the ship and kill the squire's party is discovered by Jim, and after a series of thrilling fights and adventures is completely thwarted; and the squire, with the help of the marooned pirate, Ben Gunn, secures the treasure.

Treatise of Human Nature, A, a philosophical work by Hume (q.v.), published in 1739-40.

It is convenient to consider this work, composed before the author was five-and-twenty, together with the 'Enquiry concerning Human Understanding' (1748) and the 'Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals' (1751), which are recastings of the earlier treatise in the light of a maturer judgement. Hume's purpose in these is to correct and complete the philosophy of Locke and Berkeley as set forth in the 'Essay concerning Human Understanding' (q.v.), and in the earlier works of Berkeley (q.v.). Whereas his predecessors had maintained a distinction between reason on the one hand and the effects of sensation and experience on the other, Hume endeavours to show that our 'rational' judgements are simply impressions associated by custom, expectations resulting from experience. The problem of knowledge, in his treatment, becomes the problem of causation, instead of the problem of substance. He arrives at the conclusion, with regard to our notion of causation, that 'reason can never show us the connexion of one object with another, tho' aided by experience, and the observation of their constant conjunction in all past instances. When the mind, therefore, passes from the idea or impression of one object to the idea or belief of another, it is not determined by reason, but by certain principles, which associate together the ideas of these objects and unite them in the imagination.' 'Objects have no discoverable connexion together; nor is it from any other principle but custom operating on the imagination, that we can draw any inference from the appearance of one to the existence of another.' He summarizes the position in the statement 'that objects bear to each other the relations of contiguity and succession; that like objects may be observed in several instances to have like relations; and that all this is independent of, and antecedent to, the operations of the understanding'. The repetition of the same impressions in the same relation produces 'a new impression, and by that means the idea' of causation; 'for after a frequent repetition, I find, that upon the appearance of one of the objects, the mind is determined by custom to consider its usual attendant, and to consider it in a stronger light upon account of its relation to the first object. 'Tis this impression, then, or determination, which affords me the idea of necessity.' The seat of the necessary connexion is in the mind not in the objects.

As regards the problem of substance, he concludes that the continued existence of objects distinct from perception is an illusion. Berkeley's belief in a spiritual substance is as untenable as Locke's belief in a material substance. For we have no single permanent impression of self, but only a succession of particular ever-changing impressions. Men may call themselves persons, but 'are nothing but a bundle or collection of different perceptions'. A variable interrupted existence is mistaken by the imagination for an invariable uninterrupted existence.

The weakness of this position was, however, admitted by Hume in the Appendix to the 'Treatise'; he confesses that he 'cannot discover any theory which gives him satisfaction on this head'. And he omitted the whole discussion from the later 'Enquiry'.

The general sceptical argument Hume confines to our knowledge of matters of fact, and excludes from it our knowledge of the relations of ideas, as exemplified in 'the sciences of Geometry, Algebra, and Arithmetic'. (This at least is the view propounded in the 'Enquiry', but in the 'Treatise' he attaches less certainty to the science of geometry, owing to the empirical basis of our idea of space. The subject was also discussed by J. S. Mill; see Logic.)

The second and third books of the 'Treatise' are occupied with an examination of the passions, and with morals. As regards the latter, he rejects the view that the distinction between right and wrong is one of reason. It derives from a sentiment of approval or disapproval of an action which arises in one's breast. 'It lies in yourself, not in the object.' But while in the 'Treatise' Hume makes moral approval or disapproval a matter of regard for our own happiness, in the 'Enquiry' morality is the outcome of a 'moral sense' (the view already expressed by Hutcheson), a disinterested preference for what is morally good; benevolence, or disinterested regard for the general happiness, becomes the supreme end, and social utility the sole source or inseparable accompaniment of all the social virtues. At the same time Hume comes finally to the conclusion that the happiness of others and the happiness of oneself are not discordant but harmonious aims.

Trelawny, of the ballad, see Hawker.

TRELAWNY, EDWARD JOHN (1792-1881), Shelley's friend, who was present at Leghorn when Shelley was drowned, was author of the remarkable 'Adventures of a Younger Son' (q.v., 1831), and of 'Records of Shelley, Byron, and the Author' (1858).

TRENCH, RICHARD CHENEVIX (1807-86), educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, afterwards dean of Westminster and archbishop of Dublin. He was the author of works dealing with history and literature, poetry, divinity, and philology. As a philologist, and notably by his 'The Study of Words', published in 1851, he popularized the scientific study of language. The scheme of the 'Oxford English Dictionary' originated in a resolution passed, at his suggestion, in 1857 by the Philological Society. His 'Notes on the Parables of our Lord' appeared in 1841, and 'Notes on the Miracles of our Lord' in 1846. His sonnets, lyrics, and hymns show much poetic ability. His 'Sacred Latin Poetry, chiefly Lyrical'

TRENCH

(1849) drew attention to the masterpieces of Latin hymnody.

Trent, the detective in E. C. Bentley's 'Trent's Last Case'.

Trent, FRED, a character in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.). His sister is 'Little Nell'.

Trent Case, THE: James Murray Mason and John Slidell, commissioners of the American Confederate States, were in 1861, during the American Civil War, seized on the British ship 'Trent' by the Federal captain, Wilkes. His action was disavowed by the Federal government.

Trent, COUNCIL OF, see Council of Trent.

Tressillian, EDMUND, a character in Scott's 'Kenilworth' (q.v.).

TREVELYAN, GEORGE MACAULAY (1876–), son of Sir G. O. Trevelyan (q.v.), was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, and appointed Regius professor of modern history at Cambridge in 1927 and Master of Trinity in 1940. He is author of three remarkable works on Garibaldi, 'Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic' (1907), 'Garibaldi and the Thousand' (1909), and 'Garibaldi and the Making of Italy' (1911); of a 'Life of John Bright' (1913); of a 'History of England' (1926); of 'England under Queen Anne' (1930); and of 'English Social History' (1944).

TREVELYAN, SIR GEORGE OTTO (1838–1928), the nephew of Lord Macaulay (q.v.), was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. He entered parliament in 1865 and held at various times important offices. Some of his early humorous writings, including 'Horace at the University of Athens' and 'The Ladies in Parliament', were collected and published in 1869. A year spent in India led to the publication of 'The Dawk Bungalow', a comedy, in 1863; the 'Letters of a Competition Wallah', which gives a vivid picture of the Indian Civil Service, in 1864; and 'Cawnpore', a clear and moving account of the Mutiny tragedy, in 1865. The first of his great works, 'The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay', appeared in 1876; the second, 'The Early History of Charles James Fox', in 1880. The latter was the first instalment of what the author intended to be a complete life of the great Whig statesman. But the sequel did not take precisely this form. 'The American Revolution' followed in 1909, in which Fox is not the dominant figure. In 1912–14 appeared the two volumes of 'George III and Charles Fox'. Of the series, the most brilliant and stimulating part is the 'Early History', which gives a striking picture of social and political England in the later part of the 18th century.

TREVI'SA, JOHN DE (1326–1402), fellow of Exeter (1362–9) and Queen's (1369–79) Colleges, Oxford. He was expelled 'for unworthiness' in 1379, and became vicar of Berkeley. He translated Higden's 'Polychronicon' (see Higden) in 1387, adding an introduction and short continuation, and other Latin works. The translation of the 'Polychronicon' is one of the early examples of English prose, and is written in a vigorous and colloquial style. Trevisa also translated (1398) the 'De Proprietatibus Rerum' of Bartholomaeus Anglicus, and there is evidence that he made a translation of the Bible, though this is lost.

TRILOGY

Triads, in ancient Welsh literature, verses celebrating famous subjects of tradition; a form of composition characterized by an arrangement of subjects or statements in groups of three. There are satirical allusions to these 'triads' in Peacock's 'The Misfortunes of Elphin' (q.v.).

Triamond, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', iv. iii and iv, the Knight of Friendship. After an inconclusive fight with Cambello in the contest to decide to which of her suitors Canace is to be awarded, Triamond and Cambello swear eternal friendship. In the tournament arranged by Satyrane, Triamond, though wounded, returns to rescue Cambello. He marries Canace, Cambello's sister.

Trianon, the name of two small palaces and their gardens included in the park of Versailles. The GRAND TRIANON was built by Louis XIV, the PETIT TRIANON by Louis XV. The latter was the favourite 'rustic retreat' of Marie Antoinette.

Tribrach, a foot consisting of three short syllables.

Tribulation Wholesome, a character in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

Tricolour, having three colours, especially used of the national flag of France, adopted at the Revolution, which has equal vertical stripes of blue, white, and red.

Tricoteuses, from the French tricoter, to knit, the women who, during the French Revolution, plied their knitting-needles while attending the sittings of the political assemblies.

Tridentum, in imprints, Trent.

Trifaldi, THE COUNTESS OF, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), the 'Afflicted Duenna', whose adventure Don Quixote undertakes (Pt. II, chs. xxxvi–xli).

Trilby, a novel by Du Maurier (q.v.), published in 1894.

It is the tragic story of Trilby O'Ferrall, an amiable artist's model in Paris, with whom various young English art-students fall in love. She becomes a famous singer under the mesmeric influence of Svengali, a Hungarian musician, but loses her voice when the latter dies, and herself languishes and dies soon after. 'Trilby hat' became a popular name for a soft felt hat with indented crown.

Trilogy, in Greek antiquities, a series of three tragedies (originally connected in subject) performed at Athens at the festival of Dionysus. Hence any series of three related dramatic or other literary works.

Trim, CORPORAL, one of the principal characters in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy'.

Trimalchio, a type of ostentatious extravagance and gluttony; see Petronius.

Trimeter, see Metre and Iambic.

Trimmer, originally applied to one who trims between opposing parties in politics; hence, one who inclines as his interest dictates. But Lord Halifax in his 'Character of a Trimmer' (1682) accepted the nickname in the sense of 'one who keeps even the ship of state'.

TRIMMER, Mrs. SARAH (1741-1810), née Kirby, Calverley's 'good Mrs. Trimmer', was author of the popular children's book, 'The History of the Robins', originally entitled 'Fabulous Histories' (1786), and of a number of exemplary tales and educational works. She is referred to in Byron's 'Don Juan', Canto I.

Trimurti, in Hindu theology, the triad of the three supreme gods, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva (qq.v.).

Trinacria, an ancient name for Sicily, meaning 'with three promontories'.

Trinculo, a jester in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest' (q.v.).

Trinity College, Cambridge, the largest college of Cambridge University, founded by Henry VIII in 1546, in place of several older foundations. The library was built by Sir C. Wren (q.v.). Among the distinguished men of letters educated there may be mentioned F. Bacon, Herbert, Cowley, Dryden, Newton, Porson, Byron, Macaulay, Thackeray, and Tennyson. Bentley and Whewell (qq.v.) were Masters of Trinity.

Trinity House, Tower Hill, London, the hall of the 'Guild, Fraternity, or Brotherhood of the Most Glorious and Undividable Trinity', founded by Sir Thomas Spert in 1512 (incorporated in 1514) for the benefit and protection of the shipping industry. This corporation is charged with the licensing of pilots, and the maintenance of light-houses, beacons, and buoys. In spite of an Act of Elizabeth (which charges it with the duty of doing its best to increase the Navy in ships and men), it is now wholly international in its operations, and refuses to distinguish, in time of war, between friend and foe. It is governed by 'Elder Brethren'.

Trinobantes, see Brute.

Triplet, a poem of eight lines, with two rhymes, in which the first line is repeated as the fourth and seventh, and the second as the eighth.

Trip to Scarborough, A, a comedy by R. B. Sheridan (q.v.) produced in 1777.

The plot is that of Vanbrugh's 'The Re-lapse' (q.v.) with some modifications. Berinthia is no longer an unscrupulous adventurer, but tempts Loveless in order to punish Towneley (the Worthy of the earlier play) for deserting her in favour of Amanda, Loveless's wife. And it is shame, not exposure, that restores Loveless to Amanda.

Triple Entente, THE, the political understanding between Great Britain, France, and Russia (an extension of the Entente Cordiale, q.v., between Great Britain and France) concluded in 1907 by means of conventions settling differences between Great Britain and Russia in Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet. It constituted a balance of power with the Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy during the period which preceded the war of 1914-18.

Triplet, three successive lines of verse rhyming together, occasionally introduced among heroic couplets, e.g. by Dryden.

Tripes, at Cambridge University, formerly (a) a bachelor of arts appointed to dispute, in a humorous or satirical style, with candidates for degrees at 'Commencement' (corresponding to the Terrae filius at Oxford); so called from the three-legged stool on which he sat. (b) A set of humorous verses, originally composed by the 'Tripes', and (until 1894) published at Commencement after his office was abolished. (c) The list of candidates qualified for the honours degree in mathematics, originally printed on the back of the paper containing these verses. Hence, in current use, the final honours examination in any subject for the B.A. degree. [OED.]

Triptōlēmus, in Greek mythology, a hero worshipped at Eleusis, the son of Cēleus, king of Eleusis. Celeus hospitably entertained Demeter (q.v.) when she was wandering in search of her daughter, and the goddess in return gave Triptolemus a winged chariot, wherein he travelled over the world teaching men the arts of agriculture, which he had learnt from the goddess.

Triptolemus Yellowley, and his sister BARBARA, characters in Scott's 'The Pirate'.

Trismegistus, see Hermes Trismegistus.

Tristan and Isolde, a music-drama by R. Wagner (q.v.).

Tristan l'Hermite, a character in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.).

Tristram. The story of Tristram and his love for Isolt is much older than the parallel tale of Launcelot and Guinevere, and in its earlier form was not connected with the Arthurian cycle. Before Malory's 'Morte Darthur' it figures in English only in 'Sir Tristrem', one of the earliest romances in the vernacular, probably dating from before 1300. This was drawn from earlier French sources, and was possibly composed by Thomas of Erceidoun (q.v.). According to this poem Triatrem is the son of Rouland of Erminia and Blanchefleur, sister of King

TRISTRAM

Mark of England. He slays Moraunt, king of Ireland, but is himself wounded and is tended by Ysoud, sister of Moraunt. Tristrem returns to England and tells King Mark of Ysoud. Mark sends Tristrem to request Ysoud in marriage. The remainder of the story is in essentials similar to that of Tristram as given by Malory (see below), except that Ganhardin (brother of Ysoud with the White Hand), who does not figure in the latter, falls in love with Brangwain, Ysoud of Ireland's maid.

In Malory's 'Morte Darthur', Tristram is son of Meliodas, king of Lyonesse (q.v.), and Elizabeth sister of King Mark of Cornwall. Meliodas is led away by enchantment and made prisoner. Elizabeth distracted seeks him in the forest, when she is seized with the pangs of travail. She dies after having given birth to a son, whom she calls Tristram, 'that is as much to say as a sorrowful birth'. Tristram escapes poisoning by his stepmother and begs her life when she is condemned to the stake. He becomes a skilful hunter and harper. He fights and defeats Sir Marhaus, who comes on behalf of the king of Ireland to claim the 'truage' of Cornwall, but is wounded himself. Marhaus dies, and Tristram is sent to Ireland to be cured of his wound. Owing to his skill with the harp he is received with favour by the king and is placed in the care of his daughter, La Beale Isoud. Tristram and she fall in love. The queen discovers that their guest is the knight who slew Sir Marhaus, her brother, and Tristram leaves the court after exchanging vows of fidelity with Isoud, and returns to Cornwall. After a time King Mark, being jealous of Tristram and desirous to destroy him, sends him to Ireland to ask the hand of La Beale Isoud, whose praises he has heard from Tristram. Tristram, having rendered an important service to the king of Ireland, asks as reward the hand of Isoud for King Mark. Isoud and Bragwaine, her attendant, set off with Tristram. Bragwaine has received from Isoud's mother a love potion to be given to King Mark. On the ship Tristram and Isoud find the flask and in ignorance drink its contents, with the result that they love each other for the rest of their lives. Mark and Isoud are married, but the relations between Tristram and Isoud continue, till the lovers are betrayed to Mark. (According to another version Bragwaine or Brengwaine takes Isoud's place on the wedding night; after which Isoud ungratefully plots to murder her.) Tristram leaves the court of Mark and fighting for King Howel of Brittany falls in love with Isoud la Blanche Mains and marries her, 'almost forsaking' Isoud of Ireland. However, on the invitation of the latter he returns privily to Cornwall. He is banished thence and is welcomed at Arthur's court, where he shows his prowess in many contests. Finally it is stated that Mark slew Tristram as he sat harping before La Beale Isoud.

But a more romantic ending is given in one of the manuscripts and has been adopted and developed by later poets. Tristram, in Brittany, is wounded by a poisoned arrow. Feeling that he is dying, he sends a messenger for Isoud of Ireland. If she comes, the ship that brings her is to set a white sail, if not, a black. Isoud of Brittany overhears, and when the ship returns tells Tristram the sail is black. Tristram in despair turns his face to the wall and dies (cf. the story of Theseus, q.v., and Aegeus). Isoud of Ireland finds her lover dead, lies down beside him, and dies.

Tristram and Iseult, a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.), published in 1852.

The subject is the death of Tristram (q.v.) in Brittany. As he lies on his bed of sickness, while Iseult of Brittany watches by him, he dreams in his fever of the happy days of his prime and pines for Iseult of Ireland. She comes, and after a brief passionate dialogue between them, Tristram dies.

Tristram of Lyonesse, a romance in couplets by Swinburne (q.v.), published in 1882.

It tells the tale of Tristram (q.v.), his first visit to the court of the king of Ireland, his subsequent mission to fetch Iseult to be Mark's bride, the love of Tristram and Queen Iseult, their separation and the marriage of Tristram with Iseult of Brittany, the sending for Queen Iseult when Tristram lies dying, and Tristram's death under the blow of the false cry that the sail of the returning ship is black.

Tristram Shandy, The Life and Opinions of, a novel by Sterne (q.v.), of which vols. i and ii appeared in 1760, vols. iii to vi in 1761-2, vols. vii and viii in 1765, and vol. ix in 1767. It was translated into French and German.

In spite of the title, the book gives us very little of the life, and nothing of the opinions, of the nominal hero, who gets born only in vol. iii, and breeched in vol. vi, and then disappears from the story. Instead we have a group of humorous figures: Walter Shandy of Shandy Hall, Tristram's father, peevish but frank and generous, full of paradoxical notions, which he defends with great show of learning; 'my Uncle Toby', his brother, wounded in the groin at the siege of Namur, whose hobby is the science of attacking fortified towns, which he studies by means of miniature scarps, ravelins, and bastions on his bowling-green, a man 'of unparalleled modesty' and amiability; Corporal Trim, his servant, wounded in the knee at Landen, devoted to his master and sharing his enthusiasm for the military art, voluble but respectful. Behind these three major figures, the minor characters, Yorick the parson, Dr. Slop, Mrs. Shandy, and the widow Wadman, play a more elusive part.

The book, which is chiefly occupied with exposing the author's own personality and whimsical imaginations, presents very few incidents. The first three volumes are concerned, amid many digressions (including the great curse of Ernulphus, bishop of Rochester), with the circumstances attending the hero's birth; after which the author finds time to write his preface. Vol. iv begins with the story of Slawkenbergius, the author of a treatise on noses; followed by the naming of the infant 'Tristram' by mistake for 'Trismegistus'. Vol. v contains the notable discourse of Corporal Trim on mortality; vol. vi the affecting episode of Le Fevre, and the delightful dialogue between Mr. and Mrs. Shandy on the breeching of Tristram. Vols. vii and viii abandon the narrative to give an account of the author's travels in France and the story of the king of Bohemia; and vol. ix is concerned mainly with the love-affair of Uncle Toby and the widow Wadman.

Triton, a sea deity, son of Poseidon (Neptune) and Amphitrite. He is generally represented as blowing on a shell, his body above the waist being that of a man, below it of a dolphin.

Triumph of Life, The, an uncompleted poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), in terza rima, published after his death.

The poem, on which Shelley was engaged at the time of his death, is an allegory of which the sense is obscure. The poet sees a vision of the human multitude, and in the midst of it the Triumph passes, the chariot of Life the Conqueror, trampling on youth and dragging others in chains. Rousseau interprets the vision to the poet and tells him that those chained to the car are 'the wise, the great, the unforgotten', vanquished by the mystery of Life. He shows him, among the captives, Napoleon, Plato, Aristotle, Alexander. The vision passes to the allegory of a single life, which after a youth of aspirations, succumbs to the same mystery.

Triumph of Mammon, see God and Mammon.

Trivia, or The Art of Walking the Streets of London, a poem by J. Gay (q.v.), in three books, published in 1716.

In this entertaining work, on the model of Swift's 'City Shower', the author takes the reader through the streets of London, first by day and then by night, instructing him in a mock-serious style about the coats and boots he should wear, the signs of the weather, and the dangers to be avoided, notably pick-pockets, mischievous boys who pull off wigs, the splashing mud below and the spouting rain above. 'Safety first' among the side-headings has a familiar sound. The reader's attention is drawn to the various characters he will meet: ballad-singers, chairmen, footmen, bullies, and the like. The poem is a mine of information on 18th-cent. manners.

Trivium, in the Middle Ages, the lower division of the seven liberal arts, comprising grammar, logic, and rhetoric. Cf. Quadrivium.

Trochee, a metrical foot consisting of a long followed by a short syllable; in accentual verse, of an accented followed by an unaccented syllable.

TROILUS AND CRESSIDA

Trochilus, a small Egyptian bird (not certainly identified) said by the ancients to enter the crocodile's mouth and pick its teeth.

Troglodyte, from the Greek τρώγλη, hole, and δύειν, to get into, a cave-dweller. The ancients (Pliny, Strabo, &c.) mention races of Troglodytes in Aethiopia and elsewhere.

Troll, MAGNUS, MINNA, BRENDA, and ULLA (NORNA), characters in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Troilus and Cressida. This story, which has no basis in classical antiquity but has its origin in the 'Roman de Troie' of Benoît de Sainte-Maure (q.v.), itself based on the pretended records of Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis (qq.v.), has also been dealt with by Guido Colonna in the 'Historia Trojana', by Boccaccio in 'Filostrato', by Chaucer, by Lydgate in his 'Troy-Book', by Henryson, by Shakespeare, and by Dryden.

The first of these makes Briseida (Homer's Briseis) the daughter of Calchas (the seer who advised the restoration of Chryseis to her father; see Briseis and Chryseis), and Troilus and Diomed her successive lovers. Briseida was changed to Griseida by Boccaccio, and to Cryseyde by Chaucer. The story is that of the love of Troilus, a son of Priam, king of Troy, for Cressida, daughter of Calchas the priest, who, foreknowing the fall of Troy, has fled to the Greeks but left his daughter in Troy. Cressida returns the love of Troilus, and Pandarus acts as go-between. But an exchange of prisoners is arranged and Cressida is sent to the Greek camp, where Diomed urges his suit and is finally preferred to Troilus. Troilus and Diomed meet in the field but neither kills the other. Troilus is at last killed by Achilles.

Chaucer's poem, 'Troilus and Cryseyde', probably written between 1372 and 1386, contains some 8,200 lines of rhyme-royal (annotated text by R. K. Root, 1926); in it the poet enriched the story as he got it from Boccaccio by the vivid and humorous figure of Pandarus and by the development of the character of Cressida, 'a grave, sober, considerate personage, who has an alternate eye to her character, her interest, and her pleasure'.

Shakespeare's Cressida, on the other hand, is 'a giddy girl, an unpractised jilt, who falls in love with Troilus, as she afterwards deserts him, from mere levity and thoughtlessness of temper'. His Pandarus, again, instead of being a friendly, officious go-between, 'has "a stamp exclusive and professional": he wears the badge of his trade; he is a regular knight of the game'. (The above quotations are from Hazlitt.) Shakespeare's play, produced probably in 1602, and printed in 1609, presents, as background to the story, the principal characters of the 'Iliad': Agamemnon, Ajax, Ulysses, Nestor, Achilles sulking in his tent, the railler Thersites; and on the Trojan side, Priam, Aeneas, Hector and Andromache, Paris, and Helen. The death of Hector at the hands of Achilles is summarily dealt with.

For Henryson's pathetic treatment of the latter days of Cressida see Cresseid. Dryden in 1679 published a play, 'Troilus and Cressida', which Saintsbury, in his life of Dryden (English Men of Letters), calls a 'pot boiler', 'which might much better have been left unattempted'.

Troll, in Scandinavian mythology, one of a race of supernatural beings formerly conceived as giants, now in Denmark and Sweden as dwarfs or imps supposed to inhabit caves or subterranean dwellings. [OED.]

TROLLOPE, ANTHONY (1815-82), was born in London. He has described in his 'Autobiography' the miserable conditions under which, owing to the poverty of his family, induced by the misfortunes or mismanagement of his father, he went, first to Harrow, then to Winchester, then again to Harrow; and how, when his father's debts obliged the family to take refuge in Belgium, his mother supported them by her writings. Anthony Trollope entered the General Post Office as a clerk in 1834 and in time proved himself an active and valuable public servant. His first novels were: 'The Macdermots of Ballycloran' (1847) and 'The Kellys and the O'Kellys' (1848). 'The Warden' (q.v., 1855), the first of the Barsetshire series, was a moderate success. But from this point his popularity as a novelist steadily increased. His output was considerable, having regard to the fact that his official work was arduous and that he also found time to hunt twice a week; it was achieved by a mechanical regularity in his writing which he has himself described. His chief remaining novels were: 'Barchester Towers' (q.v., 1857), 'The Three Clerks' (q.v., 1858), 'Doctor Thorne' (q.v., 1858), 'Framley Parsonage' (q.v., 1861), 'Orley Farm' (q.v., 1862), 'The Small House at Allington' (q.v., 1864), 'The Belton Estate' (q.v., 1865), 'The Claverings' (q.v., 1867), 'The Last Chronicle of Barset' (q.v., 1867), 'Phineas Finn' (q.v., 1869), 'The Eustace Diamonds' (q.v., 1873), 'Phineas Redux' (1874), 'The Prime Minister' (1876), 'The American Senator' (1877), 'Is he Popenjoy?' (1878), 'The Duke's Children' (1880), 'Ayala's Angel' (q.v., 1881), 'Dr. Wortle's School' (q.v., 1881). Trollope also published various books of travel, on the West Indies and Spanish Main (1859), North America (1862), Australia (1873), and South Africa (1878); also a monograph on Thackeray (1879). His interesting 'Autobiography' appeared in 1883. According to this his publications, down to 1879, had brought him in some £70,000.

TROLLOPE, FRANCES (1780-1863), née Milton, the mother of A. Trollope (q.v.). When her family were reduced to poverty she supported them by writing novels, of which the best known is 'The Widow Barnaby' (1838), the story of an unscrupulous and astute widow, whose schemes to make a rich marriage prove unsuccessful. She is finally imprisoned for debt, and marries a fellow prisoner, the Rev. Patrick O'Donoghue, who turns out a gambler and drinker; while her niece, Agnes, whom she has cruelly ill-treated, makes a happy match. Mrs. Trollope's 'The Vicar of Wrexhill' (1837) is a more sombre if more powerful story, the picture of a cold, evil-minded, cruel clergyman. Her 'Domestic Manners of the Americans' (1832), written after a visit to America, gave great offence, of much the same kind as did parts of Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit'.

In cunning sleights and practick knavery, attends Braggadochio (q.v.) as his squire, and with him is finally exposed and beaten out of court.

Trophee, an unknown writer mentioned by Chaucer in the Monk's Tale (l. 127):

At bothe the worldes endes, seith Trophee,
In stide of boundes he [Hercules] a pileer sette.

A marginal note in the Ellesmere and Hengwrt MSS. says, 'Ille vates Chalcedorum Tropheus'. Lydgate states that Chaucer in his youth made a translation of a book called in the Lombard tongue Trophe, and that he later named it 'Troilus and Cressida'. No such book as 'Trophe' is known.

Trophonius, son of Erginus, king of Orchomenos in Boeotia, and brother of Agamemes. The two brothers built a temple of Apollo at Delphi, and a treasury for Hyrieus, king of Hyria, in Boeotia. About this treasury a story is told similar to that of the treasury of King Rhampsinitus (q.v.). The two brothers robbed the treasury by means of a movable stone in the wall, and when Agamemes was caught in a trap, Trophonius cut off his head to avoid detection. Trophonius was subsequently swallowed up by the earth, or, according to another story, was granted death by Apollo, as the best reward for men. At Lebadeia in Boeotia, Trophonius after his death was consulted as an oracle in a cave. The suppliant always emerged from this Cave of Trophonius pale and dejected, and it became proverbial to say of a melancholy man that he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius.

Trotcosey, in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.), a favourite subject of reference by Jonathan Oldbuck; the house of Monk-barns stood on the lands of the ancient abbey of Trotcosey. Scott prepared in his later years 'Reliquiae Trocttosienses', a catalogue raisonné of the most curious articles in the library and museum at Abbotsford.

TROTTER

Trotter, JOB, see 'Pickwick Papers'.

Trotwood, BETSEY, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Troubadours, composers of lyrics on courtly love in Old Provençal.

Trouillogan, in Rabelais, III. xxxv et seq., the philosopher whom Panurge consults on the subject of his marriage.

Trouvères, composers of poetry, both lyric and narrative in Old French.

Trows or DROWS, in the mythology of the Orkneys and Shetland, dwarfs, or imps, inhabiting caves and the sea. They figure in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.). The word survives from the Troll (q.v.) of Norse mythology.

Troy or ILIUM, a city that stood near the Hellespont and the river Scamander in the NW. of Asia Minor. Its ruins have been discovered near the modern Hissarlik. The opinion now is that several cities have been buried, one on the top of the other, at the site of Hissarlik, which must always have been important as commanding the passage from Europe to Asia. According to legend, as related by Homer in his 'Iliad', Troy was the capital of King Priam, and was for ten years besieged by the Greeks in their endeavour to recover Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, who had been carried off by Paris, son of Priam. See Agamemnon, Menelaus, Helen, Paris, Achilles, Horse (The Trojan), &c.

Troy, SERGEANT, a character in Hardy's 'Far from the Madding Crowd' (q.v.).

Troy-book, a poem in five books, in ten-syllable couplets, written by Lydgate (q.v.), at the request of Prince Henry, afterwards Henry V. It was begun in 1412 and finished in 1420. It tells the 'noble storye' of Troy, following the Latin history of Guido di Colonna (which had drawn largely on the apocryphal tales of Dictys Cretensis and Dares Phrygius, qq.v.), and serves in some sort as an introduction to the story of the Trojan settlement of England by Brutus, great-grandson of Aeneas, told by Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace. In the third book, in connexion with the story of Troilus and Cressida, he introduces a tribute to his 'maister Chaucer'.

Troynovant, see Bruts.

Truce of God, 'Treuga Dei', also 'Pax Dei', a suspension of hostilities between armies, or of private feuds, ordered by the Church during certain days and seasons in medieval times. The general acceptance of it seems to have been about 1033 (a thousand years from the Passion). The close days of the week were from Wednesday evening to Monday morning. Urban II proclaimed a universal 'Treuga Dei' when urging the First Crusade at Clermont (Auvergne) in 1095.

True Law of Free Monarchies, The, a political treatise attributed to James I, published in 1603, and written to combat the Calvinistic theory of government advocated by George Buchanan in his 'De Jure Regni' (1579). It sets forth the doctrine of the divine right of kings, and of the king's responsibility to God alone.

Trulla, a virago, one of the bear-baiters in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.).

Trulliber, PARSON, a character in Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

TRUMBULL, JOHN (1750-1831), American poet, born at Westbury, Connecticut, one of the 'Hartford Wits'. He was one of the authors of 'The Anarchiad' (q.v.), and his collected poems appeared in 1820.

Trumper, VICTOR (1877-1915), a celebrated Australian cricketer, an easy natural batsman, who met with astonishing success in the English tours of 1902, 1905, and 1910.

Trumpet-Major, The, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1880.

This is one of Hardy's simplest and pleasantest tales, with hardly a trace of irony or bitterness. It is set in the time of the Napoleonic wars, and deals with the wooing of Anne Garland, whose mother is the tenant of part of Overcombe Mill, where the dragoons come down from the camp to water their horses. One of these dragoons is John Loveday, the trumpet-major, the gentle unselfish son of the miller, and he is one of Anne's suitors. Another is his brother Bob, a cheery light-hearted sailor. The third is the braggart boorish yeoman, Festus Derriman. The story ends in the exposure and discomfiture of Festus and the success of Bob while John marches off into the night, 'to blow his trumpet till silenced for ever upon one of the bloody battle-fields of Spain'.

Trumpington, THE MILLER OF, the miller in the 'Reeve's Tale' in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.).

Tryamour, see Launsfal.

Tryan, THE REV. EDGAR, a character in George Eliot's 'Janet's Repentance' (see Scenes of Clerical Life).

Tschalkovsky, see Tchaikovsky.

Tuatha Dè Danann, in Gaelic mythology, the gods, the 'Folk of the goddess Danu', the enemies of the Fomors (q.v.). They are represented as invaders of Ireland, subsequent to the Fomors and the Fir Bolgs. They rout the Fomors at the battle of Moytura, and are ousted in their turn by the Milesians (q.v.). Conspicuous among the Tuatha Dè Danann are Lugh, the Gaelic sun-god, their leader; and Lir or Lér (q.v.), the god of the sea.

Tubal-cain, according to Gen. iv. 22, the 'instructor of every artificer in brass and iron'.

Tuck, FRIAR, see Friar Tuck.

TUCKER

TUCKER, ABRAHAM (1705-74), a country gentleman and one of the first writers of the utilitarian school of philosophy. In his great work, 'The Light of Nature pursued', of which three volumes were published in 1768 and three after his death in 1778, he rejects the moral sense theory of Shaftesbury and Hutcheson (qq.v.), and finds the criterion of moral conduct in general happiness, and the motive of the individual in his own happiness. The coincidence of these two is almost, but not quite, complete. There comes a point where virtue requires a self-sacrifice that prudential motives do not justify. Here Tucker finds the place for religion and its promise of a future life, where 'the accounts of all are to be set even', and the sacrifice of personal happiness required by virtue is to be made good.

Tucker's writings are diffuse and unmethodical, but marked by humour and quaint illustration and comment. His theories were systematized by Paley (q.v.).

TUCKERMAN, HENRY THEODORE (1813-71), American author, born at Boston, Mass., remembered chiefly for his poetry. Among his books are: 'The Italian Sketch-book' (1835), 'Isabel, or Sicily, a Pilgrimage' (1839), 'Thoughts on the Poets' (1846), 'Artist Life, or Sketches of American Painters' (1847), 'Characteristics of Literature' (1849), 'Poems' (1851), 'A Month in England' (1853), 'Biographical Essays' (1857), 'Book of the Artists' (1857).

Tugwell, JEREMIAH, in Graves's 'Spiritual Quixote' (q.v.), Geoffrey Wildgoose's Sancho Panza.

Tuileries, THE, in Paris, a royal palace adjoining the Louvre, built by Catherine de Médicis on the site of a tuilerie or brickyard. It was destroyed at the time of the Commune (1871).

Tuirenn, The Fate of the Sons of, one of the 'three sorrowful tales of Erin', a mythological tale in which the three sons of Tuirenn are punished for killing Cian, the father of the hero-god Lugh, by being required, by way of fine, to achieve a number of quests, in the last of which they perish.

Tulchan bishops, a term applied derisively to the titular Scottish bishops appointed after the Reformation, on the understanding that they should not receive the revenues of their sees, which had been confiscated in 1560 and had mostly gone to the lay barons; a tulchan is a calf's skin stuffed with straw, placed under a cow to induce her to give her milk.

Tulkinghorn, MR., a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Tulliver, MR. and MRS., and TOM and MAGGY, the principal characters in G. Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

Tullochgorum, see Skinner.

Tully, see Cicero.

TURGENEV

Tully-Veolan, in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.), the castle of the Baron of Bradwardine.

Tunning of Elynour Rumming, The, a poem by Skelton (q.v.), is a vigorous Hogarthian description of contemporary low life. Elynour Rumming is an alewife who dwells beside Leatherhead and brews 'nippy ale' for 'travellers and tynkers, for sweters and swynkers, and all good ale drynkers', and the poem, coarse but full of humour and life, describes the mixed company who throng to drink it.

TUNSTALL, CUTHBERT (1474-1559), studied both at Oxford and Cambridge, and also at Padua, and became learned in Greek, Hebrew, mathematics, and civil law. He was appointed master of the rolls and bishop successively of London and Durham, and was employed in the diplomatic service of Henry VIII. He was Wolsey's agent at the Diet of Worms. During the ecclesiastical revolution he remained faithful to the Roman Catholic dogma, but obeyed passively the civil power. He was the author of religious works and of an arithmetical treatise, 'De arte supputandi'. Rabelais refers to this in 'Gargantua', xxiii.

Tupman, TRACY, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), one of the members of the Corresponding Society of the Pickwick Club.

TUPPER, MARTIN FARQUHAR (1810-89), of an old Huguenot family, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He published in 1838-42 his 'Proverbial Philosophy', commonplace maxims and reflections couched in a rhythmical form, which achieved extraordinary popularity. He published numerous other works, including 'The Crock of Gold' (1844, a book of poems) and a naïve 'Autobiography' (1886).

Turan, see Iran.

TURBERVILLE or TURBERVILLE, GEORGE (1540?-1610?), scholar of Winchester and fellow of New College, Oxford, published 'Epitaphs, Epigrams, Songs, and Sonets' (1567), 'Poems describing . . . Russia' (1568), 'The Booke of Faulconrie' (1575), and various translations from Ovid and modern Italians. 'The Noble Art of Venerie or Hunting' is also attributed to him (1575, reprinted, Oxford, 1908). He familiarized the employment of Italian models, and shows the influence of Surrey and Wyatt (qq.v.).

Turcaret, see Le Sage.

TURGENEV, IVAN SERGIEVICH (1818-83), one of the greatest of Russian novelists, possessing in a high degree humour and the power of presenting character and local colour. He lived much abroad and his work is characterized by a far more westernized spirit than is found in most Russian writers of the first class. He first came into repute by his 'Sketches of a Sportsman' (1847-51), vignettes of Russian country life. His most important novels are: 'A Nest of Gentlefolk' (1859), 'Fathers and Sons' (1862), 'Smoke' (1867), and 'Virgin Soil' (1876).

Turgot, ANNE ROBERT JACQUES, see Physiocrats.

Turk Gregory, in Shakespeare's '1 Henry IV', v. iii, where Falstaff compares his deeds in arms with those of 'Turk Gregory', is a facetious combination of the characters of 'terrible Turk' and militant pope (Gregory VII).

Turkish Spy, Letters written by a, eight vols. published in 1687-94. The first is a translation of 'L'Espion du Grand Seigneur' by Giovanni Paolo Marana, a Genoese residing in Paris, published in French in 1684-86, partly itself a translation from an Italian version. The work inaugurated a new genre in European literature, the pseudo-foreign letter, of which the 'Lettres persanes' of Montesquieu (q.v.) is the chief example.

Mahmut, a Turkish spy, employed by the Porte to report on the Christian courts, writes letters from Paris, between 1637 and 1682, addressed to various members of his government and to relations and friends. In these he discusses the political, historical, and social affairs of France, Spain, England, and Italy, and a variety of other subjects, scientific and religious, and also his personal concerns and those of his own country.

A continuation to the 'Letters', probably by Defoe, was published in England in 1718.

Turks, THE YOUNG, the party of reform in the former Ottoman Empire, who came into prominence about the year 1907, deposed the Sultan Abdul Hamid, and endeavoured to introduce modern methods into the administration of the country.

Turn of the Screw, The, a masterpiece of horror fiction by Henry James (q.v.).

TURNER, CHARLES TENNYSON, see Tennyson Turner.

Turner, JOSEPH MALLORD (or MALLAD) WILLIAM (1775-1851), the great landscape painter, was son of a London barber, and sold drawings at a very early age. He entered the Academy schools in 1789 and exhibited a view of Lambeth Palace at the Royal Academy in 1790. His 'first style', in which he imitated various old masters, as in his 'Dido building Carthage' (1815), lasted till c. 1820. After this he ceased to imitate and aimed at ideal compositions, as in his 'Ulysses deriding Polyphemus' (1829), sometimes regarded as his masterpiece. He entered his third period 1835-45, his reputation being greatly increased by the publication of Ruskin's 'Modern Painters' (q.v.) in 1843. During the next five years he produced many characteristic and inimitable works, including 'The Fighting Téméraire' (1839), the 'Snowstorm' (1842), 'The Approach to Venice' (1843), and 'Rain, Steam, and Speed' (1844). Turner is unrivalled as a water-colour artist. Collections of his water-colour drawings were given to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and others are at the National Gallery, South Kensington Museum, &c. Turner was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

TURNER, SHARON (1768-1847), a student of Icelandic and Anglo-Saxon literature, whose 'History of the Anglo-Saxons from the earliest period to the Norman Conquest' (1799-1805), subsequently extended to the death of Elizabeth, initiated an entirely new treatment of the origins of English history.

'Turnip Townshend', see Townshend.

Turnmill or TURNBULL Street, Clerkenwell, London, frequently mentioned by the Elizabethan dramatists (e.g. Shakespeare, '2 Henry IV', III. ii), took its name from the Turnmill brook, probably identical with the upper course of the Fleet (q.v.) stream. The street was notorious for its low haunts.

Turnus, a king of the Rutuli, and a brave warrior, who fought against Aeneas, because Latinus proposed to give the latter his daughter Lavinia, who had been betrothed to Turnus. He was killed by Aeneas in single combat (Bk. XII of the 'Aeneid').

Turonum or TRONUM, in imprints, Tours.

Turpin (d. c. 800), archbishop of Rheims in the days of Charlemagne, to whom is erroneously attributed the Latin chronicle, 'De Vita et Gestis Caroli Magni', the source from which Boiardo and other authors drew some of their romantic tales. According to one version of the story he died among the last of the heroes at Roncesvalles after shriving the dying Roland (q.v.).

Turpin, RICHARD (1706-39), the famous highwayman, the son of an innkeeper at Hempstead, Essex. He was arrested for horse-stealing and hanged at York. He figures in Ainsworth's 'Rookwood', which gives an account of his great ride to York on Black Bess; but romances connected with his name are legendary.

Turveydrop, father and son, characters in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Tusculum, a town about ten miles SE. of Rome, where Cicero had a villa.

Tusher, THE REV. THOMAS, chaplain to the Castlewood family in Thackeray's 'Esmond' (q.v.), subsequently a bishop and the first husband of Beatrix Esmond (see Virginians).

Tusitála, the 'Teller of Tales', the Samoan name of R. L. Stevenson (q.v.).

Tussaud, MARIE, Madame Tussaud (1760-1850), née Gresholtz, was born at Berne. She assisted her uncle Curtius in his 'Cabinet de Cire' in the Palais Royal, Paris, and modelled heads of victims of the Terror. She married Tussaud, separated from him in 1800, and, migrating to England, transferred her museum to the Lyceum, Strand, in 1802, and thence to Blackheath. After Blackheath, and until 1884, the Exhibition was at 58 Baker Street; in 1885 it was moved to premises in the Marylebone Road. These, together with many valuable relics and figures, were destroyed by fire in 1925, and the existing building, with the exhibition, was opened on the same site in 1929.

TUSSER, THOMAS (1524?-80), agricultural writer and poet, was educated at Eton and Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He farmed at Cattiwade, Suffolk, and introduced the culture of barley. He published his 'Hundreth good pointes of husbandrie' in 1557 (amplified in later editions) in verse of quaint and pointed expression, many proverbs being traceable to this work. It is a collection of instructions on farming, gardening, and housekeeping, together with humorous and wise maxims on conduct in general.

Tutankhamen (14th cent. B.C.), the son-in-law and successor of the Egyptian heretic king, Amenhotep IV or Akhnaton (q.v.). He reverted to the old religion and was buried in the valley of the tombs of the kings at Karnak, where his tomb, containing a wonderful collection of furniture, jewels, and other relics of the age, was discovered in 1922 by Mr. Howard Carter, excavating on behalf of the earl of Carnarvon.

Tvastrī, in Hindu theology, the divine builder and smith, the Hindu Vulcan. He is known in post-Vedic writings as Visvakarma.

Two Dogs, The, a poem by Burns (q.v.), completed in 1786.

Caesar, the gentleman's dog, and Luath, the ploughman's collie, converse on the comparative happiness of the lives of their rich and poor masters, until the sun goes down,

When up they gat, and shook their lugs,
Rejoic'd they were na men but dogs.

TWAIN, MARK, see Clemens.

Tweddledum and Tweedledee: for the origin of the expression see under Handel. The words were first used in a musical connexion. 'To tweedle' is to produce a succession of shrill musical sounds, to whistle or pipe; and 'tweedledee' and 'tweddledum' were used to suggest the contrast between the sounds of high- and low-pitched musical instruments. [OED.]

Tweddledum and Tweedledee figure in Lewis Carroll's 'Through the Looking-glass', where they engage in a notable battle.

Twelfth Day, 6 Jan., the twelfth day from the Nativity, also called the feast of the Epiphany, was formerly celebrated as the closing day of the Christmas festivities, with special reference, some think, to the Magi (q.v.) or Wise Men of the East. A large cake was served at the festivities, containing a bean or coin, to determine who should be king of the feast.

Twelfth Night, Or what you will, a comedy by Shakespeare, produced probably in 1600-1, and first printed in the folio of 1623. The story was probably taken from 'The History of Apolonius and Silla' in 'Riche his farewell to the Military Profession' (1581), an English rendering of a tale in Cinthio's 'Hecatommithi', or from Bandello or Belleforest.

Sebastian and Viola, twin brother and sister, and closely resembling one another, are separated in a shipwreck off the coast of Illyria. Viola, brought to shore in a boat, and disguised as a youth Cesario, takes service as page with Duke Orsino, who is in love with the lady Olivia. The latter rejects the Duke's suit and will not admit him to her presence. Orsino makes a confidant of Cesario and sends her to press his suit on Olivia, much to the distress of Cesario, who has fallen in love with Orsino. Olivia in turn falls in love with Cesario. Sebastian and Antonio, captain of the ship that had rescued Sebastian, now arrive in Illyria. Cesario, challenged to a duel by Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a rejected suitor of Olivia, is rescued from her predicament by Antonio, who takes her for Sebastian. Antonio, being arrested at that moment for an old offence, claims from Cesario a purse that he had entrusted to Sebastian, is denied it, and haled off to prison. Olivia coming upon the true Sebastian, takes him for Cesario, invites him to her house, presses her suit on him, finds him not unwilling, and marries him out of hand. Orsino comes to visit Olivia. Antonio is brought before him, claims Cesario as the youth he has rescued from the sea; while Olivia claims Cesario as her husband. The duke, deeply wounded, is bidding farewell to Olivia and the 'young dissembler' Cesario, when the arrival of the true Sebastian clears up the confusion. The duke, disappointed of Olivia, and becoming conscious of the love that Viola (as Cesario) has betrayed, turns his affection to her, and they are married.

The humour which abounds in the play is chiefly provided by the subordinate characters, who have no essential connexion with the plot: Sir Toby Belch, uncle to Olivia; Sir Andrew Aguecheek, his friend; Malvolio, the pompous conceited steward to Olivia; Maria, her attendant; and the clown, Feste. The play contains one of the most beautiful of Shakespeare's songs, 'Come away, come away, death'.

Twelve of England, THE, in the 'Lusiads' of Camoens (q.v.), canto VI. xlii et seq. Velloso tells a tale of a tournament arranged by the duke of Lancaster between 'the Twelve of England' and an equal number of Portuguese knights.

Twickenham, on the Thames, about ten miles W. of the centre of London, for many years the residence of Pope (q.v.). Famous also for Strawberry Hill, where Horace Walpole made his 'little Gothic castle'. Twickenham now has a celebrated Rugby football ground.

TWITCHER

Twitcher, JEMMY, in Gay's 'Beggar's Opera' (q.v.), one of Captain Macheath's associates, who betrays him. The nickname was given to the fourth earl of Sandwich (1718-92), who had been associated with Wilkes in the Medmenham 'brotherhood' and yet, when Wilkes's papers were seized, was active in collecting evidence against him. The allusion is to a line in the play, 'That Jemmy Twitcher should peach me, I own surprised me.'

Two Drovers, The, a short story by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), one of the 'Chronicles of the Canongate', published in 1827.

The story is designed to illustrate the Highland character. Robin Oig M'Combich, a Highland drover of good family, sets out for England with his cattle, in company with his friend, a Yorkshire drover, Harry Wakefield. When they reach Cumberland, the latter, annoyed over some trivial affair of accommodation for the cattle, fixes a quarrel on Robin in an inn, where the whole company join in insulting the Highlander. When Robin refuses to fight with his fists, as beneath the dignity of a Highland gentleman, Wakefield knocks him down. Robin walks twelve miles to fetch his dirk, which he has left with a comrade, returns to the inn, and in the presence of all plunges the dirk in Harry's breast. He then gives himself up to justice, ready to give a life for the life he took.

Two Foscari, The, a historical tragedy by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1821.

Jacopo, son of the doge of Venice, Francesco Foscari, has twice been exiled, for venality and for complicity in murder. He has been brought back from exile on a charge of treasonable correspondence, and the play opens with his examination on the rack. The doge, his father, broken-hearted at his disgrace, signs the sentence for his third perpetual exile. But Jacopo's love for Venice is so intense that he expires from dread of leaving it again. The Ten meanwhile decide to require the abdication of the old doge. He at once leaves the palace, and, as he descends the steps and hears the bells of St. Mark's tolling for the election of his successor, falls down and dies.

The play departs slightly from the facts. Jacopo died in exile at Candia, and the doge a few days after his deposition.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, The, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), one of his early works, probably of 1594-5, first printed in the folio of 1623. The story is taken from Montemayor's pastoral romance 'Diana'.

The two gentlemen of Verona are the friends Valentine and Proteus. Proteus is in love with Julia, who returns his affection, Valentine leaves Verona for Milan 'to see the wonders of the world abroad', and there falls in love with Silvia, the duke of Milan's daughter. Presently Proteus is sent also on his travels, and exchanges vows of constancy with Julia before starting. But arriving at

TWO ON A TOWER

Milan, Proteus is at once captivated by Silvia, and, betraying both his friend and his former love, reveals to the duke the intention of Valentine to carry off Silvia. Valentine is banished and becomes a captain of robbers, and Proteus continues his court of Silvia. Meanwhile Julia, pining for Proteus, comes to Milan dressed as a boy and takes service as Proteus' page, unrecognized by him. Silvia, to escape marriage with Thurio, her father's choice, leaves Milan to rejoin Valentine, is captured by robbers and rescued from them by Proteus. Proteus is violently pressing his suit on Silvia when Valentine comes on the scene. Proteus is struck with remorse, and his contrition is such that Valentine is impelled to surrender Silvia to him, to the dismay of Proteus' page, the disguised Julia. She swoons, and is then recognized by Proteus, and the discovery of her constancy wins back his love. The duke and Thurio arrive. Thurio shows cowardice in face of Valentine's determined attitude, and the duke, approving Valentine's spirit, accords him Silvia. Launce, the clownish servant of Proteus, and his dog Crab, 'the sourest natured dog that lives', provide some drollery.

Two Kings of Brentford, see Rehearsal.

Two Noble Kinsmen, The, a play by J. Fletcher (q.v.), probably with the collaboration of Shakespeare, printed in 1634.

The play, which deals with the story of Palamon and Arcite, follows fairly closely the story as told by Chaucer in the 'Knight's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales), but adds the incidents of the liberation of Palamon from prison by the jailer's daughter, and her going mad for love of him.

Two on a Tower, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1882.

Lady Constantine, whose notoriously unkind husband has gone to Africa lion-hunting, falls in love with Swithin St. Cleeve, a young astronomer and a man of comparatively humble position. She learns that her husband has died, and marries Swithin secretly. Later she discovers that by doing so she has deprived him of a legacy which would have enabled him to advance in his career; and then that her husband, though now dead, was alive at the time of her marriage with Swithin, which is consequently void. She insists on his leaving her and accepting advantageous employment in S. Africa. After he has gone, she discovers that she is with child by him. Under pressure from her brother she accepts in haste an offer of marriage from Bishop Helmsdale, and a son is born. Of the arrogant bishop's discovery of her reason for marrying him and of their life together we are told nothing. But the end of the story is illuminating. Swithin returns after the bishop's death. He is disillusioned at finding her an old woman, and is at first cold to her, to her despair; but recovering himself, he says he has come to marry her. 'The revulsion is too great, and she falls dead of joy. 'The Bishop was avenged.'

TWO ON A TOWER

Two Years Ago, a novel by C. Kingsley (q.v.), published in 1857.

In this work the author deals with some of the moral problems and material evils of contemporary English life, notably the need for sanitary reform. The central event is the descent of cholera (which was prevalent in England in the middle of the 19th cent.) upon a Cornish village, revealing the self-sacrificing character of some of its inhabitants. Chief among these are the gallant doctor, Tom Thurnall, in whom countless escapes by flood and field have raised self-confidence to the point of arrogance; the nonconformist schoolmistress, Grace Harvey, whose devotion is based on a higher faith; and the high-church curate, Frank Headley, whose grit at last wins the hearts of the dissenting villagers. Contrasted with Tom Thurnall is the effeminate John Briggs, the apothecary's poetic assistant, whose career, based on the assumption of a false name, brings him temporary prosperity, marred by terror of detection, and ended by tragedy. There is a vividly described shipwreck, and a secondary plot involving a denunciation of slavery in the United States. The Crimean War enters slightly into the story, bringing occasion for a crisis in Tom Thurnall's spiritual life, and his final union with Grace Harvey.

Twysden, TALBOT, a character in Thackeray's 'The Adventures of Philip' (q.v.).

Tybalt, a character in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.). For the allusion in the play to cats in connexion with his name, see Tibert.

Tyburn, the name of an ancient manor, north-west of the old city of London, so called from the stream, the Tybourne, which ran through it. Its name was changed to Mary-le-bourne (Marylebone, q.v.) in the 15th cent. The Tybourne flowed south to the Thames through what are now the dips in Oxford Street and Piccadilly, west of Bond Street.

Tyburn is celebrated as the principal place of execution of malefactors until 1783. The gallows, which had formerly stood farther east, were moved in the 16th cent. to a point NW. of the present position of the Marble Arch. Here the Tyburn Road turned off from Watling Street, and, following approximately the line of Oxford Street and Holborn, reached the city at Newgate.

Tyburnia, the residential quarter of London in the neighbourhood of Portman Square, so named from its proximity to the ancient Tyburn (q.v.), and frequently mentioned in Thackeray's novels.

Tyler, WAT (d. 1381), the leader of the peasants' revolt of 1381, who with Jack Straw led the peasants of Kent and Essex to London. He was killed by William Walworth, the lord mayor of London, in the course of a discussion with Richard II at Smithfield. He is the subject of a drama by Southey.

TYNDALE, WILLIAM (d. 1536), the translator of the Bible, studied at Oxford and Cambridge. He was preaching in Gloucestershire before 1522 and became involved in disputes with the clergy. He formed the project of translating the Scriptures into the vernacular, but finding difficulties in England went to Hamburg for the purpose. He visited Luther at Wittenberg, and commenced printing his translation of the New Testament at Cologne in 1525. He completed the work at Worms and introduced copies into England, which were denounced by the bishops and destroyed. He himself was ordered to be seized at Worms by Wolsey, but escaped to the protection of Philip, the landgrave of Hesse, at Marburg. He became a Zwinglian and an active pamphleteer, upholding the sole authority of Scripture in the Church and of the king in the State, earning the approval of Henry VIII, which he subsequently lost by opposing the king's divorce. He engaged in controversy with Sir T. More (q.v.) and wrote 'An answer unto Sir Thomas Mores dialogue' in 1531. He was betrayed to imperial officers and arrested for heresy, imprisoned at Vilvorde in 1535, and strangled and burnt at the stake there, in spite of Cromwell's intercession. Tyndale was one of the most remarkable of the Reformation leaders; his original writings show sound scholarship, but his translation of the Bible—consisting of the New Testament (1525), Pentateuch (c. 1530), and Jonah (1531)—the accuracy of which has been endorsed by the translators of the authorized version, is his surest title to fame. He also translated the 'Enchiridion Militis Christiani' of Erasmus (q.v.).

TYNDALL, JOHN (1820–93), professor of natural history at the Royal Institution in 1853 and superintendent there from 1867 to 1887, did much by his investigations to advance, and by his lectures and published works to popularize, science. The following are some of his principal writings: 'The Glaciers of the Alps' (1860), 'Mountaineering' (1862), 'Heat considered as a Mode of Motion' (1863), 'On Radiation' (1865), 'On Sound' (1867), 'On Light' (1869), and 'Lectures on Light' (1873), 'Contributions to Molecular Physics' (1872), 'Floating Matter in the Air' (1881). His famous address to the British Association at Belfast in 1874, on the relation between science and theological opinion, was reprinted in 'Fragments of Science', vol. ii.

Typee, see Melville.

Typhon or ΤΥΦΟΝ, in Greek mythology, a terrible monster, son of Tartarus and Gē, and father of various other monsters, such as the Chimæra and the Lernaean Hydra (qq.v.). He had a hundred heads and a tremendous voice. Zeus overthrew him with thunderbolts, set him on fire, and flung him into Tartarus or under Mount Etna or some other volcano. For his identification with the Egyptian god Set, see Osiris.

Tyr, see Tiu.

Tyrannic Love, or The Royal Martyr, a heroic play in rhymed couplets by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1669.

Maximin, the Roman emperor, while besieging Aquileia, falls in love with Catharine, the Christian princess of Alexandria, his captive, but is repulsed by her. Catharine converts Berenice the empress to Christianity, and Maximin orders them both to execution. St. Catharine is beheaded, but Maximin is stabbed by Placidius, one of his officers, who loves Berenice.

The play, which contains some beautiful passages, is marred by absurdities, which provided material for ridicule in 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.).

Tyrrel, FRANCIS, a character in Scott's 'St. Roman's Well' (q.v.).

TYRRELL, GEORGE (1861-1909), a leader of the modernist movement in religion, joined the Roman Church in 1879 and the Society of Jesus, from which he was dismissed in 1906 for his unorthodox 'Letter to a Professor of Anthropology'. This he published as 'A much abused Letter' with copious annotations. His other published works include: 'Nova et Vetera' (1897), 'Hard Sayings' (1898), 'External Religion' (1899), 'The Faith of the Millions' (1901-2, two series), 'Oil and Wine' (1902), 'Lex Orandi' (1903), 'Lex Credendi' (1906), 'Through Scylla and Charybdis' (an exposition of his religious development, 1907), 'Medievalism' (a reply to Cardinal Mercier's attack on modernism, 1908), 'Christianity at the Crossroads' (1909). 'Essays on Faith and Immortality' (1914) and his 'Autobiography and Life', edited by M. D. Petre (1912), were issued after his death.

Tyrrell, SIR JAMES (d. 1502), a strong adherent of Richard III, and the supposed murderer of the princes in the Tower of London.

Tyrrell or TIREL, WALTER (fl. 1100), son of the lord of Poix in Picardy, was generally believed to have shot the arrow which killed William Rufus, but denied having done so.

TYRTÆUS, a poet who lived at Sparta in the latter part of the 7th cent. B.C., and by his war-songs and elegiac lays, fragments of which survive, encouraged his countrymen in their war with the Messenians.

TYRWHITT, THOMAS (1730-86), educated at Eton and Queen's College, Oxford, fellow of Merton and Clerk of the House of Commons (1762-8), is remembered for his edition and exposure of the 'Rowley Poems' (q.v., 1777-8), in the authenticity of which he originally believed; for his 'Observations . . . upon . . . Shakespeare' (1766); and still more for his studies of Chaucer, whose 'Canterbury Tales' he edited in 1775-8, expounding his versification and helping to establish the Chaucer canon.

TYTLER, PATRICK FRASER (1791-1849), joint founder with Sir W. Scott of the Bannatyne Club (q.v.), was author of a 'History of Scotland' from the reign of Alexander III to the year 1603 (1828-43), and a history of 'England under the Reign of Edward VI and Mary' (1839). He also wrote lives of the Admirable Crichton (1819), Wycliffe (1826), Sir Walter Raleigh (1833), and Henry VIII (1837), besides other historical works.

Tzlgane, see Gipy.

U

UDALL or UVEDALE, NICHOLAS (1505-56), dramatist and scholar, educated at Winchester, successively head master of Eton and Westminster. He was author of 'Ralph Roister Doister' (q.v.), the earliest known English comedy. He translated selections from Terence and other works, and wrote Latin plays on sacred subjects. Tusser (q.v., 'Five hundred pointes') complains of having been severely flogged by Udall 'for fault but small or none at all'. Udall got into grave trouble at Eton and was sent to the Marshalsea by the Privy Council. He figures in F. M. Ford's novel, 'The Fifth Queen'.

Udaller, a tenant of land in Orkney or Shetland by the old native form of freehold tenure. The word is connected with 'alodial' as opposed to 'feudal' tenure of land. Magnus Trol, in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.), is frequently referred to as 'the Udaller'.

Udolpho, Mysteries of, see Mysteries of Udolpho.

Ugolino de' Gherardeschi (d. 1289), an Italian Guelph leader, who twice by treachery, in 1284 and again in 1288, made himself master of Pisa. He was finally overthrown, and with his two sons and two of his grandsons was locked up in a tower and starved to death. The episode figures in canto xxxiii of Dante's 'Inferno'.

ULFILAS or WULFILA (A.D. 311-81), a Christian of Cappadocian origin, was consecrated bishop of the Arian Visigoths in 341, and subsequently migrated with them to the neighbourhood of Nicopolis in Moesia. He translated the Bible into Gothic from the Greek, inventing, it is said, an alphabet for the purpose. Fragments of this translation, chiefly of the N.T., survive (e.g. the Codex Argenteus at Upsala), and are of great value to the philological science of the Germanic languages.

ULFILAS

Ullin's Daughter, Lord, a ballad by Campbell (q.v.).

ULPIAN (ULPIANUS DOMITIUS), a celebrated Roman jurist, who became secretary and adviser of the emperor Alexander Severus (222-35). He was killed by some soldiers who had entered the palace at night, about 228. He wrote many valuable legal works.

Ulric, in Byron's 'Werner' (q.v.), the son of Werner.

Ulrica, in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.), the old sibyl who sets fire to the castle of Torquilstone and perishes in the flames.

Ultima Thule, see Thule.

Ultramontane, meaning literally 'beyond the mountain' (i.e. the Alps), a term applied to those who hold extreme views in favour of the papal authority.

Ultrajectum, also Trajectum ad Rhenum, in imprints, Utrecht.

Ulysses, or, according to his Greek name, ODYSSEUS, son of Laertes and Anticlea (daughter of Autolycus), and king of the island of Ithaca. He became one of the suitors of Helen, but despairing of success married Penelope (qq.v.). It was by his advice that Tyndarus, father of Helen, bound her suitors by an oath to join in protecting her if she were exposed to violence. When she was carried off to Troy, Ulysses joined the other Greek princes in the expedition to recover her, after having failed to evade his obligation by simulating madness (see Palamedes). During the Trojan War he was distinguished for his prudence and sagacity no less than for his valour, and was awarded the arms of Achilles, after the death of that hero, in preference to Ajax. After the war he embarked to return home, but met on the way with a series of adventures recounted in Homer's 'Odyssey'. He was thrown upon the coast of Africa and visited the country of the Lotus-eaters; narrowly escaped destruction by the Cyclops, Polyphemus (q.v.); received a bag of winds from Aeolus (q.v.); lost eleven of his twelve ships at the hands of the Laestrygonians (q.v.); was detained a year by Circe (q.v.), and for seven years by Calypso (q.v.); was cast on the island of the Phaeacians, where he was kindly entertained by Nausicaa and her father Alcinous; and finally after an absence of twenty years reached Ithaca, where with the assistance of his son, Telemachus, and the swineherd, Eumaeus (qq.v.), he destroyed the importunate suitors of Penelope. He lived some sixteen years after his return. Then Telegonus, his son by Circe, who had come to Ithaca to make himself known to his father, was shipwrecked on the island, and, being destitute, plundered some of the inhabitants. In the ensuing quarrel, Telegonus killed Ulysses, not knowing who he was.

In a dramatic monologue, Tennyson presents Ulysses, in his last years, setting out 'to sail beyond the sunset', 'to follow knowledge like a sinking star'. The episode is not in Homer, but in Dante ('Inferno', xxvi).

Ulysses, a novel by James Joyce (q.v.).

Ulyssipo, in imprints, Lisbon.

Uma, in Hindu mythology, a name of the goddess Devi, the wife of Siva.

Umayyads or OMMIYADES, a powerful family of the Quraysh tribe (to which the Hashimite family of Mohammed also belonged), which included a series of caliphs, beginning with Moawiyah, the successor of Ali (q.v.). To this family, at a later period, belonged the Arab dynasty that ruled in Spain (8th to 11th cents.).

Umbriel, 'a dusky melancholy sprite' in Pope's 'Rape of the Lock' (q.v.).

Una, in Bk. 1 of Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', typifies the true religion. She is separated from the Red Cross Knight (q.v.) of Holiness (the Anglican Church) by the wiles of Archimago (q.v.), but meets and is protected by a lion (England), until the latter is killed by Sansloy (q.v.), who carries Una off to a forest. She is rescued by fauns and satyrs, and is finally united to the Red Cross Knight.

Uncial, from the Latin uncialis, 'pertaining to the twelfth part', i.e. an inch or an ounce. In connexion with writing, it is applied to letters having the large rounded forms (not joined to each other) characteristic of early Greek and Latin manuscripts. The term is commonly explained as meaning originally 'letters of an inch long'.

Uncle Remus, see Harris (J. C.).

Uncle Sam, a jocular name for the government (or people) of the United States, a facetious interpretation of the initials U.S. Various legends connecting the expression with government officials of the name of Samuel appear to be unfounded. [OED.]

Uncle Silas, a novel by J. S. Le Fanu (q.v.), published in 1864.

Maud Ruthyn is the daughter of Austin Ruthyn, a rich eccentric recluse, whose younger brother, Silas, is under suspicion of having murdered in his own house a man with whom he was involved in gambling transactions. Austin Ruthyn, however, believes his brother to be maligned, and at his death leaves his daughter, Maud, to the guardianship of Silas, to whom his fortune will revert in the event of her death. Silas, who is in fact a hypocritical villain, heavily in debt, tries to force a marriage between his niece and his own repulsive son, and when it turns out that his son is married already, plots with him to murder Maud. The author skillfully sets out the various circumstances so as to produce on the reader a sense of terror: the seclusion of Maud from all her friends; the arrival of a sinister French governess, Mme de la Rougierre, an accomplice of the murderers; the description of the spiked hammer with which the murder is to be committed, &c. The murder miscarries, for the governess falls its unintended but deserving victim, and Maud is rescued.

Uncle Toby, Mr: Captain Shandy, uncle of the nominal hero of Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.).

Uncle Tom's Cabin, see Stowe.

Uncommercial Traveller, The, a collection of tales and sketches of places and manners, and of institutions needing reform, by Charles Dickens (q.v.), first published in 'Household Words' and 'All the Year Round', and reissued in 1861 and 1866. It contains some of Dickens's best literary work.

Under the Greenwood Tree, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1872.

This is an idyll, set in the rustic scene of Mellstock village, of two young lovers, Dick Dewy, son of the local 'tranter' or irregular carrier, and Fancy Day, the schoolmistress, who, after overcoming the usual difficulties in the way of true love, are happily married. The Mellstock musicians, rebellious against their displacement from the church gallery in favour of a harmonium, provide some delightful racy talk. There is a little bitter with the sweet. Fancy Day, engaged to Dick, momentarily yields to the temptation of an offer of marriage by the vicar. She comes to her senses and withdraws, but she will not tell Dick, as the vicar urges.

Understanding, LORD, in Bunyan's 'Holy War' (q.v.), the lord mayor of Mansoul, deposed from his office and imprisoned during the tyranny of Diabolus.

Underwoods, a collection of 'lesser poems' by Jonson (q.v.), first printed in the folio of 1640. It includes the famous poem to Shakespeare, and Whalley's edition (1756) adds the well-known epitaph on the countess of Pembroke ('Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother') now generally attributed to W. Browne.

'Underwoods' is also the name (confessedly adopted from Jonson) of a book of poems by R. L. Stevenson (q.v.).

Undine, a fairy romance published in 1811 by Friedrich, Baron de la Motte Fouqué (1777-1843), German officer of cuirassiers and prolific writer of poetry, drama, and prose fiction. The story was suggested to him by a passage in Paracelsus, and Undine is a sylph, the personification of the watery element. A humble fisherman and his wife have lost their child by drowning, and Undine, a capricious roguish maiden, has come mysteriously to them and been brought up in her stead. A knight, Huldbrand von Ringstetten, takes shelter in their cottage and falls in love with Undine. They are married, and the sylph in consequence receives a soul. But her relations, and particularly uncle Kühleborn, the wicked water goblin, are a source of trouble. Huldbrand begins to neglect his wife and becomes attached to the haughty Bertalda, who is humbled by the discovery that she is the fisherman's lost child. One day, in a boat on the Danube, Huldbrand, tormented by Undine's kindred, angrily rebukes his wife, and she is snatched away by them into the water and seen no more. Presently Huldbrand proposes to Bertalda, and they are about to be married, when Undine, rising from a well, goes to the knight's room, kisses him, and he dies.

Unfortunate Traveller, The, or the Life of Jacke Wilton, a prose tale of adventure by T. Nash (q.v.), published in 1594, the earliest picaresque romance in English, and the most remarkable work of the kind before Defoe. It is dedicated to the earl of Southampton. Jacke Wilton is 'a certaine kinde of an appendix or page' attending on the court of Henry VIII at the time of the siege of Tournay. He lives by his wits, playing tricks on a niggardly old victualler and other gullible occupants of the camp, and gets whipped for his pains. He goes to Münster, which the Anabaptists are holding against the emperor, and sees John of Leyden hanged. The earl of Surrey, the lover of the Fair Geraldine, takes him to Italy as his page. During their travels they meet Erasmus and Sir Thomas More, and Aretino. They hear Luther disputing at Wittenberg. Wilton passes himself off as the earl of Surrey and runs away with an Italian courtesan. There is a pleasant scene where the true earl discovers them and treats the escapade with singular good humour. After a tourney at Florence, where the earl defeats all comers in honour of the Fair Geraldine, Wilton leaves him, and is at Rome during an outbreak of the plague. Here, turning from lighter themes, he depicts scenes of violence and tragedy, rapes, murders, tortures, and executions. Depressed by what he has seen, he is converted to a better way of life, marries his courtesan, and is last seen at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, in the king of England's camp. The whole story is told with much spirit and wit.

Unicorn, a fabulous animal usually regarded as having the body of a horse with a single horn projecting from its forehead; the monoceros of the ancients. Pliny describes it as having, in addition, the head of a deer, the feet of an elephant, and the tail of a lion. Its horn was reputed to have medicinal or magical properties. It has been identified at various times with the rhinoceros, certain species of antelope, &c. See 'The Lore of the Unicorn', by O. Shepard (1930), an interesting piece of research. In Heraldry a unicorn figures as a supporter of the royal arms of Great Britain; the old royal arms of Scotland had two unicorns for supporters. The narwhal or sea-unicorn has a spirally twisted horn resembling that of the fabulous animal. The word translated 'unicorn' in the O.T. is translated 'wild ox' in the Revised Version.

Uniformity, ACT OF, passed in 1559, forbade the use of any form of public prayer other than the second prayer-book of Edward VI (with some modifications). The Act of Uniformity of 1662 required clergymen and schoolmasters to accept the prayer-book.

Unigenitus Dei Filius, 'The Only-begotten Son of God', a papal bull issued by Pope Clement XI in 1713 condemning the Jansenist (q.v.) heresy. The effect of this bull was felt in all Latin Catholic countries throughout the century; and at last, as Voltaire said, it turned out to the prejudice of the Jesuits, who had driven the pope to issue it.

Unionist, a member of the political party which advocated maintenance of the parliamentary union between Great Britain and Ireland; an opponent of Home Rule. The party was formed in 1886 by the coalition of the Conservatives with those Liberals (Liberal Unionists) who were opposed to Gladstonian Home Rule. While the chief tenet of this party was the maintenance of the union, its general policy and principles gradually became identified with those of the Conservative party.

Unitarian, a member of a religious body that affirms the single personality of the Godhead, as opposed to believers in the Trinity. The distinct English body of Unitarians dates from the secession in 1773 of Theophilus Lindsay from the Anglican Church; and it was to some form of Unitarian Church that the English (as opposed to the Scottish) Presbyterians ultimately turned. It was strong at Manchester and at Norwich in the first half of the 19th cent.

Volunteer State, Tennessee (Tenn.), because of its remarkable record in furnishing volunteers in the Civil War. 1796.

Wolverine State, Michigan (Mich.). 1837.

Wonder State, Arkansas (Ark.), a title given by act of general assembly in 1923 because of its remarkable natural resources. 1836.

Unities, THE, three principles of dramatic composition, viz. that a play should consist of one main action, occurring at one time (not longer than the play takes to perform), and in one place; expanded from Aristotle's 'Poetics' by 16th-cent. Italian critics, and by French classical dramatists of the 17th cent. The Unities were often modified; e.g. the time-limit was extended to twenty-four hours, and the place to one house or town, rather than one room or street.

University Wits, name given to a group of Elizabethan playwrights and pamphleteers, of whom Nash, Greene, Lyly, and Lodge were the chief.

UNO, the Organization of the United Nations (being those which had resisted the Axis powers) for the maintenance of international peace and security. Its Charter was signed at San Francisco on 26 June 1945, and the first meetings of its General Assembly and Security Council were held in London early in 1946.

Unreason, ABBOT OF, see Misrule.

Unter den Linden, 'Under the lime trees', the name of a celebrated street in Berlin running eastward from the Brandenburger Thor, and containing the palaces of the former Imperial family, the university, &c.

UNTERMEYER, LOUIS (1885-), American poet, critic, and novelist, born in New York, one of the 'young poets' of America. His chief works are: 'Challenge' (1914), 'These Times' (1917), 'This Singing World' (modern poems for children, 1923), 'American Poetry since 1900' (1923), 'Collected Parodies' (1926). Untermeyer has translated much German poetry, including Heine (1917).

Unto This Last, four essays on economics by Ruskin (q.v.), published in 1860-2. The publication was begun in the 'Cornhill Magazine', but gave rise to so great an outcry that Thackeray, the editor, discontinued it.

URANIAN APHRODITE

This was the earliest of Ruskin's economic treatises. He first deals with wages and employment, the possibility of fixing wages by legislation, and the maintenance of a regular flow of employment. He then discusses the nature of true wealth, to be distinguished from the riches obtained at the cost of making others poor. He defines the abstract idea of just wages—'that they will consist in a sum of money which will at any time procure for [the worker] at least as much labour as he has given'. He investigates the nature of this 'equivalent', from which the element of 'human capacities and dispositions' must not be excluded, as it is by J. S. Mill. 'The real science of political economy . . . is that which teaches nations to desire and labour for the things that lead to life.' Righteousness and ideals, and not only self-interest and material needs, should be taken by it into consideration. His final plea is for 'Not greater wealth, but simpler pleasure. . . . Care in no wise to make more of money, but care to make much of it; remembering always the great, palpable, inevitable fact—that what one person has, another cannot have.'

Ruskin's views were derided at the time, but many of the reforms that he advocated have since been adopted.

Up, Guards, and at them!, reputed to be the duke of Wellington's order which opened the last stage of the Battle of Waterloo.

Upnishad, see Veda.

Upas, a fabulous tree alleged to have existed in Java, with properties so poisonous as to destroy all animal and vegetable life to a distance of fifteen or sixteen miles around it. The account given in the 'London Magazine' of 1783, from which Erasmus Darwin adopted and gave currency to the fiction, professed to be translated from an account by a Dutch surgeon who was at Samarang in 1773. It was apparently the invention of Steevens (q.v.). Darwin ('Loves of the Plants', iii. 238) refers to it as follows:

Fierce in dread silence on the blasted heath
Fell Upas sits, the Hydra-Tree of death.

Ur of the Chaldees, the city where, according to the book of Genesis, Abraham settled, and whence he migrated northwards to Haran. It stood on the Persian Gulf near one of the mouths of the Euphrates. Recent excavations have resulted in discoveries of great interest. Ur was the seat of three Sumerian dynasties of which the first came to an end about 3575 B.C., and the third about 2300 B.C. (Peake and Fleure).

Uraeus, a representation of the sacred asp or serpent, employed as an emblem of supreme power and worn on the head-dress of ancient Egyptian divinities and sovereigns.

Urania, the Muse (q.v.) of astronomy.

Uranian Aphrodite or URANIAN VENUS, the 'Heavenly Aphrodite', distinguished from

URANIAN APHRODITE

APHRODITE PANDEMOS, the Aphrodite of the World, was the goddess of pure and ennobling love.

Urānus, the personification of the sky, the most ancient of the Greek gods and the first ruler of the universe. He married Gē, the earth, and was father of the Titans, including Cronos, who ousted him from his throne.

The planet Uranus was discovered in 1781 by Sir W. Herschel, accidentally.

URBAN, SYLVANUS, the pseudonym of E. Cave (q.v.), and, by succession, of the later editors of the 'Gentleman's Magazine'.

Urbi et Orbi, Latin, 'to the City and the World', an expression used in papal documents to indicate that they are addressed not to the City of Rome alone, but to the whole Catholic world. It was also applied to the blessing given by the pope on exceptional occasions ('Catholic Encyclopaedia').

Urdu, a Hindustani (Persian) word meaning 'camp' (our word 'horde' is derived from it), used elliptically for 'language of the camp', and equivalent in English to Hindustani, the language of the Mohammedan conquerors of Hindustan. This is a form of Hindi (q.v.) with a large admixture of Arabic, Persian, and other foreign elements. The word of command in our native Indian regiments was given in it.

URFÉ, HONORÉ D' (1567-1625), member of an old French family and author of 'Astrée' (1607-28), a long sentimental romance in a pastoral setting, presenting an ideal of polite and distinguished living, in which men and women of the world are shown in the guise of shepherds and shepherdesses. The principal substance of the plot, in which the affairs of a multitude of other couples are interwoven, is the love of the shepherd Céladon for the shepherdess Astrée, whose reproaches for his supposed infidelity cause him to throw himself into a river. He is not however drowned, as Astrée supposes, and after many trials and adventures, regains his mistress's heart. The work was immensely popular and contributed to the refinement of manners and expression.

Urgan, see Alice Brand.

Urganda, an enchantress in the romances of Amadis and Palmerin (qq.v.).

Uriah the Hittite, an officer in David's army, the husband of Bathsheba, whom David caused to be killed in battle (2 Sam. xi).

Uriel, one of the seven archangels enumerated in the 'Book of Enoch' (see under Angel). Milton ('Paradise Lost', iii. 690) makes him 'Regent of the Sun', beguiled by Satan in spite of his sharp sight.

Urlen, see Ryence.

Urim and Thummim, certain objects, the nature of which is not known, worn upon the 'breast-plate' of the Jewish high-priest, by means of which the will of Jehovah was held to be declared. They are mentioned in Exod. xxviii. 30; Deut. xxxiii. 8, and other passages.

Urizen, in the mystical poems of Blake (q.v.), a grim old giant, the symbol of restrictive morality, identified with Jehovah. Also a symbol of the bondage of man to the senses.

Urn Burial or Hydriotaphia, a treatise by Sir T. Browne (q.v.) published (with the 'Garden of Cyrus', q.v.) in 1658.

The point of departure is the discovery of some ancient sepulchral urns in Norfolk, which leads the author to consider the various modes of disposal of the dead recorded in history and practised in Britain, urns and their contents, funeral ceremonies, and immortality or annihilation. The tone is meditative and mystical, and the style, from the first words of the Epistle Dedicatory, 'When the Funerall pyre was out, and the last valediction over', to the melancholy splendour of the closing passage, 'But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy', reaches the highest level of rhetorical prose.

URQUHART or URCHARD, SIR THOMAS (1611-60), of Cromarty, educated at King's College, Aberdeen. He fought at Turriff against the Covenanters, withdrew to London, and was knighted in 1641. He followed Charles II to Worcester, where many of his manuscripts were destroyed by the Parliamentarians. He was imprisoned during 1651-2, and died abroad. His best-known work is a translation of the first three books of Rabelais (q.v.) (the first two published in 1653, the third in 1693). He wrote a number of curious treatises on mathematics, linguistics, &c., with strange Greek titles ('Trisotetras', 'Logopandecteision'), collected in 1774 and 1834; among them is his 'Ekskubalauron', which combines an Introduction to his Universal Language with a Vindication of the Honour of Scotland. This contains his well-known account of the 'Admirable Crichton'.

Ursa Major, the Great Bear constellation, see Callisto. Also a name given to Dr. Johnson by Boswell's father, Lord Auchinleck.

Ursula, Sr., a British saint and martyr, daughter of a 'Christian British King', who, according to legend, was put to death with 11,000 virgins, having been captured by Huns near Cologne when on a pilgrimage. A large number of human bones were discovered when foundations were being dug, in the 12th cent., for the city walls, and these were pronounced to be the bones of the martyrs and venerated in consequence. But bones of men were found among them. One explanation of the legend is that the 11,000 virgins were in reality only one, a certain 'St. Undecemilla'.

There is no mention of St. Ursula before the 10th cent., several hundred years after her supposed martyrdom. Details of the story appear in the 12th cent., and it is told by Geoffrey of Monmouth. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') traces St. Ursula to the Swabian moon-goddess Hörsel, the wandering Isis.

USK, THOMAS (d. 1388), the author of 'The Testament of Love', formerly ascribed to Chaucer, was under-sheriff of London by Richard II's mandate in 1387, and was proceeded against by the 'Merciless' parliament in 1388 and executed. 'The Testament of Love' is an allegorical prose work written by Usk in prison to enlist sympathy. Prof. Skeat discovered that the initial letters of the sections formed an acrostic reading, 'Margaret of vertu, have merci on T S K N V I'. He thought these letters a partial anagram for 'Kitson'. Henry Bradley, as a result of certain rearrangements of the text, found that the last letters should read THINUSK, i.e. 'thine Usk'.

Usnach, THE SONS OF, see Deirdre.

USSHER, JAMES (1581-1656), a scholar of Trinity College, Dublin, at its foundation, became archbishop of Armagh. He wrote much on theological subjects, and was learned in patristic literature and ancient Irish history. But his chief work is the 'Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti', a chronological summary in Latin of the history of the world from the Creation to the dispersion of the Jews under Vespasian, of extraordinary critical quality. His dates are still printed in the English Bible. He bequeathed his collection of books and manuscripts, including the 'Book of Kells', a fine Irish illuminated manuscript of the Gospels, to Trinity College, Dublin.

Utgard, in Scandinavian mythology, the outer chaotic world, the residence of the giants, whose chief was Utgard-Loki.

Uther Pendragon, in the Arthurian legend, king of the Britons and father of Arthur (q.v.). 'Pendragon' in Welsh means 'chief leader in war'.

Utilitarianism, an essay by J. S. Mill (q.v.), first published as a series of articles in 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1861, and in book form in 1863.

In this work, Mill, while accepting the Benthamite principle (see Bentham) that Utility, or the greatest happiness of the greatest number, is the foundation of morals, departs from it by maintaining that pleasures differ in kind or quality as well as in quantity,

VALA

'that some kinds of pleasure are more desirable and more valuable than others'; also by recognizing in 'the conscientious feelings of mankind' an 'internal sanction' to be added to Bentham's 'external sanctions'. 'The social feelings of mankind, the desire to be in unity with our fellow creatures' constitute 'the ultimate sanction of the greatest happiness, morality'.

Utopia, the principal literary work of Sir T. More (q.v.), is a speculative political essay written in Latin. The work was published in 1516 at Louvain, Erasmus supervising the printing. The form was probably suggested by the narrative of the voyages of Vespucci, printed in 1507. The subject is the search for the best possible form of government. More meets at Antwerp a traveller, one Raphael Hythloday, who has discovered 'Utopia', 'Nowhere land'. Communism is there the general law, a national system of education is extended to men and women alike, and the freest toleration of religion is recognized. The work at once became popular, and was translated into English in 1551, and into French (in 1530), German, Italian, and Spanish. The rapid fame of the book is shown by the reference to Utopians by Rabelais (III. i, published in 1546).

Utrecht, PEACE OF, the peace concluded in 1713, which terminated the War of the Spanish Succession. By the treaties between France on the one hand and Great Britain, Holland, Prussia, Savoy, and Portugal, on the other, Philip V retained the throne of Spain, but the crowns of France and Spain were never to be united; the Protestant succession was secured in England; the fortifications of Dunkirk were to be dismantled; Spain ceded her possessions in Italy and the Netherlands to Charles VI, and Sicily to the duke of Savoy; Great Britain retained Minorca and Gibraltar, and acquired Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and the French part of St. Christopher's. By the BARRIER TREATY the fortresses on the southern frontier of the Netherlands were to be garrisoned by Dutch troops, three-fifths of whose wages were to be paid by the emperor; galling to the latter, and at best a feeble guarantee. See also Asiento Treaty.

Uzziel, one of the angels. In Milton's 'Paradise Lost', iv. 781-2, he is 'next in power' to Gabriel.

V

Vae Victis!, Latin, 'Woe to the vanquished!', the exclamation attributed to Brennus, the Gaulish conqueror of Rome (390 B.C.), when, having demanded 1,000 lb. of gold as ransom for the Capitol, he threw his sword into the scales to balance an excess in the quantity delivered (Livy, v. 48).

Valdarno (Val d'Arno), the valley of the Arno, in which Florence is situated.

Valence, AYMER DE, in Scott's 'Castle Dangerous' (q.v.), lieutenant to Sir John de Walton.

Valentine, one of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona" in Shakespeare's play (q.v.).

Valentine and Orson, the subject of an early French romance. Bellisant, sister of King Pepin, is married to Alexander, emperor of Constantinople. The archpriest treacherously accuses Bellisant to her husband and she is banished. A bear carries away one of her children (Orson), who is reared as a wild man. The other (Valentine) is found by Pepin and brought up as a knight. Valentine meets Orson, conquers him, brings him to the court, and tames him. Numerous adventures follow, the principal of which is the imprisonment of Valentine and Orson and their mother Bellisant in the Castle of Clerimond, sister of the giant Ferragus, and their rescue by Pacolet, the dwarf messenger of Ferragus, who has a little magic horse of wood which conveys him instantly wherever he wishes.

The story appeared in English about 1550 as the 'History of two Valyannte Brethren, Valentyne and Orson', by Henry Watson. A ballad in Percy's 'Reliques' deals with it.

Valentine Legend, the hero of Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Valentine Vox the Ventriloquist, a novel by Henry Cockton (1807-53), first published in book form in 1840.

Valentine's Day, St., 14 Feb., on which day two martyrs of the name were executed, one a Roman priest, the other a bishop of Terni. There was an ancient practice among young people in England of choosing, by lot or otherwise, on St. Valentine's day, a sweetheart, a lover, or a special friend for the ensuing year, and of sending a present to the person so chosen. John Brand ('Popular Antiquities') quotes 'Paston Letters', ii. 24, as showing that the custom prevailed as early as 1476. Its origin is obscure. A rural tradition that birds choose their mates on the day in question is referred to by Chaucer ('Assembly of Fowles', 309), by Shakespeare ('A Midsummer Night's Dream', iv. i), and by Herrick in 'Hesperides'. There is a charming essay on St. Valentine's Day in Lamb's 'Essays of Elia'. In Hardy's 'Far from the Madding Crowd', it is the thoughtless sending of a valentine by Bathsheba Everdene to Farmer Boldwood that starts the train of events leading to the tragedy of the story.

On St. Valentine's Day, 1797, Sir John Jarvis with a fleet of fifteen sail defeated the Spanish fleet of twenty-seven sail off Cape St. Vincent.

Valentinian, a tragedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), produced between 1610 and 1614.

VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH

The play, which includes some beautiful lyrics, deals with the vengeance of Maximus, a general under Valentinian III, for the dishonour of his wife Lucina by the emperor, and her self-inflicted death. To get rid of Aecius, commander of the army and faithful to the emperor, who stands in the way of his vengeance, he causes the emperor's suspicion to fall on Aecius, who takes his own life in consequence. Valentinian is then poisoned by two followers of Aecius. Maximus is proclaimed emperor, takes Eudoxia, Valentinian's widow, as his consort, and reveals to her the part he has played in the deaths of Valentinian and Aecius, even pretending that he has been a party to the ravishment of Lucina. Eudoxia, in abhorrence, poisons Maximus at his inauguration.

'Aecius' is obviously Aëtius (who defeated the Huns at Châlons in 451). Some historical truth underlies the play.

Valerian, the husband of St. Cecilia, whose story is told in Chaucer's 'The Second Nun's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales).

VALÉRY, PAUL (1871-1945), French poet and essayist, author of 'La Jeune Parque' (1917), 'Charmes' (1922), 'Variété' (essays).

Valhalla, in Scandinavian mythology, a hall in Gladsheim (the residence of Odin), destined for the reception of dead heroes.

Vall, in Scandinavian mythology, the youngest son of Odin, who avenges Balder by slaying Hödur (qq.v.), the two deaths perhaps symbolizing the changes of the seasons. He is one of the survivors of Ragnarök (q.v.).

Valjean, JEAN, an ex-convict, the hero of Hugo's (q.v.) 'Les Misérables'.

Valkyries, THE, in Scandinavian mythology, the messenger maidens of Odin. Their special function was to kill the heroes selected for death in battle, and to conduct them when dead to Valhalla.

Wagner's opera 'Die Walküre' ('The Valkyries'), the second part of the 'Ring der Nibelungen' (q.v.), tells of the flight of Sieglinde, the wife of Hunding, with her brother Siegmund, of their love, and of the fight between Hunding and Siegmund, in which, by the interposition of Wotan, Siegmund is slain. Brynhilde, the Valkyrie, who has endeavoured, contrary to Wotan's order, to protect Siegmund, is degraded and laid to sleep, surrounded by a ring of fire, where only a hero can enter and awake her. For the continuation see Siegfried.

Valley of Humiliation, THE, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), the place where Christian encounters Apollyon. There is a beautiful description of it in Pt. II, where Mr. Great-heart explains its true character.

Valley of the Shadow of Death, THE, see Ps. xxiii. 4. Christian in the 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.) passes through it, 'a very solitary place', with a dangerous quag on one side and a deep ditch on the other, and the mouth of hell is close by one side of it, from which issue flames and fiends.

Vallombrosa, a valley some twenty miles east of Florence, referred to by Milton in 'Paradise Lost', i. 303.

Vallon, ANNETTE, see Wordsworth (W.).

Vamp, MR., in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.), a caricature of Gifford (q.v.).

Van Diemen's Land, now called Tasmania, was discovered by Abel Janzoon Tasman in 1642, and so named after Anton van Diemen, governor of the Dutch East Indies, 1636-45.

Van Dyck, ANTOON or SIR ANTHONY (1599-1641), born at Antwerp, a Flemish painter, the greatest of the pupils of Rubens (q.v.). As early as 1620 he was in England in the employment of James I, but in 1623 he went to Italy, and from 1626 to 1632 he was at Antwerp. In 1632 he became one of the court painters of Charles I, and was knighted by the king. He married in 1640 a lady of the Scottish house of Ruthven. He then went to Antwerp and Paris, but returned to England in 1641 to find that the Civil War had commenced and that, like his patron, he had fallen on evil days. He died in Blackfriars and was buried in old St. Paul's.

Though his ambition was to be a great historical painter, circumstances made him principally a portrait-painter, in which capacity he ranks with Titian and Velasquez. His finest portrait of Charles I and the portraits of 'The Three Children of Charles and Henrietta Maria' are in the Louvre. Another portrait of the king is in the Hermitage Gallery. Van Dyck also painted some notable sacred pictures.

Van Eyck, HUIBRECHT (1366?-1426), and his brother JAN (1390?-1440), two of the greatest painters of the early Flemish school. Their success is partly attributable to their discovery of a new process of mixing colours with oil, and to them we perhaps owe the introduction of the movable picture in place of wall-painting. Jan van Eyck was appointed painter to, and became the confidential friend of, Philip duke of Burgundy. The greatest work of the brothers is the 'Adoration of the Lamb' for a church at Ghent. The picture by Jan of John Arnolfini and his wife is in the National Gallery. The attribution of any share in the Van Eyck paintings to Huibrecht has been contested.

Van Gogh, VINCENT, see Post-Impressionism.

VAN TUYLL VAN SEROOSKERKEN, see Zélide.

VAN VECHTEN, CARL (1880-), American novelist, born in Iowa. Van Vechten is a good representative of the modern 'sophisticated' American writer of fiction. His chief works are: 'Peter Whiffle, his Life and Works' (1922), 'The Blind Bow-Boy' (1923), 'The Tattooed Countess' (1924), 'Nigger Heaven' (1926), 'Spider Boy' (1928).

VANIR

VANBRUGH, SIR JOHN (1664-1726), dramatist and architect, was son of a London tradesman, whose father, a merchant of Ghent, had fled to England from Alva's persecutions. In 1691 he was for some time a prisoner in the Bastille as a suspected spy. In 1697 he produced 'The Relapse, or Virtue in Danger' (q.v.) with immense success, and 'The Provok'd Wife' (q.v.) in the same year. His other principal comedies are 'The Confederacy' (q.v., 1705) and 'The Provok'd Husband' (q.v.), which he left unfinished and Cibber (q.v.) completed and brought out in 1728. His collected dramatic works appeared in 1730. As a playwright he offers a strong contrast to his contemporary, Congreve, in that he paid no attention to style. He wrote as he talked, and excelled in caricature. He, together with Congreve, was specially attacked by Collier (q.v.) in his 'Short View'.

As an architect Vanbrugh designed Castle Howard, his own Haymarket Theatre, and Blenheim Palace. He also designed the Clarendon Building, Oxford, jointly with Nicholas Hawksmoor. Vanbrugh was Clarenceux king-of-arms, 1704-26.

Vance, PHILLO, the detective in a series of stories of crime by the American author, Van Dine (Willard Huntington Wright).

VANCOUVER, GEORGE (1758-98), explorer, accompanied James Cook on his second voyage, was in Rodney's victory at Les Saintes in 1782, and was subsequently sent on a voyage of discovery to Australia and the North Pacific (1791-5). He surveyed the south-west of Australia and of New Zealand, and the Pacific coast of America, sailing round the island now called after him Vancouver (it had been discovered earlier by Spaniards) and returning by Cape Horn. His 'Voyage of Discovery to the N. Pacific' appeared posthumously in 1798.

Vandals, a Germanic tribe which in the 5th cent. A.D. invaded western Europe, and established settlements in various parts of it, especially in Gaul and Spain, finally in 428-9 migrating to northern Africa, where they supplanted the old Roman provincial government. In the year 455 their king, Genseric, led a marauding expedition against Rome, which he took and sacked. The Vandals were overthrown by Belisarius (q.v.) in 533, and this was a great misfortune for Christendom, for it let in the Mohammedans in the 7th cent.; and these, not the Vandals, completed the ruin of Roman Africa and Mauretania.

Vanhomrigh, ESTHER (1690-1723), see Swift. The name is pronounced 'Vanum-mery'.

Vanir, in Scandinavian mythology, a race of gods, distinct from the Æsir (q.v.), but who became united to them. They were the gods of the atmosphere, and included Niördr,

VANIR

Frey, Freyja, and Heimdal (qq.v.). It is suggested that the Æsir and Vanir were originally the gods of two different races or religions, which coalesced.

Vanity Fair, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), a fair set up by Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion, in the town Vanity, through which pilgrims passed on their way to the Eternal City. The town was so called because it was lighter than vanity, and in the fair were sold all kinds of vanity—houses, honours, kingdoms, and all sorts of delights. There Faithful was burnt to death; but there, in Pt. II, were found some pious persons who could now show their heads, for the blood of Faithful lay as a load upon his oppressors.

Vanity Fair, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published in monthly numbers in 1847–8.

The novel is principally concerned with the parallel careers of two strongly contrasted characters: Rebecca (Becky) Sharp, the clever, unscrupulous, and courageous daughter of a penniless artist and a French opera-dancer; and Amelia Sedley, a pretty, gentle, unintelligent creature, whose father is a rich man of business and lives in Russell Square. The pair are brought together as girls at Miss Pinkerton's Academy, where Becky is an articulated pupil and teaches French. We follow her through her attempt to capture the fat Jos Sedley, Amelia's brother and ex-collector of Boggley Wallah, to the home of the dirty, cynical, old Sir Pitt Crawley, where she is engaged as governess and captivates Sir Pitt himself and his rich sister Miss Crawley. The baronet on the death of his wife proposes to her, and brings to light the fact that Becky has overreached herself by getting secretly married to Rawdon, Sir Pitt's second son and the favourite of Miss Crawley, cavalry officer, gambler, and duellist; a revelation that infuriates Sir Pitt and Miss Crawley, and loses Rawdon his aunt's inheritance.

Meanwhile Amelia's father is ruined by speculations, and her intended marriage with a young officer, George Osborne, is forbidden by Osborne's purse-proud father. Amelia is heartbroken at the desertion of George, a worthless fellow whom she blindly adores. Captain Dobbin, George's fellow officer, her honest and unselfish worshipper, brings George to a sense of the shabbiness of his conduct, and the marriage takes place in defiance of old Osborne, who utterly repudiates his son. Then follows the campaign of Waterloo, and the chief actors are brought together at Brussels, where George, before being killed in the battle, engages in an intrigue with Becky, now Mrs. Rawdon Crawley.

Much of the remainder of the story is occupied with the skilful generalship by which the undaunted Becky wins her way into the highest society, first in Paris, then in London, in spite of poverty and disadvantages of birth. Unfortunately she does not confine herself to legitimate manoeuvres, but compromises her reputation, if not her virtue, by her encouragement of the vicious old Lord Steyne, from whom, without her husband's knowledge, she receives large sums of money. Rawdon, who is devoted to his wife, and in spite of his faults has a high sense of honour, finding her and Lord Steyne together in incriminating circumstances, breaks with her after a furious scene with his lordship.

Amelia, plunged in grief by the loss of the husband she still worships, lives with her shiftless parents a life of poverty and humiliation which the devoted Dobbin has secretly done his best to alleviate. She is even forced to surrender her son to old Osborne, in order to obtain from him some means of support. After ten years Dobbin comes home from India, but though Amelia is grateful to him, the memory of her husband still stands between her and him. It is only after Becky, now a disreputable frequenter of continental haunts, has revealed to her George's infidelity that Amelia's idol is finally shattered, and room is made in her heart for Dobbin, whom she finally marries.

There are many other entertaining characters in the book: Pitt Crawley, the old baronet's pompous elder son; the Rev. Bute Crawley, the baronet's brother, and his designing wife; Briggs, Miss Crawley's companion and Becky's 'sheep-dog'; Major O'Dowd, his Irish wife, and Glorvina, his dashing sister; the Bareacres family whose rank is the only ground for their arrogance; and the tyrannical Lady Southdown, Pitt Crawley's mother-in-law, who administers tracts and medicine to all her family.

Vanity of Human Wishes, The, a poem by S. Johnson (q.v.), published in 1749. It is an imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal.

The poet considers the various objects of human ambition and indicates their vanity. First, power, which he illustrates by the rise and fall of Thomas Wolsey, of Buckingham, Hyde, and others. Then he points to the dangers attending eminence in learning, and the end of Galileo and Laud. He passes to military glory and the fate of Charles of Sweden; and then to the miseries attending great length of life and the dangers of physical beauty. His conclusion is:

Still raise for good the supplicating voice,
But leave to Heav'n the measure and the choice.

Varangians, THE, from ON. Væringi, apparently from var-, plighted faith; the Scandinavian rovers who in the 9th and 10th cents. overran Russia and reached Constantinople; hence the Northmen (latterly also the Anglo-Saxons) forming the bodyguard of the later Byzantine emperors. [OED.] The Varangians figure in Scott's 'Count Robert of Paris' (q.v.).

Varden, GABRIEL, a character in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), father of Dolly Varden.

VARIORUM

VARIORUM or VARIORUM EDITION, an edition, especially of the complete works of a classical author, containing the notes of various editors or commentators [OED.].

Varney, RICHARD, a character in Scott's 'Kenilworth' (q.v.).

Varuna, in early Vedic mythology, the greatest, with Indra, of the Indian gods, the lord and maintainer of the physical universe. The name is perhaps to be identified with the Greek Ὠκεανός, heaven. In post-Vedic mythology, Varuna appears as the god of the ocean and of the night.

VASARI, GIORGIO (1511-74), Italian painter, architect, and author, especially remembered as the author of 'Lives of the most excellent Architects, Painters, and Sculptors' of his own country (1550 and 1568).

Vasco da Gama, see Gama.

Vashti, the rebellious queen of Ahasuerus (see Esther i). She figures in Pt. I of Abercrombie's (q.v.) series of dramatic poems, 'Emblems of Love'.

Vatel, FRANÇOIS (d. 1671), steward to Fouquet and subsequently to the Prince de Condé. Because he thought the fish would not arrive in time for a Friday's repast given at Chantilly by the prince to Louis XIV, Vatel committed suicide.

Vathek, An Arabian tale, by W. Beckford (q.v.), published in English in 1786.

The work was written by Beckford in French and translated into English, probably by Samuel Henley, the translation being revised by Beckford. It reflects in part a spiritual experience in the author's life, but what precisely this was remains obscure.

The Caliph Vathek, grandson of Haroun-al-Raschid, under the influence of his sorceress mother, the Greek Carathis, and of his own unbounded curiosity and megalomania, becomes a servant of Eblis (the Devil), makes a sacrifice of fifty children, and sets off from his capital, Samarah, to the ruined city of Istakar, where he is promised the sight of the treasures of the pre-Adamite sultans. On the way he falls in love with Nouronihar, the beautiful daughter of one of his emirs, who accompanies him on his quest. Amid various grotesque and extravagant incidents, he obtains admission to the subterranean halls of Eblis, only to discover the vanity of the riches and wonders that he sees there, and to receive the penalty of his crime, in the form of eternal torture. The principal literary merit of the work lies in the description of this inferno and of Vathek's end.

To 'Vathek' Beckford added three 'Episodes' (the last unfinished), also oriental tales, which were only recently published. They were translated from the French by Sir F. T. Marzials (1912).

Vatican, THE, the palace of the pope on the Vatican Hill in Rome on the west bank of the Tiber. It contains galleries of pictures and sculpture, and the famous Vatican library. The 'Vatican City' is now distinct from Rome.

VAUXHALL

Vatican Decrees, THE, adopted in July 1870 at the Oecumenical Council summoned by Pius IX, laid down a theological definition of the doctrine of papal infallibility.

Vaucluse or VALCLUSA, a village near Avignon in the south of France, famous as the residence of Petrarch, and for the fountain which he celebrated.

Vaudeville, a light popular song or a stage performance of a light and amusing character interspersed with songs, from vau de vire, in full chanson du Vau de Vire, a song of the Valley of the Vire (in Calvados, Normandy). The name is said to have been first given to songs composed by Olivier Basselin, a fuller of Vire (15th cent.).

Vaudols, see Waldenses.

VAUGHAN, HENRY (1622-95), educated at Jesus College, Oxford, is noteworthy for his 'Silex Scintillans', a collection of religious poems (including the magnificent 'They are all gone into the world of light'), of which the first part was published in 1650, and the second in 1655. Of his profane works, 'Poems' appeared in 1646, 'Olor Iscanus' (q.v.) in 1651, and 'Thalia Rediviva' (including a section of 'Pious Thoughts and Ejaculations') in 1678. His 'Collected Works' were published in 1871. He was known as the 'Silurist' because of his love for the country of Brecknock, the county of his birth, which was anciently inhabited by the Silures.

VAUGHAN, THOMAS (1622-66), twin brother of Henry Vaughan (q.v.), alchemical writer, author of 'Magia Adamica', &c. He engaged in controversy with Henry More (q.v.), and was in part an original of Ralpho in 'Hudibras' (q.v.).

Vaux, ROLAND DE, the baron of Triermain, see Roland de Vaux.

VAUX, THOMAS, LORD (1510-56), a contributor to 'Tottel's Miscellany' (q.v.), principally remembered as the author of 'The aged Lover renounceth Love', the source of the song mumbled by the grave-digger in 'Hamlet'.

Vauxhall or FOX HALL, originally 'Falke's Hall' (said to be from Falke de Breauté, captain of John's mercenaries, and lord of the manor in the early 13th cent.), famous for the gardens laid out there in the middle of the 17th cent., and at first called 'The New Spring Gardens', because they replaced the old Spring Gardens (q.v.) adjoining St. James's Park. Vauxhall Gardens are frequently referred to from that time by dramatists and other writers, including Pepys. Sir Roger de Coverley visited them with Mr. Spectator (he commented on the scarcity of nightingales in the gardens as compared with less desirable visitors—'Spectator', No. 383). Thackeray in ch. vi of 'Vanity Fair' and Fanny Burney in 'Evelina' describe the visits to them of certain of their characters. The gardens were finally closed in 1859.

Veal, Mrs., see Defoe.

Veck, Toby ('Trotty'), a character in Dickens's 'The Chimes' (q.v.).

Vectis or VECTA, the Roman name of the Isle of Wight.

Veda, one or other of the four ancient sacred books of the Hindus (called the Rig-, Yajur-, Sama-, and Atharva-Veda). Each Veda includes a sanhita or collection of mantras or hymns, and a Brahmana or body of precepts; and to each is attached a Upanishad (meaning 'a sitting-down at the feet of an instructor'), a speculative mystical treatise dealing with the Deity, creation, and existence. The date of the Vedas is unknown, but they are among the most ancient literary works of the world.

VEGA, GARCILASSO DE LA, see Garcilasso de la Vega.

VEGA, LOPE DE (1562–1635), the founder of the Spanish drama, and the author of a great number of plays, poems, and romances, which have been a source of inspiration to European literature in general, particularly to that of France. A curious testimony to his facility is that he wrote a long continuation of Ariosto while taking part in the expedition of the Armada, from which he returned safely.

Vehmgericht or VEHMIC TRIBUNALS, tribunals that existed in Westphalia for the maintenance of public peace and order, derived from the tribunals of the late Carolingians. They exercised an extraordinary power, persons of exalted rank being subject to their jurisdiction and frequently punished. They were originally royal tribunals. They rose to importance in the 12th cent., became secret in the 15th cent., and were not suppressed until the 16th. The members of the order were initiated with mystic rites and had secret signs of recognition. They figure in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.).

Velasquez, DIEGO RODRIGUEZ DA SILVA Y, (1599–1660), the great Spanish painter, a man no less remarkable for character than for artistic genius. He became court painter to Philip IV, who declared that he would be painted by no one else. In 1628 he made the acquaintance of Rubens (q.v.) and the two artists became close friends. Velasquez paid two visits to Italy.

Vendée, LA, a department in the west of France, the scene of civil war during the French Revolution incited by the priests (far more than by the squires) of the region. It was the 'levée en masse' by the decree of the Convention of 23 Feb. 1793 which led to the first insurrection, more against this quasi-conscription than in favour of the ancien régime. See also Chouans.

Vendémiaire, from Latin vindemia, grape-gathering, the first month in the French Republican calendar (see Calendar).

Vendice or VINDICE, the chief character in 'The Revenger's Tragedy', ascribed to Cyril Tourneur (q.v.).

Veneering, Mr. and Mrs., in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.), types of flashy social parvenus.

Venetia, a novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1837.

The story is partly based on the life of Byron with some admixture of that of Shelley, but is placed in the latter part of the 18th cent. Venetia is the daughter of Mr. Herbert and Lady Annabel Herbert, who has separated from her husband owing to his subversive views on morality, politics, and religion. He is, however, a man of character as well as ability, joins the American forces in their revolution, and becomes a general. He subsequently lives in seclusion in Italy. Venetia is brought up by her mother in complete ignorance of her father, but grows up with an instinctive devotion to him, which is increased by the discovery of his portrait and of his sonnets. She is also thrown into intimate contact with the young Lord Cadurcis, a youth of brilliant abilities, who presently becomes animated with the same subversive ideas as Herbert. He is in consequence looked upon by Lady Annabel with aversion, his hope of marrying Venetia is frustrated, and he is obliged to leave England owing to a social scandal. Venetia's health is impaired by the troubles of her heart, and mother and daughter travel in Italy. Meeting accidentally her father there, Venetia effects the reconciliation of her parents, and the general happiness appears complete when Cadurcis joins them, at once wins Herbert's affection, and recovers the esteem of Lady Annabel. But at this juncture, when the obstacles to the union of Cadurcis and Venetia have been removed, Cadurcis and Herbert are drowned in a squall in the bay of Spezzia.

Veni, vidi, vici, Latin, 'I came, I saw, I conquered', words which Suetonius in 'Lives of the Caesars' (Julius, 37) says were displayed before Julius Caesar in his Pontic triumph (after his victory over the rebel Pharnaces II, 47 B.C.). According to Plutarch (Life of Caesar) the three words formed the whole of the account of this victory which he sent to his friend Amintius.

Venice Preserved, or a Plot Discovered, a tragedy in blank verse by Otway (q.v.), produced in 1682.

Jaffier, a noble Venetian youth, has secretly married Belvidera, daughter of a proud senator, Priuli, who has repudiated her. Jaffier, reduced to poverty, begs Priuli for assistance, but is met with insults. Pierre, a foreign soldier with a grievance against the Venetian republic, stimulates Jaffier's desire for revenge, confides to him a plot that is hatching against the State, and introduces him to the conspirators. As a pledge of his loyalty to them Jaffier places Belvidera in the charge of their leader, Renault, but without explaining the reason. Renault in the night offers her insult. She escapes to her husband, who, in spite of his pledge to the contrary, makes known to her the conspiracy. To save her father, who, as one of the senators, is to be killed, she persuades Jaffier to reveal the plot to the Senate, but to claim as reward the lives of the conspirators. These are arrested. Jaffier, loaded by them with insults, is overwhelmed with remorse. The senators, in spite of their promise, condemn the conspirators to death. Jaffier threatens to kill Belvidera unless she secures their pardon from her father. She succeeds, but Priuli's intervention is too late. Belvidera goes mad. Jaffier stabs his friend Pierre on the scaffold and then himself, and Belvidera dies broken-hearted.

VENICE PRESERVED

The play with Betterton as Jaffier and Mrs. Barry as Belvidera was very well received, and was frequently revived; it was seen at Drury Lane Theatre in 1829, and at Covent Garden under Macready between 1837 and 1839. The senator Antonio is a caricature of Shaftesbury.

Venn, DIGGORY, the reddeleman in Hardy's 'The Return of the Native' (q.v.).

Ventidius, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Timon of Athens' (q.v.), one of the faithless friends of Timon; (2) in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (q.v.) and in Dryden's 'All for Love' (q.v.), Antony's general.

Venus, identified with the Aphrodite of the Greeks and the Astarte of the Syrians, was the Roman name for the goddess of beauty and love. She sprang from the foam of the sea near the island Cythera (whence the epithets 'Anadyomene' and 'Cytherean'). Zeus gave her in marriage to Hephaestus (Vulcan), the ugliest of the gods. She was unfaithful to him, was found in the arms of Ares (Mars), and was exposed to the ridicule of the gods. By Ares she became mother of Harmonia; by Ares, Zeus, or Hermes, of Eros (Cupid); by Hermes of Hermaphroditus; and by Dionysus (Bacchus) of Priapus. She became enamoured also of Adonis, and of Anchises (by whom she was mother of Aeneas). In the contest with Hera and Athene for the golden apple, the prize was awarded to her by Paris. The most celebrated of her statues was that in her temple at Cnidos, by Praxiteles. There is an antique reproduction of it in the Vatican at Rome. Other famous statues of Venus are the Venus of Milo or Melos, found in 1820 in the island of Melos and now in the Louvre in Paris thought to date from about 400 B.C.; and the Medici Venus, a Greek statue of later date, perhaps of the time of Augustus, now in the Uffizi at Florence. See Uranian.

Venus, the second planet in order of distance from the sun, known as the morning or evening star.

Venus and Adonis, a poem in six-lined stanzas by Shakespeare (q.v.), published in 1593, and dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. It was probably Shakespeare's first published work. Venus, in love with the youth Adonis, detains him from the chase and woos him, but cannot win his love. She begs him to meet her on the morrow, but he is then to hunt the boar. She tries in vain to dissuade him. When the morning comes she hears his hounds at bay, and, filled with terror, goes to look for him, and finds him killed by the boar.

Venus, Mr., in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.), a preparer of anatomical specimens and for a time an ally of Silas Wegg.

Verdi, GIUSEPPE (1813-1901), the great Italian composer of operas, was the son of a village innkeeper and was trained by the organist of his village. He is said to have been rejected from the Milan Conservatoire for lack of musical talent. His most important works were: 'Ernani' (1844), 'Rigoletto' (1851), 'Il Trovatore' (1853), 'La Traviata' (1853), 'Un Ballo in Maschera' (1859), 'Aida' (1871), 'Otello' (1887), and 'Falstaff' (1893).

Verdun, a French fortified town on the Meuse, with a long history as an outpost of Lorraine, and an old bishopric of the Holy Roman Empire. It became French in 1552 and guards the straightest and shortest road from central Germany to Paris. It fell to the Prussians in 1792 and was for a time lost to France. It played an important part in the war of 1914-18 and was the object of a concentrated attack by German forces in February 1916. The concentration on Verdun was not foreseen by the French, and the defences of the town were imperfect. A heavy bombardment on 21 Feb. obliterated the outer line of these. By the 24th the Germans were threatening the last line. The crisis was reached on the 25th in the German attack on Douaumont, where the enemy failed to carry the position, though they captured the fort. On the morrow they were driven back by a counter-attack. They then shifted their attacks to other points, including in particular Mort Homme on the west of the Meuse, but were met with no less stubbornness. The fighting round Verdun continued until the end of June 1916, when the pressure was relieved by the Franco-British offensive on the Somme. The defence was conducted by General (later Marshal) Pétain.

VERDUN

VERGIL, POLYDORE (1470?-1555?), a native of Urbino, who came to England in 1502 as sub-collector of Peter's pence, and held various ecclesiastical preferments, being archdeacon of Wells from 1508 to 1554. He published his 'Anglicae Historiae Libri XXVI' in 1534-55, a chronicle of special value for the reign of Henry VII. He was also author of a 'Proverbiolum Libellus' (Venice, 1498), anticipating the 'Adagia' of Erasmus.

Verisopht, LORD FREDERICK, a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

VERLAINE, PAUL (1844-96), French poet. His verse is musical, mystical, passionate, and generally regarded as decadent in character.

Vermeer of Delft, JAN (1632-75), one of the greatest, and also rarest, of Dutch painters, remarkable for his treatment of effects of light.

VERNE, JULES (1828-1905), French novelist, who achieved great and enduring popularity by the combination of adventure with popular science in such books as the 'Voyage au centre de la Terre' (1864), 'Vingt mille lieues sous les mers' (1869), and 'Le Tour du monde en quatre-vingt jours' (1873).

VERNER, KARL ADOLPH (1846-96), a philologist of Copenhagen, the son of a German father and Danish mother. 'Verner's Law', which completes 'Grimm's Law' (see Grimm, F. L. C.) of consonantal variations in the Aryan languages, was a notable advance in the science of comparative philology.

Vernon, DIANA, the heroine of Scott's 'Rob Roy' (q.v.).

Veronica, St., in Christian legend, the woman of Jerusalem whose cloth or kerchief was used to wipe the face of Christ on the way to Calvary, and retained miraculously impressed upon it His features. Whence the word vernicle, signifying this cloth (which is preserved at St. Peter's, Rome) or the representation upon it. The name Veronica is a corruption of Berenice (itself a Macedonic form of the Greek Pherenice, 'bringing victory'). Veronica suggested verum icon, 'true image', and thus perhaps gave rise to the above legend.

Vers libres, verses in which various metres, or various rhythms, are combined, or the ordinary rules of prosody disregarded.

Versailles, a town a few miles south-west of Paris, which contains the royal palace, of which the central portion was built by Louis XIII, and the wings and other edifices by Louis XIV. Its great gallery, the GALERIE DES GLACES, and the antechamber known as the CIL DE BOUF (q.v.), are celebrated features of it. Versailles is prominent in the history of Louis XVI and his queen, Marie Antoinette, and of the early days of the French Revolution (see, e.g., Trianon and Tennis Court Oath). Here was signed the Peace of Versailles or Treaty of Paris of 1783, by which the independence of the United States was recognized and peace made with France and Spain. In the palace of Versailles King William of Prussia was proclaimed German Emperor in 1871; and here was signed the TREATY OF VERSAILLES, which terminated the war of 1914-18 with Germany, on 28 June 1919.

Vertue, GEORGE (1684-1756), engraver and antiquary, collected in his note-books materials for a history of art in England. The note-books were bought by Horace Walpole, and utilized in his 'Anecdotes of Painting'. They are now in course of publication by the Walpole Society.

Vertumnus, an Italian deity, worshipped as the god of the changing year and the giver of fruits. He became enamoured of the goddess Pomona (q.v.), pursued her in various shapes, and won her in the guise of a beautiful youth. Pope has a poem on the subject, adapted from Ovid's 'Metamorphoses', xiv.

Verulam or VERULAMIUM, the ancient Romano-British town whose modern name is St. Albans, and from which Francis Bacon took his title of Baron Verulam. It has been partly excavated; it stood on the opposite bank of the little river Ver to the modern St. Albans.

VERY, JONES (1813-80), American poet and religious mystic, born at Salem, Mass. He was an intimate friend of Emerson (q.v.), by whom he was deeply influenced. His 'Essays and Poems' appeared in 1839.

Vesey, ELIZABETH (1715?-91), wife of Agmondesham Vesey, a member of the Irish parliament. She was one of the leaders of the Blue Stocking (q.v.) circle.

Vesta, akin to the Greek goddess Hestia, was worshipped by the Romans in every household as goddess of the hearth. Her circular temple stood in the forum. In it the sacred fire (supposed to have been brought from Troy) was tended by the VESTAL VIRGINS. These were originally drawn from patrician families and were required to remain celibate for thirty years. They enjoyed great privileges and honour, had the best seats at games and festivals, were chosen as arbiters in cases of moment, and had the power of pardoning criminals whom they met accidentally on the way to execution. In cases of violation of their vow, they were buried alive. The Temple is thought to have represented the house and hearth of the king, as the Vestals represented his daughters.

Vestris, MADAME, Lucia Elizabeth Mathews (1797-1856), granddaughter of Bartolozzi the engraver, was an unrivalled operatic singer with a contralto voice. She appeared frequently at Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and the Haymarket, London, 1820-31.

Veto, MONSIEUR and MADAME, nicknames given to Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette during the French Revolution, in allusion to the king's right (which he used more than once in 1791-2) of vetoing decrees of the Legislative Assembly.

Veuve Clicquot, see Champagne.

Wholes, a lawyer in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Vicar of Bray, The, the title of a well-known song of unknown authorship, dating from the 18th cent. The subject is a time-serving parson, who boasts that he has accommodated himself to the religious views of the reigns of Charles, James, William, Anne, and George, and that whatsoever king may reign he will remain Vicar of Bray.

Various suggestions have been made as to who this vicar was. Haydn ('Dictionary of Dates') quotes Fuller as stating that Symon Symonds, vicar of Bray, Berks., in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth, was twice a Papist and twice a Protestant. When charged with being a time-server he is said to have replied, 'Not so, neither, for if I changed my religion, I am sure I kept true to my principle, which is to live and die the vicar of Bray' (see D'Israeli, 'Curiosities of Literature', s.v. Vicar of Bray).

Vicar of Christ, a title first assumed by Pope Innocent III (1198-1216).

VICE

Vicar of Wakefield, The, a novel by Goldsmith (q.v.), written in 1761-2 but not published until 1766. Goldsmith received £60 for the manuscript.

The story is told by the Rev. Dr. Primrose, the Vicar, kindly, charitable, devoid of worldly wisdom and not without some literary vanity. His wife, Deborah, is proud of her housekeeping and her children, with aspirations to gentility. Six children, two girls, Olivia and Sophia, and four boys (see Primrose), complete the family. At first they are prosperous and contented, but misfortunes presently come upon them thick and fast. The Vicar loses his independent fortune through the bankruptcy of a merchant. They move to a new living under the patronage of a certain Squire Thornhill. Thornhill, who is an unprincipled ruffian, seduces Olivia after a mock ceremony of marriage, and deserts her. She is discovered by her father and brought home, but his humble vicarage is destroyed by fire. He himself is thrown into prison for debt at the suit of Thornhill; and George Primrose, who challenges the latter to a duel to avenge his sister, is overpowered by ruffians and likewise sent to prison. The Vicar's second daughter, Sophia, is forcibly carried off in a postchaise by an unknown villain, and Olivia, who has been pining away since her desertion, is reported to the Vicar to be dead. All these misfortunes he bears with fortitude and resignation.

On their removal to their new vicarage the Primrose family have made the acquaintance of a certain Mr. Burchell, who appears to be a broken-down gentleman, kind-hearted but somewhat eccentric. He occasionally visits them, and offers advice concerning the disposal of the daughters, which, though wise, is unpalatable to the ambitious Mrs. Primrose. This leads to a breach in their relations, and he is even suspected of being Olivia's seducer. By good fortune he is now the means of rescuing Sophia, thereby increasing the regard she already feels for him. It thereupon appears that he is in reality the benevolent Sir William Thornhill, the squire's uncle. The squire's villainy is now exposed, and it appears that the abduction of Sophia was carried out by his design. All now ends happily. Sir William marries Sophia. Olivia is found not to be dead, and her marriage to the squire is shown to have been, contrary to his intentions, legal. The Vicar's fortune is restored to him, and George marries the young lady of his heart, from whom he had been separated by his father's misfortunes.

In the course of the work are included the famous adventure of Moses Primrose (q.v.) and the gross of green spectacles, as also three well-known poems, 'The Hermit' (q.v.) or 'Edwin and Angelina', the 'Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog', and the lyric sung by Olivia, 'When lovely woman stoops to folly'.

Vice, THE, a fool or buffoon introduced into some of the interludes (q.v.) and later moralties (q.v.). The character was probably evolved from the merry and mischievous devil 'Tutivillus (see Titivil)', one of the stock figures of mysteries and moralities.

Vicē Versa, a novel by F. Anstey (q.v.), published in 1882, the story of the misadventures of Mr. Bultitude, a father who, by the action of an Indian charm, is transformed into the physical appearance of his schoolboy son, while the son takes the outward form of his father; each retaining their original mental characteristics. Mr. Bultitude has to go to school while Dick remains at home and behaves as a schoolboy might be expected to behave.

'Vicisti, Galliae', see Julian the Apostate.

VICTOR AND CAZIRE, the pseudonyms under which P. B. Shelley (q.v.) and Elizabeth Shelley published 'Original Poetry' in 1810.

VICTORIA, queen of England (1819-1901), reigned 1837-1901. The 'Letters of Queen Victoria' have been issued in three series, 1837-61 in 1907, 1862-85 in 1926-8, 1886-1901 in 1930-2. Her 'Leaves from a Journal of Our Life in the Highlands, 1848-61' appeared privately in 1867, and publicly in 1868. A second part, 'More Leaves', followed in 1883, covering the years 1862-3.

Victoria and Albert Museum, at South Kensington, London, was created out of the surplus funds of the Exhibition of 1851, and was first known as the Department of Practical Art, its guiding principle being the application of art to industry. Its principal collections are of pictures (including the Raphael cartoons belonging to the King), textiles, ceramics, furniture. It also contains a large art library. The MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY, a department of the British Museum, is in a neighbouring building.

Victorian, an epithet applied to anything (spiritual or material) or to a person (author, artist, politician, &c.) considered typical of the reign of Queen Victoria. Among the characteristics of the age in allusion to which the term is sometimes used are its improved standard of decency and morality; a self-satisfaction engendered by the great increase of wealth, the prosperity of the nation as a whole, and the immense industrial and scientific development; conscious rectitude and deficient sense of humour; an unquestioning acceptance of authority and orthodoxy.

Victory, The, Nelson's flag-ship at Trafalgar. She was a line-of-battle ship of 100 guns. She is now in Portsmouth harbour.

Vidar, in Scandinavian mythology, a son of Odin, and one of the gods who survive Ragnarök (q.v.). He is the silent god, the god of the forest. It is he who slays the Fenris-wolf (q.v.).

Vienna, THE CONGRESS OF, was held by the principal European powers in 1814-15, after Napoleon's first abdication, to settle anew the boundaries of the European states. Among those who attended it were the emperors of Russia and Austria, the king of Prussia, Wellington and Castlereagh representing Great Britain, and Talleyrand representing France. By its decisions France was confined practically to her frontiers of 1792, Prussia was much enlarged, the Austrian Netherlands and the old territories of the Dutch Republic were united as a new kingdom of the Netherlands. Savoy and Nice were restored to the king of Sardinia. Austria received Lombardy and Venetia, and became dominant in Italy. A new kingdom of Poland was formed under the Tsar. The slave trade was declared illegal. The navigation of tidal waters was thrown open.

Vignette, an ornamental design on a blank space in a book, especially at the beginning or end of a chapter, of small size, and unenclosed in a border. The word is a diminutive of the Fr. vigne, a vine; originally meaning an ornament of leaves and tendrils.

VIGNY, ALFRED VICTOR, Comte de (1797-1863), French poet, dramatist, and novelist, an early leader of the Romantic movement in French literature. His works include: 'Poèmes antiques et modernes' (1826); a historical novel of the period of Louis XIII, 'Cinq-Mars' (1826); the drama 'Chatterton' (1835), and three stories under the title 'Servitude et grandeur militaires' (1835).

Vikings: the Scandinavian adventurers who from the 8th to the 11th cent. practised piracy at sea and committed depredations on land as far as the Mediterranean (Hasting the Viking sacked Pisa). The Old Norse word is commonly regarded as derived from vik, a creek. The OED., however, shows reason to think that the word originated in the Anglo-Frisian area and is derived from the Old English wic, camp, the formation of temporary encampments being a prominent feature in Viking raids.

Village, The, a poem by Crabbe (q.v.), published in 1783, in which the poet presents the life of the rustic poor unidealized, in sombre colours.

Village Blacksmith, The, a poem by Longfellow (q.v.), published in 1841.

Villanelle, a poem, usually of a pastoral or lyrical nature, consisting normally of five three-lined stanzas and a final quatrain, with only two rhymes throughout. The first and third lines of the first stanza are repeated alternately in the succeeding stanzas as a refrain, and form a final couplet in the quatrain. [OED.]

VILLEHARDOUIN, GEOFFROI DE (c. 1152-c. 1212), marshal of Champagne, was an eyewitness of the events described in his 'Conquête de Constantinople' or account of the so-called fourth Crusade, the first great literary work in French prose. Villehardouin relates with vigour and picturesqueness the negotiations with the doge of Venice, the departure of the crusading host, its diversion from its proper purpose to various more secular undertakings, including the capture of Constantinople, the subsequent dissensions and intrigues, culminating in the crowning of Baldwin of Flanders as emperor of the East, and the grant of the kingdom of Macedonia to Boniface of Montferrat.

Villette, a novel by C. Brontë (q.v.), published in 1853.

The story, which is a rehandling of material already dealt with in 'The Professor' (then unpublished), reflecting the personal experiences of the authoress, is that of the life of an English girl without beauty, money, or friends, who obtains, in order to support herself, a post as teacher in a girls' school at Brussels. There, by virtue of a strong character, steeled by adversity, she soon establishes her position and wins the respect of the capable, if unscrupulous, headmistress, Madame Beck. She firmly represses a disposition to fall in love with the handsome John Bretton, the English doctor of the school, in whom she recognizes an acquaintance of her childhood, the son of her own godmother. She watches with friendly concern his infatuation for the worthless flirt, Ginevra Fanshawe, followed by a happier love for the tiny companion of his boyhood, Paulina Home. But the principal theme is the description of the heroine's gradual fascination by the waspish, despotic, but golden-hearted little professor, M. Paul Emanuel, and of the change in him from bitterness and tyranny to esteem and affection. His generosity leaves her mistress of her own school at Brussels when he is called away by business to the West Indies. Whether he shall live to return and marry her is left to the reader to decide. The drabness of the story is redeemed by its biographical aspect and by the drawing of the characters, particularly of Monsieur Paul, Madame Beck, and the heroine herself.

VILLON, FRANÇOIS (b. 1431), French poet, a poor scholar of the university of Paris, who spent a riotous life between the tavern and the prison, and narrowly escaped the gallows for theft. Gay, witty, ironic, melancholy, he struck a new note in his lyrics, in which he sang the experiences of his own life. His chief works are the 'Petit Testament', the 'Grand Testament', and a number of ballades and rondeaux, of which the best known, the 'Ballade des dames du temps jadis', was translated by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), and 'La Belle Heaulmière' by Swinburne (q.v.).

VINCENT DE BEAUVAIS, a 13th-cent. Dominican, author of the 'Speculum Majus', an enormous compilation of all the knowledge of the time. He is mentioned by Chaucer in the prologue to the 'Legend of Good Women'.

VIOLA

Vincentio, (1) the duke in Shakespeare's 'Measure for Measure' (q.v.); (2) a character in his 'The Taming of the Shrew' (q.v.).

Vindication of Natural Society, A, a treatise by E. Burke (q.v.) published in 1756.

This is one of the first of Burke's published writings. It is an ironical answer to Bolingbroke's indictment of revealed religion, in imitation of his style and in the form of a reductio ad absurdum. Bolingbroke had pointed to some of the unfortunate results of religious creeds; Burke examines the various forms of artificial society, despotic, aristocratic, and democratic, and shows that they may all result in tyranny. He shows the evils resulting from artificial laws and the division of society into rich and poor. His conclusion is, 'If you should confess all these things, yet plead the necessity of political institutions, I can argue with equal, perhaps superior, force, concerning the necessity of artificial religion. If you say that natural religion is a sufficient guide without the foreign aid of revelation, on what principle should political laws become necessary?'

Vindobona, in imprints, Vienna.

Vinegar Bible, THE, an edition of the Bible printed by Baskett (q.v.) at Oxford in 1716-17, so called from the substitution or misprint of the word 'vinegar' for 'vineyard' in the heading of Luke xx.

VINER, CHARLES (1678-1756), educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, a jurist who published an 'Abridgment of Law and Equity' in twenty-three volumes (1742-53). He was the founder of the VINERIAN PROFESSORSHIP of common law at Oxford, and of various fellowships and scholarships at the same university.

Vinland, the region of North America where, according to the Norse sagas, a settlement was made by Norsemen in the early years of the 11th cent. It appears to have been in the neighbourhood of Cape Cod. The name is derived from the grapes said to have been found there by the discoverers.

Vintry, THE, according to Stow a part of the bank of the Thames in the City of London where the merchants of Bordeaux landed their wines. It gave its name to one of the wards.

Vinum theologicum, a proverbial expression for exceptionally good wine, due to the monks' reputed fondness for good living. (See e.g. Montaigne, III. xiii; Henri Estienne, 'Apologie pour Hérodoté', ch. xxii; Holinshed, I. 282; Rabelais in the earlier editions of 'Gargantua' has 'chopiner théologiquement', 'to drink freely of the best wine'.)

Viola, the heroine of Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.).

VIOLENTA

Violenta, one of the dramatis personae of Shakespeare's 'All's Well that Ends Well' (q.v.) who appears only once (III. v) in the play and does not speak; sometimes referred to as typical of a nonentity.

Violet-crowned City, THE, Athens, so called by Pindar and Aristophanes, perhaps from the beautiful purple colour sometimes to be seen on the mountains round the city. But the epithet is also applied by the Greek poets to Aphrodite, the Muses, and the Graces.

Virelay, a song or short lyric piece, of a type originating in France in the 14th cent., usually consisting of short lines arranged in stanzas with only two rhymes, the end-rhyme of one stanza being the chief one of the next. [OED.]

Virgidermarum, Ses Libri, by J. Hall (q.v.), a collection of satires on the abuses of the day, in the spirit of Juvenal. The first volume was published in 1597 and the second in 1598. The 'Virgidermar' ('Virgidermia' means a 'harvest of rods') deal with literary matters, with institutions and conventions, and, in the 'byting' satires of the last three books, with individuals, whose identity under their pseudonyms was probably clear to contemporaries. Among their subjects are the neglect of learning, the impostures of astrology, ostentatious piety, the character of an avaricious squire, and the servile condition of a tutor. The book was condemned by the High Commission to be burnt.

VIRGIL (PUBLIUS VERGILIUS MARO) (70-19 B.C.), the Roman poet, born at Andes, a village near Mantua. His chief works were the 'Aeneid', the epic poem of the Roman people, recounting the adventures of Aeneas and his Trojans and his settlement in Italy; the 'Georgics', a didactic poem on the cultivation of the soil and the rearing of cattle and bees; and the 'Eclogues' or 'Bucolics', imitations of the pastorals of Theocritus. There are also minor poems attributed on doubtful authority to him, such as 'Culex', 'Ciris', 'Moretum', &c. See also Sortes Virgilianae and, below, Virgil's Fourth Eclogue.

VIRGIL, POLYDORE, see Vergil (P.).

Virgil's Fourth Eclogue, written in 40 B.C. and hailing the birth of a child who should bring back the golden age, was interpreted by the early Church and in the Middle Ages as a prophecy of Christ; and Virgil and the Cumaean Sibyl (l. 4, 'Ultima Cumaei venit iam carminis aetas') held a special place in medieval belief (e.g. Virgil was Dante's guide to the gates of Paradise: the Sibyl appears in the 'Dies Irae' hymn). The identity of the child to whom Virgil was really referring has not been fully established: it may have been either a son of Asinius Pollio, to whom the poem is addressed, or more probably the expected child of Octavianus and Scribonia (who was, in fact, a girl, Julia).

VIRGINIA

Virgil's Gnat, a poem by Spenser (q.v.), adapted from the 'Culex' attributed to Virgil. A shepherd sleeping in the shade is about to be attacked by a serpent, when a gnat, to warn him, stings him on the eyelid. The shepherd crushes the gnat, and sees and kills the serpent. The next night the ghost of the gnat reproaches him for his cruelty. The shepherd, filled with remorse, raises a monument to the gnat.

Virgilla, in Shakespeare's 'Coriolanus' (q.v.), the wife of Coriolanus.

Virgin-Martyr, The, a tragedy by Massinger and Dekker (qq.v.), printed in 1622.

The Emperor Diocletian bids his daughter Artemia choose whom she will marry. She chooses Antoninus, a brave soldier, son of Sappritius, governor of Caesarea. He declines the dangerous honour, being moreover devoted to Dorothea, a maid of the Christian sect, who are at the time subject to persecution. Theophilus, a zealous persecutor, and Harpax, 'an evil spirit', his secretary, betray Antoninus and Dorothea to Artemia, who finds them together, and at once orders them to execution, but presently allows Theophilus to send his daughters to Dorothea to convert her to the pagan religion. The daughters, instead, are converted by Dorothea to Christianity, and on their boldly professing it are killed by their own father. Dorothea, attended by her 'good spirit', Angelo, is subjected to extremes of torture and indignity and finally executed, Antoninus dying by her side. In the last act, Angelo and Harpax, the good and evil spirits, contend for the soul of Theophilus. Theophilus summoned before Diocletian proclaims his conversion to Christianity, courageously suffers torture, and dies. The same story has been treated in poems by Swinburne and G. M. Hopkins.

Virgin Queen, a name for Queen Elizabeth of England.

Virginia, a daughter of the centurion, Lucius Virginius. Appius Claudius, the decemvir, became enamoured of her and sought to get possession of her. For this purpose she was claimed by one of his favourites as daughter of a slave, and Appius in the capacity of a judge gave sentence in his favour and delivered her into the hands of his friend. Virginius, informed of these proceedings, arrived from the camp, and plunged a dagger into his daughter's breast to save her from the tyrant. He then rushed to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The soldiers, incensed against Appius Claudius, marched to Rome and seized him. But he destroyed himself in prison and averted the execution of the law. This incident led to the abolition of the decemviral power. The story (which is in Livy, iii. 44 et seq.) is the basis of Sheridan Knowles's (q.v.) tragedy 'Virginius', and of Macaulay's (q.v.) lay 'Virginia'.

VIRGINIANS

Virginians, The, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published in twenty-four serial numbers, Nov. 1857 to Sept. 1859.

The author relates the fortunes of the descendants of Colonel Henry Esmond (see Esmond), in particular of the twin sons, George and Henry, of his daughter Rachel. Rachel has married a Warrington (ancestor of the friend of Pendennis) and survived him as owner of an estate in Virginia. George Warrington, the elder twin, disappears in General Braddock's disastrous expedition against Fort Duquesne, and is believed to have perished. His younger brother, now regarded as the heir of a great property, visits England, and is received with questionable cordiality by his cousins of the Castlewood family—Lord Castlewood, a well-bred card-sharper, his brother Will, a cowardly swindler and bully, and their notorious sisters, in particular the elderly Maria, who inveigles Harry into a promise of marriage. With them is the dominating character of the book, Baroness Bernstein, the Beatrix Esmond of the earlier novel, who has buried her first husband, Tom Tusher, the bishop, and the second, the baron, and is now a stout sardonic old lady with a very dark pair of eyes, who conceives a strong affection for Harry, and influences his fortune for good and evil. Harry, who is a frank, open-handed, but stupid fellow, plunges into a course of dissipation which lands him in a sponging-house, whence he is rescued by his brother George, who has survived his wounds and spent eighteen months as a prisoner in French hands. Harry, being no longer heir to the property, escapes from the clutches of the mercenary Maria, enters the army, serves with distinction under Wolfe, returns to Virginia, and marries the daughter of his mother's housekeeper, Mrs. Mountain. George settles in London and leads a struggling life; for his tyrannical mother, whose love is centred on Harry, cuts off supplies when he marries Theo, the daughter of the gallant but impecunious old General Lambert. In time, however, he inherits the Warrington property, and his troubles come to an end.

The book contains a vivid account of the rakish and unprincipled society of the day, and introduces Wolfe and Washington. The latter part deals with the American War of Independence.

the three THEOLOGICAL VIRTUES, faith, hope, and charity, and four CARDINAL VIRTUES, justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude.

Vishnu, in Hindu mythology, the second god in the triad (Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva), regarded as the preserver. He had many incarnations, which were assumed when some disaster threatened the world. One of the most interesting of these is KRISHNA (q.v.). Another is MATSYA, the fish which saves Manu (q.v.) from the deluge by means of an ark; a third is RAMA, whose exploits are told in the 'Rāmāyana' (q.v.). A fourth is BUDDHA, adopted apparently by the Brahmans in order to place Buddhism in what they regarded as the proper relation to their own religion; for they represent Vishnu as adopting the form of Buddha in order to delude by his teaching the enemies of the gods. Vishnu's wife is LAKSHMI (or SRI). Vishnu shares with Siva the principal worship of modern Hindus, Brahma having fallen into the background.

Vision concerning Piers Plowman, The, see Piers Plowman.

Vision of Judgment, A, a poem in hexameters by Southey, published in 1821.

The preface, in defence of this metrical innovation, contains, in a digression, a violent attack on the works of Byron, 'those monstrous combinations of horrors and mockery, lewdness and impiety'.

The poet in a trance sees George III, who had died in 1820, rise from the tomb, and, after receiving from the shade of Perceval the latest intelligence about affairs in England, proceed to the gates of Heaven. The Devil, accompanied by Wilkes, comes forward to arraign him, but retires discomfited, and the king, after receiving a testimonial from Washington, is admitted to Paradise, where he is greeted by previous English sovereigns, the worthies of England, and finally by his family.

The poem was amusingly parodied by Byron in 'The Vision of Judgment' (q.v.).

Vision of Judgment, The, a satirical poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 'The Liberal' in 1822.

In 1821 had appeared Southey's 'A Vision of Judgment' (q.v.), containing in the preface a violent attack on Byron's works. Byron replied in the appendix to 'The Two Foscari' (q.v.) and in the present satire, a travesty of Southey's poem, in which, besides holding up the poet laureate to derision, he treats the subject of the late king's appearance before the tribunal of heaven very disrespectfully if very humorously. Amid the buffoonery the poem includes a splendid stanza (xxxii) on the meeting of Satan and Michael. The publisher was prosecuted for endangering the public peace by a publication calumniating his late majesty, convicted, and fined.

Vision of Mirza, The, an allegory by Addison (q.v.), published in the 'Spectator' (No. 159). Mirza has a vision of human life

VITRUVIUS, MARCUS POLLIO (fl. 40 B.C.), a Roman, the author of a valuable treatise on architecture, dedicated to Augustus, the only surviving classical work on the subject.

Vittoria, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1867.

The scene is laid in northern Italy in the period of the first rising of 1848, at the inspiration of Mazzini, against the Austrian domination. The author depicts the dissensions and suspicions of the period, and the conflict between the republicans and the supporters of Charles Albert. Against this background we have a continuation of the romance of 'Sandra Belloni' (q.v.). The noble-minded singer throws herself with ardour into the movement for Italian independence and places her voice at the service of the cause, singing under the name of Vittoria in the opera at Milan the song which is to be the signal of Italian revolt. But her connexion with her English friends, particularly with Wilfrid Pole, now an officer in the Austrian army, brings her under the suspicion of a crazy patriot. This, and the enmity of two women, Anna von Lenkenstein and Violetta d'Isorella, involve her, the gallant Carlo Ammiani, whom she marries, and Wilfrid himself, in a series of dangerous situations, from which she emerges widowed. Merthyr Powys reappears in the character of her devoted and self-sacrificing friend and protector.

Vittoria, The, the only one of Magellan's (q.v.) five ships to complete (in 1521, with 18 men out of the original 265 members of the expedition) the first circumnavigation of the globe. Some perplexity was caused by her arriving one day later than her journal indicated—the converse of what happened to Mr. Phileas Fogg (q.v.), who went round the world the opposite way.

Vitus, St., the son of a Sicilian nobleman, who is said to have suffered martyrdom under Diocletian. His relics were in the 9th cent. removed to the abbey of Corvey in Saxony, where his cult developed. The saint is especially invoked in cases of chorea, the disease otherwise known as St. Vitus's DANCE.

Vivian Grey, a novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1826–7. This was the first of Disraeli's novels, written when he was only 21, and is based on 'imagination acting upon knowledge not acquired by experience' but from books and the conversations that he heard.

VOLPONE

Vivian Grey, a precocious youth of intelligence, charm, and ambition, thinks that he can achieve success by his wits and audacity. He gains great influence over the marquis of Carabas, a selfish disappointed politician, and builds up round him a faction of discontented peers and M.P.s, by skilfully playing on their foibles. His scheme to create a new party is, however, defeated by the machinations of the treacherous Mrs. Lorraine. He is challenged by Cleveland, the designated leader of the new party, who has been led to regard him as a traitor. In the duel Cleveland is killed, and Vivian Grey leaves the country. A succession of adventures on the Continent, in love and politics, leaves him with the 'satisfaction of knowing himself to be the most unfortunate and unhappy being that ever existed'.

Vogelwende, WALTHER VON DER, see Minnesingers.

Volapük, an artificial language, chiefly composed of materials from European tongues, invented in 1879 by a German priest, Johann M. Schleyer, as a means of international communication.

Volpone, or The Fox, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1606 and printed in 1607.

Volpone, a rich Venetian without children, feigns that he is dying, in order to draw gifts from his would-be heirs. Mosca, his parasite and confederate, persuades each of these in turn that he is to be the heir, and thus extracts costly presents from them; one of them, Corvino, even sacrifices his wife to Volpone in hope of the inheritance. Finally Volpone overreaches himself. To enjoy the discomfiture of the vultures who are awaiting his death, he makes over his property by will to Mosca and pretends to be dead. Mosca takes advantage of the position to blackmail Volpone; and Voltore, a lawyer, who has aided Volpone in the infamous conspiracy against Corvino's wife, finding himself defrauded of his expected reward, reveals the whole matter to the senate; whereupon Volpone, Mosca, and Corvino receive the punishment they merit. Sir Politick Would-Be, the English traveller in Italy, with his absurd schemes for supplying Venice with red herrings and detecting by means of onions and bellows whether there is plague on a ship, and Lady Politick Would-Be, the voluble female pedant, have little connexion with the main plot. The names of the principal characters, Volpone (the fox), Mosca (the fly), Voltore (the vulture), Corbaccio (the crow), Corvino (the raven), are significant of the parts they play.

It was under the name of VOLPONE that Godolphin was attacked by Dr. Sacheverell in 1710.

VOLSCIUS

Volscius, PRINCE, a character in the duke of Buckingham's 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.). He is torn between love and honour, and comes on the stage with one boot on and one off, his legs illustrating his distraction.

Volsung, in Icelandic legend, a descendant of Odin, and the father of Sigmund and grandfather of Sigurd. See Volsunga Saga.

Volsung, SIGURD THE, see Sigurd the Volsung.

Volsunga Saga, a prose version of a lost cycle of heroic songs of which fragments survive in the poetic Edda (q.v.), dealing with the families of the Volsungs and the Niblungs. It has been translated by W. Morris and E. Magnusson (1888). For the treatment in it of the story of Sigurd and Brunhild, see Sigurd the Volsung.

VOLTAIRE (1694-1778), the name assumed by Francois Marie Arouet and by which he is generally known. He was born in Paris, was educated by Jesuits, began writing early, and, after two spells of detention in the Bastille, spent the years 1726-9 in exile in England. The chief literary fruit of this sojourn was his 'Lettres philosophiques' (1734) in which he discussed various aspects of English life and criticized, by comparison, French institutions. Being exposed thereby to danger of arrest he took refuge at Cirey near the frontier of Lorraine, at the house of Mme du Châtelet, where he spent the next ten years. In 1750, at the pressing invitation of Frederick II, he took up his residence at Potsdam, but king and philosopher soon disagreed, and in 1753 Voltaire settled at Ferney close to the Swiss frontier. He returned to Paris when 84 years old and enjoyed there a brief spell of glory before his death.

His literary activity had been prodigious and varied. He had written philosophical works, such as the 'Dictionnaire philosophique' (1764), histories such as the 'Siècle de Louis XIV' (1751), tragedies (the best of a poor dramatic age, of which 'Zaïre' and 'Alzire' are perhaps the most notable), philosophical tales (including the famous 'Candide', 1759), an indifferent epic ('La Henriade'), and an unseemly mock epic on Joan of Arc, 'La Pucelle', besides innumerable letters, pamphlets, dialogues, and pieces of light verse, of which his felicity of expression made him a perfect master. He repeatedly condemned Shakespeare for lack of taste and ignorance of the classical rules of the drama, notably in his 'Lettre à l'Académie' (1776; see also Montague, Mrs. E.).

The greater part of his work was made the vehicle for his philosophical views. While affirming the existence of the deity, he condemned all dogmatic religions, especially Catholicism and its priesthood, attributing to these an intolerance and superstition which he regarded as the worst scourges of humanity ('Écrasons l'infâme!'). The dominant trait of his writings on political as well as religious subjects is lack of respect for existing institutions and contempt for authority. He was thus a dissolvent influence and prepared the way for the Revolution. His hatred of intolerance and injustice was shown in practical form by the arduous campaigns he undertook for the rehabilitation of Jean Calas and other victims of religious and political persecution.

A biography of Voltaire by Lord Morley was published in 1872.

Volumnia, in Shakespeare's 'Coriolanus' (q.v.), the mother of Coriolanus.

Voluspa Saga, a poem included in the Elder Edda (see Edda), describing the creation and destruction of the world.

Voodoo, a body of superstitious beliefs and practices, including sorcery, serpent-worship, and sacrificial rites, African in origin, current among negroes in the West Indies and Southern United States.

VORAGINE, JACOBUS A, see Golden Legend.

Vortigern, a legendary king of Britain in the 5th cent. who, it is said, usurped the crown. About 449 he invited the Jutes to England to aid him against the Picts, and, according to legend, married Rowena, daughter of their leader, Hengist; after which the Jutes declined to go away again. The story is in Layamon's 'Brut', ll. 14255-396.

Vortigern and Rowena, a pseudo-Shakespearean play forged by W. H. Ireland (q.v.), on the story of Vortigern (q.v.).

VOSSIUS, GERARD JOHN (1577-1649), and ISAAC (1618-89), his son, eminent Dutch scholars. The father, who was invited to England and made a canon of Canterbury, was professor of history at Amsterdam, and author of 'Historia Pelagiana'. The son came to England and was a canon of Windsor 1673-89. He published editions of Catullus and Juvenal and 'Observations' on classical subjects.

Vox Clamantis, a poem of 10,000 lines in Latin elegiacs by Gower (q.v.), recounting the Peasants' Rising of 1381 and exposing the corruption of contemporary society, especially in its political aspect.

Vronsky, COUNT ALEXIS, in Tolstoy's 'Anna Karenina', the lover of Anna.

Vulcan or MULCIBER, the Roman equivalent of the Greek god HEPHAESTUS. He was the god of fire and the patron of workers in metal. Hephaestus is represented as the son of Hera, and was hurled from Olympus by Zeus when he took his mother's part in a conjugal quarrel. He fell for nine days and dropped on the island of Lemnos, breaking his leg and remaining thereafter lame. He erected forges on earth, indicated by the presence of volcanoes, and wrought many ingenious pieces of mechanism. He is said to have made, at the request of Zeus, the first woman that appeared on earth, known as Pandora (q.v.). Aphrodite (Venus) was given him for his wife, but she was unfaithful to him. Her amour with Ares (Mars) was detected by means of a net prepared by Hephaestus. In 'Iliad' xviii he forges, at the request of Thetis, the armour of Achilles. For Milton's fine lines on his fall from heaven, see P.L. i. 740 et seq.

Vulgar Errors, the usual name for Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or, Enquiries into very many received Tenents and commonly presumed Truths, a treatise by Sir T. Browne (q.v.), published in 1646.

This was the author's longest work. He first analyses the causes of mistaken popular beliefs, attributing them to the common infirmitv of human nature and the inclination of mankind to error, to false deductions, to credulity, to adherence to authority, and finally to the endeavours of Satan. He then ranges over a vast number of legends and beliefs, discussing them with a pleasant irony and quaint fancy; for instance, that crystal is ice strongly congealed, that an elephant has no joints (based 'on the gross and somewhat cylindrical composure of the legs'), that snails have no eyes, and the popular notions about mandrakes and the salutation of a person who has just sneezed.

Vulgate, THE, from the Latin vulgatus, 'made public or common', a term applied more particularly to St. Jerome's Latin version of the Bible completed in 405. The CLEMENTINE text of this, a recension made by order of Clement VIII (1592-1605), is the authorized text of the Roman Catholic Church. See Bible.

Vye, EUSTACIA, a character in Hardy's 'The Return of the Native' (q.v.).

W

WAGE OF JERSEY (d. after 1171), wrote c. 1154 a 'Roman de Brut' or 'Geste des Bretons', dedicated to Eleanor, queen of Henry II, embodying the Arthurian legends, based on Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.). This was one of the sources of Layamon's 'Brut' (see Layamon). Wace also wrote a 'Roman de Rou' (i.e. Rollo) or 'Geste des Normands', a history of the dukes of Normandy. He was made canon of Bayeux by Henry II.

Wacht am Rhein, Die, 'The Watch on the Rhine', a German national song of which the words were composed in 1840 by Schneckenburger, and which became very popular during the Franco-German War.

Wackles, MRS. and the MISSES MELISSA, SOPHY, and JANE, in Dickens's 'The Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.), kept a 'Ladies' Seminary' at Chelsea.

Wade, GEORGE (1673-1748), an Irishman who rose to be field-marshal in 1743. He was commander-in-chief in England in 1745, but he was superseded for failing to stop the advance of Prince Charles Edward. He had been sent to the Highlands in 1724, where he was celebrated for the military roads that he constructed. The famous distich does not contain a 'bull' (as generally supposed) because a 'made road' differs from a road (G. Sheldon, 'From Trackway to Turnpike', 1930).

Wade, Miss, a character in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), a suspicious, venomous woman who entices away Tattycoram from the Meagles family.

Wade's boat, in Chaucer's 'Merchant's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales), l. 179:

And eek thise olde widwes, God it woot,
They conne so muchel craft on Wades boot.

According to Skeat's note Wade was a famous hero of antiquity who is mentioned in various poems and in Malory's 'Morte Darthur', vii. ix. He was the son of Wayland the Smith (q.v.) and the king's daughter, and had a magic boat called Wingelock (French Guingelot, see Gringolet). 'Old widows', says Chaucer in effect, 'know too much of the craft of Wade's boat; they can fly from place to place in a minute, and if charged with any misdemeanour, will swear they were a mile away.' A 12th-13th-cent. English reference to Wade is recorded in the 'Academy' (1896), i. 137, 157.

Wadman, WIDOW, in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.), a comely 'daughter of Eve', who occupies the house and garden next to that of 'my Uncle Toby' and tries to secure him for a husband.

Waft of Death, a phrase used by G. Fox (q.v.) in his 'Journal' for the year 1658. He writes: 'And after this I mett him [Oliver Cromwell] riding into Hampton Court park, and before I came at him he was riding in the head of his life guard, and I saw and felt a waft of death go forth against him that he looked like a dead man.'

WAGG

Wagg, Mr., in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.), a satellite of Lord Steyne. His name has allusion to Theodore Hook (q.v.).

Waggoner, The, a poem by Wordsworth (q.v.), composed in 1805, and published in 1819 with dedication to Charles Lamb.

It tells how Benjamin the Waggoner, driving home his team of eight horses through the night among the Lakeland hills, escapes the temptation of the Swan Inn, but falls victim to that of the Cherry-Tree, and loses his place in consequence. But no one else can drive the team, and Lakeland loses both waggoner and wain.

Wagner, the attendant of Faust in Marlowe's 'Doctor Faustus' (q.v.) and in Goethe's 'Faust'.

WAGNER, (WILHELM) RICHARD (1813-83), German musician and poet, who by the combination of these twin arts in his great music-dramas (the 'Ring' of the Nibelungen (1853-70), 'Tristan und Isolde' (1865), the 'Meistersinger' (1868), 'Parsifal' (1882), &c.), and also by his critical work, 'Oper und Drama' (1851), exerted a powerful influence on German music and literature. He created, or at least reformed, musical drama by combining the spoken drama with the old 'opera' in which music was the sole aim. Choosing mythical or legendary matter for his subject, he sketched his drama and wrote the verse, which itself evoked the music appropriate to it.

Wahabi, a follower of Abd-el-Wahhab, a Mohammedan reformer (1691-1787) whose sect flourishes in central Arabia.

Wainamöinen, the principal hero of the 'Kalevala' (q.v.), the god of music and poetry.

WAINEWRIGHT, THOMAS GRIF-FITHS (1794-1852), wrote art-critiques for the 'London Magazine' during 1820-3 and exhibited at the Royal Academy. He was a forger and a poisoner, and died a convict in Tasmania. He was the original of Varney in Bulwer Lytton's 'Lucretia' and suggested to Dickens his sketch, 'Hunted Down'. He was a friend of C. Lamb and the subject of an essay by O. Wilde (q.v.).

Wakefield, EDWARD GIBBON (1796-1862), a colonial statesman, who from 1829 devoted himself to the reform of the administration of the Australian colonies. He had been in 1826-9 in prison for abducting an heiress; wrote 'The Art of Colonization' in 1833; and went with Lord Durham to Canada, as unofficial adviser, in 1838; he had some share in writing Lord Durham's famous 'Report'. He opposed the transportation system and procured the discontinuance of the wasteful free grants of land to settlers. Land was to be sold to these at a fairly high price by the Crown, and part of the proceeds employed to assist emigration. He secured the formation of the South Australian Association in 1834, and of the New Zealand Association in 1837, to organize the colonization of those countries. He himself emigrated to Wellington in 1853.

WAKEFIELD, GILBERT (1756-1801), educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, edited the 'Georgics' (1788), 'Horace' (1794), 'Lucretius' (1796-9), and some Greek plays, and published 'Silva critica' in 1789. He was a vigorous controversial writer, and conceived a violent hatred of Pitt and of Porson. He attacked the latter's 'Hecuba' in a 'Diatribæ Extemporalis' in 1797. He also edited some English authors, including Pope. He was imprisoned for a seditious pamphlet, 1799-1801.

Wakefield, HARRY, the English drover in Scott's 'The Two Drovers' (q.v.).

Wakefield Plays, see Mysteries.

Wakem, MR. and PHILIP, characters in George Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

Walbrook or WALLBROOK, London, a stream that had its source in the fens beyond Moorgate (q.v.), passed through the city wall, and flowing under many bridges, divided the city in two, issuing into the Thames at Dowgate. The present street called Walbrook roughly follows part of its course.

The name is not taken from the city wall; it is weall-broc, the stream of the Britons.

Walcheren Expedition, a disastrous expedition, directed against the French, undertaken in 1809. The British troops under Lord Chatham (eldest son of the great Chatham), with a naval force under Sir Richard Strachan, reached Walcheren, an island at the mouth of the Scheldt, and took Flushing, but failed to achieve anything else, and the expedition was obliged to return after suffering heavy losses from fever. The idea of such an expedition was excellent; it was probably suggested by the French exile, Dumouriez. Antwerp, where a new French fleet was being built, was the objective; and when the expedition was being planned Austria was still holding out on the Danube. But Castlereagh ought to have known that the islands at the mouth of the Scheldt were notoriously unhealthy and that there was no drinkable water there. And the expedition started too late (28 July), when Napoleon had already won Wagram. The incident inspired the well-known epigram (there are various readings of the first line):

The Earl of Chatham, with his sword drawn,
Stood waiting for Sir Richard Strachan;
Sir Richard, longing to be at 'em,
Stood waiting for the Earl of Chatham.

Waldeck, MARTIN, the subject of a legend from the German interposed in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.), a charcoal-burner enriched by gold obtained from the demon of the Harz Mountains, and brought to an evil end by his wealth.

Waldegrave, HENRY, in Campbell's 'Ger-

Waldenses or WALDENSIANS, the adherents of a religious sect which originated in the south of France about 1170 through the preaching of Peter Waldo, a rich merchant of Lyons. They rejected the authority of the pope and various rites, and were excommunicated in 1184 and subjected to persecution. But they survived and eventually became a separately organized church, which associated itself with the Protestant Reformation of the 16th cent. and still exists, chiefly in northern Italy and the adjacent regions. Their persecution by the duchess-regent of Savoy in 1655 led to Milton's noble sonnet, 'Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints', and caused Cromwell to insist on his new ally, France, putting an instant stop to the massacre. In French the Waldenses are called Vaudois.

Waldhere, the name given to two short fragments (11th cent.) of an OE. epic poem preserved in the Royal Library at Copenhagen.

We know from other sources that Waldhere was the son of a king of Aquitaine, who was given up to Attila, king of the Huns, and became one of his generals, but escaped with Hiltgund (daughter of a king of Burgundy), to whom he had been betrothed when young. In the course of their flight they are waylaid, and Waldhere, after slaying his assailants in a first encounter, is surprised and wounded on the following day, but is able to continue his journey and is finally married to Hiltgund. The fragments give speeches that pass just before the second fight.

Walker, HOOKEY, a derisive exclamation expressive of incredulity. It is not unlikely that it was derived from some hook-nosed person of the name of Walker, but the various stories told to explain it have probably no foundation. [OED.]

WALKER, THOMAS (1784-1836), of Trinity College, Cambridge; called to the bar 1812; magistrate of Lambeth Police Court 1829. He is noted as the author of a weekly periodical, 'The Original', of which twenty-nine numbers appeared (20 May to 2 Dec. 1835) up to his death in Jan. 1836. Each number contains short articles on a variety of subjects; its purpose was 'to treat, as forcibly, perspicuously, and concisely as each subject and my own ability will allow, of whatever is most interesting and important in Religion and Politics, in Morals and Manners, and in our Habits and Customs'.

street running from Broadway to the East River, the financial centre of the city, where the principal banks and the Stock Exchange are situated.

WALLACE, ALFRED RUSSEL (1823-1913), was born at Usk in Monmouthshire, and educated at the Grammar School at Hertford. He left school at the age of 14, studied surveying, was for a time apprentice to a watchmaker, and schoolmaster at Leicester, where he made the acquaintance of Henry Walter Bates, the naturalist. In 1848 he joined Bates in a trip to the Amazon for the collection of specimens. The expedition, including the destruction of their ship by fire on the homeward voyage, is described in Wallace's 'Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro' (1853). A further voyage to the Malay Archipelago (1854-62) is described in his 'Malay Archipelago' (1869). It was in 1858 during an attack of fever at Ternate in the Moluccas that the idea of natural selection as the solution of the problem of evolution flashed upon him, and he at once communicated it to Darwin. The outcome, a testimony to the generosity of both the great biologists, was the famous joint communication to the Linnean Society on the theory of evolution. Among numerous works and scientific papers Wallace published in 1876 his 'Geographical Distribution of Animals', in 1889 the semi-popular 'Darwinism', in 1898 'The Wonderful Century', in 1903 'Man's Place in the Universe', and in 1905 his autobiography, 'My Life'.

WALLACE, EDGAR (1875-1932), a very prolific author, one of the masters of the pure 'thriller', among whose numerous works it is almost impossible to select the most notable. A few landmarks for the inquiring social and literary historian are: 'The Four Just Men' (1906) and its followers, 'Sanders of the River', 'The Angel of Terror', 'The Green Archer', 'The Fellowship of the Frog', 'The Dark Eyes of London', 'The Hand of Power' (novels); 'The Terror' (1927), 'The Squeaker' (1927), 'The Calendar', 'On the Spot' (plays). Wallace, SIR WILLIAM (1272?-1305), the Scottish patriot of the time of Edward I, who devoted his life to resistance to the English and was finally captured by treachery and executed in London, is the subject of a long poem by Henry the Minstrel (q.v.), 'Blind Harry'.

WALLACE, WILLIAM (1844-97), educated at St. Andrews and Balliol College, Oxford, succeeded T. H. Green as professor of moral philosophy at Oxford (1882-97). Wallace devoted himself largely to the elucidation of Hegel's thought, and his principal publications were 'The Logic of Hegel' (1874), translated from Hegel's 'Encyclopaedia', and 'Hegel's Philosophy of Mind' (1894). After his death appeared his 'Lectures on Natural Theology and Ethics' (1898). His 'Life of Arthur Schopenhauer' appeared in 1890.

WALLACE COLLECTION

Wallace Collection, THB, named from Sir Richard Wallace (1818–90), supposed natural son of Maria, marchioness of Hertford, an art connoisseur and collector. His upbringing was more French than English; and during the siege of Paris in 1870–1 he devoted much of his large fortune to assisting the City of Paris and the French nation. His widow left the great Hertford-Wallace Collection of pictures, &c., to the nation in 1897. It is exhibited in Sir R. Wallace's house in Manchester Square, London.

Wallenstein, ALBRECHT EUSEBIUS VON (1583–1634), an Austrian general celebrated for his campaigns in the Thirty Years War (q.v.). After many victories he was defeated by Gustavus Adolphus at Lützen in 1632. He now prepared to abandon the Imperial cause; but the emperor, Ferdinand II, suspecting his intention, removed him from his command. Wallenstein was murdered by some of his officers when he was believed to be on the point of going over to the Swedes. His career is the subject of a great historical trilogy by Schiller (q.v.), of which the two last parts were translated by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.).

WALLER, EDMUND (1606–87), inherited Beaconsfield in Buckinghamshire, and was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. In 1631 he married a London heiress, who died in 1634. He entered parliament early and was at first an active member of the opposition. Later he became a Royalist, and in 1643 was leader in a plot ('Waller's plot') to seize London for Charles I. For this he was imprisoned, fined, and banished, but on betraying his associates, spared execution. He made his peace with Cromwell in 1651 and returned to England. He was restored to royal favour on the Restoration and was again member of parliament. After the death of his first wife he had paid unsuccessful court to Lady Dorothy Sidney, whom he celebrated in poems as 'Sacharissa', and married Mary Bracey as his second wife in 1644. Waller was a precocious poet. He wrote, probably as early as 1625, a complimentary piece on 'His Majesty's Escape at St. Andre' (Prince Charles's escape from shipwreck at Santander) in heroic couplets, one of the first examples of a form that prevailed in English poetry for some two hundred years. His verse, much of which is occupied with praise of 'Sacharissa' (and also of Lady Carlisle and others), is of a polished simplicity, and was highly commended by Dryden. Some of his best work belongs to his later period: the 'Panegyric to My Lord Protector', the 'Instructions to a Painter' on the battle of Sole Bay, and 'Of the Last Verses in the Book', containing the famous lines,

The Soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed, Lets in new light through chinks that time hath made.

WALPOLE

His earlier pieces, 'On a Girdle' and 'Go, lovely Rose!', are also well known. He published six cantos 'Of Divine Love' in 1685.

WALLIS, JOHN (1616–1703), the mathematician, was educated at Felsted School and Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, 1649–1703. He was one of the founders of the Royal Society. His famous 'Arithmetica Infinitorum', which contained the germs of the differential calculus, was published in 1655.

WALPOLE, HORACE, fourth earl of Orford (1717–97), fourth son of Sir Robert Walpole, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He travelled in France and Italy with Gray (q.v.) in 1739–41, and was M.P. successively for Callington, Castle Rising, and Lynn from 1741 to 1767. In 1747 he settled at Strawberry Hill, Twickenham, which he made into 'a little Gothic castle', and in it collected articles of vertu and established a printing-press. Here he printed Gray's two Pindaric odes, in 1758 his own 'Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors', in 1762–80 his 'Anecdotes of Painting in England' (which still retain importance), and in 1765 his 'Catalogue of Engravers in England'. He also printed a description of his house and collections, and other works (prose and verse) and editions. Walpole visited Paris in 1765, 1767, and 1775. He published 'The Castle of Otranto' (q.v.) in 1764, and 'Historic Doubts on Richard III' and 'The Mysterious Mother' (q.v.) in 1768. He befriended Kitty Clive, the actress, and Mary Berry, the authoress, and her sister Agnes. He succeeded his nephew in the earldom in 1791. His collected 'Works' were published in 1798. Of his voluminous correspondence, a series of 'Miscellaneous Letters' formed vol. v of the 'Works', and collections of 'Letters' appeared in 1820, 1840, 1857–9 (Peter Cunningham), and 1903–5 (Mrs. Paget Toynbee, 16 vols.), with supplementary volumes in 1918 by Paget Toynbee. It is on his letters that Walpole's literary reputation principally rests. They are remarkable both for their charm and their autobiographical, social, and political interest. They extend from 1732 to 1797, and display his affectionate disposition and cheerful fortitude in sickness. His principal correspondents were Sir Horace Mann, his own cousin Henry Seymour Conway (Field Marshal), the countess of Upper Ossory, George Montagu, and, in his later days, Miss Berry. His letters to Madame du Deffand were destroyed by his wish. Hers to him were edited by Mrs. Toynbee in 1912.

WALPOLE, SIR HUGH (SEYMOUR) (1884–1941), novelist, among whose works are: 'Maradick at Forty' (1910), 'Mr. Perrin and Mr. Traill' (1911), 'Prelude to Adventure' (1912), 'Fortitude' (1913), 'The Dark Forest' (1916), 'The Green Mirror' (1918), 'The Cathedral' (1922); and a historical sequence comprising 'Rogue Herries' (1930), 'Judith Paris' (1931), and 'The Fortress' (1933).

Walpole, Sir Robert, first earl of Orford (1676-1745), educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, was M.P. for Castle Rising (1701-2) and King's Lynn (1702-12 and 1713-42), and was soon recognized as a great man of business and a leader of the Whig party. He was secretary of war, 1708-10, and treasurer of the navy, 1710-11. After the fall of the Whig ministry he was, in 1712, expelled from the House of Commons and imprisoned in the Tower on a vexatious charge of venality in office. He was prime minister and chancellor of the exchequer, 1715-17, and again 1721-42, during which periods he did much to encourage trade, both international and colonial, by removing import and export duties and restrictions. He followed a policy of union with France and held the view that England's best interest lay in European peace. He vainly resisted the clamour for war with Spain in 1738-9 and made the mistake of remaining in office when the demand proved irresistible. Walpole was the first minister since the Restoration who made a special study of finance and commerce; he laid the foundations of free trade and modern colonial policy. He was the father of Horace Walpole (q.v.). His grandson sold his fine collection of pictures to the Tsarina Catherine II.

WALPOLE, Sir Spencer (1839-1907), author of a 'History of England from 1815 to 1856' and 'The History of Twenty-five Years (1856-1880)', a continuation of the former, published respectively in 1878-90 and 1904-8 (the last-named work was incomplete, only four volumes being published); also of a 'Life of Lord Russell' (1889).

Walpurgis Night, so called from St. Walpurgis (an English nun who in the 8th cent. helped to convert the Germans to Christianity), the night before 1 May, when, according to popular superstition in Germany, the witches and the Devil hold a festival on the Brocken in the Harz Mountains. It is the subject of a scene in Goethe's 'Faust', Pt. I.

WALTON, IZAAK (1593-1683), was born at Stafford, was apprenticed to an iron-monger in London, and later carried on trade there on his own account. He was the friend of Donne, of Sir Henry Wotton, and of Bishops Morley, Sanderson, and King. The latter part of his life he spent at Winchester, where his son-in-law was prebendary, and there he died. He published his biographies, of John Donne (q.v.) in 1640, of Sir Henry Wotton (q.v.) in 1651, of Richard Hooker (q.v.) in 1665, of George Herbert (q.v.) in 1670, and of Bishop Sanderson in 1678. The 'Compleat Angler' (q.v.), by which he is chiefly known, first appeared in 1653, largely rewritten in the second edition (1655). See also Cotton (C.).

Wanderer, The, an OE. poem of 115 lines, included in the 'Exeter Book', telling of the wanderings of a man who has lost his lord. He dreams of his former happiness, and reflects on the vicissitudes of human life.

Wanderer, The, a moral and descriptive poem in five cantos by R. Savage (q.v.), published in 1729; designed to prove that man may owe

The fruits of bliss to bursting clouds of woe.

But the execution of the plan is difficult to follow. Johnson, who praises the poem, admits that it is not so much 'a regular fabrick' as 'a heap of shining materials thrown together by accident'.

Wandering Jew, THE, a Jew condemned to wander about the world until Christ's second coming, because, according to the legend, as Christ bore the cross to Calvary, the Jew chid him, and urged him to go faster.

A pamphlet was published at Leyden in 1602 relating that Paulus von Eizen, bishop of Schleswig, had in 1542 met a Jew named Ahasuerus, who admitted that he was the Jew in question. The story became popular, and many instances of the appearance of the Wandering Jew are recorded from the 16th to the 19th cent.

But a somewhat similar story is told by the English chronicler, Matthew Paris (q.v.), at a much earlier date. An Armenian archbishop visited England in 1228, and, while being entertained at St. Albans, was asked if he had ever seen or heard of Joseph, who was present at the Crucifixion, and was said to be still alive, as a testimony to the Christian faith. The prelate replied that the man had recently dined at his own table. He had been Pontius Pilate's porter, by name Cartaphilus, who, when they were dragging Jesus from the Judgement Hall, had struck him on the back, saying, 'Go faster, Jesus, why dost thou linger?', to which Jesus replied, 'I indeed am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come.' This man had been converted soon after and named Joseph. He lived for ever, and was now a very grave and holy person. It is noteworthy that Matthew Paris was a monk at St. Albans at the time of the archbishop's visit. About 1240-50 Philip Mousket, afterwards bishop of Tournay, wrote his rhymed chronicle, which contains a similar account of the Jew, derived from the same Armenian prelate (Baring-Gould, 'Curious Myths').

The legend of the Wandering Jew has been made the subject of many German works, and Goethe designed a poem on the subject. Eugène Sue's 'Le Juif errant' introduces it. There is a ballad in Percy's 'Reliques' in which the Wandering Jew is described as having been a shoemaker, who refused to allow Christ, on the way to Calvary, to rest upon a stone. George Croly (1780-1860) wrote a romance, 'Salathiel' (1829), on the same subject.

Wandering Willie, Willie Steenson, the blind fiddler in Scott's 'Redgauntlet' (q.v.). 'Wandering Willie's Tale' is an episode in the novel, an example of the author's successful use of the supernatural.

'Wandering Willie' is also the name of a song by Burns.

Wanderings of Cain, The, a prose-poem by S. T. Coleridge, written in 1798. The work was undertaken in conjunction with Wordsworth, who was to have written the first canto. Coleridge wrote the second canto; but the work was then abandoned, and 'The Ancient Mariner' was written instead.

WANLEY, HUMFREY (1672-1726), began life as a draper's assistant at Coventry, but read widely and went to Oxford in 1695, and was an assistant in the Bodleian Library in 1696. He displayed remarkable skill in palaeography and assisted Edward Bernard in the preparation of the 'Catalogi Librorum Manuscriptorum Angliae et Hiberniae' (1697). He produced in 1705 a catalogue of Anglo-Saxon manuscripts, which is still the standard work. He was librarian to the first and second earls of Oxford, and began the catalogue of the Harleian MSS., a work on which he was engaged when he died.

WANLEY, NATHANIEL (1634-80), divine and compiler. He published 'The Wonders of the Little World' (1678, an anecdotal treatise on mankind), and other works. His poems have been edited by L. C. Martin (1928).

Wans Dyke or WODEN'S DYKE, a defensive entrenchment of Roman or Romano-British construction running from Savernake nearly to the Bristol Channel.

Wapping, adjoining the Tower of London, 'the usual place of execution for hanging of pirates and sea-rovers, at the low water mark there to remain till three tides had overflowed them', but after the removal of the gallows further off 'a continual street or filthy straight passage, with alleys of small tenements or cottages built, inhabited by sailors and victuallers, along by the river Thames almost, to Radcliff' (Stow), later known as the Ratcliffe Highway.

Warbeck, PERKIN (1474-99), the impostor who gave himself out for Richard, duke of York, son of Edward IV; in fact the son of John Osbeck or De Werbecque, controller of Tournay. He was welcomed in Scotland by James IV, and married Lady Catherine Gordon in 1495. He landed in Cornwall in 1497, proclaiming himself King Richard IV, was taken prisoner, confessed his imposture, and was hanged. For Ford's play see Perkin Warbeck.

WARBURTON, BARTHOLOMEW ELLIOTT, see Crescent and the Cross.

Warburton, JOHN (1682-1759), herald and antiquary. He was an indefatigable collector and owned many rare manuscripts. Most of the rare Elizabethan and Jacobean plays in his possession were through his own 'carelessness and the ignorance' of Betsy Baker, his servant, 'unluckily burned or put under pye bottoms'. A list in his handwriting of those destroyed, fifty-five in number, and of those saved, three and a fragment, has been preserved. Some of the burnt manuscripts were unique.

WARBURTON, ROWLAND EYLES EGERTON (1804-91), author of 'Hunting Songs and Ballads' (1846), 'Hunting Songs and Miscellaneous Verses' (1859), and of a version of Gray's 'O tu severi Religio loci' (the alcaics written by Gray in the album of the Grande Chartreuse).

WARBURTON, WILLIAM (1698-1779), rose to be bishop of Gloucester in 1759. He was much engaged in theological controversy, writing with vigour and arrogance. His principal works were: 'The Alliance between Church and State' (1736) and 'The Divine Legation of Moses' (1737-41), a paradoxical argument that the very absence in the Mosaic law of any reference to a future life, a necessary element in a scheme of morality, is a proof of the divine mission of the law-giver. His 'Doctrine of Grace', directed against John Wesley's views, was published in 1762. He brought out in 1747 an edition of Shakespeare which was sharply criticized, and in 1751 an edition of Pope's works (he had been left Pope's literary executor). He was a bad scholar, a literary bully, and a man of untrustworthy character.

WARD, ARTEMUS, see Browne (C. F.).

WARD, EDWARD ('Ned') (1667-1731), tavern-keeper and writer of Hudibrastic doggerel verse and coarse humorous prose, is remarkable for his sketches of London life and characters. Some of the best of these are contained in 'The London Spy' (1698-1709), a simply told tale of a country resident who visits London, meets a cockney acquaintance, and with him ranges about the town, noting sights, sounds, and smells, and odd characters. His 'Hudibras Redivivus' was published in 1705-7.

WARD, MARY AUGUSTA, better known as MRS. HUMPHRY WARD (1851-1920), was granddaughter of Thomas Arnold of Rugby. She wrote her first novel, 'Miss Bretherton', in 1884, and translated Amiel's 'Journal in-time' in 1885. She embodied in her most famous novel, 'Robert Elsmere' (1888), her view that Christianity could be revitalized by emphasizing its social mission and discarding its miraculous element. Among her other novels, 'The History of David Grieve' followed in 1892, 'Marcella' in 1894, 'Sir George Tressady' in 1896, 'Helbeck of Bannisdale' in 1898, 'The Marriage of William Ashe' in 1905, and 'The Case of Richard Meynell' in 1911. Besides carrying on much social and philanthropic work, Mrs. Humphry Ward was an active opponent of the extension of the franchise to women.

WARD, WILLIAM GEORGE (1812-82), known as 'Ideal Ward' from his most famous work, was educated at Winchester, a scholar of Lincoln College, Oxford, and a fellow of Balliol. He was a keen religious controversialist and capable dialectician, adopted the theological views of Newman (q.v.), and wrote in defence of his Tract XC in 1841. He published 'The Ideal of a Christian Church', a Romanizing treatise, in 1844, in consequence of which he was removed from his degree for heresy. He was lecturer in moral philosophy at St. Edmund's College, Ware, 1851-8, and editor of the 'Dublin Review', 1863-78, writing against liberal theology and in favour of papal infallibility. He was commemorated by Tennyson in the touching poem in which he is described as 'Most generous of all Ultramontanes, Ward'.

Warden, HENRY, in Scott's 'The Monastery' and 'The Abbot' (qq.v.), an earnest Protestant divine.

Warden, The, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1855. This was the first of the Barchester series, and the first of Trollope's novels that met with success. The idea of it was conceived while Trollope one summer evening was wandering about the neighbourhood of Salisbury Cathedral.

The Rev. Septimus Harding, gentle, retiring, and conscientious, is a widower with two daughters, the elder of whom is married to the Rev. Dr. Theophilus Grantly, son of the bishop, and archdeacon of Barchester. The bishop has made Harding precentor of the cathedral and warden of Hiram's Hospital, a charitable foundation maintaining twelve old bedesmen. The property of the charity, having increased in value, yields enough, after housing the old men in comfort, to provide £800 a year for the warden, who enjoys what is practically a sinecure. This is attacked as an abuse by John Bold, an energetic young surgeon of Barchester, with a passion for reform; the matter is taken up by the 'Jupiter' newspaper (see Thunderer), and finally an action is brought against the warden and the bishop's steward, on behalf of the old bedesmen, who it is alleged are being defrauded of their rights. All this causes poor Mr. Harding intense distress, for he is not satisfied that there may not be some ground for the allegation. The situation is complicated by the fact that Bold is in love with Harding's younger daughter, Eleanor, and she with him. In spite of the strenuous opposition of Archdeacon Grantly, a somewhat worldly divine and a vigorous and overbearing defender of the rights of the Church, Harding resigns his wardenship. Meanwhile Eleanor has pleaded with Bold and persuaded him to withdraw his action. There the matter is left. The old bishop, Harding's close friend, refuses to fill the wardenship, the hospital falls into decay, and the bedesmen lose the friendly care of their former warden. Bold marries Eleanor. Harding remains precentor of the cathedral, and obtains a small living in addition. The story is continued in 'Barchester Towers' (q.v.).

Wardle, MR., a character in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Wardour, SIR ARTHUR, and his son and daughter CAPTAIN REGINALD and ISABELLA, characters in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.).

Wardour Street, the name of a street in London which was formerly occupied mainly by dealers in antique and imitation-antique furniture. Hence 'Wardour-Street English' is applied to the pseudo-archaic diction affected by some modern writers, especially of historical novels.

Ware, THE BED OF, see Bed of Ware.

Waring, one of the 'Dramatic Romances' of R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1842.

The poem is the reminiscence of a friend, Domett (q.v.), who has left England. The poet's fancy follows Waring in the places where he may now be. Finally he is reported to have been seen off the Illyrian coast in a light bark, sailing away into the sunset.

Warming-pan, a word used with allusion to the story that James II's son, afterwards called the Old Pretender, was a supposititious child introduced into the queen's bed in a warming-pan.

WARNER, WILLIAM (1558?-1609), studied at Oxford and was an attorney in London. He published in 1585 'Pan his Syrinx', seven prose tales, and a translation of the 'Menæchmi' of Plautus in 1595. His chief work is 'Albion's England', a metrical British history, with mythical and fictitious episodes, extending in the first (1586) edition from Noah to the Norman Conquest. It was brought down to James I's reign in 1606; a complete edition appeared (posthumously) in 1612. Meres, in his 'Palladis Tamia' (1598), associated him with Spenser as one of the two chief English heroic poets, and with Spenser, Daniel, Drayton, and Breton as a lyric poet. Drayton also eulogized him.

WARREN, JOHN BYRNE LEICESTER, Baron de Tabley (1835-95), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, published some volumes of verse under the pseudonyms of 'George F. Preston' (1850-62) and 'William Lancaster' (1863-8), and two tragedies, also under pseudonyms, 'Philoctetes' (1866) and 'Orestes' (1868). In 1893 and 1895 he published over his own name two series of 'Poems Dramatic and Lyrical', in which he is at his best; also a 'Guide to Bookplates' (1880). His collected poems appeared in 1903. De Tabley was a botanist, and his poems give proof of his close observation of nature.

WARREN, SAMUEL (1807-77), a student of medicine at Edinburgh, then a barrister, M.P. for Midhurst, and a master in lunacy, and the author of many legal text-books. He is remembered for his 'Passages from the Diary of a Late Physician' (1838, after having appeared in 'Blackwood'), and for his very popular novel, 'Ten Thousand a Year' (1839), the story of Mr. Tittlebat Titmouse, a draper's assistant, who comes into a large fortune, thanks to documents forged by the lawyers Gammon and Quirk. Having successfully ousted the rightful owners of the property, Charles Aubrey and his charming sister Kate, the lawyers proceed to blackmail Titmouse, whose unexpected elevation to wealth gives rise to absurd consequences. He marries Lady Cecilia, the daughter of the earl of Dredlington, and is returned to parliament by reckless corruption. Finally the fraud is exposed, Titmouse is discovered to be of illegitimate birth, is imprisoned for debt, goes mad, and is confined in a lunatic asylum, and Gammon commits suicide.

Warrington, GEORGE, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.), who figures also in 'The Newcomes'. He is a descendant of the Warringtons of 'The Virginians' (q.v.).

Wars of the Roses, THE, the prolonged struggle between the houses of York and Lancaster, whose badges were respectively a white and a red rose. The wars began in 1455 in Henry VI's reign and ended with the defeat and death of Richard III at Bosworth in 1485, and the accession of Henry VII, who, by marrying Elizabeth of York, united the two lines.

Wart, THOMAS, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', one of the recruits for Falstaff's force.

WARTON, JOSEPH (1722-1800), brother of T. Warton (q.v.), educated at Winchester and Oriel College, Oxford, held various livings and was a conspicuously unsuccessful headmaster of Winchester (1766-93). He was a literary critic of wide knowledge and independent judgement, and is principally known for his 'Essays' on Pope (1756 and 1782), in which he criticized the 'correct' school of poetry and distinguished 'betwixt a man of wit, a man of sense, and a true poet'.

WARTON, THOMAS (1728-90), brother of J. Warton (q.v.), educated at Trinity College, Oxford, was professor of poetry at Oxford (1757-67) and subsequently Camden professor of history, and poet laureate in 1785, an appointment that was celebrated in the 'Probationary Odes' (see Rolliad). He was the author of many works, including 'Poems'

WASHINGTON

(1777), notable for their revival of the sonnet; a 'History of English Poetry' (1774-81), a valuable pioneer work; and 'Observations on the Faerie Queene of Spenser' (1754). He edited the early poems of Milton and the famous miscellany of university verse entitled 'The Oxford Sausage' (1764). He was the author of much varied, including humorous, verse. In spite of several sparrings he and Dr. Johnson were warm friends. Warton was a real predecessor of the Romantic school, and a much bigger man than has been (until recently) recognized.

Warwick, Mrs., the heroine of Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v.).

Warwick the King-maker, Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick (1428-71), instrumental in placing Edward IV on the throne in 1461, and in restoring Henry VI in 1470; killed at Barnet, 1471.

Washington, GEORGE (1732-99), born in Virginia, was General Braddock's A.D.C. in the war with the French and the Indians (1755), and was appointed commander-in-chief of the Continental Forces in the War of American Independence. He compelled the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in 1781. He was president of the American convention of 1787, and first president of the United States (1789). A man notable for his lofty character, self-command, calmness, justice, and wisdom.

George Washington figures in Thackeray's 'The Virginians' (q.v.).

Washington and the Cherry-tree. The story is told in Mason L. Weems's 'A History of the Life and Death, Virtues and Exploits of General George Washington' (1800); the incident is now regarded as apocryphal, but it is frequently quoted.

When George was about six years old he was given a hatchet, with which he amused himself chopping everything that came in his way. One day he unluckily tried its edge on a beautiful young English cherry-tree. The next morning George's father, seeing what had befallen his tree, which was a great favourite, asked George if he knew who had killed it. George staggered under the question for a moment, but quickly recovered himself, and bravely cried out: 'I can't tell a lie, Pa; you know I can't tell a lie. I did cut it with my hatchet.' 'Run to my arms, you dearest boy,' cried his father in transports; 'glad am I, George, that you killed my tree; for you have paid me for it a thousand-fold.'

WASHINGTON, BOOKER TALIAFERRO (1856-1915), born of a negro slave mother on a Virginia plantation, studied at Hampton after the Civil War, and then devoted himself to raising the moral and intellectual status of his fellow negroes, working out a scheme of education for them and becoming the foremost representative of his race. He was an eloquent speaker and voluminous writer. His works include an interesting autobiography, consisting of two parts: 'Up from Slavery' (1901) and 'Working with Hands' (1904).

Watchman, The, a periodical issued by S. T. Coleridge from 1 Mar. to 13 May 1796.

Water Babies, The, A Fairy Tale for a Land-Baby, by C. Kingsley, published in 1863.

The story tells, with much pleasant humour, how little Tom, the chimney-sweep, employed by the bully, Mr. Grimes, runs away, falls into a river, and is turned into a water-baby. In the river and sea he makes intimate acquaintance with all sorts of aquatic creatures and learns the wickedness of ill-using efts and the like, and also the necessity of self-sacrifice. The first edition was charmingly illustrated by (Sir) Noel Paton.

Waterloo, a village to the S. of Brussels, where, on 18 June 1815, was fought the battle in which Napoleon was finally and decisively defeated. The allied British, Netherlands, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers, under the duke of Wellington, held their own until the close of the day, when the Prussian army under Blücher appeared, and took Napoleon in the flank. The French Imperial Guard made a last desperate charge and was repulsed. Wellington then ordered a general advance, before which the French gave way and fled. Wellington had some 70,000 men, Napoleon rather more, Blücher about 40,000. The word 'Waterloo' is used allusively for a decisive contest.

WATERTON, CHARLES (1782-1865), naturalist, of Walton Hall, Yorks., who resided in British Guiana during 1804-12 and subsequently travelled in the Orinoco region, wrote an interesting narrative of his 'Wanderings in S. America' (1825), in which occurs the famous account of his ride on an alligator.

Watier's, a club founded at 81 Piccadilly, at the suggestion of the Prince Regent, by Watier, the prince's chef, as a dinner club, noted for its elaborate cooking. It was frequented by men of fashion (including Beau Brummel, q.v.), became a gambling centre, and was closed about 1819.

Watling Street, one of the great Roman roads of Britain, which ran from Dover, through Canterbury, past the ancient city of London, crossing the Thames by a ford at Westminster, where the river was exceptionally wide and shallow, then along the line of what is now the Edgware Road, through St. Albans and across England to Chester. The name in Old English was Wæclinga Stræt; the first word, apparently the genitive plural of the name of a (real or imaginary) family or clan, occurs also in Wæclinga ceaster 'the Wæclings' city', the Old English name of St. Albans.

In Chaucer's 'House of Fame', ii. 431, the eagle draws the poet's attention to the Milky Way and says:

And some, parfay,

Watling Street, London, was probably a diversion to London Bridge of the older Watling Street (see above) that crossed the Thames by the ford at Westminster.

Watson, Dr., in the cycle of stories by Sir A. C. Doyle (q.v.) relating to Sherlock Holmes, the detective, is a stolid medical man, Holmes's companion and assistant in his adventures, and his chronicler. His stupidity, which is good-humouredly tolerated by his brilliant leader, serves as a foil to set off the qualities of the latter.

WATSON, RICHARD (1737-1816), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, professor of chemistry, 1764, and Regius professor of divinity, 1771, became bishop of Llandaff in 1782. He wrote a notable 'Apology for Christianity' (1776) in reply to Gibbon, and an 'Apology for the Bible' (1796) in reply to Thomas Paine.

WATSON, THOMAS (1557?-92), was possibly educated at Oxford, and was a law-student in London. He published a Latin version of the 'Antigone' of Sophocles, with an appendix of Latin allegorical poems and experiments in Latin metres, in 1581; and in 1582, "Εκατομυθία, or Passionate Centurie of Loue", eighteen-line English poems (called 'sonnets'), reflecting classical and French and Italian poems, and being in some cases translations; this is his most important work. He published Latin versions of Tasso's 'Aminta' (1585) and of 'Raptus Helenae' from the Greek of Coluthus (1586); his version of the 'Aminta' was rendered into English, without authority, by Abraham Fraunce (1587). He published 'The first Sett of Italian Madrigalls Englished' (1590) and an 'Eglogue' (Latin and English) on Walsingham's death (1590). His Latin pastoral 'Amyntae Gaudia' appeared posthumously in 1592, and 'The Tears of Fancie', sixty English sonnets, inspired by Petrarch and Ronsard, in 1593; a few previously unpublished poems by him appeared in 'The Phoenix Nest' (1593) and 'England's Helicon' (1600). His sonnets appear to have been studied by Shakespeare and other contemporaries. He was the 'Amyntas' of Spenser's 'Colin Clouts come home againe' (q.v.), and was declared by Francis Meres to be the equal of Petrarch, Theocritus, and Virgil.

WATSON, SIR WILLIAM (1858-1935), poet, born in Yorkshire, whose chief works are: 'Lachrymae Musarum' and 'Lyric Love' (1892), 'The Eloping Angels' (1893), 'Odes and other poems' (1894), 'The Father of the Forest' (1895), 'The Year of Shame' (1896), 'The Heralds of the Dawn' (1912), 'Collected Poems' (1906).

WATSONS

Watsons, The, an unfinished fragment of a novel by Jane Austen (q.v.), written about 1805 and appended by J. E. Austen Leigh to the second edition of his 'Memoir of Jane Austen' (1871); reprinted, Oxford, 1927.

Emma Watson, who has been brought up by a well-to-do aunt, on the latter's remarriage returns to her family, who live in a modest way in a Surrey village. A pretty, sensible girl, she is here surrounded by persons of inferior minds, her sisters being chiefly bent on the acquisition of husbands. The other principal characters, who are introduced to the reader in a local ball-room scene, are Lady Osborne, handsome and dignified; her son Lord Osborne, a fine young man with an 'air of coldness, of carelessness, even of awkwardness about him'; Mr. Howard, a gentlemanly clergyman; and Tom Musgrave, a hardened flirt. The intention appears to have been that the heroine should marry Mr. Howard, but the authoress completed little more than the mise en scène of the story.

Watt, JAMES (1736-1819), born at Greenock, was son and grandson of mathematicians, and son of a mathematical-instrument maker. He began his career as a mathematical-instrument maker, showing great manual dexterity. While repairing a model of John Newcomen's steam-engine, he discovered the cause of its waste of power (1764), and devised the separate condenser and air-pump to remedy this defect. He was in partnership with Matthew Boulton at the Soho Engineering Works, Birmingham, 1775-1800, and it was owing to this association that he was able to bring his various inventions to such fruit. He patented the 'Watt' steam-engine in 1769, and continued improving it by various mechanical devices down to about 1785. He also projected the screw-propeller, and by his own researches discovered the composition of water. He was about equally devoted to chemistry and music and drawing, and in spite of very poor health, much beloved in every society. He became F.R.S. in 1785.

WATT, ROBERT (1774-1819), author of the 'Bibliotheca Britannica, or a general Index to British and Foreign Literature' (1824), the first great bibliographical work produced in Scotland.

Watteau, JEAN ANTOINE (1684-1721), French genre-painter, whose pictures of fêtes champêtres and of shepherds and shepherdesses in the fashionable costumes of the early 18th cent. have given his name to various articles of female dress, such as the Watteau hat.

WATTS, ISAAC (1674-1748), the son of a Nonconformist schoolmaster, is remembered as the author of 'Divine Songs for Children', 1715, containing such well-known lines as:

Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
For God hath made them so;

and the lines about the little busy bee. He also wrote a number of hymns, some of which have obtained a wide popularity, including 'O God, our help in ages past', 'When I survey the wondrous Cross', 'There is a land of pure delight', and 'Jesus shall reign where'er the sun'. He published a selection of metrical 'Psalms of David' in 1719, and a number of doctrinal treatises and educational manuals. There is a monument to him in Westminster Abbey.

WATTS-DUNTON, WALTER THEODORE (1832-1914), gave up his profession of solicitor to devote himself to literary criticism, on which subject he contributed many valuable articles to the 'Athenaeum'. He was much interested in the gipsies, and republished in 'The Coming of Love' (1897) scenes in verse previously printed in the 'Athenaeum', in which Rhona Boswell, a gipsy girl, figures prominently. Gipsies again play an important part in his novel 'Aylwin' (1898), originally called 'The Renascence of Wonder', which met with great success. Watts-Dunton had met Borrow (q.v.) in 1872, and his recollections of him may be read in his editions of Lavengro (1893) and 'The Romany Rye' (1900). His best critical work is on 'Poetry' in the E.B. (9th ed., 1885).

Watts-Dunton befriended Swinburne (q.v.) in his declining health, took him to his house at Putney (where Swinburne lived from 1879 until his death), and exercised a devoted and tactful control over him.

Waverley, the first of the novels of Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1814. Much of it had been written, and thrown aside, some years before. The name is said to have been suggested by Waverley Abbey near Farnham, which Scott seems to have visited (letter in 'The Times', 30 June 1931).

Edward Waverley, a young man of romantic disposition ('a sneaking piece of imbecility' Scott himself, with perhaps excessive severity, called him), has been brought up in part by his father, a Hanoverian in politics, in part by his uncle Sir Everard Digby, a rich landowner of Jacobite leanings. Obtaining a commission in the army in the year 1745, he joins his regiment in Scotland, and there, while on leave, visits his uncle's friend, the baron of Bradwardine, a proud, kind-hearted, but pedantic old Jacobite, and attracts the favourable notice of the gentle Rose Bradwardine, his daughter. Impelled by curiosity, he visits Donald Bean Lean, a Highland freebooter, in his lair, and Fergus Mac-Ivor of Glennaquoich (Vich Ian Vohr), a young Highland chieftain, active in the Jacobite interest. While at Glennaquoich, he falls in love with Fergus's sister Flora, whose beauty and ardent loyalty to the Stuart cause appeal to his romantic disposition. These visits, injudicious in an officer of the English army at a time of acute political tension, compromise Edward with his colonel. He moreover falls a victim to Jacobite intrigues and finds himself accused of fomenting mutiny in his regiment, and is finally cashiered and arrested. From imprisonment he is rescued by the action of the devoted Rose, and, under the influence of a sense of unjust treatment, of Flora's enthusiasm, and of a gratifying reception by Prince Charles Edward, he joins the Jacobite forces. At the battle of Prestonpans he has the good fortune to save from death Colonel Talbot, a distinguished English officer and friend of his family, and the influence of the latter, after the final defeat and dispersal of the Pretender's army, is the means of securing Edward's pardon and the rehabilitation of the good baron of Bradwardine. Meanwhile Edward has been decisively rejected by the spirited Flora, and has turned his affections to the milder and more congenial Rose, to whom in due course he is married. Fergus is convicted of high treason and bravely meets his end, and Flora retires to a convent.

Among the minor characters may be mentioned Bailie Duncan Macwheeble, Bradwardine's 'prime minister'; Davie Gellatley, the 'innocent', the mouthpiece of some of Scott's most beautiful lyrics; and the laird of Balmawhapple, the quarrelsome sportsman who falls foul of Edward and contributes to his early discomfiture. For Colonel Gardiner, Edward Waverley's commanding officer, see under Doddridge.

Way of All Flesh, The, a novel by S. Butler (1835-1902, q.v.), published in 1903 after the author's death.

In the form of a novel, brilliant with wit and irony, Butler here presents a study in one of his favourite themes, the relations of parents to children, a study embittered by some of his own recollections. The idiosyncrasy of the Pontifex family is traced from father to son through several generations: old John Pontifex, the village carpenter; George Pontifex, the domineering publisher; Theobald his son, who is bullied into taking orders and jockeyed into marriage with the smug Christina; and Ernest, their child, who in turn suffers cruelly from the pharisaical tyranny of his father during childhood and schooldays, until, after his ordination, the reaction from suppression leads to sudden catastrophe. He manages to insult a young woman whom he takes for a prostitute, and is sentenced to six months' imprisonment. On emerging, ruined, from prison, he contracts a disastrous union with Ellen, a former maidservant of his family, but is released from the incubus of her drunkenness by the discovery that she is already married. A fortune inherited from an aunt permits him to devote the rest of his life to literature. The gloom and irony of the work are relieved by the pleasant portrait of Alethea Pontifex (drawn from Butler's friend, Eliza Mary Ann Savage) and the 'godless old sinner', Mrs. Jupp, the landlady.

Way of the World, The, a comedy by Congreve (q.v.), produced in 1700. This is the most finished of Congreve's comedies, but

It was not very well received and the author in disgust renounced any further writing for the stage.

Mirabell is in love with Millamant, a niece of Lady Wishfort, and has pretended to make love to the aunt in order to conceal his suit of the niece. The deceit has been revealed to Lady Wishfort by Mrs. Marwood to revenge herself on Mirabell, who has rejected her advances. Lady Wishfort, who now hates Mirabell 'more than a quaker hates a parrot', will deprive her niece of the half of the inheritance which is in her keeping, if Millamant marries Mirabell. The latter accordingly contrives that his servant Waitwell shall personate an uncle of his, Sir Rowland, make love to Lady Wishfort and pretend to marry her, having, however, first married Lady Wishfort's woman, Foible. He hopes by this deception to win Lady Wishfort's consent to his marriage to her niece. The plot is discovered by Mrs. Marwood, and also the fact that Mirabell has in the past had an intrigue with Mrs. Fainall, daughter of Lady Wishfort. She conspires with Fainall, her lover and the pretended friend of Mirabell, to reveal these facts to Lady Wishfort, while Fainall is to threaten to divorce his wife and discredit Lady Wishfort unless he is given full control of Mrs. Fainall's property and Millamant's portion is also handed over to him. The scheme, however, fails. Mrs. Fainall denies the charge against her, brings proof of Fainall's relations with Mrs. Marwood, while Mirabell produces a deed by which Mrs. Fainall, before her last marriage, made him trustee of her property. Lady Wishfort, in gratitude for her release from Fainall's threats, forgives Mirabell and consents to his marriage to Millamant.

Besides the finished portrait of Millamant, finely tempered in sense and intellect, Congreve's most brilliant creation, there are amusing characters in Sir Wilfull Witwoud, Lady Wishfort's boisterous country nephew, and Foible and Waitwell, the servants. The dialogue is exceptionally brilliant and there are some highly entertaining scenes; while Lady Wishfort's display of 'boudoir Billingsgate' (as Meredith called it) when she discovers how she has been tricked is unequalled in its kind.

Wayland or Weland the Smith, a hero of Teutonic myth, known in the Norse version as Volundr. According to the Elder Edda, he was one of three brothers settled in Ulfdale and married to Valkyries or war-nymphs. After nine years, these were constrained by fate to leave their husbands. Two brothers departed in search of their partners, but Weland remained at home working at his smith's craft and amassing wealth. Besieged by Nidudr, a Swedish king, he was cruelly lamed by the cutting of the sinews of his knee, and conveyed to a small island where he was forced to work for his captor. Here he murdered the sons of Nidudr, and presented their gold-set skulls to their father, gems made from their eyes to their mother, and a breast-ornament of their teeth to Bodhilda, their sister, who became his victim. He then entered the palace of Nidudr and recounted to him the fates of his children, afterwards escaping.

He is the Wieland of German epics, who fashioned the famous sword Mimung. There are traces of his legend in England. He was supposed to have his forge in a dolmen near the White Horse on the Berkshire Downs (see Scott's 'Kenilworth'). His misfortunes are referred to in the 'Complaint of Deor' (q.v.). King Alfred translates Boethius 'ubi nunc sunt ossa Fabricii' by 'where are now the bones of Weland once the cunning goldsmith of old'.

Wayzgoose, according to the OED. probably a corruption of waygoose, arising from an etymological conjecture by Bailey (1731), who connected the word with wayz-goose, stubble goose. But it has now been discovered from old records of the Oxford University Press that the word was formerly wake-goose. It signified originally an entertainment given by a master printer to his workmen 'about Bartholomewtide', marking the beginning of the season of working by candle-light. In later use it is an annual festivity held in summer by the employees of a printing establishment.

Weak ending, the occurrence of an unstressed or proclitic monosyllable (such as a preposition, conjunction, or auxiliary verb) in the normally stressed place at the end of an iambic line.

Wealth of Nations, Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the, a treatise on political economy by Adam Smith (q.v.), published in 1776, originally delivered in the form of lectures at Glasgow.

Adam Smith's work is the first comprehensive treatment of the whole subject of political economy, and is remarkable for its breadth of view. Smith shared the objection of the French physiocrats (q.v.) to the mercantile system, but he did not share their view that land is the sole source of wealth. The 'Wealth of Nations' sets out with the doctrine that the labour of the nation is the source of its means of life. It insists on the value of the division of labour. Labour is the standard of value, and originally was the sole determinant of price; but in a more advanced state of society three elements enter into price—wages, profit, and rent—and these elements are discussed separately.

The second book deals with capital, its nature, accumulation, and employment. With the increase of capital there is an increase of productive labour and a decrease in the rate of interest.

After this exposition the author proceeds to an elaborate attack on the mercantile system, and an advocacy of freedom of commerce and industry. His political economy is essentially individualistic; self-interest is the proper criterion of economic action. But the universal pursuit of one's own advantage contributes, in his view, to the public interest.

WEBB, SIDNEY JAMES, BARON PASSFIELD (1859–), and MRS. BEATRICE WEBB, née Potter (1858–1943), authors jointly and singly of numerous works connected with the investigation of social and economic conditions in England and with the furtherance of a socialistic policy; especially associated with the Fabian Society (q.v.).

Webster, DANIEL (1782–1852), born at Salisbury, New Hampshire, in America, rose to great eminence as an orator, both in the practice of the law, in the House of Representatives and Senate, and in discourses to the public, in which he stimulated the idea of union among the American States. He was twice secretary of state. His speeches, even in ordinary criminal trials, show a rare literary quality, comparable to that displayed by the speeches of Burke. Among the best known of them is the Discourse on the 200th anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims (1820), the Bunker Hill oration (1825), and the Adams and Jefferson speech (1826).

WEBSTER, JOHN (1580?–1625?), the son of a London tailor, and himself a freeman of the Merchant Taylors' Company, collaborated with Dekker and other dramatists in a number of comedies, 'Christmas comes but once a year' (1602), 'Westward Hoe' (q.v.) and 'Northward Hoe' (q.v.) in 1603–4 (printed in 1607), and with Rowley in 'A Cure for a Cuckold' (q.v., printed 1661). He completed for the stage Marston's 'Malcontent' (1604). With Heywood and Tournear he published elegies on Prince Henry in 1612. His tragedies, founded on Italian novelle, show that he approached in tragic power nearest of his contemporaries to Shakespeare; they are 'The White Devil' (q.v.), produced c. 1608; 'Appius and Virginia' (q.v., perhaps partly by Heywood), c. 1609; 'The Duchess of Malfi' (q.v.), c. 1614. His tragi-comedy, 'The Devil's Law Case', was published in 1623. His tragedy on contemporary French history entitled 'Guise' and 'A late Murder of the Son upon the Mother' (written in conjunction with J. Ford, c. 1624) are lost. Collected editions of his plays were published (1830) by Alexander Dyce, (1856) by William Hazlitt, and (1927) by F. L. Lucas.

WEBSTER, NOAH (1758–1843), American lexicographer, was educated at Yale University and was subsequently a teacher and a journalist. He was one of the founders Wedgwood, JOSIAH (1730-95), the founder of the celebrated pottery works at 'Etruria' (a village which he built for his workmen near Stoke-on-Trent). He started life as a working potter, and greatly developed the technique of the industry, perfecting cream (afterwards called Queen's) ware, and adopting sulphate of baryta to produce his fine jasper ware. On the artistic side, he promoted the application of classical taste to the decoration of pottery.

THOMAS WEDGWOOD (1771-1805), son of Josiah, was the first photographer, and a generous patron of S. T. Coleridge.

Wedmore, TREATY OF, between Alfred and Guthrum, king of the Danes, after the defeat of the latter at Ethandun in 878. The treaty gave Alfred Wessex, Sussex, Kent, and the western half of Mercia. The rest of England as far as the Tees was surrendered to the Danes and became known as the Danelaw. But either by this, or by a treaty two years later, Alfred kept London. Wedmore is at the foot of the Mendips.

Weir of Hermiston, an unfinished novel by R. L. Stevenson (q.v.), published in 1896. The fragment does little more than set the scene and present the chief characters, but it includes some of Stevenson's finest work.

Archie Weir is the only child of Adam Weir, Lord Hermiston, the lord justice-clerk, a formidable 'hanging judge', grim and stern, wielding with a fierce enjoyment the terrors of the law. His mother, a pale ineffectual woman, dies young, and leaves Archie, 'a fine ardent modest youthful soul' with a taste for letters, to the care of a father whom he both dreads and dislikes. Archie, revolted at the cruel glee with which the old judge hounds to death some wretched criminal at a trial, passes a grave public affront on his father, and is banished by him to the solitude of Hermiston, a remote pastoral village. He shrinks from the uncongenial society of the clodpole lairds of the neighbourhood, and lives a recluse, with Kirstie, his devoted housekeeper and distant relative. She is aunt to four notable brothers, the 'Black

WELLBORN

Elliotts', famed for their hunting down of their father's murderer. These have a young sister, Christina, whose beauty attracts Archie. The two fall deeply in love and have many meetings, which at last become known to Kirstie and to Archie's disloyal friend and visitor, Frank Innes. Moved by Kirstie's earnest warning and Frank's facetious comments, Archie tells Christina that their secret meetings must cease, and offends her deeply. At this point the fragment ends, but we know that in Stevenson's intention the argument was to proceed as follows. Archie persists in his good resolution of avoiding further conduct compromising to Christina's good name. Taking advantage of this and of the girl's unhappiness and wounded vanity, Frank Innes seduces her. This becomes known to Archie, who has an interview with Frank, which ends in a quarrel and in Archie killing Frank. He is tried before his own father and sentenced to death. Meanwhile Kirstie, who has discovered that Frank, and not, as had hitherto been supposed, Archie, is the author of Christina's betrayal, informs the Four Black Brothers. These gather a following, and after a great fight break the prison where Archie lies confined, and rescue him. He and Christina thereafter escape to America. But the ordeal of taking part in the trial of his own son is too much for the old judge, who dies of the shock. Lord Hermiston is believed to be drawn from Robert Macqueen, Lord Braxfield.

Well of St. Keyne, The, a ballad by Southey (q.v.).

The well is in Cornwall. 'Whether husband or wife come first to drink thereof, they get the mastery thereby', says Fuller. The ballad tells how a Cornishman, though he left his bride at the church porch to hurry to the well, was outwitted by her—for she had taken a bottle of the water to church.

Well-Beloved, The, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published serially in 1892, reissued in revised form in 1897.

The scene is the 'Isle of Slingers', that is, Portland, and the tale deals with the peculiar temperament of its inhabitants. Jocelyn Pierston the sculptor, an 'islander', falls in love successively with three Island women—Avice Caro, her daughter, and her granddaughter, of the same name—seeking in each an elusive ideal Well-Beloved; but the perversity of circumstances prevents him from marrying any of them. In his old age he marries an elderly widow, from whom all pretence of being the Well-Beloved has long since departed.

Weller, SAMUEL, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Mr. Pickwick's devoted servant, formerly boots at the White Hart in the Borough, a cheerful, facetious, and resourceful character, with an endless store of humorous illustrations apposite to the various incidents of life. The greatest character that Dickens ever drew.

Weller, TONY, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), a coach-driver, the father of Sam Weller. He has married a widow, who keeps the 'Marquis of Granby' inn at Dorking.

WELLS, CHARLES JEREMIAH (1800-79), author of 'Stories after Nature' (1822) and, under the pseudonym of H. L. Howard, of 'Joseph and his Brethren: a Dramatic Poem' (1824). In 1876 (and in the Classics in 1908) this was republished with an essay by Swinburne. It was greatly admired by Rossetti.

WELLS, HERBERT GEORGE (1866-1946), the son of a small tradesman and professional cricketer, was apprenticed to a draper in early life, a period of which reflections may be seen in some of his best novels ('The History of Mr. Polly', 'Kipps', 'The Wheels of Chance'). He became a teacher at Midhurst Grammar School and subsequently graduated at the Normal School of Science, South Kensington. He followed the teaching profession until 1893, when he definitely adopted that of letters. A vivid light is thrown on the circumstances of his life and mental development by his interesting 'Experiment in Autobiography' (1934).

Wells's novels divide themselves broadly into three groups: (1) fantastic and imaginative romances, in which, after the manner of Swift in 'Gulliver's Travels', the author projects himself to a distant standpoint—the moon, the future, the air—and views our life from outside, e.g. as an angel sees it ('The Wonderful Visit'); (2) novels of character and humour, of which 'The History of Mr. Polly' (q.v., 1910) is the type; (3) discussion novels—discussion, that is, in the main, of human ideals and progress—to which Wells's essay on 'The Contemporary Novel' ('Fortnightly Review', Nov. 1911, reprinted in 'An Englishman Looks at the World', 1914) serves as a general introduction.

Wells's publications include: 'The Time Machine' and 'The Wonderful Visit' (1895), 'The Invisible Man' (1897), 'The War of the Worlds' (1898), 'When the Sleeper Wakes' (1899, revised and reissued in 1911 as 'The Sleeper Awakes'), 'Love and Mr. Lewisham' (1900), 'The First Men in the Moon' (1901), 'Anticipations' (sociological essays, 1902), 'The Food of the Gods' (1904), 'A Modern Utopia' and 'Kipps' (1905), 'Tono-Bungay' (1909, one of Wells's most remarkable works, a picture of English society in dissolution in the later 19th cent. and of the advent of a new class of rich), 'Ann Veronica' (1909), 'The History of Mr. Polly' (q.v., 1910), 'The New Machiavelli' (1911), 'The Country of the Blind' (short stories, 1911), 'Bealby' (1915), 'Mr. Britling sees it through' (1916), 'The Outline of History' (1920, first issued in fortnightly parts), 'Short History of the World' (1922), 'The World of William Clissold' (1926), 'The Open Conspiracy' (1928), 'The Science of Life' (with Dr. Julian Huxley and Mr. G. P. Wells, 1929).

Wemmick, in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.), clerk to Mr. Jaggers the lawyer, and Pip's good friend.

Wen, THE, William Cobbett's name for London ('Rural Rides', passim).

Wenham, MR., in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.), a satellite of Lord Steyne.

Wentworth, SIR THOMAS, see Strafford.

Werewolf or WERWOLF, a person who (according to medieval superstition) was transformed or was capable of transforming himself at times into a wolf. Lycaon, an impious king of Greek mythology, who served a dish of human flesh to Zeus to test whether he was really a god, and was turned into a wolf as punishment, is an early instance of the superstition, and the ancient writers and Norse mythology afford other examples. The belief in werewolves was widespread in England, Wales, Ireland, and the greater part of the Continent down to the 17th cent., and is hardly extinct everywhere even to-day, though with the disappearance of the wolf the delusion necessarily loses its basis. Cf. the story of William of Palerne (q.v.). In Scotland hares take the place of wolves.

The first element in the word has usually been identified with the OE. wer, man, but the OED. regards this as doubtful.

Werner, a tragedy by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1823, founded on 'The German's Tale' in Sophia and Harriet Lee's 'Canterbury Tales'.

The dissolute and outlawed son of Count Siegendorf, bearing the assumed name of Werner, finds himself by accident in the same house as his enemy, Count Stralenheim, and under a sudden impulse robs him. His son Ulric, more determined, murders Stralenheim to conceal his father's dishonour, but without his father's knowledge, and throws the appearance of guilt on the Hungarian, Gabor. Later, when Werner has become Count Siegendorf, he finds himself confronted by Gabor, who accuses Ulric of the crime. Ulric seeks to kill Gabor, but is prevented by Siegendorf, who shrinks from assassination and dies broken-hearted at his own infamy and his son's crime.

Werther, The Sorrows of Young, see Goethe.

Thackeray wrote a short satirical poem called 'The Sorrows of Werther' ending with the well-known lines:

Charlotte, having seen his body
Borne before her on a shutter,
Like a well-conducted person
Went on cutting bread and butter.

WESLEY

WESLEY, CHARLES (1707–88), a brother of J. Wesley (q.v.), founded, while a student at Christ Church, a 'methodist' society of pious young men, who strictly observed rules of fasting and prayer. To this society belonged John Wesley and George Whitefield, and these, with Charles himself, were the principal leaders of the Methodist movement. From a literary standpoint, Charles Wesley is remembered as the composer of a very large number of hymns, including 'Jesu, lover of my soul', many of which are still in use. He left a 'Journal', published in 1849.

WESLEY, JOHN (1703–91), of old Puritan ancestry, was educated at Charterhouse and Christ Church, Oxford. He became fellow and tutor of Lincoln College, and leader of the 'methodist' society of his brother Charles (q.v.) in 1729. He accepted charge of the Georgia mission in 1735 and came under the influence of the Moravians, and after his return to England became a member of the Moravian 'society' at Fetter Lane Chapel. He visited Zinzendorf at Herrnhut in 1738, and was appointed his first lay preacher. He then began field preaching and opened a Methodist chapel at Bristol, and for the remainder of his life showed prodigious activity in his ministry, preaching forty thousand sermons and travelling many thousands of miles, nearly all on horseback. He was a man of real and deep learning, and of autocratic temper. He had a passionate desire to remain a member of the Church of England, but he committed a definite act of schism when, in 1784, he ordained a minister (for one of his American congregations); his brother Charles was bitterly opposed to this. John Wesley published twenty-three collections of hymns (1737–86) and his collected prose 'Works' (1771–4). His 'Journal', of which a standard edition was published in 1909–11, is remarkable not only as a record of his spiritual life and tireless activity, but also for its pathos, humour, and observation of mankind. Southey's 'Life of John Wesley', perhaps one of the best biographies in the language, was published in 1820. See also Methodism.

Wessex, the kingdom of the West Saxons, who established themselves in Hampshire early in the 6th cent., and extended their dominion north and west under their kings, Cerdic and Cynric. It included Hants, Dorset, Wilts., Berks., and part of Somerset. Ultimately, under Egbert, Alfred, and their successors, the kingdom of Wessex developed into that of England.

'Wessex' is used by Hardy (q.v.) to designate the south-west counties, principally Dorset, which are the scene of his novels.

West Indian, The, a comedy by Cumberland (q.v.), produced in 1771.

Stockwell, having early in life secretly married in Jamaica the daughter of his rich employer, old Belcour, has had a son by her, who has been passed off on old Belcour as a foundling, brought up by him, and has inherited his property. Young Belcour, as he is called, comes home, but Stockwell postpones recognizing him as his son until he has made trial of his character.

Young Belcour, a generous but hare-brained fellow, falls in love at first sight with Louisa, daughter of the impecunious Captain Dudley, tracks her to the lodgings where she lives with her father and brother Charles, and is there beguiled into thinking her the mistress of Charles by the rascally landlord Fulmer and his wife, who hope to profit by the intrigue. Charles is in love with his rich cousin Charlotte, stepdaughter of the avaricious and unscrupulous Lady Rusport, but in his poverty will not confess his love, though it is returned by Charlotte. Belcour generously comes to the assistance of Captain Dudley in his pressing needs, but his impudent addresses to Louisa, under a mistaken idea of her character, and his inconsiderate gift to Louisa—because he happens to have no other present handy—of some jewels entrusted to him for Charlotte, lead to grave complications and a duel with Charles. The imbroglio is cleared up by Charlotte (to whom Belcour frankly confesses his disposal of her jewels) with the help of the amiable Irishman, Major O'Flaherty. Belcour discovers his mistake, is pardoned by Louisa and obtains her hand, and is recognized by his father. Charles is discovered to be the real heir of his grandfather's property, which Lady Rusport had tried to appropriate, and marries Charlotte.

West Point, New York State, on the W. bank of the Hudson, where the U.S. Military Academy trains cadets for army service. It figured in the Revolutionary War: Washington had his headquarters there in 1779, and in 1780 Benedict Arnold endeavoured treasonably to surrender it to the British.

WESTCOTT, BROOKE FOSS (1825–1901), theological scholar, bishop of Durham, famous for his recension, jointly with F. J. A. Hort, of the Greek text of the New Testament (1871). He also wrote commentaries on the Gospel and Epistles of St. John and on the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Western, SQUIRE and SOPHIA, characters in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.).

Western Empire, THE, the more westerly of the two parts into which the Roman Empire was divided in A.D. 395. Its capital was Rome. It came to a real end with the deposition of Romulus Augustulus in 476, and its pretended revival by the pope and Charlemagne in 800 was far from being a reality, though it nominally endured as the Holy Roman Empire till 1806.

Westlock, JOHN, a character in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), at one time pupil of Mr. Pecksniff.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY

Westminster Abbey: a monastery dedicated to St. Peter was founded, in the 7th or 8th century, on the island of Thorney in the estuary of the Thames, close to where Watling Street reached the river at Tothill. It was re-founded, after destruction by the Danes, and endowed with a large manor, in the time of Edgar and Dunstan. The river was gradually pushed back and the adjoining land reclaimed. Edward the Confessor passed much of his reign at Westminster and built a great church for the monks. It was rebuilt by Henry III and added to and partly reconstructed in subsequent reigns. Chaucer was clerk of the king's works at the abbey during part of Richard II's reign. 'Poets' Corner' in the S. transept contains the monuments or other memorials of Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Milton, and other British authors. It is in the abbey that the English kings are crowned.

Westminster Hall, a part of the old Westminster Palace, built by William Rufus (perhaps in the place of an earlier hall) and rebuilt, substantially in its present form, by Richard II. The early kings held many of their Christmas and other festivities there. Many of the early parliaments sat in it, and it was the principal seat of justice from the time of Henry III until the 19th cent., and the scene of many great trials, among others of Strafford, Charles I, and Warren Hastings.

Westminster Palace, supposed to date from Edward the Confessor, on the site now occupied by the Houses of Parliament, was damaged by fire in 1512 and ceased to be a royal residence, but a great part of it remained. The Houses of Lords and Commons for a long time sat in buildings of the Palace, until these were destroyed by the fire of 1834. All that now survives of the palace is Westminster Hall (q.v.) and the crypt of St. Stephen's chapel.

Westminster Review, The, was founded in 1824 by Bentham (q.v.), with the assistance of James Mill (q.v.), as the organ of the philosophical radicals. John Bowring was its first editor. In 1851 George Eliot (q.v.) became its assistant editor (under John Chapman).

Westminster School was founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1560. Among its famous pupils have been Ben Jonson, George Herbert, Locke, Dryden, Wren, Bentham, Gibbon, Cowper, and Southey.

Westphalia, THE PEACE OF concluded in 1648 by the treaties of Osnabrück and Münster, brought to an end the Thirty Years War in Germany. The religious and political equality of the German states was secured; France was granted most of Alsace; Sweden received part of Pomerania and other districts; Holland and Switzerland were declared independent.

Westward for Smelts, a collection of tales borrowed from the 'Decameron' and similar sources, recounted by seven fish-wives who embark after selling their fish in London; by 'Kinde-Kit of Kingston' (1603?, 1620).

Westward Ho! a novel by C. Kingsley (q.v.), published in 1855.

This was the most successful of the author's novels, and is a patriotic tale of adventure, Jesuit intrigue, and naval enterprise of the time of Queen Elizabeth. The hero, Amyas Leigh, a spirited Devonshire lad, after being disappointed in his desire to sail with John Oxenham on his last ill-fated expedition, has accompanied Drake on his voyage round the world. The story continues with his participation in the military measures against the Spaniards who landed at Smerwick in 1580, in the course of which he takes prisoner a Spanish captain, Don Guzman. The latter, while on parole in Devonshire, falls in love with the beautiful Rose Salterne, and assisted by Amyas's Jesuit cousin, Eustace, induces her to leave her home, marries her, and carries her off to the Spanish main. Amyas and his brother Frank, and other disappointed suitors of Rose, with Salvation Yeo, 'flower and pattern of all bold mariners', sail in pursuit, but with tragic results. Rose, brought under suspicion by their action, falls a victim of the Inquisition, together with Frank Leigh. Amyas and his ship's crew wander for three years in South America, capture a Spanish galleon, and return to England with the beautiful Ayacanora, whom they have found ruling an Indian tribe. The last chapters of the book are devoted to Amyas's pursuit of his vengeance on Don Guzman, for which the arrival of the Armada provides an opportunity. But Providence takes the vengeance out of his hands. After a long pursuit the Spaniard is wrecked and drowned, and Amyas is struck blind by lightning. He ends by marrying Ayacanora, who has proved to be the daughter of John Oxenham.

Westward Hoe, a comedy by J. Webster (q.v.) and Dekker (q.v.), printed in 1607, but entered at the Stationers' Hall in 1605.

The main plot deals with an escapade of three merry wives and their gallants to Brentford, where their husbands find them at an inn, but their innocence is established. In the sub-plot Justiniano, an Italian merchant, convinced of his wife's infidelity, abandons her and lives disguised, enjoying the comedy of London life. Mistress Justiniano is involved in an intrigue with a profligate earl, but conscience intervenes, and repentance and reconciliation follow.

Weyburn, MATTHEW (MATIE), a character in Meredith's 'Lord Ormont and his Aminta' (q.v.).

WEYMAN, STANLEY JOHN (1855-1928), established his reputation as a historical novelist by 'A Gentleman of France' (1893, dealing with the period of Henry of Navarre), followed by a number of other romances of a similar character, showing imagination based on sound historical knowledge, and including 'Count Hannibal' (1901, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew) and 'Chippinge' (1906, The Reform Bill).

WHARTON, EDITH (1862-1937), born in New York, probably the best known of America's 'classical' novelists. Her work showed a sure sense of psychology and, at first, the influence of Henry James, though later it threw this off. Her chief books were 'The House of Mirth' (1905), 'Madame de Treymes' (1907), 'Ethan Frome' (1911), 'The Reef' (1912), 'The Custom of the Country' (1913), 'The Age of Innocence' (1920), 'Glimpses of the Moon' (1922), 'The Children' (1928), 'Hudson River Bracketed' (1929), 'The World Over' (1936), 'A Backward Glance' (autobiography, 1934). Mrs. Wharton had a deep knowledge of European, particularly of French, life, and the subject-matter of her novels was taken, for the most part, from the leisured life of the rich either in Europe or New York.

What you Will, (1) sub-title of Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.); (2) a comedy by John Marston (q.v.), printed in 1607, of no great importance, except for containing, it is said, some satire of Ben Jonson.

WHATELY, RICHARD (1787-1863), educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. He was principal of St. Alban Hall, 1825-31, and professor of political economy at Oxford, 1829-31. He was appointed archbishop of Dublin in the latter year. His 'Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon Buonaparte' (1819) is a clever satire on rationalist criticism of the Scriptures. His Bampton Lectures on 'The Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Matters of Religion' were published in 1822. But his fame rests chiefly on his 'Logic' and 'Rhetoric', popular expansions of articles in the 'Encyclopaedia' (1826 and 1828). In theology he showed himself a critic of dogma, and was a supporter of the Broad Church views.

WHEATLEY, PHILLIS (1753?-85), Negro poet, born in Africa and shipped as a child to the slave-market of Boston, the first of her race to contribute to American literature. Her poems were first published in London in 1773.

Wheel, in prosody, see Bob and Wheel.

WHETSTONE, GEORGE (1544?-87?), author of miscellaneous verse and prose tales, is principally remembered for his 'Promos and Cassandra' (1578), a play in rhymed verse (based on a tale in Cinthio's 'Hecatommiti'), which provided the plot for Shakespeare's 'Measure for Measure' and is an early example of English romantic comedy.

WHEWELL, WILLIAM (1794-1866), the son of a carpenter, educated at Lancaster Grammar School and Trinity College, Cambridge, learned German thoroughly and helped to introduce the analytical methods of continental metaphysicians. He was professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge from 1838 to 1855, and master of Trinity College from 1841 till his death. His principal works were the 'History' (1837) and the 'Philosophy' (1840) of the Inductive Sciences, his 'Astronomy and Physics in reference to Natural Philosophy' (1833), and his treatise (published anonymously in 1853) contesting the probability of the 'Plurality of Worlds'. He published and edited many other works in natural and mathematical science, philosophy, and theology, including 'Elements of Morality' (1845) and 'The History of Moral Philosophy in England' (1852).

Whiff of Grapeshot, The, the title of the last chapter of Carlyle's 'French Revolution' in which he describes how Buonaparte with artillery quelled the insurrection headed by the 'Section Lepelletier' against the Convention on the 13th Vendémiaire of the year IV (5 Oct. 1795).

Whig, a word probably shortened from Whiggamore, one who urges on a mare, was originally applied to the Covenanters in the west of Scotland who in 1648 wrested the government from the Royalist party and marched as rebels to Edinburgh, and in later years to the extreme section of the Covenanted party. About 1679 it was applied to the Exclusionists, who opposed the succession of James II to the Crown. Hence from 1689 it came to be used for an adherent of one of the two great political parties in England. Since the middle of the 19th cent. the term has been mostly superseded by Liberal, but is occasionally used to express adherence to moderate or antiquated Liberal principles. [OED.] It is often applied to the great Whig families who professed a kind of aristocratic or limited fondness for liberty.

Whig Examiner, The, a literary and political periodical published by Addison (q.v.). Five numbers appeared in Sept. to Oct. 1710.

Whisker, in Dickens's 'The Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.), the Garlands' pony.

Whiskerandos, DON FEROLLO, in Sheridan's 'The Critic' (q.v.), the lover of Tilburina.

Whist, the name of the popular card-game developed from the 16th-cent. game called 'Triumph' (whence the word 'trump') or 'Ruff and Honours'. The name may perhaps be due to the silence which prevails during the game, but it was originally 'whisk', and is so called by Taylor the water-poet and by Farquhar.

Whistlecraft, see Frere.

WHISTLER, JAMES ABBOT McNEILL (1834-1903), born at Lowell, Massachusetts, a distinguished American painter and etcher. He settled in England at Chelsea in 1863. Among his best-known pictures are: 'Portrait of my Mother' (in the Luxembourg, Paris), his 'Nocturnes', and his portraits of Carlyle and Miss Alexander. He brought a libel action against Ruskin in 1878 for condemning his 'The Falling Rocket', and was awarded a farthing damages. He published 'The Gentle Art of making Enemies' (q.v.) in 1890. Whistler exerted an immense influence on contemporary art. His 'Life' by E. R. and J. Pennell was published in 1908.

WHISTLER

Whit-Sunday, the seventh Sunday after Easter, observed as a festival of the Christian Church in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. Whit is for white, and is generally taken to refer to the ancient custom of the wearing of white baptismal robes by the newly baptized at the feast of Pentecost (from which our word 'candidate' is derived).

Whitaker's Almanack, founded in 1868 by Joseph Whitaker (1820-95), a publisher, and at one time (1856-9) editor of the 'Gentleman's Magazine'. It is a compendium of general information regarding the government, finances, population, and commerce of the world, with special reference to the British Empire and the United States, besides being an almanac in the ordinary sense.

WHITE, GILBERT (1720-93), born at Selborne in Hampshire, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He spent most of his life as curate of Selborne, refusing various livings in order to remain in his beloved birthplace. He began in 1751 to keep a 'Garden Kalendar' and later a 'Naturalist's Journal'. He made the acquaintance of two distinguished naturalists, Thomas Pennant and the Hon. Daines Barrington, with whom from 1767 he carried on a correspondence which formed the basis of his 'Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne' (published in 1789). He died at his house, 'The Wakes', Selborne. 'A Naturalist's Calendar, extracted from the papers of the late Rev. Gilbert White' appeared in 1795. An edition of his 'Works on Natural History' with notes by Bell, Daniel, Owen, and Yarrell, was issued in 1837. An edition of his 'Journals' by Walter Johnson was published in 1931. The Selborne Society for the preservation of birds, plants, &c., was founded in 1885 in memory of Gilbert White.

WHITE, HENRY KIRKE (1785-1806), the son of a butcher at Nottingham, was articled to a lawyer at Nottingham. By a volume of verses (1803) he attracted the favourable notice of Southey, who thereafter protected him, and wrote a memoir of him in 1807 after his death. White obtained a sizarship at St. John's College, Cambridge, where overwork brought about his death. He was praised by Byron, but little survives of his work except one or two hymns ('Oft in danger, oft in woe').

WHITE, JOSEPH BLANCO (1775-1841), born at Seville, entered Seville University in

WHITE COMPANY

1790 and was ordained a priest, but abandoned the priesthood, came to England, and studied at Oxford. He published 'Evidences against Catholicism' in 1825, received the degree of M.A. at Oxford in recognition of his services to the Church, and settled at Oriel College. He became a friend of Whately, and, when the latter was appointed archbishop of Dublin, accompanied him there as tutor to his son. His other publications include 'Observations on Heresy and Orthodoxy' (1835), and translations into Spanish of Paley's 'Evidences', &c. He wrote the sonnet on 'Night and Death' (published in the 'Bijou', 1828), which Coleridge declared the finest and most grandly conceived sonnet in our language.

WHITE, WILLIAM HALE (1831-1913), known as a writer under the pseudonym MARK RUTHERFORD, was the son of William White, a dissenter, bookseller, and later a well-known doorkeeper of the House of Commons and author of 'The Inner Life of the House of Commons' (1897). Hale White was educated with a view to becoming an independent minister, but in 1854 entered the Civil Service, rising to be assistant director of contracts at the Admiralty.

His literary work began with the publication in 1881 of 'The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford', followed in 1885 by its sequel 'Mark Rutherford's Deliverance', works of intimate spiritual self-revelation, marked by sincerity and depth of feeling and ironic humour. His other imaginative works were: 'The Revolution in Tanner's Lane' (1887), 'Miriam's Schooling and other Papers' (1890), 'Catharine Furze' (1893), 'Pages from a Journal' (1900), 'More Pages from a Journal' (1910), and 'Last Pages from a Journal' (posthumous, 1915). Under his own name he translated Spinoza's 'Ethic' (1883) and 'Emendation of the Intellect' (1895), and published an 'Examination of the Charge of Apostasy against Wordsworth' (1898) and 'John Bunyan' (1905).

White's, a chocolate-house in St. James's Street, London, started in 1697 by Francis White. The first number of the 'Tatler' announced that accounts of gallantry, pleasure, and entertainment would emanate from White's Chocolate House. It was taken over by Arthur (the founder of Arthur's Club) and converted into a club, which became a celebrated gaming centre. The present club-house with its bow-window (associated with Beau Brummel) dates from 1755, though much altered inside and out.

White Company, THE, a body of English mercenaries led by the condottiere Hawkwood (q.v.) about 1360 into Italy, where they took part in the wars then prevailing. They are found fighting for the marquis of Monferrato against Milan, and for Pisa against Florence. Sir A. Conan Doyle (q.v.) wrote a spirited story with this title about a similar company.

WHITE CROSS KNIGHTS

White Cross Knights, see Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem.

White Divil, The, or Vittoria Corombona, a tragedy by J. Webster (q.v.), produced c. 1608, published in 1612. The play is founded on events that took place in Italy in 1581-5.

The duke of Brachiano, husband of Isabella, the sister of the duke of Florence, is weary of her and in love with Vittoria, wife of Camillo. Flameneo, brother of Vittoria, helps Brachiano to seduce her, and contrives the death of Camillo, while Brachiano causes Isabella to be poisoned. Vittoria is tried for adultery and murder, and in spite of her 'innocent-resembling boldness' sentenced to confinement, whence she is carried off and married by Brachiano. Flameneo quarrels with his young brother, the virtuous Marcello, and kills him. The duke of Florence avenges Isabella by poisoning Brachiano, and two of his dependants kill Vittoria and Flameneo. The play contains many splendid passages, including the famous dirge by Cornelia, the mother of Marcello, over her dead son, 'Call for the robin-red-breast and the wren' (Act v. iv).

White Friars, The, the Carmelites, whose habit is distinguished by a white cloak and scapular. They had a convent in Fleet Street, London, which gave its name to the adjoining district.

White Hart Inn, The, in Southwark, is referred to by Shakespeare in '2 Henry VI', iv. viii, as the head-quarters of Jack Cade. There, at a later period, Mr. Pickwick first met Sam Weller. It survived until 1889.

White Hoods of Ghent, a name given to members of the popular party in Ghent who led the rebellion against the count of Flanders in 1381. They are referred to in Taylor's 'Philip van Artevelde' (q.v.).

White Horse, The, the figure of a white horse, reputed (by later writers) to be the ensign of the Saxons when they invaded Britain. Also the figure of a horse cut on the face of the chalk downs in Berkshire and popularly supposed to represent the 'White horse' of the Saxons. There are other 'White Horses' on the Downs, e.g. near Westbury. 'The Scouring of the White Horse', by Tom Hughes (q.v.), was published in 1859.

A white horse is the heraldic ensign of Brunswick, Hanover, and Kent.

White Horse Cellar, The, stood at the corner of Piccadilly and Dover Street. It was a famous starting-point for coaches.

White House, The, at Washington, the official residence of the President of the United States.

White Jacket, by Herman Melville (q.v.), published in 1850, is the realistic story of the author's life as a common seaman aboard a frigate in the U.S. Navy.

White Knight, The, one of the chess pieces in Carroll's 'Through the Looking-glass' (q.v.).

WHITEFIELD

White Lady, The, a character of German folk-lore, appearing in various legends; perhaps a survival of the goddess Holda or Bertha of Teutonic mythology.

White Lady of Avenel, The, a supernatural being introduced by Scott in 'The Monastery' (q.v.).

White Moon, The Knight of The, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), the bachelor Samson Carrasco, who assumes the disguise in order to overcome Don Quixote and oblige him to return to his home.

White Queen, The, one of the chess pieces in Carroll's 'Through the Looking-glass' (q.v.).

White Rose, The, the emblem of the House of York in the Wars of the Roses.

White Rose of Raby, The, Cicely, daughter of Ralph Neville, first earl of Westmorland, wife of Richard, duke of York, and mother of Edward IV and Richard III.

White Ship, The, a poem by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), included in 'Ballads and Sonnets', published in 1881.

The butcher of Rouen, Berold, tells the story of the sinking of the 'White Ship' in which Prince William, son of Henry I, was returning with his half-sister from France. The ship ran on a reef. The prince was placed in a boat and might have been saved, but returned to the ship to rescue his sister, whereupon the boat was swamped. As none of the courtiers dared to tell the king, a little child was sent to do so.

White Surrey, Richard III's horse (see Shakespeare, 'Richard III', v. iii).

Whiteboy, a member of a secret agrarian association formed in Ireland in 1761, so called from the fact that its members wore a shirt over their clothes to distinguish each other at night. The Whiteboys figure in 'Tales by the O'Hara Family' by Banim (q.v.).

Whitechapel, lying to the east of Aldgate, London, was in Strype's time 'a spacious fair street for entrance into the city eastward', 'a great thoroughfare, being the Essex Road'. The region became one of the worst localities in London, both in respect of its narrow filthy streets and disreputable inhabitants, until the construction of the broad Commercial Road through the centre of it, and better policing, improved its character. It is still a poor quarter and has a large Jewish population.

A WHITECHAPEL SHAVE, according to Dickens ('Uncommercial Traveller'), 'is in fact, whitening, judiciously applied to the jaws with the palm of the hand'.

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE (1714-70), educated at St. Mary de Crypt School, Gloucester, and Pembroke College, Oxford, joined Charles Wesley's 'Methodist Society', and undertook a missionary journey to Georgia in 1738. He subsequently engaged in evangelical preaching in New York, Pennsylvania, and other parts of America, adopting Calvinistic views, so that his followers and those of Wesley separated and formed rival parties. He became domestic chaplain to Lady Huntingdon in 1748, and founder of Lady Huntingdon's Connection, a body of Calvinistic Methodists, whom the countless energetically supported. He compiled a hymn-book (1753) and published sermons and autobiographical writings. Whitefield was ridiculed by Samuel Foote (q.v.) in his play 'The Minor', and was satirized in Graves's 'The Spiritual Quixote' (q.v.). See also Mesopotamia.

Whitehall, London, once known as York Place, from the residence of the archbishop of York, passed into the hands of Cardinal Wolsey, who built a palace there, which (like Hampton Court) he had to cede to Henry VIII. The Treasury stands on the site of Wolsey's great hall. The name 'Whitehall' became current in James I's reign, when Inigo Jones built the Banqueting Hall, the only part of the old palace that survives. The execution of Charles I took place 'in the open street before Whitehall', between the centre of the Banqueting Hall and its north end (Lofitie).

'Whitehall' is now used, in a transferred sense, of the government offices which are housed there.

WHITEHEAD, ALFRED NORTH (1861-1947), educated at Sherborne and Trinity College, Cambridge, professor of philosophy at Harvard University (1924-36). He is the author of many important philosophical and mathematical works, including 'Science and the Modern World' (1925), 'Religion in the Making' (1926), 'Symbolism' (1927), 'Process and Reality' (1929).

WHITEHEAD, CHARLES (1804-62), poet, novelist, and dramatist, published in 1831 'The Solitary', a poem, which met with warm approval. His quasi-historical romances, 'Jack Ketch' (1834), 'Richard Savage' (1842), were also successful, as was also his play, 'The Cavalier' (1836). His career was wrecked by intemperance, and he died in Australia.

WHITEHEAD, WILLIAM (1715-85), educated at Winchester and Clare Hall, Cambridge, produced at Drury Lane in 1750 a tragedy, 'The Roman Father' (a version of Corneille's 'Horace'), which was highly successful and was followed by another tragedy, 'Creusa', in 1754, and a comedy, 'The School for Lovers', in 1762. He was appointed poet laureate in 1757. His productions in this capacity met with much unfriendly comment, to which he replied in 'A Charge to Poets' (1762), but his earlier productions are not without merit. His 'Plays and Poems' were collected in 1774, and a complete edition of his poems appeared in 1788.

Whites, THE, a faction in medieval Florence. See Bianchi.

WHITTINGTON

Whitford, VERNON, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

WHITMAN, WALT (short for Walter, to distinguish him from Walter, his father) (1819-92), born in Long Island, New York, became an office boy at 11 years of age, and subsequently a printer, wandering school-teacher, and contributor to, and editor of, various magazines and newspapers. He published his first edition of 'Leaves of Grass' in 1855, twelve poems, saturated, as he describes it, 'with the vehemence of pride and audacity of freedom necessary to loosen the mind of still-to-be-form'd America from the folds, the superstitions, and all the long, tenacious, and stifling anti-democratic authorities of Asiatic and European past'. In this volume and its numerous subsequent enlarged editions, Whitman made himself a champion of American intellectual independence. His poems, on moral, social, and political questions, written in an unconventional form between rhythmical prose and verse, and containing some occasional lyrical passages, show a strong sense of the brotherhood of man, but are marred by defects of taste and an excess of egotism. His 'Drum-Taps', vivid poems on the Civil War, were published in 1865.

WHITTIER, JOHN GREENLEAF (1807-92), the American poet, was born of Quaker parents at Haverhill, Massachusetts, where Thomas Whittier, his Puritan ancestor had built the oak farmhouse described in 'Snow-Bound'. He began life as a farmer's boy and supported himself while at Haverhill Academy by shoemaking and teaching. His poetical instincts were aroused by reading Burns's poetry, and he was from early years an industrious writer. He edited various periodicals and became an ardent abolitionist, and secretary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and was more than once attacked by mobs on account of his political opinions. After 1840 he lived in seclusion at Amesbury, near his birthplace. He has always been a popular poet in America, owing in part to the transparent sincerity and nobility of his character, in part to the appeal to the young made by his ballads. He published many volumes of poems, of which a final collected edition appeared in 1888-9. Among these the best known are 'Snow-Bound' (1866), a description of an old Puritan Colonial interior, and 'The Tent on the Beach' (1867), a cycle of verse tales.

Whittington, RICHARD (d. 1423), son of Sir William Whittington, a mercer in London. He rose to be mayor of London, 1397-8, 1406-7 (a year of plague), and 1419-20. He was a liberal benefactor of the city, leaving legacies for rebuilding Newgate prison and other purposes (including a city library). The popular legend of Whittington and his cat, the germ of which is probably of very remote origin, is not known to have been narrated before 1605, when a dramatic version and a ballad were licensed for the press. The story of a cat helping its owner to fortune has been traced in many countries of Europe. It is also suggested that it is based on a confusion between 'a cat' and the French achat, in the sense of 'trade'. According to the story, Whittington, when in the service of Mr. Fitzwarren, a London merchant, sent his cat, the only thing he possessed, as part of one of the latter's trading ventures; the king of Barbary, who was plagued with rats and mice, purchased the cat for an enormous sum. Meanwhile Whittington, in consequence of ill-treatment by the cook under whom he served as scullion, ran away. He rested at Holloway, and hearing Bow Bells ringing, as he fancied, the words,

Turn again, Whittington,
Lord Mayor of London, returned to Fitzwarren's house.

Who's Who, an annual biographical dictionary of contemporary men and women. First issued in 1849 and now published annually (incorporating since 1901 'Men and Women of the Time').

Whole Duty of Man, The, a devotional work published in 1658, in which man's duties in respect of God and his fellow men are analysed and discussed in detail. The book was at one time attributed to Lady Dorothy Pakington (d. 1679). She was, however, probably only the copyist. The book, by internal evidence, is the work of a practised divine, acquainted with Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic, perhaps Richard Allestree (1619-81), chaplain in ordinary to the king, Regius professor of divinity, and provost of Eton. It had enormous popularity, lasting for over a century; it is comparable in this respect only to the 'Imitatio Christi' and to Law's 'Serious Call'. Some of the injunctions in it belong to a sterner age than the present, e.g. 'But of all the acts of disobedience that of marrying against the consent of the parent is one of the highest.'

WHYMPER, EDWARD (1840-1911), a pioneer of Alpine climbing, who made the first ascent of a number of peaks in the Alps. His first successful ascent of the Matterhorn in July 1865 was followed by a disastrous descent, four of his party being killed. He related his experiences in 'Scrambles in the Alps' (1871). He published in 1892 'Travels among the Great Andes of the Equator'. Whymper was by profession a wood-engraver, and illustrated many books.

WHYTE-MELVILLE, GEORGE JOHN (1821-78), educated at Eton, and a captain in the Coldstream Guards, served in the Crimea as a major of Turkish irregular cavalry. He was killed in the hunting-field. His novels, in many of which hunting figures largely, include 'Digby Grand' (1853), 'Holmby House' (1860), 'Tilbury Nogo' (1861), 'The Gladiators' (1863), 'Contraband' (1870), 'Sarchedon' (1871), 'Satanella' (1872), 'Katerfelto' (1875),

WIGGLESWORTH

'Roy's Wife' (1878), and 'Black but Comely' (1879). His 'Riding Recollections' appeared in 1878.

Wickfield, MR. and AGNES, characters in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

WICKLIFFE, see Wycliffe.

Widdicombe Fair, the title of a popular song. 'For some reason or other, not exactly known', writes S. Baring-Gould in 'English Minstrelsie', 'this has become the accepted Devonshire song. . . . The date of words and tune is probably the end of the last [18th] cent.'

Tom Pearse lends his grey mare to carry a party (including Old Uncle Tom Cobbleigh) to Widdicombe Fair, but the mare takes sick and dies, and is still to be seen haunting the moor at night. Widdicombe or Widedcombe-in-the-Moor is near Ashburton.

Widdrington, see Witherington.

Widow of Watling Street, THE, see Puritan (The).

Widsith, a poem of 143 lines in Old English, so named after its opening word. It is included in the 'Exeter Book' (q.v.).

Widsith, a wandering minstrel, belonging to the Myrging tribe, speaks of his travels and the kings he has heard of. He pretends he was in Italy with Ælfwine (Alboin, 6th cent.), and with Eormanric (Hermanric, 4th cent.) king of the Goths, who gave him a rich bracelet. This he handed over to Eadgils, his own lord, who gave him land, his father's heritage. Thus do minstrels wander over many lands, giving fame and receiving gifts.

The kernel of the poem may belong to the 7th cent. or an even earlier date. It was elaborately edited by R. W. Chambers, 1912.

Wieland, see Wayland the Smith.

WIELAND, CHRISTOPH MARTIN (1733-1813), German poet and writer of romances, whose best-known works are light ironic verse-tales, drawn from medieval or oriental sources, of which 'Oberon' (on the story of Huon of Bordeaux, 1780) is a good example. Wieland translated eleven of Shakespeare's plays into German prose, and 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' into verse.

Wife of Bath, (1) see Canterbury Tales; (2) the title of an unsuccessful comedy by J. Gay (1713).

Wife of Usher's Well, The, a ballad of the Scottish border. The wife sends her three sons to sea, and soon gets tidings of their death. Their ghosts come back on one of the long nights of Martinmas, and the mother, deceived by the apparitions, orders a feast; but at cock-crow they disappear.

WIGGLESWORTH, MICHAEL (1631-1705), colonial American poet, born in England, who emigrated in 1638, and who is known chiefly for his long Calvinistic poem, 'The Day of Doom'.

WILBERFORCE

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM (1759–1833), educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and a M.P. for Yorkshire, devoted himself to the cause of the abolition, first of the slave-trade, then of slavery, and to other philanthropic projects. He published in 1797 'A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians', a work that had an immense influence. He was the leading layman in the 'Clapham Sect' (as Sydney Smith nicknamed the Evangelicals), and he just lived to know that the second reading of the Bill abolishing slavery was carried.

WILCOX, MRS. ELLA WHEELER (née Wheeler) (1850–1919), American poet and journalist, described ('The Times', 31 Oct. 1919) as 'the most popular poet of either sex and of any age, read by thousands who never open Shakespeare'. She began to publish poems in 1872, and her last volume, 'Poems of Affection', was published posthumously in 1920. Her books of verse include 'Poems of Pleasure', 'Poems of Passion', 'Poems of Hope', 'Poems of Experience', 'Poems of Progress', 'Poems of Love', 'Poems of Cheer', &c. Her 'Collected Poems' were published in 1921.

Wild, JONATHAN (1682?–1725), worked as a buckle-maker in London. He became head of a large corporation of thieves, and opened offices in London for the recovery and restoration of property stolen by his dependants. He gained notoriety as a thief-taker, and was ultimately hanged at Tyburn. His 'Life and Actions' were related by Defoe (1725). For Fielding's satire see Jonathan Wild the Great.

Wild Boar of the Ardennes, see Ardennes.

Wild-Goose Chase, The, a comedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), acted with great success in 1621, and printed in 1652.

Mirabell, the 'wild goose', a Don Juan with an aversion to marriage, is 'chased' by Oriana, his betrothed, who tries various wiles to bring him to the altar. She feigns madness for love of him, but is detected, and finally wins him in the disguise of a rich Italian lady. His two companions, Pinac and Belleur, with less assurance, carry on an amusing courtship of Rosalura and Lillia-Bianca, alternately pursuing and pursued, with ultimate success. Farquhar's comedy, 'The Inconstant', is based on this play.

Wild Huntsman, The, a spectral huntsman of German folk-lore, the subject of a ballad ('Der wilde Jäger') by Bürger, imitated by Sir W. Scott. Scott's version was included in 'The Chase and William and Helen: two ballads from the German', published anonymously in 1796. The legend is that a wild-grave (keeper of a royal forest), named Falkenburg, not only hunted on the Sabbath but also tyrannized over the peasants under his authority. After his death he continued to haunt the forest, and he and his hounds might be heard, though rarely seen.

WILDING

Wildair, SIR HARRY, a character in Farquhar's 'The Constant Couple' (q.v.) and in its sequel, which bears his name.

WILDE, OSCAR FINGAL O'FLAHERTIE WILLS (1854–1900), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at Magdalen College, Oxford, gained at the latter the reputation of founder of an æsthetic cult, which was caricatured in Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera, 'Patience'. He published his first volume of 'Poems' in 1881, followed by several works of fiction, including 'The Picture of Dorian Gray' (1891), and several sparkling comedies, of which the best known are 'Lady Windermere's Fan', produced in 1892; 'A Woman of No Importance', in 1893; and 'The Importance of being Earnest', in 1895. His play 'Salomé' (in French, see Salome) was published in 1893. But the most remarkable of his works were the 'Ballad of Reading Gaol' (1898) and 'De Profundis' (1905), written after his sentence to imprisonment in 1895.

Wildenhalm, BARON, a character in Mrs. Inchbald's 'Lovers' Vows' (q.v.).

Wildevote, DAMON, a character in Hardy's 'The Return of the Native' (q.v.).

Wildfell Hall, The Tenant of, a novel by A. Brontë (q.v.), published in 1848.

The tenant of Wildfell Hall is Helen Graham, said to be a widow. Her youth and beauty, her secluded mode of life, and her silence about her antecedents set the tongues of local gossips wagging, and the gossip turns to scandal when it is discovered that she receives secret visits from her landlord, Frederick Lawrence. Gilbert Markham, the narrator of the tale, a young gentleman farmer and her neighbour, who has fallen in love with her, is loyal in his conviction of her innocence until he overhears her in affectionate conversation with Lawrence. The result is a violent scene between the two men.

The threatened rupture of relations between Gilbert and Helen forces the latter to confide her secret to her lover, and this she does in the form of her diary, which occupies a great part of the book. In this she recounts her youthful marriage with Arthur Huntingdon, a drunken profligate, her miserable life with him, and her efforts to reclaim him, until his shameless conduct and corrupting influence on her child force her to seek the asylum of Wildfell Hall, provided for her by Lawrence, who is her brother. Soon after the revelation of her secret to Gilbert, Helen returns to her husband to nurse him in an illness which, aggravated by his intemperance, proves fatal. The discovery that Helen is now wealthy is an obstacle to the renewal of Gilbert's suit, but this is finally overcome.

Wildfire, MADGE, a character in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.), the mad daughter of old Margaret Murdockson.

Wilding and Mrs. Wilding, characters in Shirley's 'The Gamester' (q.v.).

WILDRAKE

Wildrake, ROGER, a character in Scott's 'Woodstock' (q.v.).

Wilfer Family, THE, characters in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

Wilfrid or WILFRITH, ST. (634-709), bishop of York, of which see he was twice deprived. He was instrumental in winning the adherence of King Oswy of Northumbria to the Roman, as opposed to the Columban, Church (synod of Whitby), and was involved in other ecclesiastical disputes; he was imprisoned by Ecgfrid, king of Northumbria, in 680; and in 681 took refuge in Sussex, where he converted the South Saxons and taught them to fish. He twice appealed successfully to Rome against the deprivation of his functions. He is commemorated on 12 Oct. 'The Conversion of St. Wilfrid' is a beautiful tale in Rudyard Kipling's 'Rewards and Fairies'.

Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre and Wanderjahre, see Goethe.

Wilhelmstrasse, often used to signify the German Foreign Office, which stood in that street in Berlin.

WILKES, JOHN (1727-97), the son of a Clerkenwell maltster, was educated at the University of Leyden, and, after marrying an heiress much older than himself, led a life of dissipation and became a member of the Medmenham Abbey (q.v.) fraternity. He was elected M.P. for Aylesbury in 1757 and 1761. He founded in 1762 the 'North Briton' (q.v.) in which he skilfully attacked the government of Lord Bute. His prosecution for libel in connexion with No. 45 of this paper and the publication of the obscene 'Essay on Woman' led to the suppression of the 'North Briton' and to his own expulsion from the House of Commons, and outlawry. He retired to Paris, whence he returned in 1768 and was elected M.P. for Middlesex, and his outlawry was reversed. He was again expelled from the House in 1769 for a libel in the 'St. James's Chronicle', and three times re-elected for Middlesex, his elections being each time annulled. He was made sheriff of London and Middlesex, and finally took his seat without opposition in 1774, in which year he was lord mayor of London.

A man of much wit, ability, and determination, though of low moral standard, and an idol of the London mob, he was the means of asserting and securing several of our most valuable political rights.

Wilkins, PETER, see Peter Wilkins.

WILKINSON, SIR JOHN GARDNER (1797-1875), educated at Harrow and Exeter College, Oxford, a distinguished Egyptologist, arrived independently at conclusions regarding hieroglyphics identical with those of Champollion (q.v.). He was author of a standard work, 'Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians' (1837-41).

Will's Coffee-house, called after William

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY

Unwin, its proprietor, was at No. 1 Bow Street, at the corner of Russell Street. It was frequented in the 17th and 18th cents. by authors (notably by Dryden, Wycherley, Addison, Pope, and Congreve), wits, and gamblers. The first number of the 'Tatler' (q.v.) announced that all poetry appearing in it would be under the article of Will's Coffee-house.

Willbewill, THE LORD, in Bunyan's 'Holy War' (q.v.), 'as high-born as any man in Mansoul', 'a man of great strength, resolution, and courage', one of the first that went over to Diabolus.

Will-o'-the-Wisp, see Ignis Fatuus.

Willet, JOHN, in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), the host of the Maypole Inn, and JOE his son, finally the successful wooer of Dolly Varden.

Willett, WILLIAM (1856-1915), a builder, who with his father established a remarkable reputation for the houses they built in London, Chislehurst, Hove, and other places. He is especially remembered as the pioneer of 'daylight saving', of which he began the advocacy in 1907. The measure, to the furtherance of which he devoted much time, energy, and money, was adopted by parliament in 1916; but Willett did not live to see this.

William I, of Normandy, 'The Conqueror', king of England, 1066-87.

William II, or RUFUS, king of England, 1087-1100.

William III and Mary, king and queen of England from 1689. Mary died in 1694, William in 1702.

William IV, king of England, 1830-7.

William and Helen, see Lenore.

William and Margaret, a ballad by Mallet (q.v.), written in 1723, and first published in Aaron Hill's 'Plain Dealer', No. 36, July 1724. It is included in Percy's 'Reliques' under the title 'Margaret's Ghost'.

The ghost of Margaret, who has died before her time, betrayed by William, visits her faithless lover at dead of night, upbraids him, and bids him come and see 'how low she lies' in the grave. He goes to the grave, lays himself down, and never speaks more.

William de la Marck, see Ardennes.

William of Cloudeley, see Adam Ball.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY (d. 1143?), historian, was born between 1090 and 1096. He was educated at Malmesbury Abbey, and became librarian. He probably resided some time at Glastonbury, later revisions of his 'Gesta Regum Anglorum' containing notices derived from the history and charters of Glastonbury. His works include 'Gesta Regum Anglorum', covering the period from A.D. 449 to 1127; its sequel 'Historia Novella', dealing with English history to 1142; 'Gesta

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY

Pontificum Anglorum, finished 1125; and 'De Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesiae', written between 1129 and 1139. William of Malmesbury is not only a historian of high authority, but a picturesque and vivacious writer, who diversifies his narrative with anecdotes, reminiscences, and comments. The 'Gesta Regum' has two passages about Arthur, whom William regards as a great warrior, while discrediting many of the stories about him (see E. K. Chambers, 'Arthur of Britain').

WILLIAM OF NEWBURGH (1136-98?), educated at the Augustinian priory of Newburgh, Yorkshire, was the author of a 'Historia Rerum Anglicarum' in Latin, covering the period from 1066 to 1198, but mainly devoted to the reigns of Stephen and Henry II. It is the best historical work extant by an Englishman of this period, and earned for its author Freeman's opinion that he was 'the father of historical criticism'.

William of Norwich (1132?-44), saint and martyr, was apprenticed to a tanner of Norwich. He is said to have been murdered when twelve years old by Jews as a victim, in compliance with what was believed to be a Jewish rite. The resting-place of his body in Norwich Cathedral became a centre of pilgrimage. He is commemorated on 25 March.

William of Palerne, one of the earliest of the 14th-cent. alliterative English romances, of some 5,500 lines and probably of Latin source.

William is prince of Apulia. He is saved from poisoning in childhood by a werewolf (q.v.), who is, in reality, the heir to the kingdom of Spain, but has been enchanted by his stepmother, the queen of Spain. William falls in love with Melchior, daughter of the emperor of Rome, and William, as he flees with her, is again protected by the werewolf. William then fights against the king of Spain, captures him, and forces the stepmother to undo her magic. The werewolf is restored to human form and reveals the identity of William.

William of Wykeham (1324-1404), bishop of Winchester and chancellor of England, obtained a papal bull for the endowment of Winchester College in 1378, and issued the charter of foundation of New College, Oxford, in 1379. His college was built in 1380-6, and his school in 1387-94. He was first employed as clerk of the king's works at Windsor, and it has been suggested that he may have been the architect who planned the castle there.

Williams, CALEB, see Caleb Williams.

WILLIAMS, HELEN MARIA (1762-1827), resided chiefly in France after 1788 and wrote from there 'Letters' (1790-5) which contain interesting information on the state of Paris and France just before and during the Revolution.

WILSON

WILLIAMS, ISAAC (1802-65), educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Oxford, came under the influence of Keble and was one of the participants in the Oxford Movement (q.v.). He contributed No. 80 to the 'Tracts for the Times', on 'Reserve in communicating Religious Knowledge'; also Nos. 86 and 87. He also was author of poems in 'Lyra Apostolica' (q.v.) signed 'I', and of several volumes in prose and verse, notably the volume of poems entitled 'The Cathedral' (1838). His 'Autobiography' (edited by Sir G. Prevost in 1892) is an interesting record of the days of the Oxford Movement.

Williams, MICHAEL, in Shakespeare's 'Henry V' (q.v.), one of the English soldiers who converses with the king before the battle of Agincourt.

Williamson, SIR JOSEPH (1633-1701), succeeded Arlington as secretary of state in 1674. He was a patron of Muddiman (q.v.), and it was under his direction that Muddiman started the 'Oxford Gazette' (q.v.) in 1665.

WILLIS, NATHANIEL PARKER (1806-67), born at Portland, Maine, American author of plays, essays, and poems. Among his works are: 'Pencilings by the Way' (1835), 'Loiterings of Travel' (1840), 'Letters from under a Bridge' (1840), 'Outdoors at Idlewild' (1854), 'Poems: Sacred, Passionate and Humorous' (1869).

Willoughby, SIR CLEMENT, a character in Miss Burney's 'Evelina' (q.v.).

Willoughby, SIR HUGH (d. 1554), navigator, despatched by Sebastian Cabot (q.v.) in 1553 as captain-general of an expedition (with Richard Chancellor as pilot-major) which was to endeavour to reach China by the north-east passage. He perished on the coast of Lapland. The story of his great effort is given by Hakluyt (q.v.).

Willoughby, JOHN, a character in Jane Austen's 'Sense and Sensibility' (q.v.).

WILLOUGHBY DE BROKE, RICHARD GREVILLE VERNEY, nineteenth Baron (1869-1923), educated at Eton and New College, Oxford, master of the Warwickshire Foxhounds from 1900, was author of the classical 'Hunting the Fox' (1920).

WILMOT, ROBERT (fl. 1568-1608), dramatist, rector of North Ockendon, 1582, and of Horndon-on-the-Hill, 1585. He published in 1591 'The Tragedie of Tancred and Gismund' (q.v.), a play based on Boccaccio, and the oldest English play of which the plot is certainly taken from an Italian novel.

Willmot, the name of the three principal characters in Lillo's 'The Fatal Curiosity' (q.v.).

Wilson, ALISON, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), the housekeeper of Silas Morton of Milnwood.

Wilson, CAPTAIN, in Marryat's 'Midshipman Easy' (q.v.), the captain of the hero's first ship.

WILSON

WILSON, SIR ARNOLD TALBOT (1884-1940), author, among other works, of 'The Persian Gulf' (1928), two books on Mesopotamia during the War of 1914-18, and 'South West Persia' (1941).

WILSON, SIR DANIEL (1816-92), author of 'The Archaeology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland' (1851) and 'Memorials of Edinburgh in the Olden Time' (1846-8), and some biographical and other works.

WILSON, JOHN (1627?-96), a native of Plymouth, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and became a barrister of Lincoln's Inn and recorder of Londonderry. His principal plays are two comedies on the Jonsonian model, 'The Cheats' (1664) and 'The Projectors' (1665), in which sharks, braves, usurers, astrologers, and their victims are vigorously and effectively displayed; and a tragedy, 'Andronicus Comnenius' (1664), based on the adventurous career of the Roman emperor Andronicus Comnenus (1183-5). A fourth drama, 'Belphegor, or the Marriage of the Devil', was printed in 1691.

WILSON, JOHN (1785-1854), educated at Glasgow University and Magdalen College, Oxford, was elected professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh University in 1820 on the strength of his Tory principles. He joined the editorial staff of 'Blackwood's Magazine' (q.v.) in 1817, and contributed to it the greater number of the 'Noctes Ambrosianae' (q.v.), in which he figures as 'Christopher North'. He joined with Lockhart and Hogg in the production of the famous 'Translation from an Ancient Chaldee Manuscript', in which Edinburgh notabilities were satirized in scriptural language ('Blackwood', Oct. 1817). He was author of the poems 'The Isle of Palms' (1812) and 'The City of the Plague' (1816). 'The Recreations of Christopher North' appeared in 1842, and several volumes of his essays in 1866. His 'Works' were edited by Prof. Ferrier in 1855-8. Wilson was one of the first critics to do justice to the poetry of Wordsworth.

WILSON, THOMAS (1525?-81), educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, privy councillor and secretary of state in 1578, published the 'Rule of Reason' in 1551, and the 'Art of Rhetorique' in 1553. The latter is noteworthy in the history of English literature; in it the author urges the importance of writing of English matters in the English tongue, avoiding affectations and latinisms.

Wilton, JACKIE, see Unfortunate Traveller.

Wimble, WILL, in Addison's 'The Spectator' (q.v.), a friend of Sir Roger de Coverley, a good-natured officious fellow, who hunts a pack of dogs better than any man in the country, and is generally esteemed for the obliging services that he renders to all.

Wimsey, LORD PETER, the detective hero of many stories by Dorothy Sayers.

WINNER AND WASTER

WINCHILSEA, ANNE FINCH, Countess of (1661-1720), a writer of pleasant occasional verse (praised by Sir E. Gosse) and a friend of Pope and Rowe (qq.v.). Wordsworth found affinities in some of her work. One of her longer poems, 'The Spleen', contains a couplet about the 'jonquille' and 'Aromatick Pain' of which there are echoes in Pope's 'Essay on Man' and Shelley's 'Epipsychidion'.

WINCKELMANN, JOHANN JOACHIM (1717-68), the son of a German shoemaker, became the founder of the modern study of Greek sculptures and antiquities. By his understanding of the ideal of Greek art, its spiritual quality, and its sense of proportion, he exerted an immense influence on subsequent thought and literature (e.g. on Goethe). His principal works were the 'Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in Malerei und Bildhauerkunst' (1755), 'Geschichte der Kunst des Altertums' (1764), and 'Monumenti Antichi Inediti' (1767). Winckelmann was murdered by an Italian thief. He is the subject of an essay by Pater and of 'The Conversion of Winckelmann' by A. Austin.

WINTER'S TALE

Winter's Tale, The, a play by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably produced in 1609-10, and based on Robert Greene's 'Pandosto' (q.v.). It was not printed until the folio of 1623.

Leontes, king of Sicily, and Hermione, his virtuous wife, are visited by Leontes' friend, Polixenes, king of Bohemia. Leontes, presently filled with a baseless suspicion of the relations of Hermione and Polixenes, attempts to procure the death of the latter by poison, and on his escape imprisons Hermione, who in prison gives birth to a daughter. Paulina, wife of Antigonus, a Sicilian lord, tries to move the king's compassion by bringing the baby to him, but in vain. He orders Antigonus to leave the child on a desert shore to perish. He disregards a Delphian oracle declaring Hermione innocent. He soon learns that his son, Mamillius, has died of sorrow for Hermione's treatment, and shortly after that Hermione herself is dead, and is thereupon filled with remorse. Meanwhile Antigonus leaves the baby girl, Perdita, on the shore of Bohemia, and is himself killed by a bear. Perdita is found and brought up by a shepherd. When she grows up, Florizel, son of King Polixenes, falls in love with her, and his love is returned. This is discovered by Polixenes, to avoid whose anger Florizel, Perdita, and the old shepherd flee from Bohemia to the court of King Leontes, where the identity of Perdita is discovered, to Leontes' great joy, and the revival of his grief for the loss of Hermione. Paulina offers to show him a statue that perfectly resembles Hermione, and when the king's grief is intensified by the sight of this, the statue reveals itself as the living Hermione, whose death Paulina had falsely reported in order to save her life. Polixenes is reconciled to the marriage of his son with Perdita, on finding that the shepherd-girl is really the daughter of his former friend Leontes. The rogueries of Autolycus, the pedlar and 'snapper-up of unconsidered trifles', add gaiety to the later scenes of the play; and his songs, 'When daffodils begin to peer' and 'Jog on, jog on, the foot-path way', are famous.

Winterbourne, GILES, a character in Hardy's 'The Woodlanders' (q.v.).

WIREKER, NIGEL (fl. 1190), precentor of Christ Church, Canterbury, author of 'Speculum Stultorum', a satire on monks, an elegiac poem recounting the adventures of Burnel the Ass (q.v.). It is referred to in Chaucer's 'Nun's Priest's Tale'.

Wisden, A Cricketer's Almanack, first published in 1864 by John Wisden & Co. The first number contains the laws of cricket, scores of 100 and upwards from 1850 to 1863, records of extraordinary matches, &c. The publication still continues.

Wisdom of Solomon, one of the books of WISE, THOMAS JAMES (1859-1937), bibliographer, collector, and editor, who formed the great Ashley Library (q.v.). In 1934 his credit as a bibliographer was gravely damaged by the publication of a book which proved that a large number of rare pamphlets whose authenticity depended upon Wise's statements were in fact forgeries—in particular an edition of Mrs. Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese (q.v.) said to have been published in Reading in 1847.

Wishfort, Lady, a character in Congreve's 'The Way of the World' (q.v.).

Wit without Money, a comedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), written about 1614, printed in 1639.

Witch, The, a play by T. Middleton (q.v.), written before 1627, not printed until 1778.

The principal part of the plot is based on the story of the revenge of Rosamond on Alboin in the history of the kings of Lombardy. In Middleton's play the duchess is obliged by her husband to drink a health at a banquet out of a cup made from her father's skull and, to avenge herself, purchases by her pretended favours the help of a courtier, Almachides, to kill her husband. (The same subject is treated in D'Avenant's 'Albovine' (q.v.) and in Swinburne's 'Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards'.) In this and the subordinate intrigue, the assistance of the witch Hecate is called in, and part of the interest of the play lies in the comparison between Middleton's Hecate and the witches in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth'. Charles Lamb in his 'Specimens' has indicated the difference between them.

Witch of Atlas, The, a poem in ottava rima by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), written in 1820.

The poet, in playful mood, invents the myth of a beautiful and beneficent witch, the daughter of Apollo, who tames wild beasts, plays pranks in her magic boat among the clouds, can see the souls of men under their mortal forms, blesses those whom she sees most beautiful, but 'writes strange dreams upon the brain' of those who are less beautiful, and mischievously crosses their purposes.

Witch of Edmonton, The, a tragi-comedy by Dekker, J. Ford, W. Rowley (qq.v.), 'etc.' (as the title states), first performed probably in 1623, but not published until 1658.

Frank Thorney marries his fellow servant Winifred, without his father's knowledge and against his will. To save himself from being disinherited, he, at his father's bidding, also marries Susan Carter, and presently, to extract himself from his embarrassment, murders her and attempts to throw the guilt on her two rejected suitors, but is discovered and in due course executed.

The old woman of Edmonton, who is persecuted by her neighbours until she sells her soul to the devil in order to be revenged on them, and becomes the witch that they have called her, provides the title for the play, but has little connexion with the main plot. This part is notable for the characteristic sympathy shown by Dekker for the poor outcast.

WITHER, GEORGE (1588-1667), was born at Bentworth in Hampshire and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. His satires, 'Abuses stript and whipt', published in 1613, in spite of the innocuous character of their denunciations of Avarice, Gluttony, and so forth, earned him imprisonment in the Marshalsea. There he wrote five pastorals under the title of 'The Shepherd's Hunting', containing some of his best verse, a continuation of the 'Shepherd's Pipe' which he had written in conjunction with William Browne (q.v.), the 'Willie' of these eclogues. In the second of these, Wither (in the character of Philarete) describes the 'hunting of foxes, wolves, and beasts of prey' (the abuses) which got him into trouble with the government. His 'Fidelia', a poetical epistle from a faithful nymph to her inconstant lover, appeared in 1617 (privately printed, 1615) and again, with the famous song, 'Shall I, wasting in despair', in 1619. His 'Motto. Nec habeo, nec Careo, nec Curo', published in 1621, led again to his imprisonment; it is a pleasant self-eulogy, in three parts, dealing with the three phrases of his motto. In 1622 appeared his 'Mistress of Phil'Arete', a long panegyric of his mistress Arete, a partly real, partly allegorical personage; also the collection of pieces called 'Juvenilia', containing most of his best work. After this he became a convinced Puritan and published principally religious exercises, notably his 'Hymnes and Songs of the Church' (1623) and his 'Heleluiah' (1641). No complete edition of Wither's works has been published, but six collections were published by the Spencer Society, 1872-8. During the Civil War he raised a troop of horse for parliament in 1642, and was captain and commander of Farnham Castle in that year.

Wits, The, a comedy by D'Avenant (q.v.), published in 1636.

WIVES AND DAUGHTERS

This play is generally considered D'Avenant's comic masterpiece. Young Pallatine, a wit, who lives in London on an allowance, but finds it unequal to his wants, is in love with Lucy, who sells her jewels to provide him with money and is in consequence turned out of doors by her cruel aunt, who suspects her of misconduct. She takes refuge with Lady Ample, the rich ward of Sir Tyrant Thrift, who proposes to force an unwelcome marriage on his ward before he loses control over her. Meanwhile Pallatine's wealthy elder brother comes to town, with old Sir Morglay Thwack, for a spell of dissipation. He tells young Pallatine that he will never more give him money, but that he must live by his wits, as he himself and Thwack propose to do. In pursuit of this purpose they become involved in a series of adventures, are thoroughly fooled, and the elder Pallatine is released from his troubles only on making liberal provision for his brother and Lucy. Thrift is likewise fooled and held to ransom.

Wittol, SIR JOSEPH, a character in Congreve's 'The Old Bachelor' (q.v.).

Wives and Daughters, the last and unfinished novel of Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in the 'Cornhill Magazine' 1864-6.

In this novel Mrs. Gaskell's subdued humour and irony are seen at their best. Mr. Gibson is the simple hard-working doctor of the little town of Hollingford. He is a widower at the outset of the story. Molly, his daughter, an honest and unselfish girl, is passionately devoted to her father. Dr. Gibson, partly to protect his growing daughter, partly to please himself, marries a widow, Mrs. Kirkpatrick, formerly governess at 'The Towers', the neighbouring seat of Lord Cumnor, a superficially attractive woman, but with all the petty vices of a shallow, selfish nature, to which Mrs. Gaskell amusingly holds up the mirror. The marriage of her father goes far to spoil Molly's previously happy life, but she loyally strives to accept the new conditions. Her lot is improved when Mrs. Gibson's own daughter, Cynthia, arrives from the Continent, where she has been educated, a fascinating girl without her mother's petty dishonesty, but also without Molly's capacity for deep love and strong sense of principle. She has entangled herself, when 16, with Mr. Preston, Lord Cumnor's clever but ill-bred agent, from whom she has borrowed money and who has availed himself of this to extract a secret promise of marriage from her; him, however, she now hates. Another family enters largely into the drama: Mr. Hamley, a hot-tempered, good-natured old squire; his gentle wife, who presently dies; and their two sons, Osborne and Roger. The parents' hopes are set on Osborne, handsome and clever, who is to distinguish himself at Cambridge and make a brilliant marriage. But he fails miserably at the university, and secretly marries a French governess. The resulting situation produces a bitter estrangement between Osborne and his father. Osborne's health fails and he dies, leaving a baby son, and the squire realizes too late his past harshness and the bitterness of his loss. Roger, the younger son, without his brother's outward charm, is made of sterner stuff, becomes senior wrangler and an eminent man of science. The story is largely occupied with the relations of the Gibson and Hamley families. The Hamleys are devoted to Molly, who falls in love with Roger, as Roger does with Cynthia. Cynthia, although engaged to Preston, accepts Roger, without loving him, to Molly's distress. However, realizing the incongruity of their characters, Cynthia throws him over and marries a man better suited to herself, after Molly has liberated her from the pursuit of Preston. All promises well when the unfinished work closes, for Roger has discovered the worth of Molly and will evidently marry her.

There are many pleasant and amusing subordinate characters: the arrogant Lady Cumnor; her kindly daughter, Lady Harriet; the Misses Browning and Mrs. Goodenough, genteel inhabitants of Hollingford.

WODROW, ROBERT (1679-1734), was minister of Eastwood near Glasgow, and university librarian of Glasgow. His works include a 'History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution' (1828-30). He also kept private note-books (partly in cipher) published by the Maitland Club in 1842-3 as 'Analecta, or materials for a history of remarkable providences'. He was a great book-collector, and left a valuable collection of broadsides and pasquinades (see J. H. Burton, 'The Book-hunter'). He is commemorated in the Wodrow Society, devoted to the history of Presbyterianism and the works of eminent Presbyterians.

WOMAN IN THE MOONE

Woffington', the celebrated actress, was the daughter of a bricklayer in Dublin. She was engaged by Rich for Covent Garden in 1740 and was immediately successful, acting in a great number of leading parts. She quarrelled with Mrs. Bellamy and while playing Roxana to Mrs. Bellamy's Statira drove her off the stage and stabbed her. Her amours were numerous and for some time she lived with Garrick. For Charles Reade's novel and the play 'Masks and Faces' concerning her, see Peg Woffington.

WOLCOT, JOHN (1738-1819), 'PETER PINDAR', began his career as a physician, in which capacity he was attached to Sir William Trelawny, governor of Jamaica (1767-9). He then took holy orders, but returned to the practice of medicine in Cornwall. He abandoned medicine for literature in 1778 and removed to London with the painter Opie, whom he had helped. He published his satirical 'Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians' in 1782-5, followed by a mock-heroic poem, 'The Lousiad' (q.v.) in 1785, and various satires on George III. He was attacked by Gifford in the 'Anti-Jacobin' (q.v.). His 'Bozzy and Piozzi', in which Boswell and Mrs. Thrale set forth their respective reminiscences of Dr. Johnson in amoebean verse, appeared in 1786. He became blind before his death. He had a gift for the comical and mischievous exposure of foibles, but his work suffers from vulgarity of thought and inelegance of style.

He was the author of the splendid lines on 'The Burial of Sir John Moore' (apparently based on Southey's narrative in the 'Annual Register', and first published in the 'Newry Telegraph' in 1817). Wolfe wrote no other poem worthy of remark (his 'Remains' were published in 1829).

Woman in the Moone, THE, a prose play by Lyly (q.v.), published 1597. The shepherds of Utopia ask Nature to provide a woman to 'comfort their sole estate'. Nature creates Pandora, endowing her with the qualities of the Seven Planets. Pandora's moods and actions vary as the planets in turn assume the ascendant, with consequent complications among the shepherds.

Woman in White, The, a novel by Wilkie Collins (q.v.), published in 'All the Year Round' in 1860.

The story is told by several of the characters in succession. Walter Hartright, a drawing-master, is accosted on a lonely road by a woman dressed entirely in white, who shows signs of being partially demented and appears to have escaped from an asylum. He is engaged by Mr. Fairlie, a selfish valetudinarian, to give lessons to his niece, Laura Fairlie, and her half-sister, Marian Halcombe. He falls in love with Laura, who strikingly resembles the woman in white, and she returns his love, but she has promised her father on his death-bed that she will marry Sir Percival Glyde, of Blackwater Park, and Hartright leaves the country in despair. The marriage of Laura to Sir Percival takes place, and it comes to light that Sir Percival, whose affairs are embarrassed, has married Laura to get possession of her wealth, that he is responsible for the confinement of the woman in white, Anne Catherick, in an asylum, and that Anne Catherick and her mother are in possession of a secret concerning Sir Percival, of which he is determined at all costs to prevent the revelation. Unable to obtain Laura's signature to the surrender of her money, Sir Percival and Count Fosco, his friend (a fat, smooth villain, admirably conceived), contrive to get Laura confined in an asylum as Anne Catherick, while Anne Catherick, who dies, is buried as Lady Glyde. The device is discovered by the courage and resource of Marian Halcombe, and Laura is rescued. At this point Hartright returns to England, takes Laura and Marian under his care, and discovers Sir Percival's secret (that he was born out of wedlock and has no right to the title). Sir Percival is burnt to death while tampering with the parish register in a last effort to save his position. Anne Catherick turns out to be Laura's half-sister, and Laura and Hartright are happily married. Fosco is forced to supply the information which restores Laura to her position, and is killed by a member of an Italian secret society that he has betrayed.

Woman Kilde with Kindnesse, A, a romantic comedy by T. Heywood (q.v.), acted about 1603, printed in 1607.

Frankford, a country gentleman, is the husband of Anne, a 'perfect' wife. But his happiness is ruined by the treachery of Wendoll, a guest to whom Frankford has shown every kindness and hospitality. Frankford discovers Anne in the arms of Wendoll. But instead of taking immediate vengeance on her, he determines to 'kill her even with kindness'. He sends her to live in comfort in a lonely manor-house, only prohibiting her from seeing him or her children again. She dies from remorse, after having sent for Frankford to ask forgiveness on her death-bed, and received it.

This play, in which pathos and manliness are blended, is considered Heywood's masterpiece. It opens with a pleasant hawking scene.

Woman who did, The, a novel by Grant Allen, raising the question of the moral basis of marriage, published in 1895. It is the tragic story of a noble and pure-minded woman of advanced views, who regards marriage as a barbarous institution incompatible with the emancipation of women, courageously follows out her principle in her relations with the man she loves, and suffers the inevitable penalty.

Woman-Hater, The, see Beaumont.

Women beware Women, a tragedy by T. Middleton (q.v.), published in 1657, thirty years after his death.

The story involves two interwoven plots. The first is concerned with the guilty love of Hippolito for his niece Isabella. Hippolito's sister, Livia, makes Isabella believe that she is not akin to him, and she then consents to marry a foolish young heir as a screen for her own passion for Hippolito.

The second is based on the life of the historical Bianca Capello. Bianca has run away from her father's house and married Leantio, a merchant's clerk. The duke, seeing her at her window, becomes enamoured of her and carries her off to be his mistress. Reproved by the cardinal, his brother, for his sin, he contrives the death of Leantio, and marries Bianca. For this purpose he incites Hippolito to kill Leantio by revealing to him that his sister Livia has become enamoured of Leantio. These various crimes, in the last act, meet with their retribution in a wholesale massacre of the characters.

WOOD, ANTHONY, or, as he latterly called himself, ANTHONY A WOOD (1632-95), antiquary and historian, was educated at New College School, Oxford, Thame School, and Merton College, Oxford. He prepared a treatise on the history of the University of Oxford, which was translated into Latin and edited (with alterations) by Dr. John Fell (q.v.), dean of Christ Church, and published as 'Historia et Antiquitates Univ. Oxon.' (1674). Of this an English version by Wood, issued by John Gutch, is the standard edition (1786-96). Wood published 'Athenae Oxonienses' (1691-2), a biographical dictionary of Oxford writers and bishops, containing severe judgements on some of these, and was expelled from the University in 1693 at the instance of Henry Hyde, second earl of Clarendon, for a libel which the work contained on his father, the first earl. Several antiquarian manuscripts left by Wood were Woodlanders, The, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1887.

The scene is the wooded country on the skirts of Blackmoor Vale in Dorset. Honest Giles Winterbourne, in the apple and cider trade, is betrothed to Grace Melbury, daughter of a timber-merchant of Little Hintock. But on her return from the fashionable school to which she has been sent to finish her education, her social superiority to her rustic lover is evident. This and a financial misfortune that at this time befalls Giles induce her ambitious father to bring the engagement to an end, and to hustle his daughter into marriage with Edred Fitzpiers, a fascinating young doctor, a marriage to which she consents in spite of her suspicion of a low intrigue between Fitzpiers and Suke Damson, a village girl. Fitzpiers is presently lured away from his wife by the wealthy widow, Felice Charmond, and the hope of a divorce brings Grace and the faithful Giles together again. But the hope proves illusory. Fitzpiers returns from his travels abroad with Mrs. Charmond, and Grace flies for refuge to Giles's cottage in the woods. Owing to delicacy on his part and respect for the proprieties on hers, she is left alone in the cottage, and the man she loves, though ill, betakes himself to a crazy shelter of hurdles, where after a few days of exposure he dies. Mrs. Charmond being now dead, Grace and Fitzpiers are ultimately reconciled.

Parallel with the devotion of Giles to Grace is the devotion of poor plain Marty South, the typical primitive Wessex girl, to Giles. Marty and Grace meet by his death-bed and pray for his soul; together they regularly visit his tomb. At the end of the book, after Grace has rejoined her husband, Marty stands alone beside the tomb.

Woodstock; or, The Cavalier. A tale of the year 1651, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1826. The work was written when misfortunes were heaping themselves upon the author: his financial ruin, the death of his wife, and the grievous illness of his beloved grandson.

The period is that of the Civil War, and the story centres in the escape of Charles II from England after the battle of Worcester. The scene is laid in the royal lodge and park of Woodstock, near Oxford, of which the gallant old cavalier, Sir Henry Lee, is ranger. His nephew, Colonel Markham Everard, has, for reasons of conscience, adopted the parliamentary cause, distinguished himself as a soldier, and earned the favour of Cromwell. On the other hand he has incurred the displeasure of the fiery old Lee, and the course of his love for Lee's daughter, Alice, has been gravely impeded. Parliamentary commissioners are sent to sequester Woodstock, but through Everard's influence with Cromwell are withdrawn, for Cromwell hopes that the fugitive Charles II will take advantage of the opportunities for concealment offered by the old lodge, and be captured there. Charles indeed arrives, disguised as the page of Colonel Albert Lee, Sir Henry's son; and during his residence at the lodge makes ardent love to the unwilling Alice, first in the character of page and, when this fails, of king. This brings about a fierce dispute between Everard and Charles, and bloodshed is prevented only by the interposition of Alice. The king, from a generous impulse, relieves the anguish caused to Everard by the preference apparently shown by Alice to his rival, by revealing to him his identity; and Everard promises not to betray him. Cromwell, advised by a spy of the presence of Charles at Woodstock, now arrives with a force to capture him, arrests Everard, and prepares to surround the lodge. During these preparations the king receives warning and flees, leaving Albert to personate him and thus delay the pursuit. After an exciting search, Albert is captured and the escape of the fugitive king is revealed. Cromwell, after having, in his fury, ordered the immediate execution of Everard, Sir Henry Lee, and his other prisoners, presently relents and pardons them. The reconciliation of Everard and Sir Henry, and the marriage of Everard and Alice, are brought about by a parting message from Charles. An important feature in the story is the supposed haunting of Woodstock. The Royalists take advantage of it, by 'playing at ghosts' in the secret passages of the old mansion, in order to defeat the intended sequestration.

The portrait of Cromwell has been criticized; the author makes, it is said, the mistake of representing Oliver as being in supreme power before he became lord protector in 1653. But the work gives a vivid picture of a reckless cavalier, Roger Wildrake; of the Rev. Nehemiah Holdenough, Presbyterian minister of the town of Woodstock; of Puritan soldiers and preachers (including Joseph Tomkins, the steward of the parliamentary commissioners, a mixture of hypocrisy and enthusiasm); and of plotters and spies on both sides.

WOODWORTH, SAMUEL (1785-1842), American printer, journalist, and author, born at Scituate, Massachusetts, who is remembered as author of the sentimental song, 'The Old Oaken Bucket'.

Wookey Hole, a cavern in the Mendip Hills in Somersetshire, the legendary abode of the Witch of Wokey, a ballad concerning whom is included in Percy's 'Reliques'. She was changed into a stone by a 'lerner wight' from Glaston, but left a curse behind that the maidens of Wokey should find no lovers.

WOOLF, VIRGINIA (1882-1941), d. of Sir Leslie Stephen (q.v.), author, whose chief works are: 'The Voyage Out' (1915), 'Night and Day' (1919), 'Jacob's Room' (1922), 'Mrs. Dalloway' (1925), 'To the Lighthouse' (1927), 'Orlando' (1929), 'The Waves' (1931), novels; 'A Room of One's Own' (1929), essay; 'The Common Reader' (1925), literary criticism. Mrs. Woolf is considered by some the most important of modern English novelists. She was a tireless experimenter, in whose hands the novel tended to become something different from a mere fictional narrative of 'characters'. This may be seen especially in 'Jacob's Room', 'Mrs. Dalloway', 'Orlando', and 'The Waves'.

WOOLMAN, JOHN (1720-72), American Quaker, who travelled during many years preaching the faith, and was author among other works of a 'Journal' (1774) notable for the purity of its style. Charles Lamb wrote,

'Get the writings of John Woolman by heart and love the early Quakers.'

WOOLNER, THOMAS (1825-92), sculptor and poet, one of the original Pre-Raphaelite Brethren (q.v.) and a contributor to the 'Germ' (q.v.). He met with small success and went to the Australian goldfields, his departure inspiring Madox Brown's picture 'The Last of England' (1852). The statue on the Thames embankment of J. S. Mill (q.v.) is by him.

Woolsack, THE, the usual seat, without back or arms, of the lord chancellor in the House of Lords, made of a large square bag of wool and covered with cloth. It is said to have been adopted in Edward III's reign as a reminder to the Lords of the importance to England of the wool trade. The term is often used allusively to signify the lord-chancellorship.

Woolsey, The Life and Death of Thomas, see Cavendish (G.).

Woolwich, on the Thames below London, often used to signify the Royal Military Academy, where cadets were trained for the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers. Also a great arsenal. It is now a part of London.

Woolworth, the name of a large group of chain stores in which no article is sold above a general low maximum price. In 1879 Frank Winfield Woolworth opened his first 'five-cent' store at Utica in New York State. It proved a failure and was succeeded by his 'five- and ten-cent' store at Lancaster (Pa.). The F. W. Woolworth Co. was incorporated in 1911. Other stores on the same model started by Woolworth's brothers and friends in the U.S.A. were merged in this company in 1912, by which date some 600 of these stores were in existence, a number since greatly increased. In addition, associated companies were founded in England and other countries. The Woolworth Building in New York, 792 ft. high, the tallest building in the world at the time of its erection, was completed in 1912.

Wopsle, MR., in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.), a parish clerk who turns actor and plays Hamlet with indifferent success.

Worcester, THE BATTLE OF, fought on 3 Sept. 1651; the Scottish army with Charles II was utterly defeated by Cromwell, who referred to his victory as 'a crowning mercy'.

Worde, WYNKYN DE (d. ? 1534), printer and stationer. His actual name was Jan van Wynkyn, and he was born at Worth in Alsace. He came to England and was apprenticed to William Caxton (q.v.), whose business he carried on after his death. He removed to Fleet Street in 1500 and opened a shop in St. Paul's Churchyard in 1509. He issued a large number of books from his press, among the most notable being the third edition of the 'Golden Legend' (1493), the 'Vitae Sanctorum Patrum' of St. Jerome, translated by Caxton (1495), the second edition of the 'Morte Darthur' (1498), and the fourth of the 'Canterbury Tales' (1498).

WORDSWORTH, DOROTHY (1771-1855), sister and constant companion of W. Wordsworth. Her 'Journals' were edited by W. Knight, 1896 and 1904. A life and study of her by E. de Sélincourt appeared in 1933.

WORDSWORTH, WILLIAM (1770-1850), born at Cockermouth, the son of an attorney of that place, was educated at the grammar school of Hawkshead and St. John's College, Cambridge, leaving the University without distinction. In 1790 he went on a walking tour in France, the Alps, and Italy. He returned to France late in 1791, and spent there a year. The revolutionary movement was then at its height and exercised a strong influence on his mind. While in France he fell in love with the daughter of a surgeon at Blois, Annette Vallon, who bore him a daughter (see Émile Legouis, 'William Wordsworth and Annette Vallon', 1922). The episode is in part reflected in 'Vaudracour and Julia', written in 1805. In 1793 he published 'An Evening Walk' and 'Descriptive Sketches' (of the Alps), his first serious poetical efforts. When the French Revolution was followed by the English declaration of war and the Terror, Wordsworth's republican enthusiasm gave place to a period of pessimism, which manifested itself in his tragedy, 'The Borderers' (q.v.), written in 1795-6. He received in 1795 a legacy of £900, left to him by his friend Raisley Calvert, a mark of Calvert's confidence in Wordsworth's genius. In the same year Wordsworth made the acquaintance of S. T. Coleridge (q.v.). A close and long-enduring friendship developed between the poets, and Wordsworth, his sister Dorothy, and Mr. and Mrs. Coleridge lived for a year in close intercourse at Alfoxden and Stowey in Somerset. Together the poets published in 1798 'Lyrical Ballads' (q.v.), which marked a revival in English poetry, but was unfavourably received. The volume contained the 'Lines written above Tintern Abbey' (written in 1798). Together also, at the end of the same year, the poets went to Germany, Wordsworth and his sister wintering at Goslar. Here Wordsworth began 'The Prelude' (q.v.) and wrote 'Ruth', 'Lucy Gray', 'Nutting', the lines on 'Lucy' (q.v.), and other beautiful poems. In 1799 he settled with his sister at Grasmere, where he spent the remainder of his life (at first at Dove Cottage). In 1800 appeared an enlarged edition of the 'Lyrical Ballads', with a critical essay named 'Observations', expounding Wordsworth's principles of poetry, to which was added in 1802 an appendix on 'Poetic Diction'. This edition of the 'Lyrical Ballads', and particularly the 'Observations', were received by the critics with extreme hostility, which left Wordsworth unmoved. To the year 1800 belongs

WORDSWORTH

'Michael', one of the most harmonious of Wordsworth's poems. His financial position having been improved by the repayment of a debt on the death of Lord Lonsdale, he married in 1802 Mary Hutchinson of Penrith. He made a tour in Scotland in 1801, a journey to Calais in 1802, and another tour in Scotland in 1803, and began a cordial friendship with Sir W. Scott (q.v.). Events abroad now changed his political attitude to one of patriotic enthusiasm, while the death of his brother John in 1805 and the physical decline of his friend, S. T. Coleridge, deeply affected him. In 1805 he completed 'The Prelude' (q.v.), which, however, was not published until after his death. In 1807 he published poems, including the odes to 'Duty' (written in 1805) and on 'Intimations of Immortality', 'Miscellaneous Sonnets', and 'Sonnets dedicated to Liberty'. To the same year belongs 'The White Doe of Rylstone' (a tragedy of the time of Queen Elizabeth, in which the surviving daughter of a family of Catholic rebels is comforted by the visits of a white doe that she has reared in happier times), published in 1815. In 1813 he was given the office of distributor of stamps for the county of Westmorland, which brought him in some £400 a year. He now moved to Rydal Mount, Grasmere, which he occupied till his death. He again toured in Scotland in 1814, and in that year published 'The Excursion' (q.v.), of which a part, 'The Story of Margaret', had been written many years before (1797). In the same year was written 'Laodamia', on the legend of the wife of Protesilaus, who is allowed by Hermes to converse with the shade of her husband killed before Troy, and dies when the shade disappears. 'Dion' and the 'Ode to Lycoris', further poems on classical subjects, followed in 1816 and 1817. 'Peter Bell' (q.v., written in 1798) and 'The Waggoner' (q.v., written in 1805) appeared in 1819. To this year belong the 'River Duddon' sonnets, published in 1820. The 'Ecclesiastical Sonnets' appeared in 1822. He travelled on the Continent in 1820, 1823, and 1828, publishing in 1822 a volume of poems entitled 'Memorials of a Tour on the Continent'. He went to Ireland in 1829, to Scotland in 1831 (writing 'Yarrow Revisited', published in 1835), and again in 1833. A tour in Italy in 1837 inspired several pieces, published in his last volume, 'Poems chiefly of Early and Late Years' (1842). He resigned his place in the stamp office and received a civil list pension in 1842. In 1843 he succeeded Southey as poet laureate. His later writings show him in politics converted from a revolutionist to an opponent of liberalism. He was buried in Grasmere churchyard.

Mention should be made of two prose works by Wordsworth: his essay 'Concerning the Relations of Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal . . . as affected by the Convention of Cintra', published in 1809, in which he deprecates the lack of vigour shown by the English policy; and 'A Description of the Scenery of the Lakes in the North of England', written in 1810 as an introduction to T. Wilkinson's 'Select Views in Cumberland' and republished with additions in 1822, an interesting account of the county and its inhabitants.

Wordsworth's 'Poetical and Prose Works', together with Dorothy Wordsworth's 'Journals', edited by W. Knight, appeared in 1896. 'Letters of the Wordsworth Family, 1787-1855' (chiefly of William Wordsworth) were edited by W. Knight in 1907.

World, The, a periodical that appeared in 1753-6, owned by Robert Dodsley and managed by Edward Moore. Chesterfield and Horace Walpole were among the contributors.

World's Classics, a series of cheap reprints of standard works of English literature, but including also some translations (e.g. of Tolstoy, Pope's 'Homer', Dryden's 'Virgil', Florio's 'Montaigne', and others). The series began in 1901 and is still in progress; some 500 volumes have been published.

Worldly Wiseman, Mr., in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), an inhabitant of the town of Carnal Policy, who tries to dissuade Christian from going on his pilgrimage.

Worms, DIET OF, see Luther.

Worthies of the World, THE NINE, were 'three Paynims, three Jews, and three Christian men', viz. Hector of Troy, Alexander the Great, and Julius Caesar; Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabaeus; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon (Caxton, Preface to the 'Morte Darthur'). The list of worthies in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost', v. ii, is not quite the same, for it includes Pompey and Hercules.

Worthies of England, The, by Fuller (q.v.), published in 1662, after his death.

The work is a kind of gazetteer of England, in which the author takes the counties one by one, describes their physical characteristics, natural commodities, and manufactures, with quaint comments on each. After these come short biographies, not devoid of humour, of the local saints, martyrs (i.e. persons who suffered for the Protestant faith), prelates, statesmen, judges, notable soldiers, sailors, and writers; and lists of the gentry and sheriffs.

WOTTON, SIR HENRY (1568-1639), was educated at Winchester and New and Queen's Colleges, Oxford, and entered the Middle Temple. He became agent and secretary to the earl of Essex, 1595, and was employed by him in collecting foreign intelligence. He was ambassador at the court of Venice and employed on various other diplomatic missions from 1604 to 1624. While on a visit to Augsburg he wrote in his host's album the famous definition of an ambassador, 'vir bonus peregre missus ad mentiendum Reipublicae causa', 'which he would have been content should have been thus englished "An Ambassador is an honest man, sent to lie abroad for the good of his country"' (Walton); Scioppius mentioned this in his printed diatribe against James I (1611). Wotton was provost of Eton, 1624-39. He published 'Elements of Architecture' (1624). A collection of his poetical and other writings appeared under the title 'Reliquiae Wottonianae' (containing his famous 'Character of a Happy Life' and 'On his Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia'—"You meaner beauties of the night") in 1651 (enlarged editions, 1672 and 1685). His 'Life' was written by Izaak Walton (1670). His 'Life and Letters', by L. Pearsall Smith, appeared in 1907. There is a handy modern edition of his poems, together with those of other 'courtly poets', by John Hannah (1870).

Would-be, SIR POLITICK and LADY, characters in Jonson's 'Volpone' (q.v.).

Wragg is in custody: M. Arnold (q.v.) in the first of his 'Essays in Criticism', commenting on the exuberant satisfaction of Mr. Roebuck with the state of England, quotes a newspaper paragraph ending with these words. Wragg was a girl who had left the workhouse with her young illegitimate child. The child had been found strangled.

Wrayburn, EUGENE, a character in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

Wreck of the Hesperus, The, a poem by Longfellow (q.v.), published in 1841.

Wren, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1631-1723), son of Christopher Wren, who was dean of Windsor, 1635-8, and nephew of Matthew Wren, the bishop of Ely, who spent eighteen years in the Tower, was educated at Westminster School and Wadham College, Oxford. He became a fellow of All Souls in 1653. He subsequently devoted much attention to a variety of scientific subjects and was a prominent member of the circle which was incorporated as the Royal Society (q.v.). He was Savilian professor of astronomy (1661) and a forerunner of Newton in many of his mathematical discoveries. He became surveyor-general to Charles II's works in 1661, and built the chapel of Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1663-5, the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, in 1664-9, and the chapel of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1668. Wren prepared a scheme for the remodelling of London after the fire of 1666, which unfortunately was not adopted (his plans for the purpose remain at All Souls). He was engaged from 1668 for many years on the demolition and reconstruction of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, the work for which he is most celebrated. His first project had to be abandoned, but he obtained in 1675 royal approval for a design which he modified into that of the existing cathedral (the choir was opened for service in 1697). He made designs for rebuilding Temple Bar, and built no fewer than fifty-two churches in London, the monument commemorating the Fire of London, the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, Tom Tower at Christ Church, Oxford, Chelsea Hospital, Marlborough House, London, and many additions to Kensington and Hampton Court Palaces. He also prepared designs for the western towers of Westminster Abbey, which were completed, with new details, by his successors. Wren was a man of amiable and modest character, integrity, and strong Christian faith. He was buried in St. Paul's.

Wren, JENNY, the business name of the doll's dressmaker in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.). Her real name was Fanny Cleaver.

WRIGHT, THOMAS (1810-77), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, was instrumental in founding the Camden and Percy Societies (qq.v.). He published four volumes of 'Early English Poetry' in 1836, and in 1840 edited 'The Vision and Creed of Piers Plowman'. His 'Biographia Literaria of the Anglo-Saxon Period' appeared in 1842, and 'Anecdota Literaria' in 1844. He published many other works, some in collaboration with J. O. Halliwell (afterwards Halliwell-Phillipps), on subjects connected with the literature, history, and customs of England, including 'Queen Elizabeth and her Times' (1838) and a 'History of Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages' (1862).

Wrong Bos, The, see Tontine.

Wronghead, SIR FRANCIS, a character in Vanbrugh and Cibber's 'The Provok'd Husband' (q.v.).

Wulfla, see Ulfilas.

WULFSTAN (d. 1023), archbishop of York, author of homilies in the vernacular, including a famous address to the English ('Sermo Lupi ad Anglos'), in which he describes the desolation of the country owing to the Danish raids, and castigates the vices and demoralization of the people.

Wulfstan or WOLSTAN, ST. (1012?-95), was educated at the abbey of Peterborough and became a monk of the priory of Worcester, where he was successively schoolmaster, precentor, sacristan, and prior. He was appointed bishop of Worcester in 1062. He assisted Harold on his accession, but subsequently made submission to the Conqueror. He was the only Englishman left in possession of his see by William I. He preached at Bristol in condemnation of the slave trade practised by English merchants against their fellow countrymen, and procured its abandonment. He was buried at Worcester (of which he had rebuilt the cathedral) and is commemorated on 19 January.

Wuthering Heights, a novel by E. Brontë (q.v.), published in 1847.

The central figure of this sombre and highly imaginative story is Heathcliff, a gipsy waif of unknown parentage, picked up by Mr. Earnshaw in the streets of Liverpool and brought home and reared by him as one of his own children. Bullied and humiliated after the elder Earnshaw's death by Earnshaw's son Hindley, Heathcliff's passionate and ferocious nature finds its complement in Earnshaw's daughter, Catherine, and he falls passionately in love with her. Overhearing her say that it would degrade her to marry him, he leaves the house. Returning three years later he finds Catherine married to the insignificant Edgar Linton. Being possessed of money, he is welcomed by Hindley, a coarse-natured gambler, who is now married. Heathcliff's vindictive nature henceforth has full play. His violent love for Catherine brings her to her grave at the birth of her daughter Cathy. He marries Edgar's sister Isabella, not loving her, and cruelly maltreats her. He gets Hindley and his son Hareton completely in his power, brutalizing the latter in revenge for Hindley's treatment of himself when a child. Later he lures the young Cathy to his house and forces a marriage between her and his own sickly and repulsive son, with a view to getting Linton's property eventually into his own power. After his son's death, affection springs up between Cathy and Hareton, and Cathy sets about the latter's education. Heathcliff's nature has now worn itself out. He longs for the death that will reunite him with Catherine. His attempt to destroy the houses of Earnshaw and Linton fails in the end from lack of resolution, and at his death Hareton and Cathy are left to be happy together.

WYATT, SIR THOMAS (1503?-42), was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He held various posts at home and abroad, including that of ambassador to Charles V (1537-9), in the service of Henry VIII. He was a lover of Anne Boleyn before her marriage with Henry VIII, and was temporarily imprisoned in the Tower of London in 1536 on the discovery of Anne's alleged post-nuptial infidelities. He was again imprisoned in the Tower as an ally of Thomas Cromwell, but released in 1541. He was a close student of foreign literature, and (with Surrey, q.v.) introduced the sonnet from Italy into England. His first published works appeared as 'Certayne Psalmes . . . drawn into Englyshe meter' (1549), and many of his poems, which include rondeaux, lyrics, and satires in heroic couplets, were issued by Tottel (q.v.) in his 'Miscellany' (1557). He was a lyric poet of the purest note. His portrait after Holbein is in the National Portrait Gallery. He was the father of Sir T. Wyatt, who tried to raise an insurrection against the Spanish marriage of Mary I (1554).

Wybrow, ANTHONY, a character in George Eliot's 'Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story' (see Scenes of Clerical Life).

WYCHERLEY

WYCHERLEY, WILLIAM (1640–1716), of a Shropshire family, was educated first in France, then at Queen's College, Oxford. His first play, 'Love in a Wood, or St. James's Park', brought him the favour of the duchess of Cleveland, the king's mistress. Some years later he secretly married the widowed countess of Drogheda, daughter of the first earl of Radnor, and incurred thereby the displeasure of Charles II, who had offered him the tutorship of his son, the duke of Richmond. Wycherley's first play, 'Love in a Wood', above referred to, a comedy of intrigue of which St. James's Park furnishes the scene, was acted in 1671 and published in 1672. His second play, 'The Gentleman Dancing-Master' (q.v.), was acted in 1671 or 1672 (published in 1673); 'The Country Wife' (q.v.) in 1672 or 1673 (published in 1675); his last play, 'The Plain Dealer' (q.v.), probably in 1674 (published in 1677). His 'Miscellany Poems' (published in 1704) led to a friendship with Pope, who revised many of his writings. His 'Posthumous Works' appeared in 1728. Lamb classes him with Congreve as one of the best masters of 'Artificial Comedy' ('Last Essays of Elia'). Wycherley was labelled by Macaulay as licentious and indecent. The present view of him is that he was a satirist more savage than Congreve, but a poet less sensitive. Contemporaries named him 'manly Wycherley'.

WYCLIFFE, JOHN (c. 1320–84), was born, according to Leland, at Ipreswell or Hipswell near Richmond in Yorkshire, and probably educated at Balliol College, Oxford. There is a tradition also of his being at Queen's and at Merton, and he appears to have been master of Balliol. A realist in philosophy and a religious reformer, he advocated the poverty of the clergy and attacked church endowments. His 'De Dominio Divino' (1376) expounds the doctrine that all authority is founded on grace; which leads to the idea that wicked kings, popes, and priests should have no power. Wycliffe was in consequence banned by Pope Gregory XI. Moved to bolder defiance, he now attacked the papacy and after the Great Schism (q.v.) of 1378 declared it 'Antichrist itself'. He went on to condemn the whole hierarchy, to deny the doctrine of transubstantiation, and to assert the right of every man to examine the Bible for himself. He was condemned by an ecclesiastical court for his theological doctrines, and retired to Lutterworth, where he died. The Lollards adopted and exaggerated his views. From a literary standpoint he is chiefly notable as having instituted the first translation into English of the whole Bible, himself translating the Gospels, probably the New Testament, and possibly part of the Old Testament. Why he was not burnt alive, no one knows; but his remains were disinterred (by Fleming, bishop of Lincoln, the founder of Lincoln College, Oxford, which was later to be the home of Wesley) and thrown into the river Swift (a tributary of the Avon), whence the prophecy:

The Avon to the Severn runs,
The Severn to the sea,
And Wycliffe's dust shall spread abroad
Wide as the waters be.

The Hussite movement in Bohemia was based on Wycliffe's influence, and Huss's works, which were largely copies of Wycliffe's, in turn influenced Luther. The standard life of Wycliffe is by H. B. Workman (1926). See also Bible (The English).

Wycliffe, OSWALD and WILFRID, characters in Scott's 'Rokeby' (q.v.).

Wykeham, WILLIAM OF, see William of Wykeham.

Wykehamist, a member, past or present, of Winchester College. Among Wykehamists famous in a literary connexion may be mentioned Grocyn, Udall, Sir H. Wotton, Sir T. Browne, Otway, W. Somerville, E. Young, William Collins, J. Warton, Sydney Smith, T. Arnold, A. Trollope, F. Buckland, and L. Johnson (qq.v.).

WYLIE, ELINORHOYT (Mrs. W. R. Benet) (1885–1928), American poet and novelist; author of 'Black Armor' (poems; 1923), 'Mortal Image' (novel), 'Nets to Catch the Wind' (poems), 'The Venetian Glass Nephew' (novel).

Wynd, HAL O' THE, Henry Smith, the hero of Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

Wynkyn de Worde, see Worde.

WYNTOUN, ANDREW OF (1350?–1420?), a canon regular of St. Andrews and author of 'The Orygynale Cronykil', a metrical history of Scotland from the beginning of the world to the accession of James I. He becomes a valuable authority in the later part of the work. Among his stories is that of Macbeth and the witches, Malcolm, and Macduff. The chronicle was first published in 1795 from a manuscript in the Royal Library.

Wyvern, a chimerical animal (in heraldry and romance) imagined as a winged dragon with two feet like those of an eagle and a serpent-like barbed tail. The word is from Old French wyvere, a serpent.

X

X-Rays, see Röntgen.

Xanadu, in Coleridge's 'Kubla Khan' (q.v.), the place where the Khan decreed 'a stately pleasure-dome'. The name is taken from the passage in 'Purchas his Pilgrimes' which inspired the poem. 'This citie is three dayes journey northeastward to the citie Xandu, which the great Chan Cublay now reigning built.' The passage goes on to describe the enclosure or park with meadows, rivers, deer, and 'a faire wood, in which he hath built a royall House on pillars gilded and vernished' (described in the margin as 'A goodly house of pleasure'). See 'Purchas his Pilgrimes', Hakluyt Soc., 1906, vol. xi, p. 231, 'Marco Polo'. J. L. Lowes in his 'The Road to Xanadu' (1927) reconstructs, with the aid of one of Coleridge's note-books (of the years probably 1795-8), the process by which the images in the poem were drawn from various sources.

Xanthian Marbles, a collection of sculptures, now in the British Museum, discovered in 1838 by Sir Charles Fellows (1799-1860), traveller and archaeologist, in the ruins of Xanthus, an ancient city of Asia Minor.

Xanthus, one of the horses of Achilles ('Xanthus and Balius of Podarges' strain', Pope's 'Iliad'), who, when chidden for leaving Patroclus dead on the field, warned Achilles of his own approaching death (Homer, 'Iliad', xix, ad fin.).

Xanthus, in Homer, is also a name of the river Scamander (q.v.).

Xanthippê, the wife of Socrates (q.v.), said to have been a scold.

Xavier, St. FRANCIS (1506-52), a Spaniard, one of the founders of the Society of Jesus, and a famous missionary in the Far East. He is commemorated on 3 December.

Xenocrátēs (396-314 B.C.), a native of Chalcedon and a Platonic philosopher, the successor of Speusippus as head of the Academy (q.v.). His character is said to have been in harmony with his philosophy, for when sent on embassy to Philip of Macedon, he refused a present from him of fifty talents.

XENOPHĀNĒS (c. 576-480 B.C.), a Greek poet, born at Colophon, who migrated to Elea, and was formerly thought to have been the founder of the Eleatic School of philosophy. He was a satirist who attacked the current religion and asserted the unity of an all-pervading God. He inferred from shells and fossils found in the quarries of Syracuse that the earth had undergone great changes and risen from the sea.

XENOPHON, an Athenian, probably born about 430 B.C., was, when young, a pupil of Socrates. He joined the Greek contingent raised by the younger Cyrus in 401 for his war with Artaxerxes. After the battle of Cunaxa, Xenophon was elected one of the generals of the Greek force, which was left in a dangerous situation between the Tigris and Euphrates, and took a leading part in the memorable retreat thence to the Black Sea. He then accepted service under Agesilaus, king of Sparta, against the Persians in 396, and was present on the Spartan side at Coronea in 394, as a consequence of which his exile was decreed at Athens. After this he settled at Scillus, near Olympia, where some of his works were composed. The sentence of exile was finally revoked, but Xenophon probably died at Corinth about 355.

Xenophon's principal writings include: the 'Anabasis', or history of the expedition of the younger Cyrus and the retreat of the Greeks; the 'Hellenica', a continuation of the history of Thucydides down to the battle of Mantinea (362); the 'Cyropaedia', a political romance based on the history of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy; the 'Oeconomicus', on the management of a household and property; treatises on the Horse, on Hunting (authorship doubtful), and on the duties of a cavalry commander; and the 'Memorabilia' of Socrates and the 'Symposium', in which works he expounds the doctrines and character of the great philosopher.

Xerxes, king of Persia (485-465 B.C.), the son of Darius Hystaspes. He bridged the Hellespont with boats, invaded Greece, overcame the resistance of Leonidas and 300 Spartans at Thermopylae (q.v.), but was defeated at Salamis (480 B.C.). He is the King Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther.

Ximena (in French CHIMÈNE), the wife of the Cid (q.v.). Cibber (q.v.) wrote an adaptation of Corneille's 'Cid', called 'Ximena, or the Heroic Daughter' (1719).

Ximenes, FRANCISCO (1436-1517), a Spanish cardinal and statesman, who printed the Complutensian (q.v.) Polyglot Bible and founded the University of Alcalá. But he also destroyed countless Arabic works of learning, especially after the taking of Granada.

Yale University, originally founded as a school at Saybrook, Connecticut, in 1701, was transferred to New Haven, Connecticut, in 1716 and called Yale College in consequence of benefactions received from Elihu Yale (1648-1721), a native of Boston, Massachusetts, who came to England, entered the service of the East India Company, and became governor of Madras. It received a new charter in 1745 and assumed the name of Yale University in 1887.

Yama, in Hindu theology, the ruler of the world of the dead. In post-Vedic writings he is also the judge of men, who punishes the wicked.

Yankee, a nickname for a native or inhabitant of the United States. During the War of Secession it was applied by the Confederates to the soldiers of the Federal army. Its origin is uncertain. It has been derived from the Cherokee eanke, slave, coward, said to have been applied to the inhabitants of New England by the Virginians for not assisting them in a war with the Cherokees; and explained as an Indian corruption of the word English. Perhaps the most plausible explanation is that it comes from the Dutch yanke, diminutive of Jan, John. [OED.] In America it is used only of the New Englander and New Yorker.

Yankee Doodle: according to 'Our National Ballads' by C. A. Boune, the origin of this song is to be traced to 1755, when a conglomerate army of English regular troops and provincial militia was being formed under General Amherst on the bank of the Hudson for the French and Indian War. The raw American volunteers were a subject of mockery to the English, and Dr. Richard Shuckburgh palmed off on them 'the "Nankee Doodle" tune of Cromwell's time' as a celebrated air of martial music and set to it words of an absurd song which he called 'The Yankee's Return from Camp'. The tune and song became extremely popular, and developed into the battle-song of the new republic in the War of Independence. C. C. Bombaugh, in his 'Gleanings', thinks that the song probably originated in Holland, where a song with the refrain has long been sung by harvest labourers.

Yardley Oak, a poem by Cowper (q.v.), written in 1791.

Yarico, see Inkle and Yarico.

YARRELL, WILLIAM (1784-1856), zoologist, author of the 'History of British Birds'

(1843) and the 'History of British Fishes' (1836).

Yarrow, THE, a river in Selkirkshire that joins the Ettrick near Selkirk. It has inspired many poets, from the author of the ballad 'The Dowie Houns of Yarrow' onwards, including Hamilton of Bangour, the Rev. John Logan (1748-88), James Hogg, Scott, and Wordsworth.

Yaughan, 'Go, get thee to Yaughan; fetch me a stoup of liquor' (says the first gravedigger in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet', v. i). 'Yaughan' was perhaps an anglicization of the German 'Johann' and the name of an actual tavern-keeper in London.

Year, THE, in England from the 13th cent. began on 25 March (the Annunciation), having previously begun on Christmas Day. To harmonize the legal year with that of Roman Catholic countries (since 1583) and of Scotland (since 1600), also with common usage in the kingdom, an Act of 1751 prescribed that from 1752 the year should begin on 1 January. See Appendix IV.

Year Books, reports of English common law cases for the period 1292-1534, of great interest from a historical as well as a legal standpoint. They were succeeded by the law 'Reports'. F. W. Maitland (q.v.) began editing them, and the work is still going on.

Yeast, a novel by C. Kingsley (q.v.), published in 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1848, and as a separate book in 1851.

This was the first of Kingsley's novels and is crude as a literary work. It deals with some of the social and religious problems of the day (the miserable conditions of the rustic labourer, the game laws, and the Tractarian movement), largely by means of dialogues between the hero and various other characters. The story is that of the reactions of the generous but undisciplined nature of Lancelot Smith to the influences exercised on him by the philosophical Cornish game-keeper Tregarva, the worldly Colonel Bracebridge, the Romanizing curate Luke, Lancelot's orthodox love Argemone Lavington, and the philanthropic banker Barnakill; he is seen suffering the loss, first of his fortune, and then of Argemone. The story ends in a vague and semi-mystical indication that Lancelot is to seek his salvation in contributing to the regeneration of England.

YEATS, WILLIAM BUTLER (1865-1939), was born in Dublin and educated at the Godolphin School, Hammersmith, and Erasmus School, Dublin. He studied art for three years, but adopted literature as a profession when 21. Inspired by the Gaelic movement, he helped to found an Irish Literary Society in London, and another in Dublin; and subsequently applied himself to the creation of an Irish national theatre, an achievement which, with the help of Lady Gregory (q.v.) and others, was partly realized in 1899, when his play, 'The Countess Cathleen' (q.v., 1892), was acted in Dublin. The English actors engaged by the Irish Literary Theatre for the purpose gave place in 1902 to an Irish amateur company, by which Yeats's 'Cathleen ni Houlihan' was produced in that year. The Irish National Theatre Company was thereafter created, and with the help of Miss A. E. Horniman acquired the Abbey Theatre, in Dublin, which has since been the home of the famous Irish Players. Yeats's other best-known play is 'The Land of Heart's Desire' (1894). But his chief eminence was as a lyric poet, and some of the best of his work is contained in the collected 'Poems' of 1895 and 'The Wind among the Reeds' (1899). Yeats's publications include: 'The Wanderings of Oisín and other Poems' (1889), 'The Celtic Twilight' (1893), 'The Poems of William Blake' (1893), 'The Works of William Blake' (with E. J. Ellis, 1893), 'The Secret Rose' (1897), 'The Shadowy Waters' (1900), 'Ideas of Good and Evil' (essays, 1903), 'Where there is Nothing' (1903), 'In the Seven Woods' (1903), 'The Tables of the Law' (1904, privately printed 1897), 'The Hour-Glass, The Pot of Broth, &c.' (plays, 1904), 'The King's Threshold, On Baile's Strand' (plays, 1904), 'Stories of Red Hanrahan' (1904), 'Deirdre' (play, 1907), 'Discoveries' (essays, 1907), 'Collected Works' (1908), 'The Green Helmet and other Poems' (1910), 'J. M. Synge and the Ireland of his Time' (1911), 'Plays for an Irish Theatre' (1912), 'The Wild Swans at Coole' (poems, 1917), 'Per Amica Silentia Lunae' (essays, 1918), 'The Cutting of an Agate' (essays, 1919), 'Seven Poems and a Fragment' (1922), 'Reveries over Childhood' (autobiographical) and 'The Trembling of the Veil' (privately printed in 1922) (1926), 'A Vision' (philosophy, 1925).

Yellow Book, The, an illustrated quarterly which appeared from 1894 to 1897. Many distinguished writers and artists contributed to it, notably Aubrey Beardsley and Max Beerbohm, Henry James, Edmund Gosse, Walter Sickert, &c.

Yellow Dwarf, The, one of the fairy tales of the Comtesse d'Aulnoy (d. 1705).

A queen consults the Fairy of the Desert about the marriage of her daughter, the Princess Toubelle, who wishes to remain single. The Yellow Dwarf offers himself as suitor, and obtains from the queen the promise of the princess's hand by threats. The princess to escape this fate consents to marry the king of the Gold Mines. But the marriage is prevented by the Yellow Dwarf; king and princess both perish, and are turned into palm trees.

Yellow Journalism, a name given to the sensational journalism of America which developed about 1880 (see Pulitzer). The term is derived from the appearance in 1895 of a number of the 'New York World' in which a child in a yellow dress ('The Yellow Kid') was the central figure of the cartoon, this being an experiment in colour-printing designed to attract purchasers. [OED.] The YELLOW PRESS is a term applied in England to sensational periodicals:

Amid that Press of Yellow hue

One sheet was yellower yet,

It was (Great Heavens!) the Oxford University Gazette.

(A. D. Godley, 'In a Strange Land', 1913.)

Yellow Peril, The, the supposed danger of a destructive invasion of Europe by Mongolian peoples. It was much talked of in the latter part of the 19th cent.

Yellow-backs, cheap editions of novels, so called from being bound in yellow boards. They were the ordinary 'railway novels' of the seventies and eighties of the last century.

Yellowley, TRIPTOLEMUS and BARBARA, characters in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Yellowplush, MR. CHARLES JAMES, a footman, a character assumed by Thackeray (q.v.), as observer of manners and also as literary critic, in several of his earlier works, 'The Yellowplush Correspondence' (1837-8) and 'Mr. Yellowplush's Ajew' (1838), reprinted as 'Memoirs of Mr. C. J. Yellowplush' ('Miscellanies', 1856). The 'Memoirs' contain the story of the Hon. Algernon Deuceace (q.v.). 'Jeames's Diary' was printed in 'Punch', Nov. 1845-Feb. 1846, and was reprinted as 'The Diary of C. Jeames de la Pluche' (see Jeames) in 'Miscellanies' (1856).

Yeo, SALVATION, a character in C. Kingsley's 'Westward Ho' (q.v.).

Yeobright, CLYM, THOMASIN, and MRS., characters in Hardy's 'The Return of the Native' (q.v.).

Yeoman's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Ygerne, see Igraine.

Yggdrasil, in northern mythology, the world tree, an ash, representing all living nature, which connects heaven, earth, and hell. Under its branches sit the Norns (q.v.). The dragon Nidhögg gnaws at its root in Nifheim, an eagle sits at its summit, and the squirrel Ratatösk runs up and down to sow strife between the two. Our maypoles and Christmas trees are said to be derived from this conception. See also Jack and the Beanstalk.

Yiddish, derived, either directly or through the German-Jewish jiddisch, from the German jüdisch, Jewish; the language used by Jews in Europe and America, consisting mainly of German, with Balto-Slavic or Hebrew words, and printed in Hebrew characters.

Ymir, in Scandinavian mythology, the primeval giant who was nourished by the milk of the cow Audhumla; his vast bulk filled a portion of the original abyss. He was the father of the frost-giants.

Ynol, in Tennyson's 'Geraint and Enid' (q.v.), the father of Enid.

YONGE, CHARLOTTE MARY (1823-1901), was born, and educated by her father, at Otterbourne in Hants. She came under the influence of John Keble (q.v.), vicar of the neighbouring parish of Hursley, who urged her to expound his religious views in fiction. 'The Heir of Redclyffe' (q.v., 1853) first brought her popular success. 'Heartsease' followed in 1854, 'The Daisy Chain' (of which 'The Trial' is a continuation) in 1856, and 'Dynevor Terrace' in 1857. Her early historical romances included 'The Little Duke' (1854), 'The Lances of Lynwood' (1855), 'The Prince and the Page' (1865), 'The Dove in the Eagle's Nest' (1866), and 'The Caged Lion' (1870). She edited 'The Monthly Packet' from 1851 to 1808, to which she contributed 'Comeos from English History'. She issued in all 160 books, including a life of Bishop Patteson (1874), a 'History of France' (1879), and a 'Life of Hannah More' (1888).

Yorick, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v., v. i), the king's jester, whose skull the grave-diggers throw up when digging Ophelia's grave. He is perhaps to be identified with Tarlton (q.v.). (2) In Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.), 'the lively, witty, sensible, and heedless parson', of Danish extraction, and probably a descendant of Hamlet's Yorick. Sterne adopted 'Yorick' as a pseudonym in his 'Sentimental Journey' (q.v.).

Yorkshire Tragedy, A, a play published in 1608 and stated in the title to be written by Shakespeare, but internal evidence and the late date make it extremely improbable that he had any part in its authorship.

The play is based on certain murders actually committed in 1603. The husband, a brutal and depraved gamester, suddenly filled with remorse when he realizes his shame, murders his two children and stabs his docile and devoted wife.

Yorktown, on the shore of the Chesapeake, where, in 1781, the British army under Lord Cornwallis was blockaded by the American army and the French fleet under De Grasse. The capitulation of the former practically brought the American War of Independence to an end.

YOUNG, ARTHUR (1741-1820), the son of a Suffolk clergyman, became well known as an agricultural theorist, though unsuccessful as a practical farmer. He wrote a large number of works on agricultural subjects and edited the periodical 'Annals of Agriculture' (1784-1809), which extended to forty-seven volumes (parts of another volume were published in 1812 and 1813). His power of political and social observation is shown by his 'Political Arithmetic' (1774) and his 'Tour in Ireland' (1780), but his fame rests chiefly on his 'Travels in France' (q.v., 1792). He became secretary to the Board of Agriculture in 1793. Young was connected with the Burneys, and his country house, Bradfield Hall, Suffolk, is described in Fanny Burney's 'Camilla'. He took Fanny Burney to hear Warren Hastings's trial in Westminster Hall and she was charmed with him. He went blind about 1811, and spent a sad old age.

Young, BRIGHAM (1801-77), Mormon (q.v.) leader, first saw the 'Book of Mormon' in 1830, was appointed president of the Mormon Church in 1844, led the Mormons to Utah in 1847, founded Salt Lake City, and was appointed governor of Utah territory in 1851.

YOUNG, EDWARD (1683-1765), born at Upham, near Winchester, and educated at Winchester and New College and Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He received a law fellowship at All Souls College, Oxford, in 1708, and, having been disappointed in his hopes of a parliamentary or professional career, took orders and became rector of Welwyn in 1730, where he spent the remainder of his long life, never receiving the ecclesiastical promotion to which many of his contemporaries thought him entitled. In 1731 he married Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the second earl of Lichfield. His literary work includes two plays, 'Busiris', a tragedy of violence and ungoverned passion, successfully produced at Drury Lane in 1719, and 'The Revenge' (q.v.), another tragedy, produced at the same theatre in 1721. In 1725-8 he published a series of satires under the title 'The Universal Passion' (the Love of Fame), which were witty and brilliant and were much admired until they were thrown into the shade by the satires of Pope. In 1742-5 appeared the work by which he is principally remembered, 'The Complaint, or Night Thoughts (q.v.) on Life, Death, and Immortality', which immediately became very popular. He published 'The Brothers', a tragedy written long before, in 1753, and 'Resignation', his last considerable poem, in 1762. Dr. Johnson winds up his life of Young with the words—'But, with all his defects, he was a man of genius and a poet.'

Young, PATRICK, see Clement I.

Young Plan, THE, a financial scheme for the settlement of German Reparations which superseded the Dawes Plan (q.v.). It was evolved by an international committee of experts which sat in 1929 under the chairmanship of Mr. Owen D. Young, an American. It fixed the final figure of German liabilities under the Treaty of Versailles (an average annuity of about £100,000,000 for 37 years, and a maximum of £80,000,000 for another 21 years). The organs of control set up under the Dawes Plan were abolished, and the Bank of International Settlement was created to act as general trustee ('The Times', Annual Review, 1930).

YOUNG WATERS

Young Waters, a Scottish ballad, included in Percy's 'Reliques'. Young Waters comes riding into the town and the queen declares his is the fairest face her eyes did ever see. The jealous king has Waters fettered and put to death.

Yuga, in the division of time set out in Hindu mythology, is a period comprising a certain number (1,200 to 4,800) of divine years, each divine year being equal to 360 years of mortal men. There are four Yugas, called the Krita, Treta, Dvapara, and Kali Yuga. The first was the golden age and endured for $4,800 \times 360 = 1,728,000$ years of mortals. Each of those which followed showed a decline of righteousness and happiness as compared with its predecessor. The present, the Kali Yuga, is the worst. Its duration is $1,200 \times 360 = 432,000$ years of mortals.

Z

Zadig, a satirical tale by Voltaire (q.v.).

Zadkiel, an angel of Rabbinical lore; also the pseudonym of William Lilly (q.v.) and of Richard James Morrison (1795-1874), author of the 'Herald of Astrology' (1831, continued as 'Zadkiel's Almanac').

Zagreüs, see Orphicism.

Zāl, in the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.), the father of Rustem (q.v.).

Zambullo, DON CLEOFAS, the hero of Le Sage's 'Le Diable Boiteux' (q.v.).

Zamzummins, giants, 'a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims' (Deut. ii. 20-1).

Zanga, a character in E. Young's 'The Revenge' (q.v.).

ZANGWILL, ISRAEL (1864-1926), was a prominent member of Jewish literary society in England, as a lecturer, novelist, and playwright. He was author, among many novels, of 'Children of the Ghetto' (1892, dramatized by him in 1899), 'Merely Mary Ann' (1893), 'Ghetto Tragedies' (1893), 'The Master' (1895), 'Dreamers of the Ghetto' (1899), 'Ghetto Comedies' (1907).

Zany, from the Italian zani, the name of servants who act as clowns in the 'Commedia dell' Arte', a comic performer attending on a clown, acrobat, or mountebank, who imitates his master's acts in a ludicrously awkward way. Hence an attendant, follower

ZEITGEIST

Yule, from the Old English geol, Christmas day or Christmastide, corresponding to the Old Norse jól, a heathen feast lasting twelve days, and (later) Christmas.

Yule, SIR HENRY (1820-89), see Cathay. He was, with Arthur Coke Burnell, originator of 'Hobson-Jobson' (q.v.).

Yvetot, see Roi d'Yvetot.

Ywain and Gawain, a verse-romance of the 14th cent., translated from the French of Chrétien de Troyes. Ywain, a knight of the Round Table, is the hero, and Gawain plays a secondary part. Ywain, with the magic help of the damsel Lunet, kills the knight of a castle and falls in love with his mourning widow, Alundyne, whom, again with Lunet's help, he persuades to marry him. At Gawain's instance he leaves her to go in search of fame, assisted by a lion, and forgets his wife. He takes the part of one of Gawain's sisters in an attempt to get all her father's property, while Gawain takes the part of the other. Ywain and Gawain fight without knowing each other. At nightfall they learn each other's name and are reconciled. Lunet effects the reconciliation of Ywain and Alundyne.

(almost always in a contemptuous sense); or a buffoon; or a fool, simpleton. The Italian zani is the Venetian and Lombardic form of Gianni = Giovanni, John. [OED.]

Zanzis, a supposed poet referred to by Chaucer in 'Troilus and Cryseyde', iv. 414. The name perhaps arises from a misreading of Boccaccio's text which Chaucer is translating.

Zapolya, a 'dramatic poem' in humble imitation of 'The Winter's Tale', by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), published in 1817. Zapolya is a dowager queen of Illyria driven from the throne by the usurper Emerick. After a twenty years' interval she returns to power with her son Bethlen.

Zara, a character in Congreve's 'The Mourning Bride' (q.v.).

Zaraph, the lover of Nama in Moore's 'The Loves of the Angels' (q.v.).

ZELICA

Zelica, the heroine of 'The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan', one of the tales in Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.).

Zélide, the name given to herself in a self-portrait by ISABELLA VAN TUYLL VAN SEROOSKERKEN, also known as BELLE DE ZUYLEN, and after her marriage as MME DE CHARRIÈRE (1740-1805), a Dutchwoman of good family, great intelligence and originality, and considerable beauty. She numbered among her many suitors James Boswell, who quickly reconciled himself to her rejection of his hand. Declining more brilliant matches, she married her brother's Swiss tutor, the dull but worthy M. de Charrière. Her unhappy married life was brightened by an ardent intellectual friendship with Benjamin Constant, until she was ousted by Mme de Staël. She wrote in French a number of novels, of which the best known are 'Lettres Neuchâtelaises' (1784), 'Mistress Henley' (1784), 'Lettres écrites de Lausanne' (1787). There is an interesting account of her life in Geoffrey Scott's 'Portrait of Zélide'.

Zelmane, in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.), the name assumed by Pyrocles when disguised as a woman.

Zeluco, a novel by Dr. J. Moore (q.v.), published in 1786.

Zeluco, sprung of a noble Sicilian family, is a thorough-paced scoundrel, actuated in all his doings by lust, cruelty, selfishness, or revenge; his character is redeemed solely by a certain intrepidity. The novel is a long story of his misdeeds. As a child he crushes a pet sparrow to death; he drives his widowed mother to her grave heart-broken; has a slave beaten to death in the West Indies; and engages in various discreditable love-affairs. He sets himself to get possession of a beautiful and high-minded girl, and to effect his purpose stages an attack on her by robbers, from whom she is rescued by himself. He kills their child and drives her mad, finally meeting his own death from a stiletto under scandalous circumstances. In spite of the repulsive and improbable character of much of the tale, it is told with considerable humour. Zeluco sometimes overreaches himself and meets with his deserts. And there are three amusing servants: Dawson, who writes an entertaining description of a visit to Paris, and Buchanan and Targe, the Scotsmen who quarrel about the character of Mary Queen of Scots.

Zend-Avesta, the sacred writings of the Parsees, literally the Avesta (q.v.) with the interpretation. The word Zend came to be used to denote the old Iranian language in which the Avesta is written.

Zenelophon, see Cophetua.

Zeno, of Citium in Cyprus, the founder of the Stoic school of philosophy (close of the 4th cent. B.C.). He was shipwrecked as a young man on the coast of Attica, while on a trading voyage, settled at Athens, and devoted himself to the study of philosophy. For his ethical teaching see under Stoics. Another Zeno, of Elea (c. 450 B.C.), was a disciple of Parmenides (q.v.) and expounded his philosophy. In Dickens's 'Pickwick' (ch. xv) Mr. Leo Hunter, whose wife is going to give a fancy-dress party, suggests Zeno, among other 'founders of clubs', as an appropriate character for Mr. Pickwick to assume.

Zenobia, SEPTIMIA, widow and successor (c. A.D. 266) of Odenathus, ruler of Palmyra, a city state in Syria which had enjoyed the protection of successive Roman emperors. Zenobia was an ambitious woman who invaded Asia Minor and Egypt in open hostility to Rome. She was captured and deposed by Aurelian (272), and Palmyra was utterly destroyed.

Zenocratê, the wife of Tamburlaine, in Marlowe's play of that name.

Zephalinda, in Pope's 'Epistle to a Young Lady [Miss Blount]', on her leaving the town after the Coronation', the young lady who goes from opera, park, assembly, play,

To morning walks, and prayers three times a day

in the country, where she will

O'er her cold coffee trifle with her spoon, Count the slow clock, and dine exact at noon.

Zephon, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', iv. 788, a 'strong and subtle Spirit' charged, with Ithuriel, to search the Garden of Eden for Satan.

Zephyrus, in Greek mythology, the personification of the west wind. He was the father of Xanthus (q.v.) and Balus, the horses of Achilles.

Zerbino, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), a Scottish prince and perfect knight, of whom it was said that Nature broke the mould in which he had been fashioned. He was the lover of Isabella (q.v.). He was rescued by Orlando when about to be executed on a false charge, but was killed by Mandricardo when attempting to defend the arms that Orlando in his madness had thrown away.

Zetland, an old name of the Shetland Isles.

Zeugma, a figure of speech by which a single word is made to refer to two or more words in a sentence, especially when properly applying in sense to only one of them; e.g. 'See Pan with flocks, with fruits Pomona crowned'. Cf. Syllepsis.

Zeûs, the greatest of the Greek gods, in whom the myths of many different nations centred. The Roman god Jupiter was identified with him, and the Greek myths transferred to him. According to Hesiod, Zeus was the son of Cronos (q.v.) and Rhea; he was saved by his mother from being devoured by Cronos, was entrusted to the Corybantes (q.v.) to educate on Mt. Ida in Crete, and ousted his father from the government of the world. He gave the empire of the sea to his brother Poseidon (Neptune), and of the infernal regions to his brother Hades (Pluto). He repelled the attack of the giants on heaven and destroyed them. He is represented in mythology as marrying his sister Hera (Juno), and also other goddesses such as Themis and Ceres, and as assuming various disguises in his amours with mortals. He introduced himself to Danae (q.v.) in a shower of gold, to Leda (q.v.) as a swan, to Europa (q.v.) as a bull, to Callisto as Diana, and to Alcmena as Amphitryon (q.v.). His worship was widespread and of great solemnity. He was regarded as the king and father of gods and men, with power over all other deities save the Fates.

The most famous representation of Zeus was the colossal chryselephantine statue of the god made by Pheidias for his temple at Olympia. It was removed to Constantinople in the 5th cent. A.D., where it was destroyed in the great fire of 476.

Zēuxis, a celebrated Greek painter, born at Heraclea in S. Italy, who flourished in the latter part of the 5th cent. B.C. His most famous work was a picture of Helen of Troy. He was a skilful painter of still life; it is said that birds came to peck at his picture of a bunch of grapes. But in this branch of art he is said to have been excelled by Parrhasius. The latter, with whom he was engaged in a trial of skill, bade him draw back a curtain to reveal his picture, and when Zeuxis attempted to do so, it appeared that the curtain was itself the picture by Parrhasius which Zeuxis had mistaken for the reality. Zeuxis is said to have died from laughing at a comical picture he had made of an old woman.

Zimbabwe, a Bantu name given to the extensive ruins near Victoria in Mashonaland discovered in 1868 and described by J. T. Bent in his 'Ruined Cities of Mashonaland' (1871). The ruins are attributed to Bantu builders of the 14th or 15th cents. Their chief features are a roughly elliptical kraal some 800 feet in perimeter, surrounded by a massive stone wall, and an elaborately fortified hill adjoining it. [E.B.]

Zimri, (1) in 1 Kings xvi, the servant of Asa, king of Judah, captain of half his chariots, who conspired against the king, 'drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza steward of his house', and went in and killed him, and reigned in his stead. 'Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?' (2 Kings ix. 31). (2) in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), in allusion to the above, represents the duke of Buckingham.

Zingano, ZINGARO (plural Zingani, Zingari), a gipsy. 'I Zingari' is the name of a famous cricket club.

Zionism, a movement among modern Jews having for its object the assured settlement of their race upon a national basis in Palestine.

Zisca or ZISKA, JOHN (1360-1424), a Bohemian nobleman, who, after fighting at Tannenberg (1410), later against the Turks, and for the English at Agincourt, became the leader of the Hussites, built the fortress of Tabor, and gained many victories over the Imperialists. It is related that he ordered his skin after his death to be made into a drumhead. 'Must I be annihilated lest, like old John Zisca's, my skin might be made into a drum?' (Burke, 'Letter to a Noble Lord').

Zobeide, in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), the wife of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.

Zodiac, from the Greek ζῳδιακόν, a sculptured figure (of an animal), a sign of the zodiac; a belt of the celestial sphere extending 8 or 9 degrees on each side of the ecliptic within which the apparent motions of the sun, moon, and planets take place. It is divided in twelve equal parts called signs. These are named after the twelve constellations (Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricornus, Aquarius, Pisces) with which at a former epoch they severally coincided approximately. They no longer do so owing to the precession of the equinoxes.

ZOÏLUS, a grammarian of Amphipolis, of the period of Philip of Macedon. His name became proverbial as that of a carping critic, on account of his strictures on Homer, Plato, and Isocrates.

ZOLA, ÉMILE (1840-1902), the principal figure in the French school of naturalistic fiction, of which 'Thérèse Raquin' (1867) is his first example. After 1870 he set about his principal work, the Rougon-Macquart series, in which he departs from the limited themes of the novel of his day to display the whole panorama of 19th-cent. French life, studying vice and crime with faithful minuteness and focusing attention mainly on the more animal aspects of human nature. In this series 'Germinal', for instance, deals with the life of a great mining community, 'La Terre' with the life of the agricultural peasant, 'Le Ventre de Paris' with the markets of the metropolis, 'L'Assommoir' with its taverns. The cynicism and pessimism that characterize these give place to a more romantic mood in 'La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret', 'La Joie de vivre', and 'Le Docteur Pascal'. 'La Débâcle' deals with the catastrophe of the war of 1870. In his three later works, 'Lourdes', 'Rome', and 'Paris', Zola examines what the religion and social organization of the day have to offer to man. His last works, 'Fécondité', 'Travail', and 'Vérité', are long disquisitions on the subject of their several titles, the last with reference to the Dreyfus case, in which Zola intervened on the side of truth with memorable vigour (notably in his letter to 'L'Aurore', 'J'accuse!').

ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS

Zoological Gardens, London: the origin of these is to be found in the 'lions at the Tower'. Wild beasts were kept at the Tower of London (q.v.) soon after it was built. Henry I had a number of lions, leopards, and other animals there, and we hear of a present of three leopards to Henry III, in compliment to the royal arms. A white bear and an elephant were there in the 13th cent., and a very large collection by the middle of the 18th cent. It then dwindled until 1822, when it was once more increased by Mr. Cops, and in 1834 transferred to the present 'Zoo' in Regent's Park, where the Zoological Society, founded in 1826 by Sir Stamford Raffles, had already brought together a certain number of animals. (Loftie, 'History of London'.)

Zophar, one of the three friends of Job (q.v.). The name means 'chatterer'.

Zophiel, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', vi. 535, one of the 'victor Angels', 'of Cherubim the swiftest wing'.

Zoroaster, the Greek form of Zarathustra, the founder of the Magian system of religion, probably a historical personage who has become the subject of legends; a Persian who is believed to have lived in the 6th cent. B.C., during the reigns of Cyrus, Cambyzes, and Darius.

The Zoroastrian religion was founded on the old Aryan folk-religion, but the polytheistic character of the latter was completely changed. The essential feature of Zoroastrianism is the existence of two predominant spirits: Ahura-Mazda (Ormazd) the wise one, the spirit of light and good; and Ahriman, the spirit of evil and darkness. The conflict between these two is waged in this world, and centres in man, created a free agent by Ormazd. Zoroastrianism includes the belief in life after death, eternal punishment or eternal death according to the balance of a man's good and evil deeds on this earth.

Zoroaster, who claimed to be the prophet sent by Ormazd, thus raised the ancient Aryan religion to a higher and more spiritual level. The other deities of the Vedic pantheon, with the exception of the god of fire, and Mithra, the god of day, disappeared or sank to the position of minor evil spirits.

Zuleika, (1) according to Mohammedan tradition (Sale's 'Koran', xii), the name of Potiphar's wife; (2) the heroine of Byron's 'The Bride of Abydos' (q.v.).

Zuleika Dobson, see Beerbohm.

Zürich Bible, THE, a German version of the Bible, printed in 1530, embodying Luther's translation of certain portions, and as regards the rest, the work of other translators.

ZWEIG, ARNOLD (1887-), German novelist, known in England as the author of 'Der Streit um den Sergeanten Grischa' (1928, 'The Case of Sergeant Grischa').

Zwingli, ULRICH (1484-1531), a famous Swiss leader of the Reformation. He first found his inspiration in Erasmus and Luther, but soon drew away from the latter, and by 1525 had rejected the mass altogether; and this split Switzerland into Catholic and Protestant cantons. To Zwingli the Eucharist was purely symbolic; there was no 'real presence' at all, not even in the (later) Calvinistic sense, still less in the Lutheran sense of 'consubstantiation'. It ended in civil war, in which Zwingli was killed in battle.

APPENDIX I

CENSORSHIP AND THE LAW OF THE PRESS

§ 1. The control of the press

THE introduction of printing immensely increased facilities for the spread of sedition and heresy, grave dangers always threatening the life of government and church, and as the industry of the press developed in the 16th century, we find the publication of subversive matter a cause of increasing concern to the authorities. Proclamations against heretical and seditious books begin under Henry VIII in 1529, and the requirement that books shall be licensed for printing by the privy council or other royal nominees is introduced in 1538. Edward VI in 1547 and 1549 issued orders against the use of popish books of prayer and instruction. Mary, by proclamation in the first year of her reign, forbade the printing of any book or other matter without her special licence for the same, and endeavoured, notably by a proclamation of 1555, to prevent the importation from abroad of the works of the reformers. A notable date in the history of the subject is 1557, when the Stationers obtained a charter of incorporation (see the article below on Copyright). Thereafter only members of the Stationers' Company or other persons holding a special patent might print any work for sale in the kingdom.¹ The incorporation was advantageous both to the book trade and the State, for the craft gained in dignity and organization, while the facilities for the supervision of printed matter were improved. The charter did not transfer to the Stationers the responsibility in the matter of undesirable publications, but it seems probable that the wardens exercised some discretion, at any rate before the Star Chamber orders of 1586, as to the need for seeing the 'hand' of an official licenser before recording a copyright. In 1559 Elizabeth, in the first year of her reign, issued 'Injunctions' requiring that no book should be printed unless licensed by her majesty, six of her privy council, or certain specified dignitaries of the Church, and that the names of those licensing the work should be printed at the end of it. The injunction must have proved largely ineffective, for, in spite of renewed orders, a multitude of unauthorized pamphlets continued to issue from the press. In 1586, at the instance of Archbishop Whitgift, a further effort was made to enforce State control: an ordinance of the Star Chamber directed that no printing press should be set up in any place other than London, apart from one in each of the university towns of Oxford and Cambridge, and that no more presses should be set up at all until those already existing had through natural causes been reduced to such number as the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London thought sufficient for the needs of the realm. The ordinance again forbade the printing of unlicensed works. In 1588 Whitgift appointed twelve persons to license books for printing; he was especially concerned to check the flow of puritan pamphlets which at this time were attacking the episcopal system. The conflict between bishop and puritan continued, and has left its trace in English literature in the Marprelate tracts (see Martin Marprelate). In 1599 an edict was issued requiring that certain satirical works, notably those of Gabriel Harvey and Thomas Nash (q.v.), should be burnt, and that no satires or epigrams should be printed thereafter.

A further stringent decree (1637), imposing severe penalties on offending printers, was among the last measures of the Star Chamber; but the abolition of the Chamber by the Long Parliament in 1641 did not carry with it any liberation of the press. On the contrary, Parliament during 1642 was much occupied with offences by writers and printers, and in 1643 issued an Ordinance requiring that no book should be printed unless previously licensed by an officer named by them, and appointed a licenser. It was this activity which in 1644 called forth Milton's noble protest, the 'Areopagitica' (q.v.). But the protest fell on deaf ears, and the licensing system continued throughout the Commonwealth period; indeed we find Milton himself acting as a licenser in 1651-2.

By this time journalism, a new element in English letters, had come into existence. It had its origin in the manuscript newsletters which, after the introduction of regular postal services, were dispatched to subscribers from the metropolis. The licensing system and the Star Chamber decrees, as well as the royal prerogative in the distribution of news, proved for a long time an impediment to the publication of any sort of printed journal. In 1622 authority was first given to certain stationers for the issue of periodical pamphlets relating the course of foreign wars (the Thirty Years War was then in progress and was being watched with intense interest). Such pamphlets were known as Corantos. In 1632 the Star Chamber prohibited the publication of news from abroad, and the interdict on Corantos was not raised until 1638, when Nathaniel Butler and Nicholas Bourne were granted a monopoly of the printing of foreign news. These later Corantos in turn vanished after a few years, and in 1641 appeared the first authorized 'newsbooks' or printed 'Diurnalls' of parliamentary proceedings and other domestic intelligence. It is not surprising that at this period of political excitement similar but unauthorized newsbooks were soon produced in great numbers, supplementing or replacing the newsletters of the scribes. These printed newsbooks, unlike the manuscript newsletters, came under the censorship established by the Long Parliament, and we read of many suppressions and imprisonments, until Cromwell in 1655 put an end to all unofficial periodicals. Licensed newsbooks were allowed afresh by the Rump parliament in April 1659, but at the end of the same year permission for their issue was restricted to certain journalists.

Under the Restoration the control and licensing of the press were continued. In 1662 a Licensing Act was passed for two years, then extended to 1679. It forbade the printing of any book or pamphlet contrary to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England or tending to the scandal of Church or government; and it required that all books and pamphlets should be licensed by persons appointed for the purpose. It empowered the king's messengers by warrant under the sign manual or under the hand of the Secretaries of State or of the Master and Wardens of the Stationers' Company to search houses and shops for unlicensed books and to bring before the authorities any which they suspected to contain seditious or heretical matter. It also regulated the conduct of the book trade.¹ After 1679 came a period during which the press was controlled by the prosecution of offenders under the ordinary law. In 1685 the Licensing Act was revived until 1694, in which year Parliament refused to renew it, and the licensing system (so far as the press was concerned) came finally to an end. The case against the Act was prepared by John Locke (q.v.): it was pointed out that the Act had not served the purpose for which it was made, which was to prevent the publishing of seditious matter; it had appointed no penalties for offences, but had left transgressors to the common law, which already had sufficient powers to deal with them; moreover licensers had not been free from partiality. The abandonment of the Act was not due to any change of opinion in Parliament or government in favour of the liberty of expression. Various bills restraining the press were introduced in the following years, but failed to obtain approval. Other measures were resorted to. The detection of the authors and publishers of libels was entrusted to two salaried 'messengers of the press', assisted by informers in the service of the government and by the presentments of grand juries. Both Houses of Parliament were also active in drawing the attention of government to obnoxious publications and even carried out examinations and committed offenders to prison. The Solicitor to the Treasury was charged with the duty of examining alleged libellous matter, which term may be said to have included anything published with the intent of causing a breach of the peace, or likely to bring the king, the government, Parliament, or the administration of justice into contempt, or to incite to the alteration of anything in Church or State by illegal means. Upon the Solicitor's advice the Secretaries of State issued warrants for the arrest of the suspected parties. These were examined, and as a consequence might be committed to prison and prosecuted. The usual punishments were the pillory, imprisonment, fines, and the requirement of security for future good behaviour. But John Matthews was hanged for high treason in 1719 in consequence of his pamphlet 'Vox Populi Vox Dei', in which he asserted that James III was the rightful King of England. Defoe was arrested in 1703 for his pamphlets on ecclesiastical matters, imprisoned and pilloried. Even if prosecution did not follow examination, the power of arrest, accompanied by seizure of papers and type, frequently repeated, enabled the Government to harass and even ruin obnoxious printers. The 'Freeholder's Journal' and the 'True Briton' were thus brought to an end in 1723 and 1724. Ordinary warrants issued by the Secretary of State specified the charge against the person named in them. But in the first half of the 18th century the Secretary of State also issued general warrants, which might authorize the arrest of a person unnamed, and the seizure of unspecified papers. Their use for the former purpose became impracticable owing to a decision of the courts in 1765 and was further declared illegal by the Commons in 1766; their use for the latter purpose was declared illegal by the courts in 1763 in connexion with the case of No. 45 of the 'North Briton'. Wilkes (q.v.) had started this paper in 1762 in opposition to Bute's 'The Briton', and in it had attacked the Government with increasing audacity. No. 45, imputing deliberate untruth to the authors of the recent speech from the throne, gave an opportunity for legal proceedings, and a general warrant was issued for the arrest of the authors, printers, and publishers of the number. When this had been executed, Wilkes brought an action against Wood, the Under-Secretary concerned, on the ground that the seizure of his papers under the warrant had been illegal, and the jury by direction of Lord Chief Justice Pratt (later Lord Camden) returned a verdict in his favour.

Wilkes was concerned in another important reform. In trials for libel the province of the jury was at first restricted to deciding the fact of publication and interpreting the innuendoes that the alleged libels might contain. It was left to the judge to determine whether the publication was libellous or not. This restriction of the jury's province had been questioned from time to time, and the right of the jury to decide the whole issue was asserted by Bolingbroke in the 'Craftsman' (see below), and maintained by Lord Camden and by Wilkes. The restriction was removed by Fox's Libel Act of 1792.

Another of the Government's measures, designed in part to reduce the number of libels, was the Stamp Act of 1712, which imposed a duty of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ on every periodical of half a sheet or less, and of $1d.$ on every whole sheet (altered by an Act of 1725 to a halfpenny on every half-sheet). This for a time lessened the number of periodicals, but it discouraged publications favourable to the Government at least as much as those of the opposition; ultimately there was no considerable reduction in the number of papers published.

In general, executive interference with the press diminished in the course of the 18th century. The Government relied in part, for meeting the attacks made upon it, on its own pamphlets and journals, notably for a time on the 'London Gazette' (which Steele was appointed to conduct, 1707-10), on Defoe's 'Review' (1704-13), and on the 'Examiner' (to which Matthew Prior and Swift were contributors). At a later period we find Butte's 'The Briton' (edited by Smollett) employed to meet the attacks of 'The Monitor'. The Government sometimes bought up an opposition paper (such as the 'London Journal'), or subsidized pro-government prints (such as the 'Daily Courant' and 'Free Briton', and later the 'Daily Gazetteer') and had these distributed gratis over the kingdom. The ablest of the opposition papers, the 'Craftsman', long defied the resentment of the Government. Bolingbroke and Pulteney were its best-known contributors. Its publisher was tried in 1729 and acquitted, but in 1731 was sentenced to imprisonment and fine.

The attempt of Charles I to arrest the five members had left Parliament disinclined to the publication of its proceedings. It was held accordingly a breach of privilege to print without permission the proceedings of either House or even to mention the names of members of Parliament in the press. A dry summary of the proceedings, known as the 'Votes', was allowed to appear, but it contained no account of the debates and entirely failed to meet the demands of the public at times of political excitement. From the accession of Anne some discreet account of the proceedings was introduced in Abel Boyer's 'The Political State of Great Britain', and from 1716 in the 'Historical Register'. In 1732 the 'Gentleman's Magazine' and the 'London Magazine' began reporting debates (Johnson's editorship of these in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' is famous). In 1738 the House of Commons by resolution reaffirmed its privilege and threatened the utmost severity against offenders. But the reports of debates continued, under such transparent disguises as accounts of proceedings in the senate of Lilliput. A last and unsuccessful attempt to enforce the privilege was made in 1771, when the House of Commons took action against the printers of certain journals. Here again we find Wilkes taking part in the conflict, on the side of the liberty of the press.

The application of the law in the later 18th and early 19th century in restraint of the press may be illustrated by the cases of Thomas Paine (q.v.), who was brought in danger of arrest by what was regarded as his subversive work, 'The Rights of Man' (q.v., 1791-2), and fled the country in consequence; and of Cobbett (q.v.), who in 1810 received a sentence of two years' imprisonment and a fine of £1,000 for a denunciation of flogging in the army. The last special restriction on the newspaper press, the Stamp Duty, was abolished in 1855; the stamp, for postal purposes, was retained until 1870. With the lapse of the Licensing Act in 1694 the importance of the Stationers' Company in connexion with the control of the press came to an end, though registration at Stationers' Hall continued necessary for certain purposes in relation to copyright (see the article below on Copyright).

§ 2. Control of dramatic performances

IN the 16th century companies of players were attached to the court and to households of the nobility. Some of these companies travelled about the country giving performances at private houses and to the public. In addition, there were wandering troupes of miscellaneous players under no patronage. In the larger towns the guilds continued to present Corpus Christi plays, and similar performances were given sporadically in smaller places, but the performers of these probably remained amateurs. Some measure of control over stage performances was exercised in the interests of public order from about the middle of the century. The licensing of individual plays, in one form or another, begins in 1549 if not earlier; and the subjection of players, unless 'protected', to the laws relating to vagabonds dates at least from 1554, and was probably enforced in practice even earlier. These measures were re-enacted in the reign of Elizabeth. By the Injunctions of 1559 already referred to she directed that no interlude should be played unless previously licensed by the mayor of the town, or in the country by the lord lieutenant or two justices of the peace; and no plays were to be so licensed which treated of matters of religion or of the governance of the country. By an Act of 1572 all players were to be deemed rogues and vagabonds unless they belonged to a baron of the realm or person of higher degree, or were licensed by two justices. The mayor and corporation of London, who under the Injunctions of 1559 had jurisdiction over stage plays in the city of London, the chief centre of theatrical activity, were in general hostile to dramatic performances, partly from puritan sentiment, partly because the performances were apt to give rise to overcrowding and tumults, and moreover tended to spread infection in the frequently recurring periods of plague. The court on the other hand, and Elizabeth herself, favoured the players, and the grant in 1574 of a patent to the Earl of Leicester's company, authorizing them to play in all towns without hindrance by the local authorities, conflicted with the powers previously conferred on the corporation. The latter retorted with an act of Common Council requiring all players to be licensed by the corporation and all plays allowed by it. The conflict between court and city was keen and prolonged, and during certain periods the corporation prohibited all performances within the city boundaries. In consequence, the first permanent playhouse in London was erected in Finsbury fields, outside the Lord Mayor's jurisdiction. Another issue of the conflict was to bring the players increasingly under the authority of the Master of the Revels, a court official, and from about 1574 no plays might be performed in England without his licence. His authority was gradually extended: in 1581 he was given power to commit offenders to prison; after 1606 he is found issuing licences for the printing as well as the performance of plays; also for various non-dramatic performances, such as those of acrobats and displays of animals. Under James I and Charles I the London companies of players worked under royal patents; companies protected by nobles are still found in the provinces. It should be emphasized that at this time the official control over the drama was directed to the exclusion of matters of religion and government, and was exercised in the interests of Church and State, not of morality. It may be recalled that Jonson came under suspicion of papacy and treason for his 'Sejanus' (q.v.), and (together with Marston and Chapman) got into trouble for disparaging allusions to the Scots in 'Eastward Hoe' (q.v.). Daniel incurred suspicion of allusion to Essex's plot in his 'Philotas'

(q.v.). Other famous examples of official interference with the Elizabethan drama may be mentioned. The original name of the fat knight in Shakespeare's 'Henry IV' was Sir John Oldcastle. To avoid offence to members of the family of that name, Shakespeare was required to change it, and substituted Falstaff. In the play 'Sir Thomas More' (q.v.), the part relating to the insurrectionary movement in London was required by the Master of the Revels to be omitted. The performance of Middleton's 'A Game of Chesse' was prohibited on the complaint of the Spanish Ambassador. But the attitude of the puritans to the drama was quite different from that of the Government. They regarded the stage as an immoral institution; the character of their hostility to it may be gathered from 'Histriomastix' (1632), in which Prynne (q.v.) asserted that stage plays, from their origin in the Devil onwards, had been the source of every possible crime. The work was held by the Star Chamber to reflect on Charles I and his queen, and Prynne was sentenced to lose his ears, to imprisonment, and to a heavy fine. The drama, on the other hand, was full of contemptuous references to the puritans. In 1642 the Long Parliament put an end to all dramatic performances. The prohibition was to some extent evaded, was repeated in 1647, and towards the end of the Commonwealth period was in part relaxed, for D'Avenant (q.v.) was then allowed to present certain semi-dramatic entertainments accompanied by music.

After the Restoration Charles II issued patents to D'Avenant and Thomas Killigrew the elder (q.v.), authorizing them to form two companies of actors with exclusive rights of performance in London and Westminster, and enjoining on them to expunge all profaneness and scurrility from the plays that should be acted. But Sir Henry Herbert, who had been Master of the Revels under Charles I, asserted his right to grant licences, and many quarrels resulted. Finally an arrangement was arrived at between Herbert and Killigrew for sharing the control of the stage, and on Herbert's death Killigrew succeeded him as Master of the Revels. In the reaction which followed the period of puritan austerity, the administration of the censorship was very lax. Not only was gross indecency tolerated, but references to political and religious matters were inadequately controlled. In course of time, after the death of Charles II, the public mood changed, and there was a revolt against the previous licentiousness. Jeremy Collier's attack 'on the profaneness and immorality of the stage' (1697) found a wide measure of sympathy. It was followed in 1698 by a royal order prohibiting the acting of anything contrary to religion and good manners and forbidding the Master of the Revels to license plays containing anything of the kind. The attention of the censor was thus specifically directed to moral supervision. But the gradual chastening of the drama which followed and which led to such plays as those of Rowe, Addison, and Steele, may be attributed more to a change of public sentiment than to the action of the censor.

In the early part of the 18th century the control of the stage appears to have been exercised largely by the Lord Chamberlain himself. Little of importance in its history is recorded until Rich in 1728 produced Gay's 'Beggar's Opera' (q.v.), a play containing social and political satire and obvious allusions to Walpole and Townshend. The performance of its sequel, 'Polly', was prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain. In 1736 and 1737 Fielding, in his 'Pasquin' and 'The Historical Register for 1736', carried political satire and personal allusion to greater lengths; and it was no doubt to some extent in consequence of these plays that Walpole took statutory powers, by the Licensing Act of 1737 (10 Geo. II, c. 28), to control dramatic performances. This Act made the Lord Chamberlain licenser of theatres in London and Westminster and in other places of residence of the sovereign; &c imposed penalties on the performance for hire anywhere in Great Britain of plays not licensed by him, and required that a copy of every new play proposed to be performed should be sent to him. For the purpose of his duties under the Act the Lord Chamberlain appointed an Examiner of Plays as his official subordinate. The Act was unpopular with the public and was evaded in various ways. Brooke's 'Gustavus Vasa' (q.v.) was one of the first plays censored, owing to a supposed allusion in it to Walpole; Johnson's ironical 'Compleat Vindication of the Licenser of Plays' on this occasion (1739) reflected the popular resentment. 'Edward and Eleanora', a play about Edward I and Eleanor of Castile, by James Thomson (q.v.), was similarly prohibited on account of its political allusions. It is more difficult to understand why Charles Macklin's 'Man of the World' (q.v.) should for many years have been refused a licence. Another well-known incident was the prohibition of 'A Trip to Calais' by Samuel Foote (q.v.), until he had removed from it the character of Lady Kitty Crocodile, in which the Duchess of Kingston was ridiculed.

The most interesting of the appointments to the post of Examiner of Plays in the early 19th century was that of George Colman the Younger (q.v.), who held the office from 1824 to 1836. Some of his plays and poems had shown him no strait-laced moralist, and one of his proposed productions at the Haymarket had even been forbidden by the Lord Chamberlain. The severity with which he now exercised his duties as censor and prohibited expletives and scriptural allusions was therefore a surprise to authors and managers. He tempered his severity, however, by letting his opinion be known that it was no part of his duties to spy on the theatre and to see that plays were performed in accordance with his obliterations. He was succeeded by John Kemble the actor, and the latter in 1840 by his son John Mitchell Kemble. William Bodham Donne was appointed Examiner of Stage Plays in 1857, E. F. S. Pigott in 1874, G. A. Redford in 1895, C. H. E. Brookfield in 1912; Brookfield died in the following year. G. S. Street held the office 1913-36.

In 1832 a Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed under the chairmanship of Edward Bulwer-Lytton (the future Lord Lytton, q.v.) to consider the working of the Act of 1737. The recommendations of this committee led to the passing in 1843 of an Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 68) whose provisions, substantially, are in force at the present day. It left the censorship of the drama in the hands of the Lord Chamberlain and empowered him to forbid the acting for hire of any play or part thereof 'whenever he shall be of opinion that it is fitting for the preservation of good manners, decorum, or the public peace so to do'. The administration of the censorship under this Act has at times given rise to much criticism; in particular the refusal of a licence to certain plays by distinguished authors (such as Maeterlinck, Ibsen, and Bernard Shaw) evoked strong protests. In 1909 the matter was considered by a Select Committee of both Houses. The evidence given before it showed a large measure of agreement among dramatic authors that the censorship should be abolished or modified; among managers of theatres, on the other hand, that some form of licensing plays before their production should be retained. The Committee's principal recommendations were that the Lord Chamberlain should remain the licenser of plays, that it should be optional to submit a play for licence and legal to perform an unlicensed play. The Committee enumerated the various grounds (indecentcy, offence to the sentiment of religious reverence, offence to a foreign power, &c.) on which the Lord Chamberlain should refuse a licence; and it recommended the action to be taken if a play produced without a licence should appear to the Attorney-General improper to be played on any of these grounds, or to the Director of Public Prosecutions improper to be played on the ground of indecency. No legislative action has followed the report of the Committee.

§ 3. The present law of the press and drama

THE following are the chief heads under which the law to-day punishes the publication of illegal matter:

1. Libel as a civil injury, the publication of matter defamatory of the plaintiff, that is, 'calculated to convey to those to whom it is published an imputation on the plaintiff injurious to him in his trade, or holding him up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule',

- (a) unless it appears that the publication is privileged, either
 - (i) absolutely (this applies to Reports and Proceedings published under the authority of either House of Parliament, documents used in judicial proceedings, and reports of State officials to their superiors; but not necessarily to the reproduction of any of the above in newspapers);
 - or (ii) partially (this applies to reports of parliamentary, judicial, or other public proceedings, provided that the report is fair and accurate and was not published maliciously, that the matter is of public concern and its publicity for the public benefit, and that the defendant has not refused on request to publish in the newspaper in which the publication complained of was made a reasonable contradiction or explanation);
- (b) or unless the defendant can prove the defamatory matter to be true (if a statement of fact) or fair and honest comment on a subject of public interest (if a matter of opinion).

Every one who is party to producing, printing, and issuing the libel (author, proprietor of a newspaper, printer, publisher, and in certain circumstances the vendor) is liable in respect of it.

2. Libel as a criminal offence, i.e. as calculated to provoke a breach of the peace or to outrage public feeling or morality, or to endanger the State:

- (a) libels defamatory of private character. Here in order to establish justification, it is necessary to prove not only that the defamatory statement is true, but also that its publication is for the public benefit;
- (b) libels (not in the popular sense of the word, but publications which the State for public purposes prohibits) that are
 - (i) blasphemous, i.e. written or published with the malicious intent of outraging Christian sentiment or of misleading the uneducated on a sacred subject. 'If the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without a person being guilty of blasphemous libel' (Lord Coleridge);
 - (ii) obscene, i.e. matter tending to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands the matter is likely to fall. The Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83 was passed for the purpose of preventing the sale of obscene books, &c. An instance of action by the Government to restrain the sale of printed matter on the score of alleged obscenity is afforded by the well-known case of Joyce's 'Ulysses' (see Joyce). An edition of 500 numbered copies, published by John Rodker, Paris, for the Egoist Press, London, in January 1923, was confiscated (with, it is said, the exception of one copy) by the British Customs authorities, and this action effectively prohibited publication in Great Britain so long as the Government's policy remained unchanged;

- (iii) seditious, i.e. matter tending to bring into hatred or contempt the sovereign, the government and constitution, or either House of Parliament, or to excite to the alteration of anything in Church or State by unlawful means, or to raise discontent and disaffection among the king's subjects, or to promote ill-will and hostility between different classes of them.

In a trial for criminal libel a defendant presumptively responsible for the publication (such as a newspaper proprietor) who is able to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the publication did not arise from want of due care on his part, is freed from criminal responsibility.

3. Infringement of copyright (see the article on Copyright below).

4. Slander of property, i.e. the publication of a statement referring to the property or trade of another which is false and is calculated to cause, or has caused, damage.

5. Contempt of Parliament or Court, i.e. the publication of matter defamatory of or insulting to either House of Parliament, or reflecting on any member of such House in his character of member, or of any matter reflecting on one of the Superior Courts of Record or referring to the parties concerned in causes therein, if the matter is calculated to prejudice the public against the parties before the cause is heard, or to interfere with the due administration of the law.

The printer is required to put his name and address on every copy of every paper or book printed by him to be published or dispersed (2 & 3 Vict. c. 12).

Dramatic performances. The Act of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68 (1843) requires that a copy of new plays and additions to old plays intended to be acted for hire shall be sent at least seven days before the first acting thereof, together with the prescribed fee (which is not to exceed two guineas in any case), to the Lord Chamberlain, who may forbid the acting of any play or of any part thereof anywhere in Great Britain. Penalties for infringement are prescribed, and the meaning of 'acted for hire' is defined. The Act further requires that theatres shall be authorized either by letters patent or by the Lord Chamberlain or (outside London and other places of royal residence) by justices of the peace (this last provision has been modified by Local Government Acts).

[The following works among others have been consulted in the preparation of §§ 1 and 2 above: the C.H.E.L., Fowell and Palmer, 'The Censorship in England', L. Hanson, 'Government and the Press, 1695-1763'; so much of § 3 as relates to the control of the press is based on Fisher and Strahan, 'The Law of the Press'.]

APPENDIX II

NOTES ON THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH COPYRIGHT

By SIR FRANK MACKINNON

'No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money,' said the great man. In order to increase the number of books worth reading, mankind has been concerned to see that writers may get some reward for their industry. And so there came to be devised that security for them which we call Copyright.

The first English Copyright Act was the celebrated Statute¹ of 1709. But something akin to the protection of copyright had existed for at least a century and a half before that date. This had two principal sources and means of support, firstly, the prerogative rights of the Crown, and secondly, the domestic arrangements of London booksellers under the rule of the Stationers' Company.

The action of the Crown was part of its practice to grant monopolies in general, but from an early date after Caxton printed his first book² at Westminster in 1477, it claimed especial rights as to printed books. There are indeed traces of a claim that all printing was the king's prerogative. There is, for example, a record³ of a privilege granted in 1597 to the queen's footman to print certain schoolbooks for 14 years; and as late as 1631 of a grant⁴ to one Weckherlin of the sole right to print some of the Latin classics.

But a royal grant of the sole privilege to print new books was much more common. In 1518 Richard Pynson, the second holder of the office of King's Printer, produced the first English book in Roman type, and on its title-page is inscribed, 'Cum privilegio impressa a rege indulto, ne quis hanc orationem intra biennium in regno Angliae imprimat aut alibi impressam et importatam in eodem regno Angliae vendat'. Pynson's later books are only inscribed, 'Cum privilegio a rege indulto'.

The Act⁵ of 1623 abolished monopolies; but sect. 5 of it excepts Letters Patent for new inventions, and sect. 10 provides that the Act shall not extend to any Letters Patent that concern Printing, Saltpetre, Gunpowder, and Ordnance.

For more than two centuries after Pynson's grant in 1518 it was common for such a privilege to be obtained from the Crown. For example, Loggan's 'Oxonia Illustrata' (Oxon. e Theatro Sheldoniano, 1675) has printed in it a grant by Charles II giving Loggan 'the sole Priviledge of printing the aforesaid Delineations for the term of 15 years next ensuing the date of this our License'. And the practice became so inveterate that it was often continued after the Act of Anne was passed in 1709. So when in 1741 the bookseller Austin was minded to publish a second edition of Stackhouse's 'History of the Bible' (first published in 1732) he got Letters Patent from George II giving him the sole privilege of printing his edition for 14 years. And the early editions of Warburton's Pope have printed in them a licence or grant from George II, dated 24 July 1759, giving Warburton 'our Royal Privilege and License for the sole printing and publishing the said Works' for 14 years.

² There exists in the Record Office a lease dated 10 May 1482 of premises in St. Mark's Alley, St. Clement's Lane, to Henry Franckenbergk and Bernard Van Stondo 'merchants of printed books'. The Act of 1483 (1 Rich. III, cap. 9) to prevent aliens trading within the realm, by sect. 12 made an exception in favour of any Artificer or Merchant Stranger bringing into this Realm or selling any Books written or printed. The demand for the new luxury evidently exceeded the native supply. This foreigner's privilege was repealed in 1533 by 25 Hen. VIII, cap. 15.

⁵ 21 James I, cap. 3.

There was a second way in which the Crown was concerned with copyright. In certain classes of books it claimed an especial prerogative right, and granted the sole privilege of printing them. These were State documents, like Acts of Parliament and Orders in Council, Bibles and Prayer Books, the Year Books, and Almanacs.¹ Except as to the Year Books and Almanacs, this right was a real one, and survives to-day. The King's Printers are still, by Letters Patent, empowered to print Acts of Parliament, Bibles, and Prayer Books. That the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge share the right with them, arises solely from the fact that each of the Universities possesses an early Charter (that of Oxford dated 1636), which authorizes it 'to print all manner of books'.

A third way in which the Crown may be said to have been concerned in the maintenance of the rights of authors and their publishers was in connexion with the licensing of publications. But this part of the Crown's activity is to a large extent combined with the working of the Stationers' Company as the controlling power over the publication of books.

In 1557 a charter of Queen Mary incorporated 97 named persons to constitute the Company of Stationers. The motive for this creation was very little concerned with the protection of authors and their copyright. It was in fact because 'certain seditious books . . . are daily printed, renewing and spreading great and detestable heresies against the catholic doctrine of the holy Mother Church'. It was ordered that no one should exercise the art of printing unless he was a freeman of the Company, and the Master and Wardens were authorized to seize and destroy prohibited books, and to imprison any one printing contrary to their orders. The Company was further empowered to make by-laws for regulating the trade.

This charter was confirmed by Queen Elizabeth in 1559; and in the same year a Royal Injunction required that a licence for the printing of any book must be obtained from some authority (see the article on Censorship above).

From a very early date after 1557 the Stationers' Company began to keep registers of the proprietors of 'copy', and books were entered in these by the printers to whom authors had sold them. From 1576 to 1595 more than 2,000 'copies' of books were registered, entirely or in shares, as the property of particular members. As only members of the Company could legally print, the entry in the register showed which member had the right to print a particular book, and any infringement of this by another printer-member could be prevented, or remedied, by fines imposed by the Company. Any printing by a piratical printer, not a member, could be stopped by the Company's power to destroy his press altogether. The State Papers of the 16th and 17th centuries, especially in reference to the Star Chamber and the High Commission Court, contain many references to the activity of the Company in both these ways.

Not unnaturally the richer members of the Company came to own the largest number of 'copies', and this caused discontent among the smaller men. A royal decree of 1585 confirmed the charter of the Company, but recited that many of the richer members² had yielded divers of their copies to the Company for the benefit and relief of the poorer members. This process would make the Company itself the proprietor of certain works.

The effect of all this was that by 1600 the sole right of printing a particular book, not yet called 'copyright',³ was protected in two ways, first by virtue of Royal Grants giving the grantee a sole right of printing for a specified number of years, and secondly by the rules and by-laws of the Stationers' Company. There is, however, no record of any case in the law courts in which this right was enforced or recognized. The fact that it could be so thoroughly upheld by the domestic powers of the Company is no doubt the reason for this.

³ The earliest quotation for the word 'Copyright' in the O.E.D. is dated 1767 from Blackstone's Commentaries.

App. II NOTES ON THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH COPYRIGHT

These two sources of the sole right to print are recognized by the decree of the Star Chamber in 1637 'touching the Regulation of Printers and Founders of Letters'. That enacted by sect. 2 that every book should be licensed and entered in the Register Book of the Stationers' Company; and by sect. 7 that no person should print or import any copy which the Company of Stationers, or any other person, has by any letters patent, order, or entrance in their Register Book, the right or allowance solely to print.

The Star Chamber having been abolished in 1641, an Ordinance of 1641 prohibited printing without the consent of the owner of the 'copy' of any book. And this was followed by the famous Ordinance of the Long Parliament of 1643. This provided that no book should be printed unless licensed (see the article on Censorship above). It also enacted that no book, of which the copy had been granted to the Stationers' Company 'for their relief and the maintenance of their poor', be printed by any one without the licence of the Company. It also renewed to the Company the power to break up unlicensed presses, and to search for, and confiscate, unlicensed books.

But here again, as in Queen Mary's Charter to the Company of 1557, the primary motive was not the protection of authors. For the preamble to the Ordinance recites that 'many false, scandalous, seditious, and libellous' works have been lately published, 'to the great defamation of Religion and Government'; and that many private presses have been set up. It was the part of this Ordinance that required all books to be licensed that gave rise to Milton's 'Areopagitica'. 'For that part', he says, 'which preserves justly every man's copy to himself, or provides for the poor, I touch not, only wish they be not made pretences to abuse and persecute honest and painful men, who offend not in either of these particulars.' And near the end he speaks of 'the just retaining of each man his several copy, which God forbid should be gainsaid'.

There were further Ordinances to the same effect in 1647, 1649, and 1652. And after the Restoration an Act¹ of 1662 was again passed 'for preventing the frequent abuses in printing seditious, treasonable, and unlicensed books and pamphlets'. This again incidentally dealt with copyright. By sect. 3 all books are to be entered in the Register of the Stationers' Company, and by sect. 6 'no person shall print or import any book which any person by virtue of letters Patent, or of entries duly made in the Register Book of the Company . . . has, or shall have, the right, privilege, authority, or allowance solely to print without the consent of the owner or owners'.

In 1684 a new charter was granted to the Company, which recited the ownership of 'copies' according to the Register by members of the Company, and went on, 'We, willing and desiring to confirm and establish every member in their just rights and properties, do well approve of the said Register, and declare that every member of the Company, who shall be the proprietor of any book, shall have and enjoy such sole right, power, privilege, and authority of printing such book or copy as in that case hath been usual heretofore.'

These Licensing Acts were several times re-enacted, but the last of them lapsed in 1694. The effect of this was that there remained no Act of Parliament recognizing the sole right to print, and this was no doubt one of the reasons for the passing of the Act of 1709.

It is of great importance to observe that, though Letters Patent from the Crown used to specify a period, usually 14 years, for the sole right of printing, there is nowhere any trace of any limitation of time in regard to the ownership of 'copy' by registration with the Company. In the year 1700 there can be no doubt that this was universally recognized as a perpetual right. The Tonsons, for example, through most part of the eighteenth century were regarded as the undoubted owners of the copyright in 'Paradise Lost', under an assignment from Milton dated 1667, duly entered in the Register. They were also regarded as the proprietors of Shakespeare's plays, though I do not know that they had any assignment from the author on which to rely. And the Special Verdict in Millar v. Taylor in 1769 stated 'that before the reign of her late Majesty, Queen Anne, it was usual to purchase from authors the perpetual copyright of their books and to assign them from hand to hand for valuable considerations, and to make the same the subjects of family settlements for the provision of wives and children'.

In short, in 1700, it was the universal belief of the trade, and probably of lawyers, that by the common law an author, or his bookseller-assignee, had a perpetual copy-right in any book.

The Act of 1709 was probably the result of petitions from the Booksellers in 1703, 1706, and 1709. What they desired was not the creation of copyright—as to that they had no doubt, nor as to its duration—but the provision of machinery by which it could be more readily enforced. This they had enjoyed, under the Licensing Act which expired in 1694, by the power to seize unlicensed and unregistered books.

The title of the Act of 1709 was 'An Act for the encouragement of Learning, by vesting' the copies of printed books in the authors or purchasers of such copies, during the times therein mentioned'. The Preamble recited that persons have of late frequently taken the liberty of printing books without the consent of the authors, or proprietors, of such books, to their great detriment and too often to the ruin of them and their families. The first section enacted that from 10 April 1710 an author of a book already printed, or the bookseller who had bought his copy, should have the sole right and liberty of printing such book for the term of one and twenty years, and no longer; and an author of any book not yet published should have the sole liberty of printing it for the term of fourteen years from its publication, and no longer. If any one printed a book in breach of these rights, the offender should forfeit the book, and be liable to pay a penalty of a penny for every sheet found in his possession. Section 2 provided that no offender should be liable to such forfeiture or penalties, unless the title to the copy of the book should be entered in the Register of the Stationers' Company. Section 4 provided a cumbrous machinery for fixing fair prices for books in case of a complaint by any one that a bookseller was asking an unreasonable price.² Section 5 provided for the delivery of copies for certain libraries: I refer to this later. Section 7 provided that nothing in the Act should extend to prohibit the importation and sale of any books in Greek, Latin, or any other foreign language, printed beyond the seas.

² There was precedent for this in an Act of 1533 (25 Hen. VIII, cap. 15) which provided that if English printers increase the price of books at too high and unreasonable prices the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, or two Chief Justices may hold an inquiry with 12 jurors and limit the prices. The Act of 1709 in the above clause gave power to limit prices, in England, to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of London, the two Chief Justices, the Chief Baron, and the Vice-Chancellors of Oxford and Cambridge; and in Scotland, to the Lord President, the Lord Justice General, the Lord Chief Baron, and the Rector of Edinburgh University. Nothing is provided as to Ireland.

App. II NOTES ON THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH COPYRIGHT

Section 9 was, 'Provided that nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, either to prejudice or confirm any right that the said Universities, or any of them, or any person or persons have, or claim to have, to the printing or reprinting any book or copy already printed, or hereafter to be printed.' And the final section 11 was, 'Provided always that after the expiration of the said term of fourteen years, the sole right of printing or disposing of copies shall return to the author thereof, if they are then living, for another term of fourteen years.'

The great 'Question of Literary Property' which reverberates through the second half of the eighteenth century, and has its echo in the pages of Boswell, was whether the perpetual copyright, at common law, of an author or his bookseller-assignee survived the passage of this Act, or was destroyed by it. Until their final discomfiture in 1774 the Booksellers were confident that it survived. They regarded the Act as only designed to provide, for the periods named, machinery for enforcing the right by forfeiture and penalties; and they relied confidently on the proviso in clause 9. But ultimately the words 'and no longer' in clause 1 proved fatal to them.

The question could hardly arise until the expiration of the 21 years in 1731. And for a time the Booksellers were successful, especially in applications for injunctions in the Court of Chancery. For example in 1735 the proprietor of 'The Whole Duty of Man', claiming under an assignment of 1657 (from what author is not apparent), successfully restrained a rival from printing it. And in 1736, before Lord Hardwicke, 'Tolson and Others' vindicated their 'copy' in 'Paradise Lost' under the assignment from Milton of 1667.

In 1769 the question came before a Court of Law in the famous case of Millar v. Taylor. It concerned Thomson's 'Seasons', published 1726-30. Thomson's 28 years under clauses 1 and 11 of the Act of 1709 had therefore expired by 1758. He had sold all his rights to Millar. In 1763 Taylor reprinted the work, and in 1766 Millar sued him in the King's Bench. In 1769 the Court delivered judgement, and it was one of the few occasions on which that Court, during the 32 years of Lord Mansfield's reign as Chief Justice, was not unanimous. Lord Mansfield, Mr. Justice Willes, and Mr. Justice Aston decided in favour of Millar. Mr. Justice Yates (after a 'very decent preface', as the reporter, Burrow, records) delivered a lengthy dissident judgement in favour of Taylor. So, for the time, the Booksellers won.

The chief source of trouble to the London Booksellers was the activity of printers in Ireland and Scotland. For some reason they do not seem to have attempted to take action in Dublin,¹ and those who read booksellers' catalogues are aware that Dublin reprints of all the important books in the 18th century are numerous. But they did attack those whom they no doubt regarded as the Edinburgh 'pirates', and this was eventually their undoing.

The first edition of Stackhouse's 'History of the Bible' was published in 1732. A second edition² was published by his assignee, Austin, in 1744. Stackhouse died in 1752, so his 28 years under the Act expired in 1760. In 1767 Donaldson, an Edinburgh bookseller, reprinted the book. In 1770 Hinton, a London bookseller, and the assignee of Austin, sued Donaldson in the Court of Session. Ilay Campbell was Donaldson's advocate, and James Boswell was his junior. On 28 July 1773 the

² It was for this edition that Austin got the Letters Patent from George II, mentioned supra p. 881, giving him the sole privilege of printing it for 14 years.

Court of Sessions, by eleven to one, decided in favour of Donaldson. The eleven included Lord Auchinleck, Lord Hailes, and Lord Kames: the one dissentient was Lord Monboddo. So the London booksellers had won in London in 1769 and had lost in Scotland in 1773.

In 1774 came Donaldson v. Beckett in the House of Lords. This again concerned Thomson's 'Seasons'. Beckett had bought from Millar's executors the copyright that had been upheld in Millar v. Taylor in 1769. And Beckett made his claim in the English Court of Chancery against the Edinburgh 'pirate' Donaldson, who had reprinted 'The Seasons'. Lord Chancellor Bathurst granted a perpetual injunction against Donaldson, whereupon Donaldson appealed to the House of Lords. The hearing began¹ 4 February 1774. The judges, then twelve in number, being summoned, they all attended with the exception of Lord Mansfield: it was not the etiquette for him to advise the House; as a peer himself, if he were present, he would form part of the tribunal. Five questions were submitted to the judges, to which they gave answers by varying majorities. But to the most vital question—'Whether by the Statute of 1709 an author is precluded from every remedy, except on the foundation of the said statute, or on the terms and conditions prescribed therein'—six answered 'Yes', and five answered 'No'.

Lord Mansfield, who might have sat, and upheld the view he had taken in Millar v. Taylor five years before, did not attend the House. And on the motion of Lord Camden, on 22 February, the House decided in favour of the appellant, Donaldson,² and Millar v. Taylor was overruled. The English booksellers had found their Bannockburn.

They attempted to get relief from Parliament, but a Bill for that purpose, having passed the Commons, was rejected by the Lords. But the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, St. Andrews, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, and the Colleges of Winchester, Eton, and Westminster got an Act³ in 1775 giving them perpetual copyright 'in books given or bequeathed to the said Universities and Colleges for the advancement of useful learning, and other purposes of education'. This was subject to the condition that such books be printed at their own private presses, which Oxford and Cambridge alone possessed!

In 1814 the author's period of 14 years, with a second 14 years, if he was alive at the end of the first, under the Act of 1709 was altered when, by 54 Geo. III, cap. 156, the author was given 28 years, and, if he were living at the end of that period, the term of his life.

So matters remained until Serjeant Talfourd in 1837 began his efforts to secure an increased period of copyright in the interests of authors. He was removed from the House of Commons, by being made a Judge, before his crusade was successful in 1842. Sixty years was his proposal, in the Bill he introduced without success in 1838. The question was further debated in 1841 and 1842, and was made memorable by two famous speeches of Macaulay. His proposal, supported by a wealth of historical instances, was that the period should be 42 years, or the life of the author, whichever was the longer. The House was convinced by his eloquence. Sir George

² When Mr. Dempster said, 'Donaldson, Sir, is anxious for the encouragement of literature. He reduces the prices of books so that poor students may buy them', Dr. Johnson said (laughing), 'Well, Sir, allowing that to be his motive, he is no better than Robin Hood, who robbed the rich in order to give to the poor'. Boswell, 'Life' I, 438.

³ 15 Geo. III, cap. 53. Sect. 33 of the Copyright Act 1911 provides that 'Nothing in this Act shall deprive any of the Universities and Colleges mentioned in the Act of 1775 of any copyright they already possess under that Act'. But the Act of 1775 itself is repealed by the Act of 1911, so that none of the Universities or Colleges can acquire a perpetual copyright in the future.

App. II NOTES ON THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH COPYRIGHT

Trevelyan, in his 'Life of Macaulay',¹ says: 'Never has any public man, unendowed with the authority of a minister, so easily moulded an important piece of legislation into a shape which so accurately accorded with his own views as did Macaulay the Copyright Act of 1842'.

Sir Robert Peel successfully moved one amendment, by which seven years was added to the author's life. In the result the Act² of 1842 gave copyright for the period of 42 years from the date of publication, or until seven years after the author's death, whichever was the longer. Sect. 5 of the Act empowered the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to authorize, after the author's death, the reprinting of a book which the proprietor of the copyright refused to permit. Sect. 11 continued the Registry at Stationers' Hall, and provided that certificates issued there should be prima facie proof in any court of the ownership of the copyright. And by sect. 24 no action for infringement could be begun unless the work had been entered in the Registry before the writ was issued. This meant that the Registry was not necessarily a complete record of publications, though the great majority were entered. But a publisher could abstain from registering altogether, unless he came to want to sue for an infringement, when he must register before starting his suit.

This Act, like all previous ones, dealt with copyright as from the time of publication. There never was any doubt that by the common law the author of any writing, or his personal representative after his death, had complete and perpetual power over his work so long as it remained unpublished. This applied to letters. The recipient of a letter had the property in the paper, but, unless he had express or implied authority from the writer (as the Editor of a newspaper, for example), he had no right to publish copies of it. In pure theory the purchaser of an unpublished letter of Samuel Johnson could have been restrained from publishing it by his then personal representative, who would be found in a line of successive executors from Lord Stowell, the survivor of his three executors.³

This Act of 1842 provided for English literary copyright until it was replaced by the Act⁴ of 1911. This effected three momentous changes. Firstly, it increased the period of copyright to the life of the author and 50 years after his death. This gets rid of difficult questions that used to arise when the period of copyright began from the date of publication.⁵ In the case of a posthumous work, however, copyright is (by sect. 17) to subsist for 50 years from publication. Secondly, the Act tacitly abolished the Register at Stationers' Hall, since it no longer made registration there necessary for any purpose. And so those records, which had been kept for three and a half centuries, came to an end.⁶ Thirdly, the Act altered the nature of the perpetual common law right of an author, and his personal representatives, in an unpublished work. For its definition of 'copyright' includes the right, if a work is unpublished, to publish it, or any substantial part of it. Thus the right became part of the personal property of the deceased author.

In regard to the unpublished MS. of a deceased author two questions may follow:

(1) Who is the owner of the MS.? and (2) Who is proprietor of the right to publish

² 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 45.

⁴ 1 & 2 Geo. V, cap. 46.

⁵ Possibly it is an inducement to the inferior publisher to indulge in that reprehensible practice of putting no date on a title-page.

it?¹ As to the latter it is provided by sect. 17 (2) that the ownership of an unpublished MS. after the author's death, when acquired pursuant to a will made by the author, shall be prima facie proof of the copyright being vested in the owner of the MS. Apart from this, presumably the proprietor will be the express devisee of the copyright, or copyrights in general, of the deceased, or his residuary legatee.

By section 2 it is an infringement to produce or reproduce a work, or any substantial part thereof, in any material form, without the consent of the owner of the copyright. But a proviso adds that certain acts shall not constitute an infringement, in particular (i) any fair dealing with any work for the purposes of private study, research, criticism, review, or newspaper summary; and (ii) the reading or recitation in public by one person of any reasonable extract from any published work.

Sect. 4 of the Act re-enacts the provision of sect. 5 of the 1842 Act as to the power of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to authorize the reprinting of a book unreasonably withheld by the owner of the copyright.²

A proviso to sect. 3 of the Act introduces a novelty by enacting that on the expiration of 25 years from the death of the author of a published work any one may reproduce it if he gives notice of his intention to the owner of the copyright, and pays him royalties at the rate of ten per cent. on the price at which he publishes the book. Another novelty is contained in a clause in section 2. It is not to be an infringement of copyright to publish, in a collection mainly composed of non-copyright matter, bona fide intended for the use of schools and so described on the title-page and in any advertisements of the book . . . short passages from published literary works not themselves published for the use of schools . . . provided that not more than two of such passages from works by the same author are published by the same publisher within five years, and that the source from which such passages are taken is acknowledged.

International Copyright

This is a most complicated topic, which can only be noticed very briefly. Following upon an abortive Act³ of 1838, the Act⁴ of 1844 empowered Her Majesty by Order in Council to direct that foreign authors should have British copyright to the same extent as British subjects. Such Orders were issued as to countries which had given, or were prepared to give, similar protection to British authors. Between 1846 and 1886 sixteen Orders in Council were issued as to various European states, and they resulted in considerable complication.

In 1885 the Berne Convention providing for a uniform international system was arranged, and this was given effect to by the Act⁵ of 1886. Most States with any pretensions to civilization and culture became parties to the Convention, but the United States (with whom no arrangement under the Act of 1844 had been possible) did not.

The Berne Convention was revised by the Berlin Convention of 1908, and again by the Rome Convention of 1928. All civilized States with the exception of the United States were parties to these.

Up to 1891 Printers and Publishers in the United States dealt as they liked with ¹ Some speculation has naturally been raised of late as to the Boswell MSS. found in Scotland. What may be the answers to these two questions, in regard to them, I do not know. The problem depends on an accurate ascertainment of all the relevant facts, which is beyond me, and on a knowledge of Scots law, for which I have no qualification but my name.

² The equivalent of this power of a public authority to prevent the suppression of books, or the demand of an excessive price for them, has thus been continuous since 1533. I am not aware that the power has ever been invoked.

the works of British authors. In that year the Chace Act was passed, partly in the interests of foreign authors, but at least as much for the benefit of American printers. It enabled a foreign author to enjoy copyright in the United States, provided that he delivered two copies of his work on publication to the Librarian of Congress, and provided those two copies were printed from type set within the limits of the United States.

A revised United States law was passed in March 1909. Sect. 15 of this provides that of any printed book, except the original text of a book of foreign origin in a language other than English, the text of all copies accorded protection under this Act . . . shall be printed from type set within the limits of the United States . . . and the printing of the text and binding of the said book shall be performed within the limits of the United States.¹ A noble concession to humanity provides that this requirement shall not apply to works in raised characters for the use of the blind.

Delivery of Copies to Libraries

By an Act² of 1666 every printer was required to deliver three copies of the best and largest paper of each book printed by him to the Master of the Stationers' Company for the use of the King's Library, and the two Universities, under a penalty for not doing so.

Bentley, in the Preface to his 'Dissertation on the Letters of Phalaris' (1699), says that as Keeper of the King's Library he procured nearly a thousand volumes under this. But some booksellers refused to comply; and one named Bennet in particular declared that 'he knew not what right the Parliament had to give away any man's property; that he hoped the Company of Stationers would refuse, and try it out at law; that they were a Body, and had a common Purse, and more to this purpose'.

The Act of 1709 by clause 5 required nine copies to be delivered at Stationers' Hall for the Royal Library, the two English and four Scottish Universities, Sion College, and the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh. According to a Cambridge pamphlet³ of 1770, under this provision 'very few books of value have been obtained, the booksellers . . . chusing rather to forfeit all the benefit of the Act, and trust one another, by never entering their books in the Register . . .; or when this method is not safe enough, entering only one Volume of each Sett'.

After the Union these nine copies were, by 41 Geo. III, cap. 107, increased to eleven by the addition of Trinity College, Dublin, and the King's Inn, Dublin. Sion College, the four Scottish Universities, and the King's Inn, Dublin, lost this right to copies in 1836, but by other sections of the Act⁴ were given an annual payment out of the Consolidated Fund by way of compensation, the money to be spent on books for their libraries. This, I think, they still enjoy.

The Act of 1842 by sects. 6 and 7 required one copy to be delivered at the British Museum, and by sect. 8 four copies at Stationers' Hall, for the Bodleian, the Cambridge University Library, the Advocates' Library, and the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.

Finally the Act of 1911 by sect. 15 requires the delivery of copies for the same five libraries,¹ and a sixth for the National Library of Wales. Every book must be sent to the British Museum, but to the other Libraries only those for which a written demand, by the authorities of any of the libraries, is made within a year of publication. And the books to be delivered to the National Library of Wales shall not include books of such classes as may be specified in regulations to be made by the Board of Trade.

¹ The law of 1891 required the copies to be printed from type set within the limits of the United States. This made it possible for plates to be made there, and the actual printing from them, and the bookbinding, to be done in this country. The law of 1909 effectively puts an end, so far as books in English are concerned, to so nefarious a practice. By sect. 21, as amended in 1919, the deposit within 60 days of publication of one copy printed abroad will secure an interim copyright for four months. If the American printed copies are not deposited within that time all protection will cease.

APPENDIX III

NOTE ON AMERICAN COPYRIGHT LAW¹

By

RICHARD C. DE WOLF

Law Officer, Copyright Office, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.

History and General Observations

AMERICAN copyright law is an offshoot of the British law. The colonists brought with them the common law of England, which may be taken to include the principle laid down in the decision of the House of Lords in 1774, in the case of Donaldson v. Becket, that authors have perpetual property in their unpublished writings, including the exclusive right of publication, but that this property is abandoned to the public when publication takes place. Other profitable rights in addition to that of publication the author has at common law; for example, the right to perform his work on the stage if it is a dramatic composition. Indeed, his property is more complete under the common law than it is after he obtains statutory copyright, except for the one important fact, that he loses his rights on publication unless he complies with the formalities prescribed by the copyright statute.

Copyright, in the narrower sense of the word, is a right—or rather a bundle of assorted rights—growing out of the common law property of the author, but limited in the United States by certain language in the Constitution, under the authority of which all Federal legislation is enacted, and, of course, also by the language of specific copyright statutes. The Constitutional provision referred to is that of Article I, Section 8, that 'The Congress shall have power . . . To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries'. 'Inventors' and 'discoveries' are subjects dealt with by the law of patents; 'authors' and 'writings' by the copyright law.

The limitations imposed by the words above quoted, it will be observed, relate to purpose, time, persons, and subject-matter. The purpose is to promote the progress of science, i.e. learning, and useful arts, not primarily to protect the property rights of authors; or perhaps it would be better to say that the protection of such rights is merely a means to an end—the benefit of the public at large. The motive of public policy thus expressed is often referred to in the course of opinions of the courts interpreting the law and in discussions of proposed legislation. The limitation as to time prevents the enactment of a law which would grant perpetual copyright; that as to persons requires that the rights secured shall go to authors, although by natural derivation their 'executors, administrators, and assigns' are also benefited, and by a definition of doubtful soundness in the present Copyright Act, an employer for hire is deemed to be an author; and finally the subject-matter of the rights secured must be 'writings', a word whose normal meaning has been gradually extended by statutory enactments and judicial interpretation until it has come to cover practically 'any form in which the thought of an author may be recorded and from which it may be read or reproduced'.²

From the beginning American copyright law has rested upon the theory of formalities—of things to be done by the author over and above the creation of his work. He has always been required to make a public record of his claim and to deposit in some public office copies of the work in which he claims copyright, and, from an early date, to inform the public of his copyright by affixing a notice in set form to all such copies. The retention of these requirements, now obsolescent in the law of many other countries, reflects not only the predominance in the United States of the interests that exploit intellectual property over those that create it, but also the ancient prejudice against 'monopolies', which refuses to consider it any particular hardship on the author to impose upon him exceptional conditions for the enjoyment of rights of property in what he has created.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted in 1787, Copyright Acts had already been passed by all the colonies except Delaware.¹ This was due to the energetic efforts of Noah Webster, author of the famous dictionary and spelling books. These colonial statutes, very similar to one another in language, doubtless played a part in the framing of the first Federal Act, which became law 31 May 1790.²

The ensuing series of Acts, terminating in the Act of 4 March 1909, which with some amendments of detail is now in force, is marked by a steady expansion in the subjects covered, in the length of time for which protection is granted, in the variety of rights accorded to the copyright owner, and in the classes of persons by whom copyright may be obtained. Originally confined to books, maps, and charts, copyright now covers the entire range of literary and artistic production. From a maximum of 28 years, the term has been extended to a maximum of 56 years, and rights of representation, translation, dramatization, and performance have been added to those originally granted.

Down to 1891 copyright had been obtainable only by citizens or residents of the United States, another result of the tendency to consider it as a privilege rather than a right. After prolonged agitation an Act was passed in the year mentioned which placed the foreign author on the same footing as the American author, with the condition that his Government give reciprocal rights to citizens of the United States, a condition to be determined and proclaimed by the President. Coupled with the extension of copyright to foreigners went a restriction compelling books to be manufactured in the United States.³

Common Law Rights and Publication

How then is the author—for without an author there can be no copyright—to secure for himself the value of his work? And the term author, be it noted, includes composer, dramatist, artist, and even photographer or draftsman. His common law right includes the right to publish and the right to obtain copyright. He may exercise these rights himself, but to do so profitably usually requires the investment of capital which the author may not have. So he may go to a publisher of books or a producer of plays or some other of the many kinds of middleman who make a business of distributing an author's products among the consuming public; or again he may be approached by the middleman, or may be already employed by him.⁴ In any case, there is the author, with his product and his common law property right. This property right he may 'assign' in legal parlance, that is, he may sell it outright; or he may merely sell the use of it, by licensing the purchaser to publish it, or produce it, or perform it. If it is to be exploited in any way other than by publication, the common law property right remains and is protected like any other property right by the courts, but if it be published, then on the basic principle laid down in the case of Donaldson v. Becket, mentioned at the beginning of this article,¹ the common law right disappears. At this point, provided the proper steps are carefully taken, copyright, the creature of the statute, comes in to protect the work for a limited period of years; if these steps are not taken, the property right ceases and can never thereafter be revived.

It will be clear, therefore, that publication is the turning-point upon which the fate of the property right depends. What is publication? In all but exceptional cases it consists in distributing copies of a work to the public, or making them available to the public, by selling them, exposing or offering them for sale, or giving them away. No particular number of copies need be distributed, but the transfer of ownership must be complete. If this transfer is not complete, publication is incomplete. There is, however, an intermediate zone in which it is somewhat difficult to say whether publication has taken place or not, as where copies are leased for a specific use, for instance commercial rating reports and motion picture films. The opinion of their distributors is that such works are published.² Publication does not take place, however, when lecture notes are distributed by a teacher to his pupils for classroom use only, nor when copies of a song are given to a limited number of artists to permit them to sing it in public, nor when samples of printed pictures are distributed for the purpose of obtaining orders. It would seem obvious (though the point is not infrequently raised) that a work is not published when the manuscript is sent to one or more publishers, to see whether they will publish it or not. Of course an author does not relinquish his rights in a work merely by relinquishing its manual possession, and it is perhaps apparent from what has been said that the retention of control negatives the idea of publication. Performance of a play or musical composition, or oral delivery of a lecture or address, is not publication. The one case in which publication has been held to take place without any distribution of copies is that of the public exhibition of a work of art in a place to which the public had free access, so that permission to make photographs was implied,³ and while this resulted in abandonment of any right to prevent the making of photographs, it may be doubted whether it amounted to a complete publication.

How Copyright is secured in Published Works

Publication being contemplated, what must the author or his assignee or licensee, the publisher, do in order to prevent the work from falling into the public domain and to secure copyright, in place of the disappearing common law right? First, and most important, he must publish with the notice of copyright affixed to all copies in the form and in the position prescribed by the Copyright Act. Section 9 of the Act provides: 'That any person entitled thereto by this Act may *secure copyright*⁴ for his work by publication thereof with the notice of copyright required by this Act.' When this is done the copyright is 'secured', that is, the various rights granted by the Act become vested. Other things must follow in order that the right to sue for infringement may accrue, but if they are not done properly, any mistakes may usually be corrected, while failure to comply with the provisions regarding publication with notice is usually fatal.

The Copyright Act prescribes the exact form of the notice, as well as its position,

² This view is supported by Jeweler's Mercantile Agency v. Jeweler's Weekly Pub. Co., 155 N.Y., 241.

³ Carns v. Keefe Bros., 242 Fed. Rep. 745.

⁴ Italics by author.

but with certain modifications depending on the class of the work. If it be a printed literary, musical, or dramatic work, the notice must consist of the word 'Copyright' or the abbreviation 'Copr.' accompanied by the year of publication and the name of the copyright proprietor, thus 'Copyright 1938 by John Smith'. If the work be a map, work of art, reproduction of a work of art, a drawing of a scientific or technical character, a photograph, or a print or pictorial illustration, a briefer form of notice may be used, consisting of the letter c in a circle, thus ©, accompanied by the initials, monogram, mark, or symbol of the copyright proprietor. 'Provided, that on some accessible portion of such copies or of the margin, back, permanent base or pedestal, or of the substance on which such copies shall be mounted, his name shall appear'.¹ The language here plainly implies that the alternative use of the brief notice was intended chiefly for works of art, where the full-length notice would be inconvenient and disfiguring. But since the longer form is always permissible, it is prudent to use it in any case where there is a doubt as to the classification of the work, for the use of the short notice where the long one is required by the Act may be fatal to the copyright.

Similar considerations are involved in determining the position of the notice. In a book or other printed publication, it must appear upon the title-page or the page immediately following, in a periodical upon the title-page or the first page of text or under the title heading, and in a musical work upon the title-page or the first page of music. The precise location is not fixed for other classes of works, but it must be understood that the notice in general should appear upon the work itself and not upon the mount, frame, or enclosing container.²

Deposit of Copies and Registration

Copyright having been secured by publication with the prescribed notice in the prescribed place, the next steps required are the deposit of copies and registration in the Copyright Office. Promptly after publication two copies of the best edition of the work then published must be deposited. If the work is by a foreign author and has been first published in a foreign country, one copy is sufficient.³ In the case of a contribution to a periodical, one complete copy of the issue or issues containing the contribution is required. The copies deposited must be accompanied by a 'claim of copyright', i.e. an application for registration, giving certain specified information. Application forms are supplied by the Copyright Office upon request, which should state the exact nature of the work to be registered, as there are many different kinds of forms. The fee for registration of a published work, including the certificate, is $2.⁴ No action or proceeding for infringement of copyright may be maintained until the provisions of the law with respect to deposit and registration have been complied with.

If the required copies are not deposited promptly the Register of Copyrights may demand them, and if they are not thereafter deposited within three months if published in the United States, or six months if published in a foreign country, the copyright owner is liable to a fine of $100, and to pay to the Library of Congress twice the retail price of the best edition of the work, and the copyright becomes void. The law does not define the meaning of the word 'promptly', but it has been judicially held, in other connexions, to mean 'without unnecessary delay'. In a

² There is something artificial and pedantic about these regulations, but it has been held that copyright is a grant upon conditions and that these conditions must be complied with, or protection will not be obtained.

³ As to foreign books in English, see ad interim copyright, below, p. 896.

⁴ Except that a published photograph may be registered for $1 if no certificate is desired.

recent infringement case a delay of 14 months was held too long for a monthly periodical, and the copyright owner was denied recovery.¹ It seems clear, however, from the provisions above cited, that copyright is not lost by failure to deposit promptly, but only by failure to deposit within the prescribed time after demand by the Register of Copyrights. Accordingly the Copyright Office will accept copies and make registration at any time within the first term of 28 years from publication. Nevertheless, the advisability of prompt deposit needs no emphasis.

When the provisions of the Act as to publication with notice and registration have been complied with, the Register of Copyrights will issue a certificate. This is prima facie evidence of the facts stated in it as to ownership, date of publication, authorship, and other details going to show the existence of the copyright. It has been held in some cases that the certificate is prima facie evidence of the copyright, making it unnecessary for the owner to present other evidence of his right in a suit for infringement, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.² It would seem unnecessary to say that the certificate is not the 'copyright', but only evidence of the copyright's existence. As such, it is indispensable not only for use in court in case of infringement, but also in negotiating the assignment of copyright or the licensing of rights thereunder. Duplicate, or additional, certificates or 'copies of record' may be obtained at any time after registration by any one desiring them, upon payment of the fee of $1.

American Manufacture

The Copyright Act provides that, of a printed book or periodical, 'except the original text of a book of foreign origin in a language or languages other than English, the text of all copies accorded protection under this act except as below provided, shall be printed in the United States'.³ This is the much-criticized 'manufacturing clause', successor to the similar provision in the Act of 1891. It is of course intended to benefit American labour, and has no essential connexion with the protection of the rights of authors, which are the subject of copyright legislation. It applies to all books in the English language, whether of American or foreign authorship. It seems clear, also, that it is meant to apply to books in foreign languages by American authors, for the term 'foreign origin' can only mean foreign authorship. It doubtless applies as well to books in foreign languages by authors of foreign nationality domiciled in the United States, for such authors are assimilated, as to both rights and obligations under the copyright law, to American authors. An American citizen may not send his book abroad to be printed if he wants copyright, neither may the domiciled foreigner, who by virtue of his domicile enjoys the same rights as the American author.

The positive requirement of American printing extends to 'a printed book or periodical', while the exception mentions only 'a book of foreign origin', &c. This is believed not to mean that a periodical of foreign origin (i.e. authorship) in a foreign language may not be copyrighted, for each article in a periodical is a 'book' in the meaning of the law and if each such book may be separately copyrighted, then the compilation may be copyrighted. Accordingly, it has been the practice of the Copyright Office to register foreign periodicals as 'books'.

¹ Drew Pearson, et al. v. The Washingtonian Publishing Co., decided in the Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, 25 April 1938; 98 Fed. Rep. (2d) 245. But this decision has since been reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court, which held that mere delay in depositing copies will not destroy the right to sue for infringement. Washingtonian Publishing Co. v. Pearson, 30 January 1939. 40 U.S. Patents Quarterly 190; 59 Supreme Court Reporter 397.

² Wimark v. Calloway, 22 Fed. Rep. 412.

The expression 'a language or languages other than English' indicates that even though the work consists largely of a foreign language, yet if it contains English in any substantial quantity, it must be printed in its entirety in the United States.¹ But if a complete, separate work in a foreign language is included with a work in English, it would seem that such foreign language work may be separately copyrighted.

The manufacturing section of the Act provides that if the text of a work be produced by lithographic or photo-engraving process, then it shall be 'by a process wholly performed within the limits of the United States'. This would seem to be complied with by photolithographic reproduction in the United States of a book originally printed from type set or plates made in a foreign country, for the nature and origin of the copy from which the photolithographic reproduction is made cannot matter, so long as the lithographic process is entirely performed in the United States.

The requirement of American manufacture applies 'to the illustrations within a book consisting of printed text and illustrations produced by lithographic process, or photo-engraving process, and also to separate lithographs or photo-engravings, except where in either case the subjects represented are located in a foreign country and illustrate a scientific work or reproduce a work of art'. In other words, if the case is one where the text must be printed in the United States, then so must the illustrations if made by lithographic or photo-engraving process unless they represent (reproduce) subjects located (permanently) in a foreign country and unless such subjects are works of art or unless the lithographs or photo-engravings are illustrations in a scientific work. There is no requirement of American manufacture as to pictures made by other than lithographic or photo-engraving processes, e.g. photographs, line engravings, woodcuts, etchings, &c.

Books which must be printed in the United States must also be bound there. The application for registration must be accompanied by an affidavit as to such printing and binding.

Ad Interim Copyright

When a book in the English language, not printed in the United States, is first published in a foreign country, the law provides a particular course of action to facilitate compliance with the American manufacturing provisions. If a copy of the foreign edition is deposited in the Copyright Office not later than 60 days after publication abroad, with the required application, an ad interim Copyright is secured, 'which shall have all the force and effect of copyright under this Act' and shall endure for 4 months after the date of deposit. If within the period of the ad interim copyright an authorized edition of the work is manufactured in the United States and published with the copyright notice, then when the provisions of the law shall have been complied with as to deposit and registration, the copyright will be extended to endure 'for the full term elsewhere provided in this Act'—that is for 28 years from the date of first publication. Although the ad interim copyright is not 'secured' until the deposit is made in the Copyright Office, yet when secured it seems that it must revert to the original date of publication, for, first, the extended copyright obtained after republication in the United States runs from ¹ The speculative character of these observations is due in part to the rather surprising absence of any judicial decisions since 1909 on the manufacturing provisions.

'the date of first publication',¹ and, second, if the book were not protected during the period of 60 days permitted for the deposit, infringement might take place with impunity and destroy the value of the copyright. The situation may be conceived as giving the author, publisher, or other copyright owner up to 60 days of protection, conditioned upon a deposit within that period, followed by 4 months more.

Supposing that ad interim copyright has been secured but the required American manufacture and publication with notice do not take place in time, will a subsequent manufacture and publication suffice? Supposing again that no effort has been made to secure ad interim copyright, but an edition is reprinted in the United States and published with notice, and that this republication takes place, let us say, within 4-6 months after its initial publication abroad; may copyright then be had? There are no decisions of courts to aid in answering these questions, but it may be suggested that every effort should be made to comply with the ad interim provisions when first publication takes place outside the United States. The law lays down a precise method to be followed to secure copyright in such cases. To say that copyright may be secured by following some different course seems to imply that the ad interim provisions are superfluous—a rather dangerous assumption. Of course, if the book is not 'first published in a foreign country' there is no necessity for ad interim copyright. But first publication in the United States will defeat international copyright in the countries of the Berne Union,² and simultaneous publication in the United States and in a Union country, as Great Britain or Canada, is difficult of arrangement, as regards most books of foreign authorship.

Importation of Copies

Section 31 of the Statute forbids, during the existence of copyright, the importation of 'piratical copies', by which is understood copies produced without the consent of the author or copyright owner.³ It further forbids the importation of copies of works which are not produced in accordance with the manufacturing requirements of the law, subject to certain stated exceptions, the most important of which are (a) importation of one copy at a time for individual use and not for sale, and (b) importation of not more than one copy in any one invoice by public libraries and educational or learned institutions. The prohibition of importation serves both to reinforce the manufacturing requirements and to preserve the American market for the American copyright owner, who is, however, no more privileged than any one else in the matter of bringing in copies. Obstinate battles have been waged before Congressional committees on the question of privileged importation, the American publishers asserting that the copyright, which should be exclusive within the American domain, is interfered with by many importations of single copies, while librarians and others insist as strenuously upon their privilege of bringing in copies of English editions which, it is said, are often better for their purposes than the American reprint. This is one of the points at which the copyright 'monopoly' conflicts with the feeling of 'personal liberty' of the American citizen. Another similar point, in connexion with the performance of music, will be referred to later.

As ad interim copyright has 'all the force and effect given to copyright by this Act', copies cannot be imported after the ad interim copyright has been registered,

² The provision of the British law giving a 14 day leeway is not a part of the Berne Convention.

³ They are not infringing copies, strictly speaking, so long as they remain outside the sphere of United States copyright.

but may be up to that time. The question whether copies may be imported under the copyright law is of course quite independent of the obligation to pay any import duties which tariff laws may require. The importation provisions are enforced by the Customs Bureau of the Treasury Department and not by the Copyright Office.

Copyright for Unpublished Works

What has been said so far as to the formalities necessary to secure copyright relates to cases where publication is immediately necessary or desirable, but for certain classes of works specified in Section 11 of the Copyright Act, 'not reproduced in copies for sale', i.e. not published, copyright may be secured merely by the deposit in the Copyright Office of a copy of the work, or an identifying reproduction of it, 'with claim of copyright', that is, an application for registration. The deposit required is one complete copy, if the work be a lecture or similar production, or a dramatic, musical, or dramatico-musical composition; a title and description, with one print taken from each scene or act, if the work be a motion-picture photoplay; a photographic print, if it be a photograph; a title and description with not less than two prints taken from different sections, if it be a motion-picture other than a photoplay; a photograph or other identifying reproduction, if it be a work of art or a plastic work or drawing of a scientific or technical character.

The first observation to be made regarding these provisions for copyrighting unpublished material is that they apply only to the classes of works specifically named in Section 11 of the Copyright Act. All works may be copyrighted by publication with notice; but only works coming fairly within one of the classes enumerated in Section 11 may be copyrighted without, or before, publication. Books, periodicals, maps, prints, and reproductions of works of art are classes of works named by the law in its classification Section 5, as subject to copyright, but not named in Section 11 as entitled to copyright without publication; hence as to these classes the procedure to follow for obtaining copyright is publication with notice. As to other classes, there is an alternative. The point is of chief importance with regard to books, which term, as has been mentioned, includes all literary works (using the word 'literary' in the broadest sense) not otherwise classifiable. Some nice distinctions have to be made here. A lecture, sermon, or address prepared for oral delivery may be copyrighted as an unpublished work. But a book does not become a lecture merely because it may be orally delivered. A lecture, on the other hand, becomes a 'book' upon publication. Dramatic compositions may also be copyrighted without publication. A dramatic composition is a work prepared for acting usually by more than one living actor, each impersonating a character other than his own, and the copy to be deposited for copyright must be reasonably complete; that is, in such form that the play might be acted from it. A story may be dramatic in content, but that does not make it a dramatic composition for purposes of copyright registration. It remains a book and must be published with notice in order to receive copyright; so a synopsis or scenario in narrative form, which is merely preliminary to a complete play, cannot be registered as an unpublished work. Much of the material prepared for radio broadcasting is of doubtful classification, but since it is prepared for oral delivery, the class of works so described¹ comes perhaps nearest to covering it. Where a work is clearly a dramatic composition, however, the fact that it has been prepared or adapted for performance before the microphone, or the motion picture camera, does not alter its essential nature.

Correct classification is important therefore, especially as between books and other kinds of literary works, in order to decide whether they may be copyrighted without publication. It is important in some other respects, as will be seen later.

Section 11 of the Copyright Act closes with the following provision:

'But the privilege of registration of copyright secured hereunder shall not exempt the copyright proprietor from the deposit of copies, under sections twelve and thirteen of this Act, where the work is later reproduced in copies for sale.'

The purpose of this provision is undoubtedly to secure to the Library of Congress the copies of published works to which it has a claim. But as Sections 12 and 13 require registration, the provision has been construed as requiring the same formality upon publication as though no previous registration had been made, and the right to maintain an action for infringement has been denied for failure to fulfil these formalities.

Other questions which arise upon publication of a work previously copyrighted under Section 11 are: from what date does the term of 28 years begin and, in that connexion, what year should be given in the copyright notice? It is believed that in both cases this is the year in which copyright was obtained by deposit of the unpublished copy and not the year of publication (if later); but it may be desirable to add to the notice a statement showing that the work was published in such and such a year.

Classification of Copyrightable Works

It has already been indicated under the topics of copyright notice and unpublished works that the law recognizes distinctions in classes of copyrightable works, entailing different methods of obtaining copyright, and differences in the rights obtained. Section 4 of the Statute provides that 'all the writings of an author' may be copyrighted. Thus the grant of protection is as broad as the language of the Constitution permits. Anything which is the writing of an author may be copyrighted, if the proper steps are taken. Nevertheless, the Statute proceeds, in Section 5, to prescribe classes into which all copyrightable works may be divided, and in Section 1 certain rights are granted generally, while others are granted in respect of some specific class. The applicant for copyright registration is required in Section 5 to specify the class to which his work belongs, and while an error in classification will not impair his rights, it may play a part in their determination. An exhaustive treatment of the subject of classification is impossible here, but the person seeking copyright protection should study the classification schedule of the Statute and if in doubt consult the Copyright Office before filing an application for registration. The classes named by Section 5 are as follows:

- (a) Books, including composite and cyclopaedic works, directories, gazetteers, and other compilations.
- (b) Periodicals, including newspapers.
- (c) Lectures, sermons, addresses (prepared for oral delivery).
- (d) Dramatic or dramatic-musical compositions.
- (e) Musical compositions.
- (f) Maps.
- (g) Works of art; models or designs for works of art.
- (h) Reproductions of a work of art.
- (i) Drawings or plastic works of a scientific or technical character.
- (j) Prints and pictorial illustrations.

(k) Motion-picture photoplays.

(l) Motion pictures other than photoplays

Reference may here be made to the provisions of Section 6 relating to certain derivative or secondary works, based on works already existing, viz. 'compilations or abridgments, adaptations, arrangements, dramatizations, translations or other versions' of existing works, and 'works republished with new matter'. These are not separate classes of copyrightable works; their classification depends on the nature of the works on which they are based and the kind of authorship exercised in producing the derivative works. This new authorship is the basis of a new copyright. If the original work is copyrighted, then the consent of its owner must of course be obtained for making the new work, but when made, it enjoys a copyright life of its own, independent of that of the original work.

The Act says that the derivative works may be copyrighted as new works. This does not mean, especially as regards 'works republished with new matter', that the copyright in the original is revived or prolonged, but only that the new copyright is obtained in the same manner as any other copyright. Take for example a translation: the authorship is in the translator, not in the original author, and each translation is independent of any other. If the work is in the public domain, there may be any number of translations, each having its own copyright, one not interfering with the other. So indeed there may be if the original is copyrighted, provided the copyright owner consented to the making of such translations, though it is customary to grant an exclusive right of translation to a particular translator. Like considerations apply to dramatizations, new arrangements of music, and to the other derivative works mentioned in Section 6 of the Copyright Act.

Mention must be made of certain things which definitely cannot be copyrighted. Section 7 names some of these, including works in the public domain in which copyright once lost cannot be revived, works published before the passage of the Act (1 July 1909) and not then copyrighted (which is in fact one class of works in the public domain), and publications of the United States Government. (But the use of copyrighted material in a Government publication does not destroy the copyright.)

Titles of work cannot be copyrighted. They may be protected against a wrongful competing use under principles of equity relating to unfair competition and in certain cases they may be registered in the Patent Office as trademarks, but this has nothing to do with copyright. The title of a work is recorded in the course of registration of copyright, but only for the purpose of identifying the work, not to give a monopoly in the use of the title.

As a matter of public policy, the courts have held that there can be no copyright in obscene matter, but it is hard to say at the present time how far this principle would be applied.¹

Assignment of Copyright

Copyright, like other kinds of property, may be assigned, or the use of the copyrighted matter may be licensed under conditions fixed by the copyright owner. The difference between an assignment and a licence is that the former relinquishes the ownership of the copyright and transfers it to another, who may then assign it again, while a licence merely permits something to be done which would otherwise be unlawful and does not change the ownership of the copyright. An assignment of the copyright must be in writing, signed by the copyright owner. A licence may be oral, but is better put in writing also. A licence may relate to any specific use of copyrighted matter, e.g. publication, dramatization, performance; an assignment must relate to the entire copyright,¹ although it may convey only a partial interest, as one-half or one-quarter. In case of infringement the owner by assignment may of course bring suit in his own name, but a licensee must sue in the name of his licensor, the copyright owner.

The statute does not require the use of any particular form of words for an assignment of copyright, but if the owner means to assign, he should say 'assign', and if he only means to license, he should say 'license'. Loose wording in this respect is likely to give rise to trouble in case of dispute. It is true that the use of the word 'assign' will not make the instrument an assignment if its other terms clearly indicate the contrary, but it will help to show the intention of the parties.

Copyrights may also be mortgaged or bequeathed by will.

While the transfer of a material article, e.g. a painting or manuscript play in which copyright exists, does not 'of itself' transfer the copyright, nor does the transfer of the copyright carry the article, yet the two usually go together unless circumstances and the language of the assignment clearly indicate the contrary. But when a particular copy of a copyrighted work has been sold, the copyright owner cannot interfere with the use of that copy. For example, he cannot fix by copyright the price at which it may be re-sold.

The law provides that assignments shall be recorded in the Copyright Office within 3 months from their execution in the United States, or 6 months if executed in a foreign country. Failure to record the assignment renders it void against a subsequent assignee who pays value and has no notice of the previous assignment, and who himself duly records his own assignment. But this does not mean that an assignment is absolutely void if it is not recorded. It still remains good between the assignor and assignee, and it may be recorded at any time. An assignment made in a foreign country should be acknowledged before an American consular officer or secretary of a legation. The fee for recording assignments is $2 for each page or fraction of over half a page of the document. There is no limit to the number of separate copyrights which may be included in one assignment, but they should be clearly identified.

Renewal of Copyright

Copyright runs for a first term of 28 years and may be renewed for a second term of 28 years upon application filed in the Copyright Office at any time during the last year of the first term, by the person or persons belonging to the class named in the statute as entitled to renew. These classes of persons are as follows:

1. The author, if living.
2. The widow, widower, or children of the author, if the author is not living.
3. If none of the foregoing be living, the executor of the author's will.
4. In the absence of a will, the author's next of kin.
5. The proprietor, in case of:
 - (a) A posthumous work (one published after the author's death).
 - (b) A periodical, cyclopaedic, or other composite work originally copyrighted by the proprietor.
 - (c) A work which was originally copyrighted by a corporate body (otherwise than as assignee or licensee of the original author).
 - (d) A work originally copyrighted by an employer for whom such work was made for hire.

¹ Notwithstanding some decisions referring to 'assignment' of specific rights, the better view is that the copyright is indivisible.

It will be seen that the renewal does not, in general, go to the owner of the right for the first term, unless such owner happens to belong to one of the classes named. The renewal term is a new and separate grant, the right to which becomes vested only upon the arrival of the last year of the first term. Consequently the renewal right cannot be assigned by the author or other owner of the original copyright in advance of the time when it accrues. Such assignments indeed are often made, and if the assignor (usually the author) be living when the time comes to renew, he may be obligated in equity to carry out the terms of his agreement by applying for renewal registration and then assigning the renewal term. But, if he should die before the time comes to renew, the obligation becomes void. It does not bind his widow, children, or executors.

If the work, the copyright in which is to be renewed, was first published as a contribution to a periodical or other composite work, then the author, or those in succession to him, have no right of renewal unless the contribution was separately registered at the time of first publication. Otherwise the renewal right is a part of the proprietor's right to renew the copyright in the periodical. The proprietor may see fit, after renewing the copyright in the periodical, to assign to the author, or his heirs, the renewal copyright as to the particular contribution in question. He may even assign, before renewal, the unexpired copyright in the contribution, in which case the assignee becomes 'proprietor' in respect of the contribution, for Section 3 of the Statute gives to the proprietor of a composite work 'all the rights which he would have if each part were separately copyrighted', and this must include the right of assignment. Such a partial assignee then takes, presumably, the place of the proprietor and may renew in his own name. Thus it is possible to accomplish, by a roundabout method, what the statute does not directly permit, always assuming that the proprietor can be found and is willing to assign.

The provision permitting renewal by a proprietor where the work was one made for hire is intended to cover the same class of cases as those in which the employer for hire would have been the 'author' under the definition of Section 62 of the Act. It covers presumably those cases where the common law relation of 'master and servant' exists, but not cases in which the author had the status of an independent contractor, or where the work was made outside the scope of the author's employment.

'Proprietor' in relation to renewal rights seems to refer to the owner of the copyright when the time for filing the renewal application arrives, and not necessarily the original proprietor.

Where there are several members of a class entitled to renew, e.g. children of the author, all may register the renewal jointly, or one may act for all. This is the situation where there are several authors, the case that most frequently occurs being that of musical compositions, with words by one person and music by another. Either the author of the words, or the composer of the music, or their respective widows, children, &c., may renew. In such cases there are not separate renewal copyrights, in words and in music, but one copyright in the entire work, just as there was to begin with. The situation is one which leads to the filing of conflicting applications, all of which the Copyright Office must accept, since it has no power to adjudicate between them. Here, as in other respects, the renewal provisions of the copyright law are much in need of clarification, either by amendment or judicial interpretation. In fact, there is a good deal to be said in favour of doing away with renewal copyright entirely and substituting a single continuous term. The argument in favour of renewal is that it affords the author, or his family, an opportunity to secure the benefit of the increased value of a work which has made its way slowly, as do some of the most valuable intellectual productions. On the other hand, the requirements for renewal are so complicated and difficult of fulfilment that the second term of copyright is often lost.

Rights under Copyright

As already stated, copyright is a bundle of rights to do certain things with, and to, the work of an author. These rights are exclusive, and only the owner of the copyright, or some one authorized by the owner, may exercise them. Another way of putting the matter is that copyright is the right to keep others from doing with or to the copyrighted work what any one would have the right to do were it not copyrighted. Since copyright, as distinguished from the author's common law property right, is entirely the creature of statute, it follows that the only rights which it comprises are those given by the language of the Statute, construed according to its reasonable meaning.

The specific grant of rights is contained in Section 1 of the Copyright Act. Chief among them is the right given in subsection (a) to make and distribute copies. This right is applicable to all kinds of works, while the other rights granted are restricted respectively to certain specific classes.

The group of rights enumerated in subsection (b) of Section 1 relate to modification or transformation of a work, usually resulting in a new copyrightable work, such as translation, dramatization, and arrangement of music. The right to dramatize includes the right to make a motion picture photoplay, which is a kind of dramatic composition.¹ If the work from which the motion picture is made is already a dramatic composition, then the grant is doubtless included under the right to make any other version (Section 1 (b)).

Equal in importance with the right of publication, at least with respect to drama and music, is the right of public performance. The copyright owner of a dramatic composition has the right without qualification; in the case of music, the right is restricted to a public performance 'for profit'. Thus the copyright owner of a play can license or prohibit its performance even for non-profit-making educational or social purposes, while the copyright owner of music cannot. However, indirect profit or the purpose of profit is enough, and thus the widespread commercial use of music by phonograph or radio comes within the control of the copyright owner.

The recent invention of radio broadcasting has naturally given rise to new problems in copyright law. Broadcasting, precisely speaking, is not itself a performance, but the process by which a performance is transmitted; and the interesting fact is that with every broadcast, there are at least two performances, one at the transmitting, the other at the receiving end.² The performance at the transmitting end is public and that at the receiving end may be, in which cases both performances (if for profit) are within the control of the copyright owner.

The law gives to the copyright owner the right of public delivery for profit for 'a lecture, sermon, address or similar production'. Some works prepared for radio broadcasting come within this category, but the right has not so far been held to extend to literary works in general, that is books.³ A poem is not a 'similar production'.

Under Section 1 (e) the copyright owner has originally the exclusive right to make phonograph and other mechanical records of a musical work. If he exercises this right or permits another to do so, any one else who desires may do so upon the payment of a fixed licence fee of 2 cents for each record. This compulsory licence provision has been criticized as 'price fixing', as setting one price for all works, good or bad. The purpose of its adoption and one of the arguments still advanced in its favour is that it preserves the accessibility of the music to all manufacturers of records and thus prevents the formation of a super-monopoly.

Copyright owners of music have organized in order to collect fees for performance, and the largest such organization—the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP)—issues general licences to perform any or all of the music which it controls, on an annual or seasonal basis. The activities of this organization and some other similar 'performing rights societies' have met with a good deal of criticism and opposition from some of the users of music. It seems probable that copyright owners could not effectively assert their performing rights as individuals, and that the operations of such societies in the United States, as in the many foreign countries where they exist, while possibly calling for some public regulation, are, on the whole, no less beneficial than legitimate.

There is no copyright in sound records themselves, but only in the matter reproduced upon them. They were held by a decision of the Supreme Court prior to the present Act not to be 'copies' of the matter so reproduced, and this is still the law. The present law therefore appears to give no general right of making records from copyrighted books and other works, but only a restricted right in respect of musical compositions. The question, however, has not been passed upon by the courts.

Infringement

Infringement may be generally defined as doing without the copyright owner's consent anything which the law gives him an exclusive right to do. As the right to copy is the basic right in copyright, so it has been said that the gist of infringement is unauthorized copying. Even in other types of infringement, such as unauthorized performance, there is a reproduction analogous to copying, and the principles laid down by the courts in determining whether an infringing copying has taken place are applicable in all cases of infringement.

Copying has been judicially defined as 'the exact or substantial reproduction of an original, using such original as a model, as distinguished from an independent production of the same thing'.¹ But this definition does not go quite far enough. There may be, for example, a three-dimensional reproduction of a work of art in two dimensions, and vice versa.² The point in the quotation is the reference to independent production. There is no copyright in the subject or idea of a work, and two authors may produce works closely resembling each other without having copied one from the other. Such close resemblances are rare, and almost impossible in literary works of any extent; they occur more frequently in the realms of music and the graphic arts and particularly in photography. It is well to remember in this connexion that priority of creation is of no importance in copyright law.

The unauthorized copying which is infringement does not need to be complete or exact. It is enough that a substantial part be taken, or that the language of the copyrighted work be substantially followed. On the other hand the ideas of the copyrighted work may be expressed in other language without infringement. It has been said that copyright in a literary work inheres in the order of the words. In a dramatic composition, it also inheres in the order of the incidents—the plot, but not in the theme, which is only a central idea.

While what is taken must be a substantial or material part, it need not be of great extent. For, of course, if the work itself be brief, infringement may take place when only a few lines or words are copied.

This brings up the question of quotations, which seem to give much concern to conscientious writers. The doctrine of 'fair use' laid down by the courts is that a reasonable amount of quotation from a copyrighted work is permissible for purposes of criticism, comment, or illustration. It is evidently impossible to formulate a rule to fit all cases. There is no fixed number of lines or words which may be quoted without permission, or any set number of bars of music which may be so performed. The good faith of him who quotes is an important though not a final factor. Hence, it is desirable to give credit in quotation of any extent.

Another question frequently raised is that of copying for personal use. If the language of the law be literally taken, this is doubtless, at least technically, infringement, for the American law does not limit infringement to copying for commercial use, as is done in the British and some other laws. On the principle of de minimis it is highly improbable that a person who has copied a short poem in his notebook will be haled into court as an infringer; but where a public library makes a photostat or microfilm copy of a work for some other library, or even for the private use of a scholar, the situation may be different. Here the copyright owner has been deprived, pro tanto, of his exclusive right. The copy is a substitute for one which he might otherwise have sold.

Copyright infringement is a tort—an encroachment upon a property right—and the ignorance of the infringer is no excuse. Infringement may sometimes take place innocently, as where a publisher issues a work received by him under a fraudulent claim of authorship, or where the copyright notice has been inadvertently removed. This does not remove liability but may mitigate damages.

Remedies

An article of this kind obviously cannot treat in detail of legal procedure. Any one who has prospects of becoming either plaintiff or defendant in a suit for infringement will seek the advice of a lawyer. A few of the main points as to remedial action, however, may not be out of place.

Suits for copyright infringement are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, whose rules must be followed. In almost all cases the form of action is a bill in equity praying for an injunction against further infringement, damages, and an accounting of profits. The statute provides that upon proof of infringement, the copyright owner may recover all the damages he has suffered as well as all the profits which the infringer has made. Since both damages and profits are often difficult of proof, there is a provision that 'in lieu of actual damages and profits' the plaintiff may recover 'such damages as to the court shall appear to be just' and that 'the court may in its discretion' allow certain amounts, not to be less than $250. It has long been the generally accepted view that under this provision the copyright owner was certain to get not less than $250 wherever infringement was proved. But this opinion is rendered doubtful by a decision of recent date holding that where any actual damages or profits are proved, the court has no discretion to award statutory damages.¹ The result of this decision is curious, for where the defendant has made, say, $10 of profits, the plaintiff must be satisfied with this sum; but where there are no profits, the defendant must pay at least $250.

International Copyright Relations

The right of citizens of a foreign country to obtain copyright in the United States is usually established by presidential proclamation, under Section 8 of the Copyright Act, based on satisfactory assurance that the foreign country in question grants copyright to Americans. Such proclamations have been issued as to most countries. A list of these countries is printed in Bulletin 14 of the Copyright Office. The more important exceptions are Russia, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey. The effect of the proclamation is simply to put citizens of the country to which it relates on an equal footing with American citizens—to accord national treatment—usually with respect only to works published after the date of the proclamation. Special proclamation is required for the establishment of the right to make mechanical records of music.

There are also a few copyright treaties and two multilateral conventions with Latin-American countries. To one of these, the Convention of Buenos Aires, signed in 1910, most of the South American countries have adhered. This treaty goes beyond the mere granting of national treatment. It grants protection in all the adhering countries to a work copyrighted in any one of them, without any formality other than a statement printed on the work that the property right is reserved. Unfortunately, a recent decision of one of the courts appears to ignore this express provision, holding that the requirements of the American law must be complied with.¹ This decision, however, may not be final.

The rights of American citizens under the copyright law of foreign countries depend upon action under the laws of those countries or under the Berne Convention revised at Rome in 1928, by which first or simultaneous publication in one of the countries belonging to the International Copyright Union,² even of a work by a citizen of a non-union country, automatically secures copyright in all the countries of the Union. The United States, in spite of prolonged agitation, still remains outside the International Copyright Union, and American authors suffer serious inconvenience and loss on this account. America, either with or without a much needed revision of our antiquated and artificial domestic law, should take its place with other civilized countries in the system of universal reciprocal protection of intellectual property for which the Berne Union affords the best basis. There is room for hope that this action will not be much longer deferred.

APPENDIX IV

PERPETUAL CALENDAR

OLD English documents are dated in various ways, and the tables below are designed to make it easier to convert their dates into terms of the modern calendar. The elements in the problem are as follows. At Rome, according to the calendar established by Julius Caesar and known as the Julian Calendar, the year began on 1 January, and although under Christian influences other dates were chosen for the beginning of the year, the pagan usage survived and the term 'New Year' continued to mean 1 January. Early English chroniclers adopted a year beginning on Christmas Day (this was known as the Year of the Incarnation or the Year of Grace). From the latter part of the twelfth century the year, according to a mode of reckoning which had its origin on the Continent, was accepted in England as beginning neither on 1 January nor on Christmas Day, but on the following Feast of the Annunciation or Lady Day (25 March). This remained the legal and official mode of reckoning until the reform of the calendar in 1752. Consequently any document dated in England between 1 January and 24 March during the period from the thirteenth century to 1751 probably belongs to the year, according to the modern calendar, after the date it bears. Legal and official documents, moreover, were dated, not by the year of our Lord, but by the regnal year of the reigning king, a custom which survives in the method of numbering Acts of Parliament and in the dating of the Journals of the Houses of Parliament. Private documents, again, were usually in the Middle Ages dated by a Saint's Day or Feast, or by the day of the week so many days before or after a Feast. A further complication arises after 1582, in which year Pope Gregory XIII promulgated the Gregorian Calendar (see Calendar) or New Style. This was shortly adopted in Catholic countries, but England clung to the Julian Calendar till 1752, so that from 1583 there was a difference of ten days between her calendar and that of many continental countries. This gap increased to eleven days in 1700, which was a leap year in England, but not according to the Gregorian Calendar. By the Act 24 George II, cap. 23, of 1751, the Gregorian Calendar or New Style was adopted in England: the day following 31 December 1751, instead of being 1 January 1751, became 1 January 1752, and the eleven days between 2 September and 14 September 1752 were omitted. This put an end to the confusion which had prevailed owing to the concurrent use of Old Style and New Style. Scotland had altered the beginning of the year to 1 January from 1600, but in other respects retained Old Style till 1752.

The Roman Calendar. Bulls and other papal documents were dated in terms of the Julian Calendar. The Roman year was divided, like ours, into twelve months, each containing the same number of days as the corresponding month in our calendar. In each month there were three special days, known respectively as the Kalends, Nones, and Ides. The Kalends were the first day of the month; the Nones and Ides were the 5th and 13th respectively, except in March, May, July, and October (the 31-day months of the Roman Calendar before the reform of Julius Caesar), when they were the 7th and 15th. The other days of the month were numbered with reference to the Kalends, Nones, or Ides, as being so many days before one or other of them, but in this reckoning the first and last days of the series were both included. Thus A.D. (ante diem) V Kal. Jun. (the fifth, or as we should say the fourth, day before 1 June) was the designation of 28 May; A.D. IV Id. Jun. =

10 June; Prid. (pridie) Id. Jun. = 12 June. Every fourth year an additional day was introduced by doubling 24 February (the sixth day before the Kalends of March, so that these years were known as bissextile).

Indictions. The indiction was a fiscal period of fifteen years, at the commencement of which the property tax in the Roman Empire was reassessed. It was instituted by the Emperor Constantine (but had an earlier origin in Egypt) and was reckoned from 1 September 312. It became a means of dating ordinary events and transactions, and the expression 'Indiction 5', for instance, signified the fifth year in the relative indiction. But the indiction date, sometimes given in medieval documents, is not to be relied on, at least in certain periods.

The Dominical Letter (from dies dominica, Latin for Sunday) is a convention adopted in chronological tables to indicate the day in January on which the first Sunday falls in any particular year; from which the day of the week for every day in that year can readily be found. The letters A to G, corresponding to the numbers 1 to 7, are taken for this purpose, so that if the first Sunday falls on 1 January, the Dominical Letter of the year is A; if on 2 January, the Dominical Letter is B, and 1 January in that year is a Saturday; if on 7 January the Dominical Letter is G, and 1 January is a Monday. The first day of successive ordinary years falls on successive days of the week, and their Dominical Letters are consequently in the reverse order of the alphabet. In leap years the interposition of 29 February has the effect of making 1 March and the remaining days of the year fall one day later in the week than if the year had been ordinary. Accordingly a leap year is treated as if composed of January and February of an ordinary year, and of March–December of the succeeding ordinary year, and two Dominical Letters are assigned to it, viz. those appropriate to the two years in question. Thus the year 1216, being a leap year, has the Dominical Letters CB, because the first Sunday in 1216 fell on 3 January, while the days of the months from March to December fall on days of the week corresponding to a first Sunday, in an ordinary year, on 2 January.

In TABLE I below, the years in the first, fifth, and sixth columns are 'historical' years (1 January–31 December). The dates of Easter Day and of the beginning¹ and ending of regnal years, from 1066 to 1752 inclusive, are according to the Julian Calendar or Old Style. From 1583 to 1752 the date of Easter according to the Gregorian Calendar or New Style is added in a separate column. From 1753 all dates are New Style. The date of Easter connects this table with Table III, and the Dominical Letter connects it with Table V.

TABLE II is an abbreviated calendar for 1752, in which year the change from Old Style to New Style was made.

TABLE III gives the dates of the principal movable Feasts according to the various dates on which Easter Day may fall. The Dominical Letter connects this table with Table V.

TABLE IV gives the dates of the fixed Feasts and Saints' Days most frequently used in dating documents.

TABLE V, used in conjunction with Table I, makes it easy to find the day of the week on which any day of the month fell in any year from 1066 onwards.

¹ From the time of Edward VI a reign was reckoned as beginning on the day of the predecessor's death. For earlier reigns the date of commencement given below is that on which, according to public records, the reign was regarded as having begun.

* Date of deposition.

† In 1340 Edward III asserted his claim to the French crown and added his French regnal years to his English regnal years.

‡ In 1360, by the Treaty of Brétigny, Edward III surrendered his claim to the French crown.

§ In 1370 Edward III resumed his claim to the French crown, counting in the years 1360-9 during which his claim had been in abeyance.

COMMONWEALTH*

* Charles II reckoned his regnal years from 30 January 1649 (the date of the execution of Charles I) but did not reign in England until his restoration, 29 May 1660. During the Commonwealth public documents were dated according to the year of our Lord. Oliver Cromwell died 3 September 1658. Richard Cromwell abdicated 25 May 1659, after which the government was carried on by Parliament and the Army until the restoration.

† Date of the restoration of Charles II.

‡ Queen Mary died in the night of 27-8 December.

* 25 February in leap years.

Note. The occurrence on the same day of a movable and a fixed feast was apt to cause doubt and difficulty, e.g. if Ash Wednesday coincided with the feast of a patron saint, or Easter with Lady Day. There appear to have been in the Middle Ages no precise rules, observed by the Christian churches at large, for resolving these difficulties. But in England Clement Maydeston (c. 1390-1456) drew up a 'Directorium Sacerdotum' or Priests' Guide, based on the Sarum Ordinale, in which he dealt, among other things, with the celebration of feasts in the different contingencies arising from the variations of the calendar. By the end of the 15th cent. this work had obtained wide acceptance in England. Early in the 16th cent. its place was taken by the Sarum Pica or 'Pie', where its rules were adopted, and this was incorporated with the Sarum Breviary. The precise rules may be conveniently found in the 'Directorium' and the 'Tracts' of Clement Maydeston, reproduced in vols. vii and xx of the publications of the H. Bradshaw Society. Their underlying principle is that when two feasts coincide which cannot be conveniently celebrated on the same day, the inferior feast is transferred to the first unoccupied day.
